We also wanted to show leadership because there was very high inflationary pressures, mostly due to unit labour costs which went up by 25 percent, while American costs, by contract, stayed at zero, or basically at the same level. Therefore have a series of decisions was taken to maintain and indicate very clearly our commitment to sound fiscal management.

The day after we made the budget announcement, I remember meeting with Daryl Bean to explain to him what our position was. I had not previously informed him of our budget intentions. I tried to explain to him why we had taken these difficult decisions and what room we had to manœuvre. So we talked about job security and ways of making sure that our employees would see the brightest side of these difficult decisions.

Mr. Bean very quickly said—and you may have read about it following the budget—that he would never accept this, that this was a political strike, that he would prepare for it and that he would never, ever, give in to what he called the Conservative political agenda. I did not make any harsh statement at the time. I went around the country: I went from Thunder Bay to Vancouver, Halifax, Moncton, St. John, Toronto, Quebec, Montreal. I met with thousands of employees, union members, union representatives, managers. I tried to explain to them what we were going through and why it was crucial to their own future that we maintain control at a time when the fiscal situation of the government was at great risk.

Mr. Bean said that we legislated to implement our political agenda. Well, I have some surprises for him. Is it a Conservative political agenda that was implemented by certain of the provincial governments, of which many are Liberal? The Newfoundland government is not a Conservative government. They did not negotiate; they legislated zero percent. We decided we would not legislate; that we would try to negotiate. The McKenna government in New Brunswick did not negotiate; they legislated zero percent. The Manitoba government legislated zero percent. The Quebec government got the unions to agree to zero because of the very difficult situation the country was going through.

But Daryl Bean was preparing himself for his own election and he decided to have a go at us and to make it a political fight. I think anyone who has listened to him in the past few weeks will understand that he was more out after the government than he was concerned with the wellbeing of his union's members.

I stress that these are harsh realities that we must deal with. I might even add that one N.D.P. government—which can hardly be accused by Mr. Bean of being a Conservative government—has become caught up with the harsh realities of life and today announced that it would freeze for two years the salaries of certain categories of employees, including senior civil servants and politicians.

That is even worse. That is something we did not do because we put money in pay equity.

Mr. Bean says he is concerned with lower income people and women. The Ontario government had to make a difficult decision and announced today that it would save $50 million by delaying the improvement to pay equity and would delay spending another $50 million on the implementation of junior kindergarten programs.

So all governments in Canada have to deal with a difficult situation. The reality is that it has worked. We have seen the inflationary pressure go down. We have shown leadership. We have been followed by the provinces and the private sector. We have lower inflation and therefore lower interest rates, and we are seeing our way out of the recession.

Basically, honourable senators, I wanted to explain to you, as fairly as I could, the reasons why we took these measures. We tried to negotiated very openly. We spent 90 days at it. We had 30 days of conciliation and we could not get anywhere. Yesterday Mr. Bean explained that he was out to defeat this government, so there was not much chance for us to reach a settlement. Thank you.

Senator Frith: Mr. Minister, you have said that many other governments have legislated rather than negotiated and that you decided to negotiate first. Did you ever tell Mr. Bean that you were prepared to negotiate zero, three and three?

Mr. Loiselle: No.

Senator Frith: Was that, in fact, ever negotiable?

Mr. Loiselle: I told him that a collective agreement contains a large number of clauses. There are many different ways of improving the situation of our employees and, inasmuch as our target was not to penalize our employees in any way, we would do everything we could to try to improve their situation. But the zero, three and three was followed by the provinces. Even this morning a new union arrived at a tentative agreement with us with zero three in it. It became very obvious. But Mr. Bean said he would get the government to break this decision and go back on its fiscal decision, which was crucial, in my view, for the wellbeing of the country.

Senator Frith: But are we to understand from your evidence that when you said you decided to negotiate rather than simply to legislate, that "negotiate" meant no negotiation on zero, three and three?

Mr. Loiselle: We were not prepared to give in on the zero, three and three, but it was there to be discussed.

Senator Frith: But not given in on. Minister, I want to ask you about some specific points. Can we say that there will be no bonuses that do not go through this bill?

Mr. Loiselle: Yes. The government's decision at budget time was that this would be a zero year for everyone. The year does not necessarily start at the same time for everyone. Within PSAC there are some collective agreements, because it represents 28 different groups I think. Some kick in in August, some in September. For managers in the public service it kicks in in June. For crown corporations I think it is April. So as of April there is zero increase in salary for everyone until April, 1992. At the end of the year, when bonus time comes, the bonus will be zero dollars.

May I say that why it is not in the bill is because we have all kinds of premiums. For example, we have a premium for bilingualism, for ships quarters, and for working at night. There are all kinds of premiums we pay to our employees for different reasons and we did not want that to be covered.

Senator Frith: There could be premiums or bonuses that would be granted in spite of this bill?

Mr. Loiselle: Our decision is not to grant any bonus to anyone for the one-year period.

Senator Frith: Is it possible that there will be premiums or bonuses in spite of this bill?

Mr. Loiselle: It will not be possible, because it is not the policy of the government to do it and it will not be accepted at Treasury Board.

Senator Frith: Is there any room for negotiation on pay equity?

Mr. Loiselle: We were prepared to discuss pay equity at the National Joint Council because it is a question which goes beyond one particular union. As you know, we are dealing with a large number of unions, such as PIPS and others. The Alliance is not the only one. We do not want, in this particular area, to start making one deal here and another deal there; but we were quite open to discuss this. As you know, we made a considerable effort. We are abiding by the law, and in, I believe, January, 1990 we gave $370 million for pay equity, and we also announced that every year we would be giving $81 million to continue catching up. We have told PSAC that inasmuch as we have a judgment that is being discussed, we left it there. It is given to the individual, but it is not rolled into salaries. We told PSAC that one thing we can do with pay equity is to roll in the amount with the salary which, when they get 3 per cent next year, would raise the salary, and also when they get the pension. So we were trying to find within these budgets ways of trying to improve the overall package for our employees.

Senator Frith: I seem to be having some semantic trouble here. When I ask you, Mr. Minister, whether there is room for negotiation, you always answer using the word "discuss" rather than the word "negotiation." So that you will understand, what I mean by "negotiation", is flexibility, that there is the possibility of actually yielding position on it; but you say that you are prepared to "discuss" it rather than "negotiate" it.

Mr. Loiselle: No, we were negotiating. I must say we had a rather tight mandate, but if you look at the offers we put to PSAC I think you will find that in the circumstances a lot of people would be rather pleased to have this. When we agreed that we would put the legislation on hold and PSAC would ask the employees to go back to work, we agreed that we would not proceed with the bill or go back on strike until such time as the negotiations broke down. Mr. Bean said, "I am not going to lose time. I will give myself 24 hours or 48 hours and if I do not get anything serious I will leave."

I would like honorable senators to remember that Thursday evening we were still discussing and we put two offers to him, on employment security, which is very crucial to PSAC members, and we tried to do everything we could, within a fairly tight mandate, I do not disagree. My feeling was that Mr. Darryl Bean was trying to get through the back door what we could not give him through the front door, and our intention was not to give him 5 per cent indirectly; it was to try to deal with the realities of the money we have.

Senator Frith: Is there any reason why contracts are outside this?

Mr. Loiselle: It is because that would be totally impossible to manage. We hire secretaries from an agency for one week. It is not our mandate to ask her agency to impose zero, three and three. I do not think we can start regulating this. We can manage with our own employees, whom we control, but on contracting out we try to get the best possible deal, and when it is cost effective we proceed with that approach.

Senator Frith: The amount of contracts is quite significant, is it not?

Mr. Loiselle: I would not accept the numbers given by Mr. Bean. I think this number was picked out of his head. Canadian governments have been proceeding with contracts to engineers and lawyers for millions of dollars for decades, if not for a century, so this is a normal approach. The security of employment for Mr. Bean's members is theoretically the concern he has, but let me remind you that since 1986 the Treasury Board has had under it a quarter of a million employees. Approximately 1,200 have had to leave against their will, and, in most instances, because they did not find it convenient to move. We always take care of our employees. We spend up to two years retraining them. We offer them other positions. We pay for their transportation to these places. So we have a very good record. Last year, out of 210,000 employees, at a time when hundreds of thousands of Canadians were out of a job, 102 of our employees had to leave against their will. So I think we have probably the best record of any organization in Canada, if not in North America.

Senator Frith: You say that it is not practical to put a limit on contracts. My recollection is that the six and five policy did put a limitation on any contracts where there was a base line they could work on. I take it you could do that too if you so wanted. Let me ask you about a mediator. Is there any chance that you have changed your mind and that there should be a mediator?

Mr. Loiselle: I would like to make this absolutely clear. We have entered into this in good faith. We have had 60 days of negotiation, 30 days of conciliation. We agreed to go back to the table. We made offers on the table. They were not the end of the world. Mr. Bean would have preferred an offer of a 6 percent increase, and I do not disagree with that, but we made two significant offers on Thursday evening. He didn't even consider them. The next day he broke the agreement we had by asking his members to go back on the street. Then he said, "Now that I have broken my side of the deal, you come back to the table or send out a mediator." With all these pressures, particularly with the way the pickets behaved—and this was not a very pretty sight for public servants—I found that very sad. Therefore, I was not at all inclined to appoint a mediator, and I have said there was no room for a mediator in that particular period. We had 30 days with a board of three conciliators.

Senator Frith: There was an amendment put forward that the Human Rights Act should have supremacy over the bill with regard to changes that might be sought to the compensation plans while the zero and 3 cap is in force; for example, in the event of a ruling on pay equity by the Human Rights Commission. Did you reject that as unreasonable?

Mr. Loiselle: Yes, Senator. What I can say is, there was a misunderstanding that was settled eventually with the Opposition. They were reading the act as if this bill would cause us not to be subject to the Human Rights Act, but the situation was exactly the opposite. We stated that our act would apply but that the Human Rights Act would have overall supremacy.

Senator Frith: I will be proposing some amendments, Mr. Minister, and I wanted to give you a chance to comment on the amendments. You have done so.

I have one further question, and it arises from a question asked earlier by Senator MacEachen of Mr. Bean. It deals with the question of time zones and implementation. My recollection is that you recognized, when the union last went back to work under the circumstances you earlier described, there might be some difficulty in implementation because of time zones. You responded favorably and gave us an undertaking that, notwithstanding clause 25, which is the clause on proclamation, a return to work at 12 noon local time on the day following assent would be acceptable. I can just leave it at that if you are prepared to give us the same undertaking that you gave on the previous occasion.

Mr. Loiselle: Our intent is that the bill comes into effect 12 hours after Royal Assent. Some people may be going to work at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, so it is the shift after the 12 hours. So eveyone has to abide by that. I do not think we would win anything by having this kind of disruption across the country. I think that 12 hours after Royal Assent, people should be aware of the bill. If there are peculiar situations respecting certain individuals, I am sure managers can deal with that with an open mind; but I would prefer we do it this way, that they are supposed to return to work 12 hours after Royal Assent and the next shift.

Senator Frith: Is that what worked last time? Are you giving us the same undertaking you gave us last time?

Mr. Loiselle: Yes.

Senator Frith: So gave the union the opportunity to get in touch with its members, and that aspect which concerned Mr. Bean apparently worked. Are you telling us that it worked last time to his satisfaction and yours?

Mr. Loiselle: Yes. I think the unions have found ways to get in touch with their members very quickly when they want to leave the workplace. So I should think it would work the other way around. In any case, the members will probably be made aware today of where we are.

Senator Frith: So long as we are clear on the record that whatever arrangement you and Mr. Bean made last time, that took into account the difficulty Mr. Bean raised—namely the fact that some members might have to start at 3 a.m.—you are also prepared to implement this time.

Mr. Loiselle: Yes. I said the 12 hours and the next shift. So that should allow all—

Senator Frith: Is that what you did the last time?

Mr. Loiselle: Perhaps I could ask one of my assistants. I am not familiar with all these details, unfortunately, but I can check that.

Senator Frith: I can leave that so long as I know that the same arrangements that worked last time are suitable this time to both the government and Mr. Bean.

Mr. Loiselle: We are very comfortable that this can work without any problem, and if there are problems, the managers will deal with them. I do not think senators should have cause to worry about this.

Senator MacEachen: On that point, I asked Mr. Bean about the problems caused for the employees by the "coming into effect" provisions of the bill, and I understood him to say that in Ottawa, for example, 12 noon had a certain significance in that it would require, if I recollect, up until 12 noon—

Senator Frith: Local time and the day following assent.

Senator MacEachen: If, for example, Royal Assent is given today, it would require up until noon tomorrow to provide sufficient time to have the employees back at work at that time.

Mr. Loiselle: Obviously, I do not share Mr. Bean's view.

Senator MacEachen: That is the request that Mr. Bean made to this committee, or asked, or made the view known. This is the type of undertaking you might give that would help the employees to go back to work. Are you saying you cannot make that undertaking?

Mr. Loiselle: No. I think that for the good of the employees, the sooner we get on with this and allow them to go back to their lives and their work the better it is. If we start playing with a few hours here and there and create time deadlines, there is the question of why not noon here and why not noon somewhere else. We are in a position to appreciate that there are difficulties. I would suggest 12 hours after Royal Assent. I do not know when Royal Assent would be given. That is not for me to decide. When it is given, we will give ample time for people to get back as quickly as possible, because they will be getting their salaries earlier.

Senator MacEachen: Your view is that "as quickly as possible" would be your requirement. If that turned out to be a situation where all employees went back together, and were given an opportunity to go back together, which is the desire of the leadership, in the interests of returning together—

Mr. Loiselle: But they are not necessarily all working together at the same place or the same shift. Some may start tomorrow afternoon and others may start tomorrow morning or tomorrow evening.

Senator MacEachen: I understand that.

Mr. Loiselle: I think it is going back to the normal working day. That seems to me to be the reasonable thing to do.

Senator MacEachen: But that would not meet what seems to me to be a reasonable request, namely, that employees be permitted to go back together, at the same time. This would obviously require different times in various time zones.

• (1850)

I gather that you are not ready to go that far; but you are saying "as quickly as possible."

Mr. Loiselle: I said the next shift. Our employees work at different periods of time. We also have time zones. That gives us all the time needed. Most of them would be glad to get this done and not start playing another game. They would then receive their salaries as quickly as possible. That is my view.

Senator MacEachen: Let us follow this up, because it is a key point. Suppose that the leadership decided to respond positively to the will of Parliament and ordered or suggested that its employees return to work by saying that "in the interests of our common action, which we have taken together, we return together."

Mr. Loiselle: But we are not organizing a manifesto; we are organizing a back-to-work—

Senator MacEachen: No; I am asking if that would satisfy you. Would that be "as quickly as possible" from a union point of view? Would that meet their requirements? In light of the result of this legislation—that is, the knowledge that the law is likely to be obeyed and that work will be resumed—a concession of that kind at this point would seem to be rather marginal. In the interests of overall tranquillity and harmony, certainly a healing process is required. This might be a gesture that would aid in that healing process.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Mr. Loiselle: Yes, you could interpret it that way. It is my great desire that we heal this situation as soon as possible. I will certainly be doing everything I can to accomplish that. Our employees deserve that. We had to go through this sad detour of a strike, which is unfortunate, because no one wins in the end.

Basically the longer they wait the more money they lose. I do not think there is any point in causing them additional harm. If they have personal reasons for not being able to make it, they will be considered and dealt with in an intelligent and open manner.

Senator MacEachen: I take it there is some flexibility in your thinking on these matters, which is desirable in these circumstances.

Senator Molson: Mr. Minister, I should like to ask you a question about the practice of contracting out. What is the general policy of the government with regard to contracting out? It is always brought up in union matters because, obviously, it is considered as something that affects the growth or membership of the union. To that extent it is undesirable. Mr. Bean brought up the fact that the cost of contracting out has gone from $2 billion to $5 billion in a few years. What is the general policy of the government with regard to contracting out?

Mr. Loiselle: Since 1984 we have tried to bring to our management some discipline of the private sector to. With the taxes that Canadians pay, they expect us to choose the most efficient way to operate. In so doing we have all been very careful to protect our work force. But we have to define contracting out. Mr. Bean talks about contracting out, but, for example, hiring lawyers is something that has been going on in the Canadian government for some time; we did not invent that.

Basically, when a manager realizes that he can, at a cheaper rate, more efficiently accomplish something that is limited in time instead of hiring new public servants, we do it. We have reduced the number of public servants by roughly 13,000 by attrition or otherwise. Whenever there is contracting out that applies to a unit, we have a work force adjustment policy. We have devolution, for example, and when an employee has to go to the private sector he wants us to pay 12 months salary. It is so much better working for us than in the private sector that employees must be paid to make the move. We must not be so bad as employers. We are careful to balance the two.

I have been a public servant for most of my life. I have worked with public servants in Great Britain, France, Italy and Africa. We have certainly the best public service in the world.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Mr. Loiselle: But it has to be modernized. It is far too top heavy. In the process of managing our resources we cannot continue with it in its present state, with our spending $1.33 for every dollar that we receive. It makes for fantastic opportunities to spend, but it also creates problems.

We have tried to reduce spending. Contracting out is one way that is available to us. But the numbers that Mr. Bean quotes are totally irrelevant; I do not know where he gets them. Some departments have more, some have less. They come with proposals. The question is: How can we best manage the areas that we have to cover? In certain instances, contracting out does not make sense; in others it could be a way to be tried. We are open to ways of managing more efficiently.

Senator Molson: In the matter of contracting out, is any record ever kept of how many man-days will apply to any given contract, or is it merely the job to be done and the amount of money involved? Is the amount of manpower utilization taken into account in contracting out?

Mr. Loiselle: Yes it is. In a way it is part of the overall cost of any particular project. Honourable senators may like to know that we have been trying to move to operating budgets, where a department—for example, the passport office—can have enough fees to cover its costs, and so on. Instead of having person years, which is only one element of a particular project, we have an operating budget. We say to the manager, "To get this done, you have this much." You may say, "I will hire more people," or higher less, as the case may be.

We try to recruit good managers. We then write thick books about how they should buy a typewriter. We give them some responsibility. They may, within their resources, decide to contract out part of an operation. It has not increased to that extent, but it is there. The Government of Canada cannot manage such a huge organization without having access to all the tools that are available for efficient management.

Senator Olson: Mr. Minister, Mr. Bean told us a few minutes ago,—and you may have heard it before—that there was no discussion with him or with the bargaining agent for the union that there would be an ultimatum—that is the word he used. I call it an "offer"—of zero, three and three, prior to the budget announcement that was made on February 26. Is that the way to establish good labour relations?

Mr. Loiselle: Budget secrecy is something that can be discussed, and one can have different views about how it can be done. There are countries that have a very open process. In this particular instance I think the honourable senator would recognize that it would have been difficult for me to sit with Mr. Bean and tell him that tomorrow Mr. Wilson will announce this and that and that I am very sad or that it is terrible, or inform him of measures in the budget. I did meet with him shortly before and indicated to him that the situation was difficult, to the extent that he made a speech or a statement the day before the budget in which he said that if there were a freeze, it would be a political decision and he would fight it to the end. He had already made up his mind. Basically that is were we are. I could not inform him in advance.

I called him in the following day and went through the reasons. He looked at his personal PSAC case and never budged from it. He said that they had been targeted and asked me if I wanted them to reduce the deficit all by themselves, which is ridiculous and not at all the case. He said something to the effect, what is $2 million? If it is not much money, why should we worry?

Basically he decided that he would not accept this, and he said bluntly yesterday evening that his real intention was to overthrow this government. That is his problem. Basically we did not make much headway because of that. We were trying for the solution that the government had proposed. Again, when the strike was on I met with him and told him, in no uncertain terms, of the limits in the mandate of my negotiator. He said that he understood. It was not out of pleasure that we took these decisions but out of necessity, based on good fiscal policy.

Senator Olson: I understand that, but under the law you are required to enter into collective bargaining in good faith. I am pretty sure that is true. Do you think you can just make reference to a cabinet or government decision respecting a budget announcement and throw all collective bargaining obligations aside?

Mr. Loiselle: Tell that to the 146,000 Canadians who were thrown out of their jobs in January and February. Most of them had signed collective agreements. This is a tough reality that we are dealing with. People at Air Canada had a signed collective agreement; people in some provinces had signed collective agreements that were reopened. We are going through a very difficult recession and we decided, as the government, that we would do something about it and ask our employees to be part of the solution. One can agree or disagree, but I find that Liberal governments have done the same thing in the provinces this year. Conservative governments have also done it, and today the NDP government is doing it. So there must be something real about the situation.

Senator Olson: When both sides agreed to terminate the strike about two weeks ago or so, I am sure I heard you offer to negotiate. Now we are told that you went back to the table and said, "We are here but we can tell you already that the result will be zero, three and three." Is that right?

Mr. Loiselle: With respect, we offered much more than that because we put things on the table.

Senator Olson: As far as I am concerned, it was the same offer as on February 26.

Mr. Loiselle: We had our position and we said that we did not intend to move from it for obvious reasons. We have had many agreements. As I said this morning, we had a tentative negotiated agreement at zero and three. We knew it was possible, because six other unions had accepted that kind of an agreement, so there must have been some room to maneuver. I would not deny that the mandate was rather strict.

Senator Olson: We were also told that one of the preconditions of getting back to negotiation was that the union acccept the zero, three and three and then you would talk about other things.

Mr. Loiselle: What is the difference between a precondition and a condition? We do not ask you to fall on your knees and ask that you accept zero, three and three before we talk about everything else. We have always been open to that.

Senator Olson: So the assertion that you wanted them to agree to that clause before you got to talking about other things is not correct?

Mr. Loiselle: It is not correct.

Senator Molgat: I have two quick questions: The first one is a follow-up to what my colleagues, Senator Frith and Senator MacEachen, have discussed on clause 25. This has been a very difficult, process for everyone—the union, Canadians and the government. There will have to be a healing process. It seems to me that some give by you on clause 25 would go a long way toward assisting in that healing process. We have to face the fact that there are some difficult problems for the union.

I think there is such a thing as the Ottawa syndrome—and I should hope that you would not get caught up in that, Mr. Minister—whereby everything revolves around Ottawa. We heard from Mr. Bean today, who said to us that he did not like the legislation. We too, do not like the legislation, but given the circumstances it should pass at an early stage. Supposing we pass the bill between now and eight o'clock this evening. Twelve hours is fine in Ottawa, because that means that the bill will come into effect at eight o'clock tomorrow morning. However, Vancouver that is five o'clock in the morning. I think it is an unrealistic time.

So, Mr. Minister, I appeal to you to go back to what you arranged previously. You asked someone up in the gallery if what you were doing now is the same as before, and they shook their head. You may not have seen it, but I did. So I would ask you to go back as part of the healing process that we must go through. Would you be prepared to consider that?

Mr. Loiselle: You say that if we have Royal Assent here in Ottawa tonight at eight o'clock, it would cause problems in Vancouver. If it is five o'clock in the morning there, it gives them more time to get organized.

Senator Molgat: Yes, but very little time to reach those people during the night. Are you prepared to go back to the arrangement you had previously?

Mr. Loiselle: Which arrangement?

Senator Molgat: When you had an agreement with Mr. Bean as to the process of going back to work.

Mr. Loiselle: The 12 hours I have, of course, respected as well as the following shift. I think that we will capture most people. Some will jump a day, I suppose. But I think that would normally be sufficient for people to get back to the workplace. I think they will be anxious to go back. The healing process is extremely important and the sooner we get this behind us the better. If we start to have other people come in for those who stayed it may create other problems, so that may not be the best way to manage things. In all fairness, it is not a matter of a few hours, but a matter of trying to manage things as well as we can for the employees.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Molgat: It also means showing some goodwill on your part, does it not, Mr. Minister?

Mr. Loiselle: The purpose of that plan is to try to get the healing process going as quickly as possible.

Senator Molgat: It seems to me that you are showing great rigidity. We were told that the day before the budget there were increases of some 4.2 per cent grnated to management groups. How can you justify that?

Mr. Loiselle: First of all, that is not correct. We had a group of managers make recommendations to a committee. These recommendations are brought to us in June after the year is over. The evaluation is made and it comes to us in the fall. The recommendation made by an outside committee of business people was 6.2. I said that I would not give that kind of an increase. I looked at the situation and compared it with numbers from outside, and I decided that for 1989-90 it would not be 6.2 per cent but 4.2, which is less than PSAC got for the same period.

However, for this year—June to June for senior management and April 91 to April 92 for government—it will be zero dollars for everybody, salaries and bonuses. The announcement was made because of the delay. If I had given them 6.2 per cent the previous December, nobody would have mentioned it. However, the announcement being made late in the year, they said that "you just got it," but the increase was for the previous year when everyone got a raise anyway.

That has never been made clear. I was surprised that even in Ottawa, where people should know better, they never seem to understand this. However, it was very useful for their arguments, but it is not the case that they got a bonus before the budget.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I presume that in reaching the fiscal objective which the government had in mind it could have been achieved in a different way. Instead of putting the zero-three-three in the budget, and in a sense putting aside the collective bargaining process, the government might have said, "In the next three years we are prepared to put aside X dollars for compensation increases and then we negotiate." That could have been put in the budget, apart from the numbers.

I am led to conclude that you must have had some symbolic purpose in mind, namely, to indicate to the country, through the budget, that you were being tough, because I think you could have achieved the same fiscal objective and maintained at the same time collective bargaining options. You could have done something in year one, and less in two, or more in three. Why did you choose that route?

Mr. Loiselle: With respect, we offered three per cent for the first year but we said there will be a trade off. We will freeze the wage budget. Every year we have a few thousand civil servants who leave by attrition. We said that no individual will suffer, but we will freeze the wage budget and we will give you three, but for every one per cent 2,000 positions will be removed and that would be for 12 months, that is, from the date for the full convention. They said that we were asking them to pit one worker against the other. This is the reality Canadian companies have to live with every day.

Eventually with the months passing by, the year was too far advanced for us to be able to find this money without having to lay off people, because to get one per cent out of a shorter year more positions would need to be closed. So we said that we would go back to zero increase.

There was some flexibility. It could have been two per cent, without any members of PSAC practically losing their jobs. They made it a philosophical debate, so we could not get anywhere very fast for that reason.

Senator MacEachen: I take that point. However, notwithstanding that point there was the alternative of proceeding with a certain allocation for wage compensation over a three-year period, without specifying in the budget the annual amounts, and than to negotiate how the total allocation was to be divided. I just wonder why you did not choose to do that.

Mr. Loiselle: Yes, but, with great respect, two, two and two would be six. It sounds the same, but the end amounts are very different, and I know the honourable gentleman knows that.

Senator MacEachen: You are not dealing with the point, if I may say so, with respect.

Mr. Loiselle: I said, perhaps before you came in, senator, that indeed we wanted to send out a clear signal. There was this worry by people who were investing. They said that there was a recession, less money coming in to the government; companies and individuals were going bankrupt; there were more unemployed. This was dangerous and they would start charging us a price for it: higher interest rates. So we said we did not intend to budge because this was more important than a one-year difficulty. It would have thrown us into difficulty for many years; so we decided very openly to take difficult measures. They were all difficult; none of them were easy. We have been cutting for six years, but that is the price we have to pay.

Senator MacEachen: But you seem to have sought the most difficult route to achieve an objective that could have been achieved by an easier route and one that would have preserved collective bargaining. That is my opinion.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, if I may, I know that honourable senators opposite have some amendments to propose, which they are as anxious to propose as we are anxious to hear them. With your permission, I will thank my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, for appearing here and for his testimony.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT—MOTIONS NEGATIVED

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman and colleagues, I have a series of six amendments to propose. I will make the following proposal and recommend that leave be granted for me to deal with them in this way: I will table the amendments. I will not read the longer ones, but will give an explanation of the pith and substance of each amendment and what its justification is. Rather than waiting to go through the bill and having me propose an amendment as the clause comes up, we might then vote on them en masse, as a group or as pooled. Those that are accepted can be considered included in the clauses of the bill when they arrive, and those that are rejected we will, of course, vote against because of your refussal to accept them. I say this to all my colleagues. There may also be some on this side who do not like these amendments, I do not know. That is my suggestion and I think I can do it in quite a few minutes, if you agree.

Senator Murray: That is agreed, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, amendment number one deals with the question of persons engaged as independent contractors. It is put into effect by amending clause 3 by adding immediately after line 2 on page 4 the words, "persons engaged as independent contractors." If you want to make notes, amendment number 1 deals with independent contractors.

I do not think that I need say anything more about that, except to tell you that my information is that the cost of contracting is about $5 billion plus and is higher than the entire salary budget of members of the Public Service Alliance, which is $4.7 billion. My justification for the proposal is that if fiscal restraint is really the purpose of this bill then contract increases should be similarly constrained.

Amendment number two is that Bill C-29 be amended by adding immediately after line 18 on page 4 the following, and it deals with the Treasury Board revising the classification system to incorporate fully into pay scales the compensation now paid to certain employees and groups of employees as equalization payments in respect of pay equity.

Therefore, amendment number two deals with the question of pay equity, which we and many others feel is a very serious lacuna in this bill in that it does not effectively deal with the question of pay equity. Honourable senators will have noticed that a good deal of the protest, and the very strong protest, by the members of the union was based on the fact that this legislation is particularly harsh on women and does not deal fairly with the question of pay equity.

The third amendment deals with the question of mediation and provides that the Chair of the Public Service Staff Relations Board shall name a mediator acceptable to both parties who will endeavour to mediate all matters referred to the mediator to bring about agreement between the parties. There are two other clauses that deal with the same point.

Senator Oliver: What clause is that?

Senator Frith: The section is after line 18 on page 4. It is a substitution. It makes substitutions to clauses 5, 6 and 7, which are really just to buttress those particular amendments.

Senator Kelly: That is not exactly crystal clear, senator. I cannot follow you at all; but I will try.

Senator Frith: My proposal was that I would tell you what the substance of each amendment was. If you want me to go through each one line by line, I will be glad to do that.

Senator Kelly: Senator, you started off—

Senator Frith: What we were attempting to avoid was your saying to me, "On what page is that?" and so on. I will start at the beginning and go through it page by page.

Senator Kelly: No, senator.

Senator Frith: If you are asking me what the subject is, the subject, whether you find it crystal clear or not, deals with that subject. If you want me to go line by line, I can do so.

Senator Kelly: You are misunderstanding me totally, senator. You started out identifying the page to which you were referring. I was hoping you would continue to do that. That is all.

Senator Frith: I will if you like. I read the first one on that basis because it was only one line. I did not do so on the others because when I asked for leave to do it this way I thought I could save time by saying what the subject matter of the thing was, leaving aside the question of wanting to say, "Oh, I see this comma is here and that is there."

The next amendment deals with awards, including wage rates and other terms. This is an attempt to allow the parties, if they agree in writing to do so, to amend the terms of a collective agreement or arbitral award except wage rates. This amendment allows for wage rates to be changed as well. It adds to bilateral agreement the possibility of wage rates, which is not possible under the bill as it now stands.

The fifth and last amendment deals with previous compensation plans to adjust by amounts agreed upon by the parties. It is just another version of my earlier amendment.

Honourable senators, if we want to vote on all of those, I will hand them to the Page and they can be taken to the Clerk at the table. We can then deal with them as a package. I have them in French and English.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, I simply say for the record that we are indebted to the honourable senator and his colleagues for having raised each of these matters with, if I am not mistaken, the President of the Treasury Board during his testimony here. For reasons which the President of the Treasury Board advanced in his replies, I for one am not disposed to vote in favour of these amendments.

The Chairman: It is my understanding that there is agreement that we now proceed to vote on the five amendments.

Senator Frith: The amendments handed to the Table in a package are now before us, as explained by me and as commented on by Senator Murray.

The Chairman: I am not sure whether there is agreement for five votes or one vote.

Some Hon. Senators: One vote.

Senator Frith: One vote, unless anyone wants to vote on any one separately.

[Senator Kelly.]

The Chairman: It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that the amendments as explained by Senator Frith and delivered to the Clerk at the Table be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the C-29, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Chairman: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, before we agree to give leave on this matter I want to make our position unequivocally clear. We are opposed to this bill. We do not believe that this bill should carry. We do not believe the way the government has handled this whole affair has been the way it should have been handled. However, we heard this afternoon from Mr. Bean, who represents the union, that there should be no delay.

We know that the situation is creating hardship across the country. We realize the serious problem. It is only on this condition that we agree to the passage of the bill, but it is most reluctantly that we do so. We do not like this bill and are opposed to it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to revert to Orders of the Day:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Hounourable Senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government and I have discussed this matter, and I understand that it is the desire of the government to move it forward. We have agreed to give leave, but I believe Senator Corbin wishes to make a few comments on second reading of the bill.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, with leave, I move second reading of Bill C-11, an Act to amend the Railway Act (grain and subsidies).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Government): Leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, it is my intention to speak to this bill, but not at this stage, for obvious reasons. I will make my comments on third reading. This legislation takes away about $40 million from the economy of the Maritime provinces, and I want to address that matter when the bill returns from committee.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to introduce second reading of Bill C-11. This bill implements an undertaking made by the former Minister of Finance in his budget of April 1989. Its purpose is to remove the federal subsidy on the eastward movement of flour and grain.

The cancellation of the subsidy was effective July 15th, 1989. Until this bill passes, however, the railways have no statutory basis on which to construct a new rate schedule. For that reason, and because this bill has been long delayed in its passage in the other place, I commend this bill to the Senate's urgent consideration.

To understand Bill C-11, one must understand at least some of the history that lies behind the so-called "At and East" railway structure. So, honourable senators, I beg your indulgence while I recite some of this history.

The "At and East" rates were originally conceived to allow Canadian ports on the Atlantic seaboard to meet competition from the Erie Canal which connected Lake Ontario directly to the Atlantic seaboard via Buffalo and New York. With the Erie Canal providing seaboard access at two and a half to three times less than the distance to Saint John and Halifax, Canadian ports simply could not compete.

As a result, on August 26th, 1927, the Board of Railway Commissions issued General Order No. 488, pursuant to which rail tariffs from the Georgian Bay ports to Canadian ports on the Atlantic seaboard would be the same as American rail rates from Buffalo to New York. Hence the name "At and East"; meaning "At and East" of Buffalo.

Later, the "At and East" rail rates were enforced for another reason, namely, to allow Canadian grain to be moved through Canadian ports by Canadian railways at rates commensurate with those of American railways transporting grain from Buffalo to New York.

During the period from the end of the Second World War until 1960 the Canadian rates were adjusted in lockstep with changes in the American railways as authorized by the U.S. Interstate Commerce Commission.

By 1960, however, the Canadian railways argued that they were carrying Canadian grain under the "At and East" freight-rate structure at less than their actual cost of carriage. This was partly due to rate reductions made by U.S. railways to respond to competition from the new St. Lawrence Seaway. However, to protect the producers' interests, the Diefenbaker government suspended a decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners that would have allowed an upward adjustment of the freight rates. That decision stood until 1966.

In July 1966 the Board of Railway Commissioners provided for subsidies to be paid to the railways to make up the difference between the mandated rates and the so-called compensatory rates approved by the board.

The "At and East" rates and the statutory appropriation of the subsidy were included in amendments to the Railway Act in 1967.

From 1985 to 1988 the subsidy cost the federal treasury some $127.5 million dollars, or an average of about $32 million each year.

As all subsidies tend to do, this one distorted market forces. The government believes that, in the long run, Canadian ports and railways can compete effectively with their U.S. counterparts, but have no incentive to compete if the subsidy remains in place.

The government realizes that the transition will be a period of some hardship to the Atlantic region, particularly for the ports of Saint John, New Brunswick, and Halifax. The federal government, through Agriculture Canada, the Ministry of Transport, and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, is working with agri-business in those ports, with the port corporations and the elevator operators, to ease this burden. Options being looked at include financial adjustment assistance and alternate agri-business trade. I understand that, as discussions are consummated, there will be firm announcements from federal and province authorities on the specific actions to be taken.

Honourable colleagues, there were statements made in the other place during consideration of this bill that the removal of the subsidy is the result of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. I can assure honourable senators that this is not the case. This bill is motivated solely by a need to reduce government expenditures, to reduce economic regulations and return more to the discipline of market forces. The FTA is not part of it and has never been part of it.

Honourable colleagues, there is no point in ignoring or obscuring the fact that this bill, when implemented, will have an adverse impact, particularly in the Maritime provinces that are least equipped to withstand such an impact. As I stated earlier, the government is aware of this impact and is working with the local authorities and groups to ease the transition. This was the subject of some comment in the other place.

I guess I have to say, as I have said before, "What is the government supposed to do in matters of this sort?" The larger question is that the deficit must be brought under control. During the debate on the GST, a consistent theme of the opponents to the GST was that the government should make cuts on the expenditure side. Where? People must understand that expenditure cuts will impact the greatest on those who can afford it least, namely, the poorest regions and those individuals and families in the lower economic strata. What those who demand expenditure cuts are too often saying is "Cut away, but do not gore my particular ox!" When their ox is gored, then we hear cries of outrage.

Bill C-11 is about responsible, strategic, expenditure cuts and economic deregulation. It demonstrates this government's commitment to fiscal responsibility and to sound deficit management. It is, therefore, part of a wider scheme, part of a wider approach to public policy which we on this side believe is necessary to assure Canada's prosperity in the coming years. As such, honourable senators, I commend Bill C-11 to your attention.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

• (2000)

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to make it clear that our agreement to let it go forward for second reading does not imply necessarily that we will support the bill on third reading.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

THE LATE HONOURABLE HAZEN ARGUE, P.C.

TRIBUTE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have the unpleasant duty to inform you that a short time ago I was advised that our colleague Senator Argue has passed away. This is not totally unexpected, but there is no way to prepare yourself for something like this even if it is expected.

I suggest, honourable senators, that we adjourn immediately. We will deal with tributes when we come back. At the moment we might observe a moment of silence.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, let us observe one minute of silence in respect for our late colleague.

Honourable senators then stood in silent tribute.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we will be attempting to make the usual arrangements with regard to transportation to Senator Argue's funeral. I do not have those details as yet, but the Speaker's office and the office of the Black Rod will have the information in due course and will be in touch with honourable senators.

Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 22, 1991, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, October 11, 1991

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the question of leave, I want to suggest that this might be the proper moment for us to reflect on this whole question of back-to-work legislation and the fact that we usually deal with it very quickly.

In the case before us, the legislation that is before us now, the effects of the strike on the economy and on the western economy particularly and on our position as a exporter of grain all mean that we cannot fault the government for wanting to introduce the legislation and asking us to deal with it now, rather than observing the two days' notice required by the rules.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I think we have jumped the gun a bit. I called for leave, but we really are still on C-23.

Senator Frith: The bell that rang and brought me to my feet was the word "leave".

THUNDER BAY GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-37, an act to provide for the resumption of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay, Ontario.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I hear the bell again. As I was saying, honourable senators, I do not fault the government for this legislation in the context I referred to, namely, the effect that it is having on our economy generally, and particularly on the western economy, on the farmers and all the grain producers and, as has been pointed out frequently in the debate on this subject in the other place and in the media, the effect it might have on our position and our reputation, not only as efficient growers of grain but as efficient exporters of grain. But I do think, because we have had and will have before us, we know, occasions when the Senate is asked to deal with back-to-work legislation quickly and is asked to grant leave to dispense with the provisions of the rules requiring notice, that it is an appropriate time for us to reflect on the effect that such legislation has on the collective bargaining process and to ask ourselves three questions: Do we and do Canadians generally still really support the principle of collective bargaining? Do we and do Canadians generally still really support the right to strike? Do we and do Canadians generally, at a time like this, consider this kind of legislation from the point of view of the workers, and particularly individual workers?

I think that most Canadians would answer the first question, "Do we still believe in collective bargaining as an important principle in Canadian society", in the affirmative. But—and of course it is the placement of the "but", as usual, that shows the distinction between the principle and the practice. In many cases we say, "I believe in such and such, but . . .". It reminds me of Kin Hubbard's Sayings of Abe Martin: "When a feller says, 'It ain't the money; it's the principle of the thing,' it's the money."

We all say we believe in the collective bargaining process, "but..". That is what we will be saying today. That is what I am saying when I tell you that we intend to give leave. I will be saying, "I believe in the collective bargaining process." We are all saying, "Yes, we believe in that process, but not in this case." Why? Well, as has happened with this government's and previous governments' back-to-work legislation, when in certain industries the employer knows that eventually the effect of any strike on the economy will be serious, the collective bargaining process is affected because the employer knows in advance that he or she will eventually be able to win the strike. That contaminates the atmosophere for both parties. It weights the process in favour of the employer and deprives the employee and the union of their main negotiating strength.

We do not often have legislation brought before us ordering the employer back to the bargaining table. We have legislation, in this case, ordering the workers to end their strike. The legislation is back-to-work legislation, not usually back-to-the-bargaining-table legislation. We do not have legislation saying it will be an offence punishable on summary conviction or indictment of $1,000 a day if the employer does not get back to the bargaining table.

Senator Murray: We have ended lockouts.

Senator Frith: We have ended lockouts, and perhaps you will give us some examples, but it is very rare when compared to the legislation that tells the workers to go back to work: "We believe in collective bargaining, but not in this case."

Do we believe in the right to strike? Again, we will answer, "Yes, but not in this case because of the effects generally on the economy." It means, again, that if we get into the habit of passing such legislation, passing it promptly, that the right to strike, which is the only weapon the worker has, is taken away. The worker's only real weapon becomes a dud shell.

Thirdly, do we at such times make certain assumptions about the worker and the union? I hope we do not. However, underneath it all, are we assuming that the worker goes on strike and should be sent back to work because the worker is capriciously refusing to work or the union is calling the worker out on strike for capricious purposes? Do we and should we not remember, when we are passing such legislation, that from the point of view of the individual workers the chances are that it is a most serious thing for the workers to decide for themselves and their families that the workers will go on strike? It is worth pausing for a moment to realize that the worker we are sending back without a collective agreement goes on strike, puts at risk his house, his mortgage and maybe car and other payments, his rent, his food, his budget for clothing—everything that any other citizen of Canada relies on income to support—and takes the losses and debts that go with the mere strike pay that he or she will receive.

Honourable senators, I hope you will not consider it an imposition that I have used the motion for leave—which we will support—to give some perspective on this particular legislation and, more important, on this type of legislation, because we will pass it. There is no question that even without our support on this side it would pass, but this will not be the last time we will be facing its problems. These other dimensions of back-to-work legislation can easily escape our attention in the rush to deal with legislation abridging the rules, and so force the workers to give up the only real weapon that they have in the collective bargaining process.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Leader of the Opposition.

Part of the problem in a situation such as we have now, and have had as he mentioned several times, is that strikes appear to be against the public interest. We seem to use a very legalese term all the time referring to the "employer". That is part of the confusion that exists. In these strikes the employer is the people of Canada. That fact should be made a little clearer than always talking about the employer as though it was some tough bird from the middle ages who wanted to grind his people to death in order to make a lot of money. It may be the legal term, but it does not strike me as being the most effective description, because the employees certainly suffer from being on strike; there is no doubt about that. But the people who suffermost, if there is any suffering, are the people of Canada. To that extent constantly talking about the employer, when it is the people of Canada, is not terribly helpful to our own analysis of what is good and what is bad for the country.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, we have to distinguish between who is inconvenienced in addition to the employer. The question of the employer in this legislation is not a matter of legal nuance. The employer is not the people of Canada. The employer is the grain elevators, private companies. It is not the people of Canada who are the employers in this case. However, in some cases it is. You could make the argument for the postal strike, for example, and for PSAC.

We have to make that distinction, but we also have to distinguish between the question of who is inconvenienced and the question of the right to strike, because the right to strike is a right to impose inconvenience, but, as I said in my other comments, what we say is, "Yes, I believe that the worker should have the right to strike; it is an inalienable and established right of every Canadian worker to strike—but not if it inconveniences me or my group's interests."

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Not every Canadian.

Senator Frith: That is the precisely point I will come to: Not if it inconveniences a lot of people, not if it affects the economy, not if I do not get my mail.

The right to strike is the right to get attention, to withdraw services and to inconvenience people. It seems to me it is a contradiction in terms to say "An effective but popular strike." Strikes, to be effective, are bound to end up being unpopular.

The whole point of the strike is to point out to people, "Look, I am being asked to work without a collective agreement, to serve you, the public, whoever you might be, and I am withdrawing that service because I think I have a legitimate complaint, and I want you to notice the fact that I am doing that." As Senator Barootes says, the right to strike does not exist for every worker.

Senator Barootes: So it is not inalienable.

Senator Frith: It can be alienated by legislation and we are about to alienate it; you are quite right. That is why I said that we talk about it being inalienable, as a principle, but in fact it is not, because we say we only agree with it in certain cases, and if those certain cases are cases where, as Senator Molson and Senator Barootes imply, it is such an essential service that that inalienable right ought to be alienated, then we should have the courage to delare them essential services and say that they do not have the right to strike, rather than say, "Oh yes, we believe you have the right to strike, of course you do, but not in this case, because your strike is proving too effective."

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, am I right to understand that leave was granted?

Senator Frith: Yes, it is now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f) it is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall that this bill be read the second time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sorry that you were called back here on such very short notice. Some honourable senators could not make it in time, others have been delayed this morning because of fog conditions at some of our eastern airports and still others are here at considerable inconvenience. I appreciate that fact and I thank you for your cooperation.

The situation that brings us here this morning is indeed an urgent one. We are called upon to consider legislation which passed through its three stages in the House of Commons yesterday to end the grain handlers strike at Thunder Bay and to resume operations there.

Honourable senators, last year 40 per cent of Canada's grain exports went through the Thunder Bay terminals. I should say at the outset that, historically—and I am told this by people who are in a position to know—these terminals have had a very good productivity performance. They have also had quite a good record of stability in labour-management relations. The parties have usually needed third-party assistance to come to an agreement, but come to an agreement they usually have done.

There have been three strikes in the past 23 years at Thunder Bay: In 1968 for eight weeks, in 1981 for 13 days, and in 1986 for five weeks. Even those strikes were settled by the parties themselves after a time and with some assistance from neutral third parties, and without the necessity of legislation.

In somewhat more normal times, then, it might have been possible for us to wait and hope that the parties would reach an agreement and end the strike as they always have done in the past. But these are not normal times, honourable senators. You will be aware of the grievous problems that our farmers, the farm economy and, consequently, the national economy is undergoing at the present time. Total farm income is at $2 billion this year, having been, I am told, at an average of $3 billion during much of the 1980s. Net farm income is falling by some 25 per cent this year, after falling by some 12 per cent last year.

Behind these statistics there is a story of personal and family hardship in the farm community, as all honourable senators know. There is also damage to the farm economy and therefore to the national economy—very considerable damage.

The Minister of Agriculture yesterday announced an aid package of some $800 million to Canadian farmers, on top of the arrangements that have been made in recent months for safety net income support programs.

Honourable senators are well aware of the subsidy wars involving the European Economic Community and the United States that have depressed grain prices. The price of wheat is now at $2; something which we have not seen since 1961.

We cannot place our export markets at risk. In the intense international competition that is a fact today, the best support that we can give to farm income is to ensure strong export markets. Indeed, it appears that this year export sales will reach $30 million tonnes, the highest since the 1988 drought.

Mr. McKnight indicated yesterday that considerable efforts are being made, and that there is a high expectation of increased sales to Eastern Europe and to the Soviet Union and, indeed, that increased credits are being made available to facilitate such sales. Exports of grain in any new sale to the Soviet Union would go through the Thunder Bay terminals unless there is a tie-up there taking us to the closure of the shipping season, with the result that all or some of that grain would not make it through the system to the customer, the Soviet Union. This would be a serious blow to our economy. It would be an even more serious blow to Canada's reputation as a reliable supplier of grains.

On top of all this, the PSAC strike, brief though it was, shut down the whole grain-handling system because federal grain inspectors and weighers are members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. At Thunder Bay, the companies simply laid off all the grain handlers during the PSAC strike because the system could not operate without the inspectors and weighers who are members of PSAC.

The PSAC strike ended, and just when the grain started to move again, the Thunder Bay grain handlers stayed out and went on strike as they had a legal right to do.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the previous collective agreement between members of this association and the union concerned expired nearly nine months ago, on January 31, 1991. A conciliation officer designated by the Department of Labour intervened in the spring but was unable to bring the parties to resolve their differences; although the negotiations made some progress, no settlement was reached.

[English]

As I am sure the minister, Mr. Danis, will tell you when he testifies here before the Committee of the Whole, he spoke to both parties last week without success. On Tuesday, he sent his Director General of Mediation and Conciliation, Mr. Warren Edmundson, to Thunder Bay in a last ditch effort to bridge the gap. At 2.30 in the morning on Thursday, negotiations broke off when it became apparent that the parties were too far apart to conclude an agreement.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the bill before us now provides for the resumption of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay and the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator to consider all outstanding issues.

[English]

The Leader of the Opposition has said that the government and Parliament does not often act to send employers back to the negotiating table. However, honourable senators will note that one of the key provisions of this bill does precisely that: it would send both parties back to the table with the assistance of a mediator-arbitrator—not an arbitrator but a mediator-arbitrator; a neutral third party to try to bring the parties together finally to give them one more opportunity to reach an agreement between themselves, rather than have one imposed on them by the arbitrator.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the bill extends the collective agreement from February 1, 1991 until a date to be set by the mediator-arbitrator, until at least January 31, 1993 but not later than January 31, 1994.

The duration of the collective agreement is precisely one of the unresolved issues between the two parties. That is why we will mandate the mediator-arbitrator to decide it.

• (0940)

[English]

Nothing in the proposed legislation restricts the right of the parties to agree to amend any provision in the agreement other than that relating to the term of the agreement. The bill also contains enforcement provisions to ensure compliance with the legislation.

While the Thunder Bay grain handling operations bill, Bill C-37, would bring an end to the current work stoppage, it also provides, as I pointed out a moment ago, an important alternative to an imposed settlement. The appointment of this mediator-arbitrator presents the two sides in the dispute with a further opportunity to avail themselves of neutral third-party assistance in arriving at a solution to their differences.

Honourable senators, there have been some discussions through the usual channels about how we should proceed with this bill. Before I sit down, I will indicate to honourable senators what I believe to be the consensus in this chamber on that matter.

If this bill receives second reading, it would be my intention to propose that the bill be sent to Committee of the Whole immediately. The Committee of the Whole would hear Mr. Daniher, who is the head of the union at Thunder Bay, and the honourable Marcel Danis, the Minister of Labour, who is standing by to be called. Those witnesses will be permitted to be seated at a table here on the floor of the chamber.

As we have done in the past, we will permit television crews into the chamber to record the proceedings of the committee, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons where applicable.

Any amendments proposed or any votes to be taken in Committee of the Whole would be taken at the end of the proceedings, and no motion that the Chairman do now leave the chair would be received during the deliberations of that committee.

Honourable senators, I believe that this represents the consensus that has been arrived at between the leadership of the two parties in the House. I would hope and expect that our friends opposite would confirm this. I conclude now by thanking you for your indulgence and soliciting your cooperation in the expeditious passage of this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, first let me put on the record my agreement with Senator Murray's proposals to deal with the passage of this legislation today. That is certainly my understanding of the details as agreed to by Senator Lynch-Staunton and Senator Molgat, the Deputy Leaders of the Government and of the Opposition respectively.

I also want to put on the record some background information about the dispute that has brought us here today. Within the Transportation-Communications international Union, the inside grain-elevator workers are, as I understand it, represented by Lodge 650. That lodge went on strike on October 3, and there are some 700 workers on the picket line.

As I understand it, the main highlights of the dispute and of the government's actions to date are as follows: The contract expired on January 31, 1991. Labour Canada sent in a conciliator in June, 1991. Negotiations reached an impasse in August, 1991. The main issue in the dispute is pensions, which is a part of the job security package put forward by the union.

The conciliator filed a report to the minister in early September 1991 and, in keeping with the government's current policy, the minister chose not to appoint a commissioner. The minister released the concilator's report on September 24, 1991. The strike deadline was October 1, 1991 at midnight. Those are the highlights of the chronology.

The union's position will be explained by the witness, but I mention it here in case it could serve as a foundation for questions by honourable senators. In the past seven years, a thousand jobs have been lost at the Thunder Bay terminals. Of the 900 people still working at the terminals, 400 jobs are seasonal and the balance are largely part-time workers. In July of 1991, 29 people who each had earned 14 years' seniority, had their jobs terminated.

The pension issue is the key to the job security package being sought by the union. The union put forward a scenario on October 2, 1991, which we believe should and could have brought the company back to the table. The company is the Lakehead Terminal Elevators Association. My information is that they refuse to discuss the pensions issue at all, and that has been confirmed by Labour Canada. The union wants to go back to the bargaining table.

As I have mentioned, the two main issues in the strike are job security and pensions. The hourly rate is not a main issue. The labour minister, Marcel Danis, had stated that the government would not interfere in the dispute, but Charles Mayer, the Minister of State (Grains and Oil Seeds), publicly announced that the federal government intended to legislate the grain handlers back to work by the end of this week. That statement, which was published in newspapers and disseminated through other media, was made in the midst of negotiations and in the presence of an unofficial mediator.

As Senator Murray has pointed out, when the Public Service Alliance of Canada went on strike in early September, Thunder Bay grain handlers, in a show of solidarity, refused to cross their picket lines. As a result, grains for export were not loaded on ships. The Canadian Wheat Board estimated that about $36 million- worth of wheat normally moves through that port every week.

The resumption of strike action by grain handlers, following the termination of the public service strike, independent of PSAC's action, is admittedly creating serious problems in the Canadian economy. Obviously, when suppliers do not deliver the goods, they do not get paid. As Senator Murray explained, farmers are receiving rock-bottom prices for their grains due to international trade subsidy wars. Farmers are the first losers in the game— first losers I suppose after the strikers.

However, I am told that economic opportunities are being lost and Canada's reputation as a consistent supplier of grains can be tarnished. I am told also that some Canadian firms are being forced to turn to American grain suppliers to maintain production levels. With 40 percent of Canada's total grain exports and almost 100 percent of prairie grain exports being shipped through Thunder Bay, there is definite potential for serious economic damage.

Let me underline, let me repeat, but it is important for us to remember in approaching this legislation, that the strike is based mainly on job security and pensions. In the past five years the Lakehead Terminal Elevators Association, the employer, has cut approximately 50 per cent of the grain handlers' jobs; 1,000 jobs, with some estimates reaching as high as 1,500. The union is not requesting the indexation of their pensions; simply an adjustment to them based on inflation. At the table the employer offered a 3 per cent increase in income each year for the next three years, thereby completely avoiding the pension issue. The union has stated that the workers will not return to work until a contract is in place or they are legislated back to work. Unfortunately it will be the latter for them rather than the former.

The Minister of Labour appointed the Director of Mediation and Conciliation to assess the situation earlier this week and the federal government had hoped to see movement at the bargaining table as opposed to employing back-to-work legislation. As I mentioned, Mr. Mayer's public statement that the holdup on transportation of grains out of the port of Thunder Bay could not wait for mediation, and that the government would introduce such legislation, doomed those earlier talks on the spot.

In conclusion, on that background highlighting of the issues there can be no doubt that the recent series of strikes is damaging to the economy. The strike in Thunder Bay is causing economic damage to the farmers of this country who, as evidenced by demonstrations in Winnipeg, are already in a serious condition. The only action the government had taken was to appoint a mediator to assess the situation. In the meantime, one of the players refuses to address the issues while the other one refuses to return to work until a contract has been negotiated or until they are legislated back to work. And always hanging over any talks was the likelihood of back-to-work legislation, and that in fact was done before the week was up.

Grain handlers in Thunder Bay have walked off the job three times in the past 25 years — hardly grounds for an allegation that they have abused their right to strike. I repeat, they have walked off the job only three times in the past 25 years, and each time the dispute was resolved without back-to-work legislation. Twenty-five years without the kind of legislation that we are proposing to pass today.

In the other place Mr. Nault of Kenora—Rainy River proposed an amendment to clause 8(1) of the bill. The amendment was that a mediation-arbitration board be appointed within 48 hours after the coming into force of the act instead of a single mediator-arbitrator as referred to in the legislation and as underlined by Senator Murray. The board, in Mr. Nault's amendment, would consist of three members: One nominated by the union, one by the employer and a chairman appointed by the minister. The minister then would refer all matters relating to the amendment or revision of the collective agreement still in dispute at the time of the appointment.

The amendment was not accepted in the other place on the grounds that it was outside the scope of the bill because the bill had passed at second reading — which incidentally is not necessarily an inhibition to us at this point — providing for the minister to choose, recommend and appoint a mediator-arbitrator. Therefore it was ruled that any amendment that provided that he should set up a panel or board was outside the scope of the bill as adopted at second reading.

In any event, that is something we can ask the minister about at the Committee of the Whole stage. The only accepted amendment to the bill was proposed by Minister Danis himself, and that was to clause 14. It deals with a subject with which we dealt when we were dealing with the PSAC legislation; that is, the time when the workers must go back to work. You will remember that during the Committee of the Whole proceeding on PSAC, Senator MacEachen asked Mr. Loiselle if he could change the provisions of the timing for going back to work to permit a staged, across-the-country return taking into account the time zones. In this case we may not have that problem, because all the workers are, as far as I understand, in the same time zone.

The amendment accepted by the minister concerned this coming into effect of the bill and the time that the workers must return to their jobs. It is provided, as I think it was in the PSAC legislation, that it be the day immediately following Royal Assent of the bill to no less than 12 hours after Royal Assent. Of course that provision is already incorporated in the legislation before us because the copy I have before me is not second reading but the bill "as passed by the House of Commons October 10, 1991".

As one last point, I agree with Senator Murray that the provision for a mediator-arbitrator in this legislation is one of its attractive features. That provision did not exist in the PSAC legislation and that was the cause of a great deal of grief for the legislation, and complaint by the opposition and by the union. Here we have provision for a mediator-arbitrator. As Senator Murray said, it sends both the workers and the employer back to the bargaining table.

However, it does not answer the points I was raising because, although it does send the employer and the workers back to the bargaining table, because of the mediator-arbitrator it sends the employer back with all his status, rights and negotiating tools, but it sends the workers back with their right-to-strike hands tied. That is my objection to this kind of legislation in general and my insistence that it has this undesirable and unfair effect on the collective bargaining process, a process which we all, in principle, support. Let's be careful about the "buts" that we place when we say we are in favour of the bill in principle, except in the case of inconvenience or other considerations such as those that are raised here.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before we proceed with further debate, is it agreed that the special provision for the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole, as described by Senator Murray and agreed to by Senator Frith, be adopted?

Senator Frith: We deliberately did not provide for a house order. We wanted the two deputy leaders to settle it and Senator Murray to put their understanding on the record. I think we can leave it at that, but I have no objection to the Senate's formally adopting it, if they wish to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Shall the debate continue?

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words about Bill C-37. Like Senator Murray, I am sorry that we have been called back for this purpose. On the other hand, I am not sorry that we have been called back, since we have many other matters to deal with.

As Senator Frith has pointed out, the proposed legislation is an intrusion into normal labour-management relations where the labour union has the right to withhold services—to go on strike, if you like—when the union is unable to come to an agreement with the company. In this case, honourable senators, the union has been without a contract since January 31. In the past, that has been grounds for an immediate strike. No contract; no work.

However, this situation has occurred before in relation to the grain handleres. In 1968, they worked long past the termination or expiry date of their contract with the terminal elevator operators and had to strike. I remember that rather clearly because the contract between the terminal elevator operators and the grain handlers' union, in that instance, expired on December 31, 1967. They continued to operate the grain elevators to the end of July 1968—six or seven months after the termination of their contract. However, the grain companies were not able to satisfy the reasonable demands of the union, and so the union went on strike on August 1, 1968. I cannot guarantee that these dates are exact, because I am speaking from memory. I do not have my notes in front of me. At any rate, there was a strike or work stoppage for approximately five or six weeks, with apparently no progress in reaching an agreement.

Honourable senators, I mention this because the government of the day obviously had some intense interest in the strike, and it intended to introduce back-to-work legislation. The Department of Labour went on to investigate the possibility of back-to-work legislation. However, I had a higher-than-average interest in the matter, because I was in the Ministry of Agriculture. We wanted to find out what the situation was.

Five weeks after the strike had started, the grain companies had offered less than half of what they really knew was necessary in order to end the strike. We asked, "Why are you offering these amounts when they are way below what you know is necessary in order to get the unions back to work?" The answer was a vague, "Well, they are not hungry enough yet after five weeks."

That, honourable senators, gave the signal that the companies were not being reasonable, and they were sitting back, knowing that the government and the Parliament of Canada would intervene in the situation. The longer they could keep the unions at bay and under the old contract with or without a strike, the more they were profiting from the situation.

Honourable senators, I mention this example because I hope that such is not the case this time. Yet, until we hear the witnesses in Committee of the Whole, we could easily have a repetition of what happened some 23 years ago where companies simply waited, profiting from the knowledge that the Parliament of Canada would legislate the grain handlers back to work anyway.

Honourable senators, we will hear, of course, from the leader of the union involved. We will also hear from the Minister of Labour, but I wonder if we should not also hear from the negotiator for the companies? We perhaps should ask him one or two things about this dispute.

On the surface, the dispute appears to be over the right to continue contributing to, and increasing, pensions. This relates to a concern that the workers have over the diminishing level of employment at that port, perhaps due to the modernization of machinery. It may also be related to a downturn in the volume of grain passing through the elevators due to international difficulties in the grain market.

I mention this because I want to be fair. My position is usually from the point of view of the prairie farmers. As far as they are concerned, the grain should move continuously through the export terminals. I have no argument with that. That philosophy has been adopted in a lot of areas and cases; for example, we designate certain employees in the public service as essential workers. We do not allow the workers in the public service who issue old age pension cheques and unemployment insurance cheques to strike, because such cheques are essential to the income of the people who receive them.

Honourable senators, the same principle applies here. Grain handlers load the grain, the sale of which is absolutely essential to a farmer's income. I believe we should have a look at that.

There was an industrial inquiry into grain handling issues held in Vancouver in 1975. It may be that the government should take the initiative and say that the grain handlers be designated as an essential service for the purpose of ensuring that farmers' incomes will continue; designated in the same manner as employees in the public service to ensure that people such as old age pensioners get their cheques. It is even more important because at least in those cases you can write the cheque sometime later and you will get the same amount of money. In the case of farmers, with lost grain sales, it is not just the loss of income; it is the fact that that income is gone for a long time.

Canada has worked for a long time to be recognized as a reliable supplier of high quality grain. That is a reputation that you do not dismiss lightly. As Senator Murray said, these are not normal times. There is enough difficulty now with respect to income and all the reasons for that difficulty, as far as prairie grain farmers are concerned, even without a strike: Prices are down; volumes in some cases are down; and competition with some of the other countries is far more intense than it has been for years.

I suggest to you—and this has been pointed out a couple of times already today—that we need to retain our reputation as a reliable supplier of grain. If we do not, our customers will order it from other places in the world where there are ample supplies. For example, Europe, the United States, Australia and Argentina all have grain on hand now in excess of their marketings. There is a great deal of grain available and we should not make the situation for grain farmers more difficult by this kind of situation.

Therefore, honourable senators, there are a lot of questions that need to be asked with respect to this strike. The grain handlers already had the elevators shut down when PSAC was on strike because the grade inspectors and the weighing inspectors, who were part of the Public Service, were out. However, the grain handlers did not call the strike until after the PSAC strike had been settled. Their reasons for doing that are obvious. However, we should try to find out more from the people involved. That is why it would be useful if the representative or the chief negotiator for the terminal operators were here so that we could ask some questions about that sitution. I do not know whether he is available or not, but it would be helpful.

I understand that in Vancouver they reached a settlement with their grain handlers. There exists about a $2.50 per hour difference—that is, there is a higher wage level in Vancouver than in Thunder Bay. That is not unusual. That represents the traditional differential that exists. I should like to ask—and this should be addressed to someone who can give us the answer—whether or not there were other terms and conditions that were different at Vancouver that enabled them to reach a settlement, than at Thunder Bay, where they could not.

Honourable senators, I will leave it there. As I tried to point out, there are a lot of unanswered questions about the background information respecting this dispute. The best thing to do is to wait until we can ask some questions of the people who know. I wanted to raise these few matters because there have been some problems in the past where the trouble is not all on one side of the table. Yet when the government brings in back-to-work legislation, as Senator Frith has so well pointed out, it is always directed at the labour unions and at the workers. They are told to do certain things—for example, they are ordered back to work and the employers are ordered back to the bargaining table. Failing an agreement, there is mediation and then arbitration that comes into play under this bill.

We need to modernize our labour laws in relation to back-to-work legislation, which should be used very seldom, and only as the ultimate redress. There should be some way in which to indicate that the employers are under some duress, and not only the workers, when we impose back-to-work legislation. Perhaps we could look at that situation again.

Honourable senators, I thank you for the opportunity to say these few words. I hope that perhaps the people who will be appearing in the next few minutes, if that is when they are scheduled to appear, will understand the areas where I have some concern about this kind of legislation.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, we have a bill before us today that is a clear illustration of a practice that is becoming a habit. For the second time in just over a week we are legislating Canadian workers back to work. Questions have been raised this morning about our commitment to collective bargaining. These events also raise warnings about the question of labour unrest across this country.

Last week it was the public servants; today it is the grain elevator workers in Thunder Bay, who have been on strike since October 3. This week an attempt was made to resume negotiations in Thunder Bay, which had been stalled for seven weeks. At that delicate point the Grains and Oilseeds Minister, Charlie Mayer, announced publicly that back-to-work legislation would be introduced. As has been mentioned by Senator Frith, that announcement basically torpedoed or undermined the talks and any chance of swift progress towards a negotiated solution, which had been sought by Mr. Mayer's colleague, the Minister of Labour.

Caught in the middle once again are the Canadian farmers. They have been hit by a series of disasters in recent years. All of us know about them: Recessions, droughts, floods, plagues of insects, rapidly diminishing prices and skyrocketing input costs, accumulated debt, lost markets, international subsidy wars. The farmers are smack against the wall and a labour disruption halting the movement of grain to export is just another devastating hit. It is very sad, honourable senators, because this is not a battle between farmers and grain handlers—it is a battle of both for their survival.

I will talk about the farmers in a minute, but I want to review briefly the position of the workers at the Port of Thunder Bay, who must not be cast as convenient villains in this disruption. For the past several years they have lived under a cloud of enormous uncertainty, insecurity and, undoubtedly, fear for the future of themselves and their families.

In the last seven years 1,000 jobs have been lost at the Thunder Bay terminals. Of the 900 people left working at those terminals, only 400 have full-time jobs. "Full-time" at those terminals means a maximum of six months out of a year. The rest are largely part-time workers.

In addition to wages, the core concern of this dispute is pensions, retirement benefits. That is a key part of their job security. I understand that the company, Lakehead Terminal Elevators Association, has virtually refused to deal with the pension question and that clearly must be central to the discussions that will follow the passage of this legislation as a part of the meaningful mediation and arbitration process that is contained in the bill and it is a welcoming part of the bill.

Honourable senators, more than that, the workers, the employers and the people living in Thunder Bay at the Lakehead need to have an idea of what lies ahead for them in the future. It is critical to the viability of that community to know what is the future for grain handling at the Lakehead. Will that future be one where the movement of grain for export—now 40 per cent through Thunder Bay and the St. Lawrence Seaway—will be primarily directed through west coast ports? I hope not, but that is the speculation in Thunder Bay. Consequently it fuels the uncertainty and the fear in that community, not just among the workers involved but among all the other sectors that are affected by the economy of the grain trade.

So in fairness, what is the future for this product at this port and for all those associated with the industry? That question goes well beyond the technical clauses of the bill before us today, but it is also very relevant to it. It is a question of government policy that must define the future of the grain industry in Canada. The answer is as fundamental to the grain elevator workers at Thunder Bay as it is to the farmers in the west.

Senators in this house have heard repeatedly of the desperate difficulties of farmers across the country, particularly the grains and oil seeds farmers in western Canada. Quite simply, they have gone through hell in recent years, largely through events beyond their control. Let there be no doubt in any mind that Canadian farmers do their job well; they always have; they are the best in the world. As one young farmer in my area told me just this week, the current survivors of our farms are indeed the best because they have had to overcome unbelievable adversity just to stay on their land when thousands of others have been forced to give up and move away.

Disruptions, such as the one at the Lakehead, regardless of the cause, are truly devastating to the farmers who have seen the price of their product plummet to around $2 a bushel this summer, which is far short of a survival level. It has been a very bitter summer which has seen terrific growing conditions on the prairies and marvelous crops. Instead of the joy that a fair price would bring, many farmers in my area have literally been praying for hail because they can make more out of insurance than they can by selling their grain.

Our farmers are exhausted because they can only survive by combining their field work with part-time jobs. Their wives are working full time. Their families are suffering, as all of this extra effort still cannot produce a livable income. Family violence and marital breakdown have increased. Illness, physical and psychological, has spread in a deeply distressing manner. It is well known in the farm community that the suicide rate has taken an alarming jump in recent years.

The reality of the despair in our farm community is a daily tragedy in this country, which, until recently, has been occurring quietly and beyond the gaze of urban Canada. In many ways it is very different from the loss of a job, which is always enormously distressing. But losing a farm and being forced to abandon the land is truly a loss of a way of life. That may sound trite, but, to a farmer, this loss is not just of a product or a machine or even a home. It is a loss of identity and purpose and personal pride. It is seen as a personal defeat and a personal failure. There is not another kind of job that can compensate. That is why the farmers of this country consistently go to such extraordinary lengths to stay were they belong. Today is as tough as it has ever been for farmers in the history of Canada. They want to know whether indeed they have any viable future at all.

Yesterday the government announced an $800 million farm-aid package as part of a strategy to deal with the income problems of our farmers. Some $700 million of that will be directed to grain farmers. While this is decidedly welcome, it falls well short of the $1.3 billion shortfall in the last crop year. It is part of the so-called third line of defense to assist farmers until the longer term benefits of the new safety net programs are realized. I was disturbed yesterday to be told by one of the farm leaders in this country that the new aid would not be paid until just before seeding time next year. I sincerely hope that is not the government's plan, because it is unrealistic and it is unacceptable. That money is needed desperately now. There are clearly mechanisms that could deliver it to the farmers quickly.

The government also underlined the importance of increasing pressure to resolve the international pricing war between the United States and Europe as well as looking into increased credit for the sale of grains and other commodities to the Soviet Union and perhaps elsewhere in Eastern Europe. All of this must be done.

Fundamental to the strategy, however, is the absolute assurance to our farmers that they are fundamental to our country's stability, that the ability to feed a nation is basic to its sovereignty and its independence. We express often our anger at European countries for heavy subsidization of their agricultural sector because the result has been a battle between Europe and the United States which has devastated Canadian grain prices. There has to be a compromise on this issue or our international trade structures within the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade will crumble.

However, when we look at Europe we must ask ourselves why those countries have so stubbornly and extravagantly protected their farmers, so that now they rank as the second largest exporters of wheat in the world. The motivation for that European drive is embedded in the history of lands being ravaged by war after war after war, and people going hungry and starving as food supplies have diminished and disappeared. The countries of Europe in these post-war decades have determined that will never happen again, that the production of food and those who grow it are integral to their existence as nations.

Honourable senators, I am not sure that we have made that fundamental decision here in Canada, in spite of the variety of measures we legislate. I believe we must make that decision or part of our national structure will disintegrate and disappear to be replaced by solutions and products and control from outside our national borders.

We are talking again throughout Canada about our Constitution, which is the document defining our essence as a nation. I believe that an unswerving commitment to those who produce our food is an essential element of that sovereignty. It is a commitment which must be repeated and reinforced, not just by financial resources but by initiatives, innovations and technologies which will open new directions for our agriculture sector both in Canada and abroad.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

The bill which we must pass today deals with the settling of a strike. But the issues which have built up behind that bill have profound implications for our country's future productivity.

Honourable senators, farmers and workers are losing faith in our political process. In their thousands they have come out to protest. Farms from Lucknow in Ontario to Rosetown and Battleford in Saskatchewan; from the towns of Stavely and Milk River in southern Alberta to Winnipeg, Miami and Brandon in Manitoba. Indeed, this morning after I entered this house I received word that farmers in the county of Warner, very near where I come from in southern Alberta, are announcing today they are going to withhold grain, refuse to deliver it to the elevators; it is the first time in 30 years.

These are tactics of desperation and all of our governments and political parties must listen because all Canadians have a stake in the outcome of the turmoil in this industry.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform you that if the Honourable Leader of the Government speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in rising to close this debate, I wish to thank colleagues who have participated in it. I appreciate the forceful comments that we heard from our colleague, Senator Fairbairn, on the situation in the farm community. As I said in my opening remarks today, the statistics that are familiar to us all on farm incomes and wheat prices and so forth have behind them a good many tales of personal hardship and tragedy in the farm community. They are also wreaking considerable damage to the farm and national economy.

Having said that, I think it is only fair to state for the record that in the past seven years the federal government has brought some $11 billion of aid to the farmers of Canada.

I appreciate their impatience and what Senator Fairbairn has described as their lessening confidence in the political system. This is especially pronounced in the case of the inability of many countries to end the damaging subsidy wars that pit the European Economic Community and the United States—forces which have, as the saying goes, very deep pockets—against each other in a war that seems to have done nobody any good and has brought wheat prices to levels to which they have not plunged since 1961.

The Prime Minister of Canada put agriculture on the agenda at the G-7, the group of heads of state and government. We are working resolutely through the G-7, through the Cairns Group, through the multilateral trade negotiations, to bring an end to these subsidy wars and to arrive at a just solution to these problems.

In the past few years, as I said, we have brought $11 billion of aid to Canadian farmers. I remind the honourable senator of that and think it is important for the record to point that out and perhaps to detail it briefly. In 1986, we brought in $1 billion through the Special Canadian Grains Program; in 1987, another $1.1 billion was brought in under the Special Canadian Grains Program, phase two. In 1988, there was $850 million in the Crop Drought Assistance Program. In 1990, there was $500 million in the Special Income Assistance Program; and, in 1991, there was $600 million in farm support and adjustment measures.

The honourable Senator Fairbairn has also raised the question of the timing of the present aid package and when it would be available. This $800 million will be flowing to farmers before seeding time next spring.

Meanwhile, I think I should point out that some $2.5 billion under GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, and NISA, the Net Income Stabilization Account, will be flowing to farmers over the next nine months, $1.5 billion between now and the end of the 1991 calendar year and the rest of it in the first six months or thereabouts of the calendar year 1992.

This is of considerable assistance to farmers, farm families the farm communities and indeed to the national economy. It is not as much, as Senator Fairbairn has pointed out, as was asked for, but honourable senators are not unaware of the tight fiscal situation the government faces. We have had to squeeze very considerably to obtain the $800 million announced yesterday by Mr. McKnight. We have not hidden from the country the fact that we will not be able to find all of this money by re-allocating funds from other programs.

Senator Frith: Is it still the fault of the Liberal Party that you are out of money?

Senator Murray: It is still the fault of the Liberal Party that this government is spending between 30 and 40 cents for every dollar we take in on interest on the debt piled up by their irresponsible spending.

Senator Frith: I suppose, if, God forbid, you happen to stay in power for 20 years, all your failures will still be the fault of the Liberal Party.

Senator Murray: My honourable friends opposite have been stirred to intervene. I did not think that my speech was being unduly provocative. I thought I was being quite non-partisan. My friends have only to examine the national debt and subtract from it the portion of it—

Senator Olson: People stopped believing that story three years ago.

Senator Murray: It is nevertheless true. My honourable friends can look at the size of the national debt—

Senator Frith: And you have done nothing to increase the national debt; is that right?

Senator Murray: It is very easy to calculate how much of that national debt was run up under their government.

Senator Frith: And how much under yours?

Senator Murray: By doing so they can find how much of the compound interest that we are paying on the national debt is caused by the debt that they ran up.

Senator Frith: And not because of what you have done while you have been in government; it was all done by previous Liberal governments.

Senator Murray: I have already explained to honourable senators on many occasions during the oral question period that we are running a considerable surplus on the ordinary account. We are running such a surplus on the ordinary account that the annual deficit—

Senator Frith: We used to use that argument, too.

Senator Murray: —is more than accounted for by the interest that we have to pay on the debt they left us with in 1984.

In any case, honourable senators—

Senator Olson: It is no wonder nobody believes you.

Senator Murray: I can put the figures on the record easily.

Senator Frith: Why don't you do that? We will put some on, too, and we'll see.

Senator Murray: I have done it. The figures are there in black and white for honourable senators to see, and for anyone to interpret them.

Do honourable senators deny that for some years now we have been running a surplus on the operating account of this government, and that the deficit—

Senator Gigantès: I will deny anything you say because I cannot trust you.

Senator Murray: Then, of course, there is no ground for a rational debate with the honourable senator.

Senator Barootes: Who do you trust except Trudeau? You have never trusted anybody but Trudeau.

Senator Murray: There is no basis for a rational debate with the honourable senator whose nose is buried as usual in some newspaper half listening to the debate.

Senator Gigantès: When you talk I need some entertainment.

Senator Murray: I welcome the honourable senator back from his travels. I hope that he might be able to pay some attention to the debate rather than burying his nose in the newspapers as he invariably does.

Senator Gigantès: It is to keep me from suffering shock.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I simply want to say that Senator Olson raised the question earlier, as he did in the oral question period some weeks ago, of whether employees at the grain terminals, inspectors and so forth, ought to be designated essential workers. As I explained to him at that time that the concept of designating essential employees extends largely to those who are responsible for public health and safety. That is the law at present. If that is to be reconsidered, and the whole question of economic security is to be taken into account in designating essential workers, then that is something that would have to be done—

Senator Olson: That is not quite right.

Senator Murray: That is what the honourable senator is suggesting. He is suggesting that in the private sector, under federal jurisdiction, employees such as grain inspectors and weighers ought to be designated essential. He is extending the concept of essential employees to cover, not just health and public safety, but economic security. He has the right to make that argument. It is a valid argument. It can be made and should be made in connection with an overall consideration of the Canada Labour Code. I invite him to do so.

Senator Olson: I will.

Senator Murray: As the honourable senator has said, there are many unanswered questions. He will have an opportunity to put some of those questions to Mr. Daniher, the Executive Vice-President of the Grain Division of the Transportion-Communications International Union, who will be invited here in a few moments to testify in Committee of the Whole, and to the Minister of Labour, Mr. Danis.

With those few words, honourable senators, I again thank you for your indulgence. If this bill receives second reading, I will propose that it be referred to Committee of the Whole, where we can hear witnesses and proceed to a clause-by-clause consideration of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to hear from the witnesses.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before we do that, honourable senators, do we have the understanding that there will be a break and that the television cameras will be allowed in?

Senator Murray: We have agreed that that could be done under the usual conditions, yes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Gerald R. Ottenheimer in the Chair.

• (1050)

The Chairman: The Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-37, a bill to provide for the resumption and continuance of grain handling operations at Thunder Bay, Ontario. Shall the title be postponed?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, yes. I understand that Mr. Herb Daniher, Executive Vice-President of the Grain Division, Transportation-Communications International Union, is here with a colleague and is ready to proceed. Therefore, with the permission of the committee, I would ask our Deputy Leaders to bring Mr. Daniher and his colleague to the witness table.

Pursuant to agreement, Mr. Herb Daniher, Executive Vice-President of the Grain Division, Transportation-Communications International Union, and Mr. Warren Edmundson were escorted to seats in the Senate Chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable members, I welcome Mr. Herb Daniher, the Executive Vice-President of the Grain Division, Transportation-Communications International Union, who is here to answer questions from honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Does he have an opening statement?

The Chairman: Mr. Daniher, if you have an opening statement before questions, then the senators would be pleased to hear it.

Mr. Herb Daniher, Executive Vice-President, Grain Division, Transportation-Communications International Union: Basically, it has been an eventful 72 hours; it has been an emotional 72 hours. I welcome the opportunity to come here and put forth the workers' side of the story, not only on the back-to-work legislation to have the operations in Thunder Bay up and running again, but also to deal with some of the outstanding issues that, to a certain extent, have been misrepresented to the Canadian public.

The first thing I would like to do is focus on just whom the dispute is with. There seems to be a veil which Lakehead Terminal Elevators Association hides behind, the veil of the farmers' unfortunate circumstances. I think that it is unfortunate that the six companies cannot be listed every time they are talked about, because I think it is important to identify to the farmers out west and to the Canadian public exactly whom we are dealing with here.

As the story goes, the companies like to paint the picture that it is grain handlers, east or west—in this case the Thunder Bay grain handlers—versus the farmers. That definitely is not the case. The struggle that we are facing here is basically the grain handlers versus the establishment: versus Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, versus Richardson's Terminals, versus Cargill Grain, versus United Grain Growers, versus Parrish & Heimbecker Limited, and versus Manitoba Pool Elevators.

These are big businesses. This is big money. I have their annual reports here and I was going to review them, but I think I will stick to the more salient points. These companies are making millions of dollars in their terminal operations. The farmers are, on the other hand, facing 1970 or, as was said here earlier today, 1961 grain prices. But make no mistake, the terminal elevator companies are earning 1990 tariff rates. That must be understood. They are not dealing with the same rates as the farmers. These companies are making millions of dollars off the backs of the workers and off the backs of the farmers. It is high time that the true story was told.

A brief history of the Thunder Bay situation has been basically presented both in the House of Commons and here today. When I first came on the scene and began working in the grain business in 1975, I was 17 years old, just out of high school. Things were great at the elevators then. We had 1800 people. We had 300 or 400 university students who worked four or five months when it was busy in the summers. I began working in 1975 and worked fulltime in the early eighties. I earned a good income. There was overtime. We were earning a good salary.

However, in 1984, that all came to a shocking end. We see reference in the press to the fact that since 1984 we have lost 1000 full-time jobs. Our membership has dropped from 1800 to 900. Of the 900 people we have left, approximately 400 work what we would call full-time, which would be 10 to 12 months. The rest of the membership works 6 months or less. Due to the fact that we have been designated a residual port, depending on your seniority you get three months in the spring and three months in the fall.

I have 15 years at the terminals. In the past year I have been on leave of absence working in the position I now hold with my union. The last time worked for the terminals, approximately one year ago, I had 15 years' seniority and I worked 6 weeks. That's it. My total income, including my vacation pay for the year, was $6,000. When we deal with the job security issues I will tell a few more sad tales about the people who are right behind me on the seniority list and no longer have employment. People with 14 years' seniority were terminated as recently as the end of July of this year.

Just to relate to the situation of how we were being treated by the terminals with regard to job losses, there was some rationalization, there was some technological change, and the industry took a shift to the west. We have to deal with those realities. The rationalization had basically come to an end in Thunder Bay. They were at a level where they were starting to maintain the workforce, even though it was part time. The terminations had almost stopped. There were 29 individuals whose work was terminated on July 31. In fact about 60 people were on what I call the chopping block, who in fact would have lost their jobs before the season started. They would not have worked a day in 18 months. Those people were going in early January and February to get their last vacation paycheques.

When they went into the terminal facilities, specifically in the case of the 29 people who were terminated from Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, they were being asked to reapply for their jobs in the spring. They would terminate them April 1 and maybe hire them back in early March or in May. We took that to the bargaining table. It was the first thing on the agenda in the early meetings in January. In fact there were 60 individuals across the waterfront who would have been in the same circumstances. We were able to convince the company and in a way force the company, because we took a negotiating stance that we would not have a collective agreement; this thing would be hanging over our heads like the blade of a guillotine.

In fact we were able to secure an extension of these people's seniority rights on the basis that they were telling these people that they wanted them to put their names in to be re-employed; but they would be re-employed at day one with no pension entitlements, no benefits. they would start as new hires. They would lose all the things they had gained having worked in the terminal for 14 years.

Even upon getting the settlement, when it got busy and these 29 individuals should have been called back as the other 30 individuals were at three other companies where we had negotiated the same type of extension and recall rights, Saskatchewan Wheat Pool reduced its staff and asked people to move their vacations from the month of June to the month of August because that would mean they would have to call these individuals back for the month of June and they would retain their seniority rights.

They specifically went out of their way to ensure that they would not have to abide by the agreement that was arrived at at the negotiating table. I wrote a letter to the editor which clearly spells out the type of unfairness with which they treated those workers, specifically to unload them in order to start with new hires.

In the elevators it is dusty. There are always sweepers scheduled for work. During the month of June they scheduled no sweepers at the elevators. They worked as lean and mean as they could. We know through the grapevine that in May, just before the long weekend, when about 37 people were going on vacation, which would have required the 29 people who were terminated to be called back, the company conveniently reduced the operation by one shift so that no callbacks would take place. They were going to terminate those people no matter what we did at the bargaining table. These are not people with one or two years' seniority, these are people who had up to 14 years' seniority and had worked in the industry since 1977.

That is just part of the problem we are facing with the whole job security issue, which is where the negotiations were headed. It has been reiterated that because of the reality of a residual port we were dealing with reduced handling, technological change, and the threat of the movement of grain from north to south versus the traditional east to west movement.

We were out in a labour dispute by no fault of our own. We were forced out due to the company's actions; but now they are saying that we are the cause of our downfall. We are not. The effect is that we were out on strike. The cause is political, the cause is economic, and we cannot do anything about that.

We heard suggestions in a panel discussion in Winnipeg yesterday that we were to blame for the consideration to move grain north to south. I sit on the Senior Grain Transportation Committee. I sit on a number of senior bodies. I am in contact with senior officials and this is the kind of threat we face day in and day out. In fact when I went to my membership at the end of June this is exactly what I presented to them.

I have the documents here, but I do not intend to go over every document I have with me. I have about ten articles that suggest that there are going to be company mergers. I have articles that suggest they are looking for new capacity on the west coast. In the last week we saw a report from the GTA dealing with a $4 a tonne surcharge to build additional space on the west coast. All that would impact on job security in Thunder Bay.

Our whole focus of negotiation has been job security this time. The average grain handler in Thunder Bay works six months a year and earns under $20,000—and that is the average. There are about 300 who do not work enough weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance. I have been in that boat myself and it's a tough struggle. There is nowhere to go.

You have to understand the economy of Thunder Bay. They have just shut down a mill there. Everyone is reducing. There are two ways to find meaningful employment. You have to have a friend in some industry to whom you can go to get a job or you can work for a service industry, a burger chain. Those are basically the only employment opportunities there are in Thunder Bay at this time.

We have seen a number of mill closures. The shipyards are reducing their size and there is even a threatened closure there. There is nothing positive in the city of Thunder Bay right now as far as employment opportunities go. One is lucky to get a job even in the service industry.

The job security we were dealing with at the negotiating table was a four-step program. We did not want the companies to play games with the recall rights, as they did with the 29 workers. Our focus was on additional recall rights. We focused on that because, using myself as an example, I had already put 15 years into the business and had been working a declining amount for the last six years. I had stayed in the industry hoping that some time in the future, if enough people retired and through the attrition rate, I would perhaps gain an extra month, year by year, and some time in the future I would gain my full-time employment back.

That was the whole focus of it. I was only working six weeks, because I had already put fifteen years in and some time in the future, especially if we secured something in the pension area, I could go bak to working four months and six months and maybe back to a full time job in the next five years.

I want to keep my job at the terminals. I made a choice out of high school. If I lose that job or am terminated, I am left with nothing. If there is a busy season, at least I am still left with opportunity to get some work in. So we made a major focus and push to make sure that we wanted additional recall rights.

The second thing we wanted to do is look at adjustment programs. This is an interesting tale to tell, and, again, this involves the Lakehead Terminal Elevator Association. I have letters here from different requests that we have made of them. When we say we have lost 1,000 full-time jobs and 900 members, I would ask the companies of the Lakehead Terminal Elevator Association to state publicly what have they done for those people that have been terminated. What have they done with respect to adjustment programs and out-placement? What have they done for those workers? They have done nothing. They have not spent one cent.

Last year, due to the slow period, we had about 150 people on the chopping block again. There was a possibility that they would not be called back. Employment and immigration had tried to work with the LTA; they had sent them letters, and they declined any request to start working on an adjustment program. They came to the union. We committed funds and developed a three-phase program to look at the previous terminations. We got hold of those people, asked them what they had been doing and what skills they were lacking so maybe be could begin to deal with setting up the people that might be terminated and make some type of inventory of their skills so that, if they had to do a transition back into the workplace that they could do that. A high percentage of our workforce are people that have come from overseas and are working in this country.

So we presented that. We were going to go ahead with that proposal, but the government would not let us because the LTA would not participate. So I could not go ahead even though we wanted to go ahead ourselves. It was the companies and the government that stopped us from proceeding with that. However, if the companies had proceeded, we would have had adjustment programs. We asked them publicly at employees' meetings which the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool had this year, and they said that their responsibility was to the employees they still had and that they had no responsibility for the people that were leaving or that had left.

So, we put that on the bargaining table. We see that the government has increased the money for job-sharing programs almost tenfold. We can't even begin to look at those programs unless they are willing to cooperate. Up until this point in time, they have shown how willing they are to cooperate. They have declined every request, and they tell us to go our merry way. So we put that on the bargaining table as a major topic. That was part of the job security program.

Another part of the job security program, this being the most important part, is the pension issue. Have no doubt about it, and this should be stated clearly, the Thunder Bay grain handlers went on strike because they wanted to deal with the pension issue. The company said, "You will get nothing on pensions." Two weeks before we went out on strike, I talked to them almost on a daily basis. They didn't contact us. We contacted them. We contacted them and put a scenario together to bring the two consultants in because pensions is a very complex area. If there was to be meaningful discussion, we needed somebody with the expertise to discuss the issues.

We did the everything in our power to break the impasse. We suggested a way to bring them in. For example, we could do some fact finding, start getting the cost of the pension issue nailed down so we could break the impasse, because the clock was ticking on the report that Mr. Danis would be issuing.

They declined that offer. They said there would be nothing on pensions, no discussions on pensions.

When I was in Toronto, I contacted the individual to tell him that their position had not changed on pensions, and that we would not be getting together because it was counterproductive. I was in contact with a company representative from Toronto, and I told him that I would not be back in Thunder Bay until late Thursday night or Friday morning; so there should be a certain amount of protocol. What they did was put a press release out Thursday morning, skewing the truth of the matter. This was the kind of dirty pool being played all the way.

I didn't give up, though. The day before we went out on strike, we had an hour-long discussion, rehashing the whole issue of pensions. The day before, they were looking for some kind of prioritization. I broke it down into the nuts and bolts of the entire situation.

Pensions, for us, had basically two major focal points. One was the early retirement, in the job security sense, and early retirement with some type of coverage for the basic drug and dental needs, and the other focus was some type of income protection. I don't want that to be confused as some type of full indexation package. I want that to be just what it is, some type of income protection. We were willing to offer alternatives. We suggested that to them. There was conciliation on our part, but we could not even get it into the discussions.

The company representative that I talked to the day before the dispute said, "I understand where you are basically coming from, but I have been told to tell you—". They were not telling that to me directly. They were dancing all over the place. "Come back to the table and you can discuss whatever you want." I would ask them, "Are you going to discuss pensions? Are you going to have the expertise?" He danced around the issue for a two-week period.

Finally, on that date, I nailed him down. He told me that what they were told to tell us is that the union would get nothing on pensions. We explained the devastation. Anybody with half a mind can understand the devastation that the people and the grain handlers of Thunder Bay are facing. They simply took the position that they were not willing to even discuss the issue.

So, at that time, we met with our executive, and that is what the strike was about.

They were not willing to discuss the major issue, the focal point. The pension issue was not an issue by itself; however, it was the cornerstone of the job security agreement. We outlined that to them from day one, that it was the cornerstone of job security. They were confusing the two issues when they reported it in the press. The cornerstone of the job security argument, the four-step process we were using, was pensions. Job security was completely tied into that.

When you look into the whole pension issue, there was an early retirement program put into place last year by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool to protect jobs. I wanted them to look at doing some type of early retirement package at that company. There were a number of elevator buyouts which left a person that had worked 40 years in the industry with only 20 years of service. One company would buy another company; that company would get bought out again in a consolidation drive in the early seventies, and a person that had worked 40 years at the terminals would only have 20 years of service with the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool.

So we wanted to do something for those employees. They would all have to stay to 65 if we didn't do something. The whole issue was that there was a gigantic surplus in the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool plant. Last year when that took place there was a $7 million surplus. The company finally, through our lobbying, put a package together; but they didn't come to us to deal with it, and after all, we put a dollar into the plan. But what has happened, especially to the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool plan? They have put nothing into it since 1988, but it is still a negotiated item. So we wanted to have a say in the makings of that package.

So, when they finally put the package together, they came to us and said, "Your people will have from November 1 to December 1 to take advantage of it. Here it is. They are going to get X amount, and this, this and this. You will have no coverage for benefits. They can buy into the drug plan. That's what we negotiated during the last contract. There is no income protection." I said to them, "There are some basic things lacking here." I said, "I am not going to sell the membership a bill of goods. They can make up their own minds, but," I said, "I don't think that the package includes some basics that have to be there to allow a person to live in dignity during his retirement." You are looking at people with 20 years' seniority; they are retiring on $500 a month. Probably the average pension was $700 for those individuals that had worked long term with the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, and the drug coverage alone costs $81. So I asked them to have a say in that. They said, "Listen, you can get as mad as you want. This is the package that is there. You have no say in it. It doesn't matter if you are submitting money to the fund. We have set the parameters of the program. You will have no say in it." I said, "That is fine." What could I do?

We took it to the membership. The only people that retired were the people that had worked in industry a long time, and would have had to work until they were age 65. It was beneficial to them and beneficial to someone planning to retire in the next two years. However, they had basically lowered the age for a window period from 55 years and above. Nobody that wasn't in a position to have either worked in the industry for a long time and been involved in a buyout or was prepared to retire and was close to retirement age, within the last two years, took advantage of that program, because it lacked the basic fundamentals.

So here we are. We go to the table and we propose to the companies not six items, as they like to indicate to the press—and certainly the six items that we presented were all starting positions—but two major focal points. One was in the job security context regarding early retirement, basic medical coverages and some form of income protection, which was included before 1984 until we got involved with negotiating the plans. They had all sorts of plans. There were six companies. It was a mish-mash. They used to make annual adjustments if the plants could bear it.

We went to the table in 1984 when we first met at our first pension committee meeting and we said, "Are we going to look at the annual adjustments?" They said, "That now becomes a negotiable item. We will no longer do that." In fact, they have not done that since 1983. We have been trying to deal with some type of adjustment to protect not only people at the terminals now but also people who have already retired, and who had that protection to begin with.

The way in which the pension system has developed at the elevators is that it is not something that was there for a long period of time. In 1981 there was a strike at the waterfront, a 17-day shut down. That was basically over the whole issue of getting the companies to negotiate the item of pensions at that time. What was resolved after that dispute was that the issue of pensions would go on the bargaining table for 1984. In 1984, right after we bargained for pensions, there was a three-year moratorium on that item. Actually, we have only had one chance to negotiate the pension item. Because of the downturn and no grain going through the port, we have been unable to take any alternative action to force any improvements in the pension plan. The first time that we hve ever been in a position to tell the companies, "Look, you will have to consider this matter seriously," is at this present time, and they slammed the door in our face.

I will go over the reasons why I think the companies took the position that they did at the bargaining table later. It has a lot to do with the position that the Ministry of Labour has been taking with regard to the whole collective bargaining situation that we see in Canada, and especially our Vancouver situation.

Recently, you probably read in the press about an industrial inquiry into the situation, namely, into the whole focus of what is happening in Thunder Bay and on the west coast. I am more concerned with the Thunder Bay situation, but the west coast situation certainly does have an impact on us.

This was not the first request for an industrial inquiry that I presented to the government on Tuesday. We asked for two others: one during the last set of collective bargaining and one that I personally requested of the minister—not in my official capacity, but as an executive of our lodge and as a union member. We had trouble with the companies. We had a clause in our agreement that allowed for a supplementary unemployment insurance payment that would take place after six months. Guess what happened? There was a shutdown at the terminals. There were about 400 workers who were basically two weeks away from qualification for the six-month period to receive this lump-sum, supplementary unemployment insurance payout. The companies called back each and every one of us. Basically, we worked for two weeks and then they laid off the whole lot of us.

That two-week period is the only work that I got in an eight-month period. Again, later in the year I was coming up to my six-month benchmark and again they called us back. There were 30 of us from the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. They called us back for one week. There was no work; there was no increase in grain cars; there were no vacations. They called us back for a week to disentitle us. It meant that we would have to wait for another six months.

On the first occasion, it happened in the spring of the year. I sent the minister a letter wherein I expressed these concerns. I thought that we should have an industrial inquiry, and I requested it under Part 7 of the Canada Labour Code. The minister sent me a letter in reply. It was not Mr. Danis at that time; I think it was Mr. Corbeil. The minister thought that this was a matter that could be dealt with in the collective bargaining process. However, he had missed the whole point. Did he not see the problem? Did he not see that there was a problem in the way the companies were treating the workers in Thunder Bay? It was not that I was trying to get my supplementary unemployment insurance, but it concerned the unfairness with which they were treating their employees. That has been going on for some time now in the port.

This led me to my recent request for an industrial inquiry. I did so because, first of all, I wanted the government to look at the dispute. The companies were playing grain handlers against farmers. I wanted someone to come and look at the dispute. Once it became public and they saw the stand that the companies were taking, they could see that all six companies were not making their full contribution to the plans. The companies will argue to the press that they have this liability and that liability, but it is quite simple: We continue to put one dollar into the plan; in some cases the companies put nothing into the plan. For example, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has put nothing into the plan since 1988. Cargill Limited has not made a contribution since 1988. Manitoba Pool elevators also came into the plan. They used to have a money purchase plan. They are not making a full payment into it but they are benefitting from it. Richardson Terminals Limited has taken a contribution into the plan for a number of years. United Grain Growers Limited, through incompetence, underfunded their program. They are in a deficit position because they gambled. That is a story that will not be told here but is one that needs to be examined. If they had been making their full contributions there would have been plenty of room in those plans to carry out some of the improvements and thus treat the union members in a more humane manner.

It is more humane, in our minds, to have people retire early and supply work for the younger workers—and I do not mean people with one or two years seniority; I mean people with 15 to 20 years seniority. In other words, give them a few months' work per year, maybe enough to earn some unemployment insurance. That is what we are looking for, namely, a more humane way of operating. If we can do it through attrition versus termination we can perhaps lessen the blow to people who made the decision to go into the grain industry, as I did in 1975. I had the rug pulled out from under me. There is nowhere else to go. My parents live in town; my wife has a job in town and her parents live in town. A move would uproot my whole way of life. I like Thunder Bay. I have lived there all my life. I want to stay in Thunder Bay. I do not want to leave, but in some cases some people are forced to leave.

Someone mentioned job security. You have no idea what it is like to go to work every day and he called back for a week and yet not know if you will be laid off the next week, or if you will get one month's work or two months' work. You do not know what will happen in the industry. You may expect a fall or a spring call back, and it never comes. People have to live with that fear.

One of the members here mentioned something about the suicide rate. It is a sad tale to tell, but I have also been involved in some of those kinds of things. In fact, I have personally been involved in probably preventing people actually taking their lives on two occasions through discussions and getting them to talk to the right people. Unfortunately, on one occasion I was not successful and the individual did what he thought he had to do.

These things tie into the overall social problem. We see marriage breakups, and so on. It is a social disaster out there. People are not able to earn a living. There is nowhere else to go in Thunder Bay, but even if you apply for a job—and this has happened to me; I have applied for many jobs in Thunder Bay—you go to your interview and state that you have been an elevator worker with 12 or 15 years' seniority. You are often told, "I cannot take a chance. If I hire you and the elevators start up again, you might leave." Even if I tell them that I am looking for a career change or a new position, in most cases they will not gamble on grain handlers because they have seen thousands of them.

There ahave been a thousand full-time job losses and yet another 900 jobs that have been terminated off the list. There are another 500 grain handlers around town right now who have to make a decision as to whether or not they will return to the elevators every time this type of incident occurs. Then they have to make a judgment call. I get literally hundreds of calls in a year, people asking what they should do. I say that I cannot make the decision for them. I tell them that if they have an opportunity of stable employment where they can get peace of mind, take it. I put them in my shoes and tell them what I would do, but it has to be their decision. It is a real horror story.

I want to get into the events of the last 72 hours. We have been used as a pawn in a political game. First, the events that unfolded last Tuesday. We talked to the minister's office on a continual basis. We were in contact with the companies almost on a daily basis trying to break the impasse. The government was telling us there would be no back-to-work legislation. We were telling them that they were correct, that it was too early, that the companies have taken a position, that anything that has happened in this dispute is their fault, that we are out because they are not willing to bargin a fair collective agreement. For all intents and purposes they were bargining in bad faith.

Suddenly the minister gets hold of me and says that there was a major breakthrough in the morning of Tuesday. He said that there had been a major breakthrough, that there would be some meaningful discussions. At 4 o'clock the Lakehead Terminals Association put out a press release and said they were willing to come to the table and discuss all the issues. They did not say anything new to us. I asked through the press, "Are they willing to discuss the pension issue?" That is exactly what we asked them to do. In fact by 8 o'clock that night they had put out a press release that said they were willing to discuss the pension issue.

Let me talk about the mediator or, as he was described to us, the fact finder, and that term comes from the minister's office. I got word at 6 o'clock that he was supposed to be flying to Thunder Bay. At 11 o'clock he contacted me and said that he wanted to meet with me in the morning. I met with him at 7 o'clock in the morning. The discussion that took place was that he had to have an answer back to the minister by 6 o'clock that night; not that we were going to start bargining, not that the impasse was broken, but that we would have a collective agreement and basically go back to work on Friday.

It was impossible. The critical issue of pensions could never be discussed in such a short period. It would require days of negotiations. Our pension consultant does not even live in Thunder Bay. I had reached him on the phone and he was on his way up. He was not due until 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Edmundson proceeded to meet with the companies during the day. We had some strategy sessions to find out what the game plan would be. At approximately 3 o'clock in the afternoon I had basically just got to the hotel where we were meeting, down at the Labour Centre where our offices are, to hold the first face-to-face meeting with the companies ,and a colleague on the negotiating committee brought me a fax copied off the news wires. In fact, Mr. Mayer had announced to 10,000 farmers at the legislature that we were being ordered back to work. At that point in time the discussions were basically derailed. It was all for nought.

That changed the whole equation at the bargaining table. That fax that we received destroyed any chance of reaching a collective agreement with the companies. Everybody suddenly had to worry that if we put something on the table it would be presented either through mediation, if we could not settle, or it would end up in arbitration. Suddenly everyone pulled in their horns and shut themselves in their rooms. That was the end of discussions. We analyzed our positions. We had some discussions with the mediator and held exploratory talks. We felt that the companies had us over a barrel.

They were putting the squeeze on us. You can imagine what kind of exploratory talks we were having. If they were not willing to discuss the pension issue you can imagine what kind of talks we had in trying to address our concerns. We both said in fact that that would be confidential. We were over a barrel, the companies were not. The companies won to the extent that they got what they wanted, and that is what I have been saying since June. The companies are not willing to bargin on the tough issues because of what happened in the Vancouver situation. After seven days there they were ordered back to work.

We wanted our fair share of the money in the pensions, we wanted our fair share for the workers to make sure that they got treated justly. The companies did not want to see that happen. They were not willing to negotiate. They took the hard line on pensions. They forced our hand. We end up looking like the bad guys. We are out on strike because they will not even discuss the pension issue. Lo and behold, you hear the minister's office saying that this dispute is not anything like the the Vancouver dispute. They did not think they could reach an impasse. He thought there would be a settlement here. He said that day in and day out through the entire length of the dispute. We were in contact with the mediation office daily.

Suddenly, out of the blue, they get hold of us and say it looks like there will be back-to-work legislation. He did not really set a date. The companies were willing to come to the table to bargin the pension issue. Great. Then he drops the line on us: "You have to have a decision made by 6 o'clock or the legislation may be forthcoming." We had to give the minister a decision. At 3 o'clock, before we get an opportunity to even meet with the companies for the first time in eight months of negotiations, the first time a major breakthrough happens and the impasse is broken, somebody in the government, for political purposes, in front of 10,000 farmers at the legislature, says that we are getting ordered back to work. He destroyed the whole process.

They knew it would happen. We were being used as pawns in the game. Mr. Danis had to make it appear in the eyes of the public that he had made an honest attempt to settle the dispute. He did nothing. He knew he had to bring us together. He probably got hold of the companies. I assume that he got them to come to the table to do a number on us. They wanted us to accept a bill of goods and put all kinds of pressure on us. None of the exploratory discussions met the parameters that we required for settlement. Next thing you know, the back-to-work legislation is here. This was what it was all about. It was a scam and a sham. He has abused the whole system and destroyed the whole collective bargaining process. We have been pawns in the game.

If in fact Mr. Mayer had not put out his comments to the farmers—I believe the companies were also under some pressure—we do not know what would have happened. There might have been a chance for discussions, because both parties were, so to speak, under the gun, unless the companies were in cahoots with the labour department. You present "what if" scenarios in exploratory discussions. Basically there was one "what if", an ultimatum and that is what we saw. That is why we told the minister at about 2:30 in the morning that we felt that this was ill-timed, that they were not going to hoodwink us by putting this type of pressure on us to get a collective agreement. We felt that a number of minor issues were left off the table. We wanted them dealt with.

We were hoping that the legislation would have a mediation process. We thought that we could clean the slate somewhat and bring the critical issues to an arbitrator if we could not reach an agreement.

We also said we did not want just a single arbitrator, because it becomes critical. In fact, we wanted a union nominee and a company nominee with a Thunder Bay perspective, not just a union perspective but someone who is there and can see what is happening in Thunder Bay—the job losses and no opportunity for employment; someone who is familiar with what we face—the residual port, the layoffs, the terminations, the moving from full-time workers to part-time workers. We thought it was critical that it be a three-person panel. Unfortunately that did not happen yesterday. There was some discussion about who would be picked as this mediator-arbitrator. In fact, the mediation stage was not successful.

There has been a mix of words, expertise and knowledge. I think there is a difference between the two. I have knowledge about pensions. I rely on a pension consultant. We have people on the negotiating committee who have been on pension committees for 10 years. We still rely on the expertise of a consultant.

We are pleading. If we cannot change and get the panel, which is really the first and foremost focus, in order to have any semblance of a fair system and somebody who understands the pension issue to give the union a fair opportunity to get a fair collective agreement that deals with the job security issue on the waterfront in Thunder Bay, we do not need someone who has knowledge of pensions who can rely on some sort of expertise on the side. We want the person appointed to have expertise in pensions, because that is what we feel will ultimately be placed before him. It is a very difficult subject to understand and we are hoping and pleading with the minister that he will give all parties, the companies and the union, a fair shake and appoint someone who has expertise in pensions. That is very critical.

As far as the legislation is concerned, we are not happy with it. We think that it has done irreparable harm to the collective bargaining situation. Again I refer to the Vancouver situation. We feel that the companies relied on the Minister of Labour's decision in Vancouver and that was attributable to the strike we had in Thunder Bay.

I would ask senators to keep in mind that the average work year for grain handlers in Thunder Bay is six months with an average wage of less than $20,000. In Vancouver a grain handler will work twelve months and earn an average of $50,000. You cannot compare apples and oranges. Thunder Bay and Vancouver are two different sites.

The last thing I would mention is the size of the fines in the legislation. Some of our people are on vacation, some of our people have left the country, some of our people have had to find other employment because they did not know how long the dispute was going to last. Some even have to keep two jobs going because of the type of industry we are involved in.

The way I understand the legislation, it states that we have to return to work within 12 hours. I will not have the opportunity to have a membership meeting 12 hours from now. I probably will not even be home 12 hours from when the bill receives Royal Assent to have a discussion with my membership about what has happened in the last three days and tell them what action is going to have to be taken upon the passing of this bill. I think it is totally unfair to put a 12 hour time limit on returning to work. It will cause all manner of headaches. There will be some people we will not be able to contact. If they do not show up to work, will they or the union be subject to fines such as a fine of $100,000? More thought should have been put into that part of the legislation. It will cause us severe logistical problems in trying to get the word out to our membership.

In the last 20 years or more we have never been legislated back to work. Even when we had a five-week strike in 1986, or the 17-day strike to get pensions on the bargaining table in 1981, we sat down with the companies and hammered out a collective agreement. I am positive we could also have done that this time. Unfortunately, the powers that be would not let the process work and that is why I sit before you today.

That concludes my remarks, except that I would add that we heard some comments regarding funding for the farmers. We support funding for farmers. We believe that the European community and the United States have skewed the market. They are trying to put our farmers out of business so they can gain the market share. With the money that will be provided there was talk about tax increases. I would plead with the government to take a little bit of that tax money that will be raised here and look at the possibility of doing an industrial inquiry to look at the four focal points that I mentioned to the minister on Tuesday.

One was to look at this dispute and, once this dispute was resolved, to look at the consolidation of elevator companies on the waterfront, which is a strong possibility. We dealt with that during the last round of bargaining. We would also like to deal with the declining throughput of grain at the Port of Thunder Bay and the fact that we are a residual port, with the impact of farm prices and commodity prices faced by the farmers and the effect that has on Thunder Bay.

The farmers are facing 1961 grain prices. The terminal elevators are dealing with 1990 tariff rates. I have information in my briefcase that those tariff rates have been raised again this year. They are fatcats sitting up there; they are management people. I sit at the table negotiating with people who earn $80,000 to $100,000. Foremen at the terminals are paid between $50,000 and $65,000. There are bonus provisions included in that. They are a bunch of fatcats. Our dealings here are with the establishment, not the farmers. Hopefully, the necessary funding will be provided so that I will not have to sit here in two or three year's time to deal with a similar dispute in Thunder Bay. We have to look at the overall perspective and give this country peace of mind.

Senator Olson: Mr. Daniher, you have given us a great deal of detail about the problems that you experience in attempting to negotiate with the companies. If I understood you correctly, what triggered the strike action was when the companies refused even to discuss with you or with your union the pension issue. It is not clear to me from your explanation what the pension issue is. I understand you want some improvements, but are there excess funds in the pension funds that you want allocated to the membership, or is there something else in adjusting the pension issue so that you think it would be fair for your membership?

Mr. Daniher: You are correct in stating that the whole strike was because the company took the position that it would give the union nothing on pensions. Perhaps I could use the example of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. It has $7 million surplus in its fund and it has not put a dime into that fund since 1988 which saves contributions of $1 million a year. If that money had to be put into the pension fund there would be a $10 million surplus. Surely that company has the ability to fund the enhancements. It means keeping a younger workforce and allowing the older workers to retire with dignity. We are asking for a lowering of the age of retirement within the provisions of the agreement. We are also asking for medical coverage for those individuals and that the companies provide what they used to provide before 1984, some kind of income protection.

The last portion of the pension issue deals with younger people such as myself, and it pertains to credited service, an issue I did not elaborate on in my earlier remarks. I have 15 years' seniority at the terminals. I have nine years of credited service. If I were not working in my present capacity, I would be relegated to working for six months or less, even in this busy period with higher throughputs of grain. If I were to retire at age 55, if that was the retirement age, then I would have 36 years of seniority but approximately 25 years of credited service so it would be like I only worked for the pool for 25 years. If I made full contributions from now to the time I retired, I would receive 41 per cent of the base rate salary, approximately $12,000 a year. In fact, if I carry on in the same magnitude that I have been working, that would bring it down to 24 per cent a year. So we suggested to the companies in discussion that we were looking to do something about the credited service. We asked them if the employees could make a contribution for the months in which they are laid off. The companies were not even willing to consider the issue. They said it was illegal. They said a number of things.

There are a number of different ways to deal with this whole question. There are schedules in the agreement with regard to hours. It does not necessarily have to be dealt with directly on a contribution basis.

The fact of the matter is that, because we thought we would remain with the pools, hopefully until retirement, we wanted to do something about the retirement situation. It is a double-whammy type of situation. We are being affected now and we will be affected when it comes time to retire. We will not be able to retire because we will not have enough credited service. We would not have a half-decent pension to retire on.

Senator Olson: You have raised some fairly complex and detailed matters which I hope the mediator-arbitrator who will be appointed under this legislation will look into. I am sure that he will. You do not seem to be confident that he will, unless there is a three-person mediator-arbitrator team as opposed to just one person. However, we will have to wait and see with respect to that.

The other problem that you seem to have is also related to pension rights. It deals with these recall rights and the loss of seniority because of the way the companies and, in particular, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, are treating their present employees. Do you believe that this is just a means by which they can keep employees out and off their regular status in terms of their seniority? The issue, of course, would eventually include some pension rights. Do they have a right to do this under the collective agreement you already have?

Mr. Daniher: Morally, the question is do they have a right to do it. These are long-term employees who have toiled for the companies for a number of years. The whole moral question is what to do with a person who has been in the industry 15 years. Do you put him out to pasture, so to speak?

I already described an incident at the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. They will say, "Oh no, the cars dropped off." Or they will say, "Oh no, we were not asking those people to move their vacations during a period in which they would have had to recall those who would be terminated." These are long-term employees who would have been vested in the pension plans in a short period for the credits of service before 1986.

Some of the other issues are that this was an older workforce. In fact, it will be a liability to them versus, perhaps, a long-term disability. The first person to be called back out of that group of 29 was a person who had had a heart attack. I think he is 53 years of age. I do not know if he would even be able to return. Yet, he was the first person on the list. He would become a liability to the company almost immediately if he were to return to work for any active period.

What has happened with his case is that due to the lay-offs, and in spite of the fact that we negotiate long- and short-term disabilities, as well as other types of benefits, because he was not at work when he had his heart attack he has nothing. He is on welfare right now. His having to be able to return to work for a day is not even in question now, in fact, because the company terminated him. It is interesting to note that this individual, who was an older worker with a health problem, was the first one on the list.

The discussions I have had with the company in this regard could be called accusations, or perhaps even sensationalistic. There were certain people out of that group of 29 whom the companies did not want back, and come hell or high water they were not going to bring them back. If that person was at the top of the list, we could forget about the 28 people behind him. Company officials have publicly stated that to me in discussions that we have had. There have been discussions with other employees. People would say, "I guess you are going to have to recall somebody out of those 29". It became quite an issue on the waterfront. One of these people had set up an information picket. Certain foremen would let out comments like, "You'll never see him come back here. He's the last guy we would ever bring back here."

It became more political and more of a cost factor. What we had to deal with at the table this time was the issue of temporary workers. The company wants to have a temporary workforce whereby if they have work for two months they want to bring in somebody who is a temporary employee. That will happen, naturally. If a summer student or some one wants a job for a couple of months he will come and work for a couple of months and then go his merry way back to school or wherever. I mean to say that they should not terminate the people who used to have full-time jobs with the companies. They should not terminate people who made a career choice, such as myself, some 15 years ago. What are those people who are in that group to do? Once they are out the door, they are without long-term disability, vacation and everything else.

The biggest concern on the waterfront is due to the fact that, because it is a residual port, we have lost a way of life. It is a sad state of affairs at the port.

Senator Olson: Finally, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we need some kind of industrial inquiry here to deal with some of what I think the witness is saying. The companies are treating some of their employees who have, for example, 15 years of service, rather unfairly, according to the normal or appropriate way they should be treated.

That also raises the other question, which is that you have lost about 1,000 jobs. I am not sure that you gave us an indication as to whether those were permanent, more or less full-time jobs, at least full-time to the extent of about six months, which is what I think you said a full-time worker works in Thunder Bay. If that number has decreased by 1,000, then that means more than 50 per cent of the number of positions that were there in 1984 have been eliminated. I expect there has to be some rationalization of what will be an ongoing employee when, through modernization, technology, or whatever, something less than 50 per cent of the positions that were required from 1984 and before is now required. Is the union willing to accept as a fact that it is pretty hard to have job security for jobs that are no longer required?

Mr. Daniher: That is basically the focus that we have taken. Technological change is the fourth point of the industrial inquiry. We want it investigated, and I will elaborate a little on that subject.

In our job security package there was no feather-bedding. It was not to create a job where there was no job. It was to take the ability of the companies to pay to the pension plans and, in fact, reduce the numbers up top where we have the older workers. The proposal was to let them retire with perhaps a little bit more. It might be an incentive to get them to go a bit earlier. It was suggested also that the age should be lowered. In fact, what this would do would be to create work at the bottom. The only thing we tried to do was to create employment.

As far as technological change being a fact of life, it is a fact of life at the terminals. It affects us almost as much as the residual impact of the grain through the port affects us, and doubly so when there is not much volume going through the ports. But that leaves us with the adjustment program problem. As the equipment in the terminals becomes more and more complicated, it ends up that job ghettos are created. There are a number of senior workers who did not have the opportunity to gain the knowledge and skills which come with having a secondary education. Those people will never have the opportunity even to post for these higher paying jobs because they do not have the skills at this point in time.

We have looked at programs which deal with illiteracy in the workplace, as well as having people upgrade their skills, since we know that technological change will continue. These people who would benefit from such upgrading will be relegated to being sweepers at the terminals.

We have put forward proposals to the companies to deal with workplace illiteracy on about five different occasions. There is a program offered through the Ontario Federation of Labour. There has been lobbying to get this program instituted in the grain elevators. It has been declined and the companies have snubbed those putting it forward on every occasion. They will meet with them, but then they say, "Thanks, but no thanks".

Just to build on that, one of the companies at the waterfront held a needs analysis. This is how much United Grain Growers thinks of the union: They told their employees that they had spoken with the union, that they had held a meeting with the union president, and that the president okayed proceeding with the needs analysis. Not only did they say they had discussed this with the union, but they also formed a committee using all union members so they could sell their bill of goods to the employees.

The union members got hold of me. Upon my contacting the company and asking for information, they answered, "Well, do whatever you want. If you do not want to do the analysis, just cancel it then and we will not do it." I told them I just wanted to know what was happening there. They said, "It is a needs assessment for training that the company was thinking about doing." When I said, "Great, let's look into it," my contact was totally surprised. He would not even come and communicate with us about it. Yet they tried to go in through the back door. They had told the workers there, as well as the person from the college, from Skills & Development who had been hired to do the survey, that they had discussed it with the union. When I went down and talked to the individual concerned, she cancelled the program temporarily until she could clarify that this would indeed be some type of a joint venture. We were able to review it. Unfortunately, they completed the needs assessment portion and that is as far as it has gone.

As far as job security goes, we also had skills training and trades training as an issue at the bargaining table. This same company that is doing a needs assessment, saying they may allow people to take some courses in computers or in workplace literacy, is the same company that says the apprenticeship program in the collective agreement will no longer be adhered to. The program will no longer be hiring people from within, will no longer post positions for people who have been in the industry for anywhere from 10 to 20 years; instead, it will hire qualified people off the street. The company is just forgetting about the apprenticeship program, ignoring the fact that it is in the collective agreement. So now there are grievances pending.

We tried to clear up these issues at the bargaining table. We could not do so because the companies would not even commit to using the apprenticeship program. Therefore, in this industrial inquiry I could go on for days with horror stories of events that are happening on the waterfront. Someone needs to intervene, or three years from now, I will more than likely end up back here doing exactly what I am doing today.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Barootes?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Daniher, I think I have a partial answer to the question I am going to ask. You have alluded to the fact that technological advances, improvements in grain cars and the way they are handled, and the shift of markets to the west coast has caused your union membership to drop from about 1,800 to 900. You said that is a loss of about 1,000; I think it is 900.

Anyway, if that it is true, there must be quite a few people, as you have pointed out, who are without jobs. You had an excellent plan for retraining, out-placement, and other benefits of that nature which are quite common now in lay-offs. But you made this statement, and I have your exact words, that "The government stopped us from proceeding."

Would you please tell me concisely which government you mean, and how that government stopped you from proceeding with this retraining, out-placement, and help to upgrade the skills of your people?

Mr. Daniher: Canada Employment and Immigration had been lobbying the Lakehead Terminal Elevators Association to consider getting some type of a program started. They could see that there were hundreds of jobs being lost. Basically they had approached the companies on a number of occasions and had brought it to the Winnipeg—

Senator Barootes: So it is the federal government that you are talking about and not the provincial government?

Mr. Daniher: That is correct.

Senator Barootes: But tell me how they were holding you back.

Mr. Daniher: So we, the union, sat down but the companies refused to participate. They had been lobbying for approximately a two-year period. We could see a need. We thought that 160 people might be terminated. We set up a program and worked with an individual from the department. We committed funding to it. The worker took that to his superiors, but they said it could not proceed unless the Lakehead Terminal Elevator Association agreed to participate.

Senator Barootes: The company refused it, then.

Mr. Daniher: Correct.

Senator Barootes: Not the government.

Mr. Daniher: In my understanding of the situation, and of course I got it secondhand from the individual, we were willing to go ahead without the companies but the government said we could not proceed unless the companies participated.

Senator Barootes: That sounds extremely strange to me because all sorts of money has been made available for retraining of workers who do not have advanced skills. I wish you could document that situation, because it is a terrible accusation to make in view of the $800 million that has been made available for retraining of workers with obsolescent skills. I hope that you can provide documenation when you make such a statement.

Mr. Daniher: No, I don't have the written document. I have at least one letter that was written to the Lakehead Terminal Elevator Association when they declined. I am not sure that I want to provide that. I may be jeopardizing the person's employment by raising that concern. But if you give me your name and address, I can supply you with the documentation on exactly what happened in that situation, and that will probably clarify the issue.

It is not that there was no funding available; it was a matter of the union wanting to proceed on its own because the companies would not participate. We presented a proposal to the individual from the department. It was a three-phase process. We wanted to look at the people whose employment had already been terminated, those whose employment was about to be terminated, and also at some type of program to deal with the job-skill levels of the people remaining. For some reason, the government worker did not get the okay for this process from his superiors.

Senator Barootes: I take it from what you have said, again, that it is not the government that was reluctant. You said they had the funds available and there are programs available, but that someone failed to jump in. Apparently your union was willing, but someone else did not come in. Was it a tripartite program where government, employer and union have to work together?

Mr. Daniher: I believe it was set up that way, yes.

The Chairman: Senator Molgat?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Daniher, for coming to tell us about your problems. The issue at the moment, then, is not pay. The issues are pension, job security and retraining.

Mr. Daniher: That is correct.

Senator Molgat: Those are not new issues, I gather, for your group? They have been outstanding issues for quite some time with the employer?

Mr. Daniher: Of course, the pension issue has been outstanding. We had to strike to get the right just to negotiate it. Really, since '84, our numbers have been declining, but there were some slight improvements made to the pension area during the last round of bargaining. We had the same type of proposals on the table in the last round of bargaining sessions, but we had no weight because there was no grain volume to use to push the issue.

I think what has happened here is that there has been a change in leadership, there has been a change in focus, and the impact of what is happening to this union has been so dramatic that we focused on more of a business approach. Where will we be in the year 2000? Look at what is happening to us. There are people with 14 years' experience losing their jobs. We have also dealt with areas such as contracting out in the past. It has been an ongoing battle. But we have been forced to change our whole focus, our whole outlook, to concentrate on job security issues.

Senator Molgat: It is as a result of this, I gather, that you asked for an independent industrial inquiry. Tell me, when did you start asking for that inquiry, and to whom did you make the specific request?

Mr. Daniher: I do not have the exact documents with me, but the first time was during the last round of bargaining; so it would be sometime in 1988. Our bargaining took 18 months at that time. The first request was made either in late 1988 or early 1989 and I believe that Mr. Corbeil was the Minister of Labour at that time, but I would have to check that.

The second request was made by myself on behalf of a number of people from the lodge who were struck with this supplementary unemployment insurance nonpayment. We sent that in in the early summer of 1989. We have been lobbying and talking to people from the minister's office on an ongoing basis regarding the whole situation. Of course those would not be considered official requests, but we have been discussing that issue. The last formal request was made last Tuesday.

Senator Molgat: That last formal request was in writing, I take it, to the minister.

Mr. Daniher: That is correct.

Senator Molgat: Why would the government not accede to your request and proceed to do that? Did they give you a reason?

Mr. Daniher: The reason given on the first request was that we were in the bargaining process. The negotiations were still ongoing so they thought the timing of it was not right. On the second request I made he thought the issue we had brought up was a contractual issue which could have been dealt with through the grievance arbitration procedure. I think they missed the point of both those. And this third request is really a dual request, first, to look at the issues we face now specific to the bargaining and, second, to look at the issues that we are going to continue to face on an ongoing basis at the port. I am hoping I get a positive response to that.

Senator Molgat: I gather then that the government was well aware of the problem. It had been told on a number of occasions what the problems were but it did not proceed to act.

I want to come to your statements regarding the 72 hours. If I understood you correctly, you said that on Tuesday morning the minister called you. Was that Mr. Danis?

Mr. Daniher: That was not Mr. Danis, it was another senior person of that department.

Senator Molgat: From the department?

Mr. Daniher: From the labour department.

Senator Molgat: Not the minister himself but he was speaking for the minister?

Mr. Daniher: That is correct. I believe it was a deputy minister.

Senator Molgat: And he said there had been a major breakthrough. Later that day then the companies said that they were prepared to discuss all issues. Is that correct?

Mr. Daniher: First they said they were willing to go to the table and discuss all issues; then we questioned whether it was the pension issue, because we had kept saying we would return if they were willing to have meaningful discussion with the experts there to discuss the issue. They issued a second press release later in the day that spelled out that they were willing to discuss the outstanding issue of pension specifically.

Senator Molgat: I presume that is what the deputy minister meant. He had been speaking to the companies, I take it, and knew that they were going to make that statement?

Mr. Daniher: I cannot speak for the deputy minister, but that is the message I took from the conversation we had.

Senator Molgat: Was there anything said to you at that time about the possibility of back-to-work legislation?

Mr. Daniher: No, there was nothing said at that time.

Senator Molgat: Now the next day the individual who was named—as what, a fact finder, Mr. Edmundson?

Mr. Daniher: That is correct.

Senator Molgat: He was in touch with you. We are now talking about Tuesday, when the deputy minister called. On Wednesday Mr. Edmundson was in touch with you.

Mr. Daniher: He flew into Thunder Bay late Wednesday night and in fact contacted me late in the evening.

Senator Molgat: Late Tuesday night?

Mr. Daniher: Late Tuesday night, and he suggested that we meet early in the morning. We met for coffee and a discussion at 7 a.m.

Senator Molgat: Did he say anything about back-to-work legislation?

Mr. Daniher: Not specifically. We had been hearing rumblings. I probably posed a question to him about the back-to-work legislation, because we had been talking to different people from our ridings and there were a lot of rumours floating around. So basically I posed a question to him about where we sat with this back-to-work legislation. At that time he indicated that we had a very short time period to pull this all together due to the fact that if we did not—he did not specifically say this but I inferred from our discussions that if we did not have an agreement by a certain period, or a strong indication that we were going to get one, something else was going to happen. He did not specifically say back to work, but you would have to infer that that would be the next step in the process.

Senator Molgat: That day, the Wednesday, you were then proceeding to go back and discuss with the companies?

Mr. Daniher: That is correct. We had to pull our people together. Our president was out of town. We had to contact him. We had to bring the rest of the negotiating committee together. We had to get hold of our labour consultant and our pension consultant, who had to fly in from Toronto, and then we had to have a strategy session. We wanted to review where we had broken off in August and get our heads together on a strategy session that morning. And I guess the fact finder had been meeting with the company during the day. We arrived to sit down with the companies at approximately three o'clock and that is when we got the facts.

Senator Molgat: So the process was moving along then. You did not delay it at all; you proceeded immediately that day to see what you could do with the companies?

Mr. Daniher: That is correct.

Senator Molgat: All right. And then of course there was the announcement by Mr. Mayer which ended everything. I would like to go to the bill itself and the question of the mediator-arbitrator. Do I understand correctly that you would prefer this be a three-person body?

Mr. Daniher: That is correct. We suggested that the mediation process could still be a single body. If the mediation process failed, then in fact it would go to the three-party panel. There are two ways to do that. One would be that the union nominee and the company nominee would try to select a third party, and the second way would be that the government could just appoint a neutral party. In fact we would have a union nominee and the company would have a company nominee. I call it more of a Thunder Bay nominee. We want people there to be well aware of the situation that we are facing, and someone who has some knowledge of pensions, of course.

Senator Molgat: Have you made the proposal directly to the government that you be involved in the process?

Mr. Daniher: We did it through opposition politicians more than with a direct request.

Senator Molgat: The bill does not provide for a three-member group, at least as I read it. It says "appoint a mediator" and then refers to "the mediator-arbitrator" so I assume it is a one-person body.

Mr. Daniher: It is in the singular form and it is that exactly, a one-person body.

Senator Molgat: But would you still prefer that it be a three-person?

Mr. Daniher: We would still prefer that just to ensure that things are done—I would not want to say in a fair manner, but just so that all the facts are thoroughly represented and both parties get a chance, especially when a complicated issue like pensions comes up, to present their case and do whatever is necessary to elaborate on issues that specifically affect the people who live in the Thunder Bay area.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Kinsella: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, honourable senators. Mr. Daniher, just a quick particular point. In the collective agreement that has expired is there a pensions provision? Is there a clause on pensions?

Mr. Daniher: Yes there is.

Senator Kinsella: Does it provide for a money purchase plan or a defined benefits plan?

Mr. Daniher: It applies to a defined benefits plan.

Senator Kinsella: In the negotiation rounds was there any desire to change from one type of plan to another type of plan?

Mr. Daniher: Yes there was.

Senator Kinsella: To go to defined benefit from money purchase?

Mr. Daniher: No. Before the plans were all standardized in 1984 one of the companies had a money purchase plan and we moved everyone into a defined benefit plan. The employees that work for that company got a 2.8 per cent return on their money last year in total. So, in fact, the question they raised was whether it would be beneficial if they could use the money out of the money purchase plan and buy credited service in the defined benefit plan. It was something that would have to be investigated. Again, it was a complicated issue. Would it be beneficial or wouldn't it? We felt it would be beneficial to both the union and the company to have everything standardized and take away the risk that they felt this time. The people in the money purchase plan are getting ready to retire. They got 2.8 percent on their money this year, and that will reduce their retirement income somewhat.

Senator Kinsella: On a more general topic, Mr. Daniher, when the state intervenes like this in the collective bargaining process—I know honourable senators reflected on this earlier in the day—it is a serious matter. This type kind of legislation comes to legislative bodies quite rarely, whether federally or provincially. However, historically, it does from time to time arrive here.

Do you accept the idea or the principle that, in Canadian society, where the public interest is affected or there is a public interest aspect to the labour relations between two parties, the employees and the employers, it requires the intervention of the state, such as we are dealing with today?

Mr. Daniher: I think you have to weigh two things. One is that you would not want to let this thing go on forever; but you also have to weigh the impact of it. There is a collective bargaining process that you would go through, and as long as you go through that process that is one thing—and in our case, we didn't get a chance to go through it—and there is an impact on the public, I think no one could sit here and deny that on certain occasions, depending on the circumstances, you might have to consider that it is in the public's best interests to deal with that issue. It would be on a circumstance-by-circumstance basis, and it would be after every attempt has been made to get a collective agreement.

It is not fair that we are out for seven days, in our case, and we get ordered back to work, when the company would not even negotiate the major item, and they thought all along that they would not have to because we would just get legislated back to work, and they would be able to impose some kind of unfair and unjust settlement on us. However, that didn't happen, and it looks like we will be going to the mediation-arbitration stage; but on certain occasions it would have to be considered, no doubt.

Senator Kinsella: Well, I agree with you. I think there should only be intervention when all ordinary measures have been exhausted. I guess it becomes a judgment call when the public interest is adversely affected, and that is, in part, the duty of governments.

If we turn to clause 8 of the bill before the Senate and the process of appointing the mediator-arbitrator, I think there is no difficulty with the mediation process, that this will continue and the mediator will serve as the honest broker between the parties who, hopefully through the mediation process, will arrive at a collective agreement. I might say that even when a collective agreement is signed, labour relations do not stop there. They must continue in the work setting throughout the entire work relationship. In this instance, however, should mediation not bring the parties to a collective agreement, then there is a provision for arbitration.

Clause 8(2)(b) of Bill C-37 provides that, if the mediator-arbitrator is unable to bring about agreement, then the mediator-arbitrator must hear the union and the employer on the matter and arbitrate the matter. So the arbitrator is there to provide for the continuance of the negotiation between the two parties. That is a fairly ordinary process at the arbitration level.

Do you think that the arbitrator using final offer selection or final offer arbitration as his or her method would make a more level playing field than if they simply were to hear the case advanced by the union and by the employer and make an arbitral award as opposed to choosing the final proposal of the employer or the final proposal of the union?

Mr. Daniher: Personally, as far as this union is concerned, we would not be in favour of that. The type of hearing we would like to see is a three-person panel, and we make our presentations to them. They would hear the merits of the argument and make a decision together. Final offer selection, in one sense, can lead to the bottom line, but you can be a winner and loser in that situation, and you might not end up addressing the concerns that needed to be addressed. You may end up with a hostile work environment.

The way we have always done our negotiations is we have a job to do; we negotiate our agreement; we get the thing settled; we go back to work and move the country's grain. We are the number one port in the world, we believe. When the negotiations come up again, we continue to move that grain again, as we did this time, but we still have a job to do. If the job comes down to "we have to do what we have to do to get an agreement," we do that. When it gets resolved, we get back to being the number one grain port in the world. Final offer selection? This union disagrees with it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Just three points, Mr. Daniher. If the government had agreed to an independent industrial inquiry, would there have been a strike?

Mr. Daniher: Well, after the fact, it is a loaded question to that extent. I would look at it this way. If they had come in and examined the situation we were facing on the two occasions we invited them, that might have done a lot to lessen some of the hardships we have faced over the years. It would have brought the parties together before the bargaining process started so we could look at some of the things in the adjustment program, the early retirement provision and the impact of technological change. So I think it would have impacted on the negotiations and maybe the type of items that we hear, but that is strictly speculation. I would not want to say that this happened because they did not do that. The bottom line of this strike was that the company said there would be nothing on pensions. They would not even discuss the issue. So the strike was not about how much we were going to get. The strike was about the fact that they were not willing to give us anything or come to the table to discuss it. I would think that even with the industrial inquiry, if the companies had taken the position at the bargaining table where they said "nothing on pensions," we would still be out on strike at this point in time.

Senator Frith: I understand. On the basis of your evidence, the apparent dismal attitude of the government and the employer throughout, and the indictment that you have detailed, would seem to me to be exactly the kind of situation that that legislation and that process was designed to deal with.

Anyway, I will pass on that and will now move on to other items.

I have two other questions. Firstly, now that the government has brought in this legislation and has the majority in both places to see that it is passed, do you see any advantage to anyone in delaying its passage, particularly in view of what has happened up until now?

Mr. Daniher: If we review the situation, the process that has taken place in the last 72 hours, we feel that we are pawns in the game. They stated publicly that this dispute was not like the one in Vancouver, that there was a possibility of settlement, that the back-to-work legislation was not needed. They thought the parties could resolve their differences. Seven days later, for whatever reason, we see the back-to-work legislation on the table. It is a done deal. They have done it. They have done the damage and Mr. Mayer let out the word to the farmers. We never even had a chance to get out of the starting block to get into the negotiating process. At this point in time it would be counterproductive for grain handlers and farmers to delay the passage of this bill. We are not happy with it—that was stated many times in the house—but it would probably be counter-productive to delay it at this time.

Senator Frith: I understand. My last point is on clause 14. I think that clause 14 was wrong in relation to the PSAC strike, and it is wrong here. I say that on the basis of what you have told us about the timing of the back-to-work legislation. Clause 14 states:

> This Act shall come into force on the day immediately after the day on the which this Act is assented to, but not before the twelfth hour after the time at which it is assented to.

In the PSAC case, the union had the additional problem of time zones. I take it that that aspect is not a problem here, but I would ask you to walk us through exactly what would happen if we, for example, passed this legislation and Royal Assent were given. It is now 12:30 pm on Friday, October 11, 1991. If this bill is passed at third reading and is given Royal Assent, say, within the next hour and a half— 2 o'clock; it would be worse if it were earlier as I read this clause—what would happen? In 12 hours the clause states that the act would come into force on the day immediately after the day on which this act is assented to. That would mean that it would come into effect at 12:01 tomorrow morning, but not before the twelfth hour after the time at which it is assented to. Therefore, it would come into effect at 12:01 but a clock would tick a delay out until 2:01 a.m. tomorrow morning.

What would then happen? Would a shift have to come on at that time? Could you get in touch with your people? That is the first part of it, namely, what would happen? What would you feel you would have to do? Would all of your workers have to show up somewhere at 2:O1 a.m. tomorrow morning?

Mr. Daniher: It is impossible for me to get to my people to explain to them what has happened. As I said, a number of them have part-time jobs and a number of them are committed. It is moose hunting season. People have gone out of the country and some are out of town working now. I need time to have at least a meeting with them. People are not happy about this situation coming to an end in the way it has. They think that they got derailed, and they are showing great frustration. It will be very difficult for me, and for that matter even for the companies, to try to get to those people to round them up. They might get in touch with some of them, but certainly it would be total chaos.

Senator Frith: But even if you got in touch with them, are we dealing with a 24-hour operation? Would you have to say,

"All 700 of you have to be somewhere at 2:01 tomorrow morning"?

Mr. Daniher: That is exactly correct. I would have to get the companies' schedule. A couple of the companies had some discussions with me about that point yesterday but they did not know what shifts they would be running, who would be called back, the seniority, what kind of unloading they would be doing, or what was happening.

When we settled the last strike, we went back and unloaded cars. Now, there would be so many cars backed up that we would be unloading them right around the clock. One company phoned me and said, "Even though there is a backlog of cars, we are thinking about unloading Saturday." We did not know at what stage this legislation was. This was earlier in the day, and we did not know when it would be passed. I did not know that I would be down here. They said, "We are thinking of unloading Saturday and then maybe loading boats, if any, Sunday and Monday." In the past when a labour dispute resulted in a shutdown, we unloaded cars on a 24-hour a day basis and they put all the shifts back on. Right now, they are not even indicating whether there may be a few shifts or no shifts. They do not know what they are doing, so I do not have a chance to advise my people what we are doing.

Senator Frith: Has the company given you any schedule for tomorrow morning, that is, October 12?

Mr. Daniher: No, they have not.

Senator Frith: Is there any way of knowing whether you could find yourself in breach of subclause 2, which states:

> Where an employer or the union contravenes any provision of this Act, it is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and is liable, for each day or part of a day during which the offence continues, to a fine of not more than $100,000.

Do you have any anticipation of a schedule? Will the government give you a schedule to tell you when you have to go back to work?

Mr. Daniher: We will do our best to get in touch with the people to have them abide by Canadian law.

Senator Frith: What will that law be? What do you say to your members? As you see it, do you have to have 700 people standing, by ready to go to work at 2 o'clock tomorrow morning?

Mr. Daniher: That is the way the legislation reads.

Senator Murray: It is not for me to tell you, Mr. Daniher, what is in the interests of your members.

Senator Frith: It would be nice if someone did.

Senator Murray: You are the expert on that. I will express an opinion, however. You have told us that the companies told you that you would not get anything on pensions. I accept that evidence, of course. But I do not think an industrial inquiry commission would solve your pension problem. I do not think an industrial inquiry commission could have forced the company to negotiate. This bill, by appointing a mediator/arbitrator, will force them to come to the table to discuss pensions. And if they will not or cannot, or if you cannot agree, then the mediator/arbitrator will impose a settlement.

With regard to pensions, my opinion is that your members will be no worse off with the passage of this bill than they were 36 hours ago. I would argue that they would probably be better off.

Mr. Daniher: We will have to wait and see, if it goes to arbitration, what the arbitrator says. Put it this way: We will not be able to put on the compnay the kind of pressure that we thought we could—that is, public pressure—to bring them to the table to negotiate a fair collective agreement. That stage of the game has been taken out of our hands. If we cannot settle this situation through the mediation stage—and we are cautiously optimistic; we will have discussions through that stage—we feel that we have a very strong case and that we can win a fair collective agreement even at the arbitration hearing, but it is still a gamble. The matter has been taken out of our hands.

This is why we have emphasized that if we cannot get a panel, then the expertise of the arbitrator, not just his knowledge, becomes critical in order for us to get a fair hearing, and so that he can decide what is just.

Senator Murray: The company told you some time ago that you were getting nothing on pensions. None of what you told us transpired before the mediator Tuesday indicates to me that the company had had a significant change of heart.

In any event, I do want to thank Mr. Daniher for coming here and for his testimony which has been, if I may say so, both coherent and comprehensive. Therefore I would thank him on behalf of the members of the committee, and advise honourable senators that the Minister of Labour is available now to come before the committee and testify.

Mr. Chairman, there is one matter I should like to deal with before I fetch the minister. Honourable senators will be aware that at our standing committees we make arrangements to pay reasonable travelling expenses for witnesses who are invited to testify before us. In this case Mr. Daniher and one of his colleagues are here at our request, and it would take a motion of the committee to authorize that the usual arrangements be made with respect to reasonable travelling expenses. I would therefore move that that be done.

Senator Molgat: That would cover Mr. Daniher and Mr. Mike Peron who came with him. Mr. Peron did not appear on the floor, and last week our understanding was that there would be only one person. However, Mr. Peron has been in the gallery following the proceedings.

The Chairman: It is moved by Senator Murray, seconded by Senator Lynch-Staunton that the reasonable expenses of Mr. Daniher and Mr. Peron in connection with their appearance before this committee be reimbursed in the usual way.

Is it your wish, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, I believe all members of the committee know the Minister of Labour. He has appeared before the committee in the past on government legislation. He is accompanied by Mr. Michael McDermott, the Acting Deputy Minister of Labour.

[Translation]

On my right, Mr. Pierre Hamel, legal adviser to the Department of Labour.

Honourable senators, I believe the minister has a short opening statement to make.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Honourable senators, it is with some reluctance that I come here today to ask you to adopt a bill that was passed by the House of Commons . . .

Senator Frith: You may sit down if you prefer.

Mr. M. Danis: Thank you, Senator Frith.

[English]

As you know, honourable senators, I am a very strong believer in our collective bargaining process. I am sure you know that in the federal sector well over 90 per cent of settlements that we achieve are done through our normal collective bargaining process. However, in certain circumstances I do believe that the public interest dictates that the government should intervene, as regretful as that may be. I have come to the conclusion that in this dispute the government should intervene, and we have done so by proposing to the House and to the Senate that they adopt Bill C-37.

The grain has not been moving for a number of days. The grain had not been moving in Thunder Bay, even before this particular work stoppage occurred, because of the PSAC strike that involved the inspectors in the grain elevators. I was told sometime last week that discussions had broken off completely. In a conversation with Mr. Daniher, he informed me that the reason that the negotiations had come to a standstill was because the wheat pools were refusing to discuss the issue of pensions. At that time I called the wheat pools and I said that it was my intention to send someone from Labour Canada to see if a settlement would be possible. I expected the wheat pools to discuss all issues once the Labour Canada representative was there, including the issue of pensions. On Monday of this week I received a call back from the wheat pools saying that they would go back to the table with no preconditions whatsoever.

I then dispatched the director of my mediation and conciliation service to Thunder Bay to talk to the parties. I told him that I was giving him 24 hours to assess the situation and to report to me on whether he felt a settlement was possible in a relatively short period of time. I am sorry to say that it was not possible to reach a settlement and, as a result, I gave notice to the House, before 6 o'clock on Wednesday night, that the legislation would be introduced. Yesterday, the House of Commons adopted the legislation with one amendment.

I am here today, honourable senators, to ask you to support this legislation so we can get the grain moving again.

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I have one particular area of questioning and that is this matter surrounding the discussion of pensions. You know that Mr. Daniher has experienced a lot of difficulty, at least from his point of view, in getting the companies, particularly the wheat pools, to talk about pensions at all. Do you believe that the companies are violating or not living up to the arrangements or the agreement that they had before when they refuse even to discuss pensions with the union? I think you said just a minute ago that you conveyed a message to some of the wheat pools that you expected them to discuss all issues, including the pensions. Shortly after that you said the assessment of the situation was that it was not possible to reach an agreement, or that at least that was the view of your assessor. Did the companies refuse to honestly and sincerely discuss the outstanding differences respecting pensions, even after you more or less communicated to them that you expected them to hold such discussions?

Mr. Danis: I do not think anyone in the dispute was negotiating in bad faith. I know that the issue is pensions. The advice that I got from my director of the mediation and conciliation service was that he could not see an early resumption of work. Unfortunately, I was not in a position to wait for a week or ten days for the outcome of further negotiations. I cannot say what would have happened, but I did get the word of the attorney for the wheat pools, Mr. Hamilton, that negotiations would be undertaken, and also his word that there would be no preconditions. However, my advice was that there would not be an early resumption of work. That is why I then proposed the legislation to you.

Senator Olson: I understand that. We accept the union's position that at least a discussion and some readjustment of pensions is vital to them. It also includes some seniority rights with respect to some of the things the companies have been doing with recall rights and that sort of thing that adjusted them.

One of the tasks of the mediator-arbitrator that is called for in Bill C-37, is going to be to examine in detail and make some recommendations about the pension rights that seem to be the union's major problem.

Mr. Danis: Certainly, the role of the mediator, as you know, sir, will of course be to try to get the parties to cooperate and reach a settlement before they get to the arbitration stage. Once I appoint a person under legislation or under my own powers as a minister, I do not interfere at any time with the work that they do. In this case, because of the representation that you and others have made, it is my intention to send with the letter of appointment of this person a transcript of the Debates of the House of Commons yesterday and that of the Debates of the Senate today.

Senator Frith: Both in the house and in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. Danis: Yes.

Senator Olson: In addition to that, the mediator-arbitrator described in the bill is a single person. I am not saying that under some circumstances "a person" cannot be interpreted as three people. In any event, the union is a little concerned about whether or not that person will be someone who has expertise in pension issues and could carry into that discussion some views of the union. In fact, it was suggested that the union would be a whole lot happier if there was a nominee by the union, perhaps one from the companies and another one by the Minister of Labour, I presume. What kind of arrangement do you see coming out of this with respect to what in fact triggered this strike, and that was a lack of a agreement over some adjustment in the pensions?

Mr. Danis: I am told, sir, by both parties that the issue is pensions. Because I am told that by both parties, it would be my intention, if possible, to appoint someone with pension expertise. I say "if possible." If I do that, like all mediator-arbitrators that we appoint, that person will be given all the necessary resources possible to get full expertise in any area that they wish.

The reason I do not believe that a three-person panel will be helpful in this case is that I am absolutely convinced, especially after listening to Mr. Daniher earlier today, that Mr. Daniher of course will have the right to say what he wishes to the person in question, or Mr. Daniher's representatives will have that right. I am fully confident that once the person is appointed, both sides will have a full opportunity to put whatever expertise they wish to before that person.

Senator Molgat: The whole situation at Thunder Bay has been a problem for a long time. In 1968 there was a strike that lasted some two months; in 1981 there was one that lasted for days, and in 1986 there was one that lasted for five weeks. We know that each time this happens there is a particular problem for western agriculture and there is tremendous pressure to bypass the collective bargaining process. It was not bypassed in those three previous strikes, but there has been a problem in Thunder Bay for some time. This issue of pensions is not a new one, it has been known for quite some time.

Mr. Daniher told us this morning that, on a number of occasions, the union has requested an independent industrial inquiry. Why has the government not acted on that? Knowing the problem that was there, the history of the difficulties we have had, what a national problem it creates, why did we not act?

Mr. Danis: In my conversations with Mr. Daniher, I believe it was on Friday of last week, the issue of an industrial inquiry was raised. He did ask me to proceed at some point with the creation of an industrial inquiry, but he said, "Would you let us settle this dispute first and, after this is settled, then I would like you to look into it." I did give my undertaking to Mr. Daniher that once this dispute was settled I would look into the question of an industrial inquiry and I intend to do that.

Senator Molgat: That is a good step. However, you say, Mr. Minister, "last Friday." If I understood Mr. Daniher correctly, the request was made long before last Friday. It was made in previous years. Why is it that the government did not act? For example, Mr. Daniher told us this morning of the problem that some of the companies have not been making payments to the pension plan. This is not since last Friday, it goes back over some years.

Mr. Danis: The Thunder Bay situation is such that in the past 25 years there have been some work disputes, but this is the first time, unfortunately, that the government has had to resort to back-to-work legislation to settle the dispute. In all other cases, I am advised, a settlement has always been reached by the parties themselves. That is why in the past this government has not felt it was necessary to proceed with an industrial inquiry commission. In this particular case, as result of what has happened here, and also as a result of the previous time when I came before this distinguished chamber on the Vancouver grain handling situation, I indicated to Mr. Daniher that I would look at that possibility after this dispute was settled.

Senator Molgat: It seems to me, Mr. Minister, that we could have prevented a great many of the problems had there been some action previously. Mr. Daniher told us this morning, on the matter of retraining, that there were government funds available, that the union apparently was prepared to proceed, but that the companies would not join in so the retraining could not be done. In Canada we constantly speak about the need to retrain people. I would hope that your industrial inquiry will proceed very quickly and I regret that it was not done before.

My next questions should have been asked of Mr. Minister Mayer, but he was unable to be here today, so I will address the questions to you. Mr. Daniher told us that on Tuesday morning someone from your office, and he believes it was the deputy minister, called him to say that there had been a major breakthrough and that later that day the companies did in fact issue two press releases indicating that they were prepared to discuss all issues, including pensions.

The union then started to get its people together and the negotiation was to proceed. Your factfinder, Mr. Edmundson, then went to Thunder Bay. I believe he indicated that he wanted to have an agreement by 6 o'clock that day. That is pretty short notice to deal with an issue which has been outstanding for such a long time.

Be that as it may, why is it that Mr. Mayer announced earlier that day in Winnipeg, at approximately 1 p.m. local time, that the government would proceed with back-to-work legislation? Mr. Daniher said this morning that he felt it was a scam and a sham. In his shoes, I cannot see why he would think anything else, since he was told by someone in your department that by 6 o'clock that day, an unrealistic time, an agreement must be reached. Nevertheless, in the meantime, another minister said, "We will bring in back-to-work legislation."

Mr. Danis: Mr. Chairman, on Monday night at 6 o'clock I received the call back from the pool saying, "We will negotiate, with no preconditions." The breakthrough to which Mr. Daniher refers is that I told the deputy minister that on Monday night, and on Tuesday morning the deputy minister advised him that there would be no preconditions. That was the breakthrough.

Concerning the reference to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, I was told by the minister that while in Winnipeg he never used the word "legislation"; that he had been misquoted.

Senator Molgat: I cannot say whether or not he was misquoted. I was at that rally. Certainly, my understanding of what Mr. Mayer was saying was that back-to-work legislation would be brought in. I am sure that the 10,000 farmers who were there received that message, too. Let us assume that that is so. Had the government at that point decided on back-to-work legislation?

Mr. Danis: No, sir, we had not decided. As a matter of fact, I would have preferred it by a long shot had we not found it necessary to give notice for back-to-work legislation. If I had received a signal from my director that the grain would be moving again, even though the full issue might not have been completely settled, then of course I would not have given notice of the legislation. So, the government had not decided at that time. I made the decision to give the notice at 5.55 p.m. on Wednesday. I had to give notice before 6 o'clock, as you know, by our rules.

Senator Molgat: No decision had been made by Cabinet at that point?

Mr. Danis: No. It was my decision, sir, to proceed with that.

Senator Molgat: I think you will agree, Mr. Minister, that the 6 o'clock deadline to resolve the pension issue was not a realistic possibility. I do not think either the union or the company could have met that deadline.

Once the company said that it was prepared to discuss the issue and the union said that it would go back to work voluntarily, would that not have given more time to resolve the issue? Was there not a real possibility at that time that the issue could be resolved? Did you get that message at all from your factfinder?

Mr. Danis: The message I got, sir, from my factfinder was that I could not reasonably expect the grain to be moving on the short notice that I required. I agree with you, sir, that the notice to settle fully the pension issue in that period of time would have been most difficult. However, I did not require, necessarily, a full settlement of the dispute. What I required was at least some progress being made and the grain moving. That would have been okay for me at that time.

Senator Molgat: Whether Mr. Mayer was misquoted or not, that statement that afternoon effectively ended any possibility of an understanding, would you agree with that?

Mr. Danis: I have been told that some confusion was created in the room at the time the Canadian Press story came out. But I do not think that prevented the parties from continuing their discussions and reaching an agreement, had they wanted to.

Senator Molgat: Once the government says, "We are going to legislate you back to work," what is the point of any further discussion? Who would negotiate under those circumstances? It is impossible.

Mr. Danis: You have seen the legislation. It provides for a mediator-arbitrator. I still think it would be in the best interests of everyone concerned if they continued to negotiate and reach a settlement by themselves. If not, one will be imposed by the arbitrator. Thus, I think it would be in their best interests to negotiate. I understand Mr. Daniher has to be here today, but I hope that the parties will continue to negotiate to reach a settlement, even before the bill is proclaimed, if they can. The reason I say that is because we are not imposing a settlement.

Senator Molgat: As yet.

Mr. Danis: We are not imposing a percentage. With pensions, it would be difficult. Nor are we doing so with the issue of wages in the legislation.

Senator Frith: Mr. Minister, I want to finish for our side by asking you about two clauses in the bill. They are clauses 8 and 14. I understand that an amendment was proposed by Mr. Nault in the House of Commons. We heard today from Mr. Daniher that the union supported the amendment of Mr. Nault. I also know that there was a question about its admissibility since it might be outside the scope of the bill as passed at second reading.

Just for the sake of harmony, or for understanding, can you tell me if there was any merit in Mr. Nault's amendment, as supported by the union. Did you feel it was a proposal totally without merit? Or was it a close call in that, on balance, you had to decide against it? In spite of the question of admissibility, I understand that you were opposed to that amendment.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Chairman, to answer the question precisely I would have to say that, on balance, I did not feel it was an amendment that I could support. I say that because I am fully confident that the person who will be appointed as a mediator-arbitrator will give the fullest of opportunities to both parties to put forward their cases. In my mind there is an absolute 100 per cent guarantee of that. That is why I felt there was no need to have a union representative, a Wheat Board representative, as well as a third person appointed by me.

I am sure you would agree with me, senator, that whoever is appointed must give all possible opportunity to both parties to make their case on the issue of pensions.

Senator Frith: But the formula that was proposed is a formula that is used in some cases?

Mr. Danis: The last time that it was used in the federal sector was many years ago.

Senator Frith: But it is a form that is used in labour negotiations and arbitration?

Mr. Danis: You are right, sir, with regard to arbitration. Obviously, it is not used with mediation. I heard earlier today in Committee of the Whole one honourable senator mention that, therefore, what we should do is perhaps appoint one mediator and three arbitrators. Again, sir, on balance, I am confident that the parties will have a full opportunity to make their case known to the person in question.

Senator Frith: Yes, I understand that. Perhaps it is totally out of fashion, but in days when I was involved in this sort of thing, it was very common, under a collective agreement, before strike action, to have arbitration that consisted of one independent and someone representing the employer and someone representing the union. That formula or that composition had some merit. I assume its merit was not simply because an entity, a single person, refused to listen to both sides.

The advantage on the argument for this form was that both sides, the employer and the union, felt that in the final deliberations, as distinct from at the hearing, their side was going to be represented. Do you understand the distinction?

Mr. Danis: Yes.

Senator Frith: So when you say to me that you are confident that the individual will give both sides a chance, I agree with you. I do not believe that the reason for proposing a three-member body, or tribunal or whatever you want to call it, results only from a fear that there will be no application of the audi alteram partem maxim. Do you understand what I mean?

I will tell you why I am raising the point. After hearing the evidence of Mr. Daniher and some questions asked by Senator Kinsella, I was convinced that this pension question is not a simple one. When you are dealing with a group of companies, it is not a simple issue. It occurred to me that, even for psychological purposes, the union might feel better—and maybe the employer too—if the final deliberations involved all three parties.

You feel that, in this case, it was a close call and you decided against the tripartite or the troika system, but might there be cases where you would see it as appropriate?

Mr. Danis: I do not intend to say that the three-person system should be excluded completely. I would not exclude that system. I believe we have been moving away from three-person boards dealing with arbitrations at the federal level. We have done a three-person arbitration very recently in British Columbia, which was approved by the Senate. As far as I know today, the system appears to work and appeared to work well in that last legislation. I am satisfied that this one also will work well.

As a result of the concerns raised by the union and by many members here, I will do my utmost to appoint someone with expertise in the pension field, if that is possible.

Senator Frith: Clause 14 involves the coming into force of the legislation. That clause gave us some trouble on the PSAC strike. You may remember that the union in that case was dissatisfied with the coming-into-force provision of the legislation, not only because in that case there was a time-zone problem but because of difficulty even in single time zones.

At least we do not have the time-zone problem here. This clause 14, as it presently stands, purports to be an improvement over the original bill because it is the result of an amendment proposed by you in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Minister. Is that correct?

Mr. Danis: Yes.

Senator Frith: I am having difficulty understanding exactly how that will happen and how it will work. I understand the words, but I do not understand what Mr. Daniher is supposed to tell his people about where they have got to be and when they have got to be there, in order to avoid being in breach of clause 11.

Clause 11 provides that an individual who contravenes the provisions of the act is subject to a fine of not more than $50,000 where they are acting as an officer or representative, and of not more than $1,000 in every other case, and where it is an employer or the union, of not more than $100,000. If I were a union executive, or a member of the union for that matter, I would want to know exactly what I must do under clause 14 so as not to be in breach of clause 11.

Let us assume that we get third reading of this bill by 1:30 p.m. today. It is now 1:05 p.m. Clause 14 reads:

> This Act shall come into force on the day immediately after the day which this Act is assented to . . .

Stopping there, that means it would come into effect at 12:01, midnight tonight. As I read the clause, it tells me that I have to be somewhere at midnight tonight. And that applies to 700 hundred people. But then I read on and I think, no, I don't have to be there at midnight. I only have to be there not more than the twelfth hour after the bill was assented to, which would be at 1:30 in the morning. Seven hundred people have to find out where they are supposed to be at 1:30 in the morning.

What would you do, Mr. Danis, if you were a union executive? This is your clause. What would you tell your people? If I were phoning you and saying, "Mr. Danis, you are my union representative; where am I supposed to be? I don't want to be stuck with a $1000 fine."

Mr. Danis: Honourable senators, I tell you that this amendment on clause 14, which was moved by me in the House of Commons yesterday, was amended at the request of the opposition. The original bill said the following:

> This Act shall come into force on the day, or on the day at an hour to be fixed by Order of the Governor in Council.

It was at the request of the opposition that—

Senator Frith: I would like you to clarify that the "opposition" referred to is the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Daniher: Yes, the New Democratic Party. Not the Official Opposition. It was at the request of the New Democratic Party, in the spirit of cooperation that the government generally shows in the House of Commons, and I am sure shows in this place, that we agreed to modify the clause.

To answer your question, sir, clause 14 must be read with clause 4 (b):

> (b) each employee shall, when so required, forthwith resume the duties of that employee's employment.

And the criterion, if that is the right word that should be used by employees in that case, is that they must show due diligence in showing up for work. I do not anticipate any problems whatsoever, and I believe that all parties will be reasonable in the circumstances. We must look at clauses 14 and 4(b) and, in addition to that, the criterion used in past similar cases, which is the use of due diligence. I am sure no one will ask members of the union to do things that are unreasonable.

Senator Frith: I suppose some would find that reassuring, but I would not were I a grain handler. It would seem reasonable to me, if you were my union executive, to ask you for advice on this question. I read the clause, and I must know whether or not I have to be somewhere at 1:30 tomorrow morning.

Senator Frith: Then I am told, "Don't worry, you'll be all right. Don't worry about your $1,000 fine because you need only be there when required." So I say, "When am I required?" Surely that is a reasonable question. You say, "At a reasonable time." Where does it say that? It does not say anything about a reasonable time.

I am leaning on this because I hope we do not get clauses like this in the future. I must say your original clause sounded a lot more attractive to me. That, unfortunately, is not where we are at. We are here with clause 14 and I suppose all we can do now is hope that Hansard and Debates of the Senate will be made public and that 700 grain handlers will be able to say that the minister thinks everyone is going to be reasonable. I suppose we cannot take it any further than that. Can you see any way we can? I mean the words are there. When someone normally says, "What must I do?", someone says, "What you must do is what the law says you must do". If that is so, then I have to be somewhere at one-thirty or two o'clock tomorrow morning, and there is nothing in the law that tells me where; but it tells me when.

Mr. Danis: I am glad to see, Senator, that you did like the original bill and I will certainly take your comments into account if it ever unfortunately comes about that we have to do another one.

Senator Frith: I hope 700 grain handlers are reassured, but I agree that there is not much more we can do with it now except hope that we think it through a little more carefully with the next bill, if there is one, which has such a provision. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Hays: I do not have many questions, but I would like some clarification on matters that have been dealt with. I will not dwell on them, but Mr. Mayer's comments seem to be an important piece in this whole sequence. He indicated that he did not use the word "legislate". In fairness to him, what did he say he said?

Mr. Danis: I am sorry, I cannot answer that question. I do not know the answer to that. I was told that he had not used the word "legislation" as stated in the Canadian Press release.

Senator Hays: But not by him, by someone else. Someone conveyed that to you so you do not know whether he did or whether he did not, but someone told you he did not.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Mayer told me that he had not used the word "legislation" and thereby had been misquoted.

Senator Hays: And he did not elaborate on what he did say?

Mr. Danis: No, sir, he did not.

Senator Hays: So it was a short conversation.

Senator Olson: You guys should talk to each other.

Senator Molgat: He left town.

Senator Fairbairn: No. He was at the Arts Centre last night.

Senator Hays: There is another thing I wanted to ask for some comment on. As I listened to the union representative, our earlier witness, I heard a whole series of things which I would think fall under the category of the unions feeling that there were certain unfair trade practices by the employer. There is, of course, an industrial inquiry, and you have elaborated on that. It comes into existence later on, as I understand your point.

This is most unfortunate because, as Mr. Daniher said, it is some 20 years since this union was legislated back to work. Having lived through this, how are you reacting in terms of examining the labour legislation or the regulations which govern the relationship of these parties and the apparent failure of the provisions as they relate to a proper means of complaining about what the union perceives, or what an employer might perceive, to be an unfair trade practice, whether it is no sweepers in a lean and mean context, whether it is failure to deal with pension rights at an earlier date when ample opportunity was given to raise the issue, and so on and so forth?

Mr. Danis: With regard to the negotiations, we do have a process under our legislation whereby if one of the parties believes that the other one is not negotiating in good faith they can file a complaint with the CLRB and the CLRB may make a ruling at that time. The CLRB, as you know, is a quasi-judicial body so I am not aware if any complaint would have been made by the union. But we do have a process in place and there are complaints from time to time to the CLRB from one of the parties in a labour dispute. So I believe the process works. We talk about an industrial inquiry. An industrial inquiry would not solve that particular issue. We have a process in the Canada Labour Code which I think works well.

Senator Hays: I put it to you, Mr. Minister, with the greatest of respect, that it is not working that well or we would not be here today. The mechanisms available to deal with problems in advance of their precipitating industrial action, such as the industrial action taken by the union here, however it is prompted, seem inadequate. I agree there is a lot more to be heard and a lot more to be looked into. This morning Mr. Daniher indicated that over a fairly long period of time a number of things happened which aggravated the relationship and there did not seem to be any provision in the legislation or regulations to provide for a way to deal with them in advance of their becoming a problem. I guess that is not a question, it is a comment in response to how well you think it is working. If you have a further comment I would appreciate it but I acknowledge it is not a question.

Mr. Danis: Obviously we are here today discussing back-to-work legislation because the parties have not been able to reach agreement on a particular dispute.

However, we do settle over 90 per cent—in the last year I believe it was over 93 per cent—of our work disputes without any intervention at this stage. Unfortunately, no one gets any publicity when that is done. When the head of my mediation service settles an Air Canada dispute dealing with thousands and thousands of workers it gets two lines on page 46 of the newspaper, and this one gets a lot of publicity. But I think on the whole, and considering that we sometimes unfortunately have to make exceptions, the system works quite well.

Senator Olson: I want to know what the Minister of Labour's interpretation of the words "assented to" in clause 14 is. It is fairly unusual that that is in a bill at all. Usually an act is not operational until it is proclaimed. You would have to proclaim this within the stipulated 12 hours. What does Royal Assent mean? What does "assented to" mean in this case in the absence of proclamation?

Mr. Danis: The bill does come into force with Royal Assent.

Senator Olson: It does?

Mr. Danis: Yes.

Senator Olson: What happened to proclamation? No requirement?

Senator Frith: He said that was in his original clause.

Mr. Danis: The same wording was used for the Vancouver legislation also, which unfortunately we had to pass.

Senator Frith: Just for the record, on this clause, because I guess we will all be looking at it for the next time, I must in fairness say that we have received an undertaking and assurance from you, as Minister of Labour, that we were unable to wring from the President of the Treasury Board. Then, I suppose, the Treasury Board is less concerned about a reputation for being compassionate than is the Department of Labour.

Senator Molgat: When I was asking you questions regarding the independent industrial inquiry, did you said you would be establishing one?

Mr. Danis: No. I said I would consider it, sir.

[Senator Hays.]

Senator Murray: If I may, Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the minister and his officials for appearing, and we hope we may not see them again soon, but one never knows.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall clause 1, the short title, stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: For the reasons we explained earlier, we would prefer clause 8 to have the formula proposed in the other place by Mr. Nault and supported by the union. Therefore, that clause carries on division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: For the reasons previously mentioned on that clause, as well as its lack of clarity, we want that clause to carry on division.

Senator Molgat: But we note, particularly, the comments of the minister, that he will be very lenient on this question.

The Chairman: Shall the schedule carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 of the short title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill without amendment.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE LATE HONOURABLE HAZEN ARGUE, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise to pay tribute to the late Senator Hazen Argue, one of Canada's longest serving parliamentarians. He was a member of the other house for 18 years and a senator for 25 years—altogether 43 years of service in the Parliament of Canada.

Hazen Argue was known as the farmer's champion and could always be found on the side of the underdog. He was born on January 6, 1921 to Howard and Legia Argue, pioneer farmers in Kayville, Saskatchewan. This background provided him with knowledge and empathy for the plight of the farmer which he carried with him throughout his political career. He attended the University of Saskatchewan where he nurtured his debating skills as president of the Debating Directorate, and furthered his knowledge of the farming industry by obtaining a Bachelor of Science degree in agriculture.

In 1945, at 24 years of age, he became the youngest parliamentarian in Canada's history. He maintained a seat in the other house as a member of the CCF until 1962. However, when the amalgamation between the CCF and the New Democratic Party occurred, he left the CCF because he said he felt that the NDP, with its labour base, would not be able to represent all Canadians and, in particular, farmers—again he championed farmers.

I am quoting from the Leader-Post of February 20, 1962, where there is a picture of a young and vigorous-looking Hazen Argue handing over his keys as CCF House leader to H. W. Herridge. He said at the time:

> I am now convinced the New Democratic Party will not appeal to the Canadian people. The CCF would have done much better in Canada than the NDP.

I offer these as reasons that he gave at the time, rather than ex post facto for his leaving the NDP.

I quote, too, from a column of December 30, 1963, by Douglas Fisher, I must say, also carrying a picture of a younger-looking Douglas Fisher. He quoted Hazen Argue:

> The NDP has now become the tool of a small labour clique and is effectively under their domination and control.

I am not associating myself with these comments, nor failing to associate myself with them. I am simply quoting them as Senator Argue's words.

In 1962, the good Senator—and I am associating myself with this—"saw the light" and became a member of the Liberal Party. The Liberals, he said, came closest of all the existing parties to his ideals. Senator Argue was elected to the other place as a Liberal in the riding of Assiniboia in 1962. In 1964 he became the federal Liberal Party organizer in Saskatchewan.

Hazen Argue was summoned to the Senate on the recommendation of Prime Minister Lester Pearson in 1966. As a Senator, he consistently represented the farmers of western Canada and always argued the case of the underdog, not solely that of farmers. Former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau took advantage of his knowledge and insight into the life of the western Canadian farmer and appointed him Minister responsible for the Wheat Board. From 1980 to 1984, while he held the post, Canada's wheat exports increased from 15.6 million tonnes to 21.3 million tonnes, which incidentally is well ahead of 1990's level of 17.3 million tonnes.

Senators who were here at the time will remember that Senator Argue was a walking encyclopedia on matters of western farming, grain production and sales. I remember one time when one of us here in this chamber asked him a question. He stood up and spoke in response to the question, and then pulled some notes out of his pocket. I remember Senator Bob Muir making the comment that Senator Argue always had his music when he was asked to play. He always did, and he always entertained and informed when he did so.

Throughout his career he argued for the causes of average Canadians. In addition to the farmers, he sought better programs for young Canadians. He applauded the reduction in the voting age from 21 to 18. An article about the Company of Young Canadians that appeared in the December 20th, 1969 edition of the Leader-Post reported that Senator Argue said:

> Good Canadians should regard our youth with great tolerance.
> We should admire their idealism and do everything we can to be tolerant and channel this idealism in a constructive direction.

As many senators will remember, Senator Argue championed also the interests and issues concerning senior citizens, especially their economic situation. He once said of seniors living in nursing homes:

> The board may be adequate, or nearly so; the rooms may be comfortable. But for many elderly citizens, these homes are little more than "jails without pay".

And he spent a good deal of time visiting those homes, as we know.

Hazen Argue consistently lambasted the Americans for their unequal treatment of minorities, while encouraging the development of a multicultural society in Canada. In a speech in the Senate in 1988, he said:

> During my lifetime I have had the privilege to associate with many ethnic people in many walks of life. I have felt that Canadians coming to this country from many lands have made a very valuable contribution over the years . . .
> As I have visited with one ethnic group after another, I have had the feeling and the conviction that, because we have taken an enlightened attitude recently in this country to the contribution that can be made by our ethnic communities, those people from various ethnic backgrounds are very proud to be called Canadians.

Senator Argue encouraged the early teaching of the French language in schools. The senator himself was praised by the Quebec press for his support of the French language. In March of 1962, Le Nouvelliste de Trois-Rivières reported:

> Hazen Argue has all the qualities of a great parliamentarian. He is hardly forty years of age. He is an outstanding debater, a fact which has been proved on many occasions in the Commons. Of all the MPs of the New Party, he was the only one capable of speaking to Quebec in its own language. Tens and hundreds of thousands of French-speaking people have been able to note with what facility he expressed himself, and how he was constantly making rapid progress in this language.

He argued for the abolishment of capital punishment. He was a consistent supporter of human rights, working for its entrenchment in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, arguing that this would be the only way to ensure protection for individuals.

In 1980 he was reported as saying:

> Surely no one would seriously argue against the basic legal, democratic and human rights. It's not good enough to say "just leave to the political majorities in the legislatures".

Senator Argue's enthusiasm for the things he espoused was indicated in various demonstrations. At one time he and his wife conducted a two-person demonstration outside the American embassy in Ottawa to protest American sales of subsidized wheat to China. They were successful. After two days of protest, they obtained a 45-minute meeting with the then U.S. ambassador Thomas Niles to press their case.

• (1410)

During the same period, the senator and his wife embarked on what they called their "Journey for Justice" across the prairies. Their purpose was to examine the on-farm situation firsthand. They crossed Manitoba and southern Saskatchewan with a television crew from the Journal, hoping to expose all Canadians to the desperate situation in western Canadian farming.

[Senator Frith.]

At the First Ministers' Conference in 1985, the senator attempted to gain access for protesting farmers into the conference hall saying, and again a quote from the Leader Post:

> "You want to get in, I'll take you in," the Liberal senator said.
> "There are 1,500 empty seats in there. It's your conference. This isn't the Soviet Union," he said.

Our friend, Senator Argue, was a man of courage, fighting passionately for causes he believed in. As one editorial put it:

> [his passing] removes a passionately caring and dedicated champion from the political scene.

We express our condolences to his wife Jean and to his children.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when Hazen Argue died earlier this month, the Globe and Mail carried his obituary with a three-column headline that read "Liberal Senator Spoke for Farmers." Speak for farmers he did, ably and passionately, for more than 46 years, all but three of them as a representative of Saskatchewan in the Parliament of Canada.

Hazen Argue gave made his maiden speech in the House of Commons on September 25th, 1945. His constituents in Wood Mountain, Saskatchewan, ". . . are not wealthy," he told the House, "and I think honourable members will have guessed the reason why. They are largely farmers, and the farmers of Canada have never received their fair share of the national income."

In the same speech he spoke of the credit squeeze on his farmers, the high production costs and low financial returns for their wheat, and the need for more emphasis on agricultural research. He went on to advocate a change in the income tax law as it affected farmers and four changes in the Prairie Farm Financial Assistance Act to provide income security for farmers in times of crop failure. "I believe," he said, "that Canadians have come to realize that prosperity, like peace, is indivisible. If labour and small business is to prosper, then agriculture must also prosper. Indeed, prosperity in Canada generally depends on a prosperous agriculture."

Almost 20 years later, on June 15th, 1966, a few months after his appointment to the Senate, Hazen Argue spoke in the Throne Speech debate in this chamber. "The price of wheat, generally speaking, has not changed in the last 20 years," he said. "The price farmers received per bushel of wheat produced in 1945 was almost identical with the price they received for a similar bushel of wheat just one year ago. How many other industries have not had an increase in their prices in the last 20 years? Although the price of wheat has remained the same, the index of farmers' costs of production has doubled in this period."

As we all know, and as those quotations and the ones put on the record earlier by the Leader of the Opposition demonstrate, Senator Argue was relentless in his advocacy of farmers' interests. As the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, as a cabinet minister from 1980 to 1984 in the Trudeau government, Senator Argue took every opportunity to promote the interests of farmers and the interests of the Co-operative movement, whose champion he was. Others here have been his allies or adversaries in the tumultuous and colourful politics of Saskatchewan. His name will be remembered with those of Tommy Douglas and Ross Thatcher among the leading political personalities in that province in the last half century.

Honourable senators are also aware of the controversy concerning Senate funds which arose several years ago and led to charges being laid against him and later withdrawn. All of us, especially those senators who were responsible for pursuing these matters when they arose, regret the fact that what turned out to be his fatal illness overtook him and prevented him from having his day in court, as he wished to do. In this chamber his denial of having intended or committed any impropriety was unqualified and the record should show this. In particular, I draw the attention of honourable senators and those who are interested in the record to Senator Argue's declarations in this chamber of July 5, 1988, and September 30, 1988.

Hazen Argue's record, taken as a whole, was one of passionate dedication to the interests of the people he represented. That record was for him, his family, friends and colleagues, a proud one. We close it this afternoon with sadness.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I became acquainted with Senator Argue in 1957. By that time he had already been here 12 years, so that it is for a long period of time that I have known of his activities on behalf of the people that he believed he represented in both chambers of the Parliament of Canada.

As has been said, Senator Argue had a very deep, sincere and abiding interest as a tireless champion or advocate of our farmers. As has already been pointed out, my acquaintance with him led me to believe that it went far deeper than that. He was for the farmers' interests because he was familiar with what was involved in that, but he always had a deep and sincere interest in the underdog—as has been pointed out—and in other fields in addition to the well-being of farmers. Terms such as "a tireless advocate", and so on, express the dedication that Senator Argue had for pursuing the interests of the underdog. But that does not quite say it all.

I think that perhaps there are other words, but I do not know what they are. However, I know this, that whenever he supported someone whom he felt was being persecuted, either by the system or by someone in the system, his reaction was automatic. He would support them and remain supporting them until some remedial action had been taken or there was absolutely no hope. There was never a question of whether or not he would come to the support and defense of people in that category. It was automatic, and he stayed with the job until it was done.

Hazen Argue would not become discouraged because he might have appeared to have been abrasive to someone. That did not bother him. He knew that on many occasions people in the so-called establishment—whatever establishment you might care to talk about—did not like the way he did things, but, as I said, that did not discourage him; he would go forward anyway.

Canada and the Parliament of Canada have lost a very rare person who was always ready to support, no matter how much time or effort it took, the position of the underdog, particularly the people in the agriculture industry whom he felt were being oppressed or depressed. As I said, whether or not the matter was controversial did not bother him; he was not afraid. He waded into the matter as if it were someone else's problem, and not his. It will be a long time before an advocate or representative of the likes of Hazen Argue will appear in the Parliament of Canada.

The Leader of the Government mentioned that Senator Argue was a strong advocate of the Co-operative movement in Canada. He certainly was. I know that several major amendments were made in the House of Commons to federal legislation respecting cooperatives, and many of them came about as a result of Senator Argue's effort. He will be missed for the reasons I have explained. I hope that the rest of us will pick up and do some of the things that Senator Argue did in respect of the people I have mentioned.

In closing, I want to express my sympathy to his wife and family. They were not particularly close friends of mine but I know that Jeannie also shared the same views as Hazen in supporting the underdog. Certainly over the years she has been extremely active in making sure that those views were expressed before and on behalf of the people that she and Hazen represented.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the three previous senators have covered Senator Argue's contribution very well. However, on a personal note, I do want to associate myself with those comments. When I first came to the Senate in 1970, Hazen was my desk mate. We sat together as a happy duo for a number of years. While I had known Hazen prior to that time, being a prairie politician myself, I came to appreciate him even more during that period as we discussed bills before us and, as well, the issues before Canada. Hazen was exactly as he has been described: an intensely passionate supporter of the farmers of Canada and of people with financial difficulties and in need of help.

Hazen was also a very active politician and we in Manitoba had many occasions to invite him to our province to speak to rural groups. He was always willing and available, and he always had a meaningful message for the farmers in my province. It is unfortunate that at this time when Canadian farmers and particularly western farmers, in their present difficulties need all the strong voices possible to support them, we have lost this very strong voice of Hazen's.

His wife, Jean, worked with him side by side consistently through those years, and I want to express to her and to the family my deepest personal regrets. I have lost not only an individual for whom I had a great deal of respect but a good friend.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EFFECT OF TRANSFER PAYMENT CUTS ON ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, with regret I read in the newspapers that the federal government is cutting millions of dollars from transfer payments to the Atlantic provinces.

I believe on this particular day the premiers of the Atlantic provinces are meeting in Halifax to discuss the drastic cuts in the transfer payments from Ottawa which, under our new Constitution, were to be protected and supported.

I understand that Prince Edward Island will receive $17 million less than anticipated, New Brunswick will receive $100 million less than anticipated, and Newfoundland will receive $53 million less than anticipated. Apparently the only province that can look for any support at all is the province of Nova Scotia, which just happens to be led by a Tory government—that almost looks like political patronage.

I hope that the day has come that this government will realize that the Atlantic provinces have been cut adrift through free trade. The unemployment rate is high and the economy is stagnant. The agricultural industry has been destroyed by potato viruses. The hog industry has been destroyed by the marketing boards being curtailed, and the price of pork is down. The egg and poultry business is destroyed; the fisheries are gone. With the 7 per cent goods and services tax on accommodation, and with high gasoline prices, taxes are so high that tourists cannot afford to go there any more. The economy of Atlantic Canada is in very serious straits.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to report back to his cabinet and his Prime Minister in order to tell them that this situation must be changed. I ask him to tell the Honourable Mr. Don Mazankowski that he should come east and see. They might have problems in the west—they are having some problems right now with the NDP—but they are going to have more problems if they do not do something about Atlantic Canada's economy and try to get this money back in equalization payments.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

• (1430)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, may we hear the names of those who are designated to serve on the committees?

The Hon. the Speaker: A list of names has been distributed, Senator Marshall.

Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The Deputy Leader of the Government and I have discussed the matter of leave. We are prepared to give leave so that the committees may proceed to their work.

I believe that a committee will be sitting after the house rises this afternoon. Thus, we are prepared to give leave.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Before leave is given, honourable senators, I would like to say that I agree with my friend Senator Jack Marshall. The list is here on my desk. It was here before the motion was made. I suggest to honourable senators that until a motion is made that certain things be done, it should not be taken for granted that they will be done automatically. The motion should be put first and then the list can be distributed afterward. The fact that these lists are on the desks of senators ahead of time seems to take for granted that we will approve of these matters beforehand.

I suggest that chairmen make their motions, table their reports and that we discuss them afterwards.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I have received quite a number of petitions during our adjournment. The wording of each petition is as follows, the first one of which is in French:

[Translation]

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy,
> HUMBLY SHEWETH
> Whereas the new 7 per cent federal tax on all goods and services adopted by the Conservative government will create serious, undue and inhuman hardship for Canadians; and
> Whereas imposing this tax will constitutes an unprecedented attack on the dwindling incomes of Canadians, not only by obliging them to pay higher taxes but also because of the increase in the cost of living as a result of inflation, interest rates and the increase in unemployment caused by this new tax; and
> Whereas the methods used by this government are not worthy of a democratic country, reflecting the whims of legislators who want to impose a dictatorship, thus ignoring the opinions of the people; and
> Whereas the people have lost confidence in the Conservative government.
> Wherefore we humbly pray and call upon senators and members who truly represent the people of this country to do everything in their power to fight the new goods and services tax, and we demand an election immediately.

[English]

These petitions are as follows: From Alberta, two petitions with 46 names; from New Brunswick, 6 petitions with 124 names; from Ontario, 13 petitions with 310 names.

From Quebec, 16 petitions with 339 names.

Total petitions are 37 with 819 names.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to table 548 petitions from veterans' groups in support of the report of the Senate subcommittee entitled, "It's Almost Too Late". In spite of the fact that the deadline was last March, these petitions are still being presented to me, and I read the breakdown as follows: Branch number 94, Greenfield Park Legion in Quebec, 56 petitions. Another Legion in Quebec, 32. Royal Canadian Legion, St. Bruneau, Quebec, 50. Legion Royal Canadien, St. Jerome, 32; Branch 4, Canadian Legion, Verdun, Quebec, 107; Branch 159, St. Hubert, Quebec, 48; Branch 24, Royal Canadian Legion, Montreal, 170; Branch 68, St. Lambert, 13; Branch 13, Royal Canadian Legion, Corner Brook Newfoundland, 40. The total is 548.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

QUESTION PERIOD

UNITED NATIONS

CANDIDACY OF PRIME MINISTER FOR POST OF SECRETARY GENERAL

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is the Prime Minister a consenting candidate for the office of Secretary-General of the United Nations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I little much more about that matter than what we have heard in the media. The Prime Minister's name has gone forward, and he has stated in public today that he regards this news out of New York last night as an attribute to Canada and to the important role that Canada has played in the United Nations for many generations. So far as I am aware, he has not gone beyond that. If the honourable senator wishes, I will be glad to convey the sense of his question to the Prime Minister.

Senator Frith: Then I take it that he is a consenting candidate? You will let us know.

Senator Murray: I will be glad to convey the sense of the honourable senator's question to the prime minister.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Do you understand the question?

Senator Frith: I am sure that the Leader of the Government in the Senate understands the question, and I am underlining the adjective "consenting". I think the people of Canada are entitled to know whether he, either before or after any proposal was made, consented to his candidateship.

My second question is—and perhaps the Leader of the Government will have to get information in order to answer this also—have Canadian missions abroad been asked to seek support for his appointment?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think I can almost certainly indicate that the answer to that question is in the negative. The Prime Minister has stated this morning that he has not directly or indirectly sought, nor is he seeking, any position other than the one he now holds.

Senator Frith: I do, however, note the Leader of the Government's use of the words "almost certain", and I do ask him to make absolutely certain, and to advise us.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think I can answer the question with certainty. No such instructions have gone out to our missions overseas.

Senator Frith: It is always very difficult to prove a negative.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: On this same question, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us if the Prime Minister has formally accepted that his name be put forward as a candidate for the post of Secretary General of the United Nations.

Senator Murray: I believe I answered that question when Senator Frith asked it a few moments ago.

Senator Haidasz: What was the answer? At least for my information, would the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us again, yes or no, has the Prime Minister agreed to stand as a candidate for the post of Secretary General of the United Nations?

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, as I have said in quoting what the Prime Minister said this morning, he has not and is not directly or indirectly seeking any position other than the one he now holds.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: If I understand it rightly from the Leader of the Government, he cannot give us any information which will enable us to rejoice for Canada and grieve for the United Nations, if the Prime Minister goes to the United Nations, or grieve for Canada if he stays and rejoice for the United Nations.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would have thought that the honourable senator and all honourable senators and our fellow Canadians would rejoice in the fact that Prime Minister Mulroney's name has been put forward and that they would greet this news in the same spirit as the Prime Minister has greeted it, namely that it is a tribute to Canada and to the important role that Canada has played in the United Nations since 1945.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR GRAINS SECTOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question respecting the $800 million in support of the agriculture industry that was announced a few days ago. Various agricultural organizations have been seeking details without success, such as how it is going to be paid and what criteria will be used to pay it. There was a bit of information that there would probably be about $100 million for agriculture other than the grains sector.

One of the very important questions that we do not get an answer to is whether this $800 million, or $700 million, more or less, that is going to the grains sector is money in addition to what will have been paid out under the terms and conditions of GRIP and NISA.

Whether it is new money, third-line-of-defence money, or whatever you want to call it, has the government made a decision on the procedures that will be used for making the payments?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to ask my colleagues, Mr. Mazankowski, Mr. McKnight and Mr. Mayer, to provide details on the process through which this assistance will be made available.

With regard to the first part of the question, I can only quote from the announcement made by Mr. McKnight on October 10, when in announcing these new measures he said:

> The support package will bolster cash already flowing under federal-provincial safety net programs, including the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan (GRIP) the Net Income Stabilization Account (NISA) crop insurance and national tripartite stabilization programs. These existing safety net programs will provide $2.5 billion to grains and oilseeds producers over the next nine months.

Senator Olson: I do not think the Leader of the Government understood the question, or maybe he understood it too well. Some people who are knowledgeable in figuring these things out believed a payment would be made under GRIP in the amount of about $800 million around February and March of 1992, regardless of whether or not there had been an announcement of some new payment on a third line of defence.

I am asking whether this announcement is simply an advance announcement of $800 million that the government knows very well is going to be paid anyway, or is additional funding, new money, a new commitment of funding for assistance to agriculture.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in the course of the discussion here some days ago at third reading of the bill to end the work stoppage at Thunder Bay, I pointed out that about $2 billion would be going out to farmers in assistance through various programs in the next year and that most of that would be through the two new safety net programs, GRIP and NISA. Those programs are going ahead and I think the honourable senator can take it for granted that the $800 million announced earlier this month is supplementary to those existing programs.

Senator Olson: No, the honourable senator cannot take that for granted, because there are no clear answers coming from the government, or the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Finance. The Leader of the Government in the Senate is the only person of whom I can ask that question.

A lot of people who are knowledgeable in this have made the calculation, based on the price and the guaranteed income under GRIP, and indeed the time when a payment would be made under the GRIP program anyway, that that comes to about $800 million.

We cannot just take it for granted. The government has to say. Is that the payment it was talking about or is it going to make an additional $800 million available about the time it indicated, which is early spring of 1992?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not have the information in front of me, but I recall having put before the Senate the schedule of payments, if I can describe it as that, between now and next June. That is on the record. Again I draw the honourable senator's attention to the announcement made by Mr. McKnight in which he said that the $800 million package would bolster cash already flowing under federal-provincial safety-net programs and that these existing programs would provide $2.5 billion to grains and oilseeds producers over the next nine months.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we know that; that is not news. We have known what the government's estimate of the cost and the payments under GRIP particularly, but NISA too, will be. Will the minister at least give me an undertaking that he will tell me soon, because there are a lot of farmers who would like to know, whether the $800 million referred to that will be paid early next spring, according to the government's own statement, is a payment that was going to be paid under the GRIP and NISA programs in any event, or is new money that will be added for agricultural assistance at that time. No "ands, ifs or buts"; just state whether it is a new program or simply a pre-announcement.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with respect, the announcement by Mr. McKnight, the relevant paragraph of which I have now read twice, contains no "ands, ifs or buts. That having been said, I will certainly take the honourable senator's questions under advisement. As information that he seeks becomes available I will bring it to the house.

Senator Olson: It should not take long. Can you come back with it tomorrow?

TIMING OF AID TO WESTERN FARMERS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: I have a supplementary to Senator Olson's questions. The farmers are interested in timing. Can the Government Leader in the Senate tell us whether or not this money will be made available directly to the farmers in western Canada before the end of this year, rather than, as is feared, just before seeding time in the spring?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I dealt with that matter when the Honourable Senator Fairbairn last raised it; that is, in the course of debate on Friday, October 11th. What I said was that the $800 million would be flowing to farmers before seeding time next spring.

Do I understand that the honourable senator is asking for a further undertaking at this point?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, indeed. The question that arose at that time, in the words of the Leader of the Government, was a commitment by the Minister of Agriculture to have the money available to the farmers before seeding time. There has been considerable discussion with farm leaders and farmers in western Canada, and the concensus is that that is not realistic or acceptable to them when there are methods of disbursement which would get that money to them before the end of the year. Next spring is too late for people who are barely hanging on.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend is talking about the $800 million in the special package announced by Mr. McKnight. I think I should repeat that I pointed out on October 11th, that there is also $1.5 billion which willbe going out between now and the end of this calendar year to farmers, plus another billion dollars in the first six months of the calendar year, 1992. This total of $2.5 billion is going out under GRIP and NISA.

NEW BRUNSWICK

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, first I I want to apologize for not having given notice to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but my question deals with something that he knows well. Before asking my question, I would also like to tell the Leader of the Government in the Senate that whether it is old money or new funds we, in the Maritimes, are always happy to hear statements that give us hope and that make things easier in the Atlantic region. One such announcement was made by your colleagues, the honourable Mr. Valcourt and Mr. Crosbie, some ten days ago, to the effect that $35 million would be given to workers who were a few weeks short to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits.

My question, as you probably know, has to do with the numerous requests made by the Acadians of New Brunswick, who would like to see enshrined in the Canadian Constitution the legislation recognizing the two official linguistic communities of New Brunswick.

Since June, there has been a provincial election in New Brunswick. On that occasion, a political party devoted to the elimination of all forms of generous, open and beneficial policies as regards official languages, namely the Confederation of Regional Party, got eight of its members elected. This situation creates problems for all those who, in the last 20 years, have praised the Official Languages Act, in New Brunswick and in Canada, and who have benefited from it.

The legislation recognizing the two official linguistic communities goes beyond the notion of institutional bilingualism, since it truly recognizes those two communities and it also promotes the establishment of institutions that genuinely and properly belong to these two communities in New Brunswick.

The Premier of New Brunswick asked us to wait until after the provincial election to discuss the matter. Now he doesn't want us to wait until the constitutional talks begin. He wants us to wait until the Constitution has been renewed. Frankly, honourable senators, I think this is unacceptable on the part of Mr. McKenna.

I received a letter from the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, Mr. Joe Clark, advising me he was supposed to meet Mrs. Landry after the election to discuss the matter.

The letter was written in early September. However, Mrs. Landry's career was cut short by the people of Shippegan-les-Isles, and I suspect that one of the reasons why they did not want Mrs. Landry back was her well publicized reluctance to defend this issue and represent the genuine interests of Acadians. Mrs. Landry's reluctance and her defeat at the polls were a signal to Mr. McKenna.

My question is this: Although your colleague, Mr. Clark, had other plans, is the federal government, considering these recent statements by Mr. McKenna, prepared to announce that all negotiations or meetings on the subject will be made public, so that the people of New Brunswick will really know what is going on, and so that we know what the federal government's position is on this matter and what the federal government intends to do to bring Mr. McKenna to the negotiating table and make him change his position? I hope this will not happen exclusively during private meetings.

Senator Robichaud, who was and is a defender of the Acadian cause—in fact, he will be honoured some time during the next few weeks for his role in promoting the status of Acadians—Senator Robichaud should set aside partisanship, just for a while. Senator Robichaud, I hope I can count on you, just as you could count on Mr. Richard Hatfield, and the entire Tory caucus when it was time to ratify the Official Language Act in New Brunswick. Please help us persuade your Liberal Premier in New Brunswick to guarantee he will do everything in his power to entrench every single clause of Bill 88, and not just vague principles of acknowledgement.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order I wish to remark what a shame it is that Senator Perrault was not here today to hear first hand from Senator Simard, who so frequently objects to lengthy questions. It is indeed a shame that he was not here to get a lesson from Senator Simard on how to ask a short, pithy and precise question.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I wish to rise on a point of order. In so doing I draw the attention of all honourable senators to rule 26, which clearly states that a preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order.

As much of the matter that gave rise to my rising on a point of order was raised by a distinguished colleague from my province, which drew the attention of another honourable colleague from my province, I thought it would be appropriate that a senator from New Brunswick raise this point of order.

Senator Olson: You have ten minutes.

Senator Gigantès: Thirteen minutes; I timed you.

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, as for the former Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Deputy Premier of New Brunswick, I must say that all my dealings with her were always very friendly and constructive. I even took the opportunity provided by her defeat in the provincial election to write a letter thanking her for her cooperation in all my contacts with her in my capacity as a federal minister for interprovincial affairs.

That being said, I understand very well the position taken by my friend Senator Simard as an Acadian. I must say that any initiative along the lines that he advocates, namely entrenching the law recognizing the two language communities in New Brunswick, must come from the government of that province. The position of the federal government has not changed, we are prepared to cooperate with New Brunswick and I believe that the present constitutional round gives us all a golden opportunity to discuss this issue and move it forward.

NATIONAL FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—OBJECTIVES OF MONETARY POLICY—PRESERVATION OF PRICE STABILITY

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is a well-known objective of monetary policy that it should concern itself with economic growth, the level of exchange rate and employment levels, as well as the objective of price stability. Yet when I read the constitutional proposals I note that it is the intention of the government to amend the Bank of Canada Act so that the mandate of the Bank of Canada will be to preserve price stability.

Does this mean that the Bank of Canada is to turn its back on these other objectives of monetary policy, which are economic growth, exchange rate levels and employment levels?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer to that question is no. But I am sure that the honourable senator would want to have a more elaborate explanation of the position of the government on this matter, which I shall obtain from the Minister of Finance and table herewith in a few days.

EDUCATION

IMPLEMENTATION OF GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT TO IMPROVE LEARNING ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, in the Speech from the Throne last May I was delighted to hear the government committing itself to stronger education and job-training efforts in Canada. I have been anxiously awaiting news of the implementation of that commitment.

The speech said that Canada's ability to prosper in a global economy will be determined by the level of Canadians' educational achievement, by the sophistication of our management skills and by our attitudes to work and change. The government promised to cut illiteracy in half; ensure a 90 percent graduation rate from high school; increase the number of maths, science and engineering university graduates, as well as dramatically increase the training provided to employees in Canada.

My question to the government leader is as to any specific progress in fulfilling this promise. There are about two or three parts to my question, but I wish to complete it.

Senator Phillips: Be pithy!

Senator Stanbury: It is pithy. I understand—and I am pleased to hear this—that a discussion paper on learning will be published in June. But I hope that the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate could give senators details about the government's specific plans and time table, for example, when the discussion paper is to be released; what will be done with it after it is printed; and what actual initiatives has the government undertaken since the Speech from the Throne to begin to satisfy its specific commitments made toward improving the learning environment in Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend will not have long to wait. The discussion paper in question will be released quite soon.

The honourable senator will be aware that for some months now we have been conducting preconsultations with various parties, including provinces, the labour movement, business and others on the shape of a process that we hope will lead to a consensus in this country not only on objectives in the field of learning but also to improve our competitiveness as a country and the relationship between the two—that is, learning and competitiveness. Ministers Wilson and Valcourt, the ministers directly responsible, have been engaged in this task for some months now. My friend can expect further announcements shortly.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform you that the time period for Question Period has elapsed.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to table three delayed responses to questions. The first was raised on June 18, 1991, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden regarding the Budget, 1991—Cuts to Grants and Contributions. There is also one on September 17, 1991, by the Honourable John B. Stewart regarding Canadian National Railways—Possible Closure of Line between Truro and North Sydney, Nova Scotia. The third one was raised on September 24 by the Honourable Lorne Bonnell regarding Justice—Jurisdiction for Payment of Legal Aid Fees—Government Policy.

THE BUDGET, 1991

CUTS TO GRANTS AND CONTRIBUTIONS—COMPOSITION OF REVIEW COMMITTEE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on June 18, 1991)

[Senator Stanbury.]

The $75 million cut in Grants and Contributions for this Fiscal Year is now accounted for. Treasury Board will be responsible for controlling the commitments of individual ministers and for completing the process with respect to the $125 million in each of the following four years.

One of the goals of this exercise was to find a better way of dealing with Grants and Contributions in the future—to increase government accountability; to develop more specific criteria; to reduce financial reliance on government for sustaining outside bureaucracies; to increase match funding and promote fundraising; to reduce duplication; and to be more careful in terms of jurisdiction (between federal, provincial and municipal governments) so that taxpayers do not end up footing 100% of the program. The Honourable Harvie Andre hopes to be putting forward recommendations for approval.

In receiving the commitments of ministers, it was agreed that they would be responsible for executing the decisions and in turn, communicating them to client groups. Ministers want to make their own decisions as to how the reductions will be carried out.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

POSSIBLE CLOSURE OF LINE BETWEEN TRURO AND NORTH SYDNEY, NOVA SCOTIA

(Response to question raised by Hon. John B. Stewart on September 17, 1991)

CN is not abandoning the line between Truro and North Sydney.

CN is advertising for interested bidders for the line to be operated as a short line railway. All bona fide offers will be evaluated to determine the best potential operator to ensure the long-term viability of the line.

In order to be successful, a bidder will have to assure CN that it has the necessary financial backing and experience and background in the railroad industry.

Since CN continues to interchange a large majority of the traffic on the line, it is in CN's interest that the continued viability and operation of the line be assured.

JUSTICE

JURISDICTION FOR PAYMENT OF LEGAL AID FEES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorne Bonnell on September 24, 1991)

Officials from the Department of Justice are presently reviewing the funding of the defence counsel for Sadler and Revel.

The Department of Justice, under federal-provincial cost-sharing arrangements, contributes to the costs of the provision of legal aid for eligible persons charged with serious criminal offences, in every jurisdiction in Canada.

As part of the government's Expenditure Control Plan, federal funding of legal aid has been limited to the 1989-90 level for fiscal years 1990-91 and 1991-92. For fiscal year 1991-92, the Government of Canada, will be contributing approximately 79% of Prince Edward Island's costs which in actual dollars is $217,000.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SRI LANKA—POSSIBLE IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT—HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES—EFFECTS OF CIVIL WAR—ECONOMIC AID AND DEVELOPMENT—CANADIAN ROLE—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Leader of the Government concerning delayed answers. I have not received an answer to a most recent question on Sri Lanka. Amnesty International today has reported yet more violations. The minister's office does not seem to be answering letters. I wonder if I can anticipate receiving an answer to my question soon.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a note that the honourable senator's question, first asked on September 24, has not yet been answered. We sent a further inquiry forward on October 17, which, I trust, will prone more fruitful and elicit an answer soon.

NEWFOUNDLAND

GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTIONS TO MARBLE MOUNTAIN AREA—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the deputy leader a question. It has to do with a question I placed on the Order Paper on May 28, 1991. The question begins by showing the time required to prepare this answer, 9 hours, and the approximate cost, $162. What is the purpose of those statistics?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take it that in the other place, as well as here, the government is tabling with the replies to written questions the time and the cost involved in answering the questions. This is an innovation that the government has undertaken in the House of Commons, and apparently intends to apply to all written questions.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. As I indicated, the question was answered on May 28, 1991. It gives me a list of moneys provided on a federal-provincial basis to a certain ski resort in the Marble Mountain area on the west coast, outside Cornerbrook, Newfoundland. After nine hours and a cost of $162 they do not even know what I was asking for.

Senator Gigantès: They don't?

Senator Marshall: A press release put out prior to the response to that question by the Honourable John Crosbie states that there was a three-year marketing initiative for Marble Mountain at a cost of $796,000. That is not even included in the answer. So if someone has taken nine hours at a cost of $162 to answer a question that is inaccurate, I think the matter should be investigated. I wonder if the deputy leader would respond to the question and will look into the enormous cost and why the answer is so incomplete.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly look into the policy of the govenment regarding the costing of questions and verify the answer as to its incompleteness and report back.

AN ACT TO PROVIDE FOR THE APPOINTMENT OF A PORT WARDEN FOR THE HARBOUR OF QUEBEC AN ACT TO AMEND AND CONSOLIDATE THE ACTS RELATING TO THE OFFICE OF PORT WARDEN FOR THE HARBOUR OF MONTREAL

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved the third reading of Bill C-14, to provide for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec and to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal, and to validate certain fees and charges established pursuant thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

FOREIGN MISSIONS AND INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Norman K. Atkins moved the second reading of Bill C-27, respecting the privileges and immunities of foreign missions and international organizations.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Explain.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I am pleased to propose second reading of Bill C-27, respecting the privileges and immunities of foreign missions and international organizations. This bill is sponsored by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and received second and third reading in the House of Commons on October 4, 1991, having been approved by the Committee of the Whole following approximately half an hour of discussion.

As the title indicates, the bill deals with the privileges and immunities in Canada of foreign, diplomatic and consular missions and of international organizations. Presently these issues are dealt with in two statutes, the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act and the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act. It is the purpose of this bill to combine and update these two existing pieces of legislation dealing with privileges and immunities. In addition, it will strengthen the Canadian government's efforts to obtain favourable treatment for overseas offices of Canada's provinces. It will do this by permitting, for the first time, the granting of privileges and immunities to the offices of subunits of foreign states which offer equivalent treatment to the offices of Canadian provinces abroad.

Canada is required by international law to grant what we call privileges and immunities—certain exemptions from Canadian laws—to foreign embassies and consulates and to diplomatic and consular agencies. This is the subject of the first part of the bill. Perhaps one of the oldest and most basic principles of international law is the inviolability of the diplomatic representative. In modern times the special legal status of diplomatic and consular missions has been codified in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations.

Canada, along with the vast majority of nations, is a party to these conventions. The special legal status of a diplomat is not simply some convenient prerequisite of the job. As stated in the preamble to the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations: "The purpose of such privileges and immunities is not to benefit individuals but to ensure the efficient performance of the functions of diplomatic missions."

At present, the articles of the two Vienna Conventions that relate directly to the legal status of foreign missions and their personnel are given the force of law in Canada by the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act. The new act would continue to grant the force of law to these articles. It would also provide for more flexibility in the treatment of foreign embassies and consulates.

Exactly how this Part would increase flexibility requires a brief explanation of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic and Consular Relations. Most honourable senators will be familiar with the immunities of a full diplomatic agent, an individual who is not subject to the jurisdiction of domestic courts in either civil or criminal matters.

Less familiar to many people is the fact that every diplomatic mission will contain other individuals who are entitled only to limited immunity.

The Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations creates a hierarchy of privileges and immunities. At the top are diplomatic agents, with full immunities; beneath them are administrative, technical and services staff—secretaries, clerks, technicians, guards—who have much lower levels of privileges and immunities. As well, it comes as a surprise to many people that a consular agent, as defined in the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, is entitled to a very limited level of privileges and immunities when compared to a diplomat. A consul has immunities from Canadian law only in respect to acts performed in the exercise of official functions. A consular agent cannot be sued for refusing to issue a visa, but if he is out for a drive on the weekend and causes an accident, he can be sued, charged, arrested and even imprisoned. It is up to a Canadian court to decide what is or is not an exercise of an official function.

Within the framework provided by the two Vienna Conventions the treatment of foreign diplomatic and consular missions is governed by the principle of reciprocity. This is not a particularly sophisticated principle, that is tit for tat, but it is the mechanism that ensures that the obligations undertaken in the Vienna Conventions are fulfilled. The Vienna Conventions specifically permit a country such as Canada to treat another country's representative here in an unfavourable fashion in retaliation for that country's unfavourable treatment of Canada's representatives abroad. However, the Vienna Conventions also contemplate that, if a country's missions abroad are offered especially favourable treatment, that country can agree to reciprocate that favourable treatment.

Under the terms of the existing act, Canada's ability to exercise the reciprocity permitted under the Vienna Conventions is limited. Canada can react negatively to unfavourable treatment abroad, but cannot respond to offers of more favourable treatment abroad by granting more favourable treatment to those members of foreign missions—consuls, administrative and technical staff—who do not have full immunity. This has resulted in limitations of Canada's options in pursuing its foreign interests as well as in lost opportunities to save Canadian tax dollars.

For example, there may be times when Canada wishes to establish a consular mission in a foreign country, but, given the nature of that country's judicial or police system, is unwilling to establish a mission with only the limited level of immunity established by the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. Other countries such as the United States and the United Kingdom, when faced with similar concerns, have entered into treaties with such states agreeing, on a reciprocal basis, to the granting of additional privileges and immunities for their consulates. Under the existing act, Canada cannot enter into such agreements.

Another example of the limitations of the existing legislation arose when Canada was constructing its new embassy in Washington. At the time, the United States was interested in entering into an agreement with Canada which would have resulted in the administrative and technical staff in the American Embassy in Ottawa, and in the Canadian Embassy in Washington, receiving a higher level of privileges and immunities than that specified for such staff in the Vienna Convention. As part of the agreement, the American government was willing to offer a duty exemption on material imported into the United States for the construction of the new embassy in Washington. Such an exception would have reduced the cost of the construction of the Canadian Embassy in Washington by more than $1 million. Because of the limitations of the existing legislation, Canada could not enter into such an agreement. The new act will increase Canada's flexibility in administering the application of the principle of reciprocity to foreign diplomats in Canada.

International law also grants a special status to international organizations. Membership in organizations such as the United Nations carries with it the obligation to grant those organizations and their officers certain privileges and immunities. Without legislation permitting the granting of such privileges and immunities, Canada could not be a member of those organizations. Nor could we act as host country for such organizations as the ICAO, the International Civil Aviation Organization in Montreal, or the Commonwealth of Learning in Vancouver.

At present such organizations are granted privileges and immunities by Order In Council under the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act. The level of treatment which Canada can grant international organizations has not changed since the predecessor to that act, the Privileges and Immunities (United Nations) Act, was passed in 1947. But international standards of treatment for such organizations have changed significantly, and the restrictions of the existing legislation have created difficulties for Canada's relations with international organizations, including the largest international organization with headquarters in Canada, that of the ICAO.

The ICAO and its member states have for years expressed the view that the existing Headquarters Agreement with Canada, concluded in 1951, is outdated and unsuited to the modern needs of the organization. In 1951, for example, it was anticipated that the representatives of ICAO member states would only be in Canada for short periods each year. The practice of the organization has developed over the years, and today in Montreal there are 33 permanent missions to ICAO resident year round. As well, ICAO has pointed out the anomaly that ICAO's regional offices in cities such as Paris and Mexico City now receive higher levels of privileges and immunities that ICAO's headquarters in Montreal.

Responding to such concerns, Canada negotiated a new Headquarters Agreement with ICAO last year, but it cannot yet enter into force. This new legislation will permit the implementation of this new Headquarters Agreement with ICAO, thus removing irritants which over the past decade have detracted from Canada's valued relationship with that organization and assuring ICAO's continuing presence in Canada.

However, the area of interest is broader than just ICAO. Canada is committed to a multilateral approach in dealing with international issues and we pursue this objective through such international organizations as the United Nations, the CSCE, which is the Committee for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and the OAS, the Organization of American States, and others. One way in which we can enhance our role in such organizations is by working to encourage them to establish offices, or preferably headquarters, in Canada. With modern legislation, Canada can pursue more vigorously its policy of working to attract the offices of international organizations to this country.

Apart from the foreign policy reasons for such efforts, there are significant economic benefits that such offices bring with them. The hundreds of jobs and tens of millions of dollars that ICAO brings to Montreal is the most obvious example.

On a much smaller scale, the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization in Halifax and the Commonwealth of Learning in Vancouver also provide a welcome contribution to the local economy. Other countries have interests in such organizations similar to those of Canada, and compete vigorously to attract them. This new legislation will ensure that Canada can compete on an equal basis with other states in these efforts.

While the first two parts of the bill revise existing legislation, Part III is completely new. This part would allow Canada to grant limited privileges and immunities, equivalent to those granted to consulates, to the offices of a sub-unit of a foreign state, such as a German land, for example Bavaria, or an Australian state, for example, New South Wales.

Honourable senators, there is not a single Canadian province which does not maintain representatives abroad. There are 57 independent provincial offices overseas, a figure which does not include provincial tourism offices, nor provincial offices attached to Canadian diplomatic or consular missions. As a rule, there is a close and cooperative working relationship between Canada's diplomatic missions and these provincial offices, and Canada makes every efforts to assist them in furthering provincial interests.

For many years, when asked to do so by the provinces, Canada has requested foreign states to grant privileges and immunities to provincial offices in these states. Sometimes such requests are refused, but a number of countries have agreed to grant such special treatment to Canadian provincial offices.

Honourable senators, Canada asks this of other countries, yet, were the shoe on the other foot, we could not accede to such a request. We have always been conscious, when seeking such treatment on behalf of the provinces that we had no legal basis to reciprocate. With this bill, the government will be able to grant in Canada the status that it seeks for Canadian provincial offices abroad.

I should note that the bill limits the privileges and immunities that can be granted to such an office to the restricted level which is specified for a consular mission in the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. In particular, this legislation would permit the grant of limited privileges and immunities to an office which the government of Hong Kong intends to establish in Canada. Hong Kong, a British dependency, already grants a similar status to the provincial offices established in Hong Kong.

Honourable senators, the passage of Bill C-27, the Foreign Missions and International Organizations Act, will assist the Government of Canada in pursuing an active and effective foreign policy.

Honourable senators, I hope that this house will give Bill C-27 its full support.

Hon. Phillipe Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have listened with interest to what my honourable friend opposite has had to say. I have read the bill, and I have looked into these issues. This is a bill which is necessary. It contains various tools which are not now available and which should now be made available to the government.

However, I have some reservations with respect to definitions and wording, which would best be debated in committee. Therefore, I think this bill should go to committee for a study of its language. Otherwise, there is no doubt that we are on the right road with this type of bill. I support the principles of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Atkins, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill C-16, an Act to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act and to provide for other matters in relation thereto.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as agreed with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, we would like to hold over until tomorrow the debate on second reading of Bill C-16 because one of the key participants is unavoidably absent.

Order stands.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

Hon. James W. Ross moved the second reading of Bill C-23, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to lend support to Bill C-23. This bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act involves two technical amendments—housekeeping measures, if you will. It means that the Board will continue to operate in exactly the same way in which it has for more than 50 years. This bill has been thoroughly debated in the other place, but if honourable senators will permit, I would like to present a little background and then some specifics on the bill.

[Senator Atkins.]

The Canadian Wheat Board is a Crown agency that over the years has become a vital institution for our grain producers. While there are certainly other wheat boards operating in the world, the Canadian Wheat Board is one of the best known and respected. Over the last 50 years, it has earned a well-deserved reputation for being able to deliver promptly on any contract it signs.

As the sole marketer of western Canadian-produced wheat and barley, the Canadian Wheat Board plays an important role in the lives of this country's grain producers. It has helped ensure that Canada maintains its place as one of the world's leading exporters of high quality wheat and barley. At the same time, it ensures Canada farmers get the best return possible for their product.

In today's competitive marketplace, the Board's expertise and selling skills are crucial. Aggressive use of export subsidies by both the European Community and the United States has depressed prices and made the market-place fiercely competitive.

In spite of this debilitating grain subsidy trade war, the Canadian Wheat Board has managed to increase its list of customers. In 1988 and 1989, Canada sold wheat and barley to 56 countries. In 1989 and 1990, we were exporting to customers in more than 60 countries. To maintain this market edge in such a competitive world, the Canadian Wheat Board needs all of the advantages and sales tactics it can muster. The legislation before us today deals with one of those crucial advantages.

The Wheat Board uses many marketing tools to expand and enhance its markets for Canadian wheat and barley. One of the most important is the Credit Grain Sales Program. This program has served the farmers of Canada well for more than 25 years.

These are times of tight fiscal spending. Many countries do not have the ready currency they need to make cash purchases. The Canadian Wheat Board, with the assistance of the federal government, has been able to facilitate these sales by the extension of credit under the Credit Grain Sales Program. This program enables the board to sell grain to these countries on credit and to pay producers for these sales before the purchasing country has made total payment to the board. In the more than 25 years the program has been operating, there have been many occasions where the granting of credit has made the difference between a successful sale and a missed opportunity for Canadian grain farmers.

When the board enters into a credit sale, it borrows money to fund the transaction. These funds are used to pay the pool account and are included in initial and final payments to producers. The federal government guarantees the loans to finance these credit sales if the Wheat Board concurs. If the principal and interest owing on a credit sale cannot be recovered from the purchasing country, the federal government would, under its guarantee, provide the funds to repay the board's loans so that the farmers are never at risk of not being paid for grain sold on credit.

The federal government's guarantee of credit sales is an arrangement that has worked well for many years. However, these arrangements have never been spelled out in the Canadian Wheat Board Act itself. The Auditor-General voiced concerns that the government did not have the proper parliamentary authority necessary to guarantee the repayment of the Canadian Wheat Board's accounts receivable for grain sold to countries on credit. If passed, Bill C-23 will provide parliamentary authority for the federal government guarantee by including it in the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Extending credit to another country for grain sales is not something the federal government enters into lightly. The government must carefully balance the interests of the Canadian taxpayers, on whose behalf the government guarantees the credit sales, the grain producers, the agri-food economy, and the Canadian economy as a whole. All of these groups benefit from the economic impact of increased grain sales. When such sales are undertaken with the proper amount of caution and fiscal responsibility, they serve to strengthen the long-term stability of the entire agri-food sector.

This change to the Canadian Wheat Board Act will in no way affect the board's relationship with producers. It will not change the board's current operating and payment procedures. Producers will continue to receive payments in the same way as they always have. There will be no changes to the federal government's procedures or relationship with the board's operations. The federal government's guarantee for credit grain sales will continue as before. In short, nothing in this legislation will change how the board makes sales, conducts its operations, works with the federal government, or deals with export customers or producers.

What Bill C-23 will do is provide improved parliamentary authority for the Canadian Wheat Board to operate on the world marketplace. In today's tight fiscal environment, credit sales are a fact of life. We must not hamper the efforts of the board as it works to win the best economic returns possible for Canada's grain producers.

The second amendment, also prompted by concerns raised by the Auditor-General, will provide the proper parliamentary authority for the board to close pool accounts under the pooling or averaging system. One of the main principles under which the board operates is that it use this pooling system. By way of explanation, whether a producer sells at the beginning of the crop year, which runs from August to July of the following year, or at the end, they will receive the same price they would have if they had sold at any other time during the year. This is done by use of the pooling or averaging system.

When producers sell grain to an elevator, they receive an initial payment. The Wheat Board sells that product throughout the crop year for a variety of prices. At the end of the 12-month period, it arrives at an average price. As long as the average price throughout the 12-month period in which the producer has sold is higher than the initial payment, the producer will receive the balance in the final payment. Final payments are usually available soon after the end of the crop year.

The second amendment will simply provide proper parliamentary authority to allow the board to make these final payments prior to receiving payments in full from the purchasing country when grain is sold on credit.

To summarize, this bill will provide better parliamentary authority for the government to issue a guarantee of wheat payment to the Canadian Wheat Board for credit grain sales to international customers. Secondly, once these sales are made, this bill will provide better parliamentary authority for the Canadian Wheat Board to distribute funds to producers once sales on credit have been concluded. Again, this amendment will in no way alter the way the board conducts business with the federal government, its international customers or grain producers in Canada. The bill simply responds to concerns raised by the Auditor-General.

Bill C-23 will clearly demonstrate to producers and to Canada's grain customers the commitment of the government to the Canadian Wheat Board and its ongoing efforts to market Canadian grain around the world.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to respond, albeit briefly, to the comments of Senator Ross respecting Bill C-23. I do so firstly by complimenting Senator Ross for what is, in my opinion, a clear and adequate explanation of what Bill C-23 is required to do.

Senator Frith: Terrific for a Maritimer.

Senator Olson: Yes. Very well done. He points exactly and accurately to the technical requirements for Bill C-23.

However, what he failed to do is more important than what he did. That is, he did not tell us how the government and the Canadian Wheat Board got into this difficulty whereby the Auditor-General decided that they needed more legislative authority to operate the Canadian Wheat Board because of what has happened recently, in the last seven years or so. As the honourable senator points out in his remarks, the Canadian Wheat Board will continue to operate exactly as it has in the past, and the relationship between the Canadian Wheat Board, the government and the financing institutions will be the same.

All the Auditor-General is asking is that there be additional parliamentary approval for what the government or the cabinet has been doing in authorizing certain guarantees to the Canadian Wheat Board from time to time. None of the already stated arrangements will change. This bill will simply give some technical or legislative authority from Parliament to the government to make those decisions.

Why do we find onrselves in this situation? We got there, of course, mostly because of the mismanagement of this government. They have whatever excuses they have, and they always have some excuse that something is someone else's fault. But the Canadian Wheat Board is in more financial difficulty today than it ever has been in history. I think that the sponsor of this bill should bring in that information too, so that we know whatthat amount is. Three and a half billion dollars, perhaps. I don't know. Perhaps it is $4.5 billion.

I did do a little research, or asked some people to help me do a little research on this matter. From the figures that I have been able to find, the Canadian Wheat Board has somewhere between $3.5 billion and $4.5 billion coming from various customers around the world. The Government of Canada has been the guarantor of those bills. Except for the amount, there is nothing new. That is the way it has been in the past. I remember being involved in all kinds of discussions on this matter. When an opportunity became available to make a significant sale of wheat to some customer and we needed a little time, the matter was referred by the Canadian Wheat Board to the cabinet of the Government of Canada. Usually, authority was given by the government to the Canadian Wheat Board to proceed with the sale, and they would provide the guarantee for the financing that was necessary.

A great deal of that kind of action was needed in making sales to China and to the Soviet Union. Until very recently both of those countries purchased massive quantities of grains—millions and millions of tonnes. Until very recently I do not think there was ever a default on any of those loans. There might have been recently because of the turmoil that is now going on in the Soviet Union. But as long as I was involved, which is not since 1984, and even after that, I think that both of the very largest customers, those being mainland China and the Soviet Union, always paid all of their accounts on time, and very often ahead of time. There were some problems, of course, with some other countries. Poland was one that required extended terms or restructuring from time to time to enable us to continue making sales. I had no objection to that, either. I thought at the time that it was the right thing to do.

There is a desperate situation in the grain industry as far as the producers are concerned. The prices are so low that grain producers in western Canada cannot break even on operating account anymore. Even if we set aside all the other capital costs and overheads, just on their operating account—fuel, machinery repairs and depreciation—farmers cannot break even on what they are being paid for wheat today.

It is easy for the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister responsible for Grains and Oilseeds to say that the problem is that Europe and the United States are giving export enhancement subsidies. Honourable senators, we know that, and that probably exacerbates the whole situation, but I believe very sincerely that even if we were able to persuade Europe and the United States to discontinue the export enhancement subsidies, the problem would not go away. I say that because a profound change has taken place in agriculture in many parts of the world, not only in North America. North America leads the world in developing new techniques and technology. Mechanization is very important in this respect, but it is not the only thing that is important. There are new varieties and other technologies in producing great amounts of wheat, particularly, that were not known and are still not known insofar as mass production is concerned in many other parts of the world.

However, one thing has changed dramatically very recently, and that is that western Europe is now applying these mass production technologies. There has been a tremendous change. Call it modernization if you like, but it is a change in the method of producing grain in western Europe, in France in particular. There are now large fields that are mechanized where they are producing grain. That was not so 25 years ago.

The most outstanding example is probably the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom used to be our best customer for wheat, or at least one of our best customers. In the last 12 to 15 months the United Kingdom has exported 4 million tonnes of wheat. It is not just that they are not customers anymore; they are, in fact, competitors.

Senator Frith: What do we export?

Senator Olson: We probably export 20 or 21 million tonnes.

Senator Frith: Of wheat?

Senator Olson: Of wheat, yes.

Senator Frith: The U.K. is now exporting 20 per cent of what we do?

Senator Olson: They are now an exporter of wheat.

Senator Frith: But of about 20 per cent of what we export?

Senator Olson: Approximately, and that is a very small country. But they have changed. There are great areas now where wheat and other cereal grains are being produced in the United Kingdom, and more particularly in Europe. One of the things we had better understand about this situation is that even if we change the basis on which export subsidies are paid, or indeed if we withdraw them altogether, that surplus of wheat will not to go away. They are producing it and they do not have the same capacity as we have in North America for storing a crop of wheat, so they have to get rid of it. They use whatever they need in the process for their food supply for western Europe, and they have to sell the rest.

Honourable senators, let us not be fooled by this. The Europeans pay export subsidies now because it is a convenient way of moving grain out. However, if they were to agree to withdraw all of their subsidies, they would still be under the pressure of having to get rid of several million tonnes of grain because they have no place to store it, and if they did not need it in their food chain until the next crop was coming along, they would simply lower the price and sell it anyway. We understand that.

That is why I think the time is long past when the government can come before Parliament, and particularly before the Canadian farmers in western Canada, and say that the fault is due to these export enhancement subsidies. Why does the government not at least level with the people and say that there has been a significant change in the way grain is produced in western Europe and that we have to wake up to that fact and deal with it?

In many places in western Canada—Saskatchewan being the outstanding example, but also including places in Alberta and Manitoba—there is no alternative to producing cereal grains; at least there is none known today. The government should recognize these facts.

I hardly know what to say other than that the system has simply been mismanaged by the government. That is why we are in this situation. With this bill we patch up one thing such as the Canadian Wheat Board Act now. However, as I have said, it deals only with the technicality that we need more parliamentary authority to do exactly what you have been doing hitherto. It also shows that there is a tremendous debt building up that the government is obliged to pay because it made the guarantees. It is a further manifestation of the kind of mess that the government has brought the economy into. In the Atlantic areas they have the same problems with fish. You can go to other places and find the same problem with the timber industry. Everything they touched has turned to—

Senator Simard: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: Senator Simard has lots to say, but he cannot say with any clarity that the government has managed anything well. Everything has turned to ashes and sackcloth.

As I said at the outset, I want to compliment Senator Ross for bringing in a fairly clear, concise statement of what needs to be done in amending the Canadian Wheat Board Act. However, when he comes to committee with this bill and returns here to the chamber on third reading, I hope that he will give us some indication of what this government intends to do to change some of the basic fundamentals that led us to this problem where the Canadians Wheat Board has $3 billion or $4 billion outstanding under federal government guarantees for sales we have had to make in this competitive market.

Perhaps while he is doing that, he might also ask his colleagues, Mr. Mayer, the Minister responsible for Grains and Oilseeds, or Mr. McKnight, the Minister of Agriculture, what they intend to do and what kind of success they expect to have in trying to change the basic underlying causes of why we got into this mess in the first place.

It is no longer good enough to come here and say it is all someone else's fault. That does not help the poor farmer who cannot pay his fuel and grocery bills. The farming community expects the government to take action that will lead to beneficial results. The reason is very simple: That is what the farmers expected before this government was elected, and those were usually the results they got.

However, they no longer get those results. The situation gets progressively more desperate from year to year. Anyone who has been around the grain sector recently will know that the industry has hit its lowest point in the history of Canada. There has never been a time in this century when the price of grain relative to other costs has been so low. Even in the last depression when people talked about the terrible prices of 30 and 35 cents a bushel for wheat relative to other costs, it was better then than it is now.

Today, it takes over 50,000 bushels of wheat to buy one medium-sized combine. We did not, in the past, have that pricing problem where it was so expensive; where it took so many bushels of wheat to pay for the cost inputs that farmers had.

I hope the sponsor of this bill will come back with an explanation as to what this government intends to do about the problems in the agricultural sector. It is not good enough to say, "Well, it is the Europeans who all of a sudden have appeared on the international market scene as a seller, and they do not play fair. They use their treasury as an export enhancement program, and that is not proper." It is not good enough to say, "Well, it is the terrible United States, and they are matching what Europe does." The poor Canadian Wheat Board must then compete with them.

Do you think this is the first time in history we have had problems like this? I can tell you right now that it is not. What the Canadian government and its officials used to do is travel around the world negotiating in good faith, and they got results.

Opposition members such as myself are not in possession of all the details of the negotiations taking place from time to time, so we, on this side of the chamber, cannot give you a detailed blueprint of what you should do. However, I want to tell you that the farmers in western Canada will size up this government and make a decision on the basis of results. They are desperate. I hope we can get an explanation as to what the government intends to do about these fundamental problems.

The total world supply of wheat is approximately 20 percent to 22 percent of a normal full year's production. When we get down to about 20 to 22 percent of a full year's production, there ought to be price increases. Very often, the total supply of wheat in the world has been up as high as 30 percent of the total year's production. So the amount in reserve is not the problem in relation to other periods of time. The problem is the mismanagement of the international grain market in 1991 by the countries involved in that market, and Canada is one of those countries.

Our people, ministers and their assistants, have gone to Brussels and Geneva to try and work all of this out, and they have come back with no success stories at all. Each time they come back it is worse. The price goes down some more, and there are even stories in the press that the price will drop below the current depressed prices.

As I said, I have no criticism of the senator who moved bill, but he will understand that there are a few things that the farmers would like to know about how we got into this mess and what the government intends to do to try and get out of it.

What would solve the problem quickly would be an election, but I am not optimistic that that will happen. So we will have to put up with this government for a few more years.

Senator Frith: Oh, not two whole years, please. Say it isn't so.

Senator Phillips: At least.

Senator Olson: I am afraid that they will probably run out the rest of their time.

Senator Frith: Let the record show that Senator Phillips said "At least."

Senator Molgat: You are making us all afraid, now.

Senator Frith: We will have to get permission from the Security Council of the U.N. to have an election.

Senator Olson: There are a lot of farmers and grain producers who cannot wait two years. They need some answers now, and they need a government that at least shows some competence in managing what was well managed before the Conservatives came to office. They also need some indication that there will be changes.

I certainly hope that Senator Ross, the senator sponsoring this bill will come back with an explanation that will give some comfort to the people who depend on the Canadian Wheat Board, its sales, its credit arrangements and the returns it gives to the producers by trying to sell their wheat.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

NATIONAL DAY OF REMEMBRANCE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the second reading of Bill C-202, respecting a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

She said: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present Bill C-202, An Act respecting a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. The substance of this bill is contained in Article 2, which states simply that throughout Canada, in each and every year, the 6th day of December shall be known under the name of "National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women".

The reasons for the bill, as stated in the preamble, are as follows:

> WHEREAS on December 6, 1989, fourteen women died as a result of a massacre at the University of Montreal;
> AND WHEREAS it is important to denounce violence against women;
> AND WHEREAS the Canadian people wish to reflect on the event in the hope of preventing further violence against women.

The bill was introduced in the House of Commons by Dawn Black, the honourable member for New Westminster-Burnaby, and seconded by Mary Clancy, the honourable member for Halifax, and by the Honourable Mary Collins, Minister Responsible for the Status of Women. I congratulate these honourable members on their initiative and hope that you will honour their wish to give this bill speedy passage so that the families of victims of violence against women in Canada, the families of those 14 innocent young women who were victims in Montreal, can look forward to this December 6 as an official commemoration of the lives of their loved ones.

It was not long ago that women were not recognized legally as persons with respect to their rights and privileges but only with respect to penalties and pain. The law now recognizes women as persons, but penalties and pains have not decreased.

As we near the anniversary of the tragic events in Montreal on December 6, 1989, it is difficult to see what has been learned since that time; what discernible improvements in attitudes have occurred, even though the issue of violence against women has reached the top of the list in the agenda of both government and the media. A cold deliberate killer who massacred 22 persons in Texas thought of women as "treacherous female vipers". The television spectacle of Anita Hill and Judge Clarence Thomas showed us that, despite all the apparently earnest striving to understand sexual harassment, certainly a form of violence against women, the mostly male senators missed chances to analyze the issues clearly—to take one example, the telegraphing of pornography, as a key issue in the discussion, and how that is linked to women's vulnerability.

Violence and the threat of violence continue to deprive many women of their ability to achieve full equality. The history of violence against women is a history of inequality. In my city, as I am sure in yours, it is increasingly less safe for a woman to walk the streets at night than it was a few years ago.

Last February, I spoke in this chamber in response to an inquiry raised by Senator Royce Frith on the issue of violence against Canadian women in Canadian society, outlining some of the dimensions of the problem. A recent issue of the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund publication, LEAF Lines, reinforces once more that violence against women is a fundamental equality issue; that Canadian women are regularly threatened, assaulted, harassed, mutilated and killed—often in their own homes and by people they trust. When the incidence, degree and consequences of violence against women are considered together, the extent, tolerance and deep pervasiveness of violence towards women is astounding. The magnitude of that violence is reflected in the statistics that they quote in LEAF Lines. I will give you just some of the statistics that arise from the many recent research studies both in Canada and abroad on this subject.

One in four women will be sexually assaulted at some time in their lifetime. The overwhelming majority of sexual assaults are committed by males against females. Most women live with the fear of being sexually assaulted. Women of all ages and physical types from every cultural, racial, religious and socio-economic background, including disabled and elderly women, are sexually assaulted. At least one in ten women is battered by her male partner. Women are seven times more likely to be assaulted by someone they know than by a stranger.

Approximately 62 percent of all women murdered in Canada are victims of domestic violence. There is a public perception that women make false allegations of sexual assault and that it is an over-reported crime. In fact, the incidence of non-reporting is extremely high. Front line rape crisis workers estimate that only one in 20 raped women report the assault. Only one percent of date rapes are reported. Of the sexual assault survivors who do not report to the police, 44 percent stated that it was because they were concerned about the attitudes of the police or courts towards this crime. According to Statistics Canada, police across the country considered 14.2 percent of the sexual assault complaints to be unfounded compared with only 6 percent for other Criminal Code offences.

Violence against women takes many forms, including sexual harassment. Approximately 90 percent of women experience sexual harassment on the job.

A key study done by Linda McLeod, a Canadian researcher in 1989, summarized the recommendations advanced by women's groups over the years, representing a holistic response to the problem of violence against women. She listed many needed programs, legal measures, and so on, but she also identified five themes that need to be addressed before the problem of violence can be attacked: safety issues, negative attitudes towards women, barriers to equality, responses to violence against women, and women's participation in developing strategies to mitigate their fear and victimization. I would add a fifth theme: the credibility of the issue. Until the continuing violence against women achieves the same status as, say, the necessity for protecting the use of certain types of guns for hunters of ducks, legislators, judges and others in positions of power cannot redress the fundamental inequality involved in this issue.

I wish to draw your attention once more to the title of this bill before us. It is an Act respecting a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. How wise of the sponsors to include the word "action" in this bill, since that is what has been so sadly lacking, and how wonderful if their invitation to action should be taken up at last. This action should take the form of social change. The obstacle to full equality for women cannot be removed as long as violence against women continues to plague our society.

We in this chamber can have a direct role in such change. We need to restore a stronger rape shield law; we need to support the strongest possible gun control legislation. We could look carefully at the recommendation of the House of Commons Subcommittee on the Status of Women and lobby for its implementation. Many of these recommendations are within the federal purview. If those in high office take action the official date of remembrance and action on violence against women, to be commemorated every December 6, will be a meaningful memorial to the 14 young women who were so tragically killed in Montreal on December 6, 1989.

In closing, honourable senators, I want to express my deepest sympathy again to the families of these young women and bring their names forward again for this record. They are: Geneviève Bergeron, Hélène Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne-Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Marie Klueznick, Maryse Laganiere, Maryse Leclair, Anne-Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michèlle Richard, Annie St. Arneault, and Annie Turcotte.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I strongly support this private bill to declare a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. It was first introduced in the House of Commons by a New Democrat, Dawn Black, the M.P. for New Westminster-Burnaby, and she was supported on the bill by Mary Clancy, the Liberal member for Halifax and the Honourable Mary Collins, Minister Responsible for the Status of Women. The bill received all-party approval in the House of Commons and hopefully it will receive swift passage in this chamber as well. I would like to note at this point that my colleague, Senator Lorna Marsden, who is strongly supportive of this bill, is unable to be here at this moment. She is at another important meeting but is very keen that the legislation move ahead quickly and asked me to express her strong support of it.

This bill asks us to pause, once a year on December 6, to remember an incredible and horrifying event; the machinegun massacre of 14 young women, engineering students at L'Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal. Whatever other deep problems plagued their killer, he was by his own admission obsessed with a hatred for women and the place they were occupying in our modern society. He burst into a class, deliberately ordered the young men out of the room, and with a semi-automatic rifle and a battle cry of, "You are feminists", he began shooting his victims. Then he shot himself.

We do not wish to commemorate the name of that killer but we do wish to remember the 14 young women. As my colleague, Senator Spivak, has done, I will repeat their names: Geneviève Bergeron, Hélène Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Marie Klueznick, Maryse Laganiere, Maryse Leclair, Anne-Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michèlle Richard, Annie St. Arneault, and Annie Turcotte.

This bill pulls us beyond a simple remembrance of this tragic and senseless event by demanding that we take action to prevent violence against women. This special day, therefore, will stand as a constant reminder of a reality that pulsates beneath the surface of our society daily. Mostly it is hidden, but periodically it erupts in public manifestations of abuse, violence, and death, as it did in Montreal. The reality is physical, sexual, psychological and emotional and often all four combined.

The shots which ended the dreams and the promise and the contribution of those 14 young women and brought perpetual anguish to their families and to their friends, at the very least, shocked Canadians into facing facts that go far beyond discrimination against women. One in four Canadian women is sexually assaulted in her lifetime. One in ten Canadian women is assaulted by her male partner. Sixty two per cent of women murdered in Canada are victims of domestic violence, and guns are the single most common cause of death in cases of spousal murder.

Eighty per cent of aboriginal women in Ontario have experienced violence. Eighty per cent of women incarcerated under federal jurisdiction have had a history of physical or sexual abuse, and 27,000 sexual assaults were reported to police in 1990, almost double the figure of 1984. One half of the disabled women in Canada have been sexually abused in childhood, and some 40 per cent have been raped, abused or assaulted as adults. The statistics roll on, even in terms of senior Canadians. Female victims of elder abuse outnumber males two to one. These statistics are generally believed to underestimate the reality because so much remains hidden and unreported.

Beyond this kind of violence is another type which causes different wounds and different scars, and that is the fear, the humiliation, the degradation, the sense of worthlessness that flows from words and from gestures, from harassment in the workplace, in the home, in the street, and in routine social contacts. We have just witnessed a startling spectacle in the United States Senate as the confirmation process of the newest supreme court justice, Clarence Thomas, was disrupted by allegations of past sexual harassment of a female employee. I believe that one of the most disturbing elements of this event was the reluctance of the senators on that committee to consider this matter as a serious cause for concern in the initial investigative process. That casual dismissal of its importance or its relevance symbolically unleashed a sense of anger and deep frustration among the many, many women in the United States and in Canada who at some stage of our lives and careers have experienced the distress of such attitudinal pressures.

Closer to home, Ottawa women began the day on October 9 with news reports that slogans urging men to rape women were painted overnight on several buildings across this city including malls, businesses and schools. Hardest hit was Carleton University where nine slogans, including one that stated "rape girls", were found on campus. In the context of the Montreal massacre and the other brutal assaults and murders of young university women in southern Ontario in recent months, this is truly a chilling reminder to students of the threat of violence in their daily lives. And, colleagues, it is hard to imagine the core of fear that these actions produce in those they victimize. It is not hypothetical. It is not paranoia. It is not an exaggeration. The evidence of the facts makes it very real for woman of all ages, urban and rural, and particularly those who are disadvantaged in some way—economically, socially or physically.

Yes, they can walk away; yes, they can fight back; yes, they can speak out to the Human Rights Commission, to the media, to the courts. But in the current atmosphere in our society, all of us must understand that their fear cannot be erased. It is an inner fear that is thrown again into stark reality as a man drives his truck into a cafeteria in Texas, pulls out two semi-automatic pistols and kills 22 people, 14 of them women, shouting out his anger at women as he shoots.

There is no question that there is much greater awareness today of the types of violence against women and even the causes of it. But the awareness does not seem to lead to a reduction of these events, or to assistance and support to help the victims escape and to help them heal. Things like shelters for battered women and assistance in getting food and support for them and their children; things like education on gender equality and prevention of violence in our schools; things like tough public censure for those who perpetuate attitudes that denigrate women and encourage others to do the same; things like legislation that would, in the strongest possible way, limit accessibility of firearms that are the major tools of domestic assault, to say nothing of public executioners; things that will alleviate poverty and ignorance, and all kinds of discrimination that breed violence.

Status of Women Minister Mary Collins is to be congratulated for the establishment of the panel on Violence against Women which will report in December of 1992. It is a very strong panel. However, we do not need to wait a year for activity, because there are already sound recommendations available from the work of a House of Commons subcommittee on the status of women; recommendations which received all-party support at that stage.

Another area of concern is the vacuum created by the recent Supreme Court decision which felled the rape shield law, and that is something that the Minister of Justice must address with great care. I support the Minister's announcement that legislation protecting women who are affected by this decision will be prepared. I am anxious to see the legislation and would stress today that it must go far enough to protect women in the courtroom who testify in sexual assault cases. The victims must be guaranteed the right to a fair trial.

Finally, it was encouraging to see in the last few days a rather extraordinary conference in Ottawa—the first male national conference on male violence, whose participants pledged themselves to become involved in convincing others to actively oppose male violence against women. As one participant put it: "It's not a women's issue, it's just that women had to speak out because nobody else would. Men's silence is the oxygen that fuels men's violence."

I doubt that those words would have been spoken in that way or that that conference of men would have been held without the shock and awareness that has flowed from the Montreal tragedy. All of us have felt it, and I want to note in particular the response of Senator Frith in initiating an inquiry in this house soon after the events in Montreal.

There is no question in my mind that solutions and progress can only come from a cooperative effort between women and men to break down the barriers of old attitudes and unjustified fears that continue to render women far from equal, and objects of abuse. God knows, honourable senators, there are more than enough opportunities for all of us to join in trying to diminish the wrongs of our society. We clearly have a major struggle within the current generation, but surely we owe it to the young women and the young men now growing up in our system to attack the fear and the insecurity and the ignorance that breeds the hatred that promotes the violence.

This bill forces us to remember, and challenges us to act. I hope it passes quickly.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Senator Fairbairn kindly noted, I launched an inquiry on this subject of violence against women shortly after the horrifying events that led to the formulation of this bill.

The bill proposes to commemorate a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. The impetus for the initiative, of course, was the massacre of 14 women at l'École Polytechnique in Montreal on December 6—almost two years ago. The bill will provide Canadians with an opportunity to reflect upon all of the nameless, faceless, women who are killed by male violence and tend to be forgotten.

There will be a certain amount of repetition. I will be touching on a few things that have been mentioned by Senators Spivak and Fairbairn. I know that always runs the risk of people saying that they are sick of hearing about it. But that seems to be the only way to change the sickness into sickness at the happenings rather than hearing about the happenings.

This bill is a positive step toward recognition of violence against women, but it is lacking in three specific areas. I want to use this occasion to underline the need for more than what this bill does. I know that Mrs. Black, Senator Spivak, Mrs. Collins, Senator Fairbairn and others know that more has to be done in this bill. Pointing out what is missing in this bill on this occasion allows me to point out how much more needs to be done.

The bill is lacking in three specific areas. First, it does not offer a definition of violence against women. Second, it proposes to commemorate the 14 women who died in Montreal, but it does not name them. Third, it proposes to establish a national day of action on violence against women, but it does not describe what that action should entail. Senator Spivak also made a reference to that aspect of the bill.

First, in terms of violence against women and the need for definition, in order to have an open and healthy forum for discussion it is necessary that everyone agree on the definitions, or at least try to do so. In order to commemorate a national day of remembrance of violence against women, everyone should agree on what that means. What does violence against women mean?

Bill C-202 does not provide such a definition, but it at least triggers the need for such a definition and is salutary for that reason. But it would be still more effective if one were included so that Canadians could have a clear understanding of the terms.

We can find quite a well-rounded definition in The War Against Women, Report of the Sub-committee on Status of Women. It states:

> Violence against women is a multi-facetted problem which encompasses physical, psychological, and economic violations of women which is integrally linked to the social/economic/political structures, values and policies that silence women in our society, support gender-based discrimination, and maintain women's inequality.

Incidentally, honourable senators, this is why my original inquiry, and the one I renewed after prorogation, is directed to the problem of violence against women in Canadian society. We are tempted to find reassurance in the fact that we see violence against women in other societies, particularly in the United States, and think that we may be better. That is dangerous. We should be concentrating on the serious problem of violence against women in Canadian society.

Concerning remembrance of the 14 women who died in Montreal, I am glad that Senator Spivak put the names of those women on the record. Senator Fairbairn also put their names on the record. Because it is a commemoration of these young women with which we are concerned I wish that the bill contained their names. Unfortunately, it does not. There is some urgency as to the passage of this bill because we want to commemorate an event, the anniversary of which is closing in on us. An amendment would require the bill being sent back to the House of Commons. Let us remember the young women and that, officially at least, their names are on the Senate record. I do not know whether their names are on the record of the House of Commons.

The bill proposes a national day of action on violence against women. As I have said, whether one day for action is enough is questionable. In fact, I am sure that Mrs. Black or any of the other supporters do not expect it to be enough. However, it is a step. Yet, the bill neglects to prescribe any course of action, something which we should underline. Therefore, let us not think that by passing this bill we have solved this problem. All we have done with this bill is draw attention to the problem. We should remember that that is all we are purporting and can expect to do with this bill. Mary Clancy, a Member of Parliament from Halifax, noted this point in the House of Commons. She called for a tough law for gun control and a legislative response to the Supreme Court decision on August 22, as was mentioned by Senator Fairbairn.

There are many other areas to be addressed in order to stop violence against women. There is education; access to housing, which would help women and their children escape the violence; day care; pay equity, so that women can attain economic independence; and, recognition of stereotype and myth in the judicial system and in our social vocabulary. That is the type of action that is just barely starting with this bill. It is a very modest bill. It is an important start, but its big danger is that we will think that we have solved this serious problem by this important, but limited gesture.

By no means should this bill be denied easy passage into law. It is a positive step in recognizing that violence against women exists in our society. It does, however, lack in those three aforementioned areas. It is, nevertheless, a commendable attempt toward eradicating the problem. It is a beginning.

Honourable senators, about my renewed inquiry, I notice that it is on the list with the ominous number 9 beside it. Under the new rules, the clock is ticking. It will fall off the Order Paper if it is not dealt with. I would invite interventions by people who have made a study of this subject as to whether that inquiry, which specifically suggests a Senate committee to investigate the issue, is still a good idea in light of the task force that has already been established. I would like to be reassured. I wrote to Mrs. Black and she wrote back to me. I said to her, "I will support your bill, but I have an inquiry that I want to proceed with if we are not to have the kind of action that I think my inquiry could produce." I was prepared to make a motion referring the whole issue to a committee, but I have yet to receive a response from Mrs. Black on whether that will be necessary.

Honourable senators, on another occasion I put on the record something that I wish to put on the record again today in closing my remarks. It is part of a statement made by Professor Ursula Franklin, Professor Emeritus, Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering—I underline—University of Toronto. I ask honourable senators to remember that this bill commemorates the massacre of women engineering students in Montreal. Professor Ursula Franklin, at a memorial service held at Convocation Hall, University of Toronto, on January 17, 1990, for the 14 women who were murdered on December 6, 1989, at École Polytechnique, Université de Montréal, said this—and it seems worth repeating on the occasion of a memorial bill commemorating and remembering the same occasion. She said:

> The events in Montreal certainly and surely upset all of us deeply. As somebody who has taught for the last two decades in the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering and who has tried to encourage young women to enter our profession, as someone who is a pacifist and a feminist, the events of Montreal deeply, deeply trouble me. They trouble me because any of these young women could have been one of my students, could have been someone I encouraged by saying: "Look, you can do it. It's a tough turf all right, but there are others. Nothing will change if we aren't there."
> But these fourteen women are not there anymore. And many say that what happened to them was an act of a madman, something more or less like a random printing error that had nothing to do with anything except the state of Mark Lepine's mind. And I'm one of those who says, yes, it was an act of a madman, but it is not unrelated to what is going on around us. That people get mad may happen in any society, any place, every place. But how people get mad, how that escalation from prejudice to hate to violence occurs, what and who is hated, how it is expressed, is not unrelated to the world around us.
> When a madman uses easily-available weapons and easily-available prejudices, it is not totally his problem that will go away when he goes away. At another time, it could have been Jews who were lined up, it could have been black people, but in Montreal they were women, and they were women in an engineering faculty. Killed by someone who wanted to be an engineer.
> This is a service of remembrance and reflection, and we may wish to ask ourselves: Who is it we remember, what is it we are called upon to reflect? We remember the fourteen students in Montreal. But we also remember that they were abandoned. Our memory should not block out the fact that Marc Lepine, at one of his killing stations, went into a classroom in which there were men and women. He asked them to separate into two groups, and when this didn't happen, he fired a shot to the ceiling. Then it did happen. Then the men left. Fourteen women were killed, and Marc Lepine could leave this classroom; and it is not as much a question of how he got in, but it is a question of how he got out. And in our memory and our reflection, we have to include the fact that these women were abandoned by their fellow students. And we have to face it.

● (1700)

> Those among us who are men and those among us who are women have to ask, what does it take to make solidarity real? Is one shot to the ceiling or its verbal equivalent enough to abandon the victims? We may wish to reflect together, or you may wish to reflect alone, and think what you would have done, maybe even what you are doing in less lethal situations. Is a joke enough to condone harassment? There is a lot to be reflected upon.

Many of the comments after the massacre were comments on what was called a "senseless killing". Are there killings that are not senseless? Are there senseful killings? Are there people who can be abandoned? One may wish to reflect. And if the reflection shows that all killing is senseless, we may ask: Why then do we have tools of killing around if we agree that all killing is senseless? We may wish for a second to reflect how we, as a community, would have felt if the identical massacre had taken place in a bank, in a post office. Maybe, heaven forbid, in a hotel where the young women were prostitutes? How would we react?

We speak on occasion with fair ease about all of us being brothers and sisters. And maybe finally I would urge you, in memory of these our young colleagues, to reflect on what it means that someone is your sister, that someone is a member of that human family. That doesn't mean you have to like them or love them, but it does mean that you and we have to respect their presence as the right to be there on their own terms, not by gracious permission of the dominant culture, not only as they keep their mouths shut and go through the prescribed hoops; but because we are members of one family, by their inalienable right to be and to fulfil their potential.

And if the grief that we feel, the remembrance that we have to continue, and the reflections that we have to share, bring us into a world where it is not empty rhetoric when we speak of each other as brothers and sisters, then, I think, the memory of the students in Montreal will serve us well.

Hon. Senators: Here, here.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the honourable Senator Ross, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Government): I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as far as we are concerned, we would be prepared to proceed to third reading now. We have no desire to hold up the bill. We know that we normally insist that bills go to committee, but this is a very particular bill and there is some urgency. Unless the government intends to amend the bill, it can be read the third time now.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We have no plans to amend; we just want to follow procedure. We are in full agreement to dispose of it at this moment. With leave, I move third reading at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is moved by the honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the honourable Senator Phillips, that this bill be read the third time now. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: "It's Almost Too Late", tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1991, (Sessional Paper No. 342-973).—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, it is unfortunate that the Speaker did not rule on Bill S-5, to amend certain statues of Canada to recognize the war-time service of the veterans of the Canadian merchant navy. I want to take the opportunity now to spend about two minutes on the report entitled "It's Almost Too Late".

I want to update the information that we have on the merchant navies of other countries. While our government is procrastinating in recognizing merchant seamen, I have been in touch with the Australian government and I will read into the record their response. I will be as short as I can and I will only use extracts.

From a letter of September 10, 1990, from Ian Gollings, National Secretary of The Returned Services League of Australia, to Lieutenant-Colonel Colin Sharp, Australian Army Senior Standardization Representative, National Defence Headquarters, Ottawa, Ontario, I read in part:

• (1710)

Through 1988 an inquiry was conducted into Australian Merchant Mariners and Allied Veterans and Mariners as far as their repatriation entitlements were concerned. A report was handed to the Minister for Veterans' Affairs in October 1989 in which recommendations were made for the repeal of the Seamens' War Pensions and Allowances Act and the bringing of Australian Merchant Navy War Veterans under the Veterans' Entitlement Act for compensatory pensions and treatment in respect of war caused disabilities. The Government has not yet decided on its response to these recommendations but intends to do so soon when we expect that Australian Merchant Navy War Veterans will be brought under the Veterans' Entitlement Act.

Would you please ask Senator Marshall whether he wants a copy of the report or will he wait until the Government response is available. Perhaps he would prefer to wait until the particular amending legislation and explanatory memorandum items are prepared and I can send him a copy of these.

Just recently, on the 20th of August, 1991, there was a news release from Ben Humphreys, the Minister for Veterans' Affairs of Australia, and out of the "Budget 1991—Veterans' Affairs portfolio," it says this, and I quote:

Following a Report from the former Deputy President of the Repatriation Commission, Ms. Jocelyn McGirr, Australian mariners of World War I and World War II will from 1 December 1991 be granted Repatriation treatment benefits on the same basis as Australian war veterans.

That is what Bill S-5 is asking for—recognition.

I will read the extract from the "Extension of Repatriation Treatment Benefits to Australian Merchant Mariners in World War I and World War II."

BACKGROUND

The Minister for Veterans' Affairs commissioned an Inquiry into the needs of Australian Mariners, Commonwealth and Allied Veterans and Allied Mariners in January 1989.

CHANGES

From 1 December 1991, Australian mariners of World War I and World War II will be granted Repatriation treatment benefits on the same basis as Australian war veterans.

Australian Mariners who receive service pensions and fringe benefits will receive a Service Pensioner Benefits Card (the red card).

Mariners who receive both a service pension and a disability pension at or above 50 % of the general rate will receive a Personal Treatment Entitlement Card (the yellow card).

Australian mariners of World War I will also qualify for a Personal Treatment Entitlement Card and be eligible for Repatriation treatment for all conditions.

The special provisions covering the treatment of cancer and pulmonary tuberculosis will also be extended to Australian Mariners.

The cost of these changes (after deducting offsetting savings to the Department of Health, Housing and Community Services) is $1.58 million in 1991-92 (part year) and $2.92 million in 1992-93.

So the Australian government has acted while Canada procrastinates.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX A

CHAPTER 318

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 4, 1971

Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order

1. This Order may be cited as the Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order.

Interpretation

2. In this Order,

"agricultural exhibition" means a fair or exhibition at which there are exhibits, demonstrations or activities related to agriculture; (exposition agricole)

"approved capital cost" means the total cost, as determined by the Minister, of constructing, extending or improving exhibition facilities; (coût en capital approuvé)

"exhibition facilities" means a building or a building complex or part of a building complex intended for use for agricultural exhibitions and other purposes that, in the opinion of the Minister, would be of benefit to the citizens of surrounding communities; (installation d'exposition)

"Minister" means the Minister of Agriculture. (Ministre)

Loan Agreement

3. (1) Subject to this Order, the Minister may enter into an agreement with an exhibition corporation providing for the making of a loan to the corporation for the purpose of assisting it in the construction, extension or improvement of exhibition facilities.

(2) No agreement shall be entered into pursuant to subsection (1) in respect of any exhibition facilities, the construction, extension or improvement of which was commenced prior to October 21, 1971.

(3) No agreement shall be entered into pursuant to subsection (1) unless the agricultural exhibition to be held within the exhibition facilities will utilize the facilities to an extent considered reasonable by the Minister, having regard to the community in which the facilities are or will be located.

(4) Every agreement entered into pursuant to subsection (1) shall provide that the borrower will

(a) receive no portion of the loan until such time as any portion of the approved capital cost not payable by the Minister has been expended;

(b) use the proceeds of the loan to pay the actual cost of construction, extension or improvement of the exhibition facilities;

(c) make payments on the loan promptly on the due dates;

(d) maintain the exhibition facilities in respect of which a loan is made in a state of repair satisfactory to the Minister;

(e) maintain books, records and accounts in a form satisfactory to the Minister and permit the inspection thereof by the Minister; and

(f) keep in force during the term of the loan the insurance described in subsection 8(3).

(5) Every agreement entered into pursuant to subsection (1) shall

(a) provide for the holding back of such amount as deemed necessary by the Minister to secure any lien or pay any salaries owing as a result of the construction of the exhibition facilities;

(b) provide that the loan be repayable in full during the term thereof by equal payments of principal and interest not less frequently than annually; and

(c) contain such other conditions as the Minister deems necessary or desirable with respect to the loan.

Application

4. (1) No agreement shall be entered into pursuant to subsection 3(1) unless an application, on a form approved by the Minister, has been submitted to the Minister by the exhibition corporation requesting a loan, and

(a) the Department of Agriculture of the province in which the exhibition facilities are or will be located has approved the application; and

(b) it is accompanied by

(i) a map showing the location of the land on which the exhibition facilities in respect of which the loan is requested are or will be located,

(ii) a plan and specifications of the exhibition facilities,

(iii) an estimate of the capital cost of constructing, extending or improving the exhibition facilities, and

(iv) a statement as to the anticipated annual revenues from the exhibition facilities and the annual cost of operating and maintaining them.

Maximum Amount of Loan

5. The amount of any loan shall not exceed an amount equal to

(a) such portion of the approved capital cost of the exhibition facilities as the Minister, having regard to the anticipated annual revenues of the exhibition corporation from the exhibition facilities and the annual cost of operating and maintaining such facilities, determines the exhibition corporation will be able to repay during the term of the loan, and

(b) 90 per cent of the approved capital cost of the exibition facilities, whichever is the lesser.

Interest

6. Each advance pursuant to a loan agreement shall bear interest at a rate based on those market yields of Government of Canada bond issues, as published each Wednesday by the Bank of Canada as part of its weekly financial statistics, which have a term appropriate to the specific terms of the loan, for the week immediately preceding the date of the said advance, to which shall be added one-eighth of one per cent.

Terms

7. A loan shall be for a term, not exceeding 30 years, to be determined by the Minister.

Security

8. (1) As a condition of the making of a loan, the Minister may require a mortgage or hypothec on the land and buildings of the exhibition corporation to which the loan is being made and such other security from the exhibition corporation as he deems necessary.

(2) No loan shall be made unless the Minister is satisfied that the repayment of the loan is guaranteed in a manner satisfactory to him by

(a) one or more of the municipalities from which the patrons of the agricultural exhibition are, in the opinion of the Minister, likely to be drawn; or

(b) the province in which the agricultural exhibition is situated.

(3) No loan shall be made unless a fire insurance policy in favour of Her Majesty covers the exhibition facilities to the extent of the loan and other insurance is obtained by the exhibition corporation in the amounts and for the coverage determined by the Minister.

Termination

9. It shall be a condition of the making of a loan that it shall immediately become due and payable forthwith if

(a) the exhibition facilities are not used or the payments due are not made in accordance with the terms and conditions of the loan; or (b) any of the insurance policies referred to in subsection 8(3) are annulled or discontinued.

APPENDIX B

The Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order (hereafter "the Order") was made pursuant to Vote L17a of Appropriation Act No. 4, 1971. This appropriation read as follows:

> "Loans in the 1971-72 and 1972-73 fiscal years in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council, to finance the construction of multi-purpose exhibition buildings..... 10,000,000"

In 1973, this Vote was replaced by Vote L20 of Appropriation Act No. 4, 1973 which provides for:

> "Loans in the current and subsequent fiscal years, in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council, to finance the construction of multi-purpose exhibition buildings..... 15,000,000"

Parliamentary control of the public purse requires that: "The executive should make no expenditures except those approved by Parliament, in ways approved by Parliament". By Vote L20, Parliament authorized the expenditure of public funds for the purpose of making loans to finance the construction of multi-purpose exhibition buildings. Parliament also delegated to the Governor in Council the legislative authority to prescribe the terms and conditions governing the making of these loans.

Subsection 3(1) of the Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order authorizes the Minister of Agriculture to make loans to an exhibition corporation "for the purpose of assisting it in the construction, extension or improvement of exhibition facilities." By Vote L20, Parliament authorized the making of loans to finance the construction of exhibition buildings. The Order, on the other hand, purports to authorize the Minister to make loans to finance not only the construction but also the extension or improvement of exhibition buildings. On its face, the Order goes beyond the purpose authorized by Parliament. To the extent it purports to allow the Minister of Agriculture to finance the improvement or extension of existing exhibition buildings, as opposed to the construction of such buildings, the Order is ultra vires Vote L20 of Appropriation Act No. 4. 1973.

The Department of Agriculture was informed of the Committee's position in February 1985. In March 1985, the Department's Designated Instruments Officer replied that he would "not attempt to justify the wording of the Order as it relates to the vote wording" insofar as no loans had been made under authority of the Order since 1979. The Committee was informed that officials of the Department of Agriculture had been instructed to draft an Order in Council revoking the Order. That intention was reaffirmed on September 30, 1985. In April 1986, the Committee was informed that the Minister wished to postpone the revocation of the Order "for a period of six months". On January 23, 1987, the Designated Instruments Officer wrote that: "Since the Order itself has not been in use since March 1979, I have instructed my officials to again prepare an Order in Council revoking the ... Order". In July 1987, the Department once again postponed the revocation of the Order pending completion of a program review to be finalized at the end of September 1987. On November 30, 1987, the Minister informed the Chairmen of the Committee that he had instructed his officials "to again prepare an Order in Council revoking the Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order". Some seven months later however, the Minister wrote that he considered it "preferable to defer taking final action until the review is completed". This review is presumably that which was under way a year earlier and which was to be completed by the end of September 1987.

When it considered this matter again in the following Parliament, the Joint Committee instructed its Chairmen to write to the Minister of Agriculture indicating the Committee's intention to proceed with a report recommending the disallowance of the Order unless the Minister could assure the Committee that he would "either revoke the Order or amend it so that it is in conformity with the authority granted by Parliament." In his reply of August 29, 1989 the Minister wrote that: "I have instructed my officials to prepare an Order in Council revoking the Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order". Your Committee accepted that assurance. Some seven months later, the Order had not been revoked and following an inquiry by the Chairmen of the Committee, the Minister stated that he had signed "the appropriate documentation recommending the revocation of the Order" and that his officials had advised him that "the Order in Council is following its due course". Some three months later, counsel to the Committee was advised that missing information had delayed the processing of the revoking Order in Council but that "appropriate officials of the Department have been advised to take the necessary action immediately to ensure that the order is revoked." The matter, it was said, would be finalized in three weeks time. In a letter dated October 22, 1990, our counsel noted that the order still had not been revoked and sought the advice of the Department's Designated Instruments Officer as to the status of the revoking Order in Council. In his reply of February 14, 1991, the Senior Assistant Deputy Minister, Agricultural programs, wrote that: "A policy issue has arisen which is affecting the department proceeding with the revocation of the Order" and stated his expectation that the issue would be resolved "by the end of the fiscal year". Subsequent inquiries as to the progress of the revocation of the Order have remained unanswered by the responsible department.

In light of the record detailed above, your Committee is not prepared to accept any further undertaking to take action. None of the previous undertakings to revoke the offending Order has been respected and your Committee has therefore resolved that the Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order be revoked.

Given that the Order is partly ultra vires on its face and that it has stood unused for twelve years, your Committee conceives of no justification for keeping it in force. This seems to the Committee to be an appropriate case for the House of Commons to order the revocation of a statutory instrument. Should it be decided at some future time that the financing of exhibition buildings through government loans should be reinstated, it will be open to the Governor in Council to make a new and valid order prescribing the terms and conditions in accordance with which such assistance will be provided.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 23, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I may ask for leave later to revert to Senators' Statements because there is a pleasant duty of which Senator Frith and I wish to acquit ourselves, but he has been delayed by reason of having had to making a speech in Perth this afternoon. I just wish to alert the Senate that I may later ask for leave to revert to Senators' Statements.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CHINA

FLOOD DAMAGE—CONTRIBUTIONS OF CANADIANS

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the special and successful efforts of our Chinese Canadian community in raising funds for the relief of China's population which was severely affected by flooding this summer. In just three months, the B.C. Committee for China Flood Relief has raised $1.3 million of the $1.5 million goal. I have the honour to serve as honourary co-chairman of that committee along with Arthur Lee and Douglas Jung, two members of the Chinese Canadian community who are former MPs.

I am advised that the Chinese Canadian community in Toronto has raised at least another $1 million in the same period. Canada has contributed $200,000—$100,000 through the Red Cross and another $100,000 through the U.N. I understand that External Affairs is considering a substantial contribution to help with the rehabilitation efforts.

The floods devastated serious portions of China, particularly the provinces of Anhui and Jiangsu. More than 200 million Chinese were affected by the floods. The chief need is shelter, clothes and quilts. I understand that China needs 12 million sets of clothing alone as winter approaches. And, of course, emergency shelter is needed.

The money raised came from a variety of activities—auctions, art shows and children's concerts—from all walks of life. I think we should acknowledge the generous response by this community to this effort and it should be part of the public record.

BULGARIA

MISSION TO OBSERVE NATIONAL ELECTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief statement about the situation in Bulgaria. I had the honour to be the co-leader of the delegation which observed the elections in that country on October 13. The delegation was comprised of over 70 people from 23 countries. The mission was jointly sponsored by the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs and the Republican Institute for International affairs, both based in Washington, D.C. Honourable senators, both institutes deserve commendation for their continuing efforts in this regard.

Bulgaria has undergone dramatic changes in the last two years. In July of this year it became the first of the former Warsaw Pact countries to adopt a new constitution. It is also the first of those countries to hold a second round of national elections. Over 30 parties contested the elections with about seven serious contenders.

The delegation visited over 400 voting stations in 12 regions of the country. The electoral process is cumbersome and complicated. There were serious administrative problems and confusion. Fear was still evident in some areas. A lack of trust continues to influence relationships among many Bulgarians.

But beyond the confusion, there was evidence of a newfound dedication to democracy. There were 6.5 million eligible voters. The turnout was estimated at 80 percent. People throughout the country worked very hard simply to make the system work. Worthy of special mention in this respect is the organization commonly known as BAFE, the Bulgarian Association for Free Elections and Civil Rights.

The final results show that the United Democratic Front picked up 110 seats in Parliament; the Bulgarian Socialist Party, the former Communist Party, 106 seats; and the balance of power will be held by the Movement of Rights and Freedoms, a party supported largely by ethnic Turks, with 24 seats in the 240-seat Parliament.

The results will undoubtedly require a coalition between two of the parties and perhaps another general election in the spring of 1992. The presidential elections must be held by January 13 of next year.

Hopefully, the new national government will continue the political progress made in the last 18 months while effecting the difficult transition to a market economy with the help of stronger linkages with the West and other eastern European countries.

What is the significance of election observer delegations in countries like Bulgaria? I believe that such missions help generate the political will to face up to tough choices and atmospheres complicated by the omnipresent factors of intimidation and anticipated fraud. Our general objective was to encourage the Bulgarian people to believe that ultimately they have the right to determine the structures of a fair polity. They exercised that right. The big victory was won by the Bulgarian people themselves. In spite of the institutional weaknesses associated with the electoral transition, the people clearly felt a sense of entitlement—an entitlement to cast a ballot; that the act of casting that ballot was a right and that the ballot was secret. Bulgarians, for the most part, are convinced that there is a better way to live and that ordinary people may play a role in the construction of a better society.

Now, however, we in the West must assist in consolidating the impact of this historic juncture. We must ask ourselves some tough questions here in the western democracies, in our own country. Do we have a long-term commitment to building the social and economic structures intrinsic to political pluralism in Bulgaria and other evolving east European and Balkan states, or do we not have such a commitment?

Our expectation of successful electoral transitions must match our collective will to follow up in the wake of these exercises. The seeds of freedom have been sown. It is in our best interests as Canadians, as citizens of the global community, to ensure that the harvest is plentiful.

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Wednesday, October 23, 1991

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-11, An Act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), has in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, October 2, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following observations:

As part of the 1989 federal budget, the At and East grain and flour subsidy was to be terminated effective July 15, 1989.

We are of the opinion that when a sector industrial structure evolves in response to an artificial regulatory framework—as the Halifax and St. John operations did in response to the At and East subsidy—it is incumbent upon the government to provide adequate transitional assistance when that government changes the regulatory framework.

As of October 22, 1991, the Committee was not satisfied that the needed transitional assistance was evident, let alone in effect.

Respectfully submitted,

FINLAY MacDONALD
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, again I ask the indulgence of honourable senators to permit me to revert to "Government Notices of Motions" later this afternoon for the purpose of moving the weekly adjournment motion.

Let me explain. It had been our intention—by "our" I mean Senator Lynch-Staunton and me—that, if the Senate was able to conclude second reading debate of Bill C-16 today and dispose of Senator Lynch-Staunton's pre-study motions, and if we were able, with leave, to have second reading of Bill C-10 and refer it to a committee, Senator Lynch-Staunton would propose that the Senate adjourn until November 5. That is, the Senate would not sit next week.

In the interim, unfortunately, Judge Gold's mediation effort in the postal dispute has ended unsuccessfully. The parties have not been able to reach an agreement, although Judge Gold did say that they have made considerable progress. Consequently, Mr. Danis, the Minister of Labour, is giving notice in the other place this afternoon of the government's intention to proceed with a bill to impose compulsory arbitration on the parties. That being the case, I think it is highly likely that we will have to return next week, but I do not know when.

There is also the slimmest glimmer of a possibility that the parties might still reach an agreement. I say that only because they are meeting this afternoon. However, if they do not reach an agreeement, we will be going ahead with legislation. That means that with notice today in the House of Commons, the second reading debate could not start before Monday in that House, unless there is leave. I do not know—and no one knows—when the bill might pass the House of Commons.

Therefore, I ask honourable senators opposite to reflect on the matter for a while. I am inclined to suggest that we should move the adjournment, as we had intended, to November 5, it being understood that there is a strong possibility that we will have to come back next week and that I would ask His Honour, the Speaker to send telegrams to honourable senators as soon as we have a better idea as to when we might be confronted with a bill concerning the postal dispute from the House of Commons.

I will leave it at that for the moment and ask leave to revert to Government Notices of Motions later in the afternoon. By that time perhaps we will have a better idea of where the two parties are in the dispute.

Senator Olson: There are lots of good reasons to come back, in any event.

[Senator Poitras.]

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a) I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as a general principle we do not like to give leave for committees to meet during the sitting of the Senate. That has pretty well been the standard practice in this house. However, there are exceptions and in this particular case we are prepared to give leave. Senator MacDonald has spoken with me and I think it is a reasonable request.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR GRAINS AND OIL SEEDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government whether the $800 million announced by two or three Ministers of the Crown as assistance to agriculture was new money or whether it was the announcement of a payment that both they and the farmers had known was going to be paid in any event. The ministers were committed to making a payment of approximately that amount just before seeding, as they have said. As a matter of fact, if you take seriously the numbers that the government has been giving out for some time, and indeed that the Minister gave yesterday, that there will be approximately $2.5 billion paid out in the course a year—I think that is the time frame that he used—then of course the amount may be even substantially more than $800 million.

The real question that I tried to get an answer to yesterday was whether or not this is a new commitment in addition to what had been committed before through the GRIP program and the NISA program, and whatever other programs had been announced for various parts of the country. I wonder if the Minister could give us a fairly simple categorical answer as to whether it is new money or was an announcement of money that had already been committed. I would appreciate it, if he would tell us that.

Some farmers really are not sure that you have promised anything. The other thing is they are not sure how you are going to distribute the money. If you are going to distribute it through the GRIP program or the NISA program, then those who have not applied for either of those programs are not going to get anything, and they are a little worried about that. I just wonder if the Minister would enlighten us a bit so that those farmers who are desperately in need of some cash to pay their bills now will know whether there is any substance to this promise or not.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to answer the second part of the question first, that is, Senator Olson's question as to how the assistance will be paid: My colleague advises that he has received and read a draft of the Grains and Oil-seeds Third Line of Defence report. They have considered a number of options for paying the assistance ranging from payment through NISA, GRIP, or based on acreage. The Minister goes on to say that each option has implications in terms of timing and complexity; therefore, it has not yet been decided how this will be done.

Now, with regard to the amounts of money involved, I am sorry that the honourable senator continues to sow confusion on this matter.

Senator Olson: I am trying to clear it up.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows, because he has been told in this place at least three times in recent weeks, that there is approximately $2.5 billion going out through GRIP and NISA and programs of that kind. He also knows that there has been $800 million announced—

Senator Olson: Over and above that.

Senator Murray: Just a moment. There is $800 million dollars under the Special Assistance Program announced by Mr. McKnight a few weeks ago. This will bring the total amount to something like $3.3 billion. That is your answer.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is good. We at least believe now that there is $800 million over and above the $2.5 billion that was committed under NISA and GRIP.

Senator Barootes: A simple "thank you" would suffice.

Senator Olson: I will say thank you. There will be a great many farmers who will appreciate hearing that.

However, let us have the rest of the story. Is this money to be paid through the mechanism of GRIP or NISA? In many cases, the same farmers have applied for both, at least in those provinces where it is available—and it is not available in all provinces. However, those farmers who have not applied for either one of those insurance programs can expect nothing. They have the right to know how it will be used. Or does the government want them to be sitting around until next spring sometime just before seeding, not knowing—even if the $800 million is there—whether they qualify or not and whether they fit the formula that will be used for the distribution of the money?

I think the minister is a reasonable man. I think he would want farmers to know about what might be a good program. It might be a disastrous one, too, if it is handled improperly. Can the minister help us?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Olson that the farmers have a right to know what the mechanism will be. They will be told as soon as it is decided.

Senator Olson: Could the minister give us some indication as to when it will be decided, and perhaps by something a little more specific than his just saying "soon"?

Senator Murray: I am afraid I will have to consult my colleague the Minister of Agriculture on that matter, honourable senators.

I think I should also repeat what I said yesterday in answer to the honourable senator's suggestion that farmers would have to wait until some time next spring. There is $1.5 billion of the money to which I referred earlier which will be going out to farmers before the end of this calendar year. That is to say, within the next two months.

Senator Olson: The minister is now repeating what he has said so many times. He confuses one program with another. We know what the government has promised, although we are not sure that it will deliver what is there under GRIP and NISA. Now he comes along and says that there is to be paid $1.5 billion under the GRIP and NISA programs sometime this year. That is not what I was asking about. I was asking about the announcement of the $800 million.

I think we are starting to get a better idea of what is happening. The government is, too. I do not think it quite knew where it would get the money, even though if it had committed the funds a while back. I can bring a few quotes into the Senate concerning what the Minister of Finance has had to say about finding this $800 million. He was a bit apprehensive. Some of us who have been around here long enough are able to read between the lines of minister's statements. It is not completely clear to me how he will find that money for this purpose.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator need not try to read between the lines. Perhaps that is his problem. He has not been reading the lines themselves. The lines say that, no, we do not have that money, but we will have to find it either in the system or raise it somewhere.

Senator Olson: That is what the Minister of Finance says.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator need not worry about that for the moment. I wish to assure him that the $700 million, which is what it is for the grains and oilseeds sector, as he said yesterday, will be going out to the farmers. We will be announcing, shortly I hope, exactly how this will be done.

Senator Olson: I hope that when the minister uses the word "shortly" he is giving it the usual connotation that is put on that word.

Senator Murray: Yes, I am.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

AMERICAN DUTY ON LIVE HOGS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government regarding the Free Trade Agreement and the way in which the American government has been dealing specifically with hogs and pork products.

Honourable senators will recall that last year there was a very long process in which, eventually, Canada won on its position regarding pork products. But now the United States has imposed a special duty on live hogs, once again creating problems in that industry. Instead of being, in my view, honest and above board on the Free Trade Agreement, they are causing trouble whenever they can and putting difficulties in the way of our people.

Can the Leader of the Government bring us up to date on that matter? If he does not have the information now, and I understand it is rather specialized, can he give us a report at a later date, because this is a crucial matter for a large number of Canadian producers.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I appreciate that fact, honourable senators, and I will ask the Minister of International Trade for a report on that matter, and I will bring it in shortly.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

CANADA'S FOREIGN AID TIED TO RECORD OF HUMAN RIGHTS TREATMENT—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: The Honourable Leader of the Government will be well aware that last week at the Commonwealth Conference in Africa, the Prime Minister announced—although I think perhaps it was not a new announcement, but in any event, he made a clear statement that Canada would, hereafter, tie its foreign aid to the record of human rights treatment in the countries which were applying for that aid. I wonder if we could have a little more detail on how Canada will apply those criteria, or what that criteria will be? How will we determine whether the record of a country applying for aid is deserving or not? Will it be in our opinion or in whose opinion?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, every year we consider available information on human rights of various countries in the cabinet process of determining the channels and levels of Canadian assistance. This is one of several key factors that are taken into account. Without trying to establish for the honourable senator specific criteria that we use, I can do two things: One would be to give recent examples where we changed our aid policies towards particular countries as a result of events in those countries. We quite recently took decisions, for example, with regard to Haiti, and to China before that, and to several other countries. I can bring in further information on that in due course.

Second, I draw the attention of the honourable senators to the declaration made by the heads of government at Harare in which they promised to work with renewed vigour for democracy, democratic processes, and institutions which reflect national circumstances; the rule of law and the independence of the judiciary; just and honest government; fundamental human rights, including equal rights and opportunities for all citizens regardless of race, colour, creed or political belief; and equality for women, so that they may exercise their full and equal rights.

In a general way, those would be the kinds of criteria by which we would be guided in developing our aid policies toward various recipient countries.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I appreciate that answer and I certainly congratulate the conference on its statement of principles. The problems, of course, that arise from the implementation of those principles are ones which will have to be defined and dealt with, perhaps over some years. The question, of course, is who decides whether a country has a good or bad record in terms of human rights; what criteria are used to make that determination and whether those criteria are used consistently. For instance, you mentioned China. I do not think there has been much change in the situation in China, and yet we are again considering aid and trade with China. The same is true with respect to Iran.

The question is one of consistency and whether we expect the same treatment from other countries in view of the charges which are still pending by Amnesty International against Canada with respect to certain other types of human rights. I worry about a general statement which sounds like motherhood but does not have attached to it any clear criteria as to what we mean by "the record on human rights".

Senator Murray: I would suggest to the honourable senator that he re-examine what I have said about the Harare declaration. While he may consider the references to democratic development, fundamental human rights and equality for women to be motherhood, I think they are sufficiently clear that we and all potential recipient countries understand what those terms mean.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

1ST CANADIAN DIVISION—PRESENT STATUS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Government Leader. Some time ago the government announced the formation of the 1st Canadian Division. I am speaking now of the military. It was to have headquarters in Trenton with an advance tactical group in Europe and it was to take in the troops in Europe plus some of the regular Canadian troops.

With the announcement by the Minister of National Defence of the substantial reductions in Canada's regular Armed Forces, but also very substantial reductions in the forces in Europe, what is the status of the 1st Canadian Division? Is it still in existence or has it been wrapped up? What does the government intend to do?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask for a report from the Minister of National Defence on that matter.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall moved the second reading of Bill C-16, to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act and to provide for other matters in relation thereto.

He said: I am pleased to rise today in support of an amendment to the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, Bill C-16. Through this initiative we intend to do a number of things. The initiative might be described by some as merely a housekeeping matter, and indeed it has that aspect about it. I would suggest that it is well to recognize that, with this amendment, the government continues to fulfil its commitment to help make the agricultural sector of Canada more competitive. It is also a tangible demonstration of the government's promise to make federal-provincial relations work to the benefit of all Canadians.

The honourable Bill McKnight, Minister of Agriculture, in his speech to the House of Commons pointed out that the government has made co-operation with industry, the provinces and producers the cornerstone of its agri-food policy. This has been the hallmark of the policy review process which has been going on for some time right across the country.

Here, multipartite task forces on dairy, poultry, grain safety nets and farm finance and management have been able to coalesce the expertise and knowledge of committed individuals from a wide spectrum of Canadian agriculture. Their task has been to signpost the directional changes that are needed in these areas if the Canadian farm sector is to remain competitive.

On a smaller, though no less important scale, this bill is another example of the government making progress with the farm sector itself with respect to its competitive position. The original legislation for this Agricultural Products Marketing Act has served our agricultural sector well. It provides provincial marketing boards and agencies with powers to take an organized approach toward enhancing interprovincial and international marketing of their products.

As you are all aware, Canadian producers are dependent on international trade for a large, indeed very substantial, proportion of their farm incomes. The APMA provides them with a mechanism to focus their efforts, to work together to develop and enhance their international markets either through collaborative marketing approaches or product enhancement. The results have been, to say the least, somewhat impressive. In the face of stiffening international competition, Canadian farm products are finding new and expanded markets both in North America and abroad. In the process, the efficiency of the agri-food and wood industries has been notably improved.

As all of my colleagues in the chamber know, however, good government is as much about continuously fine-tuning the system to make it responsive to current realities as it is about developing, debating and enacting new wide-reaching and sweeping legislation.

After extensive consultation with the producers, marketing boards and the provinces, the government has learned that the Agricultural Products Marketing Act can become more effective by making it more responsive to the needs of our farm sector. Wood producers have told us that they require changes to the act to confirm the validity of previous wood orders. The amendments that have been put in place will confirm that wood and wood products are considered agricultural products under the act. With the change, greater stability will be brought to the industry, and future wood orders will not be subject to related legal challenges, both costly and unsettling.

Marketing boards have expressed the fact that they require the authority to recover unpaid levies, particularly for a product that is shipped out of the province or out of the country. With the amendments proposed in this bill, all producers will share equally the responsibility and, in turn, the benefits of their provincial marketing boards. This will be made possible through the amendment that will allow marketing boards and agencies to collect unpaid levies, effectively giving them the same authority in the federal jurisdiction that they now enjoy in the provincial jurisdiction. The end result will be a fairer system for all participants.

The provinces have supported the requests of their marketing boards and have asked us to be of assistance. We think that these amendments meet the expressed requirements of producers and are a tangible demonstration of the federal and provincial governments working together for the benefit of the Canadian agricultural sector.

Clearly, as legislators, it is our responsibility to ensure a speedy passage, not only of this bill but of legislation of this nature. By fine-tuning the Agriculture Products Marketing Act, we will have demonstrated that we are responsive to the needs of our agricultural sector and, by doing so, we will have allowed them to become more competitive both at home and abroad. Mr. Speaker, to quote one great philosopher, "It is the right thing to do."

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I commend Senator Forrestall for a good explanation of what it is we have before us in Bill C-16, and I join with him in asking you to support the early passage of this legislation.

I will not spend much time describing the legislation because it simply adds wood as an agricultural commodity under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, which is the legislation granting authority to extend, by order, federal powers to provincial marketing boards and agencies. The act is the basis, as Senator Forrestall has observed, for orderly marketing by provincial marketing agencies such as those which exist in the provinces for poultry, dairy and many other commodities. Those commodities would not be in the category where the agencies or marketing boards have assisted in the export, because they represent the supply-managed sector. I wish to comment on that in the context of this bill and the current crisis that that sector is confronted with as a result of the government's negotiations in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trades.

Senator Forrestall also talked, in a very kind way, about the legislation. It is interesting to note that Senator Olson, who is here today and hopefully will be prompted to say a few words about this matter, was the minister responsible at the time that that legislation was passed. It was not always popular with Conservatives. At the time, Senator Olson likened it to the GST debate where all-night sessions were needed in committee to get the necessary approval of the House of Commons agriculture committee so that the legislation could be proceeded with.

The general comments that I want to make in the context of the legislation is that the only remarkable thing about it is that it has taken the government this long to bring the amendment forward. The amendment is prompted by a request or a demand of the joint House-Senate committee on statutory instruments which observed that wood was not an agricultural commodity. Senator Godfrey of this chamber was co-chair or an active member of that committee and was very vigilant in pursuing these things, and this is one of the things that he urged be done. As I say, it is remarkable that it has taken this long for this government to bring the amending legislation forward.

The few comments that I want to make about these agencies is that they are, as Senator Forrestall has observed, extremely important to the marketing of our commodities. Perhaps the most important of these relates to the supply-managed sector which is currently worried about whether or not it will continue to enjoy the current marketing arrangement.

Canadian agriculture breaks up into basically three parts. The first is the supply-managed sector, which is healthy, relatively speaking. I do not think anyone gets rich producing supply-managed commodities, but they do not lose money doing it.

The other sector would be generally categorized as the red meat sector, including pork, which is relatively healthy and operates on a North American market. The supply-managed sector, by definition, operates within Canada only.

Thirdly, we have the huge cereals and oilseeds sector which is currently in a serious depression. I do not think that is too strong a word to use. Senator Olson's exchanges with the Leader of the Government here in the Senate highlight a very difficult situation faced by Canadian farmers today. Something between one in six and one in four of those farmers are currently bankrupt, depending on whether you go with the Farm Credit Cooperation figures or not. That commodity is not what this particular legislation relates to.

The final point I wish to make is that we have enjoyed great success in the supply-managed sector which arises out of this legislation. This is with respect to the poultry side. The diary side came about in 1965. The threat to the supply-managed sector is of great concern, but the government denies that there would be anything given away on that, and hopefully the government is being honest and truthful with Canadians.

The red meat sector is relatively healthy, as I say, and operates on a North American market. Providing that we continue to have protection against unfair competition from imports, whether through subsidized beef from Europe or Latin American beef, that sector will also operate in a healthy market-based way in the the North American context.

The cereal side is not healthy. That is evidence of failure—a colossal policy failure. I disagree with Senator Forrestall on the results of the consulting process in growing together and bringing forward a program, namely the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, which he suggests is working or helping Canadian farmers. It is not. The distress in that sector is ample evidence of that.

I would like to talk about what has to be done to address that fear. The government's position seems to be that this is external to us. This is a war between the United States and Europe. It is their fault, and we intend to fix it up by making them do what we think they should be doing; that is, operating in a market environment and recognizing comparative advantage. I do not think the government will do that, but if it does, that would be great and that would work. The Government of Canada is saying it will fix a domestic problem by changing the common agricultural policy in Europe and by changing policies in the United States, namely the 1990 Food Security Act, which is the current legislation governing their agricultural program.

If Mr. Mayer and Mr. McKnight can change the Americans and the Europeans, good for them. If they cannot, then the policy we are pursuing, namely of encouraging people to continue to grow commodities at a loss so that we can continue to export and keep our market share, will not work.

I believe we should listen carefully to the critics of our government's program, and I refer to the agricultural economists at the University of Saskatchewan who, when the GRIP program went through, said that we should not make that a commodity-specific program. We should extend the support to Canadians. Here again, I refer to the exchanges between Senator Olson in opposition and Senator Murray on the government side. The numbers are big. They support the sector, but they do not support it in a way that helps the sector, because farmers are continuing to lose money, continuing to go broke. The many demonstrations that we see by Canadian farmers across Canada are ample evidence of that. We should continue to provide assistance, but not make the farmers lose money to access the assistance, which is what the GRIP program does in its present form.

I would commend to you all a careful study of the current government's program and the situation we find ourselves in. The policy is not working. It has failed. I would ask you to address what it is that we have to do to change the policy.

An alternative would be to go the U.S. route and control very tightly how much land you can put into this crop or that crop. I am not sure that Canadian farmers would take well to that. Some of you may think that I am a bit off the topic here, but I am not. I am dealing with the agricultural problem. We are bringing "wood" into the definition of agricultural commodity, and that is a good idea. It should be supported. However, in keeping with the practice of this chamber it would be well for us to continue to have these matters examined by the appropriate committee, namely, the Agriculture and Forestry Committee in this case.

So, honourable senators, I state again that it would be very worthwhile to give immediate and early passage to this legislation at this particular point. I suggest, however, that it would be appropriate to refer it to a committee or to a Committee of the Whole.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I will be very brief.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: One can be goaded into doing things a lot differently from one's original intentions. So be careful.

When I was listening to Senator Forrestall's explanation of what a fairly innocuous bill would do, I did not know whether to be happy or enraged, because, while what he had to say about the farm marketing legislation was great, accurate and in line with what the farmers say who are producing the various products and abiding by the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, the government is now in a stage in the GATT where they are offering to do away with them. There is some commitment that we have to make wherein we will abolish the farm marketing system in Canada, including supply management and that sort of thing. Once in a while some minister, especially the Minister of Agriculture, says, "We will not do that. That is not part of the free trade arrangement with the United States and we are not negotiating so that we have to phase out our Agricultural Products Marketing Act in Canada at all."

Honourable senators, I hope that is right, because for the last six or seven years every commodity that farmers produce, except those that are covered by the Agricultural Products Marketing Act such as eggs and broilers, is in severe difficulty. Only the ones that have been saved by a policy that was put in before this government came to office are still reasonably healthy.

Senator Forrestall's remarks were to the extent that, yes, it is a great thing but now we should add wood products. I agree—that is, if you need it. I do not know where the opinion came from that wood is not an agricultural product, but I will accept that some lawyers sitting in a room some place decided that wood is not an agricultural product and, therefore, if we are to legalize or legitimize all the things that have been done in the past, Parliament should pass an act that includes "wood", as in the definition section of clause 1.1 of this act. Well, the majority of farmers in Canada, who have been practising agriculture for a long time, believe that wood comes off their farms and that it is an agricultural product. I do not know how the lawyers twisted it up so that they now have to have a legalized definition, but I will not oppose that either.

One other thing that is fairly important in this Agricultural Products Marketing Act is that for the purposes described in this act there is no need for any federal legislation at all. When the act was introduced in 1971 or 1972, neither the federal government nor the Minister of Agriculture—I was the minister at the time—ever assumed that federal jurisdiction included the competence to make legislation respecting quotas or marketing or production quotas or the competence even to set prices. I could give you all the precedents, court rulings, and so on, dating way back into the thirties where they stated that that jurisdiction came under the provincial field of jurisdiction. So why they get excited about it now is really quite beyond me.

When we brought in the Agricultural Products Marketing Act at the federal level it was for the purpose of coordinating agricultural marketing boards in the various provinces. I attended dozens of meetings where most of the provincial Ministers of Agriculture were present. I said, "Look, you have all the power that you need. You have all the jurisdictional authority that exists to make the laws that deal with agricultural supply management and marketing. Just do it." I further said, "If the federal government does it we have to get delegated legislation from the provinces in any case." And they agreed. There was no disagreement. They said, "We cannot do it without a federal coordinated structure." So we brought it in, knowing full well that the provinces could either join or refuse to join. Some refused to join for many months; in fact some refused for some years even after they had committed that they would join right away and be cooperative in dealing with a situation in which the poor producers were selling their eggs at that time between eight cents and 10 cents a dozen. It was a desperate situation as far as the producers were concerned. I am not quite sure why we need federal jurisdiction and federal amendments to the act now.

What I really got up to say is that I hope that Senator Forrestall, or his speech writer—and I am not sure who made that nice speech for him because it was a good one—is reflecting the opinion that the government will give the kind of consideration to the Agricultural Products Marketing Act that Senator Forrestall has indicated, because that is the way it should be. That is what the farmers think, too. I hope that we do not have to face a government that is off on some Conservative philosophy—free markets and so on. It all sounds good; the only problem is that it does not work. It did not work 20 years ago; it did not work seven years ago, and it does not work now. Senator Barootes knows that.

The point I am trying to make is that I hope whoever wrote that speech or did the research for that speech is now in the position of the government that is in office. Talk about freeing up this market or having a market oriented commodity in this or another commodity does not fit with what Senator Forrestall just said about agricultural marketing boards. So far, every one of those things that the government has said we are now going to rely on, such as a market economy and deregulation, has gone sour.

Look at the airline industry. Both major airlines are wondering what they are going to do next.

One that is even more important to me is the natural gas industry. That industry no longer has even a base price. If the producers in Alberta could turn back the clock, believe me, they would do so. They received a reasonable price for a base amount of gas that was supplied all across this country and that is slowly disappearing. I suppose senators opposite think that is a good thing. That is good, if you want it to be like agriculture. The way you have disregarded what works and what you can philosophize about has taught enough farmers across this country that they will never vote for a Conservative philosophy again in this generation. You might know that. I know you believe it because I am sure every one watched what happened in Saskatchewan a few days ago and also what happened in British Columbia. They have had enough of this kind of copping out. That is what the government is doing. It is not managing the economy or the monetary system or anything any more. Let the market decide, so the big boys can come in whether they are in Canada or outside of Canada and kill all of you—economically, I am talking about.

Senator Barootes: Surely he has not become a socialist!

Senator Olson: There is nothing socialist about it. In the real world the only farmers who are reasonably successful financially at this time are those who brought their commodities under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act some years ago, namely, eggs, broilers and also turkey broilers. There are a few others as well, such as dairy products, but that is a completely different set up because the federal government does not have any control over the marketing of dairy products except to the extent that they pay a subsidy on industrial milk.

[Senator Olson.]

That is all. The provincial governments are doing all the rest of it, and Senator Barootes knows that.

Senator Barootes: I learned it from you.

Senator Olson: No, you will find out it is true.

I did say that I was going to be brief. I do not know whether to be encouraged or discouraged. I hope I can feel encouraged that the government is now going to take the advice and conclusions and all the nice things that Senator Forrestall had to say about this bill and use them and not go to some international meetings and phase it out or give a commitment that it is going to be phased out, because then they will get into difficulty, too.

As I said, it prompted me to say a word or two. Perhaps the government is starting to see the light now. Indeed, I hope so.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Forrestall, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

THE HONOURABLE C. WILLIAM DOODY

TRIBUTES TO FORMER DEPUTY LEADER OF GOVERNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Senators' Statements:

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had earlier indicated that I believed there was agreement to revert to Senators' Statements when Senator Frith returned to the chamber.

Honourable senators, on September 17, when I announced the appointment of Senator Lynch-Staunton as Deputy Leader of the Government, I referred very briefly to his predecessor Senator Doody who had been our deputy leader for seven years.

Senator Doody was overseas during September and now that he is back in the chamber I want to acknowledge in his presence the great debt that the government, his colleagues on this side, and I believe the Senate itself owe to him.

Obviously it would be quite premature to eulogize Senator Doody. He is, as everybody can see, alive and well and—

Senator Frith: And well under 75.

Senator Murray: —the day for eulogies, we all trust, is a long way off.

Indeed, Senator Doody is seeking new fields to conquer. The news that Prime Minister Mulroney has been nominated for the position of Secretary General of the United Nations has eclipsed the important news that Senator Doody is seeking the Chairmanship of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Senator Molgat: And he's much better qualified.

Senator Frith: And much more open about it, too.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Nothing pithy about that!

Senator Murray: I should mention that the election takes place at 6 o'clock this evening in the Railway Committee room. Senator Doody's campaign managers are Senator Nurgitz and Senator Petten, who have assured that not only will he win but that he will win by a substantial majority. Nevertheless, those who know Senator Nurgitz and Senator Petten from previous campaigns would do well to make every effort to attend the meeting at 6 o'clock to ensure that their brazen confidence is justified and that Senator Doody's understandable trepidation is not.

Memberships in the association can be purchased for $15. In this way, honourable senators, we will go some distance to repaying the debt which I referred to earlier.

Senator Doody served as Deputy Leader to Senator Roblin from 1984 to 1986 and to me for the past five years. For the past five years, I freely confess to what has been in any case obvious to all of you, much of my time has been taken up with various responsibilities in the Cabinet, and that my attention to my duties as Leader of the Government in the Senate has been so irregular as to be episodic. Perhaps it is just as well, for Senator Doody has carried the extra burden you all know cheerfully and you all know how ably. You also know under what different political circumstances he has worked. In this most difficult situation, admiration and respect for him in this chamber has grown over the past seven years.

On October 2, I believe it was, Senator MacEachen, who has served as Leader of the Opposition for seven years, spoke very highly and very appropriately of Senator Doody's always constructive influence in this chamber.

Before the present government took office, Senator Doody's colleagues on both sides of the house expressed their confidence in him by making him Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. For the past seven years, he has been a pillar of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, for part of that time as its vice-chairman. His experience in the Newfoundland government in six portfolios, including Finance, Energy, and Intergovernmental Affairs, has made him an extremely knowledgeable and extraordinarily valuable colleague to all of us.

Again, honourable senators, I want to express my profound personal gratitude to Senator Doody for his support and cooperation and for his great contribution to the Senate and to Parliament as Deputy Leader of the Government in this place.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when Bill Doody gave what I believe from my research was his first speech in the Senate, this is what he said. I should say that it was an important debut because he was trying to persuade us to adopt a bill entitled Customs Tariff, The New Zealand Trade Agreement Act, 1932, Australian Trade Agreement Act, 1960, The Union of South Africa Trade Agreement of 1932.

He said: Honourable senators,.

After that, it says,

Hear, hear.

To which he said:

> I thank you for your kind consideration. I would ask you to bear with me and be tolerant as I walk very quietly and gingerly through these hallowed halls. I have recently come from a far less civilized forum, and it will take me a little while to become used to the indulgence of this illustrious Chamber. Any flaws or faults you can attribute completely to my ignorance.

About a year ago, I think he might have reconsidered those remarks. In any event, Senator Doody would have us believe that when he came to the Senate he was but an inexperienced newt—that's "newt," not "Newf"—from a small pond.

Well, we should have twigged right away. I think "twigged" is the right word. I looked it up to be sure.

> Twig: Understand, catch the meaning of, perceive, observe. 18th Century, of unknown origin.

In fact, of course Senator Doody was a very big fish from a combative legislative lake with the experience to mix it up in the turbulent deep waters of the middle or to lurk in the shadows feasting on unsuspecting prey.

He was not only a member of the Newfoundland legislature from 1971 to 1979, but he was a member who was Minister of Mines and Resources, Transport and Communications, Intergovernmental Affairs, Public Works, Industrial Development, Finance, and President of the Treasury Board. Were there any posts for which you were not responsible? I ask, how many posts are there in a Newfoundland cabinet?

• (1530)

Behind that "Jimmy Stewart, Mr. Smith Goes to Washington, aw shucks" style, was an experienced politician who knew how to survive many tough firing lines. I remember hearing the following comment made about someone, not kindly, obviously: "Behind that stupid, rude, bad-tempered boor, lies the animus of a stupid, rude, bad-tempered boor." Bill Doody is exactly the opposite. Behind that affable, good-humoured, intelligent exterior, lays the animus of an affable, good-humoured, intelligent gentleman.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: When we worked together he certainly started out with customary directness. He came to me as the House Leader of a party that had a majority in this chamber. He said, "I think we'll get along well if you understand two things. First, I can count; and, second, I can also fight, if necessary. That was the basis upon which we worked for seven years.

I do not know what kind of a grade we would get. However, personally, with customary immodesty, I think that when he and I were respectively house leaders looking after house business we should receive at least a passing grade.

I worked with him in this adversarial context over seven years, talking to him not daily but certainly every week of that period, and often more than once a week. Our relationship was always in its context adversarial, but still friendly and growing in friendship as the years went by.

Of course, I will never forgive him his sins as a politician, but he never gave me anything to forgive him for as a friend. I admire him and I value that friendship highly. I am still trying to choke down one thing, and I must be honest. I ask honourable senators to pardon me my choice of adjective. I refer to that infamous vote during our absence. But my friendship with Bill Doody has grown so that I think I will be able to choke even that down.

I say thank you on behalf of our side for all the things you did to make this place work better. I am very glad you are staying. Certainly, our loss of you as House Leader will be the CPA's gain.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, having listened to these very generous words I have come to the conclusion that maybe I am getting out while I am still ahead. I think that timing is very important.

There is an age-old and tired story that was attributed to Mr. Diefenbaker, as indeed most age-old and tired stories were attributed to him at one time or another. It seems there was an Irish wake somewhere in St. John's. The widow was sitting with her son receiving a stream of visitors who were constantly reminding her of what a lovely man her husband had been, and what a generous soul and a considerate and great citizen he had been. Eventually, she asked her son to go over to look in the coffin to make sure it was his father.

As I was listening to some of the things that were said about me today, I was wondering whether honourable senators had the right person in mind. In any event, I do want to thank all of you for your patience and tolerance during the past seven years. I cannot say it was all a piece of cake, but most of it was. It was a real pleasure and a learning experience. I have not learned it all yet. I plan to sit, watch and wait to learn a little more.

I particularly want to thank Senator MacEachen for his kind words of early October when I was not here, as well as Senators Roblin and Murray for their tolerance and patience with me over the seven years. I wish to thank Senator Murray for his accolades today, and Senator Frith whose friendship I value. If he forgives me for having voted, then so much the better. I am sure he will feel better for it—I certainly will.

Once again, my friends, I thank you all. We will work together for some time to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL
COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATION BILL
TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES BILL
BANK BILL

MOTIONS TO PRE-STUDY BILLS C-28, C-34, C-4 and C-19

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved:

[Senator Frith.]

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-28, an Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto;

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-34, an Act to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto;

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-4, an Act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto; and

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-19, an Act respecting banks and banking, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, as agreed, Senator Poitras will lead off the debate on our side on Bill C-28. Whatever decision is taken on this particular motion will apply to the next three, on the understanding that the four motions which are on the Order Paper refer to the same subject matter, that is, the pre-study.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I did not think we had reached that exact agreement. I think what I had agreed to is that Senator Poitras would lead off on the first motion, and that depending on what happened Senator Frith would follow. The likelihood was that we could then deal with the others en bloc. I did not think I made that formal commitment, but simply left the likelihood that it might happen.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I qualify that by saying that it is hoped that after the debate on the first item we can agree on the disposal, in an expeditious manner, of the following three.

Senator Molgat: Indeed, we now have a meeting of the minds.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, before going into detail about why we are calling for a preliminary study, I would remind honourable senators how important I think the four bills that we will have to consider will be for the country.

Legislation on all our financial institutions affects every citizen at some time or other; on these laws depend our economic health, both for the growth of our businesses and for our country's survival in international relations.

That is why I think we must attach great importance to these bills that we will have to approve later.

Less than a year ago, Parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate, voted to extend the Bank Act, which was to expire on March 31, 1991, until April 1, 1992.

Other legislation governing financial institutions like insurance companies and credit unions in our country has not been revised significantly in nearly 50 years. The Senate started to consider the financial industry with the federal government's 1985 Green Paper called "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions—Proposals for Discussion".

This document set forth nine major principles to guide federal policy. These principles fall into three broad categories.

[English]

They are as follows: First, consumer protection and financial institution stability: improving consumer protection; ensuring the soundness of financial institutions, and the stability of the financial system; controlling self-dealing; guarding against abuses of conflict of interest.

Second, enhancing competition: promoting competition and efficiency; enhancing the convenience and options available to customers in the market place; broadening the source of credit available to individuals and businesses; promoting international competitiveness and economic growth.

Three, federal-provincial consideration: promoting the harmonization of federal and provincial regulatory policies.

[Translation]

All these principles have been considered by the Senate in various studies on the financial sector, including the 1985 report on deposit insurance, which coincided with the Green Paper; the 1986 report on the regulation of financial institutions, also in response to the Green Paper; and the 1990 report entitled "Canada 1992", on a national market in financial services, which discussed the impact of Canada-U.S. free trade on the financial community, how our institutions and regulators might be affected by Europe 1992, recent changes in provincial legislation and, finally, regulatory issues and federal-provincial relations.

Senators examined these issues in depth and formulated some important recommendations. With the substantial expertise at its disposal, the Senate has had a definite impact on the bills now being considered in the House of Commons, for instance, making a minority public float compulsory for all major financial institutions and enhancing ownership diversification across the four pillars of our financial system.

The present status of these bills is as follows. The trust company proposals were referred to committee some time ago in the other place. The bank bill was reported back to the House of Commons for third reading after only two days of consideration by the House of Commons Finance Committee. Many changes were made at the last minute. However, the bills on co-operatives and insurance companies have not yet been referred to the House of Commons Finance Committee. If we wait until the House of Commons finishes third reading of all the financial legislation and the Senate finishes second reading, the Banking Committee will have no bills to consider before the end of the year, and by that time the deadline for expiration of the Bank Act will be very close. This means the committee will have no time to make a thorough study of the reform proposed by the government.

We agree the government has made significant progress by establishing a framework that respects the principles set forth by the government in its Green Paper: consumer protection, promoting competition and promoting the stability of financial institutions. We are also pleased withthe thorough reform of the legislative and regulatory system governing federally-regulated financial institutions in this country. However, a number of minor adjustments will be necessary, adjustments that can only be made after careful consideration of specific details of these substantial bills.

To do so, we must take the time to consider the legislation and consult the parties concerned, which does not require lengthy hearings but rather a number of intense sessions during which the relevant expertise can be brought to bear on certain specific problems.

"Demutualizing" insurance companies is a very important point for mutual insurance companies, which provide about 50 per cent of life insurance policies in this country. In an increasingly competitive market, insurance companies need competitive access to capital to be able to serve their customers effectively. The insurance bill recognizes the fact that conversion of a company from its mutual form to a company with share capital may be a major opportunity for the company to have access to its own capital. The insurance bill was introduced in mid-June. At the same time, the Minister of State for Finance proposed a framework for demutualization. The insurance bill was not given second reading by the middle of this month and no final decision has yet been made on the legislative and regulatory form that demutualization will take nor on the allowed procedures, other than those suggested by the government in this appendix. That is a concrete example of an area where the Senate can make a substantial contribution, but only if enough time is allowed to carefully consider the details involved in demutualization and to hear the spokespersons from Finance and major interest groups outside government.

Honourable senators, that is only one area where the government is asking for responsible suggestions. The Senate Banking Committee can help the government constructively as we approach this stage of the reform process. Moreover, since the legislation will be reviewed in five years, we should ensure that all obstacles have been smoothed out so that the legislation is on the soundest possible footing. We have made worthwhile contributions in the past and it is therefore our responsibility to play a concrete role in the process. Only a preliminary study will enable us to do this work.

In summary, there are several reasons to have the committee consider the legislation on financial institutions before it is adopted by the House of Commons:

• (1550)

[English]

In summary, first, the committee has a proven track record in being able to provide the government with acceptable alternatives. Given that track record, the committee should be given a further opportunity to provide such useful guidance to the government. Only a pre-study will provide the appropriate time frame within which such guidance could be given.

Second, several new issues are being raised which have not received in the past the parliamentary scrutiny they deserve. Examination of the bills after second reading in the Senate may simply make it too late to rectify certain problems, since any amendment must return to the House of Commons.

Third, the parliamentary calendar is unpredictable. The committee might receive the bills individually, which would hinder an all-inclusive examination of the financial sector. Pre-study enables the committee to examine all aspects at the same time. This is, to me, the only approach that makes sense, given the weakening of the barriers among the financial pillars.

Finally, this package of legislation represents the federal government's latest attempt to reform the financial sector. This package represents the government's response to past criticism and suggestions which were the result, in large part, of detailed parliamentary examination. These pieces of legislation deserve the same detailed scrutiny.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when pre-study of bills began in the Senate it was generally limited in its application to bills which were difficult and complex or where there were exceptionally serious time problems. Pre-study was also used to allow the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which started this practice, to suggest amendments to the House of Commons in cases where the Senate would find it difficult to amend the legislation, for example, and understandably, certain tax bills. What was originally intended to have but limited application became the rule. Bills were referred to Senate committees almost as a matter of course as soon as they were introduced in the House of Commons. Bills were referred for pre-study, at times even before committees had held their initial organizational meetings.

I am bound to say at this point, since someone else will if I do not, that what I am describing did not take place solely under the present administration. In other words, you may read into my speech, as before, a certain, shall we say, bouquet of repentance.

As I said, bills were referred for pre-study, at times even before committees had held their initial organizational meetings. Let me recall what happened in 1986 under this administration with the parole and penetentiary bill. The dates are important. The bill was introduced in the House of Commons on June 27, 1985, and the subject matter was referred to the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on December 17, 1985, approximately six months later. The House of Commons committee tabled its report in January of 1986. Nothing further was done with the bill in the other place until June of 1986. Meanwhile, the Senate committee held hearings through the winter and spring and tabled two interim reports. When the government presented the bill to the Senate on the last scheduled sitting day of the session, it demanded immediate passage. Senator Roblin spoke at length about how the bill had been pre-studied by the Senate committee and he used this to justify his request for instant passage.

When Parliament was recalled on July 24, 1986, Sollicitor General James Kelleher, who is now Senator Kelleher, stated:

> We delayed action on the Bill to allow the Senate to conduct and complete a pre-study of the Bill so that their suggestions could also be considered prior to third reading . . . The Senate never did get around to submitting a final report on the Bill, despite the personal pleas of my predecessor . . . who appeared before them on two occasions to plead with them to get on with the Bill and their completion of the study.

That is found at page 15013 of the House of Commons Debates.

Why should the Senate committee be asked to complete its work before the committee or the Senate ever receives the bill? How can the committee submit a final report when the bill has yet even to arrive in the Senate? Pre-study became so commonplace that the government apparently felt it quite proper to demand, as it did in that case, that the Senate committee conclude its examination of a bill before the bill was even introduced in the Senate.

We thought these questions to be more than rhetorical questions, and it was during that period that we began seriously to re-examine our view on pre-study.

Senator Murray's view of pre-study was at that time already on the record. On February 20, 1985, at the time of our disagreement over the borrowing bill, he said:

> I believe the Senate has usually done useful work with respect to legislation, to policy and to government spending and borrowing programs.
> Senators are familiar with the device of pre-study, by which we have an opportunity to suggest to ministers and to the government amendments that should be made in the legislation before it comes to us officially and formally. Senators are also aware that from time to time we take it upon ourselves to pass a bill about which we have some doubt, or about which we have reservations as to the process or principles involved. We pass a bill and we attach a narrative or commentary stating what we consider to be the proper course, and telling the government that we consider that changes should be made to the procedure in the future.

• (1600)

> All of these devices are used by the Senate precisely for the purpose of avoiding confrontation between this chamber and the elected house. These devices that have been used have been helpful and constructive; they have contributed to the legislative process, to policy development, and to the welfare of this country. But it seems to me that the conduct of Liberal Party senators on this bill indicates that in the present Parliament they have decided to take the path of confrontation. They have decided to abandon the path of moral suasion vis-a-vis the government and the House of Commons. They have opted instead for the confrontational approach. I say that if they think they are going to repeat this performance on future bills coming before this body, they are signing their own death warrant—

Does Senator Nurgitz want to lead the applause?

Senator Nurgitz: I am dying slowly.

Senator Frith: It was six-and-a-half years ago that Senator Murray envisaged a non-confrontational Senate whose role would be limited to providing advice, suggestions, and sweet talk to the government. Of course, the pre-study technique fits nicely into that plan. It did not fit into our plan, nor, in my opinion, did it fit into the constitutional concept of two separate legislative bodies dealing with legislation consecutively and not concurrently. The Senate was set up for precisely the purpose of consecutively considering legislation from the House of Commons. That is not to say, however, that we refused all requests for pre-study.

On November the 26th, 1986, when the government requested pre-study on an emergency bill designed to deal with the imminent collapse of the Bank of British Columbia, Senator MacEachen, speaking for our side, said:

> If the Leader of the Government wishes leave to put that motion for pre-study, I think he will find that we will cooperate—
> The reason is that if we do not conduct a pre-study, at the end of the day tomorrow the Senate would have had no particular information, and the two days that are available would not have been used in getting the necessary information to deal with this particular crisis.
> If that other track were followed and we received the bill and began working on it only late tomorrow, then it is quite clear that we could not deal adequately with the bill by tomorrow evening and give it Royal Assent, which I think is the intention of the government.

When I opened my remarks on this motion, I observed that when pre-study of bills began in the Senate, the technique was generally limited in its application to bills which were difficult and complex or where there were exceptionally serious time problems.

This was the case of the B.C. bank bill, and for that reason we agreed to pre-study. However, this was one of the very rare exceptions to our policy.

This policy obviously frustrated some senators opposite. On July 6th, 1987, Senator Finlay MacDonald gave notice of an inquiry into "the practice of referring the subject matter of government bills to the appropriate Senate committees." Six months later, on January 28th, 1988, he asked that his inquiry, on which he had not begun debate, be withdrawn. He suggested that there might be better ways of speaking to the topic.

In the summer of 1988, on May 31st, Senator Murray requested a pre-study of Bill C-130, the legislation implementing the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement. Senator MacEachen, speaking on behalf of the Official Opposition, observed that the request was, in effect, redundant, because the Foreign Affairs Committee had been given a mandate on November the 5th, 1987, "to examine and report upon elements of the Free Trade Agreement" itself. Senator MacEachen explained as follows:

> The committee is carefully following a particular work plan. That work plan is concentrating on certain areas of the trade agreement that are new; areas that are not normally covered in a typical trade agreement. The chairman of the committee has laid out this work plan, which has been approved, calling upon us to study, as it were, these new sectors of the agreement, of which energy is an outstanding example.
> The work program to which we have already agreed should be completed by the committee. Agriculture and trade in services, including financial services, are on our future agenda. These sectors need to be explored. They would not escape thorough examination even if the bill or the subject matter of the bill were presently before the committee. Although I would argue that there is a difference between the subject matter of a bill and the legislative text, I understand that the practice has been that, if the subject matter is referred to a committee, the legislative provisions themselves are frequently examined by Senate committees. In any event, the work that we are now doing is as valuable as if we had passed a pre-study motion, because the pre-study would involve these very sectors.

So this was a case where pre-study was already being carried out, though in a somewhat different form, and therefore is another exception to the policy that we had developed.

The government's next attempt was on June 9th, 1988, when Senator Finlay MacDonald moved that the Air Canada privatization legislation be pre-studied. His speech of that day was a most interesting examination of the entire concept of pre-study. He even presented the better-known arguments opposing pre-study, and I quote them with approval. On that day, Senator Finlay MacDonald said:

> Honourable senators, I recognize that it is a basic principle of British parliamentary procedure that a bill must be dealt with consecutively in both houses. There are some practical reasons for that. Why would one house bother to consider a bill introduced in another place and not yet adopted therein?

That is exactly what pre-study involves. To be pre-studied, we must be studying a bill which which the other place has not yet adopted.

> Why would one house bother to consider a bill introduced in another place and not yet adopted therein? Presumably, it would be a waste of time for this house to > better a proposal that, in the final instance, was to be rejected

—or could be rejected. "Could be" are my words, not Senator MacDonald's—> by the other. Hence, no house is to undertake pre-study of a bill introduced in the other without having been informed by message that the particular bill has been adopted in the house where it was first introduced.

If I may interrupt, that is what happens. Obviously that is what was intended by the Constitution, and that is what happens. The Speaker stands and says, "I have a message from the House of Commons about a bill that has been adopted in the other place." Not merely a bill they are thinking about adopting; not one that has just been introduced or talked about in the other place.

Continuing the quote from Senator Macdonald in June of 1988:

> Another disadvantage of pre-study may be that the exact contribution of the Senate to the legislative process becomes somewhat blurred, at least for the outsider, for there is no formal acknowledgement by the Commons of the senatorial input—a point put to me very strongly by Senator McElman.
> Another possible drawback is that the Senate could waste its time in suggesting hundreds of amendments to a bill that will never reach the floor of the Senate because the House will later reject it at third reading.
> These are all valid reasons, and it certainly might appear that they have found some favour recently by the majority in this chamber.

He is right about that.

The following week, on July 14th, 1988, I replied to Senator MacDonald's speech. I, of course, found favour with the arguments I have just cited and was somewhat less enamoured with the views he subsequently expressed in favour of pre-study which, it seemed to me, were contradictory to the points that he made and that I have just read. Nevertheless, I did express my admiration for the scholarship of his work, because he had given the matter a good deal of serious thought and study.

• (1610)

But, where scholarship is concerned, the final word must be given to Senator John Stewart, who, during the GST debate on November 29, 1990, launched a devastating and, in my opinion, lethal attack on the pre-study technique. His observation was not one of those raised by Senator MacDonald, but, rather, one based on a far more odious dimension to pre-study. His observation was that in the view of many, particularly in academic circles, the Senate had become a lobby from within. He cited a 1964 Globe and Mail editorial on proceedings of our Banking Committee and a 1978 book by Dr. Colin Campbell entitled: The Canadian Senate: A Lobby from Within. Doctor Campbell argued that pre-study was a form of covert lobbying. In a passage from the book, which Senator Stewart cited but which is worth repeating, Dr.Campbell says:

> By looking into the Senate at work on business review, —and that is the subject matter of the pre-study motion before us—

> one looks right into the heart of Canadian liberal democracy. Here the business community applies subtle and not-so-subtle pressure for adaptations of government legislation to fit their viewpoint. Senators play crucial roles in the process. In a very real sense they are the lobby from within. They bargain and negotiate on business's behalf for amendments which are essential for a favourable financial and commercial climate. When the government refuses to accommodate certain business claims, senators can convey to business the "necessity" of the government policy.

I incorporate these quotations by reference, not with approval as saying that that is in fact what happens, but with definite approval that that is what a lot of people think happens.

Further in the same speech Senator Stewart quotes Dr. Campbell as follows:

> By studying bills before they reach the Upper House, the committee has kept a sharp eye on bills which affect business. This has been its greatest influence. Perhaps even more than the members of the Commons Finance Committee, the Senate Banking Committeemen, through astute use of expertise and privileges, have learned the art of political bargaining and are accomplished at negotiating with government representatives to gain their ends.

As Senator Stewart noted, Dr. Campbell's conclusion is that, "because of the sinister work done in pre-study by the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the Senate as a whole deserved to be abolished".

There is no doubt that that has been an impression—an unfounded impression in my experience, but certainly an impression bolstered by the practice of pre-study.

I recommend to all senators, and particularly to all members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, Senator Stewart's remarks on November 29, 1990, particularly at pages 4487 to 4490.

I cannot say that the remarks of Dr. Campbell are inaccurate; I can only say in my experience that they are inaccurate.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Why quote them, then?

Senator Frith: A good question. Why quote them, says Senator Lynch-Staunton. I quote them because, as I have just said, pre-study, inappropriate as it is, being contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, becomes a tool in the hands of people that make these kinds of criticisms. Dr. Campbell uses pre-study to reinforce this image of the Senate as a lobby from within. He uses this practice of pre-study, which is not and should not be the normal function of the Senate, as an argument to support his thesis. That is why I quoted it.

Whether the observations of Dr. Campbell are accurate is not as important as the fact that a large segment of society shared his view that the Senate operated to protect and further the interests of business, even at the expense of the good of the general population. These same people will find it no coincidence that the government's first big push at pre-study, namely, the one before us now, involves the referral of the four major pieces of legislation dealing with financial institutions to our Banking Committee. Cynics—not I, but cynics—will say that now that the Conservative government has a majority in the Senate it, together with business, is calling for "business as usual" in the Senate, namely, pre-study of these bills before they are even passed in the House of Commons.

We on this side of the chamber have a much different view of the modern Senate and we hold a much different view about the technique of pre-study. To accept the motions of the Deputy Government Leader is to accept the gradual regression of this institution and possibly to invite once again the scorn and cynicism which found expression in Dr. Campbell's book.

Senator Poitras has presented us with all the usual beguiling arguments in favour of pre-study—and there do exist arguments in favour of pre-study, but they have a pernicious effect and are in opposition to the spirit of the Constitution, the spirit of Parliament as it was set up and as it was expected to perform: Two separate houses dealing with legislation in their turn. There is the House of Commons, where most legislation is introduced then considered, amemded, rejected or accepted—dealt with in whatever way the House desires, and when and if they pass it, it comes to the Senate for consideration. Consecutive, after their decision is made, not expecting the Senate to be either a rubber stamp or as a body giving them pre-approval or considering their legislation before they have passed, amended, rejected or otherwise dealt with it.

For that reason we remain opposed to the technique and practice of pre-study because we think that it demeans this institution.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to take a few minutes only to comment on what has just been said. This is the third time in my hearing that excerpts from Professor Campbell's book on the Senate and on pre-study have been read into the record here. The first two occasions about one year ago were by Senator Stewart of Antigonish-Guysborough.

Honourable senators, I served on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce under the late Senator Salter Hayden and under Senator Barrow. For several years I was chairman of that standing committee myself. That standing committee considered important tax legislation through the pre-study process because tax legislation is so very complex and Parliament, facing time constraints, could only have done its job properly and thoroughly by using the device of pre-study. In the pre-study of important and complex tax legislation we took professional counsel with lawyers and accountants. We were open to representations from all quarters.

I must say that Professor Campbell's book—much of which I have now read, and not just the excerpts that Senator Stewart and today Senator Frith have read into the record—is really a rather partisan and rather vicious polemic against the Senate and against honourable senators. His interpretation of the place of pre-study in our system, and of the purposes to which the pre-study device have been put in the Senate and by senators and by the Senate Banking Committee, is a totally inaccurate, unjust and unwarranted interpretation. It is an attack on all honourable senators who have taken part in that committee and it is a disservice to the Senate, in my view, to place those unwarranted interpretations and accusations on the record, as Senator Stewart and today Senator Frith have done.

Pre-study started in this place many years ago with the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In my time here, legislation has been pre-studied by a number of other standing committees. The standing committees on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and the Standing Committee on Agriculture come to mind as two standing committees that have used the device of pre-study to good purpose.

It has been said from time to time that we use pre-study simply to meet the convenience of the government, or indeed the convenience of honourable senators, because so much legislation arrives in the Christmas rush or the pre-summer rush. The added interpretation has been placed on the record today by Senator Frith and earlier by Senator Stewart—the Campbell interpretation—an ideological one that there is some sinister, ideological purpose that is served by pre-study.

Honourable senators, essentially the device of pre-study is intended to try to reconcile the fact that we have a legislative role to perform, and yet in a modern democracy it is simply not justified for an appointed body to enter into confrontation with the elected body. Pre-study is a way of avoiding confrontation while making a useful contribution to the legislative and the political process.

I must say that in my experience here, serving as I did on various committees, I found it to be an extremely useful process, an extremely useful device and I say that from the perspective of one who has taken part in it both in opposition and as a supporter of the government.

We have, in recent reforms of the rules of the Senate, provided for a process to formalize the device of pre-study with the consent of honourable senators. Using pre-study does not preclude at all the rights of honourable senators to consider legislation in the normal process when it arrives here and to refer bills to committee—not at all—but it has proven itself over the years as a useful device in the parliamentary and the legislative process.

I am very happy that we are, I believe, in a position to begin using it again. The four bills that my honourable friend Senator Poitras has suggested should go to the committee are all bills that relate to financial institutions and to the regulation of financial institutions; the four bills are interrelated. It is all to the good that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce should now, while it has some time to do so, consider those bills, the policy behind those bills and the subject matter of those bills in some detail and hear at some length, not only from ministers prepared to defend the bills and other experts, but from those who may be opposed or have reservations.

There is no ideological or political exclusivity to the work of the banking committee, or any other committee, and in my experience in this place there never has been.

I urge the Senate to adopt the motion that the Deputy Leader of the Government has put forward to enable us to return to a practice which has proved its value in the Parliamentary, legislative and political process, namely, the practice of pre-study.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have nothing further to say about the motion, but Senator Murray has accused me of doing a disservice to the Senate. If the basis for that is the fact that I put on the record of the Senate an attack on the Senate by an academic, I just want to make it clear that we certainly disagree on what a service and disservice is to the Senate. I am not so smug as to think that we ought never to put on the record of the Senate anything that attacks the Senate, justified or not justified. In fact, I think it appropriate to do so.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have some considerable reservations about the process of pre-study and I have had them for many years. I do not believe that pre-study really started with the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee. If recollection serves me correctly, it actually started with the Finance committee, at the time the Estimates were referred to the Finance committee, with the command to that committee that the Estimates be reviewed in advance of the receipt of the appropriations bill, which is the actual legislative matter that comes before the Senate and before Parliament in respect of financial appropriations.

The Finance committee did develop over the years a method of studying that was quite different from the House of Commons where the Estimates were referred to a number of committees. The Finance committee took the Estimates, made a global study of them and reported back to the Senate in advance of the receipt of the appropriations bill. At that time, the appropriations bill was not subject to debate, although later practice brought that into use. However, there was never a major debate on the appropriations bill. The discussion in the chamber took place over the report of the committee on the Estimates.

Senator Hayden, who one must remember was the Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee for some 30 odd years, I believe, recognized the reality that was articulated by Senator Murray that this body has a legislative function but its appointed nature makes it somewhat difficult for it to confront the elected house. He invoked the concept of pre-study in which the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee took complicated legislation and went over it prior to the bill being passed in the House of Commons. The results of that study were communicated to the Minister responsible for the bill in the House of Commons, and amendments were often made to the bill in the House of Commons so that it was acceptable to the Senate when it arrived here.

What you must remember about that process is that it was conducted by Senator Hayden, who first of all was a very wily politician, who was a great persuader, and who had the ear of the government of that day. Therefore, he made the process work. To my knowledge, there has not been a committee chairman or chairwoman since that time who has been able to make the process work in the manner that Senator Hayden did. The result is that pre-study is no longer what Senator Hayden saw, that is, an opportunity to influence the legislation in the Commons before it was passed by that body.

Pre-study has become a manner of getting Senate interference out of the way. The Senate committee to whom the bill is referred makes an academic study of the matter, reports to the Senate, very little or nothing happens in the House of Commons, and the bill comes to the Senate. Then the argument is postulated, "We have no need to refer the bill to committee, or if we do refer it to committee, refer it for a couple of days just to get it done and see that the form is adhered to." Then the bill as it came from the Commons is passed intact.

Senator Murray raises the problem, which is quite right, that we have a legislative function but we do not have the legislative validity of an elected house. However, we are in fact a sovereign body, and we ourselves have to decide what our duty is and what rules and methodology should guide us in the conduct of our business.

Some time ago, and I am going back a long way now, we had before us the wiretap legislation, and a bill was passed in the House of Commons and it was amended by the opposition at that time to provide that the person whose wire was being tapped had to be notified of that tap 60 days after its discontinuation.

When the matter came to the Senate, it went to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee and the Police Chiefs Association appeared and said, "This amendment is terribly dangerous because the kind of people whose wires are being tapped are usually people who are itinerant, like drug dealers. They move from place to place to place. What this legislation says is that if somebody moves, we discontinue the tap and we must notify them within 60 days that their wire was being tapped. This would be tantamount to telling them that they are being investigated, and they would act appropriately."

They pleaded with the Senate committee to take the amendment out by way of amendment. A report was made by the Chairman of the committee at that time, Senator Goldenberg, recommending that the amendment be deleted. The Senate accepted the report of the committee. The amendment was deleted and it went back to the House of Commons.

Generally, the government and even the opposition, which was Conservative at that time, agreed that it had been a mistake. They were ready to accept the Senate amendment, until Stanley Knowles got to his feet and said, "We cannot allow the Senate to amend a House of Commons bill, no matter how right it is." The House of Commons agreed with that, refused the Senate amendment and sent back the flawed legislation. After a debate, the Senate knuckled under and the flawed legislation was passed to be corrected at a later time.

It seems to me the crux of the debate is this: Is Stanley Knowles right, that the Senate has no right to amend House of Commons legislation, no matter how flawed it may be? I say clearly not. The Senate has a right, and it has a duty.

There are reasons for pre-study, there is no question about that. In complicated legislation, as Senator Murray has said, pre-study is invaluable. In cases where there is a timeframe that cannot be met under the normal process, a pre-study is important. Even to try to understand legislation in advance of the bill coming to us is understandable. Yet, what is not understandable is to substitute the right and the duty of the Senate to deal with legislation passed in the other place, despite the fact that it may have had a pre-study. Senator Frith is right: What started out legitimately, what was to be something worthwhile, what was to be a process that moved legislation along at a reasonable pace and allowed us to deal and grasp some of the thoughts behind complicated legislation, and to allow input from knowledgeable people throughout the country, has now become a system of shunting the Senate aside.

I can guarantee honourable senators if this Senate becomes elected, as many of us in this chamber hope it will, a newly-elected Senate will not stand for that for one moment. It may, in terms of a complicated bill, want to pre-study it in the interests of moving the process along. However, do not kid yourselves that they will substitute that for the legislative right to overlook the bill that was passed in the other place.

I am not against pre-study. It is a process that has a great deal of validity. What I am against is what pre-study has become—an emasculation of the sovereign rights of this body. That, honourable senators, in my humble estimation is a dreadful mistake.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments further to the proposals moved by Senator Poitras in a particular way as opposed to a general way, which proposals were responded to so ably by our distinguished leader, Senator Frith.

I refer now to the four bills that are being proposed to be pre-studied by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. These bills involve the proposed legislation, Bill C-28, respecting insurance companies; Bill C-34, which deals with cooperative credit associations; Bill C-4, respecting federal trust and loan companies; and Bill C-19, respecting banks and banking. They are all very important pieces of legislation.

May I remind honourable senators that the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee—and indeed this whole chamber—are not ignorant of the new directions which this legislation is taking. In October of 1989, the Banking committee proposed a study of financial institutions. We brought in a report in January or February of 1990 after a good deal of study—and I will go into that in a minute—in which, in a bulky document, a complete, thorough and, I think, scholarly review of all the legislation that we are now about to discuss in these proposed bills, was reviewed and reported on and certain recommendations made by this very same committee.

In other words, what I am saying to honourable senators is we are not going into this subject cold. A study has been made without the actual legislation; a study that invited witnesses from across the country—and I will go into that briefly in a few minutes—in which recommendations were made to the government, a government that was proposing legislation in this regard. From what I am led to believe, a good number of the recommendations were adopted in principle by the Department of Finance which brought in these new bills.

In other words, what is the purpose of this pre-study? We have already pre-studied. We did what a good committee should do, a committee which, as I say, agreed back in 1989 to do the very thing—because we had a sense of responsibility to this chamber and to the Canadian public—that was necessary, to conduct the review in order to enable the government to have our point of view on the proposed legislation.

The report of the committee started out by acknowledgements, if honourable senators will allow me to read a paragraph or two:

> In October, 1989, this Committee was instructed by the Senate to study and report on the future of Canadian financial institutions in a globally competitive and evolving environment and, in particular, on the ownership of such institutions.
> Over the period from late October to the end of January, the Committee heard from 26 groups of witnesses. In addition to the formal background papers associated with the hearings, the Committee received more than 40 further reports, speeches, technical papers and the like from concerned players. The Committee wishes to express its sincerest thanks for this participation and cooperation.
> In addressing these issues and in the preparation of the Report, the Committee has been very fortunate to have the advice and assistance of Mr. Thomas J. Courchene, Professor of Economics at the School of Policy Studies, Queen's University, and former Chairman of the Ontario Economic Council; and of Mr. Gérald A. Lacoste, former Chairman of the Commission des valeurs mobilières du Québec . . .

● (1650)

These are highly qualified professional experts who, along with our own research people, heard the witnesses, analyzed the results, and with the assistance and under the direction of the committee itself, prepared this lengthy report containing what I think are very solid recommendations. My question to Senator Poitras, who was the deputy chairman of that committee, is: What is the purpose of going through this exercise again? I am not talking now about the principle of pre-study. I am talking about the four bills that you have asked the Senate to undertake to pre-study.

I could give a list, but I would not keep the Senate waiting, of the distinguished witnesses that were heard: the presidents of almost every bank, the presidents and chief executive officers of major insurance and trust companies, the credit unions, the Caisse Populaire. If you read that report, in fact, the work has basically been done, not in relation to the government legislation, but an overall picture of what Canada should be doing in order to develop a national market in financial services, which is what the legislation entails now.

Honourable senators, I say to you that insofar as these four bills—and I am limiting myself to those four without in any way endorsing pre-study—that study has already been done. The Senate will spend thousands of dollars again getting these witnesses back, getting the experts again, when in fact the review has been done, and the recommendations have been made. It would be a waste of time, energy, and financial resources to do a pre-study now on bills that have already had the careful perusal of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-28, an Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto;
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-34, an Act to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto;
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-4, an Act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto; and
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-19, an Act respecting banks and banking, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

[Senator Buckwold.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will the honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins:

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, before the vote is taken, I believe rule 67(1) requires leave and the agreement of the whips to hold the vote earlier.

Senator Frith: It requires a previous order of the Senate.

Senator Phillips: Yes, and I would ask that the Senate give leave to dispense with rule 67(1).

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motions carried. Let the doors be opened.

A BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN STATUTES OF CANADA TO RECOGNIZE THE WAR-TIME SERVICE OF THE VETERANS OF THE CANADIAN MERCHANT NAVY

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING SUSTAINED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am now prepared to rule on Senator Marshall's motion on Bill S-5.

The Chair has reviewed the provisions of Bill S-5, an act to amend certain statutes of Canada to recognize the war-time service of the veterans of the Canadian merchant navy to determine whether this bill requires a royal recommendation and whether it can be properly introduced in the Senate. The Chair is satisfied that the original point of order by Senator Lynch-Staunton has been properly raised since it was made before the question had passed to a stage where objection would be out of place.

It is the opinion of the Chair that notwithstanding clause 15 of the bill, which states' "No payment shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to defray any expenses necessary for the implementation of this Act without the authority of an Act of Parliament for such purpose", Bill S-5 falls into the category of measures which, according to our parliamentary tradition, requires a recommendation of His Excellency. It does not appear, therefore, to be procedurally in order.

I must say that in reviewing this matter, the Chair was faced with a serious and complex procedural problem. On a prima facie basis, it seems that Bill S-5, because it contains the above-quoted clause 15, is not in violation of our Senate Rules. Rule 82 states, and I quote:

> "the Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative".

Clause 15 clearly denies any appropriation of public money for Bill S-5 until a further Act of Parliament is passed authorizing such expenditures. Thoughtful argument has been made that Bill S-5 does not contravene either section 53 or 54 of the Constitutional Act, 1867, since these sections, while placing restrictions on the other place, place no such restrictions upon the powers of the Senate to initiate bills of expenditure for novel purposes. These sections read:

> 53. Bills for appropriating any Part of the public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Common.

And section 54 says:

> 54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

In its report on The Form and Use of Royal Recommendations, the Senate Finance Committee noted, and I quote:

> Advice given to ministers that a royal recommendation must be attached to all bills having implications for current or future expenditure would seem to go beyond the provisions of section 54.

Based on this interpretation of Rule 82 and of sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, the Chair concedes that a strong case could be made regarding Bill S-5's procedural acceptability.

[English]

However, after carefully reviewing the parliamentary authorities, the Chair has concluded that this interpretation of the general rules and practices of financial procedure is much too narrow. Our parliamentary tradition, strictly adhered to over many years, consistently indicates that bills emanating from private members which bind the House to future legislation appropriating monies is not in order in either Chamber of Parliament.

● (1710)

The Chair does not agree that the concept "the financial initiative of the Crown" emanates solely from Standing Order 80(1) of the House of Commons. Bourinot, Fourth Edition, page 407, refers to it as a "constitutional obligation" and writes that "No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer." Erskine May, 21st edition, page 691, defines the financial initiative of the Crown as "the long established and strictly observed rule of procedure, which expressed a principle of the highest constitutional importance, that no public charge can be incurred except on the initiative of the Crown . . . ."

Bourinot's Procedures and Practices notes that, with respect to its financial procedures, the British House of Commons has historically been more strict than the Canadian Parliament. The United Kingdom Standing Order specifically states that "this House will receive no Petition for any sum relating to Public Service or proceed upon any Motion for a grant or charge upon Public Revenue, whether payable out of the Consolidated Fund or out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, unless recommended from the Crown." Although the Canadian Parliament's Standing Orders are not as definite and do not go as far as those of the United Kingdom, Bourinot infers they are substantially the same and that invariable practice under numerous decisions of Canadian Speakers has been to interpret section 54 of the Constitution Act in terms of the Standing Orders of the British House. I refer Honourable Senators to pages 406 and 408 of Bourinot's Fourth Edition.

Even the 1990 report of the National Finance Committee notes that "the Canadian House of Commons apparently has chosen to bind itself by this British rule . . ." (p. 7)

[Translation]

In the opinion of the Chair, despite its words to the contrary, Bill S-5 represents a charge upon the public revenue because it proposes relaxing the conditions, objects and purposes of existing statutes to which spending authorization of the Crown had previsouly been given. With great respect, I must state, as other Speakers have done in similar circumstances, that the simple incorporation of a clause denying any appropriation of funds is not an acceptable way of eluding the requirement for a royal recommendation where it is required.

If Bill S-5 were enacted, it would seem that many Canadians, including the merchant seamen of Canada during World War II, and their spouses, would feel that Parliament is obliged to directly appropriate monies to provide the benefits promised by the bill, since the bill amends the appropriate categories of the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act to include war-time Canadian merchant sailors. It seems clear to the Chair that the provisions of Bill S-5 represent liabilities to the Crown. Erskine May, 20th edition, states at page 797, "A charge is also involved by any proposal whereby the Crown would incur a liability or a contingent liability payable out of money to be voted by Parliament". On these grounds, Bill S-5 requires a royal recommendation.

[English]

The Chair is well aware of citation 611 of Beauchesne's 6th edition, page 185, which states "A bill from the Senate, certain clauses of which would necessitate some public expenditure, is in order if it is provided by a clause of the said bill that no such expenditure shall be made unless previously sanctioned by Parliament." In my opinion, citation 611 is not relevant in this instance. Citation 611 refers only to "certain clauses" of a bill necessitating some public expenditure. This is not the case regarding Bill S-5. The whole purpose of Bill S-5 and most of its fifteen clauses involve public expenditures.

Since Bill S-5 infringes upon the financial initiative of the Crown and therefore requires a royal recommendation, and since Rule 82 of the Rules of the Senate states "The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not, within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative," it is not in order. I therefore direct that the order for second reading of Bill S-5 be discharged and that it be removed from the Senate Order Paper.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Mr. Speaker, with due respect, I appeal your ruling.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): We would also appeal the ruling, with due respect.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I think you should put the question first, should you not?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I think there is agreement on both sides that we suspend rule 671 and hold the vote.

Senator Frith: We just need to apply it, or we agree to an order under that rule.

Senator Phillips: I would suggest that the vote be held now. Perhaps the opposition whip would prefer five minutes. That is his prerogative.

Some Hon. Senators: Now!

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, the vote should proceed now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the ruling?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

• (1720)

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I declare the ruling sustained. Let the doors be opened.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, before the adjournment motion is put I should like to pay tribute to Senator Marshall and his work on behalf of veterans.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: It is a little late for that.

Senator Phillips: I think he has done a great service to them by introducing this bill.

Senator Frith: Do you want to change your vote? It could be important.

Senator Phillips: The House of Commons—now a year later—has followed his recommendation and made a recommendation to the government that they consider introducing legislation to achieve what Senator Marshall is attempting to do here.

I should also like to tell honourable senators that there are approximately 78,000 veterans receiving pensions from World War II. Senator Marshall has intervened on behalf of several thousands of them. The Senate should be aware of the extra amount of time and effort that he has put in on behalf of them.

Senator Frith: Do not push us too hard. As they say, "Don't throw tributes; throw votes."

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make for the purpose of preparing for the adjournment motion to be moved by my friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government.

The situation is as I described it earlier today with regard to the labour dispute at Canada Post.

Notice has been given of legislation in the other place. I do not know if or when that legislation will be debated, or when it will be passed. If they proceed, it is likely that they will not do so before Monday next. Therefore, the prudent thing for us to do is to adjourn until November 5, it being understood that there will probably be a telegram going out to honourable senators early next week advising you to return Wednesday, or whenever the bill will be coming to us.

If a miracle happens and the parties involved reach an agreement and legislation is unnecessary, then I will consult with His Honour, the Speaker and with the Leader of the Opposition. We will consider the likely agenda for the Senate and decide whether to come back on November 5 or at some later date. We can invoke the new rule that was passed some months ago, which enables us to put off a sitting of the Senate by agreement if there is no business for us to attend to.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the question of the postal legislation I heard today that, although the mediator, Judge Gold, had said that he would not participate any further in mediation, the two parties still wanted to talk, each of them so declaring; and that Mr. Parrot said that the question of a strike was out of the question at the moment because they wanted to pursue their talks, which had brought them very close to agreement.

I would like to understand whether we are talking about legislation to force postal workers back to work when they are not on strike, so there would be nothing to force them back to work on, or whether we are talking about some other form of legislation such as an enforced collective agreement.

On the question of the rule that permits the Speaker to postpone or override a decision of the Senate as to adjournment, I am very opposed to that rule. It presently provides that the Speaker can do so after consultation with the leadership. What we have is equivalent to the old business of the King dismissing Parliament.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: Do you think that is a joke? The rule is what is a joke, Sir, not what I am saying about it, and it is a very bad joke because it uses the words "it should." I could consider such a rule more positively and could participate in the application of the rule if it stated that it was subject to approval. It is not subject to approval; it is subject only to consultation. It means that the Prime Minister or the government can tell the Speaker of the Senate—and I am saying whatever Prime Minister or whatever government—that "I don't want the Senate to come back. I don't want them around." The application of that rule would mean that the government could tell the Senate, "You have adjourned to November 5, 1991, come back after Christmas, or sometime in 1992 or 1993."

I will not participate in the application of that rule until it is changed to provide for approval, and not simply for consultation. If there is a further postponement under the terms of that rule, when we ever do come back, I will object strenuously to an order of the Senate having been overridden by the Speaker, who would have only consulted and not sought and obtained the approval of the Senators or the leadership in the Senate.

But back to my original point—I would like to know what form of legislation the Leader of the Government believes is required in the present context when both parties say that they want to continue negotiation and the union leader says that a strike is out of the question at the moment.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, first of all, this dispute has been going on for more than two years. There have been scores of meetings by a conciliation board. There has been a conciliation report. For the past six weeks there has been an attempt at mediation by one of the most respected mediators in the country, Judge Gold, who has told us and the Canadian people today that while progress was made, the mediation efforts have been unsuccessful and that he does not see any possibility of a negotiated settlement.

Senator Frith: But the parties do.

Senator Murray: The parties are meeting. Fine. We have given notice that we will bring in legislation. The type of legislation will depend on the circumstances. If it is a matter of ending a strike or a lockout, if one or the other occurs, then the provisions of the legislation would be pretty obvious to everyone. It could be that it will be legislation simply to continue the operation of the post office and to impose a settlement in respect to the unresolved issues.

Senator Frith: Even in the absence of a strike?

Senator Murray: Even in the absence of a strike.

Senator Frith: And while they are operating and we are getting our mail?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I say, the parties have had over two years to come to an agreement and the honourable senator should understand—

Senator Frith: But they are still delivering the mail.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should understand the situation—

Senator Frith: I understand perfectly.

Senator Murray: —in which the post office is placed financially by the cost of all the standby arrangements that have had to be made because of the lack of a contract between the two parties, and the fact that the public will simply be held at ransom, as it were, awaiting the timing of one party or the other.

The government believes that if progress is not made soon we shall have to act to ensure that there will be a continuation of postal services and that they will not be simply interrupted at any time. There are cheques going out to social recipients and various other considerations.

Senator Frith: Yes, they are going out. They are not being held up.

Senator Murray: Well, timing is everything. The honourable senator can debate the legislation when and if it comes.

I have been trying to take the Senate into our confidence as much as is possible under the circumstances. I could simply ask to adjourn the house until Monday or Tuesday, if honourable senators want that. I thought it was more prudent to adjourn until November 5, there being no business other than the possibility of—

Senator Frith: That's fine. There is no objection to that.

Senator Murray: —of back-to-work legislation coming before us. However, I am suggesting that we adjourn until November 5—

Senator Frith: That's fine.

Senator Murray: —it being understood that, if necessary, honourable senators will be summoned back.

Senator Frith: As always.

Senator Murray: With regard to the second matter, let me advise honourable senators so that there is no misunderstanding of what I intend to do: If we do not have to come back here before November 5 and if, as November 5 approaches, I find that there is no likelihood of sufficient business coming from the House of Commons to occupy us, it would be my intention to consult with the Speaker and to consult with the Leader of the Opposition as to whether we should put off the resumption of our sittings here for another week or another two weeks, or whatever. If the Leader of the Opposition refuses to take part in that process, then we will solemnly troop back here on November 5 with nothing to do, but that will have been his choice, not mine.

Senator Frith: Quite possible. I agree. But anything is preferable to the application of that iniquitous rule.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 5, 1991, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 5, 1991, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 29, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I ask your indulgence for a moment while I make a brief statement about the business before us today and in the foreseeable future.

When last we met, I had indicated that there was a strong possibility that we might be called back to this chamber to deal with legislation concerning the postal dispute. Efforts to resolve that dispute, as recently as last weekend, proved unavailing and, as a result, the House of Commons now has before it Bill C-40.

I had anticipated that that bill would have been disposed of by the House of Commons before 2 o'clock today, which is why I asked His Honour the Speaker to set 2 o'clock as the time of resumption of our sitting. However, it now appears that the vote on third reading in the House of Commons will not take place until 3 o'clock; that is, the division will take place at 3 o'clock. The division normally takes about 10 minutes. Therefore, sometime between 3:00 and 3:30, on the assumption that the bill passes the House, I would expect the message to the Senate from the House of Commons concerning that bill.

The usual discussions have taken place between the parties in the Senate. It has been agreed that we would proceed immediately to second reading of that bill and then to Committee of the Whole. It is the intention to call, as witnesses, the Minister of Labour and to invite representatives of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and of Canada Post to testify before the Committee of the Whole this afternoon. If all goes well, I would be seeking permission from the Senate to proceed with third reading following the deliberations of the Committee of the Whole. I would hope to have Royal Assent before 6:30 this evening.

Honourable senators, there are several other bills coming before us that have completed the committee stage. Two of them will, I am advised by our friends opposite, need somewhat further scrutiny at third reading; that is to say, Bills C-11 and C-8. Therefore, when those committee reports are presented today, we would propose third reading debate be put off until a later date.

With regard to Bills C-16 and C-23, we intend to ask leave to proceed with third reading today. If that is granted, then we would proceed to Royal Assent, and it would be the intention of my friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government, to move that the Senate adjourn until November 19th.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I cannot add anything useful to what the Leader of the Government has said about today's work, but my colleague, the Deputy Leader and the House Leader may have something to say about the specific pieces of legislation.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, dealing first with the question of the four bills that will be reported back, with respect to Bill C-23, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act and Bill C-16, to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, these bills were debated on second reading here. They then went to committee. I understand that there were no great controversial items raised at the committee stage. In keeping with what has been the practice for some time, namely, the fact that we expect to have Royal Assent later today and that these two bills are not controversial, we are prepared to give leave to proceed with those two bills today.

With respect to the other two bills, namely Bills C-8 and C-11, unfortunately we were unable to obtain the transcripts of the committee meetings that were held last week relating to those two bills. I should like to see those transcripts, as would my colleague, Senator Corbin, on Bills C-11 and C-8. As agreed, we will defer those until we meet next time.

With respect to Bill C-40 and the whole procedure on the back-to-work legislation, the Leader of the Government has put our position clearly, namely, that we are prepared to give leave to proceed. If all goes well at the committee meeting, as I expect it will, we could then proceed later with the further stages. But that is on the premise that all goes well at the committee stage.

However, I want to make a general observation on this whole system of calling the Senate back on very short notice. This puts senators who do not live in Ottawa, or within easy travelling distance from Ottawa, in a very difficult position. There could be circumstances where there might be an issue of major regional importance but senators from Atlantic Canada and western Canada, for example, would be prevented from participating in a debate and voting on issues that could be crucial to them. I make a plea for the future to try and have as much time as possible when we have recalls of the Senate to ensure that all the regions of the country have a chance to express their opinion.

There is a further problem, although not as important as this one, namely, the question of attendance of senators. It is impossible for certain senators to be here today. If we do not sit tomorrow, as is the expectation, there will be some senators who, try as best they might, simply will not be attending a session through no fault of theirs at all, yet on the attendance register it would be indicated that they were not present. That is another issue that we should look at. I hope that the Rules Committee can look at that issue for future reference.

The important thing is the fact that, due to these quick recalls, certain of our senators in certain regions of our country are prevented from participating in issues of national importance.

We give leave today, but I want to make it clear that that is not necessarily a blanket leave for the future on these quick recalls.

THE HONOURABLE FERNAND-E. LEBLANC

FELICITATIONS ON THE OCCASION OF HIS NOMINATION AS A FELLOW OF THE ORDER OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I want to bring to your attention the fact that one of our colleagues, Senator Fernand Lablanc, the distinguished chairman of the Standing Committee on National Finance, was just granted the highest honour bestowed upon a chartered accountant. Indeed, the honourable Senator Fernand-E. Leblanc is now a fellow of the Order of Chartered Accountant of the province of Quebec.

[English]

THE HONOURABLE SIDNEY L. BUCKWOLD

NOTICE OF RETIREMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, next week will be a week that includes an important date for one of us. November 3, 1991, will be the 75th birthday of Senator Buckwold. If the plans that have been outlined by the Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Government evolve as predicted, Senator Buckwold will, today, be attending his last session of the Senate under the terms of the Constitution of Canada.

● (1410)

I think that we shall all want the opportunity to prepare tributes to our colleague, certainly one of the most famous and one of the most—

Senator Haidasz: Colourful.

Senator Frith: I intend to save my adjectives for the tributes—

Senator Haidasz: Distinguished.

Senator Frith: —but he is certainly one of the most beloved senators in the history of Canada.

Since he may not be here at the next sitting and may have to read our tributes, I thought that he might want to use this occasion to leave us some words of wisdom.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I thank our revered leader for the compliment about words of wisdom. I remember some famous man being quoted as having said: "I have been rich and I have been poor, and, believe me, it is better to be rich." I could add that I have been in the Senate in good days and I have been here in bad days, and, believe me, it is better to be here in good days. I would like to think that today is one of them.

I really was not prepared to give my "obituary" at this point. Usually one likes to be inspired by the words of wisdom—I use that word advisedly—that flow from one's colleagues, usually mostly untrue but flattering, and that give one the impetus to prepare an address that will go down in history as the last, unforgettable, statement of a retiring senator.

I remember not long ago, by the way, that I was introduced at a dinner where the chairman said: "The senator is a very fine speaker. I heard him give a speech a month ago; it was an unforgettable address. I can't remember what he said, but it was unforgettable." I am sure this is the type of speech that will fit into that category very well.

I have had the privilege of being in this chamber for 20 years, almost to the day. It does not seem that long, to me at least, although it may be to some of those on the other side. I have enjoyed not just the work of the Senate but perhaps more especially the opportunity to be with my colleagues from all parties who have always been friendly, fair and decent, and even encouraging, although there have been occasions when that, perhaps, does not quite ring true. However, it was not because of a lack of sincerity on the part of any of us.

I well recall being brought into the Senate on the arm of one of my idols, namely, Senator Croll. With me at the time were Senator van Roggen and Senator Goldenberg. We were the three. Senator Bonnell was supposed to be with us but he came in a week or two later.

Senator Goldenberg was just a great fellow. I remember shortly after he came into the Senate, Senator Goldenberg told me that he was approached by someone in Montreal who said, in congratulating him, "I know that I will never be able to be a senator. Perhaps you could make me an assistant senator." And Senator Goldenberg, in his usual sort of self-deprecating, personal way, said, "Impossible. There is nothing lower than a senator."

Honourable senators, that is not quite the case. The fact is that in spite of what you might read in some of the newspaper or magazine articles, for the past 20 years there has been a very important role for this chamber, and believe me for the next 20 years we will have a much more important role.

I wish some day someone would write the really true story of what goes on in an active senator's life, one who takes his duty seriously and is prepared to make the sacrifice to be present as often as possible and to perform his duties respecting his own region as best he can. I would like to think that I have tried to meet those standards.

I think that I can honestly say that in most cases I have felt that I represented the views of my region. I know I was not very popular when I personally opposed the National Energy Program, but I felt that was the duty of a senator from Saskatchewan where some of us felt we had been adversely affected. There are many other occasions when that type of thing goes on in this chamber.

I think the public does not realize that an active senator, especially from perhaps more remote areas, is very much part of his local scene and is very often as busy as an average MP. Certainly in the days when Saskatchewan had no elected members of the government of the day, senators from that province played an important role in being able to represent the views of their people to the government of the time. With all due respect to our Tory friends, Senator Buckwold was sent out to open every post office and every old folks' home and every senior citizens' residence and every new industry out of which we could possibly get some political mileage. We earned our keep. Over and above that, the correspondence would be, I think, as voluminous as that of most MPs in meeting the needs of our constituents in our respective provinces.

Honourable senators, you are looking at a great supporter of this institution. I have said before publicly, and indeed in this house, that a country like Canada has to have a second chamber. I think I have even convinced my NDP friends. They, at one time, wanted to eliminate this second chamber and move into a unicameral form of government. With the problems of our regions, to limit the government of Canada to one chamber controlled by the so-called tyranny of the majority would be a serious disaster. Under that system, the prime minister really is probably the most powerful political leader in the free world unless there is some counterbalance of a chamber of this type with its responsibilities and areas of control. That is absolutely essential for the future well-being of this country, and I think that is recognized now by everyone. We do not hear too much about abolishing the second chamber.

I have to tell you, as many of you know, that I was very active, almost from the day I got here, in advocating an elected senate. Some honourable senators will remember a trip to Australia that was taken, I think I can say, as a result of representations that I made to the Prime Minister of the day that we should take a serious look at the model of the Australian Senate. I was given the opportunity to go because it was a suggestion of mine. In fact, a committee of the Senate went to look in detail at the operations of that second chamber. I think all of us came back convinced that, with some modifications to meet our needs, we could have a Triple E Senate as the Australians have—equal, elected and effective—working under a parliamentary system of government rather than a presidential one.

As I have said before, I asked our friends in the government to look carefully at that model of the Australian system. We hear it referred to generally in a distant way, but no one is zeroing in on, and looking at, how it works. I respectfully suggest to the Leader of the Government that that model be reviewed again to see whether it meets the aspirations, especially of those of us from western Canada who feel it is important that we have such representation.

For a fellow who did not intend to say a word, this is moving along quite well. Sometimes the longest speeches are the ones that are not prepared.

I want to take this opportunity to thank everyone. As I have said, we have had our good days and we have had our bad days. As a matter of fact, I was just thinking that approximately a year ago to this very day was not one of our better days, but that is history and someday someone may write a comedy about it, I am not sure.

Senator Gigantès: A tragedy.

Senator Buckwold: No, I said a comedy.

To those of you who have helped, to the leaders of the government, to the leaders of the opposition, to all of my colleagues, to members of the Senate staff who have always been so helpful, and in particular to my own secretaries who have always been reliable and available at any time for their duties, I wish to thank you. You have all made it a very pleasant 20 years. It is almost a shame that it has to end.

I recall a famous cartoon by McPherson in 1965 when the rule regarding lifetime appointments was changed. The cartoon depicted two elderly senators in the reading room. The viewer could not see their faces, only the high-backed chairs showing the senators' gnarled hands on the armrests. Underneath, the caption read, "Sir John A. didn't tell us that this would be temporary employment." I guess it is temporary, but, as I say, for a temporary job it has been very exciting and very meaningful.

To all of you again, thank you for your courtesies. Thank you for your friendship. I hope that whenever you are out in that wonderful part of Canada, namely, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, you will come and visit. Bring a loaf of bread because things are a little rough out there, and your snowshoes because it has been snowing.

May I conclude by saying that, although I am out of the battle as far as the Ottawa scene is concerned, I hope, along with all of you, to continue to give my very best to maintain this country as we know it. If there is ever a sadness that creeps into anything that I do—and I usually find the fun in life—it is to see what is happening to Canada, this finest piece of the world's geography. Knowing as we do that this country is one of God's great creations, we yet somehow seem to allow it to slip through our fingers. Somehow, we must manage to keep it together from sea to sea as we have known it in the past, and as I hope we will know it in the future.

Thank you again, all of you. God bless you and good health.

OUTSTANDING MONTREALERS

GALA TO HONOUR WINNERS

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, last Thursday I presided the Gala to honour outstanding Montrealers.

I want to give you, in alphabetical order, the names of the three persons who were honoured on that occasion, three outstanding Canadians and three outstanding Montrealers indeed. The first one is Mr. Raymond Cyr, president of Bell Enterprises. The second is Mrs. Antonine Maillet, who now lives in Montreal, a famous novelist, the author of remarkable pieces on Acadia which comes to the fora in all her novels and plays.

Finally, the honourable Jeanne Sauvé, well known to us as a parliamentarian and a former Governor General.

Thank you, honourable senators.

SWITZERLAND

STATEMENT ON CONSTITUTION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, earlier this year, the Senate made it possible for me to visit Switzerland in order to look at its Constitution. The Swiss people told me they have problems: they can no longer convince the young to join the yodelling clubs or the village brass bands. Otherwise they seem to manage their constitutional affairs by using a degree of decentralization that should be instructive.

All legislative power in Switzerland resides with the cantons, their provinces. They have delegated four jurisdictions to the federal government—maybe by coincidence the same four jurisdictions which Mr. Allaire suggested. They have since installed a federal old age security plan, the only other safety-net being a full employment policy.

There are rich cantons and poor cantons. The richer cantons do not delegate any of their authority to the federal government; the poorer cantons do. The richer cantons are prepared to pay taxes to allow poorer cantons to have services roughly comparable to those of the rich cantons.

The government is decentralized. The French-speaking cantons say they would not think of joining France, because some prefect from Paris would come and run them. They have so much independence that it makes them very proud to be Swiss. Maybe this is something we should keep in mind. The fact that Switzerland is so much smaller than we are is no obstacle to examining their system. If so small a country should need so much decentralization, surely a country as large as ours also needs decentralization, or so the Swiss told me.

It is my duty, after such trip, to report to the Senate. This I have done, and I thank you for the opportunity.

By the way, I caught a mild case of typhoid in Switzerland, although it is supposed to be the world's cleanest country. And my last illusion was shattered when, standing in the railway station in Geneva, I noticed a disparity between the clock over track 5 and the clock over track 6; there was a difference of one and a half minutes. I protested vigorously to the chef du gare who promised he would fix it by the next day; and he did so.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE PRESENTED

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras has the honour to present the following report:

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

The Committee recommends that Bill C-8 be passed without amendment but wishes to add a special note in reference to the Canada Harbour Place Corporation in Vancouver and the Harbourfront Corporation in Toronto. These Corporations have provided an important federal presence in Vancouver and Toronto respectively contributing significantly to national unity through their programs and activities. It is the desire of Committee members that the organisations created to succeed these Corporations ensure that the momentum achieved continues and that national unity remain a significant focus.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, tabled the first report of the committee.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, presented the following report:

Tuesday, October 29th, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-23, An Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, October 22, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

E. W. (STAFF) BAROOTES
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. James W. Ross: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Senator Molgat: Yes, in accordance with the comments I made earlier, we are prepared to give leave.

• (1440)

Hon. H.A. Olson: I do not intend to hold up the bill, but I do have some questions. I wonder if the sponsor of this bill in the Senate, Senator Ross, could tell us about the costs involved with respect the guarantees? For example, we were told that in the 1990 report of the Canadian Wheat Board, the amounts owing to the Canadian Wheat Board, covered by the kind of guarantees that are now being legislated in a more positive way, were about $4.3 billion, of which approximately $3.4 billion are for financially-troubled countries. We tried to make inquiries about who owes this money. For reasons that I will accept for now, although I will not accept them forever, we were told it would not be in our commercial interests to reveal the details of who or which countries were owing the Canadian Wheat Board parts of this $3.4 billion.

However, there is a problem of who pays the interest charges before the guarantees are called. I do not know whether it is the Canadian Wheat Board using the producers' money, or moneys that would otherwise turn into final payments to the producers that is being used to pay the interest on this $4.3 billion, or whether, in making its guarantee, the government intends to pay the interest from day one. I just simply do not know the answer to that. If I were to yield the floor to Senator Ross, I wonder if he could tell us about that so that the farmers will have some view respecting this.

I am not arguing, honourable senators, that it is a good idea for the federal government to have statutory authority to consider, and therefore make, loans or guarantees of loans to the Canadian Wheat Board from time to time. That is not the point. The point is, if we consider that, some weeks ago interest rates were around 10 percent and 11 percent, it is clear that there are several hundred million dollars in interest charges that are being charged to someone every year for these loans. I wonder if Senator Ross could tell us who it is that ultimately pays those charges?

Senator Ross: Honourable senators, I agree that these are good questions. I had not expected the sitting today, and I have asked for some of that information. I undertake to submit that information at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will accept that because I accept what Senator Ross says respecting the short notice that the Senate would be dealing with these bills today. If he will also give an undertaking to bring us an answer on where the ultimate responsibility for these interest charges lies, I will accept that for another day.

Senator Frith: And put it on the record.

Senator Olson: Yes, of course, we will put it on the record.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-16, An Act to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act and to provide for other matters in relation thereto, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, October 23, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

E. W. (STAFF) BAROOTES
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

On Government Notices of Motions:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): With permission, I will ask later for leave to revert to this item so that we can propose an appropriate adjournment motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I move:

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a problem with respect to Inquiries. Perhaps you have noticed that I have about five standing in my name. The problem is that we have not met on enough days for me to deal with all of them. If you look at the number beside them you will see that Inquiries Nos. 3, 4 and 5 have apparently been called 11 times and we have not dealt with them. They are important matters from time to time.

My question is simple: if we get to the number 15, I understand that by the rules they then drop off the Order Paper. The question is: can we just put them back on the Order Paper? The alternative is that you will have to suffer through four or five speeches from me in one day to get through them before they are taken off the Order Paper. If there is no problem with putting them back on the Order Paper, then I do not have a problem, but I do not think this has been tested under the new rules yet.

I do not no who will answer my question. I hope that the people opposite, who put these rules together, will nod in agreement that, yes, they may be put back on the Order Paper after they are called for the fifteenth time and automatically drop off. But the new rules have not been tested, so we do not know.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, if I may respond to the question, it is the intention in these new rules that, should an Inquiry drop off the Order Paper, it could be reinstated by the sponsoring senator at any other time.

Senator Olson: There is no problem, then.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 160 residents of the province of Quebec who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Chartierville, Notre-Dame des Bois, Thetford Mines, Saint-Joseph de Beauce and Bellechasse.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 175 residents of New Brunswick who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitioners are from Caraquet, Maisonnette, Brenville, Baie Sainte-Anne and Burnt Church.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 25 young residents of Kamloops and Victoria in British Columbia, who deplore the fact that the Goods and Services Tax Credit is not available to young Canadians who no longer live with their parents, pay taxes and are under 19. They ask the Senate to call upon the government to end this injustice.

Honourable senators, finally, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 4,302 residents of the province of Quebec who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Falardeau, Châteauguay, Shawinigan, Montreal, Victoriaville, Princeville, Hemmingford, Chesterville, L'Avenir, Saint-Germain and Arthabaska.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPLACEMENT OF VICTORIA CROSS

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if it is in fact government policy to discontinue the use of the award of the Victoria Cross in Canada or for Canadian servicemen. If that matter has been considered, have members of the Canadian Legion, the Air Force Association and the Naval Association been consulted?

To read a notice in the press that this matter is under consideration by the Department of National Defence, to substitute some worthy Canadian order for it, should be taken with a great deal of reserve. There is a history, a tradition and a record behind the Victoria Cross that no other decoration that I know of has. One can even take into account the U.S. Congressional Medal or the highest award of any country and there is none that stands higher than the Victoria Cross. Before this government or this country decides to discontinue a decoration of that merit there should be a great deal of consultation and, more particularly, consultation with the veterans, who have made so much history for the country.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask for a full report from my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CANADIAN AID TO SOVIET UNION AND CURRENT CONSTITUENT REPUBLICS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Could the Leader of the Government answer this question either now or at some later time? I suppose it has to be later today; from what I gather we may adjourn today until November 19. My question deals with consumer goods aid to the Soviet Union or to the republics. This involves primarily food, but it could also be other consumer goods that that part of the world will be desperately short of before long, according to all the reports from the people who are there.

I have an inquiry, No. 10, in which I call the attention of the Senate to the proposed Canadian aid to the Soviet Union and its current constituent republics. I was rather encouraged—in fact more than a little encouraged by the Prime Minister's comments at Stanford University when he talked about the G-7 and the western countries generally coming to some decision with respect to a reasonable amount of aid to either the Soviet Union or to its constituent republics.

Can the Leader of the Government give us an indication as to whether something is to be done? I bring that up now because I put this inquiry forward on September 17, but it has not been convenient, for a number of reasons, to bring on the debate under "Inquiries" until now. We are getting close to that time of year when there will be some very serious deprivation, poverty and other things occuring in those parts of the world unless Canada and the other G-7 nations reach some conclusion as to what kind of support they will give to these people to see them through these difficult circumstances.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us at what stage are these discussions involving Canada and the other G-7 countries in respect to this matter?

• (1500)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a $150 million line of credit for food purchases was resently signed between Canada and the Soviet Union, and up to $50 million in credit has been reserved for the Ukraine. The honourable senator has made reference to the speech of the Prime Minister at Stanford University. In that speech Mr. Mulroney proposed a doubling of the capitalization of the European Bank to $25 billion U.S, the restructuring of the OECD to serve as a policy forum for that region, the removal of trade barriers, the integration of the new democracies into the global economy and the strong engagement of the G-7 countries. All I can tell the honourable senator at the moment is that we are actively pursuing these proposals with our G-7 partners and with the institutions I have mentioned, such as the OECD.

I should point out that the Prime Minister also made clear our readiness to play a full part in a G-7 response to food and medical needs and to assist in solving the problems of food distribution.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I appreciate that reply. If I seem to be pursuing this matter to some extent it is not that I am trying to be critical of what the Prime Minister has said, or of what Canada's position has been with respect to the G-7 response to President Gorbachev's request which was made some time ago—in fact, just before he came to meet with them at the London meeting several weeks ago. Rather, I am concerned that Canada and the other G-7 countries have not come to any resolution with respect to making a significant amount available. I am not saying that $150 million is not a significant amount, but in relation to the task to be carried out, it is an insignificant amount, and other countries within the G-7 should be coming forward with that amount and, indeed, much more.

As a matter of fact, I think some kind of an agreement was reached yesterday between the republics and the G-7 on a structure for repaying the approximately $65 billion of previous debt held by the Soviet Union. These economic matters have been transferred from what was the Soviet Union to the constituent republics. Apparently all the republics have signed on and have agreed to the repayment of this debt. Surely that should be a significant step forward in having all the G-7 countries make a commitment now of sufficient magnitude to deal with the problem. As I a said, $150 million is not a small amount, but it is a small amount in relation to the problem they face.

I hope that I can encourage the minister and the Government of Canada to be more forthright in providing consumer goods, food and other things in a significant amount that will help deal with the problems of as many as 300 million people. So far, in my view, they have not given the kind of commitment that will give hope to the Soviet authorities that they will be able to meet the demands with which they will be faced. That is why I am anxious that the Government of Canada perhaps be even more aggressive in trying to resolve this problem.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Olson is right to state that the resolution of some of these debt-related issues, which apparently was achieved yesterday among the republics and the centre, is an important element in freeing up or in making possible the provision of substantial aid from other countries. For example, the European Economic Community had proposed a package valued at some $2.4 billion, about $1.6 billion I believe of which is actually new, and Japan had offered $2.5 billion in new credits, $500 million of which would be for food purchases. In both cases the donors, the European Community and Japan, had made their offers conditional upon the resolution of some of these debt-related issues.

To be fair and to complete the record, I have already pointed out that Canada has already signed a $150 million line of credit for food purchases for the Soviet Union and up to $50 million for the Ukraine. There is a proposed Canadian contribution of up to $500 million in new credits for wheat and humanitarian aid, and of up to $6 to $7 million mainly for medicines. There are, as I said, existing credits for the U.S.S.R., the Ukraine, the Baltic States, as well as the $25 million program of technical assistance for the U.S.S.R., at least $5 million of which will be for the agricultural sector.

Senator Olson: I thank the honourable Leader of the Government for that information. Perhaps I could ask him if he would be prepared to bring us a full, or more complete, list, if that is the right word, of the commitments of the other western countries, including the G-7, as soon as possible after we come back on the November 19. My reading of the situation is that Canadians generally are very anxious to make some things, such as food and other consumer goods that we have in surplus, available to the Soviet Union and the constituent republics in the context of the present situation. I want to encourage the government to do that, and I think people want to know what is going on and what our government is promoting to achieve that end.

Senator Murray: I do not think there is much more information available at the moment, but I shall monitor the situation and as further information becomes available I shall certainly provide it to the house.

Senator Barootes: Would you like that inquiry removed from the order paper, sir?

Senator Olson: No, I think I will want to call Inquiry No.10, possibly on November 19 or 20, to provide the basis of an exchange between the Leader of the Government and myself, because I think some useful consequences could come of it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCE AND GERMANY—PROPOSAL TO FORM JOINT MILITARY TROOP—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Several weeks ago the German and French governments announced the joint creation of a new military formation composed of French and German troops in Europe, ostensibly under the auspices of the European Union of which Canada is not a member. Is Canada, as an active member of NATO, in favour of this proposal? If so, why, and, if not, why not? If not, what steps are we taking to oppose it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are quite a few questions there concerning a proposal which, I am lead to believe, is still only a proposal.

• (1510)

In any case, I shall ask my cabinet colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whether there are any comments that she feels it would be proper to make on that matter at this time. One can only assume that it is a matter of considerable discussion in the councils of NATO at the moment.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

SCHEDULE OF MEETINGS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Government Leader in the Senate regarding the joint committee of the two houses on the new constitutional proposals.

I have received a complaint from a Canadian citizen who read the advertisements and listened to what the government had to say about participation by the public. This individual phoned me this morning and reported that, having phoned the 1-800-561-1188 number, which is the one listed in the government advertisements as to what the schedule of meetings is going to be, was informed that they had no idea and could not tell him what the schedule was. This person then phoned the clerk of the committee with the same question and received the same answer: they had no knowledge; they thought the committee was going to meet in Ottawa this Thursday but they could not say where, when, or who was going to be the witness.

It seems that we say to the public that we want participation, but we do not issue a schedule. Could the minister undertake to get for us a schedule of where this committee is to meet and have it published so that the public of Canada can indeed participate, as was the original claim of the government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): As the Deputy Leader of the Opposition is aware, questions of this kind should be addressed to the joint chairman of the committee, Senator Castonguay.

Senator Molgat: He is not here.

Senator Murray: In his absence, I will undertake to use my good offices to obtain the information that the honourable senator seeks.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

NEGOTIATIONS ON AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Since apparently we may not meet again until November 19, could the Leader of the Government give us an update on what is happening with the GATT negotiations representing trade in general, but more specifically whether there has been a bit more optimism on coming to an agreement on the agriculture subsidies.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sorry I do not have anything further to report to our last discussion on that matter in this place.

I can simply tell the honourable senator that my cabinet colleague, Mr. Wilson, the Minister for International Trade, has been in touch with a number of players, most recently with Mr. Frans Andriessen, the commissioner for agriculture of the European community. On the basis of these discussions, Mr. Wilson remains confident that all parties to the discussions, and in particular the Europeans, are genuinely seeking a resolution of the problem.

[Senator Murray.]

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

SCHEDULE OF MEETINGS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to Senator Molgat's earlier question.

I would be grateful if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could include in his inquiries the scheduled travels in Alberta of this committeee in the week directly after Remembrance Day. The folks in southern Alberta are quite keen to know whether this committee, or any part of it, will come down to our area.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I shall be glad to do so, honourable senators.

COMMUNICATIONS CANADA

COMMUNITY RADIO FOR FRENCH-SPEAKING PEOPLE OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Hon. Jean-Pierre Simard: Honorable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Governement in the Senate. I know that he cannot answer my question right away. I ask him to urge the Department of Communications or the governement in general to provide us with a report on the matter of community radio for French-speaking people outside Quebec.

At a time when we speak of preserving and promoting French-speaking communities, I am glad to see that this government has done more and has settled problems through appropriate action and has often joined with groups in an effort to help these minorities live a better life.

I remember that five years ago when the Department of Communications, at our request, has released funds in the amount of $5 million, which is the federal contribution to in a $10 million program. I can tell you, honorable senators that in my opinion, this program has been a success.

I am told that funds for this commitment have run out. I certainly can understand it given the popularity of that program. A few important projects have been achieved in New-Brunswick and in Western Canada.

Would the Leader of the government in the Senate undertake to table, as soon as possible, an analysis or an assessment of that contribution and of this generous program the federal governement shared into. I know that in the West, given the popularity and the success of that program, they consider establishing other community radios in other regions. Before taking that next step, the federal government will probably have an assessment done. If it is possible, I will ask for the results of that assessment to be tabled in the Senate.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honorable senators, it will be my pleasure to obtain the information sought by the honorable senator.

THE ENVIRONMENT

GREAT WHALE PROJECT—EFFECT OF DAMS ON GREENHOUSE EMISSIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the government leader and it is a question on the environment. Some time towards the end of September or early October there were environment hearings in New York to assess the Great Whale project.

Mr. John Rudd, one of the experts in this question who has been doing some research work for the federal government in the province of Manitoba wanted to appear. Mr. Rudd is a scientist with the institute in Manitoba. For one reason or another, someone in the federal system denied him the right to appear, even though he has been doing research on the very question of the effect of large dams on greenhouse emissions.

Apparently some people in the federal government claim that the research is not valid. Yet there are others who have worked with Mr. Rudd who say it is extremely important information to put forward.

Can the minister tell us what information he has in that regard, and if he does not have it now, could he find out for us why it was that Mr. Rudd was refused permission to appear, and by whom?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, unless an honourable senator wished to proceed with an inquiry at this time, I would propose that we might adjourn to the call of the bell, awaiting a message from the House of Commons concerning Bill C-40.

The Hon. The Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: The bells are now ringing, I am informed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I think they are holding the vote. The bells have stopped.

Senator Murray: The bells have stopped. The division has taken place. That being the case, the message should not be long delayed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that we adjourn until 3:30 or to the call of the bell?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that this bill be read the second time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the labour dispute that we are called upon to resolve today is 25 months old. It has been the subject of the best efforts of the government to try to facilitate a settlement. But, as I indicated earlier, these efforts have been to no avail.

There is also no doubt that the parties to the dispute have been extended every possible opportunity to resolve their differences without legislation. I do not think I have to remind honourable senators of how severe are the repercussions on ordinary Canadians and on the business sector of a prolonged postal strike. All the alternatives have been canvassed without success. Regrettably, we now find ourselves in a position where we must pass legislation.

The 25 months that have elapsed during the present dispute are against a background that I think is familiar to all honourable senators—a background of many years' duration of very poor labour relations in the post office. That has been the finding of successive conciliators, mediators and others who have had to deal with this situation.

Let me, however, give a brief overview of the circumstances surrounding this legislation. The current negotiations between Canada Post and CUPW represent the first round of bargaining between these parties since the 1988 decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board to re-organize the structure of the bargaining units at Canada Post. The negotiations were aimed at arriving at a new, all-encompassing collective agreement for some 45,000 operational employees to incorporate seven previous collective agreements which expired on July 31, 1989.

[Translation]

On September 12, 1989, the union filed a notice of dispute. In the following year, the conciliator who was named to help the parties held 78 meetings with them. That shows how slow progress was. Admittedly, the large number of demands tabled by both parties made the task very complex to begin with. Furthermore, the provisions of seven collective agreements had to be combined into a single one. These two factors alone should explain the formidable size of the task.

[English]

Discussions went on with the conciliation officer focusing on the grievance arbitration backlog. With the assistance of the conciliation officer, both parties signed a Memorandum of Agreement in February, 1990. It was intended to hasten the resolution of these grievances, but, unfortunately, not one of the other major issues was resolved. The dispute was sensitive and complex, and the conciliation officer informed the Minister of Labour that he was unable to bring the parties to a settlement.

The chief obstacle, namely, merging the seven collective agreements under one umbrella, was a major impediment to the attainment of an agreement. Thus, on October 31, 1990, the Minister of Labour constituted a conciliation board to deal with the dispute.

[Translation]

This board was chaired by Marc Lapointe, a former chairman of the Canada Labour Relations Board. The board held some 60 conciliation sessions from January of this year until it issued its report on August 12. Despite that, the progress made was insufficient. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, the parties themselves had each appointed their own representative to the Board: Arnold Masters for the management side and Jacques Desmarais for the union. These two representatives agreed on the appointment of Mr. Lapointe as chairman, a choice that was ratified by both parties to the dispute. So the choice of members was not the stumbling block at this stage of negotiations, but rather the size of the gap between the parties.

[English]

The conciliation board's report was released to the parties by the Minister of Labour on August 16 of this year. The conciliation board observed that, while it had not been able to bring the two parties to an agreement, it had managed to reduce the number of items in dispute.

The board succeeded in bringing some 300 unresolved union demands into sharper focus by identifying the remaining nine major and 20 minor issues separating the parties. The board also pointed out that the absence of a healthy labour relations environment at Canada Post had frustrated the members of the commission in their efforts to find a settlement.

On August 16, the same day as the board's report was released, the parties used its findings as a basis for further discussion and began direct negotiations. However, with no settlement in sight, CUPW initiated rotating strikes at various locations across the country on August 24, eight days later.

The Minister of Labour contacted both Canada Post Corporation President Donald Lander and CUPW President Jean-Claude Parrot on August 30 of this year. The minister impressed upon them the need for both sides to make significant progress in direct negotiations over the impending Labour Day weekend.

[Translation]

On September 2, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Labour asked qualified officials at Labour Canada to evaluate the progress which had been made in the days since the Conciliation Board's report was published. Their report was not encouraging. It became increasingly clear that the government would have to act in the public interest to prevent the problems from worsening. The Minister of Labour then met with the parties and after analyzing the various options available at that stage of the conflict, he decided to give them another chance by providing the services of a mediator. The minister thus wanted to respond positively to the expression of a real desire of the parties to reach a settlement.

[English]

Chief Justice Alan B. Gold of the Quebec Superior Court was appointed as mediator in the postal dispute on September 5 last.

Under the proposed legislation that is before my colleagues, the term of each of the seven collective agreements is extended to July 31, 1993. The bill also provides that an arbitrator will be appointed and given the task of amalgamating these seven collective agreements.

Extensive conciliation and mediation assistance have been extended to the parties throughout the bargaining process. One of the best-known mediator in our country kindly accepted to put his time and his abilities at the disposal of the parties. What else could have been done to help the collective bargaining process? Because the conflict could once again harm our economy, but above all, the well being of Canadians, I think that we must as soon as possible pass a bill to put an end to this conflict.

[English]

With this appointment, the parties agreed to return to work, resume normal postal operations, and participate in good faith during the mediation talks. Judge Gold spent six weeks on this mediation effort and gave the process his undivided attention. On several occasions, Judge Gold made major adjustments to his professional and personal commitments in order to accommodate this responsibility in a selfless and public-spirited fashion.

On October 23, less than one week ago, Judge Gold advised the Minister of Labour, whom he felt had negotiated, had bargained in good faith, that there were difficulties that just could not be resolved.

The minister, Mr. Danis, as I am sure he will explain when he appears before the Committee of the Whole, delayed the introduction of the legislation over the past weekend in order to give the parties one final opportunity to negotiate an agreement by themselves. Regrettably, that last effort has also failed. Therefore, I urge honourable senators to give this legislation expeditious passage so that it can receive Royal Assent and dispel the uncertainty that now exists as to the continuation of postal services in the country.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, Bill C-40 was introduced in the other place yesterday. The intent of the bill, as Senator Murray has said, is to prevent a postal strike from occurring and to impose arbitration on the parties.

By introducing such legislation when both sides have stated that an agreement may be near, the government has once again undermined the process of collective bargaining. In fact, I suggest the government is redefining the traditional process of collective bargaining. It is progressively interfering more deeply into the collective bargaining process, interfering first at the strike level, after some period of striking, then interfering earlier in the strike period, and now interfering by threatening to introduce legislation even before there is a strike. It is implying that postal service is an essential service to the public without specifically designating it as such.

Bill C-40 effectively prevents CUPW from going on strike and the Canada Post Corporation from locking out workers. It extends the present collective agreement date to July 31, 1993. It states that the minister will appoint an arbitrator who will first determine the matters on which the parties are in agreement and then incorporate those matters into the collective agreement. The arbitrator will then determine which conclusions of the conciliation board report can be incorporated into the collective agreement.

To quote from the legislation, the arbitrator will take

> . . . .cognizance of the [conciliation board] report referred to in paragraph (c) and the summary of the corporate plan, arbitrate all matters not covered by paragraphs (b) and (c) and render a decision in respect thereof in such form as will enable the decision to be incorporated into the collective agreement . . . .

Two things will provide the basis for the arbitrator's decision: first, the conciliation board report which was agreed to by neither party, and no agreement being reached as a result of that report; and, two, Canada Post's corporate plan which has created stumbling blocks in the negotiations. This morning, an amendment proposed by Minister Danis and carried takes into account those matters upon which substantial agreement has been reached since the report of the conciliation board was presented.

This amendment to section 7 (b) of the legislation allows the arbitrator to determine matters where the parties were "in substantial agreement" and to incorporate those matters into the collective agreement. The objective is to ensure that any progress made by the parties since August will not be lost.

However, the arbitrator will be the one to decide what has been agreed upon. He or she will determine where there has been a "substantial" agreement. Someone has to decide where there has or has not been a substantial agreement. It will be the arbitrator.

That decision of the arbitrator does not have to be brought to Parliament. It will simply become part of the collective agreement. By passing this legislation, we are delegating that decision. We are putting the word "substantial" in and leaving it for the arbitrator to decide.

As Senator Murray has pointed out, CUPW has been without a contract since July 31, 1989. Negotiations, as he has chronicled, have been lengthy and complex. Over 360 demands were tabled by the parties while also attempting to merge seven collective agreements into one comprehensive contract covering 45,000 employees.

On October 23, 1991, CUPW was in a legal strike position but Jean-Claude Parrot, CUPW president, refused to walk away from the bargaining table. He did not issue a strike call after mediation broke down, because he felt the sides were close enough to continue negotiations without a mediator. As I recall, both he and the postal corporation stated that they thought they were close to an agreement. Mr. Danis, at the time, promised that if an arbitrator was appointed the government would try to ensure that all the items already agreed upon by the parties would be included in any settlement imposed by the arbitrator, again so that progress made over this long and difficult period of negotiation would not be lost.

Although the minister had announced that he would introduce the legislation to end the postal dispute on October 25, he agreed, as Senator Murray has said, to wait another weekend upon hearing statements by both Mr. Parrot of CUPW and Mr. Harold Dunstan, Canada Post vice-president, that the dispute could be resolved through further negotiation.

On the morning of October 28, yesterday, CUPW issued a press release stating:

> . . . the union believes that a negotiated settlement is still in reach, but that legislation would remove any pressure from Canada Post to negotiate.

That is the same story we had with the legislation regarding civil servants, and the same with regard to the grain handlers. The threat of legislation, the imminence of legislation, the habit of bringing in legislation, changes the whole chemistry of collective bargaining and removes pressure on the parties to reach an agreement.

The press release went on to say:

> There is no strike and no national emergency.

To repeat the CUPW press release, the threat of such legislation would remove any pressure from Canada Post to negotiate.

It turns out that CUPW was right. A letter was produced in yesterday's committee meeting in the other place from Mr. Courville, Corporate Manager, Labour Relations, Canada Post. The letter is addressed to J.-C. Parrot, National President, Canadian Union of Postal Workers, 280 Metcalfe Street, Ottawa. Remember that the hope was that progress would be solidified.

The letter from Mr. Courville says:

> This is to advise you that any and all of the Corporation's positions, offers and proposals made through the mediator or otherwise after midnight of August 23, 1991 are withdrawn. This includes any language, positions, offers and proposals that were accepted by the Union with the exception of clauses signed by the parties during the mediation process.
> The Corporation's position now reverts to the recommendations of the conciliation board chaired by Mr. M. Lapointe.

Interestingly enough, the letter was dated October 29 but was received by Mr. Parrot at 1 p.m. on October 28, approximately one hour after the legislation was tabled in the house. A typographical error, claims Mr. Dunstan, and he can tell us about that if he comes as a witness before Committee of the Whole. Mr. Dunstan stated before the committee last evening that he has carried such a letter — carried, I guess, in his pocket — since the meetings with Judge Gold began, just in case. You remember what that letter said. It was carried around, just in case, apparently, to advise that all of the corporation's positions, offers and proposals made through the mediator or otherwise are withdrawn. This is a rather odd thing for a party to do that is negotiating in good faith. Clearly, Canada Post is tailoring its proposals to the legislation and no longer feels any specific pressure to negotiate an agreement, which is always the case when legislation looms over negotiation.

However, the amendment proposed by Mr. Danis will incorporate those matters on which substantial agreement has been made, and will help temper the corporation's position as contained in Mr. Courville's letter. Certainly the motivation for Minister Danis' initiative is a worthy one.

However, that letter indicates that Canada Post's position is that no agreements have been reached. That must be distinguished from Mr. Danis' position and what he is trying to accomplish in the legislation. It does not change the fact that Canada Post's position is that no agreements have been reached. How can the arbitrator decide that there has been substantial agreement on any issue when Canada Post denies that any agreement has been reached? That is their position in writing.

We have the union's position; now for Mr. Danis' position: Although there was no strike or lockout, or threat of one, Mr. Danis introduced legislation which would impose an agreement upon the parties. The minister felt, according to his testimony to the committee, that the parties would be unable to reach an agreement regardless of how long they negotiated. The minister also stated that it was in the national interest to keep the mail moving, and thus legislation was necessary to prevent a strike or lockout.

By introducing legislation, the government is continuing to send out a number of messages and this is how those messages are being read. First, the government no longer wholeheartedly supports the collective bargaining process. Second, the government does not believe in the right to strike. Third, the government will not declare postal service an essential service, yet introduces back-to-work legislation before the workers walk out. That is Mr. Danis' position.

Finally, I come to Canada Post's position, Harold Dunstan's position. Canada Post's position is made clearly by Mr. Courville's letter to Mr. Parrot. Regardless of what progress has been made, everything following the conciliation board report is revoked. The purpose of the letter was to ensure that Canada Post would not be in a position where an offer was made and they received nothing in return. Although the amendment allows for matters to be included in the arbitrator's decision, Mr. Dunstan claims that no real agreements have been reached and that the lists of agreements drawn up by both parties were dissimilar. When Mr. Dunstan was asked about progress made by Judge Gold he said that his position had not been documented,—and I do not know whether everyone realizes this—but since the parties did not deal face to face, no one knew what went on in either room.

While Mr. Dunstan felt that Canada Post had been fair to its employees, offering benefits such as recognition awards and improved facilities, he admitted that the corporate plan was nowhere near in line with the union's interests. Union demands, he claimed, would prevent Canada Post from ever achieving its corporate plan.

Canada Post says it does not welcome the legislation as it legislates the contract and not the culture, which is what really needs to be worked on. Mr. Dunstan also stated that he believed CUPW had acted irresponsibly at the bargaining table.

The union remains convinced that there is no need for the legislation. Union members returned to work with the belief that an agreement could be reached, and to prevent inconvenience to the public. However, the union members now feel as though they are being penalized for having made efforts to reach an agreement without a strike. This experience is teaching them, as it has taught other unions, that the government will force an agreement.

Of course, that is acceptable to many members of the Canadian public. Many of them accept that an agreement may be forced, but it is worthwhile taking a moment to consider how that looks to the workers who authorized their unions to look after their complaints through the process of collective bargaining, and now have an agreement forced upon them by the government.

Bill C-40 provides for an arbitrator, and the arbitrator's duties indicate to CUPW that the conciliation report will apply, especially in view of the Canada Post letter saying that all offers, all language, et cetera, is withdrawn as of August, 1991, which position, of course, the union does not support.

The decision to incorporate the conciliator's report into the collective agreement has serious ramifications. If the government is now treating a conciliator—and it seems to me this is what it comes to—as, in effect, an arbitrator, unions will be much more cautious in future disputes where a conciliator is appointed because they will have to consider him an arbitrator in conciliator's clothing. From the union's perspective, there is no doubt that introduction of this legislation has undermined the process of collective bargaining, given that both sides believed an agreement could be reached and that no strike or lockout had been threatened.

• (1600)

In summary, honourable senators, this legislation, as did Bill C-37 dealing with the grain handlers in Thunder Bay, largely ignores the interests of Canadian workers, favoring instead the corporation. The intent of Bill C-40 is to deny the union members their legal right to negotiate a better agreement. It clearly puts the priorities of the corporation first. It provides Canada Post with the opportunity to backtrack on all matters that have reached substantial agreement since the conciliation board report. The corporation immediately took advantage of that opportunity.

Although Minister Danis' amendment provides that an arbitrator will include such matters in a final agreement, the arbitrator cannot know if substantial agreement has been reached.

If Canada Post says "There has not been such an agreement," which they can do on any one of the items, this means that progress which has been made on issues such as child care and pensions for part-time workers may be lost.

So that is where we are now. As always is the case, public convenience and necessity, as viewed by the government, is offered as justification for abandoning long collective bargaining. As Senator Murray has pointed out, it is clear that the collective bargaining here has been long. However, if the government believes that collective bargaining is inappropriate unless it succeeds the way the government thinks it should proceed, why do we keep waltzing through these charades? Shouldn't it say that it will designate the postal service as an essential service and save everyone a lot of time and money? Twenty-five months of futile negotiations. Instead, it seems to me it wants it both ways, saying "We believe in collective bargaining, but not in this case." The exceptions are becoming the principle rather than exceptions to it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: If Senator Murray speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in rising briefly to close this debate, let me make just one or two points.

First of all, I am not here and the government is not here with a brief from Canada Post. Canada Post is an arm's length crown corporation. That is the way it was set up by our predecessors in office. That is the way it is. The vice-president of Canada Post will be one of our witnesses in Committee of the Whole this afternoon. I invite honourable senators to examine him and cross-examine him on the policies of Canada Post, on its corporate plan, on the negotiations which have now gone on for 25 months, and on the state of labour relations generally in that corporation. Have at him. He is here to speak for his corporation.

I am here to speak for the government, however. I must say that the accusation that we are interfering with or undermining the process of collective bargaining comes, rather strangely, 25 months after the previous agreement had expired. I remind honourable senators that rotating strikes had already begun some weeks ago, and what was destined to happen again if Parliament did not act was another round of rotating strikes. I know I do not need to remind honourable senators of the inconvenience and, yes, the hardship and misery that is visited upon many ordinary Canadians when there is strike action at the post office.

Twenty-five months this present dispute has gone on. We are acting now following the failure of a conciliation officer; following the failure of a conciliation board; following the failure of mediation efforts to arrive at a final settlement. It is no secret, honourable senators, that the country cannot endure a prolonged postal strike or strike action.

Senator Frith: Why not designate them?

Senator Murray: Nor can it endure rotating strikes such as we had earlier. Both parties know and the country knows that Parliament has always acted in the past, and Parliament will have to act in this case before we create further uncertainty and disruption affecting individuals and the Canadian economy.

The Leader of the Opposition suggests that we should consider designating the postal workers as providing an essential service. I do not think I am in a position to comment on that suggestion. Certainly it is an option, and certainly I would say that we have to consider all our options as a country, given the sorry history of labour relations in the postal service in this country.

Honourable senators will have an opportunity to question the the Minister of Labour, whose bill this is and who is in the position not only to explain the bill but to provide a history of the collective bargaining process, the conciliation process, and the mediation process as it proceeded and came to an unhappy end. We will then hear from the representatives of the union headed by Mr. Parrot, its president, and finally from the vice-president of Canada Post.

I will leave the matter, therefore, in the hands of honourable senators to obtain the information that they need to obtain in the process to expedite the passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole?

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Gerald R. Ottenheimer in the Chair.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Mr. Chairman, we saw the Honourable Minister of Labour only a few weeks ago. I expressed the hope that we would not be seeing him again under such circumstances, but those hopes have been dashed. He is here to elaborate on Bill C-40 before the committee and to take any questions. The minister has a brief opening statement to make.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-40, an Act to provide for the continuation of postal services. Shall we hear the minister?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to agreement, the Honourable Marcel Danis, Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Mr. Danis, if you have an opening statement, the senators would be pleased to hear it.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As you know, honourable senators, I had to table Bill C-40, an Act to provide for the continuation of postal services.

Unfortunately, honourable senators, I have had to do that because I have come to the conclusion that the parties were not able by themselves to settle the dispute. You are aware, no doubt, honourable senators, that this collective agreement expired August 31, 1989. At that time Labour Canada appointed an experienced conciliation officer, Mr. Andre Courchesne of Montreal, who met with the parties, had over 60 conciliation sessions and was not able to bring the parties together. We then appointed a conciliation commission made up of the union appointee, Jacques Desmarais, and the appointee by Canada Post, Mr. Arnold Masters. Both parties is agreed on the chairman of the conciliation board, Marc Lapointe, a former chairman of the Canada Labour Relations Board.

The conciliation board met for practically 23 months and was not able to settle all the disputes. I then called into my office the vice-president of Canada Post, Mr. Herald Dunstan, and Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot, President of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. I suggested to them that I would be willing to ask Judge Alan B. Gold to serve as a mediator in the dispute, provided Mr. Parrot ordered his people back to work. When I did that the rotating strikes were approximately in their tenth day. It took me approximately two days to arrange a back-to-work protocol between Mr. Parrot an Mr. Dunstan. And they did go back to work.

The judge met with the parties for close to seven weeks and told me that, even though the parties did negotiate in good faith and were sincere in their best efforts to try and reach an agreement, he felt that the parties would not be able to reach an agreement.

It is at that time that I decided to introduce Bill C-40. We must remember, however, that at the start of this dispute there were approximately 310 items under discussion by both parties; 260 of which were at the request of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and 50 of those at the request of Canada Post. So that we did start this whole process with 310 items. A tremendous amount of progress has been made. A lot of progress was made by the conciliator and the commission. I am told by both parties that substantial progress was made under Judge Gold.

Unfortunately, we had to introduce Bill C-40. It is my best judgment, honourable senators, that the parties left by themselves are simply not able to reach an agreement, period. Both parties separately discussed with me the issues on which they were not able to reach full agreement. There were approximately eight or nine of them, which I would classify as monetary issues, on which there may eventually have been an agreement, but on one issue I do not care how much time we would have given these parties, I do not believe that it would have been possible for them to reach an agreement: the issue of the 130,000 outstanding grievances. The backlog is unbelievable.

With that in the background, honourable senators, I felt that Bill C-40 would be the way to solve the dispute. It is unfortunate that we have to introduce the legislation for the continuation of postal services, but it is in the best interests of the workers of CUPW, the best interests of Canada Post and the best interests of the country. Thank you.

Senator Frith: Mr. Minister, there is nothing personal in this. It is always a pleasure to see members of the government here. It is always good to have the opportunity to discuss with members of the government policy as well as legislation. In particular, we always seem to get along quite well with you. However I do hope that this procedure will not become a bad habit. I say "not become a bad habit", because we on this side feel that legislation and the threat of legislation has a seriously molignant effect on collective bargainning.

That leads me to ask you how sensitive and how conscious do you continue to be—that is, I hope you continue to be—about the effect that legislation and the habit of introducing legislation has on the collective bargaining process. Would you like to comment on that?

Mr. Danis: I am a very strong believer, as honourable senators know, of our collective bargaining process in this country. If I might remind honourable senators, at the federal level approximately 93 to 94 percent of the collective agreements are renegotiated through the normal collective process. Unfortunately, there are cases where it is my best judgment that the public interest warrants legislation. This is an exceptional case.

I know, honourable senators, that you will be meeting with two other witnesses this afternoon from both parties, but I have had a number of meetings with both of them and I cannot see how they can solve the grievance issue. It is unfortunate, but it is not because of lack of good faith on their part. It appears to me that it is one of those issues which is practically impossible to solve. That is why in the legislation that is proposed to you it is a form of binding arbitration on the issues on which they cannot agree. The first step would be that the issues on which they can agree would be signed off and the arbitrator would confirm that. The conciliation board report does take care of a number of issues by incorporating the conciliation board report into the legislation. I feel that we do not lose all the gains that have been made by both parties in this dispute. It will definitely shorten the time that the arbitrator will take. Even though I do not favour legislation of this type, I believe that there are certain cases where, unfortunately, it must be done.

Senator Frith: You say that, 93 per cent to 94 per cent of the time, bargaining results in an agreement.

Do you have any studies on what effect the legislation threatened and, in fact, imposed has on forcing those agreements? You have separated them completely; you say 93 to 94 per cent are settled and reach agreement, and that with the rest you have to impose a settlement. Is there any influence on the collective bargaining process in those other cases?

Mr. Danis: Unfortunately the other cases always appear to be the same ones. They appear to deal with grain handlers and they appear to deal with the post office. If I can separate both issues, there appears to be, in my opinion, a labour relations problem at Canada Post.

Senator Frith: That is an understatement.

Mr. Danis: Exactly. There is a labour relations problem at Canada Post. The conciliation board report even said that the conciliation board officers felt that there was actual, palpable hatred between the parties when they were negotiating. That is in writing in their report. That surprised me. I also understand that both sides are to blame for this sorry state of affairs. But to their credit, I must say that the intervention of Judge Gold had a very positive effect, I believe, on both parties. I think the climate of labour relations has improved, and as proof of that I cite the tremendous amount of progress that was made recently. I guess it was not improved enough for them to reach agreement.

Senator Frith: You might be able to clear up something that was reported when Judge Gold withdrew. It was said in the press that he had laid down an ultimatum to the two sides, that they either agree on such and such or else he would pull out. When they failed to do so he had to pull out in order to save face, to quote the expression that was used. What do you know about that?

Mr. Danis: Unfortunately I know very little of the Gold mediation. I understand that the judge works that way. I was not kept aware by him of the developments of the mediation under his directorship. At no time was I made aware of issues. When I tell honourable senators of certain issues that were not settled, I was, in turn, told about them by the parties, not by the judge.

Senator Frith: You hope that gains made during this long collective bargaining process will not be lost. That, I understand, was the motivation for your amendment introduced in the other place. We have had to compare that amendment to the letter from Mr. Courville that he had been carrying around to give to Mr. Parrot, saying that he was withdrawing everything that had been offered unless it was the subject of a written agreement. Do you think your clause will solve that problem, because it looks like a serious problem if you go back to square one.

Mr. Danis: I believe that the letter to which you are referring is an unfortunate letter. I have been told that it is "normal procedure in the case of negotiations to do these types of things". I certainly do not believe that it was a helpful letter that brought a positive light to the negotiations and the settlement we are trying to achieve. I do count, however, on the good faith—I do not believe that the delivery of this letter was carried out in bad faith—of both parties to meet with the arbitrator.

Senator Frith: Unfortunate faith but not bad faith. Minister, the legislation before us is also, as you have said, an exception. It is a further exception because it intervened in the collective bargaining process before there was a strike. I think, as I said, that you understate the case when you say you think there are problems between the two parties. I am concerned that by interfering before there was even a strike, and thereby forcing back the people who are apparently in a state of animosity, to put it mildly, you add to that animosity psychologically.

Mr. Danis: I do not believe, with respect, that we are doing that. It was my best judgment at the time, and it still is, that unfortunately there was no way to reach an agreement. I was careful before I recommended to my colleagues that we proceed with legislation. I met with both parties separately to determine if there were any open avenues that would lead to a settlement. It became clear to me that it was not possible. Again, we certainly do not like to proceed with legislation of this type, but you must take into account the 12 days of rotating strikes, the violence that was involved during those 12 days and also the fact that I had really run out of mediators. Again, I could not see the possibility of appointing another mediator. There was only one who came to my mind who would have been very good and that is the Prime Minister. He was busy on something else. I think he would have done a great job.

Senator Frith: Domestic and international.

Mr. Danis: So not having any other mediator, I felt it would be in the national interest to proceed. I told both parties at that time that I would proceed with legislation.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: It seems to me that in this case you are taking quite a big step. It is not a matter of forcing people back to the table where there is a strike. First, there is no strike; secondly, they were prepared to negotiate. You said that they had to go back and negotiate, and in effect you are legislating an agreement subject, at least, to the role of the arbitrator. What was at risk if there was no strike? Why not let the parties bargain? Why not let them knock their heads together if they were prepared to bargain, they were prepared to go back to the table and the mail was going to be delivered? Why would the government interfere in the process and, at the same time, say they believe in the process?

Mr. Danis: There are a number of reasons. The main reason is that we had had 12 days of rotating strikes.

Senator Frith: But they were not threatened this time.

Mr. Danis: True. Second, there are over 130,000 grievances, because of the sorry state of labour relations, and they were accumulating on a daily basis. There are also, I believe, 71 disciplinary cases from incidents that occurred during the rotating strikes that are not settled. The people involved in those 71 incidents, the 71 members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, given that the collective agreement was not in effect during the duration of the strike, were left in limbo. That is why we have a clause in the legislation dealing with those issues.

Apart from those reasons the main reason is the fact that I came to the conclusion that there was no possibility for them to reach agreement; just no way. I did not think that further negotiations or even further mediation assistance could produce an agreement. I even suggested something to the parties last Friday, when I was told how far apart they were. I was surprised to see how close they were when they both confirmed to me what they could not agree on, and I asked them to go through the weekend to settle the monetary issues not resolved. I said, "If you come back to me on Sunday night and the grievance issue is still unresolved, and if you both agree to leave it with me, I will deal with the issue." I talked to them on Sunday night and on Monday and they could not agree on the other issues. So there was no possibility of them getting an agreement, no matter how long it took.

Senator Frith: It is clear that that was your decision, not the parties' decision, that they could not reach an agreement. They were not the ones who stated that an agreement cannot be reached. You, the government, made the decision that these people who had been negotiating for that length of time could not reach an agreement. In other words, there is no question that they did not ask for this legislation. They did not say, "We can't agree, please come in and force it." You said, "I have decided you can't agree", and brought the legislation in.

Mr. Danis: I told them that I would introduce legislation. But it would be interesting to see, if you put the question to them—not the question, "Did you ask for legislation." I am sure the answer is "no" to that question, but the question as to whether they could have reached an agreement.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, you indicated, Mr. Danis, that you have not met judge Gold. Is there a reason why you did not have any discussions with him? Since he spent much time discussing with both parties, don't you think he could have given you useful information?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I did not say I did not meet with judge Gold. What I said was that judge Gold did not inform me of the state of the negotiations. As I understand how he works, everything he is told by both parties remains confidential. I asked him, and this is his answer: "Ask the parties. If the parties wish to tell you, that is their choice." That is the way he works and that is why the parties always trust him.

Senator Molgat: He has to maintain the confidence of both parties.

Mr. Danis: That's right.

Senator Molgat: If both parties said: We are ready to free Judge Gold from this commitment. You are now going to appoint an arbitrator. Could that arbitrator use the advice of Judge Gold?

Mr. Danis: Certainly, according to our Canada Labour Code, the arbitrator could not ask Judge Gold to testify before him. What was said to Judge Gold is confidential and the Canada Labour Code recognizes that.

However, I think that the parties would benefit from following the suggestions that you just made. The other option, if you allow me, Senator, is the one I suggested to the parties. When I learned that there remained a few outstanding issues over the three years, I suggested to them a binding arbitration without a bill. I was still trying to avoid the bill. That did not seem to be agreeable to them.

Senator Molgat: Regarding the monetary issues, could you give us an idea of the amounts involved, did you figure out how large the gap was between the parties?

M. Danis: Mr. Chairman, no, I cannot give you the overall figure. I know, for example, that one of the outstanding issues is the union's request for a lowering of the six-week leave entitlement from 30 to 25 years of service. This is what I was told by Mr. Parrot. This alone would have amounted to about $4 to $4.5 million over the duration of the contract. I have the figure for that but not for the other outstanding issues.

Senator Frith: Could I ask another question, Mr. Minister? During your answers to the questions I put to you, I thought you said that one of the problems that motivated your initiative was the grievance arbitration backlog. I note from your speaking notes for a speech at second reading in the other place that you make the point that "Initial discussions during the Conciliation Officer stage centered on the grievance arbitration backlog." But you point out that "with the assistance of the officer, the parties signed a memorandum of agreement in February 1990 designed to expedite its resolution", and that that stage "did not result in the resolution of any other major issues."

Am I correct that the parties had entered into an agreement and signed a Memorandum of Agreement as far as the grievance arbitration backlog was concerned?

Mr. Danis: I am not aware of that, Senator.

Senator Frith: This document is something that comes out of Labour Canada and states "The Honourable Marcel Danis, Minister of Labour, speaking notes for second reading of the Postal Services Continuation Act, 1991 in the House of Commons." I am not reading from Hansard. I am reading from what your department put out. However, you are not familiar with these speaking notes?

Mr. Danis: I do not deny the facts that are there. According to what I have been told, the main issue which prevents a settlement of this dispute c'est l'impossibilite d'en arriver a une entente on the grievance backlog. There are other issues also, but I believe that is the main one.

Senator Frith: But there is an agreement on that mattter if I am not mistaken, that is in February 1990 an agreement signed specifically about the grievance arbitration backlog.

M. Danis: Obviously the agreement does not work since we are still in the same situation now. I have it from both parties that the crucial issue on which they have made the least progress lately is this one. I think this is confirmed by the fact we will always have 130,000 problems. Furthermore I am told by the union that between one third and one quarter of its whole budget . . .

[English]

—of the union budget of CUPW goes to pay lawyers for grievances. I believe the amount that I was given by Mr. Parrot, is that last year it cost him $4.5 million to pay lawyers to try to settle the grievance issue, and they are not making progress. I presume from that that Canada Post would spend the same amount of money, but they are not making progress.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: So Mr. Speaker, it is not the fact that they cannot agree on that point, but the fact that even with an agreement, they still have a hard time trying to enforce it.

Mr. Danis: Yes, Senator.

[English]

I also understand that one of the issues is who they appoint. I do not think they can agree on who to appoint for the grievance arbitrator. I believe they spend hours and hours on lists and they cannot agree on that. So if they cannot agree on that, they cannot solve the dispute.

[Translation]

Senator David: Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Minister a very, very naïve question probably. As I understand, you are appointing an arbitrator. This arbitrator has a 90 day delay to settle what could not be settled in two years. What are your hopes of solution from this arbitrator? Since there is only eight or nine serious outstanding monetary differences, you may hope that he will be able to settle them. But what about the 130,000 grievances? If it took a day to settle one grievance, you can imagine the number of days needed. Do you hope that in 90 days he will be able to settle such an impossible situation? As you already know, four bodies or persons have already looked at these problems. Please forgive the naïvety of my question, but I would like to have an answer.

Mr. Danis: Thank you Mr. Chairman. I know that the arbitrator would have three months to try to solve the problem. But as I said earlier, a lot of progress has been made following the efforts of Mr. Courchesne, the work of the Commission headed by Mr. Lapointe, and, especially, the mediation of Judge Gold.

Still, some issues remain to be settled. I am confident that the arbitrator, provided the senators give their approval, will be able to solve these problems with the powers given to him. As for grievances, the bill provides for the appointment of arbitrators. I hope that they will be able to come to an agreement on those grievances. Even though there are 130,000, the two sides tell me that a number of them are similar. So, it could be another story, but I understand there is still a lot of work to be done by the arbitrator.

Senator David: Do you have the power to extend the arbitrator mandate if the negotiations or hearings are going well?

Mr. Danis: Yes senator, it is provided in the bill.

Senator Murray: Mr. Speaker, if there are no more questions or comments, I will thank the minister, Mr. Danis, for his testimony before the Committee. Now, if the Committee wishes, I would like to invite the union officials to come before us.

• (1640)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Mr. Chairman, we have with us representatives of the union. I want to welcome them and ask Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot to introduce his colleagues and to make a short opening statement.

Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot, National President of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers: Honourable senators, first of all, I thank you for this opportunity to appear before you. I am accompanied by two colleagues who are on the bargaining team with me, namely Jeannie Campbell, from Cape-Breton, and Lynn Bue, from Alberta. Both of them are postal workers: one is an inside worker and the other an outside worker. They are presently on the bargaining team, but as soon as the labour dispute is over, they will resume their jobs.

A couple of minutes ago, I heard the matter of the conflect particularly with regards to the grievance and arbitration process, being discussed. I think there is some confusion over what is going on.

At the bargaining table today, the settlement of 130,000 grievances that have accumulated is not an issue. Those grievances have already been referred to arbitral mediation, at least those that existed before February 1990. Since that time, there has been a further accumulation of grievances. We ask that all grievances accumulated on the date the new collective agreement is signed also be sent to arbitral mediation, so that we can make a fresh start, without having to deal with all accumulated grievances, otherwise the new procedure would not be able to function. That is the issue we are trying to negotiate.

As for failure to agree on arbitrators, we are talking about a situation where according to existing collective agreements, arbitrators are already provided. At the bargaining table, there was a request from the Canada Post Corporation to remove some of the arbitrators, obviously because there were decisions the employer did not appreciate.

We realize there may sometimes be reasons for allowing the parties to decide, for instance, to remove an arbitrator if he is no longer available or takes years to hand down a decision. However, when we are talking about recognized and respected arbitrators with a lot of experience, who are constantly handing down decisions and who know about collective agreements, we fail to see why those arbitrators should be removed from collective bargaining.

The Canada Post Corporation offered us an additional benefit that would give employees six weeks annual leave after 28 years instead of 30 years, if we agreed to get rid of certain arbitrators the Corporation doesn't like. Need I remind you, we are not in the business of selling arbitrators! As far as we are concerned, the arbitrators who are there were selected by both parties. We don't always like their decisions. However, I don't think that should be mixed up with the benefits being sought at the bargaining table. Otherwise we would have a situation where the arbitrators would say: After the bargaining process, one of the two parties is going to pay for the arbitrator to be removed. I don't think that is helpful. In any case, I thought this clarification might be useful.

The union was also very concerned with the law that was introduced. That is why I took the opportunity before the legislative committee yesterday to explain that the contents of the legislation would very clearly impose the report of the conciliation board chaired by Marc Lapointe. This report is already several months old and both parties have gone far beyond its recommendations since then, either by initialing clauses or by making agreements in principle that are not yet in the new collective agreement in that they have not yet been signed.

Mr. Courville sent us a letter one hour after the bill was introduced in the House of Commons, telling us that not only was he taking back everything that had been done since we obtained our right to strike and throughout the mediation period, but in the last paragraph, he clearly told us that he now accepted the conciliation report.

We very clearly saw the connection between a law that said the arbitrator would only have to impose the conciliation report containing recommendations and not a decision and the employer who told us that now with this legislation, they no longer needed what had been negotiated with us; they would have something better, the conciliation report. That is why we greatly insisted on amending the bill.

This morning, there was an amendment. It is not the one we would have wanted. I think that what happened in 1987 would be much better: the arbitrator was given the authority to consider the conciliation report and reach his own conclusions before making a decision.

This time, he must impose the conciliation report for issues on which the parties did not agree. That is too bad because the recommendations in the conciliation report were made to ensure a balance between the two parties for later on. Otherwise, perhaps Marc Lapointe would not have made the same recommendations, if they were to be binding on the parties.

The recommendations are to help the parties reach agreement. It is not an arbitration decision.

We hope the amendment will mean that the arbitrator will now be able to look at the issues yet to be settled between the parties. According to the amendment, we are talking only about the issues where both parties were in substantial agreement. Therefore, for some matters, the arbitrator will be bound by the conciliation report, in spite of today's amendment.

Since I do not want to take up too much of your time and I want to give you the opportunity to ask us some questions, I will conclude here and try to clarify some points while answering your questions.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Parrot, without the legislation, do you think a collective agreement would have been possible?

Mr. Parrot: Senator Frith, through negotiation, it is possible to reach a negotiated settlement.

Senator Frith: You never left the bargaining table?

Mr. Parrot: No, senator Frith, we never left the bargaining table. Since the very beginning, we have been open to negotiation. I think what prevented us from reaching an agreement was the fact that one of the parties knew a special bill was forthcoming. I think that had a lot to do with the failure of the mediation process and of the last efforts made during this past weekend.

● (1650)

Senator Frith: What was the purpose in your calling off the strike action back in September?

Mr. Parrot: It was as a result of a request by Judge Gold to go back to work in order for him to accept the post as mediator. I understood his situation. In our opinion, he has a great deal of integrity. He is a well respected arbitrator. My brothers and sisters on the national board and I decided to accept the back-to-work request in order to assist the mediation process, and to ensure that other incidents that might create difficulties would not arise. We felt it was very important. It was not an easy decision to make. I am not sure we would have done it for anybody else; but with Judge Gold we felt that we could give it a try. I think it was worth it. I believe the progress made during the mediation surely showed that it was an exercise that was well worth the effort.

Senator Frith: Is it possible for you to tell us in terms that we can understand, because I know that these negotiations are very complex, how close you were to an agreement when Judge Gold withdrew?

Mr. Parrot: Yes. I can tell you, for example, that on the monetary issue there was a difference of between half a per cent and 1 per cent which separated the parties. That was not with respect to the wages, because the latest figures had been agreed upon. There were two benefits to be resolved surrounding the issue of money. So we were very close in that sense.

Everything except, in our opinion, the policy of the government, whether it be the direction that Canada Post must take, or the method by which Canada Post implements or carries out its operations, was either resolved in principle or close to being resolved in principle. When Judge Gold left last Friday, he left because the two parties told him that we had basically reached our bottom line. He could not get the two parties to move at that stage. For us, it was a situation in which we felt that the employer had to move. Thus, he felt his only choice was to leave. I think in leaving he knew that the parties would find themselves in a strange situation, being so close yet not being able to reach an agreement. I think that is what happened.

Immediately, we said that since we were so close we believed we should do something. So we did not provide the 24-hour notice to go out on strike. Instead, we indicated that we needed a period of reflection. I also think that was worthwhile because the next day we met again and more progress was made during the weekend—however, not much. Unfortunately, instead of going to the seven or eight points one by one and trying to see if we could reach an agreement in principle, and then look at how we would put that into contractual language, if there were problems, the employer chose the approach of a global offer.

This is what happened when the global offer arrived in front of us. It addressed the seven or eight points that were in dispute, but it also put into contractual language all the other issues that had been in dispute between the parties or were agreed to on in principle. We found that some matters in the agreement in principle were no longer agreed to, in the sense that it did not reflect what was agreed upon.

An example I would give in this regard is this: In the agreement that was reached between the parties a percentage of corporate outlets were to be maintained open during the life of the agreement. It was our understanding that this included all the existing services. Otherwise, to keep them open and to eliminate the services would not have worked. When it came back, not only was the maintenance of the existing service not in the language, but there were also conditions that we would accept part-time employees at the wicket. This is something that we do not have right now. This represents the very few full-time day jobs that are left in the bargaining unit.

In addition, there was a condition that we not carry out any campaigns against the contracting out of this work. We could not make application before the Canada Labour Relations Board to protest, to call for succession of rights, for example, on the franchises. Obviously, this would be illegal anyway, but it was a request of the employer. We were willing to stop the boycott. We were even willing not to picket these private outlets. However, we surely were not willing to give away our right to campaign and to protest and to talk against the management.

That is one example. There was a series of things like that, some big and some small.

One other point was that according to the Minister of Labour we had only a few hours to make it or break it. The employer in his offer came out with something stating that it would take seven months to make the retroactive pay. Obviously, this is a bargaining matter. In our opinion, they would settle for the usual 90 days in the end. Why, then, at the last minute, did they come up with that kind of thing? They should have come right away with the 90 days so that we could deal with the real issues that were there.

We felt it was a clear indication that there would not be an agreement. I cannot give you the whole list; that would take too much time. There were a lot more than seven or eight issues in dispute.

Senator Frith: I know there were many issues in contention over the whole period of bargaining. Is it possible to say what percentage of those issues were still in contention when this legislation was introduced?

Mr. Parrot: It always depends on how the parties view them, because the issues come in packages. In one package, you may have two or three issues but if one is resolved, it resolves the others. So it is difficult to give a percentage. I would say there are a dozen issues that should be resolved in ongoing negotiation but many of them have already been agreed to in principle. Within those 12 issues, in some cases there is more than one sub-issue.

Senator Frith: I recently saw a video that described the psychological atmosphere that exists in the workplace after a strike. It did not deal with postal workers or any particular strike; it conducted a study by interviewing experts, and so on, about how difficult it is for both sides when a strike is over and people go back to work.

In this case, the people are already back at work, having been sent back by you. I also get the impression that in this particular case there is a long history of animosity between the two sides that, I suppose, would take place at the interface of supervisors and workers right on the floor. The tension of trying constantly to settle human relations on the basis of manuals and procedures must be horrendous in its mounting effect, having accumulated over years and years of being forced back to work and so on.

Can you give us any sense, or would it be too big a job to give us a sense, of what effect this legislation will have upon the workers and upon their relationships with the supervisors on the job? Can you draw any comparison between that effect and the effect that you would expect if an attempt were made to continue the negotiations?

Mr. Parrot: In my opinion, the legislation will have a very devastating effect. Personally, I have said quite often that if we had been able to reach an agreement without back-to-work legislation in this form of negotiation, I believe it would have helped the parties to go in a new direction. Some of the issues that have been negotiated between the parties require us to meet together more often than in the past and to work together in certain committees with some specific funds that have been developed. This would have been a good change for us.

I want you to understand that we are just coming out of a three- to four-year period that has been hell for the people on the work floors all across this country. I have two sisters with me who certainly could tell you a lot about the kinds of harassment that have been taking place there.

What is happening now, the latest difficulty, is that we cannot get those problems resolved. You cannot settle grievances at the level of the supervisor; you cannot get them settled at the level of the plant manager; you cannot go to the division level; you cannot go to the national level. You cannot go to the grievance process. It takes years to get a grievance resolved. So eventually you have a local supervisor on the work floor who continuously tells the workers, if you are not happy, grieve, and it will only take 37 years or 99 years to have your grievance heard. That's the kind of attitude we are hearing from management on a day-to-day basis.

A new direction that we would like to see in the field, is that management would agree that such an attitude should not take place anymore. We are close to an agreement regarding the grievance and arbitration process involving the introduction of expedited arbitration at the local level. This should provide a chance to have grievances resolved locally by the arbitration process. That would help a little bit. We are willing to go in that direction, despite our reservations, just to try to help the situation.

However, a serious change in attitude is required there. With the introduction of back-to-work legislation, we have difficulty seeing any indication that management has changed. After all, just 24 hours ago, management said that all the benefits that have been negotiated, the child care, the pension plan for part-time employees, the wages, the retroactivity, will be gone just by way of a letter given by management to the union, even before the law is adopted. This is the kind of attitude we are facing.

It is very difficult to believe now that, within the next 24 hours, conditions on the work floor will improve for our members. On our side, we will keep trying. But we need a method that will allow us to solve our problems as they happen, not 99 years later.

Senator Frith: Is your bargaining ability seriously restricted by this legislation, as opposed to the flexibility you had in negotiating before introduction of the legislation?

Mr. Parrot: In the case of the grievance and arbitration process, if the arbitrator does not succeed I think he is bound by the conciliation board report. The conciliation board report, unfortunately, came only with conclusions, and not recommendations as such. That means it will require a lot of discussion between the parties, and, hopefully, the arbitrator can come to his own decisions on what should be recommended. Even the conciliation board report cannot totally solve this issue. It will simply give some ideas on how to deal with the issue of grievances and arbitration.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, this will be my last question.

Mr. Parrot, do you think that the amendment proposed by the minister and adopted by the House of Commons adequately protects the progress made since the conciliation report?

You already alluded to the letter sent by someone for the Corporation and the possibility that all the progress made would now be lost. I believe that when the minister, Mr. Danis, made the amendment, it was precisely to protect the progress made.

Do you feel that the amendment achieves that?

Mr. Parrot: Our initial reaction is positive, especially following the statements made by the minister and the indications that were given, and also because it talks about "significant agreement".

We know that we had reached significant agreements in this process.

There is only one point that concerns us a bit. The amendment refers to a a significant agreement between the parties on the coming into force of this act. Now, as this act is coming into force, we have this letter from Mr. Courville who tells us that there is no agreement anymore. That is the only point that bothers us a bit. Does that letter destroy the intent of the provision?

For us, obviously, the date should have been just before the letter and not after. That is what concerns us a bit.

Will the employer go before the arbitrator and say: When the act came into force, there was no agreement, since we had sent a letter stating that there was no agreement.

In my view, this is the only point that is worrying. It seems to me we are being told that this should not be a problem. There is always the possibility that the arbitrator will be bound by what is written and not by the intent.

Senator Frith: In that sense, you are not completely reassured by the amendment.

Mr. Parrot: Not entirely, senator, but we have been told . . .

Senator Frith: Carry on.

Mr. Parrot: We have been told that this was not the intention and that the arbitrator would not make that interpretation. We hope so!

Senator Frith: Maybe we should ask representatives of the Corporation about that, to find out how they feel about the amendment in the context of their letter.

Mr. Parrot: Well, they could still maintain the position stated in the letter, namely that there was no agreement when the act was passed.

I hope the arbitrator will see a different intention unless, of course, we make sure this passage applies before the letter, that is at the moment the postal workers will again have the right to strike.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

The Chairman: Is there any other question?

Senator Molgat: Mr. Parrot, you probably heard the questions I asked to the minister.

As for the monetary aspect, do you have any idea of how you were opposed all in all on the question of money?

Mr. Parrot: Between half and one per cent, that is approximately 0.5 per cent. In fact, we are opposed on two kinds of benefits: the leaves of absence for the night workers and the holidays, where we are offered an improvement in exchange for no arbitration.

As for the rest, there are not many monetary items. Some measures may affect wages depending on how the employer will have to operate if it agrees with the changes we are requesting, but in a very minimal way.

Senator Molgat: What would that represent approximately in dollars?

Mr. Parrot: Less than ten millions dollars, I think. We are talking here of a four-year collective agreement and $2 billion. Naturally, considering the number of employees, it is a very small amount of money.

Senator Molgat: I do not want to put words in the minister's mouth, but I assume the big problem comes from grievances. If I understand well, you indicated that outstanding grievances under the old collective agreement should be left aside and things should start anew. Why did the Corporation reject that?

Mr. Parrot: We do not want to continue under the former collective agreement as such. We want these grievances to come before arbitral mediation, like the other grievances that are already at that stage. In fact, we have five arbitrators across the country who are trying to deal with 130,000 grievances and are dealing with both parties. We don't even have to use lawyers. We can process a great many grievances, and this is a much quicker way to dispose of them. It's a much faster process. That is why we want this.

Why did Canada Post refuse? We find this hard to understand. I think that in this case, they are afraid of the results. Remember, we win the vast majority of our grievances, and grievances represent millions that go well beyond the settlement of this dispute.

Seven or eight million remains to be settled by the parties. That is nothing compared with the grievances. We have calculated that these grievances will represent about $50 million for our members, once they are settled. We realize Canada Post is not terribly eager to settle all these grievances, because obviously, they will have to pay in the end for violations of the collective agreements they themselves help to make.

I think that may be one of the reasons why they are getting edgy.

Senator Molgat: Considering the situation today, do you agree we should pass this bill now? Is there any reason to delay it?

Mr. Parrot: I believe your time is important and I don't think that an extra five, six or seven days to finally adopt this bill would make any difference to us.

Of course, if there were major amendments like the one I mentioned, if an amendment can help, that's one thing. We have already asked our members to go back to work. So the fact that the debate continues will not keep people on strike. Obviously, we are all well aware of what remains to be done. We have been waiting for a collective agreement for two and half years. We are anxious to get there.

So whether the arbitration starts in five days or in two days, I think that once the arbitrator is there, the sooner we can begin.

Our only concern now, besides the point I raised here on the amendment, is that, in addition to what I was asked earlier, 71 people were dismissed outside the period covered and they will now be entitled to arbitration.

Among them are very many men and women in very difficult situations who will have to wait a very long time before being reinstated and being able to go back to work. In most cases, at least we tried to have the Corporation reinstate these people while we await the arbitration decision.

One of the problems we have with the dismissals at Canada Post is that we must always wait until the end and the employer often dismisses people, knowing beforehand that it calms the others down, but that we win our cases later in arbitration. You would not believe how many cases we win in arbitration!

So there are many injustices in that area and there have been a great number in this conflict. It is too bad that with a special law, we are put in a situation where we cannot negotiate a back-to-work protocol for our people as is normally done when the parties reach an agreement.

The result is that we have many people now who should normally be reinstated but will have to wait a long time for the arbitration decisions, and we never know how they will turn out, of course.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Mr. Parrot.

• (1710)

[English]

Senator Bosa: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if there were other non-monetary issues which prevented the two sides from coming together. For instance, I recall you, Mr. Parrot, having been reported as saying that you did not want any more part-time workers hired because you felt that Canada Post should have enough permanent full-time workers to cope with the peak seasons such as Christmas and Valentine's Day. Was there disagreement in this? Were you able to make some progress in reaching a compromise in this area?

Mr. Parrot: On converting part time into full time?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Mr. Parrot: There had been a lot of progress on that issue. We still had small points in dispute but the employer himself is telling us that it is cheaper to have one full-time employee than to have two part-time employees, if the work is there. So we are saying that if that is the case we should negotiate something that will allow the conversion of some part-time employees into full time. Right now there is a small difference between the two parties on how many part-time employees they will be allowed to use during the life of the collective agreement. However, the difference in figures between the parties is pretty small.

Senator Bosa: Do I understand you correctly, Mr. Parrot, that it was Canada Post that did not want to convert part-time workers into full-time workers? Is that the position? You were reported as wanting to have full-time workers to fill the peak times of mail volume in the Post Office, whereas Canada Post wanted to have part-time employees. If that were the case, what would these permanent workers do during periods in which there is a very low volume of mail?

Mr. Parrot: This is not the case. In the collective agreement today there is flexibility to use part-time employees during peak periods. We are not taking that away. For example, in the internal operations there are 4,200 part-time employees the employer can use for the peak periods. In addition to that the employer also has access to casual workers as well as what are called term employees.

There are term employees, for example, in Canada Post who have been working at full-time jobs for years and years who cannot have access to regular full-time jobs because the employer does not want to give them regular full-time jobs even if they are working full time. Not all of them are there because they are replacing someone. It is simply that there are vacancies that are not being filled in Canada Post.

The same is true in internal. We say that these people are being deprived of some rights, including accumulation of seniority. If they were regular employees their seniority would mean something, but to be a casual worker for seven, eight and nine years is a very difficult situation for those people. They never know from one day to the next if they will have a job in the Post Office, even though they are working full time. They are working full time for all these years because there are jobs for them. Why do we not give them a regular job? The only difference for the employer is that those people will have seniority and access to the same benefits as the other workers. The differences between casual work and regular work are not that big with regard to benefits because we have negotiated those things in the past. So why not make them regular employees instead of keeping them as casual?

That is an issue, yes, but that is not a cost issue to the employer. It is not a question of cost.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, if there are no other interventions or questions, it remains only for me to say that the testimony that Mr. Parrot has given us has been very helpful and has given us all, I believe, a better understanding not only of the issues at stake in the present dispute but also on the state of labour relations in the post office generally. I thank Mr. Parrot for that.

Honourable senators, if it is your wish, I will call the vice-president of Canada Post to the witness table.

Pursuant to agreement, Mr. Harold Dunstan, Ms. Bonnie Beretski and Mr. Gilles Courville were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

Mr. Chairman, the witnesses advise that they do not have an opening statement, but they will be pleased to reply to questions from honourable senators.

Senator Frith: I would like you to tell us, if you will, where you were with regard to progress on negotiations when the legislation was introduced, or word got out that it was to be introduced? I ask you that because I have the impression, and I think that the country at large has the impression, that when the legislation came forward, the parties were negotiating. In other words, it is not legislation to settle a strike. It is not telling the workers to go back to work. They are back at work. You were in negotiations, and we got the impression from the media that when Judge Gold withdrew, both parties felt that there was still a possibility of agreement and that there was no breaking off of negotiations, no leaving the bargaining table when the legislation came in; that you were, in fact, at the bargaining table when the legislation came in. Can you tell us about that?

Mr. Harold Dunstan, Vice-President of Human Resources, Canada Post: Honourable senators, at the time the first announcement of the legislation was made, Chief Justice Gold had left the parties and announced that he felt no further progress could be made in mediation. The morning that he left, both the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and myself, on behalf of the corporation, felt that we were close, but due to the complexity of the mediation process where we were not meeting face-to-face, we were not sure exactly where we were.

Senator Frith: This process was a shuttle diplomacy, Henry Kissinger type of modus, I understand. Judge Gold goes and speaks to one side and then goes and speaks to the other side, but you are not in each other's presence during this process; is that right?

Mr. Dunstan: In the final days of the mediation process, that is how it was. We went through a variety of stages during the mediation process before Chief Justice Gold, but in the final days, we were not seeing each other face-to-face, with the result that Chief Justice Gold advised me, as I am sure he advised Mr. Parrot on Tuesday night, that he felt no agreement was possible. He brought us together on Wednesday morning and told us that he felt no agreement was imminent, and then he departed.

That afternoon, Mr. Parrot and his committee and myself, with members of the corporation, the bargaining committee, met with CUPW and exchanged views on where we were. It was clear on the Wednesday afternoon that, while we thought we were close, there were seven to nine issues on which we had possibly not reached agreement, or on which we did not have a clear understanding of what one party had said to Mr. Gold or what the other party had said to Mr. Gold, and that on two or three of the issues we were considerably far apart, far enough apart that there was no need for further discussions.

In the process, the Minister of Labour then announced that he was intended to table legislation, but prior to tabling it, contacted myself, as I am sure he did Mr. Parrot—as I learned afterwards— met with us individually and, given that there were only these seven to nine issues discussed whether or not we could get back together and attempt a resolution so that legislation would not have to be introduced.

Senator Frith: That was before the weekend?

Mr. Dunstan: This was before the weekend, yes.

• (1730)

Senator Frith: You negotiated over the weekend. Then after the weekend did you try to negotiate?

Mr. Dunstan: Yes. We met on Friday and Saturday. In the first session on the Friday, the number of issues outstanding increased from the seven to nine that we had originally thought were there to become 24 issues. We spent Friday and Saturday morning in two sessions discussing—

Senator Frith: But now you are face-to-face?

Mr. Dunstan: This is face-to-face, yes. We spent Friday and primarily Saturday morning discussing those issues that we felt jointly needed discussion, because I specifically asked the question: is there any element that needs further discussion? Late Saturday night the corporation then prepared an offer to the union on all of the items that were outstanding at that time, which we made to the union. The union responded late Sunday night to us that they considered our offer—as they said to Mr. Courville and myself who were there, and to two other members of the bargaining team—to be an insult and they had no intention of ever responding to our offer. And in the morning—-

Senator Frith: Which morning would that be? Monday morning?

Mr. Dunstan: On the Monday morning.

Senator Frith: Yesterday morning, October 28?

Mr. Dunstan: I lose track of days. Yes; Monday, October 28.

Senator Frith: Yesterday?

Mr. Dunstan: Yes. The Minister of Labour contacted me, and I indicated the events of the night before.

Senator Frith: Did you or, to your knowledge, anyone on behalf of the corporation ask for the legislation?

Mr. Dunstan: Not to my knowledge.

Senator Frith: Did Mr. Parrot, to your knowledge?

Mr. Dunstan: I do not know sir, no.

Senator Frith: He never told you, or you have no information that either side asked for the legislation?

Mr. Dunstan: During discussions before Chief Justice Gold, and also in committee meetings face-to-face, both of us had indicated to each other—that is, both Mr. Parrot and members of his committee had indicated to us and we had indicated to them—that neither of us wanted legislation because legislation does not serve either parties' purpose.

Senator Frith: I suppose it did not serve either parties' purpose. Also, does that include the dimension of the added psychological difficulties that occur when two parties are forced to go back to work together rather than going back of their own accord?

Mr. Dunstan: The experience in 1987 showed us that it was virtually a repeat of the events of the seventies when the Canadian Union of Postal Workers had been ordered back to work a number of times. The after-effect of ordering back requires special effort to try and work at improving relationships. Having been through that, and having taken considerable steps to improve that relationship I, on behalf of the corporation, felt that we would be redoing the efforts.

Senator Frith: Do you think that this legislation is more beneficial in its results and in the overall context to the corporation than to the union?

Mr. Dunstan: I do not believe that any legislation is favourable to one party or the other when you are put before an arbitrator. As both parties learned in 1987 when we were put before an arbitrator, an arbitrator is liable to do unexpected things, might side with one party or the other, or might split everything right down the middle. It is an unknown that neither one of us really wanted.

Senator Frith: Lastly, I want to ask you and Mr. Courville about a letter that I have, which was the subject of some discussion in the committee in the other place. It is addressed to Mr. Parrot and dated October 29, 1991. I would like it to be part of the record, so I will quote it. It reads:

> During the course of these negotiations, in an effort to reach a negotiated collective agreement and later, in an effort to avoid a strike with its costs and hardship caused by continued work disruptions, the Corporation made several proposals and offers and agreed to various texts and positions.

It now seems apparent, at this late hour—

We do not know what hour—I think "hour" is being used in a poetic sense rather than in a chronological sense; I do not know. Mr. Courville can perhaps inform us of that. But it does say "at this late hour". It continues.

> . . . that this effort, including all the most recent concessions the Corporation has made, has not helped us to attain our goal of a negotiated collective agreement.

Page two then states:

> This is to advise you that any and all of the Corporations's positions, offers and proposals made through the mediator or otherwise after midnight of August 23, 1991 are withdrawn. This includes any language, positions, offers and proposals that were accepted by the Union with the exception of clauses signed by the parties during the mediation process.
> The Corporation's position now reverts to the recommendations of the conciliation board chaired by Mr. M. Lapointe.

Why would that letter be delivered? It creates the impression to someone who is not expert in the field, and not on the inside as you are who perhaps understand its context better than I do, that all the progress that you made after August 23, 1991, is down the drain. That is a bit disappointing, even depressing, to think that all the time that you spent since August 23, 1991 is, if I can use the expression, down the drain. Perhaps you will also explain what the significance of the August 23, 1991, date is.

The impression that the creates to someone on the outside is that it is not a particularly helpful letter to the process.

Mr. Dunstan: One of the problems in our negotiations concerns the very words that the honourable senator used, namely, "to one on the outside". It is not normal during the negotiations that the table talk or the table manners would become as exposed as they have in this round of negotiations.

With honourable senators' indulgence, I would like to refer to an October 17 bulletin signed by Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot to his members. I will refer to one portion only. The bulletin states that > . . . .at the current time we are not providing precise details of the discussions and negotiations. The reason for this is because the proposals being discussed are being made subject to a negotiated agreement. If strike action or a lockout occurs, the parties may resume the right to withdraw their positions as if they never existed.

As the honourable senator will note, this is Mr. Parrot's position and is basically the position that we took in our letter. It was merely a question, from a bargaining point of view, of who was going to say it first. We had made a decision—

Senator Frith: But was his case not different? Just repeat what he said. Did he not say "in the case of a strike or lockout"?

Mr. Dunstan: I am glad that you asked me to rephrase the last sentence, because it brings me to the next point. It states that ". . . if strike action or lockout occurs, the parties may resume the right to withdraw their positions as if they never existed."

During the mediation procedures, this position was discussed with Chief Justice Gold on each of our sides because we were concerned about exposing ourselves. An agreement, was made, signed by both Canada Post and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, that either party could serve notice on the other that they would strike within 24 hours. The corporation made the decision that we would not exercise this right of saying that things did not exist unless we were served with such a notice by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. At 12:10 on the Monday, we were served with such a notice.

Senator Frith: 12:10 p.m.?

Mr. Dunstan: At 12:10 p.m. on October 28, I received a letter signed by Mr. Jean-Claude Parrot which reads as follows:

> Take notice that the agreement entered into on September 7, 1991 between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and Canada Post Corporation will cease to apply as of 12:10 p.m., October 29, 1991 and that the Canadian Union of Postal Workers intends to exercise its right to strike as of that moment.

The letter signed by Mr. Courville was a protective reaction to the letter we received from the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. The preceding day, or that morning, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers had characterized our offer as offensive, manipulating and insulting. We had hoped that even though negotiations had broken down and even though they had characterized the offer in that way, perhaps there was still hope for settlement and therefore we did not intend to serve our notice until we were actually told that they intended to go on strike.

Senator Frith: As I understand it, they said that in the case of lockout or strike each party reserved the right, but did not automatically exercise it, to withdraw their position. They simply gave you the strike notice but did not withdraw any position, as your letter did.

Mr. Dunstan: As the honourable senator noted in an earlier comment, it is a question of a bargaining tactic or perhaps of phrasing it as who strikes first for protective purposes. Throughout the negotiations there had been a very clear understanding, reflected in Mr. Parrot's bulletins and in our discussions with Chief Justice Gold, that the entire discussion, particularly the discussion on the issues, amounted to agreements in principal only, and only subject to an overall settlement.

Senator Frith: We do not have a matching letter as such from them so I will leave it at that. I want to be sure that that is clear, because it leads me to my last question. You have the strike letter to which your letter was a reaction. Their strike notice was not accompanied by a "therefore-we- withdraw" notice. That was the situation that Mr. Danis was trying to react to through his amendment to clause 7, I believe. Do you think that that amendment succeeds in changing the rather bleak impression that the combination of the strike notice and your withdrawal creates? Do you think that the amendment gives us hope that maybe everything is not off the table and down the drain since August 23?

Mr. Dunstan: I believe that the amendment will give the arbitrator a greater opportunity, perhaps more direct latitude rather than indirect latitude, to consider the positions of the parties at the closing stages of negotiations and to examine our positions, along with any hope that we may have had that perhaps that would lead to a quicker resolution.

Senator Frith: But he will be able to say, according to the amendment as I understand it, that on that point there was substantial agreement. That is the phrase that is used "substantial agreement". You can say no. I mean, you can argue that the agreement, if there was one, was not substantial and that you had withdrawn it. Will you take that position?

Mr. Dunstan: The difficulty that the arbitrator will have will be in establishing what the agreement was because there were quid pro quos, such as, "I will offer this if this is set aside". At least the arbitrator with this amendment will now be able to directly look into those situations and make a determination.

Senator Frith: Do you agree that, according to the amendment, he will be the final decider on whether there was or was not substantial agreement? In other words, you can argue that there was not substantial agreement and Mr. Parrot can argue the opposite, but the decision will be made by the arbitrator as to whether the decision was substantial and therefore he can put that in the agreement, if he thinks there was.

Mr. Dunstan: As I understand the legislation, that is correct.

Senator Molgat: It seems that over the years the whole labour-management operations of the Post Office could be described as dismal. The Canadian public, I think is fed up with the operation. Can we hope for any improvement, or do you intend to continue in this same way?

Mr. Dunstan: Honourable senators, I hope that there has been recognition that in the workplace there has been considerable improvement. We have taken steps to introduce programs to ensure better relationships between management and employees at the local level.

At the national level the problem continues, as evidenced by this dispute. There is a difficulty in relationships. Part of the negotiation process, particularly the discussions before Mr. Chief Justice Gold, was to seek ways to allow the parties to discuss matters in fuller detail in the hope there would be a better relationship between union and management at the national level and that the improved relations in the workplace would move upwards into the organization.

In answer to the honourable senator's question, is there hope, the answer is yes, there certainly is hope. We know, and I believe that the Canadian Union of Postal Workers also know, that we cannot continue in the mold we are in now, and that we have to break out of it.

Senator Molgat: Both the minister and Mr. Parrot indicated that the major point at issue is the question of grievance. I also got the impression that the company has been, in a sense, encouraging the staff to go to grievance, and with the tremendous backlog the time for resolution stretches and stretches and there is no resolution. What is the company's position on the grievance matter?

Mr. Dunstan: It has been my belief, and the corporation's belief also, that the grievance and arbitration processes are to be dispute resolution processes, and not sources of dispute. Unfortunately the process that we have in place is a difficult one. It has caused considerable difficulties. A number of third parties have commented on it and indicated that it needs improvement. There has been reluctance on the part of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to entertain any change in that process.

However, as I understand the legislation that has been tabled, the arbitrator appointed will be able to look into the grievance and arbitration processes, and one can only hope that there will be a system that will improve the grievance and arbitration processes we currently have.

Senator Molgat: Does the company want the grievances to be settled or does it want them to drag on?

Mr. Dunstan: There is no question that we want them to be settled. One cannot walk around with a cloud of over 100,000 grievances hanging over one's head. Employees get frustrated with the system not being able to handle them, and management gets frustrated from not knowing where things stand. It has to be cleaned up, honourable senators, and this process and the arbitrator appointed under the legislation will be able to do that.

Senator Molgat: Is it your view that the legislation should be passed at this time? Is there any reason to delay the legislation?

Mr. Dunstan: I would see no reason, honourable senator, to delay the legislation. Without checking on where we are right now with respect to the corporation, I believe that the unknown state of affairs that is hanging over everyone's head must be cleared up, an arbitrator must be appointed quickly and both the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the corporation have to show to our employees and to their members that there is some process that is addressing the contract under which they must live. I believe that speed, in that sense, is essential.

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I want to clear up one thing in pursuit of what Senator Frith was asking a minute ago. In the letter of October 29 you advised that any and all of the corporation's positions, offers and proposals made through the mediator are withdrawn. Are all of your positions, or are all of these matters—without going over them again—a matter of public knowledge?

Mr. Dunstan: Honourable senator, I do not believe that the positions are a matter of public knowledge. I think that the media attention, and certainly the focus of that attention of the last couple of days, has made a great number of issues public knowledge, but not the substance of the issues.

Senator Olson: I do not know who the mediator will be. I doubt that it will be Chief Justice Gold. Will whoever arbitrates this situation have a knowledge of where both sides will agree, particularly yours, where your positions, offers and proposals will be known to him and that you do not dispute that? I understand you have withdrawn, and I am not arguing about that. I understand if one side offers a package and the other side does not accept the package then what is acceptable cannot be picked out. Will the arbitrator know what was substantially agreed to, or will you deny that you substantially agreed to all of those things?

Mr. Dunstan: Honourable senator, I believe the legislation in section 7(3) provides that the arbitrator has the powers and duties of an arbitrator under section 60 and 61 which, from my memory of the Canada Labour Code, allows that arbitrator to compel such evidence as he may require.

My experience in the past has been that both parties in situations such as this, in an effort to defend their positions, will bring as many—and many times too many—pieces of paper as necessary before the arbitrator to defend their positions. Therefore, it will depend on the skill of the arbitrator.

Senator Olson: But there has to be a reason why you withdrew all the positions, offers and proposals. You do not wish to go into an arbitration procedure with these things being satisfactory to you, apparently, so you withdraw them all.

Off the top of my head, I do not know what section 60 and 61 give the arbitrator the power to do. Will there be further dispute or argument on these matters on which you have already reached substantial agreement, because of your letter?

Mr. Dunstan: I think, honourable senator, that it is difficult to say at this time whether there will be a lot of argument. Clearly, each party took a position on a particular issue that they would back away from something if something else happened. I think the argument will be, did that something happen. I think that the Canadian Union of Postal Workers will have the same difficulty, perhaps more so than the corporation in this sense since it is the corporation that is giving. However, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers had some 260 demands on the table, a number of which had to be withdrawn in order for us to move on certain issues.

If those issues are still withdrawn on their side, and if they take the position that, yes, they are gone, then agreement might be forthcoming fairly quickly before the arbitrator.

Senator Olson: Did the union withdraw all of its positions, offers and so on when it called a strike?

Mr. Dunstan: Officially or directly as we did by letter, no it did not, senator. However, I believe that the situation there is that because we did it first, there was no need for the union do it.

Senator Olson: I am curious about this, because it seems to me that both the union representative and the corporation in the last two or three days said that you were very close to agreement. At least, it was reported that you had said that on Friday and on Saturday, and I think the Minister of Labour responded by delaying a bit, at least over the weekend. So will we now have a wider gap between the parties when we get the arbitrator going on this than we had, say, last Friday?

Mr. Dunstan: Honourable senator, I will not know that until the arbitrator is appointed and we lay our positions before him and perhaps have the first or second session with him.

Senator Bosa: Mr. Chairman, I understand that one of the issues that appeared to encounter a great deal of difficulty on both sides was the question of part-time workers. I put the same question to Mr. Parrot earlier when he was here because he seemed to have been reported in the media at some time as saying that he wanted Canada Post to hire sufficient permanent employees to cope with the high peak of volumes such as Christmas and Valentine's Day, and that Canada Post resisted that suggestion. I do not know if you listened to his testimony, but he seemed to have told us, if I understood him correctly, that it is Canada Post that believes that hiring part-time workers is more expensive than having permanent workers.

Can you comment on that, Mr. Dunstan? Was that one of the main stumbling blocks among the non-monetary issues in reaching an agreement?

Mr. Dunstan: Honourable senator, to first address the issue of whether it is a monetary issue, the use of part-time workers versus full-time workers clearly is a monetary issue because it does have an operational cost to us. If we use a worker for eight hours a day, or if we have to pay a worker for eight hours a day and the demand for the worker or the operational use of the worker is only there for four hours, that means four hours of non-productive labour, so there is a cost.

Where we are apart is on the question of social direction, in my opinion, on the part of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and a question of operational efficiency on the part of the corporation. There are peaks during the daytime, for example, in certain operations where we service the public. Clearly, early morning, late afternoon, and/or the lunch hour are times when we get more business in a postal station, for example, than we would get at other times during the day. When we do street letter box pick-ups throughout the city at 6 o'clock at night, there is clearly more mail in the plant for a very short period of time in the evening than there would be at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. We try to balance the use of part time and full time to address those operational requirements.

In the traditional use of part-time labour, the issue in the normal industry context is because of wages, but within Canada Post that is not the issue because we pay part-time workers the same benefits, the same salary. They get everything in terms of benefits that a full-time worker gets. The benefit issue is not one that one would normally see in another industry. Here it is only a question of whether or not we use part-time workers.

The other part of the Honourable Senator's question was, "Were we close?" Yes, I believe we were close on that issue. We were close in the sense that the corporation had made considerable movement to address the union's concerns. It is an operating restriction on the corporation when we accept that we will only use x-number of part-time workers. That has to be considered carefully by the corporation. We did address it through Chief Justice Gold in a very comprehensive manner.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, it remains only for me to thank the witnesses from Canada Post for their testimony this afternoon. If there are no further questions, I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you take us clause by clause through this bill.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I do not know whether it has been agreed to ignore the clock when 6 o'clock comes.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, stand?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, just before you do that, I do not know whether other senators have the same problem that I perceive that I have, namely that the copy I have is the first reading copy, which would be the unamended copy. I believe there was only one amendment. Do you have third reading copy? I have a copy of the amendment, but I still want to be sure I have an undertaking from someone that the bill I have before me, the one we are now about to consider and formally pass, is Bill C-40, and I have the first reading copy, October 28, 1991. Can we have some assurance that that is the right one except for clause 7, which you have to put to us as amended.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: So that is correct? The government is telling me that this is the copy? The only change is the—

Senator Murray: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Frith: Then we can proceed, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7, as amended, carry?

Senator Frith: As amended in the House.

Senator Murray: As amended in the House, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which Bill C-40, an Act to provide for the continuation of postal services, was referred, has examined the bill and asks me to present a report, without amendment.

[English]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Murray: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, we have listened to the witnesses; both the company and the union have said that they see no purpose in delaying the bill at this point. We are prepared to give leave, but I must say that we are reluctantly supporting this bill. We frankly are not happy with these recurring actions by government to bypass the collective bargaining process. Nevertheless, under these circumstances we will not oppose the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motions:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 59(1)(h), I move:

THE LATE PAUL-ÉMILE CARDINAL LÉGER

TRIBUTES

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Canada has just lost one of its noblest sons. Paul-Émile Cardinal Léger was indeed a giant of whom all of Canada can be proud.

Few Canadians surpassed him in culture, eloquence and especially sense of social duty.

[English]

After 17 years as head of the largest Roman Catholic diocese in Canada, Cardinal Léger resigned from this prestigious and influential position to become a missionary in Africa, devoting himself to the poor, the handicapped and the diseased. He gave them 12 years of his life; 12 years of untiring devotion which exhausted him to the point that, in 1979, he returned to Canada where he continued to work for the disadvantaged through a number of foundations, including the one which bears his name and that of his equally distinguished brother, the late Governor General, Jules Léger.

Few are the more needy areas of the world which have not benefited from Paul-Emile Léger's involvement in such fields as education, hospital care, public health and subsistence farming.

[Translation]

He did all he could with the best of his immense talents to improve the lives of the disadvantaged, to heal the sick, to help the handicapped overcome their difficulties, to clothe and house the poor and to give the hungry drinking water and bread.

That is why the whole nation paid him a deep tribute of gratitude and affection last Saturday in Montreal.

May the lessons of self-denial and love for one's neighbour, especially the poor and disabled, that come from the life of this great Canadian remain forever in our minds and our hearts.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I am sure that my colleagues on both sides of this House will want to join in this final tribute to Paul-Émile Cardinal Léger whose funeral was held last Saturday in Montreal.

I had the pleasure of knowing Cardinal Léger personally at various times in my life. In fact, I knew him when I was a young girl. I especially knew his parents who were quite outstanding people, unassuming, but very intelligent and cultivated. No doubt they greatly contributed to making Cardinal Léger the very humane and intellectual man that he was.

I think that everything has been said about the course of his life inside and outside the Church. Cardinal Léger was a very cultivated man. He was an exceptional communicator. No doubt this ability to communicate and his great eloquence were significant factors in his impressive career in the Church, but also outside it as someone who could mobilize incalculable energy in the many people who supported him in his numerous works for the poor and the sick, first in Montreal and then throughout the world.

It was mentioned that he helped launch projects in some 92 Third World countries. I think that the value of someone's work is shown if it can go on after him.

It was the case in Montreal with what he called his "big chores" when, as I was saying earlier, the St. Charles Borromée Hospital and the Foyer de la Charité, which were established during those days, would mobilize all his energy. Today, these institutions pursue their mission, although for many years now, the Cardinal was no longer directly involved. We can already see that the other missions that he established abroad will continue. In this regard, I would like to quote Mr. Roger Gaudry, former rector of the University of Montreal, who said:

> We are deeply distressed and saddened by his departure, but the message of hope left by that this great Apostle fills us with joy. He chose the people of Canada, the people of Quebec, foreign benefactors, his colleagues from the Jules and Paul-Émile Léger Foundation, as well as all the agencies that he set up, including the Cardinal Léger Leprosy Institute, the Cardinal's Partners, Help the Aged and Partners of the World—in other words you and me—to carry on his fundamental mission: to help the poorest of the world.

During the last twenty years of his life, and especially the last ten he was not able to make all the people of Quebec and even of Canada aware of our responsibility to help the underprivileged countries in the Third World.

Even if we forget it in our everyday lives because of all our other commitments, I believe that this reminder of our duty to help the people of the Third World is probably becoming more and more acute and current. If some continue his works and start similar ones, I think that humanity may be better and more respectful of individuals, of other countries and of all the citizens of the world, particularly the most underprivileged.

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, we mourn the passing of Paul-Émile Cardinal Léger. Born at the beginning of the century, Cardinal Léger was a reflection of both the society and the Church to which he belonged.

He also made an outstanding contribution to the Church and to temporal society. Ultimately, Cardinal Léger was a man who loved God, the Church and those who suffer, with all the passion that was part of his nature.

As I said, he was a witness and a true reflection of the Church and society. In the first half of the century, Quebec was a monolithic, hierarchic, authoritarian society in which the Church exerted an influence which could hardly be overestimated. The prince of the Church triumphant personified with spirit and talent this era and its institutions.

Through a happy coincidence, the aggiornamento of the Church in the early 1960s, during the Second Vatican Council, took place just as Quebec was undergoing its Quiet Revolution, one aspect of which was precisely the end of the clerical society.

Cardinal Léger showed solidarity with this new Quebec in which the place and role of the Church were more discreet than when he was appointed Archbishop of Montreal in difficult circumstances.

With the passage of time, the vision that will remain in our minds will undoubtedly be his resignation, in 1967, when he left his archdiocese and went to Africa as a simple missionary.

I think that seeing this man leave his palace to live in a trailer in Africa in order to help his suffering hungry brothers was the most shining proof of Paul-Émile Cardinal Léger's love for his fellow men.

The two institutes that he founded, "Fame Pereo" and "Cardinal Leger and His Endeavours", gave large sums of money to hundreds of missions throughout the world, and are also proof of Cardinal Leger's devotion and determination to relieve human misery.

Honourable senators, on behalf of my party, I would like to extend our most sincere sympathies to the Church of which he was one of the most illustrious members and to the family of this great man.

THE LATE DR. ROBERT BAIRD McCLURE

TRIBUTES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, since we last met Canada has lost one of its great citizens in the person of Dr. Robert Baird McClure, late of Toronto.

Dr. McClure was the only lay moderator of the United Church of Canada. Doubtless he was chosen by that body of church people because of his great service to humanity in many spheres around the world. He was a distinguished medical man and a medical missionary who served in various parts of the Third World. We find that he was on loan to the International Red Cross and served in China for many years. He was in Sarawak. During the second great war he served on the Burma Road. He performed all kinds of operations. In fact, because he was so skilled in surgery he was made a fellow of the International College of Surgeons at Edinburgh University over 50 years ago.

I suppose it can be said of this man that instead of using his professional skill to gain professional advancement he devoted his skill to humanitarian service. He can be honoured among Canadians down through the ages because of this unselfish devotion and the pledging of his great gifts to worthy causes and to suffering mankind.

I had the honour of meeting Dr. McClure, and I wish I had known him better. One of the great things about him was that he was a man of humour and common sense, humble in his bearings. One time in Charlottetown when I was engaged in the humanitarian campaign of another great person, Dr. Lotta Hitschmanova, Bob McClure happened to be in Charlottetown. We asked him if he would come in to talk to our meeting, and he did. He began by saying, "This is a very special and important appeal. We don't want one of Aunt Mary's old hats or the pants that junior has grown out of. We want real help this time — and the first thing you can think about is money." Of course, with his great personality he made the campaign go over the top.

Dr. McClure was a man of the greatest appeal. One of the later moderators of the United Church of Canada, Dr. McLeod, said, "If Dr. McClure comes into a room for a while, there isn't a person there who does not believe that the world is a little better, and that their circumstances are a little bit improved because of the power and compelling role of his personality."

Dr. McClure was one of the greatest Canadians in my lifetime. Indeed, he was probably one of the greatest Canadians in Canada's history. I am sure that my colleagues will support me today as I salute this great man and tender to his wife and children the gratitude of a nation which has been touched by his service and has broadened its own outlook due to the broadness of his mind and the depth of his charity.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, just over a year ago, I received an invitation from a young friend of mine, a student at the University of Toronto, to have lunch with Dr. McClure and his wife. Dr. McClure was such a Canadian legend, a man of such reputation, that it was a most exciting invitation. Dr. and Mrs. McClure arrived filled with energy. We had a long and most illuminating discussion about the situation in China from which he had just returned. His analysis of the cultural revolution, of the events of Tiananmen Square, his reaction, his constant correspondence with people still—all were most revealing.

It was a great privilege to be able to draw upon the life experience and the wisdom of a person like Dr. McClure. He was an extraordinary person with a sense of priorities and an analysis that went right to the core of important issues. Dr. McClure was also a person of progressive views. As we have heard, he was perhaps most broadly known across the country for his work as moderator of the United Church of Canada from 1968 to 1971. Those were years of changing times in this country, and Dr. McClure contributed quite significantly to the institutionalization of some of the better and broader views that are now reflected in our laws and regulations. All Canadians are indebted to him in that respect.

However, his views were held philosophically, not opportunistically, and they arose from his experience, from his change of mind about a lot of the social issues of the day, and from his ability to understand what concerned people living in a situation of poverty, oppression, or otherwise disadvantaged situations in our society.

● (1420)

In the obituary published on Dr. McClure in the Globe and Mail, the Reverend Bruce McLeod, also one of Canada's leading progressive thinkers, said this about Dr. McClure:

> Wherever he went he left hope and optimism in his path. Nobody could feel badly about life after Bob McClure had been through the room. That was his gift.
> He thought boredom was the main sin.

I agree entirely with Bruce McLeod. Dr. McClure was an extraordinary person. His love of and loyalty to Canada was combined with his impatience of our provincialisms and our laxness in our duty and attitude toward the rest of the world.

Such were the contributions of his life that, while we all send our sympathy to his wife and his family, we can do nothing else but rejoice in what he accomplished and the influence he has had, and will continue to have, on Canadians young and old.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, Dr. Bob McClure was a Sunday-school teacher of mine before I was a teenager. I have known him all my life, and all the remarks that have been made about him are absolutely, utterly and completely true. He was an inspirational man of the first order and I say that from the most intimate personal experience.

"HOODS ON THE HILL"

FORTHCOMING PUBLICATION OF POLITICAL COMMENTARY BY THE HONOURABLE ROYCE FRITH

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I had a rather delightful experience coming here in the airplane today. I read a column in today's Star by Carol Goar, which referred to the fact that we have a new author in our midst. He was referred to by Carol Goar as an "elegant senator". I cannot think of a more apt description for our colleague, and I think that from now on I will refer to him as His Elegancy.

Those of you who may not have read the Star this morning may not realize that I am referring to the Honourable Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. He has written a book which I am sure will go down in the annals of Canadian literature, along with the writings of Margaret Atwood, Alice Munro and others, about our Canadian political experience. He has called this book Hoods on the Hill.

I will reserve judgment about the merits of this book until I have had a chance to read it. However, I hope that such a book will not further contribute to the hard-ball political partisanship that has characterized this place and the House of Commons over the last year. A kettle-and-pot name-calling contest would never be appropriate in this place, let alone at this particular time in our history. I know that every member of the Joint Unity Committee is aware of the depth of the disillusionment and cynicism of the Canadian public about our political processes, about our politicians, and about our Parliament.

As an independent, I only know what I read in the newpapers or see on television. Will Rogers did not mention television. There must be many reasons why this joint committee temporarily fumbled. Maybe there are no reasons. Maybe there are just excuses. I hope this is a temporary breakdown.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator—

Senator Lang: I need just 15 seconds more, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted to extend the time, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lang: Thank you very much, honourable colleagues. The mandate of this joint committee must, in all seriousness, override partisan political concerns. It must be motivated by the spirit that motivated our Fathers of Confederation.

Honourable senators, we live on a planet that is in terrible shape, and I give you the examples of the Middle East, South America, and the self-destruction in Yugoslavia. However, as Canadians, we live in a blessed land; we are a blessed people. Let us be proud to promote that fact. I pray that this committee will reunite in an effort to bring all Canadians together so that we may enjoy the future we have inherited.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, although I deferred to Senator Lang, I have a point of order that I wish to raise, and I should like to be recognized.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Haidasz, according to Rule 23(1), your point of order can be taken after Question Period. The rule states:

> During the time provided for the consideration of the daily Routine of Business and the daily Question Period, it shall not be in order to raise any question of privilege or point of order . . . .

You may raise your point of order after Question Period.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I wish to rise, then, on a question of privilege.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is the same thing. Read the rules.

The Hon. the Speaker: The wait should not be very long, Senator Haidasz.

Senator Haidasz: I cannot wait.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, the 20th of November, I will move that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have the power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject matters and estimates as are referred to it.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF "CANADIAN CROSS" AS HIGHEST DISTINCTION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, 21st of November 1991, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Canadian Government's ill-advised plan to introduce the so-called "Canadian Cross" as the highest distinction for courage, thereby replacing the historic Victoria Cross, and to recommend to the Senate that the matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to examine the advisability of such action in light of the opposition of the vast majority of Canadian veterans and the demeaning of the heroism of not only those Canadian VC winners who have passed on, but those remaining; namely, Col. Fred Tilston, Lt. Col. CCI (Cecil) Merritt and Sgt. Ernest Alva "Smokey" Smith.

METROPOLITAN GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition from the Metropolitan General Insurance Company, of the City of Montreal, in the Province of Quebec, praying for the passage of an Act to amend the Act of Incorporation of the Metropolitan General Insurance Company, in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the province of Quebec.

AGRICULTURE

STATUS OF GATT NEGOTIATIONS—RESOLUTION OF GRAIN EXPORTS SUBSIDY WAR—FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR GRAINS SECTOR—REQUEST FOR UPDATES

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, there are two questions on which I would ask the Leader of the Government to give us an update, if he has the information with him. They are on very familiar subjects.

The first question is whether or not the GATT negotiations are proceeding at some satisfactory level, so that we can look forward to a resolution of what has been called the international export subsidy war on grain.

The second question relates to the matter of the proposed, promised or announced $800 million payment to farmers, particularly western grain farmers. When the announcement was made, the caveat was that the Minister of Finance did not know where he would get the money. He indicated that he was not willing to have a further deficit of that amount. Therefore, he expressed his intention to find the money from within the commitments. However, at that time he did not announce where he would obtain the money to make this payment in February or March.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us today where the money is coming from in order that there can be some assurance that the payment will be made at all?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): To take the second question first, honourable senators, my friend should be in no doubt whatever as to the intentions of the government to make the payments that we have announced we would make. I have put on the record here on several occasions some indication as to what farmers could expect between now and the end of the calendar year 1991, and during the first six months of 1992. To that I can only add that probably this week my colleague Mr. McKnight will be making a further announcement respecting a significant portion of the new moneys announced some weeks ago.

So far as the source of the money is concerned, that is a matter that is properly the field of the Minister of Finance. He will make an announcement in due course on that matter, and I do not intend to try to scoop him on that.

To take the first question relating to the progress being made at the GATT, all the reports that we have received in the government from the responsible ministers and from our advisers, including Ambassador Shannon who was in town today, indicate that there has been much better progress recently than had been the case hitherto. The progress that has been made within the European Community itself in reforming the common agricultural policy is one factor contributing to some optimism about the outcome of the GATT.

Further to that, there have been discussions between President Bush and Mr. Delors, as there have been between Prime Minister Mulroney and Mr. Delors. The evidence is that the two big traders, the United States and the European Economic Community, are seriously engaged in a discussion of the full range of trading issues, including agriculture.

[Senator Sylvain.]

Whether the issues that my friend refers to will be resolved is a question that cannot be answered definitively until next month, December, but in recent weeks there has been much cause for renewed optimism.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I hope that the renewed optimism and the fact that the two major powers, the United States and Europe, are now discussing this matter is indeed an indication of perhaps more positive things to come.

With respect, the question as to whether or not the government has obtained a sourcing for the $800 million is rather critical. I hope that the minister will not continue to confuse the issue with whether or not it was money that was committed under the GRIP and the NISA programs that was to be paid in 1991 in any event, based on the premium contributions that have been paid by the farmers who applied for those programs. That has nothing to do with the $800 million that was promised; it is quite apart from that, and that is the point I wanted to talk about.

The Minister of Finance, and I can refer honourable senators to quotations, made it very clear that there was not to be an addition to the deficit to pay the $800 million. That is not my invention; that is what he said.

Senator Murray: Right.

Senator Olson: So unless and until a source of funds is found, it is clear that what the minister was trying to indicate is that the government does not intend to borrow the money to make the payment. Therefore, until and unless he finds that he is able to take this money from present expenditures and transfer it for this payment, obviously it will not be made.

Many farmers are wondering whether or not the government will actually make the payment at all, because the recession in some respects has been far more expensive than the Minister of Finance anticipated when he brought down his budget some months ago. Therefore, if the government is already falling behind on its prediction of the size of the deficit—and it looks like it might be substantially higher quite apart from this payment—then the people who are hoping the payment will be made ought to know if and when, based on its commitments, the government feels that it is ready to say yes, the payment will be made. That is all I am asking. Have you found the money yet?

Senator Murray: I do not know what the purpose of that lecture was. I have told the honourable senator that my colleague the Minister of Agriculture will be making a statement, probably during the course of this week, which I think will be of interest to him and to the farmers. That is the job of the Minister of Agriculture. He can make that statement as to the timing and the modalities of the payments to the farmers having taken advice, having received advice and considered it from the third line of defence committees that have been meeting and advising him. That is the job of the Minister of Agriculture. The job of the Minister of Finance is to find the money, and when he has done that and is ready to make an announcement, he will make it. I think that is all my friend needs to know for the moment.

● (1450)

Senator Olson: No, my friend. Your friend has a very concerned person from western Canada who wants to know —

Senator Murray: You mean Conservative.

Senator Olson: Concerned, not Conservative. He wants to know, based on the qualifications that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture made, whether or not this government will make the payment at all, or if it is just a bunch of fluff. On the basis of what you just said, I am asking: Is the Minister of Agriculture in the process of trying to find a transfer of funds from some other program in the Department of Agriculture? I believe that is where his authority more or less begins and ends insofar as payments are concerned. Or will the Minister of Finance rearrange some of the financing that the government announced in its last budget in order to find the $800 million? He does not need to come back and fluff the issue. They have made it very clear; they said that they did not intend to borrow more money to make the payment.

Senator Murray: That is correct, honourable senators.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—EFFECT OF VIRUS INVESTIGATION ON SEED POTATO INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, since we are talking about agriculture, I would ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, on potatoes and the PVY-n virus. What is the status of the investigation of the Department of Agriculture concerning the PVY-n virus? Apparently, many of our farmers in Prince Edward Island had to plough down their potatoes, only to find out afterwards that the Department of Agriculture had made a mistake and that there was no PVY-n virus in them at all; that it was, in fact, another virus. Will the federal government, through the Department of Agriculture, now pay those farmers the many thousands of dollars that they have lost over their potato crops?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to obtain an up-to-date report from my colleague the Minister of Agriculture on that matter. As the honourable senator knows, the situation was the subject of very serious discussions between the premier and other officials of the Province of Prince Edward Island and the Minister of Agriculture and several of his federal colleagues last spring and summer. I am certainly under the impression that the solution that was arrived at was regarded by all sides as being a fair, equitable and practical solution under the circumstances. However, since my friend wants an update, I will try to obtain one from my colleague Mr. McKnight as soon as possible.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not disagree with what the Leader of the Government said here in the Senate. However, that was based on false information from the Department of Agriculture to the people of Prince Edward Island, to the farmers of Prince Edward Island, to the government of Prince Edward Island, because the tests apparently carried out by the federal inspectors were wrong. The potato farmers of Prince Edward Island would like to know what the federal government intends to do about this situation.

The Prince Edward Island seed potato is the best in the world. Because of the destruction of this year's crop due to the scare on this virus, this year's market is lost and the economy of Prince Edward Island is now in a very serious situation. The farmers are also facing a very serious situation. I would appreciate it, if the Leader of the Government would bring forth an update on what has taken place in November, 1991, as opposed to what took place in May, 1991.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator must surely be aware that the problem arose when the United States closed its border to the potatos from Prince Edward Island, alleging that the virus to which the honourable senator refers was present in shipments going across the border. This was the subject of considerable discussions between Canadian and United States authorities at the time, and later between the responsible federal and provincial ministers. The honourable senator is making some quite sweeping allegations, and I will indeed want to obtain a written report from my colleague and bring it to the attention of the house as soon as possible.

Senator Bonnell: I would just inform the Leader of the Government that although the U.S. authorities indeed stopped potatoes from entering the United States from Prince Edward Island, it was because of information that was passed on to them by the inspectors from the federal Department of Agriculture. They told the Americans that our potatoes had this virus, and the Americans said, "Well, we do not want those potatos to come across our border." We have been led down the garden path by the federal government, and their advice has been instrumental in ruining the best industry we had in our province, namely the seed potato industry.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—LOCATION OF CONSTRUCTION HEADQUARTERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to have an update on what is to take place with respect to the fixed link that is to be constructed between the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Now that there is the possibility that the rest of Canada and North America might like to join us and become part of our province, I understand that the premier of our province has said that there will be no fixed link, and that he will not let Canada join with us, unless the head office for the construction of the link is in Prince Edward Island. Has the government of Canada agreed to that as part of the terms of construction? If so, it looks very much like the rest of you may become part of our province in the future.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask my colleague Mr. MacKay the Minister of Public Works for a report on this matter. Meanwhile, may I say that we are still waiting patiently for a statement from the honourable senator as to whether he supports or opposes the fixed link.

WESTERN SAHARA

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSED PEACE PLAN—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to ask another western question, but this time about the western Sahara. Senators will be aware that in September a peace plan was to take effect in the dispute that had been going for many years in the western Sahara. Reports now indicate that this peace plan is not being implemented.

Senators will note that Canadian forces are the largest part of the peace-keeping contingent currently in the western Sahara. It is my understanding that there are no observers or journalists being allowed into the area to look at the implementation of this peace plan and that there is yet another green march coming from Morocco into the area.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate three questions. First, can he tell us what the situation is of the Canadian forces who are part of the peace-keeping mission? Second, can he tell us what Canada is doing to discover the condition, and possibly relieve the condition, of civilians in the refugee camps? Third, can he tell us whether any Canadian observers and journalists are in the area, or will be shortly in the area?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret to say that my notes on this matter are far too old to be of much use in view of the questions that the honourable senator has just asked. I will attempt to get a more up-to-date report from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and bring it before the Senate in the course of the present week.

HONOURABLE LORNA MARSDEN

FELICITATIONS ON APPOINTMENT AS CHANCELLOR OF WILFRID LAURIER UNIVERSITY

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must take advantage of this first opportunity provided by Senator Marsden to offer my congratulations, and the warmest congratulations of all of us, to the honourable senator on her appointment as Chancellor of Wilfrid Laurier University.

Hon. John B. Stewart: It is very clear, honourable senators, that the Honourable Senator Marsden will be running a very tight ship at the university.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (1500)

WESTERN SAHARA

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSED PEACE PLAN—PRESENCE OF CANADIAN TROOPS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to the question raised by Senator Marsden.

I believe the Canadian government also dispatched some troops to the western Sahara. Could the minister at the same time report on the status of that group, where they are and how many are involved?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there was a very small number at first. I will obtain a report from my colleague.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, it may have been a small number, but it is the largest contingent. Canada has more people there than any other nation and is therefore looked to to provide leadership in this area. It worries me that the minister's notes are not up to date on this issue. It is exactly the nature of the problem that areas such as western Sahara have been trying to deal with for years. I am sure we would all be grateful if that report could come in as soon as possible.

CANADA-FRANCE FISHERIES AND BOUNDARIES AGREEMENT

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—STATUS OF ARBITRATION ON TERRIRITORIAL SEAS

Hon. John B. Stewart: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what progress we may anticipate over the next few weeks in the arbitration with regard to the claims of France concerning the Canadian territorial sea adjacent to the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon? If his homework is not up to date, an answer tomorrow or the next day would be acceptable to me, although perhaps not to Senator Marsden.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all I can tell the honourable senator today is that the decision on the Maritimes boundary is expected early in 1992.

Senator Stewart: May I ask the honourable senator, then, if it is expected that the board will give its decision at the time that was anticipated when the board was given this reference, and if there is to be a delay, then what regime will apply insofar as fish quotas are concerned in the disputed waters?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am informed that an agreement signed by Canada and France in March provides that the quotas are extended on a quarterly basis until a decision has been handed down. The agreement does not provide for quotas past the end of 1992.

I am not sure what date was foreseen concerning a decision at the time the process began. However, my information is that we still expect the boundary decision in early 1992.

TRANSPORT

SHIPMENT OF CANADIAN GRAIN THROUGH U.S. PORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators are aware of the fact that very vigorous competition exists on the west coast of North America with respect to the use of port facilities.

An item which has distressed many people living in British Columbia occurred last week when it was announced that some shipments of Canadian grain will now be shipped through the ports of Seattle and Tacoma in the State of Washington. The grain workers' union and the longshoremen on the west coast insist that there is the capacity in Vancouver to undertake those shipments from British Columbia ports.

Will the Leader of the Government tell us whether the shipment—

Senator Barootes: They're on strike!

Senator Perrault: No, they are not on strike, honourable senators. I would ask Senator Barootes not to denigrate the responsible trade union people on the west coast when the facts are simply not in accord with his prejudices.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the announced action to ship barley and other grains through the Port of Seattle constitutes a change in policy on the part of the Government of Canada? After all, we were assured that the free trade arrangement with the United States meant jobs, jobs, jobs. We felt these jobs would be Canadian jobs and not American jobs.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will obtain a report on the specific situation to which the honourable senator refers.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

STATUS OF LIBERAL PARTY POLICY—RESCISSION OF TAX ON BOOKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As reported in the Toronto Star of November 16 by George Oake, the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, Mr. Chrétien, went west for four days. Apparently, the trip delighted his Alberta fans.

It is also reported in the same paper that Mr. Chrétien went west to obtain a higher profile and to hammer home his policies. He talks about some of his policies, including a promise that the goods and services tax would vanish under a Liberal government.

On November 15, 1991, Le Soleil reported about the same trip, and I quote:

> The Liberal leader Jean Chrétien promised yesterday that he would get rid of the GST on books if he forms the next government, but that it will be maintained on several other goods and services, he added.

Of course, I do not want government policy to follow the about-turns and changes of heart of our friend Mr. Chrétien.

Nevertheless, the tax on books is a problem. Others brought this up a while back. I would like to know if there is, within government, any sign of an exemption or provision that might foster the sale of books and, thus, provide relief to editors and potential buyers.

I know this kind of thing is normally discussed and announced at budget time, but I would like to get from Senator Murray assurances that, like several of us, he will keep doing his best to bring relief to this segment of the industry.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as with any tax measure, the government takes into consideration the impact of the GST on various industries. We will act accordingly in due course.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed responses to questions raised in the Senate on September 24 by the Honourable Senator Marsden regarding Sri Lanka; by the Honourable Senator Everett on October 22 regarding the Bank of Canada; and by the Honourable Senator Marshall regarding the time requirements for Order Paper questions. I have one answer to a question raised by the Honourable Senator Molgat on October 23 regarding the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement—Duty on Live Hogs. I have responses to three questions raised on October 29 by the Honourable Senator Grafstein regarding France and Germany—Proposal to Form Joint Military Troop; one by the Honourable Senator Olson regarding international grain sales and the interest charges related thereto; and one by the Honourable Senator Molgat regarding the Great Whale Project.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SRI LANKA—POSSIBLE IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT—HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES—EFFECTS OF CIVIL WAR—ECONOMIC AID AND DEVELOPMENT—CANADIAN ROLE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on September 24, 1991)

> The Sri Lankan Parliament reconvened on September 23. There were two days of inconclusive debate on the impeachment motion, following which Parliament recessed until October 8. Following the reconvening of Parliament, the Speaker dismissed the impeachment motion on the grounds of insufficient votes to carry it.

secessionists, and the attendant human rights abuses. We have made clear on several occasions, including the U.N. Commission on Human Rights annual hearings and the annual donor consortium meeting, that we believe both sides in the conflict bear a responsibility to ensure the safety of civilians and to observe their human rights.

Canada is continuing to provide aid to Sri Lanka. Official Development Assistance is budgeted at $14 million annually, and is focused on human resources development and training, support to voluntary and non-governmental organizations, and support to small scale entrepreneurs and self-help projects.

Additionally, the Government has offered to share its experience in constitutional reform, federal-provincial relations, devolution of powers, bilingualism, and multiculturalism to assist and encourage Sri Lanka to resolve the current conflict in a peaceful and equitable manner. A Sri Lankan mission was scheduled to visit Canada in September but has been postponed. A senior representative of the office of official languages was in Sri Lanka in late October to assess the need for language guidelines and legislation, and the nature of assistance that Canada could offer.

NATIONAL FINANCE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Douglas D. Everett on October 22, 1991)

Amending the Bank of Canada Act so that the mandate of the Bank of Canada will be to preserve price stability does not mean that monetary policy will be ignoring growth, employment and the exchange rate.

Changing the Bank's mandate merely recognizes the fact that, in the longer term, the only contribution that monetary policy can make to sustained economic progress is to preserve the purchasing power of Canadian money; that is, to ensure price stability.

The experience of countries like Germany and Japan demonstrates that low inflation does not detract from economic growth. Rather, it enhances growth. Indeed our own experience demonstrates this. During the low-inflation 1950s and 1960s economic growth was much higher in Canada than in the higher-inflation 1970s and early 1980s.

Achieving and maintaining price stability is the only way to secure permanently lower interest rates, support strong sustainable growth, and avoid the erosion of the real living standards of those on fixed incomes.

Canada is not alone in emphasizing the importance of price stability. It is the key objective underlying monetary policy in a number of industrialized countries. The importance of price stability is reflected in the communique from the July London G-7 Economic Summit meeting: "Our shared objectives are a sustained recovery and price stability."

We realize, of course, that price stability cannot be attained immediately. As well, there will, from time to time, be disturbances that cause temporary deviations from price stability. Our commitment to price stability does not mean that other economic goals and objectives will be ignored. Indeed, in the Canadian Federalism and Economic Union document, it is stated that:

> "In determining the desired path toward price stability, and the appropriate pace to return to price stability following (economic disturbances), monetary policy should be conducted with due cognizance of the path to price stability that best contributes to other Canadian economic objectives".

NEWFOUNDLAND

This matter was originally discussed in the House of Commons in 1975. A study followed, which resulted in the issuing of "cost approximations" of the average Order Paper question. This was done periodically from 1975 up until the current session.

The Government House Leader decided that it would be useful to give more accurate figures to ensure that MPs and Senators would be made aware of the associated costs of their enquiries. Thus, last spring, the Parliamentary Returns Division (PRD) of the Office of the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons was requested to set up a cost accounting system to identify time consuming questions and determine their cost while minimizing the time and cost of the exercise.

Based on the 1975 experience, it was decided that respondents would only provide the approximate total number of hours/minutes spent to prepare each response. The total number of hours/minutes includes the approximate time spent on all preparation steps i.e.: assignment, research, preparation, editing, coordinating, typing, computer time, review, translation, approval, printing, etc.

The formula is: Time spent to prepare response multiplied by the hourly rate of the Public Service plus printing cost, if voluminous.

Recent Changes

On October 2,1991 the Speaker of the House of Commons ruled that the inclusion of these figures was an unnecessary addition to the answer therefore should not be continued (Commons debates, October 2, 1991, pages 3147-48).

As a result, the practise of pricing answers has been terminated in the Senate. In the Commons however, what now occurs is that an enquiry is tabled requesting a cost and time analysis for Order Paper questions answered during a specific time frame (Commons debates, October 9, 1991, page 3521).

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

U.S. DUTY ON LIVE HOGS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas Molgat on October 23, 1991)

This duty increase is part of the normal administrative review process under U.S. countervailing duty law. With the publication of each review of the 1985 countervailing duty order, the duty can be adjusted both up or down—as it has been over the past five years. The rate of duty is tied to the degree of support provided to the Canadian industry. Basically, assistance under the tripartite stabilization programme.

Government officials have been in touch with the industry to discuss this duty increase.

The final determination in the fourth review is now being reviewed by a binational panel under Chapter 19 of the FTA and the Government is a party to those proceedings. We understand that the industry is also considering binational panel review of this recent determination. Should the industry decide to do so, the Government will also join in that review.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCE AND GERMANY—PROPOSAL TO FORM JOINT MILITARY TROOP

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein on October 29, 1991)

The Government has received preliminary reports of the Franco-German proposal. European community states' aspirations to express a common security and defence policy are a natural development in the process of European integration. A recent U.K.-Italy statement is also relevant in this regard.

The choice of the mechanism for the evolution of a European defence and military security pillar (the Western European Union or some other institution) is purely a European decision.

Canada welcomes the development of a European defence and security pillar. It is essential, however, that a European army pillar not compete with NATO, but evolve in close cooperation with the Alliance. A stronger European defence and security identity is essential to the revitalisation of NATO. This was affirmed at the London Summit in July 1990 and in the meeting of NATO Foreign Ministers' meeting in Copenhagen in June 1991.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INTEREST CHARGES RELATED TO INTERNATIONAL GRAIN SALES

(Response to question raised by Hon. H.A. Olson on October 29, 1991)

There have never been any payments made by the federal government under the guarantee to the Canadian Wheat Board and the banks. The credit extended by the Canadian Wheat Board to its customers is debt that is backed by the sovereign guarantee of repayment from the importing country. Sovereign debt is ultimately collectible.

Neither the Canadian Wheat Board nor the producers' monies are used to pay interest charges on extended credit since interest on credit extended to purchasing countries accumulates to the account of that country. The Canadian Wheat Board is, in effect, borrowing funds to cover interest payments and adding the funds borrowed to cover interest to the total amount owed by the purchasing country. There has not been any risk for either the Canadian Wheat Board or the producers on whose behalf the Canadian Wheat Board is selling grain. The federal government guarantee of repayment by the purchasing country includes both the principal and accumulated interest.

THE ENVIRONMENT

GREAT WHALE PROJECT—EFFECT OF DAMS ON GREENHOUSE EMISSIONS

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on October 29, 1991)

Dr. John Rudd was denied permission to travel to the New York hearings on the Great Whale hydroelectric project by his Regional Director General in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, Mr. Paul Sutherland.

It is not unusual for applications for travel by scientists to be refused. There are many more requests than available funds and choices are made on the most responsible use of departmental budgets and scientists time. In the instance quoted, the personal appearance of Dr. Rudd at the hearings was not felt to be warranted.

Dr. Rudd and other researchers have conducted studies on the release of methane and carbon dioxide from flooded peatlands and have hypothesized that increased amounts of greenhouse gases from flooding due to hydroelectric projects may require serious consideration. The hypothesis and results from previous research into this question, including papers by Dr. Rudd, have been published and are freely available in the scientific literature.

Any number of scientists, including several from New York State universities, could have speculated on the importance of the hypothesis at the New York City hearings. However, for the present, rigorous scientific proof is missing and until it is obtained, the hypothesis remains an hypothesis. To remedy the situation, a 5-year research program into this question has recently been started at the Experimental Lakes Area of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. The project involves 15 researchers from Canada and the United States. Results will be disseminated as they become available.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION OR TRANSFER AUTHORIZATION BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John T. Eyton moved the third reading of Bill C-8.

He said: Honourable senators, I previously spoke to this bill at second reading, and there is no need to say more now, except to refer to my conclusion at that time. With this bill, the government is getting out of inappropriate roles and allocating tasks where they can best be performed without additional overheads. We are recognizing that, when a job is completed, the agency that did the job should be phased out. These are actions that can and should be supported. The savings from these initiatives are modest, but the initiatives are, nonetheless, a clear indication of a process of critical self-evaluation that should be welcomed.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce examined the bill and reported it without amendment, but made a special note, and I would like to share that note with you. The note reads:

> The Committee recommends that Bill C-8 be passed without amendment, but wishes to add a special note in reference to Canada Harbour Place Corporation in Vancouver and the Harbourfront Corporation in Toronto. These corporations have provided an important federal presence in Vancouver and Toronto respectively, contributing significantly to national unity through their programs and activities. It is the desire of Committee members that the organization created to succeed these corporations ensure that the momentum achieved continues, and that national unity remains a significant focus.

With regard to these special notes, and touching on Canada Harbour Place Corporation, the government has indicated that Canada Harbour Place Corporation is to remain a federal entity so that its good work can continue.

Touching on Harbourfront Corporation, the government wants to remove itself from the development business while fulfilling a commitment to the people of Toronto to create parks on the waterfront. In order to do this, the government proposes to dissolve Harbourfront Corporation and use the proceeds from the sale of Harbourfront real estate to create a trust fund that will provide income to a local independent programming entity. This entity will continue to provide the programming activities in parks along the waterfront which are open to all Canadians and which, of course, are enormously popular. I think they attract something like 3.5 million visitors a year.

This decision by the government is consistent with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Future Toronto Waterfront, and it is supported by the Province of Ontario.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Eyton: I will give it a try.

Senator Molgat: I do not understand clearly the statement he has made, but with regard to Canada Harbour Place in Vancouver, he said that this is to remain a federal entity. Can he explain what it is that the government intends?

Senator Eyton: I am not sure that that is precisely defined at this moment. The Minister of Transport is the responsible minister. It is a surviving company, created in 1982, and it related to the Expo that was conducted in Vancouver in 1986. Its operations today are modest. The conclusion was reached that the parent Crown corporation is not needed to operate the facility, and the government therefore proposes that the program be absorbed by another federal entity. That could very well be the Department of Transport.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned to the next sitting of the Senate.

THE RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the third reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Railway Act (grains and flour subsidies).

Hon. H. A. Olson: I do not know whether Senator Kelly intends to reply to some of the questions that were raised from time to time, but I think there are some senators who would be interested.

Quite frankly, I do not have my notes in front of me, but it does seem to me that there were some vital interests respecting those industries which were, at least to some extent, the recipients of the benefits paid under this bill, normally referred to as the At and East subsidy. What will happen to them? Are we just to let them die, in the same way as several processing industries in the Maritime provinces which will now have no access to this program? I would hope that there would be some answers. If Senator Kelly does not intend to say anything more about it, that must be the end of it. However, I think there were a number of questions raised. Normally on third reading, the sponsor of the bill will reply—I would not say it is an answer all of the time, but at least he replies to the queries that are raised.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I am certain that Senator Olson has made it his business to examine the minutes of the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation, where questions were raised with officials and the best answers available were put forward at that time.

I believe I did say in my remarks at second reading that, in my view—and I note that it was reflected also in the comments on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation—it is incumbent on government to provide some transitional planning, some process of transition that makes the removal of that subsidy somewhat more palatable.

I have to confess that I share some dissatisfaction, as did the committee, with the extent to which these discussions have gone on without reaching the kind of finality which I would have preferred. I would refresh Senator Olson's memory, if I may, by reading the comments which were appended to the report which recommended the passage of the bill without amendment.

I quote from that report:

> "We are of the opinion that when a sector industrial structure evolves in response to an artificial regulatory framework—as the Halifax and St. John operations did in response to the At and East subsidy—it is incumbent upon the government to provide adequate transitional assistance when that government changes the regulatory framework.
> As of October 22, 1991, the Committee was not satisfied that the needed transitional assistance was evident, let alone in effect.

That was a unanimous comment by the Committee. There was no dissension.

There is no question that there will be, and there is now, some short-term hardship being visited there as a result of the removal of that subsidy. Beyond that, in response to Senator Olson's comments, I can repeat that I, too, share some impatience to see some of this transitional assistance put in place.

Senator Olson: I should point out to Senator Kelly, the sponsor of this bill, that it is not quite good enough to just come back to the Senate and say that all those replies, and therefore answers, were given in the committee. There are a great many people who are interested in what is happening to the provisions of this bill who do not get a transcript of the committee meeting. In fact, I am not even sure it is ready. It may be. I am not questioning whether it is or not, but the transcript is sometimes very late in coming from some of the committee meetings. It may be ready, as I said, and I do not want to question that. I simply want him to realize that when it gets to third reading in this place, the people who are vitally interested in what is happening have a right to at least a brief explanation of what took place with regard to the questions which were raised here and in the committee so that they can have some guidance.

Perhaps the senator can tell us what the government's response was to the observations that were made by the committee when it referred the bill back to this place for third reading. The indication was that the members of the committee were not happy with what the government is doing with this bill, but they went on to say that we should pass it without amendment. Surely, between that time and today there could have been some response from the government to the committee's observation and recommendation that something tangible be done. Did the government respond to that recommendation in a way that can be useful to the people who will be severely affected by the passage of this bill?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I think it is fairly well known that I have great enthusiasm and affection for Senator Olson but, as usual, in my opinion, he is mischievously attempting to embarrass me on this issue.

Senator Olson: Never.

Senator Kelly: First, I have spent nine years in this chamber and I am still learning how the system is supposed to work. There is no question that a number of senators in this place were deeply concerned about the removal of the At and East subsidy. I have to believe that those senators who had that concern would have made it their business to attend the committee meeting. I know a number of them did. I regret that, even though I was the sponsor, I was unable to attend and that is why I made very certain to get the transcript and read carefully what questions were raised and what answers were given. I do not believe it is my role to rehearse all of that material for the benefit of those who did not find it possible to attend the committee when the officials were brought before it.

Senator Olson: That is a new approach to passing legislation: You either go to committee or you do not know.

Senator Kelly: I want to call to the attention of the Senate that I did what Senator Frith does. I sat down quickly while Senator Olson was speaking. I want to show that I am learning that too.

The officials who were invited to come before the committee were officials who we felt could best answer the questions that were raised in this chamber at the time the bill was introduced here. They were held out to us as the best available, given the particular concerns that had been expressed in this chamber.

In answer to the question of where we stand now, I have no further knowledge that we are any further ahead than we were at the time we said we should get something better than we had. That is not much of an answer, but that is the way it is.

In answer to the question of the ongoing responsibility of the committee, it has always been my belief, and I know it is shared by most in this chamber, that where a committee of this chamber makes comments such as, "We believe it is incumbent upon the government to provide adequate transitional assistance when the government changes the regulatory framework", it is incumbent on that committee to follow up with the government and not believe its job is done simply by way of the committee saying that this is not good enough. We must have something more.

I note that the chairman of the Transport Committee is not here at this moment, but I know he shares the view that the committee will have a responsibility to continue to do whatever has to be done to press the government to carry out what we believe to be its clear responsibility.

Senator Olson: Very good. That is better.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, in case some of you might not know or might have forgotten, this bill was first introduced by this government on June 16, 1989, as Bill C-26. It was shelved and eventually died on the Order Paper when the 2nd Session of the 34th Parliament tragically ended, then resurrected during the 3rd Session as Bill C-11.

For my colleagues and myself, this bill exemplified the failure of this government and its habitual lack of consultations on anything having to do with the business of this nation, however small. If only this government consulted, if only it knew how, perhaps it would gain half a point in the polls.

The Act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies) was a personal initiative of the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, the father of the GST and author of a host of regressive fiscal measures, he who claimed he could tame our national debt which,incidentally, grew consistently bigger under his yoke. Mr. Wilson is now going around the country to try and restore the confidence of his favourite consituency, the financial community, through million-dollar programs.

A few people still believe in it, but many more—they are legion actually—have had it with the Mulroney government. Wilson and Mulroney have brought the recession upon us, suffocated our economy, killed initiative and sown despair. This is their legacy.

This, for the government and its cohort of blind supporters, is an insignificant bill. They will tell you: "Never mind that we acted undemocratically. There were no discussions prior to making a decision. Let us turn the page. It is no use crying over spilt milk."

We would have expected an honourable senator from the Atlantic region to sponsor this bill in the Senate. But they refused to do so and made it clear to their caucus.

[English]

Senator Kelly, a farmer from the City of Toronto, speaking at the second reading of Bill C-11, said:

> This bill implements an undertaking made by the former Minister of Finance in his budget of April 1989.

Undertaking indeed. How perspicacious the comments of Senator Kelly. How acutely discerning of him to have so coolly emphasized what every Canadian has known all along, that Mr. Wilson is indeed the undertaker of our national economy.

In the House of Commons, 38 opposition members spoke during debate on Bill C-26 and Bill C-11. A single government member rose, on several occasions, to try and save appearances for the government, and may be his seat in Halifax. There were more than 80 strong interventions on the part of opposition members at various stages of the bill, not to mention the proceedings in committee, where witnesses were often furious against the government.

For those willing to understand, it was clear that something was rotten in the kingdom of Canada, especially in the East.

[Senator Olson.]

Here, in the Senate, those on the government side were so ashamed to be seen supporting this legislation (except for Senator MacDonald (Halifax) who, as chairman of the Committee on Transport and Communications could not objectively be happy or ashamed) that they felt compelled to put out "observations", attached to the report from the committee, that I will quote:

> We are of the opinion that when a sector's industrial structure evolves in response to an artificial regulatory framework—as the Halifax and St. John operations did in response to the At and East subsidy—it is incumbent upon the government to provide adequate transitional assistance when that government changes the regulatory framework.

We have to remember that the original text of Senator Forrestall was amended by Senator Eyton. The original said: "adequate adjustments" or something like that. The report then says:

> As of October 22, 1991, the Committee was not satisfied that the needed transitional assistance . . .

Another word added by Senator Eyton "transitional"

> . . . was evident, let alone in effect.

I was just quoting from the third report from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, dated Wednesday, October 23, 1991.

After the testimony it received, the committee was probably, in fact was definitely right to make this comment, considering that the subsidies had ceased to exist as of July 15, 1989! The situation had indeed become embarrassing.

It is really too bad the committee failed to mention the methods used by the Minister of Finance at the time to terminate the subsidy: Elimination without prior consultation. Even worse: the government refused to consider serious proposals for adjusting the program to the current situation, which were submitted to the government in 1985 by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission. I will get back to that in a minute, because what is particularly striking is the government's cavalier and arrogant attitude and its assumption that the situation cannot be turned around. Granted, the government has an impressive majority, but is that any excuse for throwing common sense overboard? What is left of the concept of partnership between government and business?

It is useless to retrace the history of the subsidy or to mention the millions of dollars injected for so many years in various economic sectors. And why point to all the jobs that were lost as a result of the Tory government's hatchet job? Why bother to repeat that this government has further weakened railway transportation in this country? These comments and many others can be found in the Debates of the House of Commons. The government's attitude is that all this is now history. We now have to dispose of the rotting remains.

Senator Forrestall wrote the comment that appeared in the committee's report. When he sat in the House of Commons, he was a vociferous defender of the transportation subsidies he felt were essential to the economy of the Atlantic region and his beloved Port of Halifax—Dartmouth.

However, there is not a word in these comments on the purpose of the subsidy or its elimination. We can assume that the only Tory senator from the Atlantic region who participated in the debate swallowed in one gulp the reasons given by Mr. Wilson and his bureaucrats. I am astonished. This reminds me of sea cucumbers which swallow themselves when they are upset.

The situation is this: We have a text that gently chides the naughty government and turns a blind eye to its arrogance and mistakes. Just a simple comment. No shouts, no prayers. Just a comment.

What I found particulary surprising in the committee's analysis was the interpretation given by Senator Eyton. He was here a moment ago but he just left.

He started by stating that it was a good bill, and I quote:

• (1530)

> . . . is headed in the right direction. In fact, the subsidy did encourage the companies and the individuals to do things that they wouldn't otherwise do and that really did not make any economic or rational sense.

Senator Eyton would perhaps want to explain to Senator Phillips from Prince Edward Island, his whip, or to Senator Buchanan, a former Nova Scotia premier, his dogma on federal subsidies. I am sure they would want to respond.

[Translation]

So be advised, corporations, companies, and businessmen of the Atlantic region that in the first place you have no right to share in the coutnry's economy unless you are pure, that is, provided you were not tainted by any government subsidy. The only ones who will be favoured will be those to which nature, geography, climate, fortune and politics have given everything they could wish for, that is, everything that moves along the Canadian-American border between the city of Quebec and the Toronto satellites.

Secondly, Senator Eyton told only half the truth, the reality which followed the 1989 budget, and he kept silent about the other half, the reality which has preceeded by a few years the unilateral presentation of the budget. It might be ignorance on his part. I grant him that. However, he told the committee:

[English

> . . . The notice was there, the parties were involved.

That is on page E-6.

He is right to talk about a process that followed the budget, although the dice were loaded in advance anyway: there are no more subsidies; the program has been done for since July 15, 1989! So is it a consultation or a post mortem? However, he is quite mistaken to talk about apre-budget process. The facts indicate otherwise.

In its brief of September 1989, the Transport Commission of the Atlantic Provinces said:

> In 1985—
> About four years before the Wilson Budget of Spring 1989,
> —in response to an invitation from the Department of Transportation—

—of the federal government—

> the TCAP developed and presented specific proposals to make the subsidy program more efficient, while meeting three regional economic objectives, namely to maintain the operational viability of the grain elevators in Halifax and Saint John, to maintain the commercial viability of the Halifax flour mill and to maintain the steady movement by rail of grain and flour for export through the ports of Halifax and Saint John.
> Changes proposed by the TCAP would have enabled—

Note this, honourable senators!

> —the federal government to save—starting in 1985

> —about $22 million in transport subsidies per year, approximately half the total cost of the subsidy program at that time.

I refer you to pages 5 and 6 of the brief from the Transport Commission of the Atlantic Provinces. Does that sound like blind determined attachment to the federal government's subsidy program? Answer, you who accuse us.

What did the Mulroney-Wilson government do for four years in response to TCAP's proposal? Nothing! Zero! The brief that I just quoted adds this stinging comment:

> The federal government never followed up TCAP's proposals!

That is on page 6 of the brief.

The executioner thought it better to cut it off. Decapitation first, negotiation later. My, that Mr. Wilson was funny!

• (1540)

[English]

Mr. Ramsay M. S. Armitage, currently General Manager of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, the most respected and competent institution of its kind in all of Canada, I do not hesitate to say, said on May 17, 1990 before the Commons Legislative Committee on Bill C-26, as reported on page 22:

> No, we were not consulted . . . we had every right to be consulted . . .
> We suggested some changes. I would have to say to you, no, we were not consulted. We were not advised of the budget decision [beforehand] and we did not have an opportunity to contribute in any way to addressing the situation at that time.

So there you have it; the government's big lie exposed.

[Translation]

Here is what Mr. John Doering, Vice-President of Dover Mills Limited, from Halifax, said to the legislative committee on Bill C-26 on Thursday, May 17, 1990, one year after it was announced unilaterally that the federal subsidy would disappear. Please refer to page 23, Issue No. 2.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform you that according to Rule 38(4), you only have one minute left.

Senator Corbin: How nice of you! Parliament is really the place for democracy!

[English]

I quote from Mr. Doering's testimony.

> . . . first of all, were we consulted? No, the industry was not consulted. We, on our part as part of the Canadian National Millers Association, have made a number of presentations and briefs sent to all kinds of people in government relative to this issue. We have accepted that there could be some changes in "At and East" and would recommend changes and a number of offsets. This goes back again many years. The last groups . . .

"Of representations", I suppose is what he means.

> . . . was in April 1985. We did not receive replies to those presentations.

Honourable senators, that was four years before the budget measures. That is damning evidence that blows to pieces the government affirmations of consultation.

Above all, I marveled at how different regions in Canada helped one another, through the central government, as Senator Eyton had seen it:

[English]

I quote him:

> It's the transitional help we are looking for. And when I say "transitional" I mean something that will come to an end, because otherwise it doesn't make economic sense.

[Translation]

Those are the warm feelings of the honourable Senator towards the Atlantic region. With nice people like him, who can speak for a united, rational and efficient Canada? Thus, the Mulroney-Wilson philosophy carries on in the Senate.

Let me tell you that this "transitional help", and I quote Senator Eyton:

> . . . we have it since the beginning of Confederation.

It is up to you to decide if you would rather have the assistance or the region. If you choose the region, please tell us how we can survive economically in this country, apart from moving outright to Ontario. If you have no answer, please don't get carried away on the rightist conservative philosophy.

The Senator was most candid when he said:

[English]

> I have a personal association with a flour company . . .
> The flour mill industry in Eastern Canada . . .

[Translation]

What did he mean by "Eastern Canada"?

[Senator Corbin.]

> is making dramatic changes—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the honourable senator's time is up. Is leave granted for him to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Corbin: Thank you, honourable senators. I continue quoting Senator Eyton:

> The flour mill industry in Eastern Canada . . . is making dramatic changes today in response to all sorts of changes that are happening in the world market, such as the anticipated impacts of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Well, who created that? The current government of course. Then he says:

> On the other hand, I understand that it is necessary to deal with people fairly . . .

I could not believe my eyes when I read this. Senator Eyton says:

> On the other hand, I understand that it is necessary to deal with people fairly and to make sure that they have lots of notice and to try to assist them in accommodating that change.

[Translation]

You may be redeemed by these last words, Senator Eyton, if this is your way of admitting that, in the case of bill C-26 and bill C-11, the Government has not really carried out any consultation or given any notice; that he has ignored constructive and realistic proposals from the transport commission of the Atlantic provinces and from companies which were directly affected by these policies. The Government has moved unilaterally, causing anxiety and most of all, creating instability, which is contrary to any healthy management of the economy that you like so much to advocate.

What will the Government do with the committee recommendation? Well, what it likes, it will probably ignore it. It is the cavalier way with which it treats all recommendations, suggestions and ideas which come from the Senate.

So, I would tell my honourable colleagues opposite: do not waste your time with the proposals before the Senate. If you want some action, put forward your arguments in your caucus in presence of the Prime Minister, because it is getting late. Thank you.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Castonguay, that this bill be read a third time. Is is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: On division?

Senator Molgat: On division.

Senator Corbin: On a point of order, is Senator Kelly not going to—he is not listening. Senator Kelly, may I have your attention, please? Since you will probably be moving up to more important responsibilities soon, you should pay attention. If I may suggest—

Senator Doyle: Order.

Senator Corbin: You do not like that kind of a talk; you like to have it your way. Shake your heads all you want; some day your heads will drop off your shoulders. Be careful.

Senator Kelly, what do you intend to do with the observation? Do you intend to introduce a motion that the observation be sent down to the other place, or do you intend to let it die? What is its worth?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I do not know what more I can say in response to Senator Corbin's question than what I have already said. I would comment to this extent, however: Senator Corbin has suggested that the other place or the government does not listen to recommendations of Senate committees.

Senator Corbin: That has been the history up till now.

Senator Kelly: I would have to say that my personal experience—and senators who have been here for a while well know my concerns and interest over the years on the question of international terrorism and the extent of preparedness in this country to deal with crises of that sort—that the Terrorism committee reports prepared and sent—and Senator Corbin was a member of that committee—were listened to. Substantial changes were made to plans that had been described to us initially as being solid, well-thought through, and so forth. We were able to cause changes to be made. I am confident that in this instance the same thing can apply.

As I said before, and will say again, it is the intent of the Transport committee to pursue the matter. There are many senators on this side who agree with the need for transitional assistance but who do not agree with the opportunity that Senator Corbin took to lambaste the government in a very general way. However, I cannot fault him for that since he is a partisan fellow, and very active in his party.

That is about the best I can do in response, Senator Corbin. I think the message is there. The recommendation accompanies the report of the committee, and the follow-up is something that will take place.

Senator Corbin: Senator Kelly, if you do not accept any of the facts that I laid before the Senate today, I wish you would stand up and refute each and every one of them.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

GRASSE, FRANCE

COMMEMORATION OF LIBERATION OF SOUTHERN FRANCE—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On the Inquiry by the Honourable Senator Waters:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the commemoration on the 24th August, 1991, in Grasse, France, of the liberation of Southern France by the U.S.-Canadian First Special Service Force and gallant members of the French resistance.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for obvious reasons, this item should be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

ADJOURNMENT

MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES WITHDRAWN

On the motion by the Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government):

> That the Senate suspend Rule 6(1) and (2) and Rule 14 for the duration of the period commencing upon the adoption of this order and concluding at not later that 2:00 o'clock p.m., Monday, October 7, 1991.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for obvious reasons, this item should be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Molgat: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

QUEEN'S PRINTER FOR CANADA
OTTAWA, 1978

APPENDIX B

The Indian Health Regulations were enacted pursuant to the authority conferred on the Governor in Council by section 73 of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.I-5. In accordance with section 19(3) of the Statute Revision Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.S-20, the Regulations were reviewed by the Joint Committee on January 20, 1983.

The provisions subject to disallowance are found in Part I of the Regulations which applies to: (a) every Indian who ordinarily resides on a reserve, (b) every Indian who follows the Indian mode of life whether or not he ordinarily resides on a reserve, and (c) every person other than an Indian who resides on a reserve.

In the judgement of the Joint Committee, sections 8 and 13 of the Regulations are inconsistent with the "right to life, liberty and security of the person" which is constitutionally protected by section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and section 14 infringes the "right to be secure against unreasonable search" that is guaranteed in section 8 of the Charter. The Committee also considers that section 15 of the Regulations is inconsistent with "the right to enjoyment of property" that is recognized in paragraph 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. Finally, the Committee is of the view that all of these provisions contravene the Committee's scrutiny criterion No. 9 as they "trespass unduly on rights and liberties" as well as its scrutiny criterion No. 10 as they "make the rights and liberties of the person unduly dependent on administrative discretion" and "are not consistent with the rules of natural justice".

The Joint Committee also finds that the Regulations are not authorized by the Indian Act to the extent they purport to authorize the compulsory hospitalization and treatment of persons other than Indians.

When a person infected or suspected of being infected with an infectious disease neglects or refuses to comply with an order issued by a superintendent to undergo a medical examination and to follow a prescribed medical treatment, section 8 gives the same departmental official a discretion to issue an order "for the compulsory examination and treatment of such person at a place of detention to be designated by the superintendent upon the advice of a medical officer". Section 8 further authorizes any peace officer or constable to arrest and convey the person named in the order to the designated place of detention and the person in charge of that place is authorized to detain the person "by whatever means available". Additional provisions authorize the "apprehension and return" of a detained person who escapes from the place of detention. The only protection which the Regulations afford a detained person is the right to appeal the detention order "to a police magistrate or to two justices of the peace" who may order the release of the person if satisfied the person is not suffering from an infectious disease. Having regard to the seriousness of the interference with the liberty and physical integrity of the person which results from a detention order, the conferral of a right of appeal exercisable only after a person has been deprived on his or her liberty is entirely inadequate.

In assessing these provisions, your Committee was struck by the fact that the arrest, detention "by whatever means available", and subsequent forcible medical treatment of an individual may result from a discretionary decision by a departmental official, a decision which may be made in any case in which the person "neglects or refuses" to comply with an order issued under section 7. Your Committee also took into consideration the broad scope of the Regulations, which flows from the regulatory definition of "infectious disease" as meaning "any contagious or communicable disease and includes every doubtful case of communicable disease". Your Committee firmly believes that a law that grants a government official a discretionary power to deprive a citizen of his liberty and of his right to the security of his person on the ground the individual suffers or appears to suffer from a communicable disease, without requiring that consideration be given to the type or severity of the disease and to the danger it presents to public health, is entirely inconsistent with the "principles of fundamental justice" and that such a law cannot be characterized as imposing "reasonable limits" that are "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". In short, because of the lack of objective criteria or standards to govern the making of the decision to issue a detention order, the Regulations "strike the wrong balance between the liberty of the individual and the interests of the community". (Per Philp J.A. in Thwaites v. Health Sciences Centre Psychiatric Facility, (1988) 48 D.L.R. (4th) 338, at 351 (Man.C.A.)).

That it is unlikely section 8 would be invoked except in the most exigent circumstances does not change this conclusion. Your Committee reviews regulations as it finds them and will not read into a regulation limitations or conditions which do not appear on its face.

In a case such as this, your Committee also would not accept as satisfactory any assurance that might be offered that section 8, along with the other provisions subject to disallowance, will not be invoked by departmental officials. The fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadians cannot be made to depend on the goodwill or sense of propriety of governmental officials. Only the revocation of these provisions can afford a proper and full guarantee that the powers they contain will not be resorted to.

These considerations also apply to section 13 of the Regulations, which provides for the issue of a similar order in cases where a medical officer certifies that the effective isolation of a case of infectious disease or quarantine of contacts cannot be secured in premises on a reserve.

Section 14 of the Regulations authorizes a superintendent or medical officer to enter in the daytime "any dwelling or other premises situated on the reserve" to inquire as to the state of health of any person therein or to examine the hygienic condition of the dwelling or other premises. Except for the fact its operation is confined to daytime hours, this section confers on officers of the government a complete and unfettered discretion to enter a person's private residence at will. In the Committee's opinion, a provision which gives government officials authority to enter a person's home at any time of the day for whatever reasons seem sufficient to those officials and without the need to obtain a warrant, without the obligation to give prior notice to the occupants of the premises or without having to identify themselves before entering, is so arbitrary and oppressive that it cannot be justified under section 1 of the Charter.

Finally, section 15 of the Regulations would permit the alteration or destruction of any building which a medical officer certifies to be unfit for human habitation. Your Committee considers that such a provision unduly trespasses on rights and liberties and ignores the right to enjoyment of property recognized in paragraph 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. Your Committee finds it inconceivable that officials of the government would have authority to order the destruction of a person's residence without requirement of prior notice and without the person having a right to have the decision reviewed before it is carried out. Your Committee emphasizes that the operation of this provision is not limited to situations of emergency but could be invoked at any time at the discretion of a superintendent with the approval of his superior officer.

When informed of the Joint Committee's concerns in relation to these Regulations, the Department acknowledged that the conformity of these Regulations to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is doubtful and that the Regulations are ultra vires in part. The Department undertook to prepare amendments. That assurance was given to the Committee in November of 1983. Some seven years later, and after much prompting by this Committee including an indication in March 1990 that consideration might be given to disallowance, proposed amendments to the Indian Health Regulations were published in Part I of the Canada Gazette on December 20, 1990. In early October 1991, however, your Committee was informed that:

> In the face of [requests for further consultations from Indian bands and native organizations], this Department is proposing to put the process to amend the Indian Health Regulations on hold indefinitely pending a more comprehensive and long-term review of health-related matters within the Indian community.

In light of this decision, the Joint Committee considers it has no choice but to recommend the disallowance of the more offensive provisions of the Regulations.

The legitimate desire of aboriginal representatives for a comprehensive settlement of health-related issues that affect their communities cannot, in our view, serve to justify the continued existence of the provisions described earlier in the body of Canadian law. Sections 8, 13, 14 and 15 can be severed from the Regulations and the Indian Health Regulations will otherwise continue in force as in the past. The disallowance of these provisions does not alter the status quo or change the jurisdictional basis for those Regulations. The proposal for amendments which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development communicated to Indian bands and native representatives would not only have resulted in the removal of sections 8, 13, 14 and 15 from the Regulations but also provided for the enactment of new provisions in their place. It is in respect of this proposal that requests for further consultations were made by Indian bands and native organizations. The approach put forward by the Joint Committee is a simpler one and involves only the removal of existing provisions which are contrary to the fundamental rights of native people. In this regard, the Committee notes as well that these provisions are not exclusively concerned with Indians but, by virtue of paragraph 3(c) of the Regulations, are also made applicable to persons other than Indians who reside on a reserve.

Some might say that the continued existence of these provisions is of little consequence insofar as it is unlikely they would ever be applied or resorted to by government officials. However unlikely that event, your Committee wishes to see even that remote possibility removed. The role of the Charter is not only to afford a remedy to the citizen after a breach of his rights has taken place, it is also to prevent such infringements from taking place. Elected representatives of the people have a special responsibility not only to protect the fundamental rights and freedoms of the people from encroachment by the government but to guard against the potential for their encroachment. In the end, the Joint Committee cannot escape the conclusion that provisions of the kind discussed in this Report simply have no place in Canadian law.

Finally, your Committee wishes to add that its decision to disallow sections 8, 13, 14 and 15 alone does not indicate its approval of the remaining provisions of the Regulations. Some of these provisions are clearly in need of revision and they will undoubtedly be addressed in the course of the further consultations which the Minister will engage in with Indian bands and aboriginal representatives. Because it recognizes the importance of this continuing exchange of views, the Joint Committee deliberately limited the scope of the resolution set out in this Third Report to those provisions which amount to a clear denial of the rights and dignity of native people and other residents on reserves. The revocation of legislative provisions which infringe on constitutionally protected rights and freedoms should require no consultations. In the legislative area, the purpose of consultations will be to negotiate a consensus on what the law should be and to reconcile private interests and the public interest. Clearly, this process will not apply where the contemplated action touches on fundamental rights and liberties. The rights and liberties which are guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were given constitutional status in recognition of their fundamental nature. These rights and liberties are not negotiable and are incapable of being limited by agreement between governments and the people. The regulations described in this Third Report are unconstitutional and no amount of further discussion can make them less offensive or more acceptable.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

EDUCATION

NATIONAL STAY-IN-SCHOOL INITIATIVE

Hon. Noël. A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, a critical component of our success as a nation and our full engagement in the globalized world community is education. However, honourable senators, the conditio sine qua non of education is having young Canadians staying in school. A serious problem exists in Canada where the high school drop-out rate is at the 30 per cent level. Yes, honourable senators, nationally 30 per cent of our students do not finish high school, and in some parts of Canada that percentage leaps to 70 per cent or more.

Those statistics are shocking, and I am sure that all members of this chamber are scandalized by them. We are well aware of the disastrous negative consequences that flow from this situation, in terms of both the personal development of the individual and the social consequences it has for our society. Indeed, earlier this year we learned from one of our own Senate committees that young people who drop out of school because of poverty—and poverty often goes hand in hand with low academic achievement—will cost the country about $33 billion in the next 20 years. However, I am equally concerned with the costs to the right of each individual to develop his or her potential and maximize one's personal abilities.

It is noteworthy, therefore, that the government has committed nearly $300 million over five years to a national Stay-In-School Initiative and has set a national goal that by the year 2000, 90 per cent of our youth will gain a high school diploma or equivalent. I would like to see us exceed that goal and achieve a zero tolerance for school drop-out. Honourable senators, we should support this national Stay-In-School Initiative. We should use every occasion to promote an understanding of this problem, and most importantly, we should be part of the national effort to solve this problem.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR WILFRID LAURIER

COMMEMORATION OF 150th BIRTHDAY

The Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, every four or five years the Canadian people either renew the mandate of the Prime Minister or they elect a new one. Presumably they choose someone who they think will be a good Prime Minister. What are the qualities of a good Prime Minister, and whom can we consider to have had these qualities? Today we can turn our attention to a Prime Minister who met the necessary qualities, for 150 years ago today Sir Wilfrid Laurier was born. On behalf of all my colleagues and in my new position as president designate of Wilfrid Laurier, I am speaking for us all in celebrating this occasion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marsden: As we attempt to weather current political storms, we would do well to remember why the years from 1896 to 1911, years during which Sir Wilfrid Laurier was Prime Minister of Canada, are thought of so highly. It is said of Laurier that he was fortunate in securing as cabinet colleagues men—he didn't have any choice in those days—who were not only competent but were also valued political leaders themselves. Laurier's 1896 cabinet has been called the "Cabinet of all the talents [that] remains in the Liberal legend as the ministerial masterpiece of Canadian politics."

Author O.D. Skelton explained the strength of the cabinet in the book Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, II, when he said.

> As it was, the ministry was an extraordinarily able one, none so strong before or since. In individuality, in varied ability, in administrative capacity, in constructive vision, in internal unity and integrity, it could safely challenge comparison.

The importance in having formed such a strong cabinet lay in the fact that its members would help Laurier to develop and to implement many policies crucial to the development of the country, and encourage public trust in Laurier and in the government.

By and large, he advocated two main principles in cabinet decision making: ministerial independence and cabinet solidarity.

As Skelton says:

> As Prime Minister Sir Wilfrid was not a hard task master, he did not intervene in the details of the administration of his colleagues. He believed in giving every minister wide latitude and large responsibility.

The Prime Minister was also a strong proponent of cabinet solidarity. In a speech to the House of Commons, he makes this position quite clear:

> . . . the necessity for solidarity between the members of the Cabinet is absolute, that the moment a policy has been determined upon them it becomes the duty of every member of that administration to support it and support it in its entirety.

That policy resulted in the cabinet's acting as a unified body, instilling confidence in the minds of the Canadian people. While cabinet solidarity did not always prevail, it did for the most part, thus projecting the image of a cabinet that was in fact a strong one.

Finally, it was said of Laurier that he was a genius conciliator who remained "at all times . . . undisputed leader of his cabinet and party" and who exercised effective control over his cabinet.

Once Laurier made a decision, he stood firm in it and was not easily influenced. He often said that his method was not one of rushing. He would assess a situation from all sides, considering all effects before taking any action. As a result, he would not allow "his firmness of action to be hampered by vain doubts and reconsiderings".

The second facet of a good Prime Minister involves the policies he initiates and implements. These are seen as a testament to his leadership, his ability to solve problems and, in so doing, develop his nation to the greatest of his ability.

Laurier's main concern was always to preserve unity. He perceived Canada's central problem to be the conflicts between the two founding nations, French and English Canada. He himself claimed that he had given his political life "to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country."

This, however, was not always an easy task.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to the rules, I must interrupt the honourable senator to ask permission for her to continue, since she has spoken for more than three minutes. Is there unanimous agreement for the senator to finish her remarks?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, honourable senators. I will not describe to you the difficulties of the Manitoba school question and other issues, but go to my conclusion.

Senator Murray: Don't gloss over that; I love that topic.

Senator Marsden: I overheard you, Senator Murray. I would be glad to deliver this to you privately, if you like.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier administered his office in a way that is respected and admired. He managed his government superbly and initiated policies that went a long way in developing this country.

Most policies initiated by the Laurier government were premised on the necessity to preserve unity. This was evidenced in his reaction to the Manitoba schools problem and the Boer War.

The development policies initiated for the opening of the West were aggressive and innovative. The immigration, land and transportation policies all contributed to the success of this initiative.

It must be said that Laurier also did much to gain equal status for Canada within the Empire. This conception was strengthened by the results of the Boer War and the Alaska boundary dispute. Finally, in 1907, some recognition of this principle was offered when the name of the "Colonial Conference" was changed to "Imperial Conference".

• (1410)

Bruce Hutchison claims that Laurier had achieved:

> . . . a new status for Canada in the Empire, a peopled West, a truly national economy, a 15-year period of prosperity, a reconciliation of church and state, perhaps a reconciliation of races.

None of this can be denied. In fact, given the challenges of his time and the success of his government, it is no wonder that Laurier proclaimed that the twentieth century belonged to Canada.

As some of you know, Wilfrid Laurier University was founded in 1911. Sir Wilfrid passed away in 1919.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION FROM REPUBLIC OF SLOVENIA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of a delegation of parliamentarians from the Republic of Slovenia, including Dr. Ludvik Toplak, Speaker of the Chamber of Representatives of the Republic of Slovenia, and Mr. Rous, Speaker of the Parliament of the State of Styria.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REQUEST FOR TABLING CLERK'S ACCOUNTS IN BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, yesterday we were told that the Clerk had laid on the Table a detailed statement of his receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year ending the 31st of March, 1991. This document contains a text that was drafted in English only and thus violates the Official Languages Act, especially since the documents that were drafted in English only came from the office of the Auditor General of Canada.

I believe we should insist that the document tabled yesterday be withdrawn and tabled again, this time in accordance with the Official Languages Act—in other words, with all texts appearing in both official languages. In its present form, it does not meet the requirements of the Official Languages Act.

Honourable senators, is something going to be done about this? Are we going to let a document that violates the Official Languages Act remain on the Table of the Senate—a document tabled by the Clerk himself? That I cannot tolerate.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Corbin, we will consider your request, make enquiries and then report back to you.

Honourable senators, if we are to act on his request, we are entitled to examine this report as carefully as Senator Corbin did.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am told this document will be resubmitted tomorrow, in both official languages.

OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Still on the question of official languages, I have been told that the French version of Hansard will not be ready until 2.45 p.m. The English version was available to our English-speaking senators ages ago. This often happens. When will Francophones sitting in the Senate be treated with the same respect?

PRIVATE BILL

METROPOLITAN GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—FIRST READING

Hon. John Sylvain presented Bill S-6, to amend the Act of incorporation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the Province of Quebec.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, since this is a matter of a purely technical nature, which has no political or partisan connotations, to save one of Quebec's major financial institutions a lot of unnecessary expense and a lot of unnecessary delay, I would ask leave of the Senate, in a marriage of principle and reason, for this bill to be read the second time at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, Senator Sylvain had the courtesy to speak to me in advance on this matter and I also replied to him in advance. I want to make our position very clear on the matter. As a general principle, we do not believe that leave should be granted to accelerate legislation unless it is indeed an emergency situation. If it were the end of the session, for example, I would consider that. But it seems to me that we can follow the normal procedure in this case with the normal notice. We will be sitting next week so we can proceed then with the regular procedures. I do not see that that would delay the forward movement of this bill and prevent its passage in the proper time.

Senator Sylvain: If I may reply, after this bill is introduced in this House it has to go to the other place. The bill must be finally approved in the other place before year end, and that evidently means sometime before Christmas. We do not have a lot of time left for the bill to be approved in the other place and for this company to reorganize itself before year end in order to avoid a lot of unnecessary expense from accountants, lawyers, consultants and what have you if all the work that will be done to close their books at year end has to be repeated. So I think this is a matter of urgency, if I might be permitted.

However, if agreement cannot be reached on this matter, I would ask that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading next Tuesday.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

On motion of Senator Sylvain, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, November 26, 1991.

CANADA-EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

VISIT TO TURKEY AND USSR

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have in my hands a report that was put together by the staff of the Canada-European Parliamentary Association respecting a conference that was held in Turkey and in the Soviet Union of that organization.

• (1420)

When I received the report, it was 45 pages long. It is far too long and detailed to repeat in this chamber, and I feel it would be unnecessary to do that. If you wish to reprint 45 pages, put it in Hansard and pay for the cost of translating it, fine. Again, I do not think that is necessary.

Senator Barootes and I were the only two senators in this delegation. A number of things happened in the meetings we had in Turkey and the Soviet Union that are of particular importance and becoming more important every day. I will give Senators a brief oral report.

The delegation met with certain officials of the Turkish government in Ankara. The person that I met with was the leader of what was then the official opposition party in Turkey. He is now the Prime Minister of Turkey, because they have had an election in the meantime. We had a discussion of what the Western nations, NATO, the G-7 and other organizations ought to be doing in the face of what is evolving inside the Soviet Union. I can say without reservation that this man was very knowledgeable. He had been the Prime Minister of Turkey two or three times before.

Turkey borders the southern republics of the Soviet Union. The Turkish prime minister made it abundantly clear that we needed to get together and make an offer of substantial amounts of consumer goods. If these goods were not forthcoming, he believed the whole world would be in severe jeopardy, because that part of the world, Eastern Europe and Western Asia, would firstly become economically unstable, followed by political instability that would be extremely dangerous to Turkey and the rest of the world.

From there, the delegation went to Moscow for two days. The delegation then travelled to what was then Leningrad, and is now St. Petersburg. We had a meeting with the mayor and several members of the city council of St. Petersburg. The economy in this area has simply collapsed. 80 per cent of all economic activity in the city of St. Petersburg was dependent on the defence industry. The Red Army is no longer buying so much. The mayor was extremely concerned about what alternative economic base the city could use, whether it was part of the Soviet Union or of the new Russian Republic. He was well aware of the fact that there had to be a complete restructuring of the wealth creation in that city. His plea to us was not for massive amounts of aid for his industrial base. His city needs that over time, but his plea to us was for the provision of consumer goods such as food and clothing and other basic necessities of life so that the city can get through this winter.

Honourable senators, I will leave it there. I will be making comments later about Canada's participation in this delegation and following up on comments that the Prime Minister made at Stanford University in California, and comments made at other meetings held in London and other places. It is important that we can make a contribution at this time, given the severe economic conditions in much of the Soviet Union.

Hon. Pat Carney: Perhaps I could ask my honourable colleague a question. If we were to provide this type of aid, was there any discussion as to how it could be distributed? That is a factor that people worry about.

Senator Olson: I am well aware of that and it is an excellent question. We not only worry about it, but we have to try to do something about it. The infrastructure that needs to be in place for what we consider wholesale and retail distribution and also the processing of food is simply nonexistent. All of those things used to belong to the state, and indeed were controlled by various cells of the Communist Party. All of that is gone, so it needs to be put back in place. They realized that they did not have a full operative alternative to the structure that was collapsing.

We have to help them. We have to use whatever expertise we have, based on their conditions, because their conditions are not at all like those in North America or western Europe. I would hope that we are prepared to give—I do not know about massive or significant, or whatever word you wish to use—those things we have in abundance, such as wheat, and perhaps other consumer goods that they desperately need this winter.

The message we got—and Senator Barootes will bear me out on this—was the message I have just given you to-day, and I hope that conveying it to this chamber of Parliament will be useful.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the world has observed with great interest the fact that the Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. James Baker, has met recently with the leaders of China to discuss the normalization of relations between the People's Republic of China and the United States. This follows the lead of several European nations. News reports suggest that while progress was made in several areas, certain outstanding differences still remain between the United States and the People's Republic of China.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate provide assurances that similar initiatives will be undertaken in the near future by Canada to normalize relations between Canada and China? When will the Secretary of State for External Affairs travel to China for a face-to-face meeting with the Chinese leadership for discussions involving economic, scientific, educational, cultural relations, and human rights issues? Surely it is in the interests of both countries to re-establish good relations just as soon as impediments to those good relations have been resolved and removed.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, not for the first time the government is somewhat ahead of the honourable senator. The Secretary of State for External Affairs met with the Chinese foreign minister at the United Nations on September 23. The central subject of discussion was a human rights situation in China and our concern about that situation.

Since that time the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. McKnight, has had an extensive visit to China, including meetings at a very senior level with officials of the government of the People's Republic. In these and all our contacts with the Government of China we take the opportunity to reinforce the importance of our commercial ties with China and to firmly express our concerns about human rights in that country.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would point out to the Leader of the Government that none of these discussions at this time have covered the same broad range of matters discussed between Mr. Baker and officials of the People's Republic of China. There is a difference with a meeting between our Secretary of State for External Affairs in New York and a fully organized conference in China with the Chinese leadership, involving the range of issues of the kind that was followed by Mr. Baker when he was in China a short while ago. If the Leader of the Government will check his facts, he will know that, to this point, we have not engaged in anything approaching the breadth of the agenda discussed between the Americans and the Chinese.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator must know that there is a long-established consultative mechanism which in fact resulted from a 1973 agreement between Canada and the People's Republic of China. There is what is called the Canada-China Joint Trade Committee, which meets periodically and, indeed, met earlier this month to discuss bilateral trade and economic relations, including the impediments that human rights concerns are causing to realizing the full potential of our bilateral relationship.

I repeat, respect for human rights is one of the fundamental characteristics of Canadian foreign policy, and we hope that China will take measures to alleviate our concerns on the human rights issue. We have lost no opportunities to emphasize that stance in our contacts with the People's Republic of China.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as welcome as these developments are, my major question remains: When will the Secretary of State for External Affairs of this country travel to Beijing for the kind of comprehensive meetings that many Canadians are urging? Does the Leader of the Government have a date in his briefing notes?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are no plans at the moment for a visit by Mrs. McDougall to the People's Republic of China. As I have said, our cabinet colleague, Mr. McKnight, has just returned from a visit there. Mrs. McDougall has met with the Chinese foreign minister at the United Nations, and earlier this month there was a meeting of the Canada-China Joint Trade Committee. When it is appropriate and when time and her many other duties permit, I am sure Mrs. McDougall will consider visiting the People's Republic of China in person. Until that time we are satisfied that the kinds of contacts I referred to a minute ago are more than adequate, given the present state of our relationship.

● (1440)

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, would the honourable senators opposite agree to set up a formal committee to save further embarrassment to this country? Each one of us could contribute a dollar to a fund for this committee, which would advance this money to the Prime Minister every time he went abroad and found himself short of cash to pay his taxi. I am sure the Conservatives can find a talented woman among their members, and prove to the country that there are talented women who can organize a small committee. I am prepared to donate the first dollar.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—EFFECT ON OPERATION OF FERRY SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, for a change, I want to congratulate the government on the announcement by the Minister of Public Works, the Hon. Mr. MacKay, that we are about to get a new ferry from Caribou, Nova Scotia, to Wood Island, Prince Edward Island. This is the fourth time the introduction of such a service has been announced by various different Tory ministers. Since we now have the fifth announcement, we are very pleased with that. I want to congratulate the government for that fifth announcement for the same ferry.

However, in response to that announcement, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate convey to me an assurance from the Government of Canada to all Prince Edward Islanders that, if the fixed link is constructed, the ferry between Caribou, Nova Scotia, and Wood Island, Prince Edward Island, will continue to operate as it does at the present time, regardless of the fixed link?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Bonnell knows better than anyone, that is a hypothetical question.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, it is not a hypothetical question. If we can get the promise that, regardless of the fixed link, the ferries will continue to operate, the people of Prince Edward Island can then give their opinion as to whether or not they want the fixed link. They need to know the answer to that question before they say yes or no to the premier of Prince Edward Island. Therefore we want the Government of Canada to assure the people of Prince Edward Island that the contruction of a fixed link will have no bearing at all on continued operation of the Wood Island-Caribou ferry.

Senator Murray: We are making progress, honourable senators, because for much more than a year I have been trying to elicit from Senator Bonnell a statement of his position for or against the fixed link. Now we have it boiled down to one condition only on the basis of which he would support the fixed link. I shall certainly be happy to convey this information to my colleagues and see whether that condition can be met.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Simard on October 29 regarding community radio for French-speaking people outside Quebec.

COMMUNITY RADIO FOR FRENCH-SPEAKING PEOPLE OUTSIDE QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard on October 29, 1991)

Since 1987, the Department of the Secretary of State, under the auspices of the Promotion of Official Languages Program, has contributed financially toward the development of community radio stations designed to serve official-language minority communities which do not have access to locally-based radio programming in their own language.

To date, the Department of the Secretary of State has made $5 million available to assist in the development of 18 community radio projects in 7 provinces.

These community radio stations have successfully contributed to the social and cultural development of official language minority communities and have served as an important tool for communication and the bringing together of community members.

The Community Radio Program is scheduled to terminate on March 31, 1992. As the Honourable Senator has suggested, an evaluation of the program's effectiveness is underway. This study will be taken into consideration by the Secretary of State with respect to any decision regarding the future of this program. Once completed the study will be sent to the Honourable Senator.

THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Eyton, seconded by the Honourable Senator DeWare, for the third reading of Bill C-8, An Act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would ask that this Order be deferred until tomorrow. I was unable to get the transcripts of the committee hearings until yesterday, and I have not had the chance to go through them. I should be ready to proceed tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-10, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-10 will implement the increases in the excise taxes and duties on tobacco products and the taxation of inventories of these products announced by the Minister of Finance in the February 26, 1991, budget. These tax measures are a key element of the government's National Strategy to Reduce Tobacco Use. Revenues from these measures will also contribute to restoring fiscal stability and reinforce the government's Plan for Economic Recovery.

The National Strategy to Reduce Tobacco Use features a wide range of initiatives to discourage Canadians from beginning to smoke, to encourage smokers to quit and to protect Canadians from the health risks of tobacco use. Because young people are much more sensitive to increases in the price of tobacco products than adults, the taxation of tobacco products is particularly effective in discouraging young Canadians from smoking. The tax increases in this bill are therefore expected to reduce long-term addition to tobacco use and the associated health consequences for many young Canadians.

Honourable senators, the increases include raising the excise tax on cigarettes by three cents a cigarette or $6 a carton and increasing the excise levies on other tobacco products proportionately. Thus the ad valorem excise tax on cigars will be increased from 40 to 65 per cent, and the excise tax on manufactured tobacco, which includes fine cut tobacco for "roll-your-own" cigarettes, will be raised by $4.08 per 200 gram container. As is generally the case for sales and excise tax increases announced in a budget, the new rates, when approved by Parliament, will apply from the day after the budget announcements.

This bill also changes the manner in which the excise levies are imposed on preportioned rolls of tobacco which are inserted into paper tubes to make high-quality "roll-your-own" cigarettes—to equalize the tax treatment with traditional "roll-your-own" cigarettes. Tobacco sticks will now be taxed on a per-unit basis and the excise tax and duty set to equal those on other fine cut products at approximately two-thirds of the rate on fully manufactured cigarettes. This measure also comes into effect on February 27, 1991.

The current excise levies on tobacco products are imposed at the manufacturer's level. Thus, the higher tax rates announced in the budget apply to tobacco products sold by manufacturers after February 26 and not to the inventories of tobacco products held by retailers and wholesalers at the time the new rates take effect. To ensure that the tobacco tax increases are applied in a consistent manner at all trade levels as of February 27, the excise tax increases will also apply to these inventories. However, the tax increases will not apply to the first 1,000 cartons of cigarettes or equivalent held in inventory in retail outlets at midnight on budget day. This exemption will simplify compliance for small and medium-size retailers.

Finally, honourable senators, this bill charges interest on delayed payments of the tax increases beyond the time within which existing levies are normally remitted and on late or deficient instalments of the tax on tobacco product inventories. This measure will ensure that taxpayers who voluntarily remit the tax increases announced in the budget and those who withhold payment until the proposed increases are enacted are treated equally.

These changes in the taxation of tobacco will raise substantial revenues—$1.4 billion in the 1991-92 fiscal year. The increases in tobacco taxes, and other initiatives under the National Strategy to Reduce Tobacco Use, will also have a major impact on tobacco consumption both this year and in coming years. Thus the additional revenues from these tax increases are expected to decline to $980 million in the 1994-95 fiscal year.

In conclusion, honourable senators, this is an important bill. The tax increases it implements will generate important revenues which will help the government restore fiscal stability and contribute to the government's plan for economic recovery. This plan will create the essential conditions for the restoration of economic growth in Canada by setting out a clear path toward lower inflation and lower interest rates, and by dealing resolutely with the government's fiscal situation.

The tax increases are also a key element of the government's strategy to reduce tobacco use in Canada and thereby protect the health of Canadians, particularly younger generations of Canadians.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the honourable senator has just described for us the details of this legislation. I appreciate the fullness and clarity with which he has done so.

On our side, we agree with the presentation of the bill as a measure to increase taxes. That is to say, we agree that is what it does. Our doubts arise in terms of its effectiveness in health measures, and also its impact in other areas. Let me explain our concerns with this bill which we hope to address further in committee.

As honourable senators are aware, the bill received first reading on May 28, 1991, in the House of Commons. Second reading followed on June 14, and it was passed on October 21. The bill implements the budget measures introduced February 27, 1991, which increase the excise taxes and duties on tobacco products.

The purpose of the bill, as has just been described, is two-pronged: First, it increases the tax on cigarettes. Thus, tax revenues will increase, which is important in the current fiscal situation. However, it is also meant to improve the health of Canadians by reducing the amount of tobacco used. Senators who have dealt with measures to improve the health of Canadians through the reduction of smoking will be aware that there is a calculation on the impact of the costs on stopping people from smoking. Those costs have all been worked out in relation to this bill as well.

Let me assure government senators that we are in favour of people stopping smoking and the health improvements that would come with a decrease in the consumption of tobacco products. However, it is our view that the bill as presented is not a bill that deals with health measures but is basically a tax increase. It will raise an estimated $1.4 billion. The burden of this tax is not equally distributed among Canadians, but will rest primarily on the shoulders of lower-income Canadians, who smoke more than other sectors of society. It is a regressive tax which pays no attention to people's ability to pay.

Ultimately, smokers are being punished for making a choice to use a legal product, for tobacco remains a legal product. In the other place, the Liberal critic for the Department of National Health and Welfare proposed an amendment to this bill that would effectively earmark revenues resulting from the tax.

First, it is our view that if the government is serious about its anti-smoking campaign, then it should use the tax revenues such as those which are expected to be raised by this measure in health promotion and education. In this way people could be given the facts about smoking and the opportunity to get rid of the habit. Second, such funds could attack the problem specifically by funding support programs to help people stop smoking. Also, some of the tax revenues could go directly to provide the health care necessary to help smokers as they go through periods of poor physical health.

Finally, on our list but not finally in our priorities, these revenues should be put toward programs to help tobacco farmers diversify and leave the tobacco farming industry. There are 1,300 growers in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes. These growers provide some 20,000 seasonal jobs. There are two such programs presently in operation: The Tobacco Transition Adjustment Initiatives helps ease farmers out of the tobacco market, while the Alternate Enterprise Initiative Program helps tobacco farmers search for alternate crops. However, there are not sufficient funds in these programs to meet the demand. Farmers who are trying now to move from a tobacco crop to an alternative crop are simply not getting the help they need from this government. Furthermore, both these programs will expire by April 1992.

One of our most strenuous objections to this bill is that it fails to deal with the burden that is being placed on the backs of farmers who, after all, are growing a legal product and a legal crop and who are not being helped out. The situation in Ontario is extraordinarily bad. In the committee we will present the figures which indicate the situation. I certainly urge the committee to hear from tobacco farmers on the impact this bill is likely to have on the burden that they already carry.

There is no doubt that this tax increase will reduce the number of smokers in Canada, which is a good thing. But taxation is also an issue. Some $4.38 of the cost of a package of cigarettes in Ontario is tax alone. The use of taxation to force Canadians to act in a certain way has a coercive element. On the one hand, the government maintains that tobacco products are legal, yet it punishes those who legally purchase these legal products.

Therefore, honourable senators, we are in favour of the bill being sent to committee. However, we certainly intend to present at that committee our vigorous objections to certain aspects of this bill.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I am glad that Senator Marsden has raised the points that she has. I want to make my position quite clear. I know of the damage that smoking can do, for I am a victim of it. However, I am getting tired of governments, this one and the one in New Brunswick, piling taxes upon taxes upon taxes on the poorer segment of the population.

Let us face it, perhaps people who have not been around them do not know how poor people operate, but I do. Nothing is being done to educate the kids in school; or, if anything is being done, it is not half enough to educate them as to the health effects of smoking. Over the past years governments have been to blame for this. I am not being partisan when I say that. I am talking about Liberal and Conservative governments. I could not honestly care less which government it was. I care about the poor people who must pay the bill and who cannot afford it.

The same is true in terms of tobacco as it is for booze and gasoline. At the other end of the spectrum is the politicians. They are all over the place. I refer to Liberals, Conservatives, NDPers and all others. They decry the fact that people cross the border to shop. I want to tell honourable senators this: In New Brunswick today the price of a carton of cigarettes is up to $57, or $8.25 per package. The poorer people very seldom have $57 to buy a carton of cigarettes, so they buy them by the pack. I understand that the price of a case of beer has risen to $15, or something in that order. Federal and provincial taxes on gasoline have doubled or tripled over the last few years. Governments are forcing people to cross the border from New Brunswick to the State of Maine to buy cigarettes, booze and gasoline.

I read today that someone has estimated that the federal government is losing about $350 million a year as a result of the illegal importation of cigarettes from the United States. The government will gain $1.8 billion through the measures in this bill as a result of the increased tax on cigarettes. I do not know how much New Brunswick will gain, or thinks it will gain. In fact, I do not think it will gain a red cent.

The reason I say that honourable senators, is that, thank God, people are gradually, quietly, reducing their smoking. Fewer young people are taking up the habit, and I repeat, thank God. However, there are people who find it impossible to stop smoking. Maybe there are some in this group, I do not know. I only stopped after having bypass operations, and by then it was no problem. But quitting can be very difficult, and new government measures have reached a point where I do not think they are producing the expected revenue.

In rural areas in New Brunswick where in the past people very seldom went across the border to shop, even in my own community now, every weekend, if I ask around, dozens and dozens of people are making the trip across the border. What draws them, I repeat, is cigarettes, booze, and gasoline mostly. And when they are there, of course, they buy other things. On the whole, the retail trade in my province is having a terrible problem.

You have government saying that it is almost un-Canadian to cross the border to go shopping. On the otehr hand, governments, especially this government during the free trade debate preached that, in fact, free trade would make it free for everyone to cross the border and shop as much as they wanted and, in fact, $800 or $900 per household would be saved. Psychologically, therefore, governments have done everything to help people go across the border to shop. With the tax measures that have been implemented in the last few years, in my province and in this country, the governments have imposed an impossible tax burden. As Senator Marsden has said, this affects mostly the poor segment of the population, people who are often down and out. They are smokers, seniors who are 65 and 70 years old. They say, "I am 70," or, "I am 75, and I have smoked all my life."

On top of that, the government is are causing people to become smugglers. Drive anywhere in New Brunswick and inquire. You do not have to make any more than two inquiries to find someone who can tell you where you can buy a can of tobacco, selling for $40 or more in the stores, for $9 or $10. Can you blame people?

Honourable senators, governments are taking the wrong approach. I know taxes are needed. I know revenues are needed. But when you force people to commit illegal acts, and when you force an impossible tax on the poorer people of society, I think it is a wrong-headed policy.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, as I have never been a smoker myself, I have no personal interest in the question.

Senator Barootes: Try it, you'll like it!

Senator Molgat: That, coming from eminent doctor, surprises me, Senator Barootes. However, I have become convinced by what I have read and the statements I have heard that there is indeed a serious health problem insofar as smoking is concerned. I do support endeavours to reduce smoking in Canada. Certainly, as a member of this house, I am delighted that, at our committee meetings, we no longer have to withstand the smoke as we did in the past.

However, I am concerned about the bill in another way, and that is with respect to the tobacco growers who in past years have been encouraged to go into the tobacco-growing business. I know that the measures taken at that time to achieve this and were well meant. They were an attempt to create diversification in agriculture. So governments urged farmers to go from growing other crops into growing tobacco crops, which were high-yield and high-paying crops. That was an understandable action.

However, since then, by government decree in many cases, we have really gone against the tobacco industry. If these individuals had merely gone into this crop on their own initiative, with no encouragement from government, then we would have no particular obligation to them. I would feel very sorry for them but there would be no public responsibility. However, in light of the encouragement given by both provincial and federal governments to growers to enter this industry, we now have an obligation, and I am concerned about how we are dealing with that obligation.

I understand that for a period of time there were, in fact, government grants or government help to get growers out of the tobacco-growing business and into other crops. I understand that has now been stopped. As we are continuing the pressure, and as we are making that industry one that cannot survive, I think our obligation continues because we were involved in the first place in getting these people into the business.

I would, therefore, like to have an answer from the government about their proposals insofar as the tobacco growers in this country are concerned.

Hon. R. James Balfour: I may be mistaken, but I understood that Senator Frith wished to participate in this debate. Has there been a change in that regard?

Senator Molgat: Unfortunately, I have not had a chance to speak to him today. If it is agreeable, we could adjourn the matter until Tuesday in his name.

On motion of Senator Molgat, for Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the twenty-fifth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: "It's Almost Too Late" tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1991 (Sessional Paper No. 342-973).

[Senator Molgat.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform Senator Marshall that he has 11 minutes remaining in his time.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, as you are no doubt aware, in January of this year—that is, ten months ago—the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs submitted its report on outstanding issues affecting our treatment of veterans. The report dealt with a number of issues in addition to the treatment of veterans of the Merchant Marine, and I refer to the residency requirement for war veterans allowance for those Canadian veterans living in another country and to the POW compensation and the Veterans Independence Program. However, the report dealt first, foremost and in detail with the wartime and post-war treatment of veterans of the Canadian Merchant Navy. In fact, the first paragraph in the section dealing with merchant seamen reads as follows:

> The wartime service and post-war treatment of the veterans of the Canadian Merchant Navy was a major focal point of your Committee's concern, and the Subcommittee heard from a number of groups and individuals who represent merchant navy veterans and merchant navy prisoners of war. As far as we are aware, our investigation marks the first occasion on which a parliamentary committee has been made aware both of the service and sacrifices of merchant seamen during World War II and of the shabbiness of their treatment in the years following the war.

We had a chance to correct that just recently.

> We also became aware of how little we and other Canadians know of the wartime history of the merchant marine. For this reason, the proceedings of our Subcommittee reprint some of the briefs and material we received.

At the conclusion we made three recommendations: first, that at the earliest possible opportunity the Government of Canada introduce legislation to extend full veterans benefits to all Canadian merchant seamen who served in dangerous waters in Canada's armed conflicts; second, that the War Veterans Allowance Act be amended to define as a veteran all merchant seamen who made at least one trip through dangerous waters; and, third, that the Government of Canada prepare and place in the Peace Tower a Book of Remembrance honouring merchant seamen who died of enemy action in Canadian armed conflicts and, further, that suitable monuments to their sacrifices be erected.

While these recommendations dealt with merchant marine veterans as a whole, other recommendations were also of interest to them. For example, in drafting our recommendations on POW compensation the subcommittee took into consideration the fact that some merchant mariners were POWs for up to 50 months and our POW Compensation Act only provides for an award for incarceration for up to 30 months. That is one reason why we recommended that the POW Compensation Act be reviewed. Our objective was to take into account the severity of the POW regime forced on veterans by awarding additional compensation for each month deemed extremely severe, and we recommended that two additional categories be added at appropriate rates of compensation for those veterans who served 30 months and more as prisoners of war.

Since the tabling of the Senate report, the House of Commons Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs has re-examined the wartime service and post-war treatment of Canada's merchant mariners. They heard from some of the same witnesses who appeared before the subcommittee in the Senate and obviously consulted the Senate report in the preparation of their own.

Not surprisingly, the House of Commons committee has affirmed the validity and major recommendations of the subcommittee's report in slightly different words. Thus, they have recommended that merchant mariners with one or more high-seas ocean-going assignments during wartime be fully recognized as veterans and that veterans' benefits be extended to them. They also recommended that a Book of Remembrance be prepared and placed in the Peace Tower and that a monument to honour wartime merchant mariners be erected, preferably in the area of Halifax.

Reviewing the similarities of the two reports it is tempting to think either that plagiarism is the most sincere form of flattery or that the time of the committee of the House of Commons was wasted. But that is not the case. Under our constitution both Houses of Parliament must adopt proposed legislation in the same form before it can become law. The veterans affairs committees of both houses have now reported on our post-war treatment of veterans of the merchant marine and have recommended to their respective chambers that veterans of the merchant marine be fully recognized as veterans in terms both of having the benefits extended to them and their survivors and hving their service and sacrifice publicly recognized.

Both the Senate and the House of Commons have accepted the reports. So in my opinion the government no longer has any valid excuse for further delay in righting the wrong that was done to the veterans of the merchant marine more than 40 years ago.

This tells us a story about the Senate. Apart from the House of Commons report there was a consultation group that arose from somewhere which comprised the three largest veterans organizations in Canada. That includes the Army, Navy and Air Force, the Royal Canadian Legion, and the National Council of Veteran Associations. They are speaking on behalf of 90 per cent or more of the 600,000 veterans in Canada. Here is what they said to the minister in a letter dated October 31:

> The National Council of Veteran Associations—

—and that comprises 18 veterans organizations,

> —at its Annual Meeting in Toronto today, approved the following Resolution:

And the resolution was as contained in the three recommendations that we made. I will not repeat them because I have only 11 minutes.

The letter goes on to say:

> This would appear to mean, in effect, that the position of N.C.V.A. regarding Merchant Seamen can be interpreted as being either that as set out in the Consultation Committee Submission to you of May 8, 1991—

—that is four months after we tabled our report,

> —or that set out in the Report of the Senate Subcommittee.
> In other words, my feeling, and that of N.C.V.A., is that we are prepared to fully support the recommendations of the Senate Subcommittee which we believe forms the basis of the proposals from the Merchant Navy Coalition.
> Alternatively, we would continue to support the position of the Consultation Group, as forwarded to you last May.
> The position of N.C.V.A., as outlined herein, was discussed at the Consultation Committee Meeting in Ottawa, October 28th, 1991.

It was agreed that the chairman of that group, the now Dominion Command President of the Royal Canadian Legion, would write to the minister advising that the consultation group is in agreement with the proposal that it support either the position set out in its submission of May 8th or that of the Senate subcommittee.

That is clear. We have the support of all the veterans' organizations in Canada. As I said before, that includes over 90 per cent of all recommendations.

What did we do in the Senate subcommittee? Last January we produced a report after five or six months of hearings. We produced the report entitled "It's Almost Too Late." We then attempted to find out if we had the support of veterans across the country; we sent out 2,500 petitions and we received up to 17,000 signatures. Multiply that by the families and the friends of those veterans. That includes many hundreds of thousands of veterans and Canadians who support the cause that we took up. As a Senate, we took up the cause of the veterans. It is the Senate's right and responsibility to protect minorities, and 3,500 merchant seamen are a minority group in Canada.

I then introduced a bill in the Senate which, as you know, was defeated. The Speaker ruled against it as a money bill, which I do not agree with. I challenged the ruling, and we had a vote and lost by one vote.

Honourable senators, what harm would we have done if we had given unanimous consent to the passage of that bill? The Commons agreed with our report and gave the same recommendations as we did. The Commons could have taken that bill and passed it, and we would have been acclaimed across the country as the heroes of the Canadian conscience. Yet, we look at the narrow thinking permeating this country with respect to the national unity debate. We defeat a just bill, a just cause for a minority of people who have been forgotten for so many years, and then we stand up on Remembrance Day and say what a great bunch the veterans are.

I can only repeat, honourable senators, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has come full circle. He has looked at all the reports. I have not had a response yet from our report of January, some 10 or 11 months ago. I have not had the courtesy of a response from the minister indicating whether the recommendations are good or not. Evidently they are good recommendations, because I hear that from everybody but the minister.

As a Senate, we could do something right for Canada. We could do something for the people in Canada who are fed up with this situation, and they would praise us, the Senate, for doing so.

I leave that with you, honourable senators, as a cause for Canada that we should be dealing with right now.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable Senator Marshall has given the details of all the groups supporting this report. I was on the subcommittee that heard this matter. Could the honourable senator tell me if there were any objections? I did not hear any, but did Senator Marshall hear any objections to the idea? If there are no objections, what is the problem? Is it a matter of dollars? Is that why the government will not move, or are there other reasons?

Senator Marshall: We have not had objections, other than from people who do not like the Senate and say that we did not go far enough, or that our bill is not the proper one, or that we did not do it the right way, or that we are asking for changes to the Pension Act and that part of it should be a separate piece of legislation.

Whatever the objections are, the individuals who drafted the bill say it is a good bill. It is not a money bill. I bow to the Speaker's Ruling; I could do anything else, but it is not a money bill. Nobody objects to it now, because it is a good issue. There were objections, but we have overcome them. An overwhelming majority of people across Canada applaud us.

The word "money" is an excuse that all governments use, but they can find the money when the cause is right, and we all know that here in the Senate. Perhaps it is a matter of timing. I know the minister has commissioned a former assistant deputy minister from the department, who used to be in charge of veterans' services, to look into the aspects of the legislation, one of which is how to define "merchant seaman." I say that has already been established. The government has changed the War Veterans Allowance Act so many times that it is not even funny. There is a Canada service veteran now; a civilian war pensioner now. So what is holding up the definition of "veteran"? They just did not have a uniform. I do not think there is any excuse now.

I understand that the minister is meeting with the heads of these three groups in a few days. What bothers me is that we reported 10 months ago. The House of Commons committee has given them 150 days to respond. That will bring it into March of next year and another 8 per cent of all veterans will have died, including merchant seamen. If the cause is right, we can do it tomorrow.

One of the aspects of the bill they could do by an amendment to the veterans' care regulations is the veterans independence program, which is very popular with aging veterans. The government could do it tomorrow, if it wanted. The minister knows it and everybody else knows it. Why the government is procrastinating, I do not know.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to point out that Rule 38(4) reads as follows:

> Except as provided in sections (2) and (3) above, no Senator shall speak for more than fifteen minutes, inclusive of any question or comments from other Senators which the Senator may permit in the course of his or her remarks.

I have not implemented this rule. I am pointing it out to honourable senators. The rule could be changed, but that is the way it presently reads.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

THE ECONOMY

FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ADDRESS ECONOMIC ILLS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H.A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of May 28, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the failure of this government to address the economic ills of Canada.

He said: This inquiry was placed on the Order Paper on May 28, 1991. I realize that the wording of the inquiry is broad and general.

A number of economic problems are of growing, desperate concern to the people who live in the part of Canada that I come from. I wish to discuss briefly, within the Rules of the Senate, the matter of agriculture and the matter of the unprecedented levels of unemployment in the oil and gas sector of our economy. The problems in these areas have been exacerbated by the monetary policy followed by this government over the past few months. We are suffering profoundly from the monetary policy of this government and the interest rates that flow from that policy.

The government seems to believe that the ramifications of the GST on the economy have gone away and died. I certainly hope that the government is not of the opinion that Canadians have forgotten about it, or that they have toned down their resentment of the GST. I spent most of the last two weeks in southern Alberta. It is easy to go about that part of the country and become involved in very intense discussions about the resentment, not so much to the amount of the GST that is paid, but to the method that is used to collect it and all that is involved in the accounting that is required of hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens that was simply not required before it was brought in.

Turning to agriculture for a moment, and particularly to the grain trade, in spite of all the questions that I have asked over the last few months and all the announcements that have been made by the Minister of Agriculture and by the Minister of Finance who was, by the way, the Minister of Agriculture, and all of the replies that they have given to the Leader of the Government in this chamber in reply to my questions, nothing has happened. Those farmers have not received any money at all for months.

I see that Senator Barootes is making some facial expressions that would indicate that he does not agree with what I said.

Hon. Efstathios W. Barootes: My stomach keeps turning when you say things like that.

Senator Olson: If he knows of any significant amount of assistance that has come from any of the announcements that have been made since last May or June, I hope he will rise and say what they are. He is not listening. He is a very good senator as far as giving sympathy to farmers in western Canada is concerned, but when it comes to delivering something tangible in order that they can go to town and pay their fuel bills, tax bills, food bills, and all the rest of their expenses, there is nothing. Not one payment of any kind that I know of has come, in spite of all the promises.

Yesterday, I asked whether or not they had worked out the details to deliver on the $800 million that the Minister of Agriculture had promised some weeks ago and I did not receive any answer at all. I received confirmation from the Leader of the Government in the Senate that, yes, they would not increase the deficit to pay the $800 million. All that means is that they will borrow the money and they will find it some place, but until they do find it some place, it is not certain that it is even coming, because that is one of the conditions—

Senator Murray: It is coming.

Senator Olson: —that was put on it by the Minister of Finance: We will not increase the deficit to make this payment.

I am not the only one who has done a little research to come to that conclusion. There was an article written by Marjorie Nichols who talked to many people on Parliament Hill, and she also came to the conclusion that the government members were probably bluffing—bluffing in the sense that they knew there would probably be a payment of about $800 million under previously-announced programs anyway and that is what they were talking about.

I do not believe that government members are quite that dishonest. It is fairly dishonest to tell people that you are coming out with new money when you are really only trying to anticipate a date when a payment would be made anyway. I do not believe that.

When Senator Murray tells me that the government will find $800 million of what he calls "new" money, at least money in addition to anything that might have been paid under the GRIP or the NISA programs, I believe him. However, I keep trying to find out on what basis the payment will be made. Will it be made on the permit books in the grain sector? There has to be a basis of payment for the other sectors of agriculture too, because the minister told me there was about $100 million that would be paid to some other producer groups, other than the grain and oilseeds sector. That is acceptable, but we do not know yet what will be used. Will the acreages in the permit books be used to determine what the payment will be, who will be paid and how much they will be paid?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I have told you that there will be an announcement probably this week.

Senator Olson: Perhaps I better wait with anticipation.

Senator Murray: With bated breath.

Senator Olson: Not only have I been waiting, but the people who desperately need that money are waiting.

I wonder, when you come in with the announcement, will you change the date a little? A long way forward in February or sometime in March is not satisfactory when farmers are already starving for money to pay for expenses.

Senator Murray: Before seeding, we said.

Senator Olson: Before seeding.

Senator Murray: That is what we said.

Senator Olson: That is the third line of defence—sometime before seeding. Before seeding in 1992, or when? I keep asking these questions because people want to know, and you keep dodging.

Senator Murray: No.

Senator Olson: Some people will seed in June, 1992. I mean, it cannot be 1991 because no one is seeding anything more this year, so it will be for 1992.

Senator Barootes: Lots of winter wheat is being seeded at this time.

Senator Olson: Senator Barootes, you do not really believe that any more winter wheat will be seeded in 1991, do you?

Senator Barootes: There will be some seeding done in Ontario this fall.

Senator Olson: I will not argue about that. Before seeding, I presume, means before seeding in 1992.

The third line of defence, and all that was supposed to be involved in that when it was announced by the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds, the Honourable Mr. Mayer and the then Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Mr. Mazankowski, was to be a program that would be needed from time to time when the regular programs such as GRIP and NISA failed to meet the need. That is the reason for its announcement, and the farm organizations that were involved in putting it together believed that.

Honourable senators, let me tell you without the slightest reservation that the receipts from the sale of grain so far this year, and all the payments—although there have not been any—that have come out of any other programs have been demonstrated to be far below the requirements to pay even some of the simple expenses like harvesting expenses for fuel and repairs. That was the plea that was made by leaders of farm organizations when they tried to persuade the government that it is time for the third line of defense to come into action. They received a commitment, such as it is, that some kind of payment in the amount of about $800 million would be paid before seeding in 1992.

Honourable senators, that is not good enough. That is something like trying to offer someone some nourishment after they have starved to death. We are not talking about great amounts of money that will keep the whole agriculture industry healthy. That is not what is involved here at all. What is involved is a little money now so that they can get over the winter of 1991-92. The minister has already said that there will be an announcement within a few days. I hope it will clear up all this confusion or lack of information in light of what has been provided to date. We want to know that the government has the money, and that it is not looking around in some other programs to find it.

We would also like to know so that some people can go to their bankers at least, or to the people who are carrying them on credit, and say, "Look, I think we will get a few dollars, sometime before seeding. Could you carry us over until then?" We really need to know the dates somewhat more precisely. We also need to know the terms and conditions of identifying those people who will get a payment. Will it be people who applied for a permit book? The reason I bring up that point is that, for the past 40 or 50 years, that has been the most common basis for the distribution of government funds in the grains and oil seeds sector in western Canada. Will it be on some other basis if not on the permit books, and, if so, on what? There may be a lot of people who think they will be eligible for a payment but who will come to find out, when the government publishes the rules and conditions of who is eligible, that they may not qualify at all. That is worrisome when you are on the brink of bankruptcy.

Honourable senators, I think I will leave that matter for now because the minister has said an announcement is imminent. I want to talk now about whether or not we can expect some modifications to the GST. One of the things the people of this country are waiting for is an election so they can get at you. I know, and you know, exactly what they will do when that happens. They will toss you out in the greatest landslide that this country has ever seen. That is clear.

Senator Olson: The people also know that we do not have to have that election for two years. The present government can sit in office for, I believe, five years from November 21, 1988. So that is 1993. That is when the mandate expires, so an announcement on the election date has to be made by that time. However, it could be some months later that the actual election takes place. Governments have done some strange things. We could even go into 1994 before there is an election. Most people in Canada understand democracy well enough to know that they have to put up with a government that they elect until their mandate expires.

That is why I am standing before you today to plead with you to do something about the GST, even in the two or so years that are left, because people are sick and tired of the accounting slavery that I explained to this house has come about as a result of the GST.

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I raise a question?

Senator Olson: You certainly may, but you will understand my time is limited.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must tell Senator Olson that there is one minute left of his 15 minutes.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take one more minute. In fact I could stop now, let you call the next item and start up again.

Senator Kelly: Senator Olson, could I ask a quick question?

Senator Olson: Go ahead.

Senator Kelly: Just to help me understand. I apologize for having to do this but I have been out and have lost track of where we are. Are you on inquiry three or four?

Senator Olson: I think it is four.

Senator Barootes: It does not matter; let him finish.

Senator Corbin: Why do you not ask your front bench? Are you a potential whip, asking questions of that kind?

Senator Olson: If my time has expired I do not want to ask the house for any special dispensation as to the time concerned. Please call the next item.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I intend to say a few words in response to what Senator Olson has just said on this inquiry. I believe that is permitted.

Senator Olson: You have 15 minutes, I think.

Senator Murray: My friend says I have 15 minutes. I will not take that, but I do want to comment on one or two points that the honourable senator has raised.

First of all, there is no question about where the government stands on the GST. We brought it in; we continue to believe, and the evidence is there, that it is helpful to the exporting sectors of our economy. A few moments ago we heard Senator Olson's colleague, Senator Thériault, talking about cross-border shopping. We have heard from the truckers of this country about the problems they face. The fact of the matter is that one of the things that the GST did was reduce the federal tax on diesel fuel by three cents a litre. This is a pretty significant amount. The problems facing truckers in this country would be considerably greater were it not for the reduction of the tax on diesel fuel that occurred as a result of the GST.

Second, I should point out, as I did yesterday in answer to a question from our colleague, Senator Simard, that we will study and continue to study the impact of the GST on various sectors of the economy. We will take whatever steps we feel are appropriate and desirable once we have had the time to draw conclusions from that study. I remind the honourable senator that the GST has been in force for less than a year. It came into force on January 1 of the present year.

Senator Olson: That is something that Canadians do not like about it already.

Senator Murray: I am sure there are many things that Canadians do not like about it and a great many other taxes.

Senator Olson: Especially the GST.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should not imply that there is any ambiguity about the government's position on this matter. We brought it in. It is a tax such as is imposed in up to 50 other countries. It is a tax that makes our exporting sectors more competitive. Therefore, it is helpful to the Canadian economy.

Senator Thériault: We saw that at the end of the month.

Senator Olson: It does not turn out that way.

• (1550)

Senator Murray: The honourable senator says it does not turn out that way. We will see. The tax has been in force for less than a year. I repeat, less than a year. We will study its impact on various sectors of the economy to see what changes or improvements need to be made.

Honourable senators, I think I should also point out that the government is committed to applying all of the proceeds from the GST to deficit and debt reduction. The honourable senator knows that. The government—

Senator Olson: You apply all the income you have to all the expenses you have. I know that, too.

Senator Murray: None of the GST revenues will be used to finance new spending programs by the Government of Canada. This is important. Further to that, we have committed ourselves to keeping the increase in program expenditures to 3 per cent per year as a maximum.

These policies, honourable senators, are having the desired effect on the rate of inflation in this country, and therefore on interest rates, and therefore on economic growth. Under the circumstances, it is no surprise at all that all of the reputable think-tanks, nationally and internationally, are forecasting that Canada will have a very substantial increase in economic growth in 1992. Indeed, some of these projections are that Canada will lead the industrialized world in the rate of economic growth in 1992. The honourable senator has the policies of the present government to thank for that and the perseverance of the present government in sticking to those policies, even while the honourable senator and his colleagues are doing their level best to wreck those policies and to sow lack of confidence—

Senator Olson: Everybody believes you, except the Canadians.

Senator Murray: On the GST, I think it is worth mentioning that while the position of the government is clear and without ambiguity, the position of our friends opposite is, to say the least, rather mixed.

Senator Olson: Consistent.

Senator Murray: Consistent, is it?

An Hon. Senator: Consistently mixed.

Senator Murray: When his leader, Mr. Chrétien, was Minister of Finance back in 1977, he looked at the Manufacturers' Sales Tax and said:

> It worries me [. . .] that serious structural problems have been identified in the manufacturers' sales tax [. . .] These problem areas in the law cannot be tolerated indefinitely.

That was Mr. Chrétien in 1977.

Senator Olson: How about something more recent?

Senator Murray: I will give you one from 1990, when Mr. Chrétien was seeking the leadership of the Liberal party. I quote.

> I can't say I will kill the GST or I won't kill the GST. You have to tell people where you'd get the $25 billion.

That was on April 2, 1990, as reported in the Winnipeg Sun.

However, a few days later, on April 21, 1990, Mr. Chrétien said:

> It would be impossible for me to say that I would get rid of the GST today because I would have to tell you where I would get the $25 billion to replace it and I really don't know where the money will come from.

Senator Olson: That is a pretty responsible statement, is it not?

Senator Murray: Six months later, with the GST on the brink of becoming law, and all the fun and games that were taking place down here in the Senate, Mr. Chrétien decided to join the Liberal senators and announced that he was going to replace the GST. Indeed, he announced the creation of a Liberal working group to > propose a fair and equitable tax system that will give us the necessary revenues to implements our programs.

However, a few weeks ago, Mr. Chrétien did a complete about-face on the question of the GST. Rather than replace the system, he decided just to tinker with it. I quote him:

> I want the GST to be changed substantially.
> We're saying that we're reviewing the tax and that it will be fundamentally changed.
> But I cannot say there will be no tax on any goods because there will be. I cannot say that there will be no tax on any services because we don't know yet.

So much for the various positions of the leader of the Liberal party. As between a party that knows where it stands, that has a clear position, that knows where it is going, as this government does, and a party that cannot make up its mind and a leader who backs and fills and fudges on important issues, I think the people of Canada will always choose the party and the government that knows its policy and has no fear of announcing it and giving some direction to the Canadian people.

Senator Olson: Never mind whether the Canadian people like it or not.

Senator Murray: On the matter of agriculture, I indicated earlier that Mr. MacKnight will be making an announcement perhaps as early as this week on these payments. I want again to put on the record that the $700 million that we are talking about, along with assistance from existing programs—and I am talking here about GRIP and NISA and so forth—and from some of the provinces, will bring government payments to the grains and oil-seeds producers to about $3.3 billion between now and the end of June, 1992. After deducting the producers' premiums of about $600 million for crop insurance and GRIP, the net amounts producers will receive is about $2.7 billion. I have put this on the record on a previous occasion. I do so again in view of the questions that the honourable senator persists in raising, notwithstanding the clear answers that he has been given by me and by other spokesmen for the federal government.

Senator Murray: I have told the honourable senator also that at least some of the money will be provided over the next two to three months, and as I said two months ago, our target is to have all of it in producers' hands by seeding time next spring.

The honourable senator says that the farmers have received nothing. Well, first of all, let me remind him of the record of the past few years.

Senator Olson: Just this year.

Senator Murray: In 1986, the $1 billion Special Canadian Grains Program. In 1987, $1.1 billion in the Special Canadian Grains Program. In 1988, $850 million in the Crop Drought Assistance Program. In 1990, $500 million in the Special Income Assistance Program. In 1991, $640 million in Farm Support and Adjustments Measures.

This year, honourable senators, in March we announced a $158 million payment under the Western Grain Stabilization Program. In April, we wrote down farmers' GRIP premiums by 25 per cent and provincial premiums by 10 per cent to make it easier for farmers to join this safety net program, an initiative that is worth $112 million for producers and $33 million for the provinces.

In August, we announced the extension of the Cash Flow Enhancement Program to the new crop year beginning August 1. This means farmers can receive interest-free cash advances of up to $50,000 on their 1991-92 crop.

In September, the NISA forms went out. Most of the cheques, as we know, are to be in the mail between September and Christmas, and NISA itself will deliver some $334 million in 1991 and another $220 million early in 1992.

[Senator Murray.]

In October, the interim GRIP payment cheques began going out to farmers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. This interim GRIP payment is expected to be at least $600 million for all of Canada.

In November, GRIP interim payment cheques began going out to Ontario and Alberta farmers. The final payment will be made through the Western Grain Stabilization Program. Payments will be made on eastern crops under the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

Honourable senators, the record of action, the record of assistance, on the part of the federal government towards the farmers for whom my honourable friend speaks completely belies the contention that he has made in this house earlier today that nothing has been done, that there has been no follow up, that there has been inaction on the part of the government. When the need is there, we consider the need. We take advice from the farmers and the Third Line of Defence Committee. We then act in consequence. That is what we have done.

My friend the Minister of Agriculture will make a statement tomorrow as to a substantial part of the special assistance and the modalities of payment, how the assistance is to be delivered and what the timing will be. Surely the honourable senator can await that announcement.

In the meantime, the least he might do is acknowledge the positive steps that have been taken by this government, by Mr. McKnight and by Mr. Mazankowski before him, to bring a real measure of assistance to the farm sector which, as the honourable senator correctly says, has been sorely tried by circumstances that are outside its control and outside the control of this government or this country.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, because my name was brought into the debate by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I wish to make a few points, but not on issues concerning farming. I will leave those to my friend and colleague, Senator Olson, who is more than familiar with the issues. I wish to say a few words about taxing measures and government policy in general.

I, for one, honourable senators, hope that the Leader of the Government is right when he says that next year we will see a boom in the economy like we have never seen before. The problem right now in Canada is that 85 per cent of Canadians do not believe this government. They have no confidence in it. That accounts for part of the problem we see in the economy.

The people do not believe Senator Murray when he speaks on behalf of the government. They do not believe the Prime Minister. They do not believe the Minister of Finance. They do not believe anyone. The end result is that the Canadian people have lost their confidence.

My friend Senator Olson talks about what will happen in the next election. I will make a prediction on that point. I do not know what party will get the most seats. I do not know who will be elected. However, I dare say that if the Conservative Party salvages 30 seats in Canada, it will be very lucky. I do not know whether it will be Preston Manning or Lucien Bouchard who is elected, or a member of the NDP or the Liberals.

We have lived through such a loss of confidence in the government over the last few years in New Brunswick. The end result has been that the Tory party was completely wiped out. That could happen in this country. It is sad.

Honourable senators, the policies that have been embarked upon by this government are a copy of the Reagan-Thatcher policies. They have proven only one thing—they are not the complete answer to economic problems. I ask honourable senators to look at what has taken place in the United States of America.

Senator Murray: Do you agree that it is a partial answer?

Senator Thériault: Look at what has happened in Britain. At least there, a way to get rid of Thatcher was found. If we could get rid of Mulroney in Canada, then perhaps the people of Canada would regain some confidence.

Senator Barootes: Worry about getting rid of Chrétien.

Senator Thériault: This is not the first time that the country has gone through a recession. The last time we had a bad recession was in 1981-82. Even in those days, the people of Canada had not lost confidence. The proof of that is that when the economy started to come back, it came back with a boom. This time, we should look at all the indicators.

Senators opposite talk about the success of the GST over the manufacturers' sales tax. For the first time in 15 years we have a trade deficit. Free trade was supposed to give us free access to the American market. What has happened?

Senator Murray: Did the honourable senator happen to notice that those statistics are for a month in which, because of a strike, almost no grain was shipped abroad?

Senator Olson: But the Tories were in office.

Senator Thériault: Even if you leave out the grain and just look at the Americans, the honourable senator will recall that there was no strike in the auto manufacturing sector. There was no strike in the other major manufacturing sectors in Canada.

Honourable senators will recall that when we started negotiations with the Americans on the free trade agreement we had an annual surplus of $20 billion per year. What has been the trend since then? The right-wing policies of this government and its giving of all the breaks to the Americans have brought this country to a point where the Canadian people have lost confidence in it. That is sad.

Do honourable senators remember the big debate we had on Bill C-21, the patent drug legislation, and on unemployment insurance?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Thériault: These matters are now coming home to roost.

Senator Murray: Tell us about the forecasts and the predictions you made about drug prices and about R and D. Tell us what has happened, notwithstanding your predictions on both counts. Bring the statistics in.

Senator Barootes: You should be ashamed to raise Bill C-21.

Senator Thériault: I am quite happy that the Leader of the Government in the Senate was able to predict what I was about to say with respect to the patent drug situation, since today there is an article in the Toronto Star on that very subject. I know that some senators on the other side of the house do not like to hear about articles that are in the Toronto Star; they like to quote the Globe and Mail, which is their political Bible.

It states in this article:

> Canada will be under strong pressure in North American free trade talks to end the patent-law provisions lowering the price of prescription drugs for consumers, a Washington patent expert warns.
> The United States succeeded in having Canada make controversial changes during the Canada-U.S. free trade negotiations, Robert Sherwood, a U.S. expert on intellectual property law, said yesterday.
> But these changes did not go far enough . . . Sherwood told a free trade conference organized by the University of Toronto's Centre for International Studies.
> The U.S. pharmaceutical industry, which dominates much of Canada's pharmaceuticals business, wants further curbs to the system of compulsory licensing.

It goes on to state that prior to the 1987 law the generic drug arrangement succeeded in reducing drug costs by $300 million per year in Canada. I know that for the same program in four different provinces where I have made inquiries, drug costs in those provinces have increased. This is despite what we read in the glossy advertising taken out by the drug manufacturers. Health costs have gone up in my province, where there is a population of 750,000 people, by $19 million because of the increase in the price of drugs. This is what the policies of the government are doing.

Senator Murray: What is the percentage increase? Let the honourable senator tell us what the percentage increase is in patent drugs, because it is patents drugs that we are controlling here, since that bill became law? Bring those statistics in. Never mind the global budget figures in New Brunswick about which, frankly, it is impossible to judge their meaning.

Senator Thériault: I tell honourable senators that I get my information from the provincial governments who have to pay the costs, not from the big companies which are supplying funds to the Conservative Party. The policies of the government are causing the cost of health programs in Canada to go through the roof. People in government cannot afford to pay them any more. This is part of your philosophy of following Thatcher-Reagan policies.

A lot of people are afraid to talk about government intervention of any kind because of what happened in Eastern Europe and Russia. No one ever suggested that communism was the answer. No one from this party has ever suggested that total social programs or total government intervention was the right program. But we do contend—at least, I contend—that it is the mixture that has proven right for Canada since Confederation. A mixture of government and private enterprise has made the standard of living for the people in this country better than in any other country in the world.

I say to you that your policy is going in the wrong direction. The last time that Canadian history records a totally free market society was in 1930 under R. B. Bennett, and the end result was the biggest depression that anyone has every heard of. Since those days, a combination of private and government enterprises and interjection and intervention have produced results in this country.

So much for the drugs. Now the unemployment insurance program—

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Would you entertain a question, Senator Thériault, please?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Only an entertaining question.

Senator Barootes: It is an entertaining question. Prior to the institution of Bill C-22, the drug patent bill, the figures were a 9 to 16 percent annual increase in the cost of drugs. Since then, as promised by the pharmaceutical companies, the rate of increase in the cost of drugs has been less than the cost of living index.

Senator Barootes: You cannot deny that. It has also brought back to Canada some—you can hold me to this number—140 or more Canadian scientists who had deserted to do their research in the United States. They are now back in Canada and working in research here. Is that a plus or a minus?

Senator Olson: What's the question?

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, as I said earlier, I am not getting my information from the glossy ads in Maclean's or any other magazine, paid for by the hundreds of millions of dollars of super-profits made by the drug companies since 1987. I know, Mr. Thatcher, where you come from.

Senator Corbin: And we know what happened to Mrs. Thatcher.

Senator Barootes: I know where you are coming from, too, Mr. Lewis.

Senator Thériault: I know where you come from. You want the same kind of free market society that has caused the Americans to have 40 million people without any kind of social protection at all. That is what you want. Your policies have caused the situation where there are now more than a million people on welfare in the great province of Ontario. It is not only happening in the Maritimes.

[Senator Thériault.]

Your policy on unemployment insurance has caused the need for increases in premium payments—by 24 percent in July, and by 7 percent again in January 1992. In the meantime, under your philosophy, you have gone to that fund and taken $1.8 billion for training that used to—

Senator Murray: You are against that, are you?

Senator Thériault: No, I am not against training.

Senator Murray: You are against funds for training?

Senator Thériault: But those funds used to be provided from general revenue, not from the backs of the poor unemployed people in Canada. That is what your philosophy is achieving in this country.

Next year, you say there will be a projected growth of 4 percent. 4 percent, after two years of no growth, is what? It won't bring you back to where you were in 1990.

Senator Murray: Yes, it will.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, look at the polls. Read the polls. The people of this country have lost confidence. Your policies are not working. People are concerned. People used to be secure in their thoughts that there was in Canada a social safety net to protect them during recessions. Now, people are not spending. Even those who have a few bucks will not spend them because they are scared. They are worried. And because people are not spending, there is no growth in the economy.

Senator Murray: That is not true.

Senator Thériault: Even the business people should understand that, when you cut unemployment insurance, you force more people onto welfare roles. People lose confidence, and they have no money to buy, and when they do not have any money to buy, the business people do not make any money.

In the last 50 years, since World War II, we have had it good in this country. I am not suggesting at all that the Liberals did it all.

Senator Olson: No, but they did.

Senator Thériault: But I am suggesting that this is the first time since the War that we are faced with a Reagan-Thatcher policy, made outside of Canada, that may be good for the United Kingdom and may be good for the money-oriented people of the United States, but it does not work in Canada, and the Canadian people will not support it.

Senator Murray: Trust the facts. Give us the facts.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

On motion of Senator Barootes, debate adjourned.

UNEMPLOYMENT

FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ADDRESS UNEMPLOYMENT IN CANADA, PARTICULARLY IN ALBERTA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 28, 1991:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the unemployment situation in Canada, and in Alberta in particular.

He said: Honourable senators, I had a number of things I wanted to say on this matter. We were diverted into a number of matters that were very interesting, and I think they needed to be said, particularly by Senator Thériault. It was also very good that Senator Murray got into the debate to some extent, because he provided us with some more information and perhaps more specific promises about a number of things in the agriculture sector that he has not done before.

Under Inquiry No.5, however, I want to talk more particularly about the unemployment situation in Alberta. The reason is that we have never, in recent history, had anything that equates to the present unemployment situation in Alberta. To be fair, I am not suggesting that the numbers of unemployed in Alberta are the highest. The Alberta level is lower than the national average by some 2 percentage points. I am not quite sure what it is, but I think it is around 8 percent or so, the national average being 2 or 3 percentage points higher than that.

However, the kind of devastation that is going on amongst the so-called working people in Alberta at this time has never happened before. There is downsizing in the gas and oil business. There are deliberate attempts to cut costs that are resulting in people losing jobs, jobs that they had expected to have for the rest of their working life.

I am sure that every part of Canada has some very basic, stable industries. Well, not any more; not since 1984. A lot of that has come loose.

Prior to that time, people could get into the forest industry in B.C. with a good reliable company and expect to work there for the rest of their lives. No doubt in the Maritime provinces people expected to work in the fishing industry, or perhaps the ocean transport industry, for all of their lives. That was also true in Alberta in the gas and oil sector. If a person was able to get into the employ of large companies like Esso Resources, Amoco, Shell and a lot of others, and work their way through the various promotions, they expected that that would be their occupation, with all the benefits that come from promotions from time to time, for the rest of their lives.

During the summer of 1991 there has been a program to which the newspaper reporters refer as "downsizing". The announcement comes out from Esso Resources that it will lay off 900 people. Amoco makes an announcement that it will lay off or "downsize" by 3,900 people. I do not have the statistics in front of me, and in the few minutes I have at my disposal I do not have time to read them, all anyway. What is important is that as far as those people know, they have lost their jobs forever. It is not a layoff for a few days or weeks or months, after which they will be called back. They have been told that that position does not exist in the company anymore.

These are people of all ages, but some of them are in the age group of 40, 45 and up. They probably have some savings, but most of them, like everyone else, have a house that requires the kind of salary they were making in order to make the payments, and they have a car and all the other things that go with feeling fairly comfortable in the Canadian scene, because their job was to be steady and carry on. Now they have been laid off and have no hope of getting back on.

Senator Barootes: Is this a speech for your householder for Christmas?

Senator Olson: I think it might be useful to send it out. I will tell you one thing that I know about politics, which perhaps Senator Barootes does not know, and that is that the most effective way of communicating with the people with whom you are supposed to communicate is to reflect accurately what they have on their minds. I said that he may not know, but I think he does know that. You do not need a bunch of new, bright ideas on how you intend to change everything in a country. You need, first, to articulate clearly what is bothering people, then they will read it and have some respect for how you obtained that information, that feeling for them.

I hope that over the years I have been able to do that because, in my view, the mark of a good and successful politician is that he can come from as far away as Alberta to the capital of this country and stand before one of the houses of Parliament and tell it like it is, and say what the people really have on their minds.

I do not send Christmas brochures, by the way, but if people out there read some of the copies of Debates of the Senate that I intend to send out, I hope that they will agree that I have been able to accurately reflect their opinions of the Government of Canada and what it has done and, indeed, what it has failed to do. And what is most important right now is what the government has failed to do.

We do not know anymore what the national government's policy is respecting gas and oil. I do not think the government has one. I do not think there is one person on that side of the house who could get up and, in five minutes or 50 minutes, say what the policy of this government is respecting gas and oil, except to say "let the market decide". That means that the decisions that are made in Saudi Arabia have far more effect on what happens to the employment levels and the distress in the oil patch, as we call it out there, than anything that we do in Canada. If that is the way you think it ought to be, okay, but at least come clean and say so. Say that you have abdicated your responsibility to govern this country.

Some minutes ago there were some complaints made about the government abdicating its responsibility even for the social services safety net that Canadians have become so proud of. We know that is coming. We know that if this government stays in office long enough it will start to undermine the medicare system, the hospitalization system and all of that. It is very simple to understand why. The multinational corporations for whom the free trade deal was wrought need that move because they can argue very satisfactorily that it is unfair for them to compete in the so-called global village if they have to carry the cost of hospitalization, medicare and all the rest of the safety net programs that we have, as opposed to someone manufacturing in other parts of the world where they do not have to carry the medical system on the back of the taxation system.

We can figure that out. There are lots of people who understand that now, and there are a whole lot of people who do not want to change that, either. So I hope that this government will try to do something. I am making a plea today not because I am afraid of what will happen. If the people had a chance to vote and they voted the government in, I would have to take it. There would be buttons all over the place saying, "Don't blame me, I didn't vote Tory". But people realize that this government will probably going to hang onto office to the last day, November 21, 1993. Therefore there are a couple of years left, and I plead with the government to make some changes so that people can have some hope.

Let me talk about the GST. You can say all you want about the GST. I was listening to Senator Murray say that the GST is a wonderful thing but that we have not yet had quite enough time to see whether people like it. I will tell him right now that they do not like it. They understand they have to pay enough taxes so that there are not increasing deficits in this country. That is not the point. The point is that it has an unnecessarily complicated and costly collection structure that the people do not like.

For example, a farmer used to be able to exchange a little custom combining or ploughing with his neighbour. As the farmer pays for the work—and they will stop paying in money—but supposing he does it for $1,000, he must send $70 to the government. He must make all the arrangements to get the forms and account for it. If he does not, the revenue policemen will check him out.

Then what happens? The farmer who paid the $1,000 and the $70 GST must apply to get the money back. This is zero-rated for farmers. The farmer is not supposed to pay, but the government would not exempt him. The farmer must go through this complicated procedure of bookkeeping, accounting, collecting the GST, obtaining the correct forms and submitting them to the government. The farmer probably has to borrow the money in order to pay the GST. In the meantime, the other farmer is going through the same process to collect the money back from the government.

You think this is comical? Well, after you have gone through the process a few times, it is not comical any more. If you think that farmers and small businessmen do not resent this rebate system, then you are not listening to the right people and not listening in the right places.

There was an anticipation when this tax was brought in that the collection process would be onerous for hundreds of thousands of people. People were apprehensive about the amount they would be required to pay, given that the economy was in decline. It is not merely a mild resentment; it is a livid anger at a government that is sticking its nose into everyone's business for no reason.

[Senator Olson.]

The bureaucrats understand this process. I have had a little experience with bureaucracy. A politician's job includes keeping the bureaucrats in line. A politician should ask, "How will this affect the people of this country; how will they respond to any new law in this area?" If politicians do not do that, they are failing in their jobs as politicians.

The bureaucrats did not want to exempt anyone, or very few, from the GST. They would rather zero-rate farmers, because then they would have the records of all the transactions made, and this would make the collection of income tax easier and more complete. A great idea for the bureaucrats! A terrible inconvenience to all the people who must comply with that law! Do not forget that when a law passes through both Houses of Parliament, that law is forced on people. Individuals are forced to comply, and they do not like that. That is what is happening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, unless everyone agrees that you can finish your speech—

Senator Olson: I will not impose on honourable senators, unless they wish that I proceed to the next item. I will take only a few more minutes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: The unemployment situation in Alberta is terrible. According to statistics, Alberta is better off than any province in the country, but the economic situation in Alberta is still bad. Calgary is supposed to be feeling the effects of the recession to a lesser degree than other major centres in the country. However, this is no longer a recession; it is a depression. I can walk around downtown Calgary and see first hand the consequences of this economic downturn. The food banks are running out of food in Calgary, just as they are in the rest of the country. The welfare payments have been cut back by this government in its transfer payments to the provinces. There is real deprivation in this country, unfortunately.

I hope the government will do something about this economic situation. The government has a few years remaining in its mandate. It has time to redeem itself, but if it does not exhibit concern for ordinary Canadians, if it does not stop catering to the multi-national corporations, as it has with the free trade agreement and the monetary policy, the government will get what it deserves in the next election.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, what I have to say can be said briefly. It is a question of putting a few facts on the record, as distinct from the twisted version of reality that we heard from the Honourable Senator Olson as to the state of the national economy.

Senator Olson: You will find out what people think about your facts.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government has an economic plan. The economic plan is working.

Senator Thériault: Starvation for poor people.

Senator Murray: The targets set out in the budget of February 1991 are being achieved. The Honourable Senator Thériault talks about hardship and misery. I will give him hardship and misery in the 1980s with double-digit inflation, double-digit unemployment and double-digit interest rates. That is heartache and misery on the backs of those who can least afford it.

Senator Thériault: But there was confidence.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator was able to contain his indignation quite successfully during that period of time.

Senator Thériault: Our popularity never went down to 15 per cent.

Senator Olson: You mean everything that is happening to the people of this country has been deliberately designed?

Senator Murray: I do not wish to engage in rhetoric with the honourable senators. Let me put a few facts on the record so that they will be there in contradistinction to what the Honourable Senator Olson and the Honourable Senator Thériault have said.

Senator Thériault: Do not waste your time. No one believes you.

Senator Murray: I have a few facts to put on the record. The Honourable Senator Olson talks about jobs, employment and unemployment. I wish to remind him that employment has increased in six of the last eight months in this country, and that full-time employment increased by 108,000 in the last two months. These and other encouraging signs are evidence that the recovery is continuing.

Senator Olson: Why does no one in the country know it?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows, and not because I am telling him but because the facts are there, and the facts are released every month by Statistics Canada and from other objective sources that inflation has been going down dramatically.

Senator Olson: Because of the depression.

Senator Murray: The year-over-year increase in the Consumer Price Index was 4.4 per cent in October, down from 5.7 per cent in the second quarter of 1991. The six-month annualized rate of inflation was 1.3 per cent in October.

With the decline in inflation has come a decline in interest rates and a decline in the bank rate. The bank rate has declined by 102 basis points since the beginning of September. With the decline in inflation and the decline in interest rates has come an upsurge in confidence in this country.

Senator Olson: Which poll have you read?

Senator Murray: Let me give some examples: The Conference Board of Canada has just completed a survey of international forecasts and indicates that Canada will post the strongest growth of the G-7 economies in 1992. What is that but an objective source, the Conference Board stating that we will lead the entire industrialized world in economic growth next year? The Conference Board's own projection is that real growth in Canada will be 4.3 per cent in 1992.

In addition to that, I give you the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. That body has recently released a survey of Canada which says that the fiscal actions taken by the government and the inflation reduction targets taken by the government in cooperation with the Bank of Canada—the Honourable Senator Olson was throwing cold water on these only a few months ago.

Senator Olson: Only because of the suffering that came from these policies.

• (1640)

Senator Murray: The OECD states that these targets, together with continued efforts on structural reform, will leave Canada:

> Well placed to maintain its traditional role as one of the most prosperous and fastest growing economies in the OECD area."

The OECD expects the Canadian economy to expand by 3.5 per cent in 1992.

The International Monetary Fund predicts that the Canadian economy will grow by 3.8 per cent in 1992, the strongest growth amongst the G-7 countries. The IMF sees inflation in Canada falling by 2.8 per cent in 1992, second lowest to Japan among the G-7 countries.

There, honourable senators, are some forecasts and indications from reputable and objective sources about economic growth in Canada this year and next, in the short and medium term. The honourable senator never heard the like when he was a minister of the Crown; he would eat his heart out to hear such forecasts from reputable international think-tanks concerning Canada's economy.

Senator Olson: We never had the problems you have.

Senator Murray: All they ever heard was condemnation and lack of confidence on the part of the international community reflected in high interest rates, high unemployment and high inflation during their entire time in office, and certainly during their last mandate.

Honourable senators, I have pointed out the increases in employment, the decreases in the inflation rate and in interest rates, and the upsurge in confidence. I have just pointed to the evidence from the international forecasters as to what is happening in the Canadian economy. Let me now drive the point home for the honourable senator who spoke for Alberta, and about the situation in Alberta.

I spoke about confidence. In this calendar year, I want to give the honourable senator a couple of examples of the large investment plans that have been announced in his own province. In the field of petrochemicals, Nova Corporation has announced an investment of $690 million this year.

Senator Olson: They do that every year.

Senator Murray: They do it every year, do they?

How about Alberta-Pacific Forest Industries Ltd., the pulp and paper giant which announced an investment of $1.2 billion. Do they do that every year?

Senator Olson: No. They have to get it past the environmental people first.

Senator Murray: No, they do not do that every year. Why are they doing that if it is not because they are confident in the future of the Canadian economy and in the management of the Canadian and Alberta economies?

Senator Olson: We have a lot of good stuff out there.

Senator Murray: It is a good province with a good government, and you have a good country with a good government, too.

A rather smaller amount, but in the field of plastics, Toby Manufacturing Inc. in Alberta announced a $10 million investment this year.

Senator Olson: That is good, too.

Senator Murray: In the hotel area, Wesbild Enterprises Ltd. announced an $80 million investment this year. A world trade showcase announced for Edmonton, the Edmonton Northlands' World Trade Showcase, an investment of $31 million.

Those are a few examples of important investments announced in the course of this calendar year from my honourable friend's home province.

The honourable senator says that occasionally en route to Medicine Hat, he spends a night in Calgary. I invite him to spend another day in Calgary and to go to the sources of objective information and talk to the business community there about their plans. He will go to Medicine Hat a much happier man, and he will return to Ottawa a much happier man than he is today.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

PRIVILEGE

ORAL NOTICE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I rise pursuant to Rule 44(7) which indicates the procedure to be followed consequent upon my having submitted to the Clerk earlier today an advice that I would raise a question of privilege.

Rule 44(7) states that I must rise at this time to give oral notice of the question of privilege:

> In doing so, the Senator shall indicate that he or she is prepared to move a motion either calling upon the Senate to take action in relation to the matter complained of or referring the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders.

I wish to advise the Senate that I propose to move a motion to refer the matter to Internal Economy, because that is where it belongs rather than in the Rules Committee. I am not sure what the problem is, and in my comments later I will speak about that. That is what I propose to do when the matter comes up later under the present rules.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the matter of committees sitting during sessions is always a problem in the Senate. As a normal rule, we do not like it and I do not believe that the other side likes it any better than we do. However, Senator Poitras spoke to me in advance and indicated what the situation was. I understand that there is agreement between senators in the committee on both sides, and on that basis I am prepared to grant leave.

FARM SUPPORT AND ADJUSTMENT MEASURES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PAYMENT PHASES

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I received a press release from the Minister of Agriculture's office this morning, allegedly setting out the terms and conditions under which the $800 million will be paid under the Farm Support Adjustment Measures, Phase I and Phase II. It really does not add a great deal to the information we had before.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me what that means? If he cannot do so immediately, can he help me to find out what is meant? I had asked earlier if it was to be based on the acreages in the permit books. On page 2 of this press release, it says:

> In the grains sector, an acreage formula will be used as the basis for payments on the Prairies and in Atlantic Canada.

What does that mean? They do not have permit books for quota privileges in Atlantic Canada. I do not know whether or not it will be the same formula on the prairies and in Atlantic Canada. The press release says that the NISA database will be used in Ontario and British Columbia, and that the provincial stabilization program in Quebec will be the basis for distributing the funds.

Could the Leader of the Government help me obtain that information, because people want to know.

• (1410)

The second item to which I wish to refer is found on page 3 of the press release. It states:

> The $800-million second phase involving cash assistance is in addition to the initial $640-million FSAM package announced in April.

It goes on to state:

> The first phase of FSAM included incentives for producers to participate in NISA, GRIP premium reductions, cash advances and land use adjustment.

In other words, farmers did not receive any money; they just got incentives to pay their premiums for some of the programs that the government announced. That bears out exactly what I claimed yesterday. That is to say, there have not been any payments made at all. There has been some juggling on the government's books and it claims that it paid out $640 million for that.

Will the minister clarify some of these matters? What is contained in this news release really does not add much to the public knowledge.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know that I can help the honourable senator with the second part of his question, because it was not a question at all but a political comment which would be more appropriately—

Senator Olson: An informational comment.

Senator Murray: —made in debate.

With regard to the criteria for the prairie acreage payment, that is, seeded acreage, my information is that in developing the criteria, the main focus of the Third Line of Defence Committee was to ensure that payments are delivered quickly to producers. Seeded acreage was selected because the data had already been collected by the Canadian Wheat Board. These criteria will ensure that producers receive prompt payment. The first instalment will be based on seeded acreage.

The honourable senator refers to the situation in Atlantic Canada. I am informed that the initial and final payment will be delivered through the regional offices of the Agri-food Development Branch of the Department of Agriculture in each province. Application forms will be mailed directly to farmers in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In Prince Edward Island, the same database used to deliver the Special Income Assistance Program in 1990 will be used. I am informed that assistance will be paid out on the basis of seeded acreage, and the payment level will vary depending on the crops in Atlantic Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it would be helpful if we could obtain a copy of that portion of the report of the Third Line of Defence Committee that defines the basis for the payment. Another dimension has been added to this situation in addition to what is in the news release. The minister now says that it applies to "seeded acreage". Seeded acreage is very much different from quota acreage in western Canada. That is why it is important to know the difference.

All of this could be cleared up if the minister would obtain a copy of the report of the Third Line of Defence Committee to the government recommending certain criteria or formulae for determining the eligibility for payment. If he could obtain that document, there might be some precision there that practical farmers on the lands would understand.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will see what is available from my colleague, Mr. McKnight.

THE CONSTITUTION

REACTION OF PROVINCES TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS—QUALITY OF NEWS MEDIA COVERAGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have two questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he perhaps advise honourable senators and the public at large whether, in the course of the current discussions on proposals that have been made and put before the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, the public can soon expect the federal government's ministers from Quebec to start defending the government's proposals in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): I don't understand exactly what the senator means. The proposals made by the government are intended to encourage debate among Canadians. The government has already said that once the parliamentary committee has submitted its report, the government will table final, more concrete and more formal proposals. For the time being, a number of proposals have been put forward as a basis for discussion. That is how most provinces and other parties have treated these proposals.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government may have had trouble understanding my question, but he had no trouble with his answer.

As usual, he evaded the issue. It is my understanding, and many Canadians seem to agree, that the proposals made by the government are, more or less, the government's position, subject of course to being amended or enhanced in some way or another. In any case, they are the government's proposals.

I wonder, and many of the people I talk to every day are wondering whether ministers from Quebec, like Benoît Bouchard and Marcel Masse, approve those proposals. Every time we read a newspaper or watch television, one of the ministers, especially Mr. Clark, is saying: "It is very serious. The country could be on the verge of breaking up". If that is true, doesn't the Leader of the Government in the Senate think it is high time the ministers from Quebec, who have been telling all and sundry for the past seven years that they are there to represent Quebec . . .

Doesn't he think it is high time those ministers decided once and for all whether they are really there to defend Quebec in Canada or outside Canada? Canadians, and not only French-speaking Canadians, are wondering about this. I am too, and I would appreciate an answer from the minister.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my hon. friend is not very well informed about the activities of my cabinet colleagues from Quebec. They support the proposals tabled by the government at the end of September and are aware the government is looking for suggestions on how these proposals could be improved.

I think, for instance, of my friend, Benoît Bouchard, who supported the government's proposals, not only in Quebec but across the country. Quite recently, on a trip with the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Mazankowski, in Alberta, Mr. Bouchard, Mr. Charest and other Quebec colleagues publicly expressed their support for the government's constitutional policy. That is quite clear.

• (1420)

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am an avid reader of newspapers from Quebec. I listen daily to French television from Quebec, Radio-Canada, TVA and the other ànetworks.

It is true that the Prime Minister of Canada has repeatedly defended the Canadian government's position in Quebec. I personally thank him for doing that. The Prime Minister has done it often and vigorously and I am very happy about that.

It is also true that I read in the papers about a meeting of a few Conservatives from the Lac Saint-Jean region and some Conservatives from the riding of the Minister of Finance in Alberta. That is fine and I do not object.

Senator Simard: I am glad that you approve!

Senator Thériault: I can tell you that we hear less about Benoît Bouchard and Mr. Masse than we hear about Mr. Charest. It is very clear that Mr. Charest defends the government's position. He does not do it as vigorously as he should, in my opinion, but he does it. There are a number of ministers, including Messrs. Bouchard, Masse, Corbeil, Loiselle and so on, but week after week, I have not read anything really about these people defending Canada's position and the Canadian government's proposals in their province.

It would be good if they did, not only to sell the government's proposals to Quebec, but also to show Anglophones outside that province that the ministers from Quebec in that government support the Canadian proposals, rightly or wrongly.

In 1980, during the last referendum, we saw the Canadian government's ministers, day after day, (even Mr. Mulroney who was not the Prime Minister) and other Quebecers, defend Canada's position. Thanks to this concerted effort, federalism prevailed during the referendum.

Right now, there does not seem to be that kind of support for Canada, for this country, among the majority of Francophone ministers from Quebec. I urge the leader of the Government in the Senate to ask his chief to give concrete orders—

Senator Simard: Order!

Senator Thériault: —to his Quebec ministers and to all the other ministers to start defending this country, if they truly believe in it. Let us stop once and for all telling Canadians that the country is on the verge of breaking up. Because, as you know, prophecies of doom are often self-fulfilling.

Let us do something concrete, something positive and stop being as negative as we have been so far.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend is a victim of the deficiencies in the media coverage. Beware of the media!

In any case, I am not responsible for the deficiencies in the media coverage. My friend goes by what he sees or does not see in the media. I am not responsible for that.

All I am saying is that my colleagues, starting with the Prime Mnister and Ministers Charest and Benoît Bouchard, to name but a few, are very active in supporting the government's constitutional proposals in Quebec and elsewhere.

Hon. Senators: Very good!

Senator Thériault: That is not enough!

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Eyton, seconded by the Honourable Senator DeWare, for the third reading of Bill C-8, An Act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I thank the Senate for having allowed me to put this matter over for two days. The reason I did so is really the subject of the question of privilege which I will raise later and has to do with getting transcripts from committees. I will not deal with that issue now, but this transcript is what I have been able to obtain to date, and only after considerable effort. So it was with some difficulty that I was able to prepare myself for my comments.

When this matter came up for second reading, I indicated some of our concerns on the matter of privatization. It is not that we are simply opposed to privatization if it is required, but we do not believe that, in and of itself, privatization is a good thing.

I have the impression that it is a fetish of the government of the day that we must privatize. I think, rather, that we should look at each issue and if privatization is sensible and the right course, then yes, let us do it.

The other concern that I indicated then was that if any corporation was privatized, we had to ensure that the public interest was protected. I mentioned then the privatization, for example, of Route Canada, which really was a very badly-handled privatization. It is one that everyone suffered from. The Canadian public suffered because we should have received more money from the company that was privatized. The workers suffered most because they ended up without jobs. So we have to look at these things very carefully.

Senator LeBlanc: It is a ripoff.

Senator Molgat: Unfortunately, I could not attend when the committee held some of its meetings, but some of my questions have at least been answered. A number of these companies simply have no reason to exist anymore and are being wound up, and others are being transferred to other government departments, and it is indicated which ones are involved. I still have some concerns about the Toronto corporation because a fair amount of lands and buildings are being transferred to developers. Some of the land has not been built upon and it will go to developers. I want to be sure that the public interest is protected here, that the land will not be transferred by some deal that is not open, and that whatever system is used, such as tendering, is open.

I want to deal particularly with the Vancouver corporation. There was an interesting exchange in the committee. I will read some of it into the record because I think it is important. I presume that no honourable senators have had an opportunity to look at these transcripts unless he or she made a particular request to get them. I want to refer to what was said at that committee meeting by Senator Carney, who is certainly familiar with the situation because she is from the province of British Columbia. The witness was Mr. McDermid, Minister of State (Finance and Privatization). Senator Carney said this:

> Mr. Minister, let me, for the benefit of my colleagues, just remind them that Canada Harbour Place Corporation is the building with the sails. It has become the landmark building in Vancouver. It is the one on the waterfront with the wonderful teflon sails. It was Canada's gift to Expo, Canada's gift to Vancouver for Expo '86. It basically comprises the cruiseship terminal and the convention centre. It is a very successful building. Under this legislation, of course, the crown corporation that operates it would be for sale or shut down.

Then she said:

> —there is a concern that the fate of this corporation could affect its ability to be the federal presence.

I think Senator Carney's point is proper, that this building is indeed the federal presence in Vancouver, there for all to see as a federal building and a magnificent one. She goes on to say:

> If it is going to be absorbed by another agency, what is that agency? There are two suggestions. One is DPW and that is not encouraged because DPW is not the most efficient way to do that.
> I should point out, this is a self-sufficient agency. It does not weigh on public money. Its major revenues are parking revenues and leases.

She goes on:

> There is also a suggestion that it should be absorbed by the port, but the problem with having the port absorb it is the port's business is running the port. Its business is not being the federal presence.

Then I skip again and Senator Carney finishes:

> The two questions are, who would absorb it and how would you ensure that the federal presence remains in a city which really has very little federal presence of any sort?

I think Senator Carney made a valid point there, and I share her concern. I would have expected the minister to say, "Well, we have a better plan. We are all set, and we know what we will do, and we will ensure there is a federal presence in Vancouver. We have a better way of doing it than is being done now." That, however, is not what the minister said. The minister said he has no plan. He does not know where it will go. He does not know who will be in charge.

• (1440)

Let me quote the minister. He is answering Senator Carney. He says:

> Let me answer your questions this way: I understand there is some controversy on this and that there are ongoing discussions. The points that you raise are being raised by others. No conclusion has been reached as to which federal entity they should go to. That debate is going on.

Later, Mr. McDermid says:

> What this bill does is permit the department to do something with the crown corporation. Again, it has not been decided what or when, but those discussions are ongoing.

Honourable senators, we are being asked to pass legislation that does not make sense. For the others, I believe the minister made a case, but for Vancouver, he makes no case. He admits to Senator Carney and to the committee that there is a problem. I do not think he denied the need for the federal presence. He accepted it, but he has no plan. He does not know who will take over.

Why are we passing the legislation with this particular corporation in it? The logic would be to pass it with the other elements, but not to include this one until the minister can come to us with a plan. I do not think it is reasonable for the minister to come to us, as representatives of the Canadian people, and say, "Give me the chance to privatize this, but I do not know what I will do about it. For those reasons, honourable senators, I wish to move an amendment.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Honourable senators, I move:

That Bill C-8 be amended

(a) by deleting sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6;

(b) by striking out lines 8 and 9 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"47. Sections 8 and 9, subsections 10(1) and(2),".

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Pat Carney: Mr. Speaker, before proceeding, I wonder if Senator Molgat would take a question on this matter?

Senator Molgat: Certainly. By all means.

Senator Carney: I am at a loss because I do not know the details of the motion you are proposing. Could you elaborate on what your alternative plan would be? I am pleased that you have such a high regard for this institution, which I think serves a nonpartisan purpose in that it was initiated under one administration and completed under another. I am pleased that you share my concern about what happens with Canada Harbour Place. It may be that this was simply a bureaucratic decision taken without full realization of its implications, but would you explain or elaborate what your alternative vision is?

Senator Molgat: My amendment simply deletes from the bill any reference to the Vancouver Canada Harbour Place. The bill will then stand on the basis of the other corporations in the bill where the minister made a satisfactory explanation, although there were questions. Honourable Senator De Bané raised interesting questions as to the disposition of the land and whether it should revert, in the case of Toronto, to Toronto. This, however, would be removed. So we would not deal with Canada Harbour Place at this time.

We would then wait for the minister to produce his plan. At the moment, he is asking us to pass something where he, himself, says he has no plan. I cannot tell you what the plan is, Senator Carney. I wish I could. I would think that you, from Vancouver, would have better ideas than I. In your comments, however, you indicated there were serious concerns from the board as to its continuation; there was serious concern by the staff of Canada Harbour Place, who were in limbo. Rather than have that situation continue, we should say "Let us not deal with that one." The staff will know they are in place and will continue. When the minister has a plan, we will deal with it.

Senator Carney: Honourable senator, do I understand that the effect of your proposal would be to maintain the status quo at this time?

Senator Molgat: That is right.

Senator Carney: You do not have a particular alternative to propose in terms of what might be done with this facility? As I outlined in committee, the problem is that they have not found an alternative way to deal with it. You are not dealing with that. You are saying that by making these deletions, the facility would stay under the status quo?

Senator Molgat: That is correct. As a matter of fact, I gathered that was your proposal at the committee. I would have to go back and get the exact quote, but you expressed concern for the staff being in this uncertain position. You expressed concern for the board. I gather you said it was an efficient corporation now and with all that it was doing to ensure presence—such as annual First of July activities, fireworks—that it was doing its job. Therefore, it was doing a proper job in being the federal presence. The employees were happy, the people of Vancouver were happy, and it did not cost any money. It was self-supporting. With all those points, I do not know why we would change it. The sensible thing to do is to leave it run as it is.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: If it is not broken, don't fix it.

Senator Carney: I support much of what you say, but I want to point out that I was not expressing support for the status quo in the quotes you read into the record. I was merely asking the minister what his alternative plan was. I knew, or perceived, that they did not have an alternative plan. I do not want you to read into my remarks a preference for the status quo. In my remarks in committee, my point was to draw from the minister some idea of what he would do with this magnificent building in the heart of Vancouver.

Senator Molgat: I was not at the meeting, unfortunately. In reading the text, I had the feeling that you felt the status quo was satisfactory because it was doing its job. The fact is that the minister certainly did not present any alternatives. He simply said, "I do not have any. It is not settled. My suggestion is to leave it as it is if it is working." If it turns out that it is not, and the minister has a better idea, we will look at it at that time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the Senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the Chamber be locked.

Honourable senators, it was moved by Senator Eyton, seconded by Senator DeWare, that Bill C-8 be read the third time.

In amendment, it was moved by Senator Molgat, seconded by Senator Gigantès, that Bill C-8 be amended

(a) by deleting sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6;

(b) by striking out lines 8 and 9 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"47. Sections 8 and 9, subsections 10(1) and (2),".

CRIMINAL CODE
CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Berntson moved the second reading of Bill C-17, to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to outline for all honourable senators some of the elements of the government's bill to amend the gun control provisions of the Criminal Code.

As my honourable colleagues will be aware, the government has proposed a bill that contains a number of amendments to Part III of the Criminal Code dealing with firearms and other weapons. Some of these are intended to address concerns about the impact of firearms on public safety. Others are of a more technical nature, making adjustments to the law for clarification or to make administration easier. Many of these changes also respond to administrative concerns that have been raised since the law was last amended in 1979.

Honourable senators, this legislation is the end product of a long process of development. It was first introduced as Bill C-80 by the Minister of Justice on June 26, 1990. Gun control is important to a great many Canadians, and the process of developing this bill has allowed views to be expressed on all sides of the issue. It has emerged as a serious concern, not only for those Canadians who own and use firearms in the course of their daily lives, but for many others as well. Representatives of Canadian municipalities, women's groups, aboriginal groups, firearms owners, victims of crime and many other individuals and organizations have all made significant contributions to this legislation.

All of the evidence suggests that the current legislation has been effective in reducing the number of deaths and injuries from firearms in Canada since it was enacted in 1978. There is still some room for improvement, however. The measures contained in this bill will effectively combine with the existing law and address the very real concerns of all Canadians about public safety and the place of firearms in our society.

The legislation will make significant improvements to several key areas of the existing gun control system. First, it will enhance the present system for prescreening those who want to acquire a firearm by attaching new requirements to the firearms acquisition certificate. It will improve safety by setting uniform national safety screening programs for those who apply for the acquisition certificate. It will reduce the access of all Canadians to certain types of high-firepower weapons that are not intended for sporting purposes, but for military purposes. It will improve the deterrence element of the legislation by increasing the sentences for some offenses. It will improve the prevention of some offenses by increasing the application of court prohibition orders and by encouraging the courts to use them more often, especially in situations involving domestic violence.

The purpose of the firearms acquisition certificate is to keep firearms out of the hands of these who should not have them, or who might use them for criminal purposes, by requiring a basic screening process before the certificate can be issued.

Honourable senators, this legislation will make several important changes to that screening procession. It will require applicants to wait at least 28 days before a certificate can be issued, and to provide the names of two references who the police can contact to verify the identity and the information provided by the applicant. It will require the new FAC form to carry a photograph of the holder to prevent use by unauthorized persons. It will also raise the minimum age for FAC applicants from 16 to 18 years.

Persons between 12 and 18 years will still be allowed to use firearms either under the direct supervision of an adult or under conditions of supervision specified on a minors' permit. This will allow them to use firearms but not to acquire them without parental consent.

One key element of the screening process will be a requirement that applicants must pass a course or test in firearm safety. This will help to screen out unfit applicants. But more importantly, it will eventually ensure that everyone who acquires a gun will have had some instruction on how to use and store it safely.

Many provinces already require those who apply for a hunting license to pass a basic safety course. Existing provisions of the Criminal Code requiring all FAC applicants to pass such a course will be proclaimed in force as soon as the course programs are ready. The use of safety courses for provincial hunting licences over the past ten years has clearly shown their benefits in reducing firearms deaths and injuries.

The new FAC courses will be implemented jointly with the provinces to ensure that the federal and provincial programs are effectively integrated. The new legislation also enables the government to make general regulations dealing with safe storage, and it will require that these regulations be effectively incorporated into the new courses.

The legislation also has elements that will reduce the accidental misuse of guns and encourage responsible ownership and use by all Canadians. Most important of these is the power that will allow specific safe storage standards to be set by regulation. This will allow each individual gun owner to determine what standards are required for his firearms in his situation. It will also help to address concerns under the Charter of Rights that have been raised in the courts.

Honourable senators, there are some types of firearms that simply should not be in the hands of private citizens, however carefully screened they have been. There are others which have legitimate uses for some, but for which the public interest requires additional screening. The existing law recognizes this by designating some weapons as prohibited weapons and others as restricted weapons. This bill will make several important changes to the law in this area. These are intended to place effective limits on certain types of high fire-power or military-type firearms.

The past decade has seen a proliferation of these guns around the world. There have been many incidents where they have been used to commit serious crimes. On December 6, 1989, Marc Lepine used a rifle with two 30-shot magazines to shoot 28 people in only a few minutes. 15 of these people, including Mr. Lepine himself, were killed. Since that time, incidents of mass murder have also taken place in the United States, New Zealand and many parts of the world.

During the development of this legislation, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities unanimously endorsed a resolution calling for the prohibition of military and paramilitary weapons, and the Minister of Justice received some 100 municipal resolutions and petitions demanding the same thing.

Following the Montreal shooting tragedy, representatives of the École Polytechnique collected almost 600 thousand signatures on a petition calling for the prohibition of such firearms. I am sure that all members of this house will share the concerns of those who signed that petition that effective action must be taken against high fire-power guns in Canada.

This legislation, honourable senators, will allow the government of Canada to take effective action against these guns. It will supplement existing powers to prohibit or restrict non-sporting firearms by allowing the government to set limits on the capacity of cartridge magazines. These limits will be used to control the firepower of guns that have some legitimate sporting applications without prohibiting the guns themselves.

● (1600)

The legislation will also specifically designate fully-automatic firearms that have been converted to semi-automatics to be prohibited weapons. These firearms have been a source of growing concern, particularly over the past decade. They pose a high risk to public safety, and have little or no use for legitimate sporting activities.

The prohibition is accompanied by a provision that would permit genuine gun collectors who already have these weapons to keep them, subject to strict limits on transfers. The RCMP will create a special registration category to track these guns and ensure that they are subject to effective controls.

The effect of these measures will be to place a ceiling on the number of these weapons and their owners in Canada. Eventually, as owners dispose of their guns, this number will be reduced and the guns taken out of circulation. Dealing effectively with these firearms will respond to the concerns of Canadians that firearms which are exclusively designed for warfare have no socially acceptable purpose in this country.

Honourable senators, another key element of the existing gun control system is a series of provisions which are intended to deter the misuse of firearms, and to punish those who are not deterred. During the development of this legislation, many Canadians expressed concerns about deterrence.

Members of Canada's law-abiding, responsible firearms community were particularly concerned that responsible citizens are being asked to pay the price of maintaining public safety while criminals go unpunished. They are concerned that too much emphasis is placed on crime prevention and not enough on deterrence or punishment.

Many of the present Criminal Code measures provide for adequate deterrence and punishment, but the legislation contains elements that are intended to improve the overall deterrence package. The maximum sentences for some offences, such as importing or possessing prohibited weapons, are increased from five to 10 years. There are also several provisions intended to increase the length of firearm prohibition orders and to encourage the courts to use them more often, especially in situations involving domestic violence. Many Canadians are concerned about domestic violence, and the tragic consequences that all too often result when firearms are involved.

The legislation will encourage police agencies to conduct "community checks" before issuing an FAC. Investigators may interview spouses, family members, or social agencies if there are any doubts about whether allowing the applicant to obtain a firearm would endanger safety.

Where violent incidents have occurred, courts will also be required to consider firearms prohibition orders before releasing an accused person on bail, or when considering a "peace bond" application. This should help to remove firearms from dangerous situations before a tragedy can occur.

The government has also stated its intention to make every effort to inform Canadians about the changes in the law and how they will be affected by them. Steps will be taken to make this information as available as possible, especially to firearms owners and users. Communications, public legal education and information packages will be assembled and disseminated over the coming months, leading up to the implementation of these new measures.

A general firearms amnesty program is also being developed that would coincide with the proclamation of the new measures. This would be intended to encourage Canadians to dispose of unwanted guns safely, to register handguns and other restricted firearms, and to allow those who have guns who may be affected by the new changes to clarify their status without fear of prosecution.

The amendments will also allow the setting of future FAC fees by regulation. The government does not believe that high costs should be used to deter legitimate gun owners, but it is committed to maintaining cost recovery in the future, and this will permit further adjustments without amending the Criminal Code.

Honourable senators, the Government of Canada has an obligation to develop and maintain a gun control system that will be as effective as possible in preserving and maintaining adequate levels of public safety for all Canadians. Canadians from all walks of life have come forward and made their views clear: They want strong and effective gun control, and they want it now. The system must also be as efficient as possible for those who administer it and for those who are affected by it, but the first obligation must always be to public safety.

This legislation has been developed with those priorities in mind. It will make the overall gun control system more efficient and less costly for the Government of Canada to operate. Most important, however, it will increase the protection of all Canadians from the tragic consequences of criminal or accidental misuse of firearms, and I urge all honourable senators to give it strong and unequivocal support, the type of support that I believe this bill deserves.

Hon. Jack Marshall: May I ask Senator Berntson a question? It has to do with the restriction on page 10, clause 93, having to do with persons under the age of 18 years. This would affect 60,000 cadets in the cadet league of Canada who, as part of their training since time immemorial, have been using and training with weapons under the supervision of the regular forces of Canada.

I wonder if the honourable senator could comment on whether that was taken into consideration when the bill was drafted, or when he received his briefing on the bill?

Senator Berntson: Honourable senators, when I was briefed on the bill, that question was raised and I will give you my understanding of what I believe the bill contains there.

Remember, of course, that the Minister of Justice and expert witnesses will appear before the committee, and any questions that may come up relative to this, I would be very happy to see that answers are brought in for them.

My understanding is that in military applications there is no change; the military cadets operating in the military environment will operate as they have under previous legislation.

• (1610)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask a further question. Will that include the firing of automatic weapons insofar as the cadets are concerned?

Senator Berntson: It is my understanding that in the military environment cadets will be under supervision, of course. It is my understanding that there is nothing in this bill that will change anything in the military environment, and the cadets are obviously in a military environment.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I will be very brief on this.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I heard the word "brief".

Senator Olson: I did not hear that comment. Was it provocative?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I heard the word "brief".

Senator Olson: I intend to be brief, according to my standards, of course.

I want to agree with Senator Berntson that there is a need in Canada to remove a lot of military weapons and that sort of thing that have found their way into our country. Perhaps some of them came from our manufacturers, I do not know, but a number of them come from all over the world. People claim that these things are collectors' items. I do not buy that at all. I think they might be fascinated by the machinery that is in these automatic weapons, these high-powered military attack rifles. The AK-47 is the Russian version and there are several others that are made in other parts of the world.

I think these firearms should be restricted completely. I do not think anyone can make a valid case that these have any place in our society at all. One thing is certain, and that is that all the sporting fish and game laws in every province prohibit the use of them for sporting purposes in any event, and what else can they be used for? Therefore I agree with that provision.

However, I am a little bit concerned about the proposed regulations respecting some of the controls on other high-powered firearms. For example, in the explanation I have of the clauses in the bill, under proposed regulations it says that regulations will specify types and limits. Below that, it says that there will probably be a limit of ten shots in the magazine for semi-automatic handguns. Why? Who needs a ten-shot magazine in a semi-automatic handgun? I do not see any purpose for that. I know some people go to shooting ranges and that sort of thing but they do not need to be able to automatically or semi-automatically repeat ten times. They can load these things in such a way that some other action is needed to fire the ensuing shots.

Honourable senators, ten-shot semi-automatic handguns are potentially a very dangerous weapon in the hands of some people. Some of the tragic cases that we have had in the past could have been achieved, with regard to the mechanics, with that kind of a weapon. The government also intends to allow five shots in all centre-fire semi-automatic rifles and shotguns. As far as I know, there is not one province that has a sporting rifle or shotgun regulation that allows more than three. If you are caught out in the field with a magazine that will hold more than three shots, one in the chamber and two in the magazine, you have committed an offence and most of the time you are charged with carrying a weapon that is illegal for sporting purposes. I do not think that we need to have more than that. Again, it becomes a very dangerous type of firearm if it carries up to five shots which, as I said, is beyond what is allowed for sporting purposes in any event.

I said I would be brief. I think that the proposed limits on some of the types of weapons under the proposed regulations are beyond what anyone can claim is legitimate because the kinds of weapons that they are proposing to make legal are, in my opinion, very, very dangerous weapons and they should be restricted at least to the limit that the sporting authorities in the provinces allow.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

COMMITEE PROCEEDINGS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): In accordance with the rules, this is the time for me to proceed with my question on a breach of privilege. I want to make it clear that this is not a breach of personal privileges; it is the privileges of the Senate that concern me in this regard.

I think we have a serious problem in providing to the Senate the documents that it requires. We had an example earlier today, when I was speaking on Bill C-8. Because I had pushed to get the transcript, I was able to get the raw material, which other senators could have had, had they been particularly desirous of having it, but they would have had to ask for it. The printed material was not available.

This presents a problem for the Senate in dealing with its affairs. The transcript of the committee dealing with Bill C-8 is not the only one; there have been recurring instances of this problem in the last while.

Let me give you some examples. The Standing Committee on Agriculture and Forestry met on the 23rd of October to examine Bill C-23. The proceedings of that committee were not available in official printed form until November 19. The Standing Committee on National Finance met on October 24 and October 30 to examine the Main Estimates. Those proceedings were not available until November 19. The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications met on October 22 to examine Bill C-11. We actually gave third reading to that legislation on Tuesday of this week, November 19. Yet the printed record of that meeting did not arrive, in my office at least, until yesterday, November 20, a full month after the meeting was held. In the case of Bill C-8, to which I have referred, I believe the meeting was held on the 24th of October and we are still waiting for the report.

Those are some of the recent examples. I have to admit that this is not an absolutely new problem, but I think the problem right now has been aggravated. In fairness, the problem has been around for some time, because I have here a transcript of the Debates of the Senate of October 22, 1903. Mr. Young was speaking at that time and he said:

> There is another matter in connection with this to which I should like to call attention, and it is the fact that the official reports of our debates are somewhat behind in the issue of the days sittings. We are practically about a week behind in the printing of the reports.

So they were not as bad off in 1903 as we are now. We are running a month behind. He points out one other thing: He is referring to the debates in the other place, and he says:

> Older members may have a reasonable explanation, but if the debates are got out so promptly in one Chamber why is it they are not distributed more quickly here?

The question is a serious one. Senators cannot attend every committee. It is impossible. Yet senators are asked here in the Senate sometimes to voice an opinion, to vote on an issue where you have been unable to find out what was said in committee because you do not have the committee reports before you or the transcripts. I think it is an unreasonable way in which to proceed. Senators should have access to all the information when they are asked to vote on an issue.

I do not particularly like to use the other place as a source for our rules. I think we should have our own rules, but we should perhaps have a look at what they have done over there on this matter. I am referring now to House of Commons Debates, 1983 March 17. Mr. Lambert is speaking. He is objecting on a point of order with regard to a report dealing with Bill C-143.

> —I would ask whether it includes a transcript of all evidence taken by the Committee to date. There is no way that the House can accept a report which is deficient in the evidence that was taken. Otherwise the report is meaningless. Amendments in the House must be based upon evidence. Unless it is included in this package, it is out of order for the Vice-Chairman of the Committee to file that report.

Madam Speaker Sauvé responded and said that in her view there was no objection to receiving the report of a committee, but she concurred in the idea that the House should not proceed with action on the report of the committee until all the evidence was in. I think that that is what we have to be looking at here. I do not know what the problem is. I do not know if it is a staff problem, that we do not have enough people to do the work. I do not know if it is a mechanical problem in the printing. All I know is that there is a problem, and the Senate has to do something about it.

As I said earlier, the rules indicate that I should refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders but it seems to me—and perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government can advise me in this regard—that if it is a mechanical problem then we should refer it to the Internal Economy Committee and ask them to find out what the problem is and take whatever steps are required to correct it.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE REFERRED TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we may also want to ask the Rules Committee to establish a rule to the effect that we will not proceed with third reading on any bill unless we do, in fact, have the complete record of the committee proceedings on the matter. So, unless the Deputy Leader of the Government has another proposal, I would move:

> That the question of privilege which I have raised be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think the point is very well taken. Every senator, no matter how long he has been in this chamber, has suffered from the problems that have been so well expressed by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, whether it is a translation delay, a printing delay or human factors. This issue was discussed in the Internal Economy Committee meeting of no later than this morning. I certainly agree that Senator Molgat's representations should be addressed to that committee and given full airing.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I wish to second the motion of Senator Molgat, and as Senator Lynch-

Staunton just said, we discussed the matter this morning at the Internal Economy meeting, but the matter is far from settled. We agreed, as suggested by the Chair, to get back to this question at a subsequent meeting of the committee, and I hope this will happen fairly quickly, since there are a number of other important matters that require the immediate attention of the Internal Economy Committee.

I said we should get back to this as soon as possible, because it is one of the complaints we seem to be making quite regularly, on an annual and now even on a quarterly basis, especially regarding the quality of the translation of our documents.

This morning, when we were leaving the meeting, an official of the Department of the Secretary of State who had heard our comments told me it seemed the main problem was that the translation was now being done by freelance translators. These are translators from the private sector who work on contract. They are not in-house translators. These are not people who are familiar with the way the Senate operates, who are familiar with our rules, who understand the nuances of the terms we use here, and there are many more considerations of this kind. It is not a straightforward translation problem. The problem is that we are getting the service from the private sector, from people who don't know what we are talking about most of the time, and the result is that the translations seem to have no connection with the comments or speeches made on the floor, as Senator Lynch-Staunton pointed out.

I have raised this matter before from my seat here in the Senate, and I have done so several times in committee. Some of our colleagues who are now retired, and I am thinking of Senator Joseph Guay and Senator Jean Lemoyne, often complained bitterly about the poor quality of the translation.

It seems our comments are not being taken seriously. I would even say that these issues, which are raised not by our English-speaking colleagues but by those of us in this institution who speak French, are being blithely ignored. No one is doing anything about a situation that has been going on month after month and year after year. We are sick and tired of this attitude, and if that is what it takes, and I am not resorting to threats, but if it means we have to resort to methods that may not be very pleasant to get the attention of those in charge, so be it. I am just warning you. We are not indifferent, we do care, and we are sick and tired of being treated like this.

[English]

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few observations of my own in support of what I consider to be a very important matter that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has brought before this chamber. Clearly, the point was well made by Senator Molgat that if we are called upon to deal with a piece of legislation at third reading, and if we are not a member of the committee that studied that bill, it is impossible to know the rationale or, most importantly, the views of the witnesses, Canadians who have been called before the committee.

There is an old medieval dictum that says nihil est in intellectus quod non prius fuerat in sensu, which means nothing can be in the intellect which was first not in the senses. Therefore if we do not get to see or read the deliberations in committee, we can hardly give serious consideration and reflection to the matter. In principle alone, I am glad this matter has been raised.

I also wish to raise the issue of the National Finance Committee this morning. We found ourselves in the situation of not having simultaneous translation. The problem was indicated to be that the translators were serving another committee that went on longer than anticipated. We had witnesses. Either we dealt with them, or we dealt with them with the consent of senators present to speak in one of the official languages only.

I do not know what the management difficulties are, but this issue cannot be allowed to continue. Management issues no doubt have some budgetary considerations attached to them. I support the matter that has been raised.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I thank my colleagues very much for the support they have expressed for this motion. It is a nonpartisan question and relates simply to the proper functioning of the Senate.

I wish to point out that the Senate has not been sitting regularly, and the committees have only been meeting sporadically. It is strange that we should have this problem of getting material printed when there has not been much going on. This is an urgent matter that must be looked at and corrected for the good of the Senate and the proper functioning of our institution.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, could I ask a question to Senator Molgat? What you are asking for, is it the translation of the entire proceedings of the committees or just the report? Since reports give the substance of the debate, we should be glad to get those at least.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, what I want, is a copy of everything that was said in committee. We cannot attend all committee meetings, that is impossible. We hear witnesses, like Mr. Goldbloom who was before the Committee on Transport this morning. He put forward some very clear ideas concerning the issue of official languages, of how the official languages are related to a particular bill.

It is important for all senators to know exactly what Mr. Goldbloom had to say. If you did not attend that meeting, there is no way you can know what was said. To be able to make a final decision here, we need a complete report of the proceedings of committees. If that is not the case, senators cannot be kept informed. It is all very well to say the chairman of the committee will make a report, or a speech, but he cannot give us every detail of what was said. It is crucial to have a copy of the proceedings themselves of the committee, a copy of the minutes.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I sense that there is full agreement, so I will not rule on the point of privilege.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

TWENTY-FIRST CONFERENCE OF THE CARIBBEAN, THE AMERICAS AND THE ATLANTIC REGION IN PORT OF SPAIN, TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Heath Macquarrie rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 13, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-first Conference of the Caribbean, the Americas and the Atlantic Region of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association held at Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago, 12th to 18th May, 1991.

He said: Honourable senators, I am extremely interested in the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and even more so in the Commonwealth Caribbean, but one of my friends and colleagues is also interested in taking part in the debate on this Inquiry, and I would, therefore, ask to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE DETERMINATION—LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS—GOVERNMENT POLICY—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On Inquiry No. 8:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the apparent contradictions in the policy of the government wherein certain refugees enter Canada and receive landed immigrant status while others are denied the privilege.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I wish to receive unanimous consent to remove this Inquiry from the Order Paper. I have the answers and I do not think there is any need to pursue it further.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CANADIAN AID TO SOVIET UNION AND CURRENT CONSTITUENT REPUBLICS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H.A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, September 17, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to proposed Canadian aid to the Soviet Union and its current constituent Republics.

[Senator Molgat.]

He said: I suppose we could simply stand this Inquiry, but it requires more than that. There are two reasons why I wish to put this matter over for a detailed debate on another day. Firstly, Senator Baroutes wishes to be involved in this debate. He and I were the only senators in the delegation that went to the Soviet Union earlier this summer.

Secondly, there is so much happening with respect to working up an acceptable aid package to meet the needs of the Soviet people that perhaps it would be better to wait a day or two. For example, there is a meeting of the G-7 in Moscow today. Proposals have been made, but there is no official declaration that the G-7 has made a proposal to the republics that if they will accept the obligation of paying off the debt of $65 billion to $80 billion and putting up a substantial amount of gold—approximately 240 tonnes—that they would be offered a billion dollars in immediate additional credits and be allowed to forego interest payments on the $65 or $80 billion debt for 1992, which could be worth as much as $7 billion or $8 billion to the republics.

I hope that Canada will participate in making a very generous offer. It is not that I want to be generous necessarily to the republics of the Soviet Union, but I am convinced that Canadians are not only willing but anxious to provide consumer goods to the Soviet Union. For example, this country has wheat in abundance. Skim milk powder is desperately needed in the Soviet Union, as well as clothing. Again, we have these items in abundance.

There was a rumour this morning that the U.S. White House was about to offer the Soviet Union up to $1.3 billion in additional credit for emergency aid such as food and medical purchases. As well, additional credits may be made available by the European bank for reconstruction of countries in Eastern Europe.

• (1640)

Honourable senators, I do not want to take up more time today, while so many of the matters I have raised are in a state of flux. The meetings I have talked about are still going on today. The announcements as to what will come out of those meetings are not yet clear. It may be that the sum total is a respectably good package to deal with some 260 million to 280 million people who will face severe conditions this winter. The consequence of that action could be to maintain both economic and political stability in that part of the world.

If I may, honourable senators, I would like to leave the subject for today, and perhaps call this inquiry again next Tuesday when some of these matters may be cleared up somewhat.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY VETERANS HEALTH CARE REGULATIONS AND OTHER MATTERS

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the Veterans Health Care Regulations (SOR/90-594, August 28, 1990) and on all other matters concerning veterans affairs which may arise from time to time.

He said: Honourable senators, I apologize for not dealing with this motion sooner, but as everyone knows, it took quite some time for the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to be struck.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRISONERS OF WAR COMPENSATION—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS—REVIEW OF ACT—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On Motion No. 3:

That the Senate acknowledges the implied responsibility of the Government of Canada to compensate the Canadian Hong Kong prisoners of war for the suffering they endured in the Japanese prisoner of war camps; and prompts further action;

That the Government should consider the advisability of seizing the opportunity to provide benefits still denied to other prisoners of war, to which they should be entitled by right, by implementing the recommendations contained in the report of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, Its Almost Too Late, as a result of the evidence given by the following:

The National Prisoner of War (European Theatre) Association;

The Dieppe Prisoner of War Association;

The Merchant Navy P.O.W. Association; and

The Koncentration Lager Buchenwald Club.

The recommendations are as follows:

6. THAT the rates of compensation provided for under the Prisoners of War Compensation Act be reviewed with the objective of taking into account the severity of the prisoner of war regime forced on veterans by the award of additional compensation for each month deemed extremely severe, and that two additional categories be added at appropriate rates of compensation for those veterans who served 30 months or more as prisoners of war; and

7. THAT for the purposes of establishing entitlement to the Veterans Independence Program, receipt of prisoner-of-war compensation be treated as proof of undiagnosed medical disability.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that the Canadian War Amputees Association has been bringing the matter of the experience of Canadian prisoners of war in Hong Kong and has laid before the United Nations Subcommission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities, a subcommission of the United Nations Human Rights Commission, the fact that it would like the UN to look into the question of whether or not Canadian prisoners of war in Hong Kong were the victims of gross and consistent patterns of human rights violations.

I am wondering whether or not this is so. Does Senator Marshall have any indication as to the position of our mission at the United Nations concerning this matter? It seems to me that there is now a question under international human rights law that is making its way through the UN system.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am aware that the war amputees and, in particular, the Hong Kong Veterans Association under the leadership of Harold Atkinson, who is the president, and John Stroud, who is the president of one of its branches in Ontario, periodically bring pressure to bear on the matter and that it is being considered.

What prompted my motion was a visit I made to Hong Kong. A question on the subject was raised with the Prime Minister, who indicated that if there were any compensation granted to Canadians that it would be by the Canadian government.

It had to do also with this matter's relationship to the report "It's Almost Too Late" which deals with prisoner of war compensation. I have reiterated the recommendations of the report "It's Almost Too Late". I was hopeful that since our report was tabled last January, there would have been some response from governments at all levels.

I am not aware what negotiations are going on with the war amputees, the Hong Kong veterans or the Minister of Veterans Affairs, but I recognize, as Senator Kinsella said, that there is pressure being brought to bear on a periodic basis at the United Nations. I do not know if it has been resolved yet, but the pressure is being kept up.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

STRIKING OF CANADIAN VOLUNTEER KOREAN SERVICE MEDAL—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT TO ALLOW KOREAN VETERANS TO APPLY FOR WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCE—POINT OF ORDER—MOTION STANDS

On Motion No. 4:

That this Chamber commends the Government of Canada in fulfilling a commitment to the veterans of Canada through a petition signed by a majority of the members of the Senate and the House of Commons and further strengthened by the signature of the Prime Minister of Canada calling on the Government to recognize the sacrifices of the Canadian veterans who served in the Korean conflict by striking a Canadian Volunteer Korean Service Medal;

That this Chamber remind the Government of Canada that they have not as yet fulfilled another commitment made and signed by the Prime Minister of Canada on August 7, 1984, that assured that one of the priorities of the government would be to make Canadian veterans and/or their dependents living outside of Canada eligible to apply for War Veterans' Allowances if by reason of health, financial or other mitigating circumstances they are unable to return to Canada; and

That the government be asked to respond within thirty days.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a point of order on this motion. I would ask all senators to look at Motion No. 4. Compare the French and English texts and you will see a perfect example of the complaints that have been made regarding translations.

The English text states: "That this Chamber commends the Government of Canada . . ."

[Translation]

And the French text states: "Que le Sénat demande au gouvernement du Canada, . . ."

This does not make sense! In English, we praise the Government, and in French, we make a request to it. Come on!

Could we ask for a correction in the next edition of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate?

[English]

Senator Marshall: Could Senator Molgat explain a little further so that I may understand?

Senator Molgat: The English text "commends" the government for fulfilling a commitment. The motion in French "asks" the government to do something. The two simply do not match. They do not say the same thing at all.

I presume that you prepared the motion in English. The French text has to be completely re-worked.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: On that point of order, honourable senators, do we know which is the correct text, Senator Marshall? Is it as it is stated in English that this chamber "commends" the government; or did you mean "command"?

Senator Marshall: I am commending the government. However, I am also reminding it that there is another commitment that it did not make. It was a facetious way of getting to my question. Could we stand on this motion, please.

Motion stands.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO HEAR EVIDENCE AND TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

On Motion No. 6:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to hear evidence and to examine and report on negotiations for a North American free trade agreement among Canada, the United States and Mexico and any other related trade developments;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the services of professional and clerical staff as deemed advisable by the Committee;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the aforesaid subject before the Committee during the First and Second Sessions of the Thirty-fourth Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than December 17, 1992.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before proceeding with this motion, I must inform the Senate that the motion, as it appears on the Order Paper, is out of order because it contravenes paragraph 2:02 of the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operations of Senate Committees, which is printed as Appendix II of the Rules of the Senate. Paragraph 2:02 reads as follows:

A notice of motion to establish a special committee or to authorize a committee to conduct a special study shall not refer to special expenses but shall set a date by which the committee is to report to the Senate.

Accordingly, I must rule that the motion is out of order. However, I would suggest that, with leave of the Senate, we could proceed with the motion by deleting the second and third paragraphs thereof.

I must add that the mover of the motion agrees with that and I think the Deputy Leader of the Opposition also agrees.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Stewart spoke to me about this matter before he had to leave to go to committee, and he is more than agreeable to this suggestion. He would like to have the motion passed now without paragraphs 2 and 3, in order that the committee can proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Do I understand that Senator Molgat asked for leave? Knowing his feelings about that particular procedure, I would like him to note that to every rule there is an exception, and I am delighted that Senator Molgat found one.

Senator Molgat: I do not believe that I asked for leave. I believe it was Mr. Speaker who said it would have to be done with leave.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Even better, he is agreeing with the Speaker.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 26, 1991, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 26, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE GREY CUP

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE TORONTO ARGONAUTS ON WINNING THE CANADIAN PROFESSIONAL FOOTBALL CHAMPIONSHIP

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I wonder if a former Commissioner of the CFL—albeit for only 54 fun-filled days—is allowed to congratulate the CFL and the Toronto Argonauts on last Sunday's spectacular success for both the team and the league.

The CFL is decidedly alive and well. John MacKinnon, sport's columnist for the Citizen, is perfectly correct when he says, "Let's keep the "C" in the CFL."

What a remarkable demonstration of Canadian identity! The people of Winnipeg, in particular, deserve all the credit they are receiving.

The Toronto Argonauts, including owners Bruce McNall, Wayne Gretzky and John Candy, brought not only the league back to life, but football back to Toronto. Rocket Ismail really is a rocket. Matt Dunigan is one gutsy quarter-back.

It was a great day for the CFL, for Canada and for Toronto. Who knows, next year we may win the World Series.

I am sure all senators will want to salute the CFL, Canada and Toronto. If my vanity can be forgiven, 24 years ago I urged the CFL to abandon blackouts. Everyone knows what happened, and they can read more in my football fan's bill of rights, page 117, in that remarkable book The Rainmaker.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, as a confirmed westerner, I can only say, by way of a response, "Wait until next year!"

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

SHIPMENTS OF GRAIN THROUGH UNITED STATES PORTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, Canadians living on the west coast are disturbed and disappointed by the recent Canadian Wheat Board decision to export 55,000 tonnes of Canadian barley via Seattle, Washington.

Spokesmen for the B.C. Terminal Elevator Operators Association have predicted that the Seattle shipment will open the floodgates to more Canadians grain exports from United States ports. Our Vancouver Port Corporation has served notice it will take immediate action to stop further erosion of revenue and jobs.

Honourable senators, this is the first time in Canadian history that uncleaned grain is being shipped out for export. Yet, we in Canada have established an international reputation for high- quality, high-grade grain, only because our grain is cleaned to perfection. This gives us an edge in competing with grain-exporting countries like the United States, the European Economic Community, Australia and Argentina.

This recent action by the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian government to ship uncleaned Canadian grain, or for that matter cleaned Canadian grain, through U.S. ports threatens thousands of Canadian jobs, not only in the grain industry but also those included in railway transportation, the port of Vancouver, the port of Thunder Bay, and other areas involved in the handling and export of Canadian grain. Businessmen and shipowners involved in the grain-handling industry will lose business. Already, Canadian businessmen are suffering from the continuing recession. They need more opportunities to sustain and improve their economic circumstances, not to lose more.

This shipment of 55,000 tonnes of barley to the port of Seattle can very easily be handled through the port of Vancouver or through the port of Prince Rupert. Right now in the port of Vancouver, and I have checked this morning, we have 75,000 tonnes of excess capacity in two of the grain elevators in Vancouver alone. We can handle this 55,000 tonnes of barley faster and cheaper by at least $9 and $10 per tonne than can the United States. Shipping via west coast ports would save farmers money instead of losing money. It is ironical that a ship coming to Vancouver, Canada, to be inspected by Agriculture Canada has to proceed to Seattle to pick up Canadian barley. It is also ironical that the Canadian government grain inspectors are travelling down to Seattle, Washington, to inspect that shipment of grain.

Who will pay for this? It has to be the Canadian farmer. For some time there has been a shortage of hopper cars in the grain elevators in North Vancouver and in Vancouver, British Columbia. The afternoon shifts and the night shifts cannot utilize their work force for unloading hopper cars because 650 hopper cars are being used to ship this barley to the port of Seattle. Crews in these elevators, instead of unloading grain, are being utilized for clean-up, and therefore the grain companies are losing money.

Canadian grain farmers are told that it will be cheaper for them to ship Canadian grain through the United States ports. This is not true. They may benefit temporarily, but on a long-range basis of three or four years from now, the Canadian farmers will pay, and pay dearly, for this folly. Not only will the farmers suffer tremendously, the workers and the business people will also suffer along with them.

However, the biggest loser will be this country. Canada will suffer very badly as a whole. I urge the government to bring every force to bear to modify this addled and damaging decision to ship Canadian grain through U.S. ports.

AGRICULTURE

DELEGATION OF PRAIRIE FARMERS AND GRAIN PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable Senators, I wish to advise the Senate that a large number of farmers and grain producers from the three prairie provinces are in Ottawa today. They are here because the situation has become so desperate with respect to their financial condition that it became necessary for them to organize a contingent to come to Ottawa to meet with as many members of Parliament as possible, from both Houses, to bring this to their attention.

As a matter of fact, meetings have been taking place this morning and there will be more this afternoon, and I hope that as many members of this House who can find the time, or make the time, will meet with them and listen to what they have to say about the desperate financial situation that exists in the Prairies at the present time.

We are advised that the $800 million that the government has committed—that is providing they can find it without borrowing, and I understand that—was indeed provided in response to recommendations made to the government by the Third Line of Defence Committee from which the government had requested recommendations. Indeed, that financial commitment was made because of the shortfall in the 1990 crop, not the 1991 crop.

I find it difficult to understand why the government would put off responding until 1992 to the recommendations that they asked for. By that time, of course, it will be nearly two years after the results were known.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate has told us that payments that have already gone out under GRIP are only on the production or yield side, and certainly not on the price side of that equation. As yet, therefore, the payments out are very small in relation to the commitment that was made.

However, there will be a number of meetings this afternoon and again this evening. I want to draw this to the attention of the Senate and to urge senators to listen to the stories of privation and desperate financial situations that have caused these farmers to send a delegation to Ottawa.

NOTICE OF MEETING BETWEEN SENATORS AND FARM REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, my friend Senator Olson has just mentioned the large delegation of farmers and some politicians who have come to Ottawa. For those of us who will not have the opportunity to meet with them personally, but who wish to do so, tomorrow afternoon a delegation of representatives of these farmers will be meeting with senators in Room 356-S and all senators are invited to come and listen to their presentation and perhaps ask questions. If you have not received that notice, I bring it to your attention. The time that we have allocated for this meeting is not earlier than 4.30 p.m., or when the Senate rises. It is my fond hope that the Senate chamber will rise before 4.30 p.m. tomorrow evening so that we can make ourselves available and avail ourselves of the information that our friends from the agricultural industry are bringing to Ottawa.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Would you bring the minister of agriculture?

Senator Barootes: This is a meeting for senators.

LA FRANCOPHONIE

PARIS CONFERENCE—OMISSION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FROM PRESENTATION MAP OF CANADA

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to make a statement concerning the Francophone Conference in Paris and the participation of the Government of Canada at that conference. It is always nice to know that we, as a bilingual country, can go to Francophone conferences as well as to Commonwealth conferences, but it is very disappointing to a Prince Edward Islander to note that the Department of External Affairs and the Internal Trade Commission of Canada have put out a map from which Prince Edward Island has been omitted.

Hon. Senators: Shame, shame.

Senator Bonnell: All the other little islands of this world are mentioned—the Shetland Islands, the West Indies, the East Indies, Bali and Sable Island, but Prince Edward Island has disappeared.

I want to bring to the attention of the Government of Canada the fact that there is an island called Prince Edward Island. It is a province of this country. It has four MPs and four senators. Prince Edward Islanders would like to be known as such, and to participate in trade with all countries, whether they are Francophone or Commonwealth countries. When the Government of Canada spends money promoting Canada, we want it to be promoting Prince Edward Island as well.

I would ask the minister here in the Senate responsible for inter-provincial relations to make sure that this map put out by the Department of External Affairs and the Internal Trade Commission of Canada is revised so that Prince Edward Island is put back on the map.

Moreover, someone removed the English-speaking part of New Brunswick from that mat and added it to the United States, rather than admit that they were English-speaking. I am sure that the Anglophones of New Brunswick would want to be recognized as well as the Francophones.

As for the rest of Canada, even the small islands in the north that no one lives on are all recognized; while the great province of Prince Edward Island has been ignored by this government. Is it because we have four Liberal members of Parliament and one good Liberal senator?

Senator Perrault: Is Vancouver Island there?

Senator Bonnell: Vancouver Island is there. Cape Breton is not an island anymore. It is a peninsula. It is part of Nova Scotia.

THE HONOURABLE SIDNEY L. BUCKWOLD

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am glad to have this occasion to weigh in with some tributes to the Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, who turned 75 earlier this month and, therefore, pursuant to our Constitution, was required to retire. I wish to say something about Sid Buckwold as a public figure, and I wish to say something about him as a man.

The Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold was called to the Senate some 20 years ago on November 4th, 1971. He will carry on his contributions to Canadian life within the private sector, but he will be missed within this chamber, and he certainly left with all the appearances of being in the prime of his life.

Sid Buckwold's illustrious career spans both municipal and federal politics. His career in municipal politics began in 1953 when he became a councillor. He served as mayor of Saskatoon from 1958 to 1963 and from 1967 to 1971. He also served as President of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities from June 1960 to June 1961. During his municipal career, he was one of the best known municipal politicians in Canada. Anyone who attended the tributes given to him in Saskatoon will know how well known he was as a citizen of Saskatoon.

Former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau called Sid Buckwold to the Senate in 1971. He received nothing but praise and well-wishes on that occasion. The Saskatoon Star Phoenix on November 6th, 1971, said:

> It would be difficult to find in all Canada, let alone in Saskatchewan, a man who deserves to be called to the Senate more than does Senator Sidney L. Buckwold, mayor of Saskatoon for, lo, these many years.

A further quote:

> His common sense, his proven ability as a businessman, his concern with matters of state and society beyond the limits of civic government, and his happy skill in speech, will grace the Senate as much as they have contributed to the strength and reputation of Saskatoon.

The Regina Leader Post of the same day echoed that response with these words:

> Sid Buckwold (the popular mayor of Saskatoon, to use an old cliche) is a man of humour and enthusiasm and common sense who should be an asset to Canada, and to the West in particular, in his new role as a senator from Saskatchewan.

And how prophetic that turned out to be.

In his new position, Senator Buckwold maintained an active role in many issues. He held many chairman positions, including Chairman of the Canadian National Committee on Human Settlements (for the 1976 United Nations Habitat Conference and Exposition on Human Settlements), Chairman of the Committee on International Hockey, and Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Buckwold consistently fought for and supported the causes he believed in. He pursued the issue of national pride in the 1970s, citing Canada's richness in natural resources, water power and abundant food supplies.

As a Western Canadian, Senator Buckwold consistently fought for better treatment for Canadian farmers. He certainly would have been in the thick of the representations that are being made on Parliament Hill today. Topics taken at issue were the preservation of agricultural lands and recognition of the importance of agriculture to the Canadian economy. In his position as Chair for the Habitat Conference, the senator sought for ways to improve the international human settlement situation.

• (1420)

In a Globe and Mail article on October 29, 1975 Senator Buckwold discussed the population problems faced by Canada, and he was quoted in that article as follows:

> "Somewhere along the line we will have to curb the growth of our larger cities," he said. "If current trends are allowed to go unchecked, 50 per cent of Canada's population will live in three cities—Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver—within 25 years. Furthermore, 75 per cent of the population will be congregated in 12 cities within the same period.

So we will have to change our national growth policies or almost all Canadians will be inhabitants of the concrete jungle."

In 1990, Senator Buckwold attended the Global Forum of Spiritual and Parliamentary Leaders on Human Survival dealing with environmental issues in Moscow. At this conference he was quoted as saying:

"The greatest problem facing the world in the next decade is the environment and controlling the population growth.

Again, that illustrates his ability to clearly analyse the essence of Canada and the world's political problems.

Sidney Buckwold received many honours. In 1969 he was voted Salesman of the Year for obtaining the Canada Winter Games for the city of Saskatoon. He was also voted Saskatoon Citizen of the Year in 1971. He has at all times fulfilled his civic duty with flair and finesse. The following story written by Art Robinson in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix on February 5, 1986 aptly illustrates the point:

The young woman was one of many who got stuck in last week's snow-in.

She was trying to get out of the parking lot access on Spadina Crescent across from the Bessborough Hotel when the wheels on her vehicle started to spin.

Most citizens and most senators who have been ever been in Saskatoon will have in their minds the scene opposite the Bessborough Hotel.

A few people walked by without paying too much attention.

Then one well-dressed gentleman who was downtown on business came over to offer a hand—or at least a rump.

He sat on the back of the car to provide a little traction.

It wasn't until the car was moving that the woman recognized the good Samaritan.

It was none other than 70-year-old Senator (and former Saskatoon Mayor) Sid Buckwold.

Senator Buckwold has always taken up issues he believed in with the greatest of intensity. He has done this in this house and he has done this house and the country a great service. We are sad to see him go, but we know that no matter what he is doing, Sid Buckwold will continue to be a great Canadian.

I want to finish by saying something about Sid Buckwold as a man. The one word that best describes him is a Yiddish word. I will tell you the definition of that word and you will see how it applies to him. I will quote from a book by Leo Rosten entitled Hooray for Yiddish and also from a book given to me by my good friend Senator Nurgitz, who was one of my mentors in Yiddish. Although he does me the honour of saying I speak it almost as well as he does, I am not sure that is saying very much. This book is entitled Every Goy's Guide to Common Jewish Expressions. For those who do not know any Yiddish, I am a Goy, Nurgitz is not.

I was once paid the great compliment by the father of a Jewish friend of mine of being described as a Goy with a Yiddish kup. Senator Nurgitz will translate that. It is a gentile with a Jewish head or mind.

The first quote is from the book given to me by Senator Nurgitz. The word is "mensch" and the definition states:

"This isn't going to be easy."

I am reading this in connection with Senator Buckwold.

Literally, mensch means a person, a human being. But it means much more than that.

To call someone a mensch is, in a certain way, the highest compliment you can pay them. It means they're mature, compassionate, decent, loving — everything a human being should be. Menschlichkeit means true humanity, real human dignity.

When mensch is used as the last word in a sentence, as it often is, it's always emphasized—"now this is a mensch!"—because there's little you can say beyond that.

Oriana Fallaci wrote a book called A Man. The feeling she wants to convey about this Greek patriot comes across even better in the Yiddish title A Mensch.

You don't have to be well known, or even exceptional (except in your menschlichkeit), to be a mensch, but the examples I'll give of mensches will be famous people, because otherwise you won't know who I'm talking about. Martin Luther King was a mensch. Albert Einstein was a mensch. Emma Goldman was a mensch. Salvador Allende was a mensch. Malcolm X was a mensch. Joan Baez is a mensch. Robert Redford is a mensch. And, if you ask me, Abbie Hoffman is a mensch.

Then from Leo Rosten's book, a little shorter.

mentsh

Rhymes with "bench." German: Mensch: person.

1. An upright, honourable, decent person. ("Come on, act like a mentsh!")

2. Someone of consequence; someone to emulate; of noble character. ("Now, there is a mentsh!")

3. A personification of worth and dignity, requiring the highest respect and approbation; totally trustworthy.

Mentsh is being used more and more in English. An extremity of scorn or contempt is contained in the simple declaration: "He did not act like a mentsh."

Neither wealth nor status nor success nor fame nor popularity qualify one to be called a mentsh. A king may be a paskudnyak; a doctor can be a bulvon, a scholar a klutz. The key to mentshlichkayt is character: rectitude, responsibility, decorum, generosity of spirit. Abraham Lincoln, say Jews, was the model-ideal of a mentsh.

Sid Buckwold, I say, was another model of a mentsh.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words about my friend Sid Buckwold. I do so because the Buckwold and the Barootes clans grew up together in Saskatoon going back to our school days.

Sid was a classmate of my eldest sister. The late Dr. Alvin Buckwold was a contemporary of mine through school, through college and in the practice of medicine, a very fine paediatrician. The youngest brother of the family, Seymore, was a classmate of my late brother. Both of them have now passed away. Sid is the surviving son of the Buckwold family.

There is no doubt in my mind that Sid Buckwold gave great leadership to the city of Saskatoon. I went so far as to say that he was the best mayor that Saskatoon ever had. I might even go so far as to say he was probably one of the outstanding mayors in this country in his time. He managed, during strong Liberal administrations in Ottawa and in Saskatchewan, to snatch away from Regina a fairly substantial sum of money which was available to us in the Jubilee Year to build a substantial building to the honour of Canada's one-hundredth birthday. Wouldn't you know it, Sid had the power and the pursuasion to get about half of that money. Not only that, when we were sitting in that edifice at the dinner in his honour, I made the suggestion that, in view of the fact that it was through his efforts that this magnificent building had been built in Saskatoon—where it did not deserve to be, I might add—they might think to rename the Centennial Auditorium in his honour. Darned if at the end of that dinner the chairman of that committee did not get up and say to us that their board had decided to name the hall in which we were sitting the Senator Sidney L. Buckwold Auditorium.

• (1430)

Senator Frith: You don't know your own strength.

Senator Barootes: That pleased me very much, to be prophetic, as I often feel I am and which very few of you here recognize.

The other thing Sidney Buckwold did as a civic leader which might interest you is that he obtained the first winter games. Saskatoon is as flat as beer in a platter, as you all know. They had to have a place to do their downhill skiing. So Sid had them build a mountain. Now listen; Moses came down from a mountain, but Sid built the mountain to climb for Saskatoon. It is called Blackstrap Mountain. A few people in the athletic field, particularly Jim Coleman, a friend of mine, named it "Jock-strap Mountain". However, the name "Blackstrap" still sticks and it has become a fairly grand resort in that flat prairie area.

Sid Buckwold went further than that. He was a distinguished scholar, a very successful businessman, as we all know, both in local, provincial, and national affairs, sitting on several boards of major institutions of a financial nature. He was also very involved in voluntarism; civic, provincial, national, and international. I will not recite his entire career because my friend the Leader of the Loyal Opposition has outlined it so beautifully.

However, I will say this: Sid was unsuccessful in two federal election in Saskatchewan. Those were difficult years for any Liberal to even think of running in Saskatchewan. Those were the Diefenbaker years. It was only with the blessing of the great John Diefenbaker in those days that anyone could be elected in Saskatchewan. However, the Prime Minister did see fit, in 1971, to bring this fine gentleman here to Ottawa and make him a senator where he could prove his legislative abilities, prove his mettle as we say. Indeed, he did participate, as you know, most wholesomely in the activities of this chamber.

I have touched on some of the things that Sid Buckwold has done. There are many more that can be cited. He served in the military. It is a source of pride to him to be able to say that he was the honourary colonel of the North Saskatchewan Regiment. This is quite a career—child prodigy, highly successful businessman , politician, soldier and a volunteer all in one lifetime. His contribution to Canada, as Senator Frith has said, has not ceased. I am sure it will continue. He was a great advocate for our province and a great and successful advocate for his city.

Yet, what has been left out is that which endeared Sid most to the Senate. I think we all agree that that is his great sense of humour, his fabled wit, his ability to carry an audience, whether as a master of ceremonies or as an after-dinner speaker. As for that quick wit and those dreadful one-liners that he used to come out with, I can say I have several of the scars to show for it.

He has been a loving husband, a great father, a great grandfather. He is now, I think without a doubt, the patriarch of the Buckwold Meshpuka in this country. Along with my colleagues on this side, and I hope on the other side, I take this opportunity to say that we wish Sid, Clarice and their family a long, healthy and busy future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I add a short addendum about Sid? I noted a couple of stories about his sense of humour that I had meant to finish with, but I got carried away by associating him with Abe Lincoln.

I would like to relate two classic Sid Buckwold stories. Sid was a very well-known businessman. This story is about Sid seeing a friend on the street and asking, "How's business?" The friend replied, "Terrible, it's never been so bad. I never open the store a single day but I don't lose money." Sid said to him, "So how do you make a living?" The friend said, "We close weekends."

The other story so well illustrates his humility, not Uriah Heep-like humility, but genuine humility. He told us that he felt privileged to be in Ottawa with such fine people, such distinguished colleagues and persons of such good character. Honourable senators may remember that he told a story about seeing a friend on the street. The friend had with him a mongrel dog, and Sid said to him, "Where are you going with the dog?" His friend replied, "I'm taking him to a dog show," to which Sid said, "That mutt, he couldn't win anything," to which his friend replied, "That's true, but it does introduce him to a better class of dogs."

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, most Canadian observers in the media are preoccupied–indeed, obsessed— by big cities. Yet the roots of Canada's civic values most often are planted the deepest and flourish the strongest in the smaller cities and towns across the land. From these towns and small cities spring Canada's greatest natural personalities.

Surely, Sid Buckwold is such an uncommon offspring of small-town Canada: Unfailingly courteous, always civil, perpetually in good humour, never, ever refusing to do a good deed for a friend or a cause in need. Whether as a businessman, politician or humanitarian, Sid has always led by progressive example. Sid Buckwold personifies for me the greatest civic virtues that have made Canada and Canadians envied around the world.

The Bible reminds us that Moses, the greatest of the prophets, lived until 120 years, and the force was still with him. Since that time, the greatest salutation we can bestow upon a living friend is that he should live to 120 years, and that the force should continue to be with him. So be it with our friend Sid Buckwold. He will be missed but never forgotten.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

CANADA-JAPAN INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TABLING OF REPORT OF SECOND ANNUAL MEETING

Hon. H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table in both official languages the report of the second annual meeting of the Canada-Japan Inter-Parliamentary Group, which was held in Tokyo, Japan, from June 22 to July 2, 1991.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES, AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I wish to give notice, pursuant to rules 57(1) and 59(1)(a), that, within a day of sitting of the Senate, I shall move the temporary suspension of a requisite two-thirds majority vote in correcting an anomaly or suspension of rules in consideration of the fact that the former rules were dropped on June 18, 1991, without the requisite two-thirds majority specified in former rule 47(2).

Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator Thériault:

> That, pursuant to rule 3 which supports practice, and based on rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, as it is a matter of universal privilege, and of profound constitutional significance, therefore the Senate's vote upon Order No. 2 under Other Business, being a resolution to rescind the adoption of the present rules as resolved on June 18, 1991, with less than two-thirds majority at that time, in contravention of then-rule 47(2), will be resolved in the affirmative, though without thereby setting a precedent of general practice, if a simple majority of voting senators assent.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you giving notice for tomorrow, Senator Haidasz?

Senator Haidasz: Yes, sir.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and not withstanding rule 59(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have leave to meet at four o'clock tomorrow afternoon, November 27, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

May I give a brief explanation?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Before Senator MacDonald provides his explanation, perhaps I could ask him to include in it his assurances, as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, that before the committee meets tomorrow at four o'clock, as he is proposing, that all honourable senators who are members of the committee at the very least will have a full translation, in both English and French, of the unrevised evidence of the committee hearing of November 21; and I want to emphasize that we would need that in ample time to make a proper examination of that evidence prior to the meeting.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Graham, if you do not have the information you require in both languages, there will not be a meeting tomorrow.

By way of a brief explanation, there is a great deal of committee activity tomorrow, both tomorrow afternoon after the Senate rises and tomorrow evening, and into the night. Banking, Trade and Commerce, National Finance, Internal Economy, and Transport are meeting when the Senate rises and will be sitting into the evening. When a committee chairperson arranges for witnesses at a time after the Senate rises and then another committee moves in and the chairman is told that the committee cannot meet because there are not enough rooms, that is very disruptive. What I am asking for today is a predictable hour's head start so that our committee may finish its work in three and a quarter hours before we are asked to move to another room. I give assurances to the two deputy leaders that I will not be in the habit of asking for this as a regular matter of business; however, I do wish that there could be better coordination involving committees and committee meeting rooms.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator MacDonald spoke to me about this matter yesterday; in fact, we have had two or three conversations about it. I know he was reluctant to ask me because he knows that the position we have always taken on both sides of the House is that we do not like to do that.

However, there is a special circumstance in this case. I was at the committee meeting last week when the committee had to stop because someone else needed to use the room. It does present a real problem for the Senate in scheduling committee meetings. I would appeal to the government leadership to see what can be done to arrange for more space. It is not reasonable to have committees meeting at the same time as the Senate. That is a generally accepted principle. Yet committees have to meet. Somehow or other we have to find more space.

On this particular occasion, and particularly with the guarantee that Senator MacDonald gave to Senator Graham regarding having the transcript available in both languages before the meeting, we agree to give leave on this one occasion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

FARM LOANS—EFFECT OF DEBT SERVICE CHARGES

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to be brief. There will be a number of meetings this afternoon and this evening with the people from the farm communities of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba about some of their financial problems. In the meetings that we had this morning it came through very clearly that the major single item of expense that has caused a lot of these problems is the debt service charges.

They told us that about 65 per cent of the long-term debt that farmers owe in those three provinces is now owed to one or other of the federal or provincial agencies, such as the federal Farm Credit Corporation and several provincial organizations that have been extending credit.

Are the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the cabinet giving serious consideration to extending relief from the accumulation of these debt service charges due to the very low prices for grain and the very high interest charges that were paid some time ago? I realize they have come down substantially in the last six months or so, but prior to that there were many months when they were paying 50 to 60 per cent more than they agreed to when these loans were made.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe my colleagues, Mr. Mazankowski and Mr. Mayer, have been meeting within the past couple of hours with the farmers' delegation from western Canada. I would have to get a further report from those ministers as to what transpired before answering the honourable senator's question with any precision.

However, I can say in a general way that the special program of $800 million announced a couple of months ago, in addition to the arrangements that have been made under the two new safety net programs, GRIP and NISA, represent about the limit of the federal government's capacity for further financial assistance at this time.

Senator Olson: I realize that the matter of dealing with the terms and conditions of foreclosures, particularly involving homes of farmers and so on, is within the provincial jurisdiction. I understand that there is some action being taken by some of those provinces to deal with the significantly greater number of foreclosures that are taking place. But the federal government also has a very large stake. In fact, I think something like $3.5 billion in loans are owed to the Farm Credit Corporation.

Relief in that matter, whether it comes in announcements in the meetings being held with the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance today, is one thing. Has the government given some serious consideration to that particular problem prior to today?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I have indicated, the steps that we have taken within the past few months to bring assistance to the farm sector represent the limit of our financial ability at the present time.

SUSPENSION OF REPAYMENT OF FARM LOANS—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask a supplementary question on that matter. The government is saying that it has a problem getting enough cash to give the farmers. If it were simply to say at this point that it will suspend repayment to the Farm Credit Corporation of both interest and capital until, let us say, next fall, this would not result in any cash requirement on the part of the government. Admittedly, in the long run it would mean the government would receive less money but it would mean no cash outflow at all. The government could simply make that decision and give that amount of support.

I understand that about 71 per cent of the debt presently owed by farmers is owed by one-third of the farmers. So there is a very special area there consisting mainly of young farmers. This could be immediate relief without any cash outflow.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the distinction that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition is trying to draw here, and I accept it as a representation which I will convey to my colleagues.

Senator Molgat: It was really a question as to whether the government would consider that.

Senator Murray: If that is a question then I will convey that question-cum-representation to my colleagues.

FORESTRY

EXCLUSION OF CANADIAN LUMBER FROM EEC

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators are aware of the fact that the forest products industry in Canada is going through very difficult times. Of course all of us were dismayed by the arbitrary, unilateral action taken by the European Economic Community a few days ago declaring that certain classifications of Canadian lumber would be excluded from the EEC.

If the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not have the information at this time, that will be understood by all of us, but will he at some point in time, hopefully sooner rather than later, advise us of what the Canadian reaction to this arbitrary European action will be? Are we going to accept this decision by the Europeans or will we make some counter-proposals to save our industry an enormous loss of money?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall ask my colleague Mr. Wilson for a report on that matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VENUE FOR MIDDLE EAST TALKS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government tell us whether the Government of Canada has taken any view with respect to the venue of the Middle East talks proposed tentatively to be held in Washington? If so, has it encouraged the venue of Washington or has it supported Israel in seeking a different venue?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have not taken any position with regard to the venue of the conference.

YUGOSLAVIA

CANADIAN INITIATIVES TO PROMOTE PEACE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, if not today, then at the next sitting, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us all the steps that the federal government has taken to try to stop the fighting between Croatia and Serbia in this present civil war in Yugoslavia?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I can tell the honourable senator that we have been very active in the United Nations on this matter. Unfortunately, I am not in a position to report much success with regard to our efforts to persuade the parties to end the conflict.

Many weeks ago, Prime Minister Mulroney was urging United Nations action, if necessary, to send peacekeeping troops to that country. We are participating in the cease-fire monitoring mission mandated by the Conference of Security and Cooperation in Europe. We have also supported the call for a UN oil embargo and, as I said, the deployment of UN peacekeepers.

[Senator Murray.]

The honourable senator also knows that at the economic level we suspended all trade support for Yugoslavia, required permits for exports to that country and raised import tariffs. We are also cooperating with the UN embargo on shipments of weapons and military equipment.

At the last meeting of NATO heads of government the Prime Minister, on Canada's behalf, supported a statement calling for all existing internal and external borders to be respected, and we have made it clear that we will not recognize any unilateral change of borders brought about by force.

To that I can only add that my colleague Mr. Masse, the Minister of National Defence, is sending two Canadian Forces Boeing 707s to Yugoslavia with emergency relief supplies. The first of those 707s left yesterday, and the second will leave tomorrow.

• (1510)

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question: Can the Leader of the Government inform this House whether anyone in the Canadian delegation at the General Assembly meeting of the United Nations in New York has offered, or promised to offer, manpower to any United Nations' force that might be approved to keep the peace between the Croatians and Serbians?

Senator Murray: The answer to that is an emphatic yes. We have stated our willingness to contribute personnel to such a peacekeeping mission.

CANADIAN UNITY

STATEMENT BY THE HONOURABLE BENOÎT BOUCHARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, following questions I asked him last week, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I wish to say, honourable senators, that I am very happy that Benoît Bouchard has finally made up his mind to speak on behalf of Canada.

Senator Murray: No, you finally noticed. That is the difference.

Senator Thériault: I wish to quote from the famous Globe and Mail that my friends on the other side of the chamber are often happy to quote. The quote reads as follows:

> Benoît Bouchard, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's Quebec lieutenant, yesterday attacked the idea of Quebec sovereignty as "an absurdity" and defended the concept of a federal referendum.

I say "Aye, aye".

The question I have is that I hope the Leader of the Government in the Senate will encourage the other ministers from Quebec—

Senator Simard: What is your question? Follow the precedents. Follow the rules.

Senator Frith: The pot just interrupted the kettle.

Senator Thériault: Coming from Senator Simard, that makes me nervous.

My question, Senator Simard, is this. The quote goes on in the Globe and Mail article. I quote Minister Bouchard.

> I will do everything, everything in my power and more than I wanted to, to prevent this country from coming apart.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government will seek an explanation of what was meant when Mr. Bouchard said "more than I wanted to"? As I read it, it means more than he wanted to do. Would you please inquire and see where Mr. Bouchard stands on the matter?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it is clear where Mr. Bouchard and all of my colleagues stand on the issue. We are dedicated to the preservation of a strong and united Canada.

Senator Frith: It may be clear to you.

Senator Thériault: We are waiting to hear the others.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

DELAY IN RESPONSES TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am asking about the delay in responses to questions that I have had on the Order Paper, specifically questions 38 through 47, relating to the Special Senate Committee on Terrorism. These questions were first placed on the Order Paper over 14 months ago, and then they were replaced on the Order Paper this September. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us as to why it is taking so long to answer these questions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): There are quite a few of them, honourable senators. I shall attempt to track down a reply to the question my friend asks today and report back to him in a day or two.

Senator Kenny: By way of supplementary, I was approached by an official in the Solicitor General's department over a month ago asking me how did I like the replies to the questions I had asked. The official told me that they had been forwarded to the Leader of the Government in the Senate's Office some time ago.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Murray: That information is almost certainly incorrect. I read my mail every day.

Senator Perrault: How much do you throw away?

Senator Murray: I attempt to table replies to honourable senators' questions as soon as they arrive and I have read them and approved them. The official in question is surely not well informed. No replies to my friend's questions have arrived in my office.

CHINA-CANADA RELATIONS

STATUS OF TIBET—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government.

At the weekend, I was dealing on Sunday with an accumulation of correspondence. I will have to explain this, because I do not have the piece of paper I want, and I will not be here tomorrow. My question deals with Tibet. Amongst the material was a statement that the United States' State Department has declared that the United States of America considers Tibet an occupied territory. I thought this to be rather significant.

Considering that the present government feels that this is a brittle question, illustrated by the reception that the Dalai Lama received when he was here, I ask the leader if he would consult with his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as to whether I am correct. Secondly, is Canada's position similar to that of the United States? Thirdly, if our position has not been a similar position up until now, does the position taken by the United States change our position, or is it in the course of influencing our position?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall make all those inquiries of Mrs. McDougall.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Olson on October 22 regarding federal support for the grains sector.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR GRAINS SECTOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. H.A. Olson on October 22, 1991)

> The $800 million, ($700 million for the grains and oilseeds sector) announced October 10, 1991 represents new funds in addition to that to be provided under the terms and conditions of GRIP and NISA.
> The payments from the $700 million will be made in two instalments. Most farmers will receive the first instalment beginning in late December and January and the final instalment in April.
> Delivery mechanisms for grains and oilseeds crops will vary from region to region. These different systems take into account unique circumstances in various regions across the country.
> For prairie provinces, a first instalment of $5 per seeded acre will be made beginning in December 1991, with the final instalment payment expected before spring seeding.

The final instalment will also include a payment on eligible forage and summerfallow at a rate of 25 per cent of the payment on seeded acres.

The various delivery options were developed by the Grains and Oilseeds Third Line of Defence Committee, which is comprised of representatives of industry, the financial and academic communities and federal and provincial governments.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE SUSPENDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Berntson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forrestall, for the second reading of Bill C-17, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Berntson for his clear and comprehensive description of Bill C-17 of last Thursday. I am sorry I was not in the chamber at that time, Senator Berntson, but I read your remarks carefully in Debates of the Senate, and I appreciated them. I know that Senator Berntson's strong case for the passage of the bill, the government's most recent attempt at gun control legislation, has found many supporters among us here in this chamber.

I too wish to offer my support for the principle of this important bill. Although Bill C-17 is not the ideal to which I subscribe, I recognize and commend the improvements over the current law that have been included in this bill, and I am prepared to accept this as a compromise and a necessary step forward.

● (1520)

The Senate has been waiting for gun control legislation for almost two years and, during that time, the country has been anxious for a new firearms law. Today we have a good start—even a milestone of sorts. I congratulate the Minister of Justice for her continued efforts, even when faced with opposition from within her own caucus. She has built a compromise. I would hope that this compromise, like many other Canadian compromises over the years, will form a workable foundation for future improvements.

The need for stronger gun control in this country is real. Implementation of these controls is vital to retarding the proliferation of deadly weapons and, most important, the controls are needed to help in the fight against violent crime.

On December 6, 1989, that need was drastically and viciously illustrated at l'école Polytechnique in Montreal. The horror of the events of that day have ignited a grassroots campaign to control the proliferation of firearms in Canada. Throughout that campaign, the name of the perpetrator has been used too often and the names of the ladies who were victims have been spoken far too seldom. Therefore, I would like to repeat their names now as a form of remembrance: Geneviève Bergeron, Hélène Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne-Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Maria Klueznick, Maryse Laganiere, Maryse Leclair, Anne-Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michele Richard, Annie St.Arneault, Annie Turcotte.

I recognize that this bill, and even gun control in general, is not a panacea or a cure-all for violent crime. Violent crime and in particular, violent crime against women must be addressed through a series of measures. This bill has little effect on violence. However, it can have a great deal of impact on the manifestations of that violence. For instance, this bill cannot stop an abusive husband from lashing out at his wife. What this bill can do is help make it difficult for that husband to lash out with a gun. We all know that guns are a particularly efficient way of killing. One-third of victims shot with guns will die. Guns can be used at a distance, they can be used without too much planning, and they can turn an accident into a fatality. They make killing particularly easy and they, more often than not, make an attempt on a life a murder. We need to take away the ability of violent people to commit crime with a gun and reduce the risk of a gun being an element in a serious accident.

The limitation on access is a central theme in the legislation. The bill creates an environment where the opportunity for criminals and potential criminals to gain access to guns is greatly reduced. At the same time, though, the inconvenience and encroachment on the privileges of legitimate gun owners is relatively slight. For instance, the Firearm Acquisition Certificate—or FAC as it is called—process installed in this bill is aimed at ensuring that criminals will not be able to legally buy firearms, while legitimate users will not encounter any real impediments. Similarly, other provisions make it much more difficult for potential offenders to steal guns from legitimate gun owners; and still other conditions of the bill restrict the type of firearms which can be sold.

I would like to address more closely these facets of the legislation. First of all, with the FAC, Bill C-17 offers documentation, administration and supervision for the process of purchasing firearms. A comprehensive yet fair screening process will be employed. Specifically, the bill includes the following. The tightening of the screening procedure of gun applicants for FACs; the raising of the minimum age for receiving a Firearms Acquisition Certificate to 18 years from 16; the introduction of a mandatory 28 day waiting period for FAC; the requirement for each FAC applicant to be guaranteed by two referees; the allowance for a fee to be charged to FAC applicants to maintain a system of self-financing; and the provision for photographs on the FAC.

As I mentioned, beyond the provisions that will make it difficult for criminals and potential criminals to gain access to firearms through lawful means, Bill C-17 will also make it more difficult for guns to be stolen from lawful gun owners for the purposes of crime, or for selling on the black market.

Under current law, no specific safe storage requirements exist: Under Bill C-17, there are provisions that would require all firearms owners to meet regulations outlining secure storage; ultimately, to take seriously the extraordinary responsibility that goes along with the ownership and use of weapons. Those who do legitimately own and use guns will be required to keep their weapons under secured condition or be subject to charges under the Criminal Code.

Perhaps of greatest interest to the victims of gun-related violence and their families are the provisions for limits on the extent of allowable firepower that a gun can produce. Bans or restrictions on certain firearms and stipulations on the size of cartridge magazines is a central tenet of this bill and begins to address the catastrophe that these dangerous weapons can cause when placed in the wrong hands. A general tightening up of rules affecting lawful firearms was needed and has been addressed through the bill and its proposed regulations. Still, I hope that further movement will be made by the Government's Advisory Council on Firearms, and by the cabinet in the coming months in their consideration of which guns require restricted status.

Of course, there are still other legislative avenues that should be taken to control the criminal use and proliferation of firearms. This particular legislation would best be considered as a healthy foundation for a future round of improvements. For instance, I would like to see Parliament consider some fresh ideas for control, including a national registry and licensing system, the control of ammunition, and a requirement for the mandatory reporting of lost or stolen weapons by their owners.

I expect that there will be some discussion in committee and in the chamber about various ills honourable senators perceive in this bill. I expect that some of the ideas I just listed will be mentioned in the committee. I know for sure that there will be serious discussion regarding the very legitimate concern that Senator Marshall outlined in the chamber last Thursday. I must confess that earlier I, myself, felt that we should press for some strengthening amendments.

However, in contemplating possible changes to this bill, I would suggest that the reality of the situation at hand requires our consideration and attention. There was an effective compromise in the other place when this bill was debated there. Whether that compromise will withstand another round of debate in that place is a question that has not been answered, and I am not at all sure that I want to subject an acceptable bill to the risk of defeat and the breakdown of compromise.

I do not want to preclude debate in any way. In fact, I would like to see a full consideration of ideas so that when the government makes an attempt to introduce further gun control legislation in future years, it will have a road map from the Senate for its changes. In fact, if the concerns that Senator Marshall has expressed are not satisfied in the terms of the bill in its exception for the military, then I would think that it would be a perfect opportunity to draft a Senate bill, a bill in this case that would ensure special provisions for the cadet program.

Nevertheless, I think that the utility of passing this bill now to get some guns off the street, others out of the hands of criminals, and still others safely stored, is paramount. The sooner this legislation becomes law, the better for those who are potential victims of violence and the better for our society as a whole.

Finally, honourable senators, I would like to reaffirm my support for the principle of the bill. Primarily, we should remember that this is a public safety bill. Consequently, where we can reasonably make the appropriate allowances for safe, responsible and lawful gun owners, we should do so. However, when we measure the rights of the community at large against the privileges of gun users, the privileges are outweighed by the rights. I congratulate the Minister of Justice on her ability to formulate a workable compromise between the rights and the privileges.

Honourable senators, we have been given an opportunity to make a law that will have a positive impact on a very large portion of the Canadian population. We have an opportunity, given the proximity of the December 6 anniversary and remembrance date of the Montreal tragedy, to offer both a symbol as well as a tangible and indispensable set of new laws and regulations to the people who have invested so much of themselves in this legislation. I would hope that we will take full advantage of this unique and important opportunity.

Honourable senators, I would like to support Senator Berntson's motion that Bill C-17, to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff, should now receive second reading, and further, that this bill be referred in a timely fashion to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for closer consideration and discussion.

Hon Jack Marshall: Before you decide on moving second reading, I have a comment on one segment of the bill. Before I do so, I would like to congratulate Senator Stanbury on taking up the cause which I am about to speak on, and also my compliments to Senator Berntson for his answers the other day on the questions I put to him.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Marshall, pursuant to rule 136(8), I must interrupt you and suspend the debate. You will be recognized when the sitting is resumed following the Royal Assent ceremony. The Senate will now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Berntson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forrestall, for the second reading of Bill C-17, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, as I was saying before I was interrupted by such a high office, I rise to address one segment of Bill C-17 which was either overlooked by those responsible for drafting the legislation, or which was not given serious thought. It is certainly not as clear as it should be.

While I have had more than a few representations on what were considered inequities in the bill, my own priority interest in raising an important oversight in the bill has to do with the negative effect it will have on some 50,000 to 60,000 of our youth who serve in the Cadet League of Canada's Army, Navy and Air Force.

I am well aware of the terrible effects that firearms have on human beings, and there are countless stories which emphasize the events that have taken the lives of innocent citizens unnecessarily. Like all members of this chamber, I have no desire to see guns spread uncontrollably among the population of our country. I feel that Bill C-17 is an adequate step in limiting general access to dangerous weaponry.

However, I feel just as strong that this piece of legislation carries with it an effect that is extremely negative upon the 60,000 young men and women who compose the Cadet League of Canada, as well as the 6,000 who serve on the Cadet Instructor List.

Honourable senators, I have had a long association with the cadets and have served side by side with Senator Molgat, who is a distinguished past President of the Army Cadet League of Canada, as well as a respected and renowned member of the executive of the Army Cadet League at present. It is without doubt the most popular and beneficial program ever designed for our youth, and is a credit not only to the Department of National Defence, which oversees it, but to all governments of Canada which have supported the movement over the years. I believe that the organization has been in existence for over half a century.

The cadet movement is an organization that fosters a positive sense of patriotism, duty, and personal responsibility among the young people of our nation, as well as leadership and citizenship. Cadets are instructed by members of the Armed Forces in many worthwhile activities, including the responsible use of military firearms. Under extremely tight supervision, cadets practise on firing ranges with firearms belonging to the Armed Forces.

However, the bill before us, if passed unamended, would have the unfortunate and unintentional effect of denying cadets the opportunity to use certain restricted and prohibited firearms, including the C-7 rifle, the standard small arm of our forces.

I do not need to say, honourable senators, that I am not arguing that cadets, who are between the ages of 12 and 18, should be allowed personally to possess military firearms. It is quite the contrary. The amendment I will propose simply would exempt cadets from the provision of the bill when they are executing their training under the authority and supervision of the Armed Forces.

Statistics clearly show that the number of firearms accidents occurring during cadet activities is negligible. That has been the case for many years. I agree with the minister when she states that the bill seeks to reduce the danger to the general public from firearms. Strict, controlled use of restricted and prohibited weapons by cadets does not pose any threat to the Canadian public. Their firearms training occurs on Department of Defence property, safely isolated from the public.

If anything, honourable senators, the sort of exposure to firearms that cadets receive is conducive to the principles of this bill. Young men and women are fully taught the dangers and risks that guns hold; their instruction does not in any way romanticize weaponry; and it is a necessary element of the training they receive in preparation for what may some day be careers in the Armed Forces. I point out with a deep sense of satisfaction that some 60 per cent of our cadets have chosen a military career either in the reserves or in the regular force.

Honourable senators, the amendment I intend to propose at the appropriate time does not in any way seek to weaken or undermine this piece of legislation. I agree fully with the fundamental principle, which is the need to strictly limit access to dangerous weapons among the general public.

The Cadet League of Canada, however, stands to lose a vital element of its purpose if its members are unnecessarily denied access to certain firearms. The amendment does not in any way seek to allow legions of young people personally to possess firearms. It simply allows for them to fulfil their duties under the rigorous, safe and responsible supervision of the Canadian Armed Forces.

I will not read my amendment now but propose it at the opportune time.

Honourable senators, my interest in the effects of Bill C-17 has been longstanding. As early as March 25 last, I wrote to the minister proposing that she appoint an additional member to the Canadian Council on Firearms which she appointed on October 4, 1990. I quote from that letter which states:

> May I suggest that you consider an addition to the Council of a representative of the Cadet League of Canada, to offer the point of view of our 65,000 members in the cadet movement. The cadet movement has done so much for youth in their program to enhance citizenship, and it is important that the movement be represented on the Council to take into account their particular interest in military training, which is so vital to our future leaders.

The minister did not agree with me. She said that if there happened to be a change later on, she would consider it. I have not heard from her since.

I also wish to put on the record the answer the minister gave to the President of the Army Cadet League who wrote to her on December 12, 1990. In her response of April 18, 1991 she stated:

> Since the Canadian Forces are of the opinion that cadets are not "members of the Canadians Forces" within the meaning of that term as it is used in paragraph 92(1)(a) of the Criminal Code, I am informed that cadets are not generally allowed to possess fully-automatic firearms in the course of their training.

No one said they were allowed. She goes on to state:

> Whether cadets should be permitted access to "sophisticated" military firearms depends, therefore, on the status of those weapons under the provisions of the Criminal Code. Clearly, there must be some restrictions on access to military firepower and, in view of the danger to public safety that arises when high firepower weapons are too easily available, any exemptions to those restrictions must be narrowly drawn.
> While I am aware of the value of cadet training for the Canadian Forces and those fortunate enough to participate in such training, I cannot say that I disagree with the application of the law or the currently proposed changes in it.

I have copies of the letter for the record.

Honourable senators, I place this material on the record so that senators will be aware of my thoughts on this matter. I have read the letters from the minister to the President of the Army Cadet League. They are reasonable. I think that there is something missing in the bill.

Through the proper procedures at the appropriate time, I will introduce my amendment.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Senator Berntson closes off the debate, I would like to say a few words. I will not repeat the presentation made by Senator Marshall. I think he put the case well. His was certainly not by any means an attempt to have cadets own firearms. They do not own firearms, nor do we want them to do so. This is certainly very much part of their training.

• (1600)

However, I would like to point out that the army cadet movement is important right across Canada. It is represented in every province. In fact, the province with the highest number of army cadets is Quebec. They are scattered throughout that province and they represent in many communities a Canadian vision and a Canadian attachment. These young people have the opportunity during the summer to go to summer camps in various parts of the country to mix with other young Canadians. I think it is an extremely important part of citizenship.

The handling of military weapons is part of their training. It is done under supervision. We do not seek anything different than that, but we believe that it is important to that particular movement. Remember that other cadet movements have an interesting focus; for example, in the air force, cadets have access to gliders and to travel in airplanes. Many of these things the army cadets do not have. The rifle shooting, the training with firearms is an essential part of the army cadet training. We want it to be able to continue under supervision. We ask for nothing else, simply the ability to do as they presently are doing.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Berntson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Eric Berntson: In closing debate on Bill C-17, I will take a couple of minutes to thank Senators Stanbury, Marshall and Molgat for their contributions to the debate here today. I think, Senator Stanbury, that your views are shared by a great many people both inside and outside of Parliament.

This bill truly is the product of a very, very long process of accommodation, negotiation and compromise. While it may not be a perfect bill, I believe that it is a good bill, perhaps even better than we know. Over the course of the next few days, while the bill is before the committee, I hope that answers to the questions that have been raised by all honourable senators will be provided to the satisfaction of all members.

Referring to what I will call the cadet question, my understanding has been, and is today, that there is nothing in this bill that will take anything away from the rights which cadets already enjoyed under previous legislation. I may be in error, but I intend to find out sooner, rather than later, and I hope to answer that question to the satisfaction of both Senator Marshall and Senator Molgat.

I want to thank all of those who have made a contribution to the process that finally culminated in this bill. It was a very long and, at times, a very emotional process. I want to thank everyone, both inside and outside of Parliament, who has in any way contributed to that process.

Ere I go back to my old life, Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, I hope I am procedurally correct when I say that I therefore move second reading of Bill C-17.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, for the second reading of Bill C-10, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was not here when this bill was debated at second reading. I understand that Senator Balfour was kind enough not to proceed with his final second reading motion on the assumption that I would want to speak to the matter, on the basis, I take it, of the reputation that I gained around here some years ago on the subject of smoking.

Whatever the reason was or is, I did read the intervention of Senator Marsden, and I have nothing to add to what she has said.

Hon. Wilbert J. Keon: Honourable senators, I spoke in support of Bill C-10, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, passed in the House of Commons on October 21. The tax on cigarettes will be approximately equivalent to 5.17 cents per cigarette. A similar tax will be levied on tobacco sticks; a tax of 35.648 dollars per kilogram on manufactured tobacco; and on cigars, a tax of 65 per cent.

For a one-pack-per-day cigarette smoker, this represents $1.03 daily. That tax paid by an addicted smoker during a 20-year-period is $7,519. This barely covers a 10-day routine hospital stay and, in fact, will only cover about 50 percent of the cost of an uncomplicated open heart operation, which I perform frequently.

Virtually every medical organization, association or society in the world, including the World Health Organization, over the past 20 years has joined in the condemnation of cigarette smoking and other uses of tobacco. The amount of information available on this subject is staggering. I would not attempt to cite the reports and references, but I would like to restate the issue and attempt to summarize where we are and where we are going with this massive health problem.

I will frequently refer to and paraphrase information from the report prepared for the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada by Dr. David Sacket, the chairman of the Health and Public Policy Committee of the college. Allow me to cite a few key statements from his report.

Every 18 months, cigarettes kill more Canadians than all those who died serving their country throughout World War II. Canadians now die from smoking at a rate equivalent to the crash of a jumbo jet every four days. If the number of cigarette smokers in Canada is to be kept constant, each week, 800 children must begin smoking to replace the 800 people who have died of smoking-related disease during that week.

Premature death is not the only hazard of smoking. There is unequivocal evidence, for example, that cigarette smokers miss more work than non-smokers. They use more health care services than non-smokers. Cigarette-caused fires are a major safety hazard. There is an increased risk of bronchitis and pneumonia among the infants of smoking parents. Indeed, even in a heavily industrialized area such as Hamilton, Ontario, children's lung function and respiratory illness is determined more by their mother's smoking habits than by atmospheric pollution. A number of studies have demonstrated that passive smoking, that is, exposure to second-hand cigarette smoke, can cause lung cancer in non-smokers.

In 1986, the Royal College, in fulfilling its duty to promote the health of all Canadians, urged the execution of four specific steps to reduce the toll of unnecessary disability and needless death from cigarette smoking; One, smokers who wish to stop smoking should receive help. Two, non-smokers should be protected from secondhand smoke. Three, children should be taught not to smoke. Four, Canada should stop growing tobacco.

The overwhelming majority of smokers would like to quit. Strategies have already been identified, some that work, and more trials are under way. More research into the causes and cures of smoking is needed.

The federal government launched a national strategy to reduce tobacco use in October of 1985 through Health and Welfare Canada in collaboration with provincial and territorial counterparts and national organizations. Its three goals were to protect the health and rights of smokers, to help non-smokers to stay smoke free and to help and encourage those who want to quit smoking to do so.

The department produced a background paper on stopping smoking in teenagers in collaboration with other agencies. Free smoking cessation programs for all public servants wishing to quit smoking are provided. All the provinces and territories in Canada, in cooperation with voluntary agencies, have introduced extensive measures to help people stop smoking. Ontario's Chief Medical Officer of Health recently called for everyone to tackle their top health problem, which is smoking.

Regarding the protection of non-smokers and secondhand smoke, as of January, 1990, the federal government, with the Non-smokers' Health Act, provided a smoke-free working environment in most federally regulated workplaces. In addition, all domestic international air flights of less than six hours' duration are now smoke free with international flights scheduled to be totally smoke free by July, 1993. Smoking is banned on inter-city buses and restricted on trains and in all transport terminals. All provinces and territories are working toward smoke-free working environments.

Enormous effort has gone forth in teaching children and teenagers not to smoke. The federal government has introduced the Peer Assisted Learning Smoking Preventive Project which is widely used in schools across Canada. Also, the "Break-Free/Fumer c'est fini" public awareness and information campaign has been designed to appeal to youth and target groups. An educational brochure entitled "Kids Decide But Parents Can Tip the Scales" was recently produced by the federal department and has been widely distributed across Canada. A number of other projects are under way. For example, "Break-Free All Stars" is an amateur sports project designed to promote non-smoking as a positive life style behaviour among eight to ten-year-old athletes. There are also teen cessation programs under way, as well as ongoing studies on smoking behaviour among Canadian youth. In the provinces and territories, extensive programs are under way.

Serious efforts are also being made in Canada to phase out the growing of tobacco. The federal government, through Agriculture Canada, has developed programs to ease the economic dislocation experienced by tobacco cultivators in Prince Edward Island, Ontario and Quebec. Although the Canadian capacity currently provides for 99 per cent of the Canadian market of about 6 million smokers, any one American tobacco company could supply Canada's entire market with Canadian style cigarettes.

In Ontario, the Ministry of Agriculture is trying to discourage tobacco crop growth. Research is under way to develop alternate crops of tobacco. Unfortunately, tobacco remains the second most important cash crop in Ontario. In British Columbia, tobacco growers are taking advantage of joint federal initiatives to help them get out of the tobacco-growing business. Now there are only five tobacco growers in the province with about 300 acres under cultivation.

In Prince Edward Island, the Tobacco Transition Adjustment Initiative Program, which began in 1986, is gradually shifting tobacco growing land to other activities.

All of this, honourable senators, gives an indication of the joint efforts that have been put forth in Canada by governments, authorities, associations, health providers and citizens at every level to deal with this tremendous problem.

Indeed, it is gratifying to see that while Canadians of different political persuasions, cultural backgrounds and geographic origins seem to have great difficulties in coming together in the past few years regarding constitutional matters, when a problem of this magnitude surfaces they are united in a common goal for its control and elimination.

Unfortunately, a great deal more remains to be done. In 1988, a Gallup poll by the Canadian Heart and Stroke Foundation and the Canadian Cancer Society found that 90 per cent of adult Canadians did not identify cigarette smoking as a leading cause of premature death in Canada. In addition, it pains me to say that 72 per cent did not identify heart disease when asked about the consequences of smoking.

Female smokers demonstrated a dismal knowledge of the risks of smoking during pregnancy. Only 40 per cent knew of the risk of miscarriage, and only 30 per cent knew of the risk of having stillborn children.

The overall rate of smoking in Canada is still too high, despite our recent success. It is clear, however, that the over 30 per cent decline in tobacco consumption that was observed during the 1980 to 1990 decade is attributable in large part to Canada's national strategy to reduce tobacco use, of which fiscal policy is an integral part.

Bill C-10 is therefore an integral part of the national comprehensive plan. It is based on the known relationship between prices of tobacco products and the demand for these same products. This relationship is known in economic jargon as the price elasticity of demand for cigarettes. The most widely recognized estimates of this price elasticity have yielded a figure of about 1.4, which means that a price increase of 10 per cent will reduce consumption by 4 per cent.

These numbers are well documented in texts such as "Reduce the Health Consequence of Smoking, 25 Years of Progress", by the Surgeon General of the United States, and in other research conducted by Eugene Lewitt of the New Jersey Medical School and Mr. Neil Comeshaw of Health and Welfare Canada. Lewitt's work is particularly interesting since it indicates that teenagers, due to a low income and the fact that many are not yet addicted to nicotine, have an elastic response to a price increase of 0.4, which means that a cigarette price increase of 10 per cent will reduce consumption by 14 per cent in this age category. Considering that the very large majority of Canadians start smoking when they are minors, tax increases such as that represented in Bill C-10 will have a major effect on the number of youngsters who will quit smoking or will never start. In fact, the overall number of smokers would decrees dramatically if we could prevent youngsters from getting hooked on cigarettes.

Health agencies in Canada have estimated that up to 700,000 Canadians will quit smoking because of Bill C-10. As important, 100,000 teenagers will quit smoking and another 30,000 will never enter the market. The future tobacco deaths avoided as a result could reach beyond 170,000 lives, a number equal to four times the total number of Canadians casualties experienced in World War II.

There are excellent indications that Canada is leading the world toward a relative reduction of 10 per cent per capita consumption of cigarettes for 1991. This is compared to 4 per cent in the U.S. and 5 per cent in the United Kingdom. Bill C-10 helps us maintain that leadership.

In summary, Bill C-10 is an effective countermeasure against the leading cause of death in Canada, an effective countermeasure against one of our leading health economic burdens, an effective countermeasure against a major cause of suffering and disability, and an effective countermeasure against the widespread use of one of the most addictive substances known to humankind.

I believe strongly, therefore, that it is the collective responsibility of all of us to support this legislation.

• (1620)

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I beg your indulgence to make a few remarks with respect to Bill C-10. We have just heard an excellent speech by Senator Dr. Keon, especially as tobacco is related to its effects of smoking on the cardiovascular system. As we all should know, smoking is associated with cancer of the bronchi, the larynx, pharynx, and the tongue. Some experts say tobacco also has a role to play in cancers of the pancreas and of the urinary bladder.

Given that this bill is amending the excise tax, I wish to bring you up-to-date on some tax information from the Department of National Health and Welfare. Federal government revenues related to tobacco taxes are estimated by economist Arthur Danner to be approximately $3.1 billion in 1990. The combined provincial and federal taxes on tobacco products come to approximately $7 billion. The other point I wish to make is that it costs the Canadian economy anually almost $20 billion—and that is the estimate way back in 1986—to deal with tobacco-related illnesses, loss of time at work, productivity, pensions, etcetera. In addition to that, it costs Canadians another $60 million annually to defray the costs involved with tobacco-related fires that occur frequently. According to this economist, there were 4,750 fires caused by tobacco smoking across Canada. $20 billion plus $60 million is the total staggering cost to the Canadian economy, according to updated statistics.

I hope to hear that the committee studying Bill C-10 will take into account the necessity, at least the plausibility, of vigorously promoting smoking cessation programs. I have in my hand a pamphlet issued recently by Health and Welfare Canada. It outlines 27 programs that would help a smoker to quit this bad habit. 20 of these are called "tobacco cessation programs," both self-help and group programs. It describes the information kits. It also talks about the availability of programs in various languages and their costs.

In view of the huge loss to the Canadian economy and other social and personal costs of tobacco smoking, I believe the government should cover the costs of any smoker who would try these programs to stop their bad habit. For example, as a physician, I often prescribe nicotine gum to my patients to stop smoking, but it is not 100 per cent effective. Furthermore, it is not covered by any provincial drug program. Given the cost of the pharmacist's prescription fee and the cost of the product, nicotine gum can come to about $20 for just one week's treatment. I want to see the committee to study and evaluate these smoking cessation programs and to study my suggestion that the federal government allow, for income tax purposes, the costs that smokers pay to try these smoking cessation programs.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF THIRD REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons for the Scrutiny of Regulations (Indian Health Regulations) presented in the Senate on November 19, 1991.

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I rise today regarding the third report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Scrutiny of Regulations. This report was presented to the Senate on November 19th, and I wish to thank my colleague, Senator Ottenheimer, who kindly agreed to present this report on my behalf. I should also note that after I have concluded my remarks, I will not seek the Senate's approval of this report, since it was presented to the Senate only for the information of honourable senators.

Those senators who have had a chance to read the third report of the joint committee will have noticed that it is different from other reports of that committee which have been tabled in the Senate in the past. The third report is a report to the House of Commons in which the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations proposes the disallowance of certain provisions of the Indian Health Regulations.

Prior to 1986, there existed no general disallowance procedure in Canada. That year, following recommendations made by a parliamentary committee, the government agreed to the introduction of a disallowance procedure in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons which authorizes the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations to make a report containing a resolution that a statutory instrument, or a portion thereof, be revoked. Once the motion for concurrence in such a report has been placed on the House of Commons' Order Paper, a minister of the Crown may request a debate on the disallowance resolution. At the conclusion of the debate, the House of Commons will be asked to vote on the report. If the disallowance resolution is rejected, that is the end of the matter. If, however, the vote is in favour of the disallowance resolution, that resolution becomes an order of the house directed to the ministry that it revoke the statutory instrument.

Another possibility is that no request for debate is made by a minister of the Crown. In that case the Standing Orders provide that after 15 sitting days, the disallowance resolution automatically becomes an order of the house that the statutory instrument be revoked. It is in accordance with this procedure that on November 18, 1991, the House of Commons ordered for the very first time that an instrument of delegated legislation, the Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order, be revoked by the Governor in Council. The report which was presented to the Senate on November 19 last, and the one that I discuss with you now, will, if accepted, result in a second order to revoke certain provisions of the Indian Health Regulations.

[Translation]

As Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations, I must say that the disallowance procedure I just described does not quite reflect the recommendations made previously. When it was introduced in 1986, the present disallowance procedure was criticized by the committee I chair today, for three reasons.

First, the committee has always maintained that a disallowance procedure must have a legislative basis. In other words, the existence and application of such a procedure should be laid down in an Act of Parliament, but that is not the case unfortunately.

Second, the committee's view has always been that a disallowance procedure should provide that either Chamber may disallow a regulation or other statutory instrument. However, as I explained earlier, a disallowance procedure can only take place before the House of Commons.

Finally, the committee observed that the procedure adopted in 1986 only provided for disallowance of a certain type of regulations: those issued by a minister or by the governor in council. Consequently, a substantial number of regulations are not subject to the disallowance procedure, such as the regulations adopted by the National Transportation Agency, the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, and the Atomic Energy Control Board. A disallowance procedure laid down in the form of legislation would make all these regulations subject to parliamentary control, on the same basis as regulations issued by ministers or by the governor in council.

That being said, honourable senators, it must be admitted that the procedure agreed to by the government in 1986 was a major step forward. In all major parliamentary democracies in the Commonwealth, parliaments have for a long time had parliamentary mechanisms or procedures for monitoring delegated legislation. Ours, adopted by the House of Commons in 1986, came in response to a real need.

[English]

Honourable senators, while the disallowance procedure I have described is a House of Commons procedure, this does not mean that it does not concern this chamber. The Senate is indeed concerned because the committee that is authorized to initiate the disallowance of a statutory instrument is a joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons. Through its participation on the joint committee, the Senate does play a part in the procedure.

The recent disallowance of the Agricultural Exhibition Loans Order by the House of Commons and the eventual disallowance of the regulatory provision mentioned in the third report are proof of a significant and important improvement in our collective ability to ensure that the legislative powers we so often, and almost routinely, delegate to the executive are exercised in accordance with the law and in a manner that respects the rights and liberties of the people of this country.

Also, it should be noted that decisions of the House of Commons on disallowance resolution will not be treated as involving a question of confidence in the government. In this regard, I note that shortly after the new procedure was introduced, the Right Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn, then President of the Queen's Privy Council and minister responsible for regulatory affairs, gave members of the joint committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations the assurance that a vote on a disallowance resolution adopted by the joint committee "is not a matter of confidence in the government" and that "all Members of Parliament will be able to vote with respect to this particular item as they see fit."

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I thought it would be useful to draw your attention to this rather unusual subject. I would ask you to take a few minutes to read this third report, and if you need further information, please let me know.

Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this report will be considered debated.

PRIVATE BILL

METROPOLITAN GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—SECOND READING

Hon. John Sylvain moved the second reading of Bill S-6, to amend the Act of incorporation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the Province of Quebec.

He said: Honourable senators, the Metropolitan General Insurance Company was incorporated by Chapter 51 of the Statutes of Canada, 1956 and is governed by the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. In April, 1987, the Metropolitan General Insurance Company was acquired by Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, the large mutual life insurer whose Canadian head office is located in Ottawa.

• (1640)

Metropolitan General Insurance Company operates as a direct writer of automobile and personal property insurance. Its insurance agents deal directly with customers without the intervention of independent insurance brokers. It derives all of its premium income in the province of Quebec.

The total volume of gross written premiums of Metropolitan General Insurance Company in 1990 was $12.2 million. At the year end, the company had 26,281 policies in force.

Following net losses of more than $5 million in each of 1989 and 1990, Metropolitan General Insurance Company's parents announced in January, 1991, that it would cease operations as of the end of March, 1991, if a purchaser could not be found.

On June 4, 1991, the Commerce Group Insurance Company, a federally chartered insurance company and one of the two operating companies making up Commassur Inc., a leading property and casualty insurance group in Quebec, acquired Metropolitan General Insurance Company. Following the purchase, and in order to improve the financial strength of Metropolitan General Insurance Company, the Commerce Group Insurance Company added $9 million to the capital stock of Metropolitan General Insurance Company, more than trebling the company's capital and surplus.

The Commerce Group Insurance Company does business exclusively through insurance brokers while Belair Insurance Company, another member of the Commassur Inc. group, like Metropolitan General Insurance Company, deals directly with customers without the intervention of insurance brokers. Belair Insurance Company is incorporated under the Quebec Insurance Act.

Metropolitan General Insurance Company, a direct writer of insurance, wants to continue under the laws of Quebec in order to merge with Belair Insurance Company, also a direct writer of insurance. The management of Metropolitan General Insurance Company believes that it can offer more competitive products and improve services to policyholders by merging with Belair Insurance Company, a company well known and well respected among the insurance-buying public in Quebec. With its computer system and its distribution network of 35 sales offices, Belair Insurance Company will absorb an increase of its premium volume at low marginal cost. The synergistic effect of the merger should bring a positive contribution to the Commassur Inc. group's profitability over the next few years. As well, the acquisition of Metropolitan General Insurance Company by Commerce Group Insurance Company Inc. and its merger with Belair Insurance company will ensure that more that 40 jobs, which would have been lost had the company discontinued operations, will be saved.

In order to be continued under the laws of Quebec, Metropolitan General Insurance Company must be authorized to do so under its basic legislation, and this can only be done through a private bill before the Parliament of Canada. At a special general meeting of shareholders held on November 5, 1991, the continuation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company under the laws of Quebec was unanimously approved.

In conclusion, honourable senators, the proposed transfer of jurisdiction of Metropolitan General Insurance Company is clearly beneficial to its shareholders, customers, and the general public. Consequently, I would ask honourable senators to give this bill appropriate consideration so that the company will be able to carry out its plan as soon as possible.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have listened very attentively to the remarks made by Senator Sylvain, and I find nothing controversial in this legislation. I do not think there are any objections on this side to giving the bill speedy passage. I understand that Senator Sylvain intends to move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, wherein perhaps some of us might wish to pursue some questions and some further information.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the other day Senator Sylvain asked for leave, and I regretted that I could not grant leave at that time. I am pleased that the bill is now before us and will not be held up. I only want one assurance from him. My concern would be that nothing in what is being proposed will be of any damage to any of the shareholders or to any of the policyholders. I would like to have that assurance from him, that neither of these two groups, who I presume are the only interested ones, will be hurt by this legislation.

Senator Sylvain: Honourable senators, I can certainly assure you that none of the stockholders would be damaged since we are dealing with the same shareholders in the one company and in the other. It is a transfer from one pocket to the other.

The policyholders, on the other hand, are in much better hands since the company that carried their risk was about to close had this company not been sold to this group. They are being advantaged in that their policies are now with a group which is a first-class group with enormous financial strength, and they will be well looked after.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Sylvain, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition) rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the violence against women in Canadian society and the desirability of investigation of the subject by a Senate Committee.

He said: Honourable senators, I have to say a word about this inquiry in order to save it from rule 28's guillotine, this being its last day before death unless I say something about it.

An Hon. Senator: Revive it.

Senator Frith: I thought of reviving it, of course, but I want to say just this about it: This inquiry is an inquiry that renews or revives a previous inquiry dealing with the question of violence against women in Canadian society. The original inquiry did not directly refer to the possibility of an investigation of the subject by a Senate committee. The present inquiry does so. It therefore has to be looked at in the context of a panel that has been established to look into this question.

When Dawn Black, the NDP Member of Parliament for New Westminster-Burnaby, proposed private Bill C-202, she wrote to me asking for support. I wrote back telling her I would support the bill and mentioned to her that I had this inquiry and that it was a renewal of a previous inquiry. I asked her whether she thought the panel on violence against women was a sufficient solution to the problem that is addressed by this inquiry, at least for the moment. She wrote back saying that she thought so, and that it would not be wise to have two inquiries or two investigations going on at the same time. I am using "inquiry" in the sense of an inquiry by a committee as opposed to an inquiry found in the Senate rules to describe, for exmple, Inquiry No. 1.

• (1650)

Therefore, honourable senators, I would like to wait for some more action from the panel on violence against women and hold on our Order Paper the possibility of our proceeding with an inquiry calling the attention of the Senate to the subject matter, and also the possibility of Senate committee activity. I do not want to propose anything directly at the moment while the panel is engaged in its work but I would like to reserve the right to do so after we have seen how active the panel is and how appropriate its recommendations might be.

I think it is appropriate that the Senate hold on to this matter as an inquiry and that it is appropriate that it do so today, considering the comments made at second reading debate on Bill C-17. Therefore, I ask that the debate on this inquiry be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE ECONOMY

CANCELLATION OF CONSTRUCTION PROJECT IN GRAND-SAULT/GRAND FALLS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, Senator Lowell Murray, the government's official spokesman in the Senate, told us last week, in a tone of righteous indignation, that the economy was recovering. On page 565 of the Debates of the Senate for November 20, 1991, he told Senator Olson:

> The hon. senator has the policies of the present government to thank for that namely Senator Murray's prediction that:

> Canada will lead the industrialized world in the rate of economic growth in 1992.

However, the reality is quite different from what the Leader of the Government in the Senate would have us believe.

Last week, Cavendish Farms announced from its Moncton office that a $50-million potato processing plant planned for Grand Falls would not be built. This plant, which was to open in the summer of 1992, was announced with great fanfare in September 1990. It was to process 280 million pounds of potatoes and create 200 jobs.

The question now is: Why did Cavendish Farms make that decision? Unfortunately, I did not contact them, but I have an article from the Telegraph Journal, the daily newspaper of Saint John, N.B., of Saturday, November 23, 1991. Like Cavendish, this paper also belongs to Irving interests. The article says:

[English]

> . . . company officials say difficult economic times don't allow for construction of the proposed $50 million plant.
> Cavendish President Robert Irving says that changes in business conditions since the time of the announcement have caused the company to review its initiative.

So there you have it in a nutshell, honourable senators, the economy being what it is, and not what the ostrich Tory government says it is or will be.

The first closing of a U.S.-owned branch plant in Canada as a direct result of the Canada-U.S. free trade agreement was that of Square-D, in Edmundston, New Brunswick, a neighbouring town of Grand Falls. All 159 employees lost their jobs forever. The pulp and paper industry in New Brunswick is really suffering. Hundreds upon hundreds of workers have either lost their jobs or have been laid off as the result of this government's monetary policies. Another heavily subsidized plant in Grand Falls producing synthetic pallets is idle. The federal government had pumped millions into this establishment which had opened only recently. Trans-border shopping has been encouraged by this government's stupid tax policies, particularly the GST.

Senator Murray, don't tell the good people of Grand Falls, New Brunswick, that the Canadian economy is on the course of recovery, because your government is heading for the electoral shoals. The good people of Grand Falls will laugh you out of town, you and your train of sycophants, if you so much as suggest that everything is well in Mulroneyland.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

WHITE RIBBON CAMPAIGN—BREAKING MEN'S SILENCE TO END MEN'S VIOLENCE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to read you what the White Ribbon Campaign for Breaking Men's Silence to End Men's Violence has to say these days.

I quote:

> If it were between countries, we'd call it war. If it were a disease, we we'd call it an epidemic. If it were an oil spill, we'd call it a disaster. But it's happening to women, and it's just an everyday affair. It is violence against women. It is rape at home and on dates. It is the beating or the blow that one out of four Canadian women receive in their lifetime. It is sexual harassment at work and sexual abuse of the young. It is murder.
> There's no secret enemy pulling the trigger. No unseen virus that leads to death. It's just men. Men from all social backgrounds and of all colours and ages. Men in business suits and men in blue collars. Men who plant the fields and men who sell furniture. Not weirdos. Just regular guys.
> All those regular guys, though, have helped create a climate of fear and mistrust among women. Our sisters and our mothers, our daughters and our lovers can no longer feel safe in their homes. At night they can't walk to the corner for milk without wondering who's walking behind them. It's hard for them to turn on the TV without seeing men running amok in displays of brutality against women and other men. Even the millions of women in relationships with that majority of men who are gentle and caring feel they cannot totally trust men. All women are imprisoned in a culture of violence.

Men's violence against women isn't aberrant behaviour. Men have created cultures where men use violence against other men, where we wreak violence on the natural habitat, where we see violence as the means to solve differences between nations, where every boy is forced to learn to fight or to be branded as a sissy, and where men have forms of power and privilege that women do not enjoy.

Men have been defined as part of the problem. But we are writing this statement because we think men can also be part of the solution. Confronting men's violence requires nothing less than a commitment to full equality for women and a redefinition of what it means to be men, to discover a meaning of manhood that doesn't require blood to be spilled.

The White Ribbon Campaign urges that in order to commemorate the awful tragedy at the Écôle Polytechnique in Montreal, all men should wear a white ribbon or a white armband in the week from December 1 to December 6. I urge my fellow senators to do the same.

Senators wishing to send donations, please make the cheques payable to the Regional Co-ordinating Committee on Wife Assault, care of Family Service Centre, 119 Ross Avenue, Ottawa, K1Y 0N6. The telephone number is 725-3601, and the FAX number is 728-6159. You can write to the White Ribbon Campaign at 253 College Street, Box 231, Toronto, Ontario, M5T 1R5. You can find these addresses in the proceedings tomorrow.

FORESTRY

EXCLUSION OF CANADIAN LUMBER FROM EEC

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: As honourable senators are aware, our Canadian lumber industry is having a very difficult time, and now there is a new problem—this time involving the European Community. The new problem relates to the failure to this date to obtain an extension of the derogation on Canadian unseasoned lumber.

This is not a partisan statement. I believe that all parties in this country should rally behind the efforts of this government and the forest industry to prevent what could be a major tragedy for the Canadian forest industry and for Canadian workers from coast to coast. So I make this statement in that spirit.

It was understood that the European Community Plant Health Standing Committee was to vote on the extension to the European Community kiln dry directive at its November 19th, 1991 meeting. For reasons not fully understood, the item, while on the agenda, was not put forward for voting. The understanding of the industry is that the next meeting is scheduled for December 16th, 1991, and this delay is the source of the problem for the Canadian forest industry.

In many respects, one month is a short period of time. However, in this particular instance this impediment to trade will drastically harm an industry that is already facing record financial losses.

Some honourable senators will know the details. Unseasoned lumber is the lumber that comes out of the mill, and is not kiln dried. Some countries in Europe are concerned that there is a nematode in certain imported lumber that might affect their stands of timber. We do not believe that this is a valid reason to exclude unseasoned Canadian lumber from those European markets. We have a rigid certification policy in Canada to make sure that when Canadian lumber is shipped abroad, it is top quality. There is none finer in the world.

I should observe that the total value of Canadian lumber exports for 1990, including exports to the United Kingdom and the European Community but not including pulp and paper, was about $1 billion. That is the magnitute of the market that may be in jeopardy.

As I said, one month in many respects is a short period of time, even if we did get a favourable judgment on December 16. However, in this particular instance this impediment to trade will drastically harm an industry that is already facing record financial losses.

The result of delaying the vote, which all indications showed would have been a favourable response to achieving an extension, gives other world lumber producers a valuable competitive advantage in European markets that have traditionally been supplied by our Canadian producers. Due to the longer shipping periods required to ship from the West Coast, it also changes the short-term competitiveness between western and eastern North America.

Here in absolutely succinct form—if I can have another minute—is the impact to the Canadian lumber industry. Lumber sales for the first quarter of 1992 cannot proceed. The volumes of unseasoned lumber normally sold for this period to Europe is 330 million FBM, or 1.3 million FBM annually. The value of unseasoned lumber sold to the EEC is $55 million to $60 million per month. Some Canadian shippers have sold into 1992, based on positive feedback that was being received from numerous sources that the extension would be granted. Some of these contracts are now in jeopardy.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: You are already a minute over your time.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I ask for a brief extension to finish this list? I am practically finished.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: I want to thank honourable senators for their decision.

Whether or not the sales have already been made, January shipments will be lost. The February/March sales and shipments will depend on an early resolution of the problem. Until that happens, other suppliers will have a distinct advantage.

The effect of the delay in granting an extension will have a quick impact on western Canadian sawmills; indeed, on all the sawmills in the country. Some coastal sawmills in my province sell up to 40 per cent of their production to EEC countries.

Mill shutdowns are expected to start in early December. Besides the financial impact on the sawmills, there will be a social impact as many employees have already faced previous unemployment due to shutdowns which occurred because of the depressed market.

One of the major problems involves the existing order file for December 1991. This stock must arrive in the EEC countries by February 1992. The time frame has caused a considerable rush on vessel space for December shipments.

Obviously there will be an effort to divert to other markets. This may result in a short-term relief in employment for the mills. It will, however, change the delicate balance between supply and demand which potentially could further erode market prices.

In a one-sentence summary, the potential effect of the one month delay of the derogation extension to the Canadian Lumber Industry, excluding the social and economic aspects of unemployment, is in the area of $150 million to $200 million. That is why all parties in this Parliament have to work together and support efforts made by the government and by the industry to convince the Europeans as to the seriousness of this situation and the unfairness of it.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know how much time is left in this period. The rules provide for 15 minutes for statements by senators. If there was another minute or two left and no other senator wished to make a statement, I would follow up what Senator Perrault has just said. There are two minutes left.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We would have no objections to extending the time.

Senator Murray: I simply wish to say, honourable senators, that this matter was raised today as it was raised, I believe, during the Oral Question Period earlier in the week by our friend Senator Perrault. Let me say that Canada expects a positive decision in our favour. We recognize that the announced delay to December 16 in making this decision is putting a number of contracts in jeopardy, and those contracts amount to, I think, over $100 million, close on $200 million.

I want to emphasize that we are pressing the Europeans to make a decision well before December 16. To that end, our ambassador in Brussels, Mr. Smith, has been in touch with Mr. MacSharry of the European Commission and has taken a letter from the Minister to Mr. MacSharry with a view to pressing the point and having the decision made as soon as possible.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to inform the chamber that the meeting scheduled for this afternoon with the Prairie delegation has had to be cancelled. Notice of the cancellation was sent to all senators, but, in case some have yet to receive it, I want to mention that the delegation had to leave earlier than anticipated. Therefore there will be no meeting.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Atkins, bill placed on the Orders of the day for second reading on Tuesday next, December 3, 1991.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sure that, despite the temporary absence of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, my colleagues opposite would not want to be deprived of a few petitions! I intend to table several today.

I may say that Senator Kelly is always very anxious to make sure that these petitions are in order, and they are. They contain the usual prayer, and their form is impeccable. These petitions are against the GST.

Today, I am tabling 99 different petitions with a total of 2,160 signatures. One petition is from Alberta, with 23 names representing people from 11 different locations in Alberta.

We have six petitions from New Brunswick, with a total of 108 signatures from nine different communities. From Nova Scotia, one petition with seven names, representing five different communities. From Ontario, 85 petitions with 1,945 names from 24 different towns. From Quebec, 14 petitions with 279 signatures from 25 different towns or villages.

This is an indication that, although the GST is now nearly a year old, the Canadian public's reaction to it has not changed. Canadians remain just as opposed to this measure as they were a year ago.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I also have some petitions, but they are different in that they were signed by 111 young Canadians from Edmonton, Alberta, who deplore the fact that the goods and services tax credit is not available to young Canadians who are not living with their parents, pay taxes and are under the age of 19.

They ask the Senate to urge the government to correct this injustice.

I would like to read part of a letter from the vice-president of the student association of the University of Alberta, which accompanies this petition, and it says the following:

[English]

"Dear Senator Hébert,

Thank you so much for providing us with this petition concerning the credit of the Goods and Services Tax for young people. We at the Students' Union have realized this error on the part of the government, and we are pleased to see the Senate responding to an obvious need. Enclosed you will find several hundred signatures that were collected during our Week of Welcome. I hope they will add to the names that you have already collected and will speed the way for you to effect some change on this point.

There are also some other things. This is the petition.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have some more here.

I have the honour to present to you petitions signed by 56 citizens of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick who are opposed to the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Dartmouth, Oxford and Amherst, Nova Scotia and Moncton, Cocagne and Saint John, New Brunswick.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 213 citizens of the province of Quebec who are opposed to the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Victoriaville, Baie Saint-Paul, Jonquière, Longueuil, Montreal, Falardeau and Chicoutimi.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers to questions. The first is in response to a question asked by Senator Molgat on October 23, on 1st Canadian Division. The other two are in response to questions asked on November 19, one by Senator Perrault on the shipment of Canadian grain through U.S. ports, and the other by Senator Bonnell on the fixed link at P.E.I.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

1ST CANADIAN DIVISION—PRESENT STATUS

(Response to question raised by Honourable Gildas L. Molgat on October 23, 1991)

The re-creation of the 1st Canadian Division was announced in March 1988.

The Division, headquartered in Kingston, and maintaining forces both in the Federal Republic of Germany and across Canada, would come together as a formation in the Central Region of Europe only in time of crisis. The Division includes two mechanized infantry brigades and supporting divisional troops.

On September 17, 1991, the Minister of National Defence announced the results of the Review of Defence Policy.

The 1991 Defence Review has directed that, before 1995, Canada will reduce its military force in Germany to a task force of approximately 1,100 people. The location of the Task Force will be determined after consultations with our allies and NATO authorities.

In light of the results of the Defence Review, DND officials are currently examining the status of 1st Canadian Division so as to determine whether a headquarter needs to be maintained for the coordination of possible tasks requiring more than one formation in response to crisis, either at home or abroad.

TRANSPORT

SHIPMENT OF CANADIAN GRAIN THROUGH U.S. PORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Honourable Raymond J. Perrault on November 19, 1991)

On November 5, 1991, the Canadian Wheat Board (CWB) announced that it would be exporting 55,000 tonnes (one vessel) of barley through the Port of Seattle in order to evaluate this shipping option and determine how costs compare to all Canadian routes.

The ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert are currently being pushed to their limits of capacity, and any shipments through Seattle are a net addition to total West Coast throughput. The CWB is expecting that grain exports this crop year may reach a record level.

This is the first time that the CWB has used a U.S. port for an off-shore customer. This is a one-time movement and does not represent the wave of the future. The sharing of grain terminals is not a new phenomenon since the U.S. grain industry regularly moves grain through ports on the St. Lawrence.

Prairie farmers benefit from this initiative for a number of reasons: 1) it results in a net increase in grain sales; 2) it is cheaper to use west coast ports than the eastern system; 3) Canadian west coast ports are currently at capacity.

[Senator Murray.]

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—LOCATION OF CONSTRUCTION HEADQUARTERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Honourable Lorne Bonnell on November 19, 1991)

The specific bridge designs from each of the three remaining consortia have been submitted to Public Works Canada (PWC). PWC will now—with the assistance of a panel of independent ice-experts—determine whether each bridge design meets the environmental criteria, including the 2 day ice-out delay as identified by the Environmental Assessment Review Panel.

Those companies which meet the environmental criteria will be asked to submit financial bids to Public Works.

Although Premier Ghiz has recently made a public statement concerning the location of the construction site office, he has not officially communicated this to the Minister of Public Works. A decision on the location of the construction site office would be made solely by the winning consortium.

The fixed link will proceed only if the project can be proven to be environmentally sound and financially viable.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-1992

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 26, 1991, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1992 (Sessional Paper No. 343-317).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I would like to make a few comments about the Supplementary Estimates, not for the purpose of debating in any detail the policy implications of the Supplementary Estimates but to cast our minds ahead a bit to consider what the situation of a newly reformed Senate would be if the current proposals were put into the Constitution.

May I begin by saying that these Supplementary Estimates are in the amount of $2.276 billion, a substantial sum. In the Expenditure Management Report published by the Treasury Board of Canada, there is a listing of the main items in the Supplementary Estimates, among which are highlighted the support to farmers, native agenda and the Green Plan. Under "Support to Farmers" it reads:

> Support to farmers of $1,168 million is included for Agriculture Canada, comprising $749 million for payments made pursuant to the new programs under the Farm Income Protection Act: the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account.
> The initial instalment of $400 million on the recently announced $800 million assistance program to Canadian farmers and producers of agricultural products is also included in these estimates. These payments are being made in light of the depressed state of the farm sector.
> Supplementary Estimates (A) of $428 million provided transitional income support to farmers pending the implementation of the Farm Income Protection Act.

I understand that the bulk of this funding will apply to western farmers, and I have no complaint with that. That is a point I want to make as background to what I will say later. It is an item of deep regional interest that obviously western senators and western Members of Parliament would find of great importance in their areas.

If I turn to the Supplementary Estimates with respect to the Department of Fisheries, I find that, relative to the history of the fisheries, there is a substantial sum provided under that item; I believe an amount of $56 million. If one turns to the detail, one will find a listing of the expenditures for new capital projects to be made in Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Quebec, British Columbia, and Nova Scotia. In fact, there is a very important item in the amount of $18 million entitled "Grants to self-employed fishermen prevented from fishing due to ice conditions". This is an item covering the funds from the Treasury Board under the contingency, both paying for this item, being mainly an expenditure in the Province of Newfoundland, if I am not mistaken.

In the normal course of our legislative process, all these Supplementary Estimates come to the Senate, are sent to a standing committee, and the Senate could, if it wished, defeat them. At least it has them before it.

Having stated that within these Supplementary Estimates there are items of what one might call strong regional interest affecting the west and the east, let me turn now to see how these regional interests could be reflected in a new Senate established in accordance with the principles contained in the document, "Shaping Canada's Future Together".

It is interesting to me to find in this document the following statement, with which I fully agree.

> The second house is designed to give particular weight to regional and minority views in federal policy-making.

Of course it is because of that weight that the notion of an elected, effective, equal Senate has gripped the attention of the west because it could express regional interests. The fact that that is the intention of the proposal is reinforced by an examination of the powers of the Senate in which it is stated that for "matters of particular national importance"—I would conclude as distinct from regional importance—such as national defence and international affairs, the new, elected, Senate would have a suspensive veto only. If an item were defeated in the Senate it would then return to the House of Commons and be repassed in the same way as a constitutional amendment. We saw it exemplified in the case of the Meech Lake proposals.

My point in drawing the comparison is to establish the intention of the proposals to create a second chamber which would be designed to give particular weight to regional and minority views in federal policy making.

I turn to another section of the proposals which further elaborates the powers of the Senate and which states that there will be "no legislative role in relation to appropriation bills and measures to raise funds including borrowing authorities". It is the proposal contained in this document that a new elected Senate would have no role, as is stated in the document, "in relation to appropriation bills and measures to raise funds including borrowing authorities".

The expression "appropriation bills" is a very broad expression and includes the appropriation bills that will follow from the Estimates, so to speak, either the main or the supplementary or the interim supply. But it also includes any bill which appropriates funds and which accordingly would be preceded by a royal recommendation.

If one accepted this statement literally, one would conclude that the new, elected, Senate would have no ability to deal either with supply or with a host of other bills which are normally preceded by the royal recommendation, because these are appropriation bills.

I am sorry I do not have the actual words of the testimony, because I did not get a chance to pick it up before coming into the Senate, but in the testimony by officials before the constitutional affairs committee it was pointed out that really what the government had in mind was not such a sweeping proposal as appropriation bills, but the target was the business of supply. The chief witness for the government stated that, in framing this proposal, the government had in mind the conclusion of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform, co-chaired by Senator Molgat, which did its work in 1983.

That was a joint committee. That committee concluded that the Senate should have no role with respect to the business of supply. The witness said that; in effect, he said: "What we have in mind is nothing other than the business of supply. All appropriation bills except the business of supply would come to the Senate."

We know that the business of supply is not an undefined concept. For example, Standing Order 81 (3) of the House of Commons defines the business of supply as follows:

> For the purposes of this Order, the business of supply shall consist of motions to concur in interim supply, main estimates and supplementary or final estimates; motions to restore or reinstate any item in the estimates; motions to introduce or pass at all stages any bill or bills based thereon; and opposition motions that under this order may be considered on allotted days.

So it was a considerable improvement, in my mind, to have the witness state that the government had in mind, not as is stated in the document; no role in relation to appropriation bills, but had in mind no role with respect to the business of supply.

Let us stop here and consider what we have been told. We have been told that all appropriation bills would come to the new, reformed Senate with the exception of the business of supply, which I have defined and which is vividly exemplified by the Supplementary Estimates. My conclusion is that this is certainly an improvement, that all appropriation bills, less the business of supply, would come to the new, elected, effective and equal Senate.

Having accepted that improvement from the witnesses, I go on to ask, is that enough? Surely those who talk about a Senate that has a regional voice would have to ask themselves: What would be the position of elected senators in the new Senate from Alberta, Manitoba or Saskatchewan who would find that the Supplementary Estimates, containing $1,168 million to deal with a crucial western issue, would not come to the Senate? The new senators would never see it. They would have no voice whatsoever.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, unless the honourable senator is granted leave to continue, his 15 minutes are over. Is leave granted for the senator to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator MacEachen: Do we want to look at these proposals carefully? Do we want to build an institution that will meet the expectations of regional populations? I emphasize this case because it is so apparent that if we adopt these new proposals without any change, then those senators, freshly elected from Alberta, would come to the Senate awaiting to deal with financial measures contained in the estimates affecting western agriculture, and they would find they had no say. Indeed, they would not even see it. I am asking, is that a satisfactory situation? They would say, "Isn't it odd that the elected members of the House of Commons from Ontario will be able to vote and pronounce upon these western agricultural issues, and I, an elected senator from Alberta, will have no chance to pronounce or say a word or even see it."

That is the issue as I see it, but is it satisfactory? The senator who is running for election in Lethbridge, what will he or she say when asked "What are your views on support for the crisis in western agriculture?" What will that newly-elected senator say upon returning to the constituency to explain how it was that the support was so inadequate? He would say, "Well, I have nothing to do with that. I am constitutionally part of a new regional chamber but, on this regional issue, I just cannot say anything. That is the way the Constitution works." I do not think I am overstating this point.

Let us then take the case of the Newfoundlander. The amount stated in the Supplementary Estimates (B) was $18 million for ice conditions and wharves in important fishing villages and important places in Nova Scotia. The newly-elected senators from Newfoundland, bursting with regional ambition and pride, will be asked to produce some help for the fishermen in their districts. That is the word in Newfoundland, "district." It is not "constituency." They will say, "Gee, I am sorry. We have nothing to do with that. That is in the business of supply." The people of the district will say, "But we elected you to do things for Newfoundland regionally. Fish is us." The newly-elected senator would reply, "Oh well, no." The people of the district would then say, "What do you deal with?" The senator would reply, "Well, we have a double majority on language and culture." The constituent would then say, "Well, that is fine, but what about the fish?"

I am making a little point, honourable senators. Focus on this and consider, in the proposed new senate, whether it would be an adequate solution to frame the powers of the Senate in a way that would deny the elected regional persons from dealing with and pronouncing upon important regional issues, which would be the case if the business of supply were totally excluded from this new chamber.

If we go back in history, we find that many of the traditional items affecting the regions of this country come through the Estimates. I think that the funding for ACOA was provided for through the Estimates. Therefore, when ACOA was established, none of the Atlantic province senators under these proposals, would have had a chance to say a word. They would not see it. The Western Opportunities Fund, was that not put through in the Estimates?

Senator Olson: Western Diversification Fund.

Senator MacEachen: The Western Diversification Fund. So there are real anomalies here.

In the committee, I asked whether the government had made an analysis of the flow of legislation over the past five years through the current Parliament to determine into what categories that legislation would fit in relation to a prospective new Senate according to these proposals. I do not think that analysis has been made. I asked if it could be made for the committee members, because I do not think we can produce a judgment on the powers of the Senate unless we see what role it would have with respect to the legislation that has been historically dealt with by the Senate.

I know these are difficult questions for Constitution makers, but I must say that the answers provided, if they are implemented, are bound to lead to frustration in the regions because the people will never understand why this has happened.

I thank you, honourable senators, for allowing me the extra time, because this is a matter of importance and ought not to be overlooked.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, my honourable friend has raised a serious question which I think has been obvious to all of us who have carefully examined the role of the Senate in the past, and the suggestions about the role of the Senate in the future.

• (1500)

I start by harking back to the situation in the House of Lords in the 17th century when the question was decided as to whether the Lords or the Commons had control of the purse. In those days it was decided, over the vigorous objections of the members of the House of Lords, that the Commons had control of the purse. All of our traditions since then with respect to budgetary matters have been based on the proposition that the Commons has control of the purse.

It is curious that when the Canadian Senate was established in 1867, no reference was made to that particular aspect of governmental activity. The implication was that the powers of the Senate did extend to control of the purse in those particular days, and since then the development of custom and experience has made it expedient for the Senate to be very careful about exercising that power.

There is a very interesting constitutional background which comes into play when discussing this matter. It has to do with the principle of confidence. One of the principles that is enshrined in the present suggestions, I believe, is that there should only be one confidence body, namely, the House of Commons. It is difficult to conceive how, in a parliamentary system, we could depart from that principle without substantially reorganizing the way in which we do business. The House of Commons is the confidence body and it is only the House of Commons that can say who should be the government. The Senate has never attempted to exercise any role, as far as I am aware, in connection with confidence, and none of us in this chamber have ever suggested that a defeat in the government of the Senate would, in effect, be a vote of confidence and would have serious implications with respect to the other chamber and the life of the government. So there is a problem.

How do you reconcile that state of affairs, which I do not think any of us want to change? I do not think anyone here is seriously advocating that the Senate should become a confidence body. Even those advocating the Triple-E Senate who have examined the issues have gone to some pains to recognize that principle, because in their suggestions the Senate has a limited role with respect to financial matters. It seems to be common ground that the Senate is not a confidence body.

How, then, are questions of confidence dealt with in the Senate? I suggest that dealing with the matter of supply, the Main Estimates, the Interim Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates, are unquestionably matters of confidence. If the new Senate decided to reject any of these bills in the supply system, it is difficult to see how one could avoid regarding that as a lack of confidence in the government. One would wonder how that would fit in with our suggestion that this is not a confidence body. That is a problem.

On the other hand, the honourable senator raises an equally difficult problem; that is, to what extent should the Senate have a say in expressing regional interests in financial matters? That seems to me to be the nub of what he is saying. It seems to me there is nothing to prevent us from making arrangements that the Senate should continue to do that as it does now. Nowadays, without any hesitation, we express opinions on financial matters that have a national or regional aspect to them. Such debates take place here all the time. Requests are made for money for various things by senators opposite; and some of us on this side would like to do the same thing all the time without having the government crumble, fall down, or, indeed, without the passage of such bills being adversely affected.

I would not accept my honourable friend's suggestion that if we could not have the power to vote against these bills effectively then that would prevent us from having anything to say about contents. I doubt that that is the case. As we consider how a reformed Senate would work, I think it would be possible for us to apply our minds to that question and see how we could assure ourselves that elected senators would have adequate opportunity to express their views about the financial implications of bills that come before this chamber without, at the same time, having the constitutional capacity to throw them out.

The point raised is one about which I have not given any serious or detailed consideration at the present time. There are others who might be able to do that. However, it seems to me that it is not impossible for us to exercise an advisory capacity with respect to the expenditure of public funds, even though we cannot vote the bill itself out because it happens to be a bill that is part of the business of supply.

I would not discourage senators by suggesting to them that they would have nothing to say. I think they would have a lot to say. It is quite possible that at the present time, if our arguments were persuasive, even though we had no power to deal with this bill in the business of supply, our views might not go unheard in other places. Certainly, they would be heard in the public arena, and that is the place we want to make them heard. The senator from Lethbridge, if she is elected in that constituency, would be able to go back to Lethbridge and state that although she did not have a vote on this matter, she certainly told them what she thought about it. She could say that she was able to lay out before this body and her constituency the views that she supported, if she were the lucky person to represent that splendid constituency in an elected, new, Senate. I do not think she is in any way inhibited from performing a representative duty and to act in a representative capacity in financial matters, even though the Constitution might limit the capacity of this house to deny those bills legitimacy.

What is the problem? The problem is how to balance the capacity of members of this House under a new dispensation to have their say with respect to financial matters and to speak up for their regions, and at the same time to do so in a manner which does not involve questions of confidence. If we have the right to vote on these things, as some would like to have us do, then we are projecting ourselves into this arena of confidence. We are projecting ourselves into this change in the parliamentary system that has been developed in the United Kingdom over the centuries; something which we largely follow, that the confidence chamber is the House of Commons and that motions in this house should not result in the resignation of the government.

It is a good problem. I think my honourable friend was correct to raise it because he is not the only one who has been worrying about this type of thing. I would not go to the extreme that he appears to do in saying if we cannot vote it out we have nothing say about it. I do not think that follows. Perhaps it is not the kind of say we would like to have, but we have to balance that off against the principle of confidence bodies and which body will have the right to dictate the fate of the government.

It seems to me that in any new power that is given to the Senate, we must reconcile what we want this body to do with this question of confidence. I would put it to honourable senators that, in the parliamentary system, you cannot have a government responsible to two bodies on questions of confidence. In fact, it is not the case in the congressional system. The president is not responsible to either body. Congress can vote against him any time they like without putting him out of office.

However, that is not the case here. We have to say to ourselves: Do we want this body to be a confidence body, as the House of Commons is, and thus rule on financial matters? Do we think that is compatible in any way with the system we have grown up with here, and do we feel that this is a new look on the parliamentary procedure that we could well afford to investigate and to decide upon? Or do we feel that the risks that it involves in terms of instability in the Government of Canada is more than we are prepared to take?

Bear this in mind: How will this body be constituted under a new dispensation? Do you suppose it will be on the "First past the post" principle with the Senate being elected in the same fashion as is the House of Commons, with a roughly similar distribution of party interests as you get in the House of Commons, and with the single member seats? If that is the kind of Senate we are to have, I suggest it is not the best kind of Senate that we should have for this country.

I have long suggested that if the Senate is to be elected, it should be elected on the system of the single transferable vote. The result of that, as we have seen in other communities, is that it is quite unlikely that any party will have a majority in such a body in a country like Canada. In fact, we may not even have a majority in the House of Commons next time with the single member seats as they elect them in that chamber now. That is a distinct possibility. However, if we were to have the single transferable vote for the election of members of the Senate, I guarantee that no party would have a majority in this house. It would be a house of minorities. Regional groups that do not now have any representation here at all would have some representation then.

It would be, in that sense, a good idea, but it is only possible, in my opinion, if this body refrains from asking for the right to be a confidence body. The minute it asks to be a confidence body and have the right to rule on the financial matters in connection with supply, that very fact itself will mean that no one can be sure of any stability with respect to the Government of Canada because no one party will control this house. Varying coalitions will be formed from time to time on various special issues, no doubt, and the life of the government will be tenuous in the extreme. No one will be able to predict how long it will stay in office. If you face that kind of a situation, then it really makes you concentrate on this question of confidence.

It seems to me that to get an elected house of the kind I would prefer, namely elected by the single transferable vote so that there is a much broader representation of the various interest groups in this country than is possible in any other way—and that is the way to go—but the trade off and the sacrifice we must make, if it is a sacrifice, is to agree that this will not be a confidence body under those circumstances. If you accept that line of argument, then you are forced back onto the principle that is being laid out in the constitutional proposals that are before us, namely that this body should not be able to defeat the budgetary propositions of the government. Once that is done, we become a confidence body.

So we have a dilemma. I do not think it is insoluble. I think my honourable friend has been well advised to raise the matter here. This is a good place to talk about it and to indicate to us the difficulties which he foresees if this question of the business of supply becomes one in which we do not exercise a vote. I express my opinion that it is difficult to see any way around that if we are to stick to the principle of the confidence body being the House of Commons. However, it is not difficult to devise ways and means by which members of this house could express their views. That, probably, is the issue that we should concentrate on at the present time.

I have to tell the house, and it is probably obvious, that I had no intention of intervening in this debate because I did not know what was to be said, but having heard the very interesting proposition put forward by my honourable friend, he stimulated me to make these remarks.

Senator MacEachen: May I just make an interrogation in the form of a statement? The argument advanced by Senator Roblin is that if, for example, a majority in the Senate defeated the $18 million for Newfoundland financial assistance, that would be a matter of confidence. In other words, because those financial items flow from the Main Estimates, therefore they become a matter of confidence. However, when I contemplate the comments made by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, I find that the new, elected Senate, for example, would have the authority to defeat a tax bill such as the GST, and it would not be a matter of confidence. I think, therefore, that we have to sort of open our minds and try to grapple with this, possibly in a new context rather than relying on the linear tradition.

When I consider, for example, accepting these constitutional proposals, and if the elected Senate, for example, did defeat the unemployment insurance bill, which it would be able to do under these powers, that would not be a confidence measure. I think it becomes an artificial distinction, really, that with these powers the new, elected Senate could have defeated the unemployment insurance bill which came as a result of a constitutional amendment agreed to by all the provinces. We could defeat that sort of bill, but we could not deal with what we would consider to be more ordinary financial measures.

I find myself wavering on this. The new Senate will get so much power, but it will not have power to grapple with, in some cases, direct regional issues which come through the Main Estimates. I think that we must all push our minds ahead. Senator Roblin has done it on the single transferable vote, which is quite radical, but I think we have to do it elsewhere. How do you relate all of that to the GST, to the UI bill, to other big items that we could defeat which would be so critical to a government, much more significant politically than some of these items which we would never be able to address? What I am thinking about is that we have to try to pull out of these financial measures items of a regional character.

Senator Roblin: I would be delighted to answer that question. In the sense that my friend has made a statement, maybe I would be allowed to make a following statement. He has a point. It is a very difficult point. When I heard that the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs had declared that the Senate under the new rules could have thrown out the GST bill, my hair stood on end because I simply could not reconcile that with other questions that were involved in the Constitution. I suspect he might have to revisit that question to see what the right answer might be. However, the area that is opened up is fascinating.

I will give you my solution: My solution is that the question of confidence is much overworked in the House of Commons. My solution is that every bill that a government submits should not be a question of confidence. I think that we should devise a set of rules as to what confidence really means in terms of legislation in the House of Commons, and I am afraid it would probably include financial bills. It would probably include matters which have been covered by general election campaigns, and it would also probably include specific policies which the government declared to be matters of confidence. It seems to me that I would go behind the present rules and examine the question of confidence to see how far we had to carry that principal without making everyone in the Parliament of Canada a trained seal, as they say.

I think we have gone far too far in designating everything that the government brings in as a matter of confidence. For example, the gun bill—

Senator MacEachen: Is confidence not what the government declares to be confidence?

Senator Roblin: Yes, but Parliament should have something to say about the limitations with respect to that idea, otherwise everything becomes a matter of confidence—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, speaking about limitations, both honourable senators have had their allotted time. Rule 38(4) states:

> Except as provided in sections (2) and (3) above, no Senator shall speak more than fifteen minutes, inclusive of any question or comments from other Senators which the Senator may permit in the course of his or her remarks.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I think that there is another observation which ought to be added. The discussion has broadened somewhat beyond the point raised originally by Senator MacEachen. If one looks at the proposals made by the government with regard to confidence matters in the House of Commons, one will see that appropriation and taxation bills are to entail confidence, and that questions of confidence are to be limited to certain other bills that the government has identified in advance as central to the government's program.

Let us see how that dovetails with the proposals with regard to the Senate. Senator MacEachen has said that appropriation bills and taxation bills—and there is a problem of definition with respect to taxation—are not to come to the Senate at all. Consequently, we may set that category aside.

Second, there is the category of bills of particular national importance. We are told that the expression means bills such as those relating to defence and international issues. There is to be a veto by the Senate for that category of bills. The Senate is to have a six-month suspensive veto. Third, bills on all other matters can be amended and defeated by the Senate.

The observation I wish to make is that it is quite conceivable that a bill designated as entailing confidence in the House of Commons would fall into the third category in the Senate. That is the category of bills the Senate has a right to defeat.

I think both Senator MacEachen and Senator Roblin are quite correct when they say that this is an important question and it is highly desirable that our thinking be clarified on it before support for the proposals as they are now moves forward and the public becomes committed to those particular proposals.

I want to make one or two other points. The colloquium that took place a moment ago was extremely enlightening. Notice, honourable senators, what came to be discussed. It was not the nature of federalism that came to be discussed; rather, it was the nature of confidence and of responsible government.

An elected Senate will be the federal house of a bicameral parliament. There is no problem with that. The problems as I see them relate to an exact definition of responsible government, and to an exact and accepted understanding as to the nature and limits of the mandate a government achieves when it obtains a majority in the House of Commons. What is the definition of its mandate?

Moreover, as Senator MacEachen has said, what does confidence entail? As he points out, if a government can carry on notwithstanding that a bill such as the unemployment insurance bill has been defeated, but feels obliged to resign or bring on an election because some item in the Estimates, perhaps a few thousand dollars, have been rejected, either here or in the House of Commons, then, surely, we need to get behind the facade of the word "confidence". I propose that these terms should be defined.

What do we mean by responsible government? That is a lively and relevant question now. What do we mean by the government's mandate? What do we mean by confidence? Until these terms have clear meanings, we will never succeed in devising a system in which an elected Senate can be compatible with responsible government.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I do not want to contribute at any length to this marvellous debate. However, I would like to make two points to which we will return when the appropriate time comes.

Senator Roblin raises the issue of confidence, and argues in favour of the continuation of the British parliamentary tradition as it applies to the upper chamber, a tradition which has evolved over the last 120 years. I believe that this issue of confidence is itself at question in discussions on the reform of the Senate and will be put again and again.

Senator Stewart has raised some of the other matters that will be debated. If we look at other federal institutions, we see that the question of confidence is handled quite differently from that which has been our custom. For example, in Australia, the Whitlam government fell because a budgetary matter would not be passed by the Australian Senate. There has been no reform of the powers of the Australian Senate since that time. The debate in that country has left those powers and the question of confidence shared between the two houses. I suggest that this house examine most carefully that particular precedent before it settles on the question of confidence.

Then there is the practice of the federal Parliament of Germany and its upper house. Members here will be familiar with the fact that the upper house represents the interests of the Länder, and that the Länder and the upper house have a large say in the federal appropriation process within the German federal state.

Senator Roblin: But they are not elected.

Senator Austin: As Senator Roblin mentions, they are not elected directly, although—

Senator Roblin: They are civil servants.

Senator Austin: They are appointed. They can be a combination of civil servants or elected members of the Länder.

There are a number of precedents, and the opening of the question concerning the powers of the Senate—and that is what has been discussed in the most fascinating way for the last few minutes—opens a Pandora's box which, indeed, will not be closed easily.

The second point I want to make with respect to Senator Roblin's comments is that it should not be taken for granted that the premiers in the western provinces are uninterested in the question of confidence, or are committed to the continuation of the present parliamentary practice here in Ottawa. I believe that in the negotiations with respect to the nature and character of an upper house senators will see western premiers with a different view of the powers which the upper house should be given and the way in which it should dispose of those powers.

Honourable senators, I will not continue the debate. I simply give notice that these are additional issues that will be debated.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, with some risk, I wish to say a few words on this subject. In Ontario, the question of responsible government versus elected government, as some may well know, was a big issue in the 1850s. That was at a time when it was clear that the union government in Canada was failing. There were many debates because an important group of Ontario reformers of the day supported elective government—in other words, the U.S. system. It became a strong debate at the time. The group of reformers that prevailed was the group that decided that Canada should reject the elective government system and keep the responsible government system. As I understand it—and I think Senator Stewart's point that we should understand the definition is extremely important—a responsible government means that the government is responsible to the elected members of the legislature and not directly to an electorate, as had happened in the United States.

• (1530)

However, when you read the proposals for Senate reform in the document that is being studied by the Constitution committee, you realize that nobody seems to have actually tried to work out what kind of system of government we have in Canada. When we adopted the federal system in 1867, and we adopted the system of having an appointed upper house, one of the reasons that was done was because of the argument between the majority who supported representative government and those who supported the elective American system.

Even to-day, many people, when they talk of an elected Senate, immediately look to the U.S. and say that their Senate seems to work better than many second chambers in federal states. We say that, and it may well be true, but we say it without looking at the actual fundamentals of how Canadian parliamentary government has developed since the time of Lord Durham—and we forget that the first attempt was a failure. It failed utterly. There was a total deadlock and Canada could not govern itself, probably starting in 1858.

Senator Stewart: That is not true of Nova Scotia.

Senator Stollery: But the two Canadas, the union government that I am talking about, Senator Stewart. The union government was Ontario and Quebec, and it failed totally. I do not think that any member here wants to see us get into the next Constitution—or whatever it is that we are doing—without thinking it through, because, just as happened in the 1840s and 1850s, we may well have another total failure. In that event, it will not be just a question of Quebec separation. There will be much more serious consequences, because each part of the country will feel failed if we do not go about this exercise in an orderly and logical fashion.

Honourable senators, I really only rose to emphasize what I see as the importance of Senator Stewart's observations of the need to define what kind of government we have. In the proposals, that is not done. Whoever wrote the proposals does not appear to me to have the slightest idea of Canadian constitutional history, which did not just start in 1867.

We need to begin by understanding how to adapt a federal system to a representative government which, after all, started off in an unitary state. If we do not clearly understand what we are doing when we devise a second house, a federal house to represent regional interests—and as I say, I do not think the architects of this paper have the foggiest idea of Canadian constitutional development—if we do not understand, then I think we run the severe and serious risk of failing Canadians, just as they were failed before in the case of Upper and Lower Canada. The failure that was introduced into the system was not seen until about 1855 or 1858, when it was clear that the system could not possibly work, and the country had become ungovernable. If we do not effect this cponstitutional change in an orderly and organized fashion, understanding what we are doing, we will just repeat the performance that has already taken place in Canada.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I want to thank Senator MacEachen for bringing this matter forward. I think it is extremely fitting that we should be discussing this matter at this time, as the joint committee charged by the two houses to look at a renewed Canada is presumably doing work on the reform of the Senate, and, I presume, as some civil servants somewhere in the back room are concocting the new Senate, I think it is extremely important that we have this debate here.

Because of the fact that Senator MacEachen has mentioned that the committee which I had the honour to co-chair, presented its report in January 1984, and because at times there are references to it in the government proposals, I want to make some very clear positions. That report was a compromise, inevitably, as all reports are. The committee itself was structured with ten members from the House of Commons and eight members from the Senate, so obviously the House of Commons had the majority and, thereby, the final say.

As an aside, I think we in this chamber ought to consider whether in fact we should participate in joint committees where the House of Commons dominates. I really do not know why we should. I do not know why there should not be equal participation. It is true that they have larger numbers, but they have no more responsibility, except that they are elected and we are not. Under the Constitution, essentially, these are two separate houses, each standing each on its own feet. However, I think we should review the idea, that, because there are more members over there than there are here in this chamber, they are automatically entitled to have more members on a joint committee. We should regard it as being two houses joining together, not as 295 members of Parliament and 103 senators, or whatever we are right now.

As I say, that committee at that time was dominated—and that may be too strong a word, but certainly the majority of members was from the House of Commons. I might point out, by the way, that there are still a number of senators here who were on that committee. Senator Doody, Senator Leblanc (Saurel), Senator Lewis, Senator Lucier and Senator Tremblay all sat on that committee. I think they would agree with me that we did not get things all our own way as representing the Senate, nor did we get our own individual ways. I want to make that very clear. If the report is to be taken by the government as reflecting the views of the Senate, that is not quite correct. Certainly, the report does not reflect my views in every respect.

I might refer to one of the comments made by Senator Roblin regarding the method of election. That item was pushed by the members of the House of Commons, who insisted that they be first past the post. I was much more in favour of the preferential system because I think that would give much better representation. I think the majority of my colleagues from the Senate were also of like mind—I see Senator Doody shaking his head. In that event, then, we would have lost the vote in any case, but my own preference was not for "First past the post." However, that is what the committee decided, that is what we have.

We come then to the question of powers. That is really the essential element on which we have to turn. My friends from the west always speak about the three "Es"—equal, elected and effective. I have grave doubts that we will ever be equal. I do not think we will get the two biggest provinces to agree to that one. I am much more concerned about the effective "E", that the Senate have sufficient power to do its essential job, and that essential job is regional representation. That is why the Senate was created in the first place. That is really the direction in which this committee worked. I think the majority of senators who sat on that committee were of that view, that this is what we had to look at.

When we talk of power, where does the final power reside? It resides in the control of the money. If you have no control over the money, you have no control over anything from a governing perspective. Senator Roblin says we could talk. Yes, we could talk, but that is one of the things that infuriates western Canadians with respect to the present setup in the House of Commons. Yes, our members come down here and talk, but when it comes down to the crunch the majority from the central provinces dominate.

Therefore talk is not enough. You have to have the power to act. That power resides in the control over the money. Senator Roblin says that that goes to the essence of responsible government and of confidence. In his reply to Senator MacEachen, he said—I think quite properly—that we have to decide what really are the elements of confidence. I do not necessarily agree that if the Senate were to use its power to refuse the spending of money, that would automatically mean the defeat of the government. For me, confidence means a situation where, for example, the government says, "We are defeated, we must go to an election." I do not think that that necessarily works.

A great deal depends, of course, on the length of time during which the Senate may exert its power. We are talking about a total veto when, if we refuse to pass a money bill or refuse to pass supply, that is automatically a permanent veto. I think we should look at it differently; that we should have the power for a certain time period or under certain conditions. In past years when we have talked about having a suspensive veto it has normally been in terms of time, either six months, nine months or some many days, and so on.

After having lived through some of the debates in this chamber—for example the one on the drug bill, which lasted a very long time before the government received it, the unemployment insurance bill, which again lasted a long time before the government received it or, indeed, the GST—I do not think it is enough to say that the period should be six months. Our experience in those three cases was that the Senate objected, the Senate reacted but pure time was not sufficient, since the government waited us out. I think we should look at this business of how we deal with the two houses in a different way. For example, I think we should look at joint sessions of the two houses where if the Senate refuses to pass, say, a supply bill or if the Senate has not passed the bill within a certain period of time, then the two houses would get together and vote.

Indeed, I think we could look at another measure—and I know this will be heresy to many. Perhaps if that kind of deadlock occurred where a bill had gone back and forth, we could have not only a joint session but one with a secret ballot. Just think what that would have meant in the case of the GST. After the Senate had objected to the GST for a certain period of time—which we did—if we could not have reached agreement we could have had a joint meeting with the House of Commons and held a secret ballot.

Senator Roblin: Not a secret ballot.

Senator Molgat: I am not surprised that there are objections. Think what it would have meant to the people of Canada. I predict that had there been a joint meeting of the Senate and the House of Commons, the GST would not have passed.

Senator Doody: Nor the National Energy Program.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps the country would have been better off if we had not passed the National Energy Program either and perhaps the country would be better off if we had not passed the GST. In those instances, the views of Canadians would have been expressed. That is not what happened with the GST, even though Canadians did not want it.

I agree with Senator Roblin that we should clarify what we mean by confidence and get it down on paper. However, the Senate, in my view, has to retain power over money bills. So I did not agree with that part of the report of our committee.

As far as I am concerned, the Senate should retain the powers we have now. They should be suspensive, but in reference to the six month formula, that is not enough. We have to find another mechanism to express the views of this house and the other house and I think joint sessions are the proper method to follow.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Roblin: That is what they do in Australia.

Senator Molgat: I share the concern of Senator MacEachen. I do not think we should move away from supply because that would mean that, in the final analysis, the Senate would not be able to do the things we need to do for our regions.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, may I inform the chamber that if Senator Lynch-Staunton speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate at second reading.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to this most interesting intellectual exercise, which I know all of us have been most privileged to share. I hope that it can be continued, perhaps under a different item, because some valuable ideas have been shared by people with so much experience. I want to thank Senator MacEachen for using the Estimates to debate his points.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES, AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULE STANDS

On Motion No. 7:

> That pursuant to rule 3 which supports practice, and based on rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, as it is a matter of universal privilege, and of profound constitutional significance, therefore the Senate's vote upon Order No. 2 under Other Business, being a resolution to rescind the adoption of the present rules as resolved on June 18, 1991, with less than two-thirds majority at that time, in contravention of then-rule 47(2), will be resolved in the affirmative, though without thereby setting a precedent of general practice, if a simple majority of voting Senators assent.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I wonder if Motion No. 7 has any validity, since the motion it refers to has just been stood on the fifteenth day and therefore will not reappear on our agenda. Perhaps we could leave that with the Speaker for a ruling.

Notice of Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker, pro tempore: It is moved by Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) that the Senate do now adjourn. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: On a point of order, I am sorry that I arrived late.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): We have adjourned.

Senator Haidasz: I thought I would get the opportunity to speak to my two motions on the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: We called your items and you were not here. We are in the process of adjourning.

Senator Haidasz: Well, I can speak tomorrow to those motions.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

CANADIAN AUTOMOBILE ASSOCIATION

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES FOR 1991-92

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Yesterday, all hon. senators received a "Statement of Principles for 1991-92" from the Canadian Automobile Association, but all senators do not read everything that we get every day in the office—it is impossible.

I think that the federal government, together with the provinces, should not only read the CAA's priority recommendations but also act, especially on the statement concerning a national highway policy, expressed as follows:

> The federal and provincial governments should establish a national highway policy for the establishment of a primary network of national roads and the improvement and expansion of the network according to a strategic plan, in order to meet national and regional needs.
> Funding should be part of this policy, which must recognize: the economic importance of an efficient highway system for the whole country; the need not to charge tolls, which contribute to congestion and delay traffic and have a negative impact on tourism and transportation.
> Funding in addition to that allocated for road development is necessary to pursue a national highway policy. This funding should come from current tax revenue, applied on a broader base.

In response to many statements that I have made in the Senate in the past four years, Senator Murray has said that the government was dealing with this issue, considering it and waiting for reports.

I believe that action must be taken as soon as possible. It is time that the federal and provincial governments agreed. Drivers' lives depend on it. The regions' prosperity also depends on it.

Thank you, honourable senators.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 59(1)(h), I move:

THAT when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 3rd December, 1991, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, about an hour and a half ago this side of the chamber was alerted by the other place to the possibility that, by unanimous consent, certain legislation would pass through all three stages in the House today and be sent here for the same procedure.

At this moment, and after discussion with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition who has been informed of these developments, it is my understanding that there is as yet no agreement between the House Leaders in the other place to allow this process to take place. I need not at this stage go into the details of the proposed legislation, except to say that it involves an amendment to the Canada Labour Code, which, if passed, would allow for the resumption of negotiations between employers and employees, the employees being longshoremen in the Trois-Rivières-Bécancour area.

It is a highly technical bill. However, as soon as it is passed it will allow the resumption of negotiations that have been stalled for some time. At this point all I can say is that there is this possibility. I do not know whether it is a remote possibility, but, on the other hand, it is certainly not an assured one. As soon as I have more information, I will be pleased to inform this chamber.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, December 3, 1991, I will move:

> THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

RULES OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO RESCIND CURRENT RULES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 64(2), I hereby give notice that within at least five days of sitting of the Senate I shall move the rescission of the current rules on the basis of their unconstitutionality.

I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel):

> That pursuant to section 18 of the BNA Act, which precludes major changes to privilege without Act of Parliament, and which at all events precludes elevating a member's immunities, powers, or privilege above the corresponding immunities, powers, or privileges held by other members in this House or in the British Parliament, and in consideration of Senate Rule 3 which supports practice, based on Senate Rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, and as the empowerment of the Senate Speaker by the current rules 1 and 18 threatens universal privilege in the Senate, and is of profound constitutional significance; therefore, the Senate resolves to rescind the adoption of the present rules as occurred on June 18, 1991, through simple majority resolution to adopt the report of the Senate Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders as tabled in the Senate on June 11, 1991.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ADDRESS ECONOMIC ILLS—EFFECTIVENESS OF GOVERNMENT PLANNING—REQUEST FOR RESPONSE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, last Wednesday, Nwovember 20, in speaking to an inquiry about Canada's economic problems, I raised a number of questions to which the Leader of the Government replied in a number of ways. I quote from page 570 of Debates of the Senate. He said:

> Honourable senators, the government has an economic plan. The economic plan is working.

He went on to say:

> The targets set out in the budget of February 1991 are being achieved.

Well, the Minister of Finance has said on a number of occasions that the government has set out an economic plan and that it is right on target.

I wish, therefore, to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government this question: If the government's deliberate economic plan is right on target, perhaps the Leader of the Government could come to the chamber with some of the consequences of this policy that the government expects to see.

• (1420)

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce sent out a news release a couple of days after that, I think on November 22, which said, "The national economic crisis is upon us." They go on to say that the difficulty and privation now present in the Canadian economy belies that, and they say that "Canada's real growth performance will fall far short of the federal government's forecasts."

Can we then have a revised forecast of the number of bankruptcies the government expects next month and next quarter, and an indication of whether or not they still believe that they are right on target as far as what they have deliberately set out to do to the economy since February, 1991?

Senator Perrault: Good question.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes, and much better than the answer you are going to get. You will have noticed, honourable senators, the absence of the Leader of the Government. He will not be here this afternoon. I will not be so presumptuous as to pretend that I can answer for him. Therefore, I will take good note of the questions and draw them to his attention, hoping that he will reply next week. That goes for any further questions as well.

Senator Lefebvre: Give it a try; break the ice.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have noted the absence of the Leader of the Government, but I suggest that his priority is to be here in his place, at least for the opening of Question Period in the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Doody: He did not know you would be here.

Senator Bonnell: He is quite sure I am here because I am always here. I ask the Deputy Leader to bring the suggestion to him that he should be here for Question Period. If he has a meeting to go to after that, that is fine. Otherwise, I would suggest that they put Senator Doody in the cabinet so that he can answer.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here!

Senator Doody: Please send a copy of the Debates of the Senate to my banker.

Senator Bonnell: I will send a copy to the Prime Minister, if you so wish. If you cannot put Senator Doody in the cabinet, then I suggest Senator Phillips, because they both have long experience in Parliament. I am quite sure they know the procedures of this house and can get the required answers.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Murray's attendance record here is excelled by very few. This is the first Question Period that he has missed since I have been here. His absence is for very good reason. I do not think the reprimand offered to him by the other side is at all well deserved.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am not here to reprimand him. I am here to tell him where his real duties are. All honourable senators must realize that. If there are other members in the cabinet available, fine. But there is no one here to answer for the Government of Canada today in this whole House of Parliament.

LA FRANCOPHONIE

PARIS CONFERENCE—OMMISSION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FROM PRESENTATION MAP OF CANADA

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I had a few calls today from the CBC asking me if the Leader of the Government in the Senate had any explanation as to why the Francophone conference that took place in Paris neglected to show Prince Edward Island on the map. Could the Deputy Leader get that answer, either from the Prime Minister, who went there promoting that map, or from the Department of External Affairs who put out the map, or from the External Trade Commission who also put out the map. I think it is very important that all provinces of Canada be allowed to trade with the Francophone countries.

The whole province of Prince Edward Island should not have been ommitted from the map. I would like an explanation as to why that happened. Will the map be revised so that Prince Edward Island is put back on that map again?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly seek out the information.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—LOCATION OF CONSTRUCTION HEADQUARTERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I would ask the Deputy Leader for another answer. The Halifax Chronicle on November 23 reported that the Honourable Elmer MacKay, P.C., announced that a spring start is possible for the fixed link to Prince Edward Island if the project clears two hurdles. The two hurdles are environmental and financial. The first hurdle is the submission for approval of three proposals from competing firms to a panel of ice experts. The second hurdle is that after a proposal is environmentally approved, its financial package must be approved.

There is not a word about the hurdle of having the head offices of the company which gets the contract situate in Prince Edward Island. There is not a word about that particular hurdle.

Mr. MacKay also mentions in his press release that there is a third element. It is not a hurdle, just an element. That third element in bringing a project of this kind to reality is the enthusiastic support of P.E.I premier Joe Ghiz. That is only an element, it is not a hurdle.

Perhaps the Deputy Leader could find out for me if there is a third hurdle, namely, that the head office of the construction firm must be in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will look into that matter, honourable senator.

THE ECONOMY

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING—EFFECT ON SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, one can only hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is absent today because he is urgently seeking answers to some of the problems that are besetting the nation and that his absence is not for some trivial or unworthy reason.

I rise to ask a question of the Deputy Leader. Obviously government supporters across Canada, and they dwindle in numbersdaily, are nervous about any kind of question, whether public, private, or in this chamber.

It was reported in British Columbia this week that the retail merchants of that province are losing $1 billion a year in cross-border shopping sales to the United States, and that this is happening from coast to coast. During the GST hearings we warned that if we had a tax regime out of sync with that of the United States we were bound to see serious damage done to the Canadian economy.

Will there be any plan put in operation at some time to save the thousands of retail businesses from coast to coast from haemorrhaging to death as a result of the addled tax policies of this government?

The horror story on cross-border shopping is the same in all of the provinces from coast to coast, be it the Atlantic provinces, central Canada, the west or British Columbia. As I have said, in B.C. there is said to be $1 billion a year in lost retail sales. In British Columbia, some U.S. companies are now putting full-page advertisements in Vancouver newspapers inviting shoppers to come down from Canada and really save money.

Senator Doody: Question.

Senator Perrault: What are you going do about it? That is one of the questions. What are you going to do about it?

Right across the country we are in a very serious situation. The doors and windows of retail establishments are now shuttered from coast to coast. Some border towns are ghost towns.

There was a television program this week in British Columbia featuring an interview with a very prosperous shopping mall developer in Bellingham, Washington. He said that they cannot build facilities fast enough to cope with Canadian sales. He said that 70 per cent of all the business in that shopping centre is by Canadians who go down there to save money and to beat the GST.

How long are we to allow this situation to continue? How long are we going to allow the retail merchants of this country, who are just barely surviving, to haemorrhage away their dollars, their life savings and their careers because the government simply will not recognize the problem?

Yes, there are questions. Have we some game plan? Without a game plan the Toronto Argos could not have won the Grey Cup. In the case of cross-border shopping, there does not seem to be any government game plan at all. Mr. Jelinek, from time to time, makes little inspirational speeches to local chambers of commerce. He claims that the government is concerned about the problem. He says that, after all, the number of bankruptcies has reduced over the past two months. Why is this? Because there are fewer companies around that can go bankrupt. That is the reason the statistics read that way. Thousands of companies are already out of business. There will be no tropical holidays for these bankrupt retailers this winter. So the brief question is: What do you intend to do about it?

• (1430)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I listened carefully to Senator Perrault's statement. His questions are of a rhetorical nature and I think his whole statement would have been better made under Senators' Statements. I do not understand what he is getting at except complaining about a situation with which he appears to be familiar.

Senator Perrault: A rhetorical question! To describe questions regarding the bankruptcy of thousands of Canadian businesses from coast to coast as mere "rhetorical" questions is beyond belief!

Senator MacEachen: He has a hard heart.

Senator Perrault: May I remind government supporters that in a recent poll, sixteen per cent of the people in Canada said that they believed that Elvis Presley is alive and well and living in North America while only 14 per cent say they would vote Conservative in the next election. I would start worrying about that figure if I were you.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is that another question?

UKRAINE

DELEGATION OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS TO ATTEND INDEPENDENCE REFERENDUM

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, it has been brought to my attention that a delegation of members of the other house are leaving for Ukraine to be present in that country on Sunday next, October 1, to witness the voting on a referendum on the question of the independence of Ukraine. I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether any senators are going. If not, why not? Is this trip being financed from the Consolidated Revenue Fund or by private means?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as the honourable senator knows, the Leader of the Government has a briefing book which allows him to find information of this type. The deputy leader has neither the briefing book nor the information in his head. However, I will inquire, and try to have the answer for the honourable senator next week.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS ON CANADIAN MARKETING BOARDS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would ask the deputy leader to take notice of another question. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for International Trade are in Geneva, or at least they were yesterday. The Minister of Agriculture is quoted as saying that he did not get exactly an enthusiastic response to his representations for the retention of the protection provided under article 11 of the GATT. I wonder if the deputy leader would take notice and bring in a reply next week, hopefully on Tuesday, as to exactly what happened, so that some of the people who are dependent on these marketing boards will know precisely what happened?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will do all I can.

CRIMINAL CODE
NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT
YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare, moved the second reading of Bill C-30, to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof.

She said: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to speak in support of this bill to amend the Criminal Code provisions relating to mentally disordered offenders, which is the product of ten years of development and extensive consultation. For too long our criminal law has tended to forget about the mentally disordered offenders, leaving their fate to be determined by the pleasure of the provincial lieutenant governors. We have been fortunate, though, in recent years at least, that the lieutenant governors, aided in most instances by advisory review boards, have exercised their pleasure in a considered and humane way.

Little credit for that can be attributed to the Criminal Code provisions which are terribly out of date, show little concern for the rights of the mentally disordered persons appearing before the criminal courts and leave many practical problems unanswered. Today I would like to deal with some of those shortcomings and show how this bill that we have before us would improve the situation, not only for the mentally disordered accused but for the public as well.

One of the problems with the current legislation provisions is that they are simply out of date. For the most part they are borrowed from English legislation dating from the latter half of the nineteenth century. The language is Victorian, as are the concepts underlying the provisions. The terms "insanity" and "natural imbecility" are no longer used by psychiatrists, who prefer to use the term "mental disorder"; the concept of insane delusions is a separate form of mental disorder, for which a separate provision is required as is the case now in subsection 16(3) of the Criminal Code. It has been discredited, and the rule that requires that persons who are found to be either "unfit to stand trial on account of insanity", or "not guilty on account of insanity", be held in custody "until the pleasure of the Lieutenant Governor of the province is known", is at best anachronistic.

The bill that is before us modernizes the law by using the term "mental disorder", and by eliminating the unnecessary provisions regarding "insane delusions". More importantly, it does away with the role of the provincial Lieutenant Governor in this process, transferring the decision-making power in respect of the care and detention of the mentally disordered accused persons to an expert review board, chaired in most instances by a judge or a retired judge.

The Criminal Code has for some years contained a section permitting the creation of a board to review, and the making of recommendations with respect to cases of persons being held under the authority of the Lieutenant Governor. Such boards have been created in most provinces, and the experience with them indicates that their creation should be made mandatory in all provinces and territories. Moreover, as the ones who hear the evidence have direct contact with the mentally disordered person during the hearing and have the expertise to determine the appropriate disposition, they should be making the decisions, rather than merely advising the Lieutenant Governor.

I will not go into detail concerning the operation of the review boards under the proposed legislation. Let me simply say that with this legislation, the reconstituted boards will provide better protection for the rights of both the mentally disordered and the general public.

This leads me to a second group of problems associated with the existing law, namely, that it displays little regard for the rights of the mentally disordered. Let me give a few illustrations.

Section 615 of the Criminal Code empowers the court to order that the accused be remanded in custody for up to 30 days—indeed, in extraordinary circumstances for up to 60 days—for psychiatric observation in order to assist the court in determining whether the accused is unfit to stand trial on account of insanity. While the law does state that this is a maximum period, and that a remand in custody is not required, in the great majority of cases the courts do in fact remand the accused in custody for 30 days. But experts agree that an assessment of whether a person is fit or unfit to stand trial can be done in a very short period of time, and a couple of days is normally ample. Therefore, in most cases, the additional 28 days is completely unnecessary.

Not only does this extra time on remand in custody cost the public purse a great deal of money and tie up hospital facilities that are in scarce supply, but it also constitutes a major interference with the freedom of the accused who, but for this order, in most instances would be released pending trial. Nor is this concern with the freedom of the accused a purely abstract or theoretical one, for detention in custody may also interfere with a person's family life, livelihood or education.

The proposed legislation deals with this problem by setting a time limit of five days, exclusive of holidays, for a fitness examination, unless the prosecutor and the defence agree on a longer period. In order to accommodate the special needs of remote areas, this five-day period is also exclusive of travel time to and from the place where the assessment is to take place.

The bill also contains two other protections for the accused. First, it provides that the order for an assessment is non-custodial, unless the court is satisfied that one of the prescribed criteria for a custodial remand is met. Second, it limits the absolute right of the prosecution to apply for a fitness remand to cases that are being prosecuted by way of indictment—that is to say, serious cases. In other cases, the prosecution may only apply for a fitness remand where the issue has been raised by the accused, or the prosecution alleges that there are substantial reasons to doubt that the accused is fit to stand trial.

Another problem exists in relation to the admissibility of statements that the accused may have made to the psychiatrist or others in the assessment team during the course of a fitness evaluation. Under the present law, such statements are generally admissible in evidence against the accused, even though he or she may have thought that they were being made in confidence. Although it may be surprising to some honourable senators, statements made in the course of a doctor-patient relationship are not considered to be confidential for purposes of the criminal law, and therefore the doctor may be compelled to testify as to what his or her patient told him. Such statements could, of course, have disastrous effects upon the case for the defence at trial. As a result of this risk, there is a tendency for defence lawyers to advise their clients to say nothing to the examining psychiatrist, and this, of course, undermines the whole purpose of court-ordered examinations. Therefore the current law is neither fair nor practical.

The proposed law remedies the situation by declaring that statements made by the accused to a psychiatrist or others during the course of a court-ordered psychiatric examination are inadmissible in evidence without the consent of the accused. There are exceptions to this general rule. Since the purpose of the assessment is to determine the fitness of the accused to stand trial, it would be illogical to exclude statements which help the court to answer that question. However, they should be admissible only for that purpose and not for the purpose of establishing the guilt of the accused.

There are other exceptions which are designed to discourage the accused from committing perjury, or telling a different story to the court than he told to the psychiatrist. These exceptions only apply if the accused testifies at his trial. So the proposed amendments provide protection for the accused, but at the same time are designed to prevent the accused from positively misleading the court.

A third example of how the present law shows little regard for the rights of the accused is its lack of guidance on the procedures which are to be followed in assessing what to do with the accused while he or she is "awaiting the pleasure of the Lieutenant Governor." The Criminal Code leaves it to the Lieutenant Governor to determine whether the accused should be detained in "safe custody", or whether "it would be in the best interests of the accused and not contrary to the interest of the public" to discharge the accused, either absolutely or subject to such conditions as the Lieutenant Governor may prescribe in subsection 617(1) of the Criminal Code. However, the Criminal Code imposes no criteria for exercising this discretion, requires no regular hearing—in fact requires no hearing at all—and does not provide for an appeal. It is true that section 619 of the Criminal Code sets out certain procedural rules with respect to the holding of hearings by an advisory review board. However, these are minimal, and in any case, as I mentioned earlier, there is no obligation under the present law to set up a review board. Even if one is set up, the Lieutenant Governor is not bound to follow its recommendations.

The only bright spot, as far as the mentally disordered accused is concerned, is that the courts recently have imposed a requirement on the review boards to act fairly, and they have placed an onus on the Lieutenant Governor to assure that the procedure before the board was fair.

The proposed legislation provides much more protection for the mentally disordered accused. It sets out a greater range of dispositions which can be made, and it says that the one that is the least restrictive so far as the accused is concerned should be chosen, so long as it is consistent with the protection of the public. It sets out basic rules of procedure to be followed, to assure that the procedure will be fair and will be applied with a greater degree of uniformity across the country than has been the case in the past. It eliminates the role of the Lieutenant Governor in relation to the mentally disordered accused, transferring the decision-making power to the review boards, and it makes the establishment of review boards mandatory in all provinces and territories.

Undoubtedly the most fundamental problem with the present system of keeping a mentally disordered person in custody until "the pleasure of the Lieutenant Governor is known" is that the custody could continue indefinitely. The bill imposes an outer limit or "cap" on the length of time a mentally disordered accused can be held under the authority of the criminal law. Thus, there is a cap of "life" for murder, because the minimum sentence for murder is life imprisonment; for offences involving danger to the lives or safety of persons, or threatening the security of the state, the cap is the lesser of 10 years or the maximum sentence for the offence; and for all other offences, the cap is the lesser of two years or the maximum sentence.

There may be some cases where the behaviour of the accused is marked by repetitive or persistent aggression, or the offence itself was of such a brutal nature that if the accused were sane and had been convicted, it would have been appropriate for the Attorney General to ask the court to find the accused a "dangerous offender" and to impose an indeterminate sentence.

The bill will allow the Attorney General to make a similar application in relation to persons found "not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder"; and if the court is satisfied that the accused should be designated a "dangerous mentally disordered accused", the 10-year cap will be increased to a maximum of life. The transitional provisions of the bill allow similar applications to a commissioner in relation to mentally disordered accused who are on Lieutenant Governor's warrants at the time this bill comes into force.

It should be understood, of course, that the cap, just like a sentence, is an outer limit, and the person may be released earlier if the review board is satisfied that he or she no longer constitutes a danger to the public. On the other hand, unlike a sentence, if at the time the outer limit is reached the individual still is dangerous on account of mental disorder, that person can be committed to a hospital under the authority of the provincial mental health legislation. Hence there is greater protection for the public in relation to the mentally disordered accused than in relation to the sane offender.

I think that the capping provisions represent a very fine compromise between the need to protect the rights of the mentally disordered accused and the need to provide adequate protection for the public. They provide a greater degree of equivalence in the way in which the criminal law treats the sane offender and the mentally disordered, in a manner consistent with the "equality" section of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. They recognize the appropriate roles of the federal and provincial governments in relation to "criminal law" and "health" respectively. In order to give the provinces the opportunity to modify their mental health legislation to dovetail with the new federal legislation, the Minister of Justice has assured her provincial counterparts that the proclamation of the capping provisions will be delayed for a reasonable length of time.

Finally, there is another problem area that is not dealt with in the existing legislation and which the bill addresses in a unique way. It is the question of hospital orders. In some instances the accused is found fit to stand trial, is convicted, but at the time of sentencing is found to be suffering from a mental disorder in an acute phase, which if not treated immediately is likely to result in a significant deterioration in the mental or physical health of the offender, or in the offender causing serious bodily harm to himself or others. At the present time the court has no power to order that the offender be sent to a hospital or other treatment facility. All that the judge can do is to make a recommendation to the authorities in charge of the prison where the offender is to serve her or his sentence that appropriate psychiatric care be provided to the offender on an urgent basis.

As a result of advice received during a very extensive consultation process, the government is proposing to give the courts the power to order that the offender spend up to the first 60 days of his sentence receiving treatment in a hospital or other treatment facility, at the end of which time he or she would be transferred to the prison to complete their sentence, unless some other arrangement were made between the prison and the hospital for further care and treatment. Thus, what is proposed in the bill is a relatively short period of treatment designed to stabilize the offender's mental condition so that it does not pose a threat either to the offender or to others.

There are other differences as well. The Canadian proposal, unlike the United Kingdom one, would require the consent of the offender and the hospital before such an order for treatment could be made; the British scheme only requires the consent of the hospital. The Canadian proposal would limit the availability of hospital orders to situations where the mental disorder was in an "acute phase", requiring immediate treatment on an urgent basis; the British scheme allows an order to be made where "appropriate". The Canadian proposal has more exclusions: Those serving a term of imprisonment of less than 60 days or serving a sentence on an intermittent basis and those whose term of imprisonment is imposed in default of complying with an order to pay a fine or an amount by way of restitution.

Despite these limitations on the application of the order proposal, a number of the provinces expressed concern that this implementation might have serious financial implications for them. The Minister of Justice has therefore proposed to her provincial counterparts that the proclamation of the hospital order scheme on a national basis be deferred, and that instead it be proclaimed in one or two provinces which are willing to have it implemented on a pilot project basis. This would allow the scheme to be assessed and evaluated in operation over a two to three year period before a decision is taken to implement it nationally.

There is a great deal more that we could say about this bill, for not only is it a large bill, but it also represents a major social advance in the way in which we deal with the mentally disordered who have come into contact with the law. I urge honourable senators to give this important legislation speedy passage so it can be implemented in the shortest possible time, particularly in light of the short extension—until February 5, 1992—given to Parliament by the Supreme Court of Canada as a result of an application by the Federal Government to extend the original six month period set out by the court in Swain versus the Queen.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like the clerk to revert to the Orders of Business and call the report of the banking committee at this stage.

INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL
COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATION BILL
TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES BILL
BANK BILL

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (subject matter of Bill C-28, the Insurance Companies Bill; Bill C-34, the Cooperative Credit Association Bill; Bill C-4, the Trust and Loan Companies Bill; and Bill C-19, the Bank Bill).

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I had the pleasure earlier today of presenting the report of the pre-study by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-28, Bill C-34, Bill C-4 and Bill C-19. These four bills—which are now going through the final stages of third reading debate in the other place—propose nothing less than a radical change in the framework within which financial institutions in Canada will operate.

I do not wish to discuss today the substance of the report of the pre-study, nor the issues raised by the legislation. There will be time enough for that when the bills are officially received and debated by the Senate. What I will address is the process involved in the pre-study.

On October 23, 1991, the Deputy Leader of the Government moved that the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to do a pre-study of the four bills dealing with the trust companies, the banks, the insurance companies and the co-operatives. At that time, Bill C-4 and Bill C-19 had already been dealt with at committee stage in the other place, while the other two bills were proceeding rapidly to committee stage.

The Senate Banking Committee, through its major studies of financial regulation in Canada, has played an important role in the form that this legislation has taken. It was important that the Senate have the opportunity to review the final legislation before it left the other place in order to both provide guidance to the government and to ensure that the bills are able to proceed through Parliament in a timely fashion.

Honourable senators, from time to time special situations such as this one arise, situations in which we are called upon to demonstrate flexibility to avoid needless confrontation between this chamber and the other place, and to give us the opportunity to have a positive impact on legislation. After some debate and some indications of reluctance by our colleagues on the other side of this chamber to proceed with the pre-study, we were able to go through a very constructive process. Their cooperation in the committee was appreciated.

● (1500)

The pre-study began with the process of consultation with numerous interested parties—the major industry associations, banks, insurance companies and government officials. It ended with two days of formal hearings with witnesses from the Department of Finance and those major industry groups that wished to appear.

Today, the final report of the pre-study has been tabled. It has proven to be a valuable exercise, one which reaffirms the important role of the Senate in the legislative process. I will have more to say on this issue at a later date when debate on the bills begins officially in the Senate.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

With those remarks, I offer to senators the number and the names of all witnesses who appeared on those two days of committee hearings.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody moved the second reading of Bill C-3, respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to move second reading of Bill C-3, respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of federal real property.

This bill would bring together, in one statute, the general authorities necessary to buy, sell or lease the lands and buildings government departments use in the delivery of programs and services to the Canadian public. These proposals are designed not only to make land transactions more efficient but also simpler and more understandable by the public.

As it stands now, real property legislation at the federal level is highly complex. Federal real estate—and by this I mean not only undeveloped land but also land complete with buildings—is governed by over 60 acts of Parliament. These 60 or more distinct pieces of legislation can be thought of, roughly speaking, as falling into one of three categories: first, those statutes setting out a regulatory policy, such as the Canadian Environmental Protection Act; second, statutes governing departmental programs with major property components, such as the National Parks Act and the Indian Act; third, and most pertinent to us today, those statutes that set out internal government processes and authorities, such as the Financial Administration Act.

Bill C-3 would fall into the last category, as its proposals concern internal government processes. The bill deals with the general authorities needed for the conveyancing of real property used by government departments to deliver programs to Canadians.

The bill covers many transactions, such as purchases, sales, leasing and licensing, easements, mutually agreed upon transfers between departments and between departments and agent corporations, and transfers to and from the provinces.

Currently, three separate and often conflicting statutes govern the way most real property transactions are handled. These statutes are the Public Lands Grants Act, the Public Works Act (Part II) and the Surplus Crown Assets Act. These acts are complex and out of date.

The Public Lands Grants Acts and Part II of the Public Works Act as they apply to real estate transactions are essentially unchanged from the 1890s—100 years ago. We have been operating with a real property regime designed for the horse-and-buggy era dealing with assets that belong to all Canadians. Clearly, it is time that this legislation be modernized.

The third piece of legislation, the Surplus Crown Assets Act, was not designed to deal with land and is totally inadequate to do so.

These statutes do not allow the use of modern real property methods or practices familiar to the private sector. They use different terms to describe the same things and they use different mechanisms to carry out the same kinds of transactions.

In contrast, the proposed federal real property act would enable the government to use the same means to buy or sell property that are used by the public but with appropriate controls in place. This would make it faster and easier for people to deal with the government.

By simplifying and modernizing real property management, these legislative proposals would increase efficiency and property transactions and reduce delays to the public. They would eliminate differences in approach that now exist between the government and the public. In Alberta, we would be able to do things the Albertan way and in Ontario, the Ontario way, and so on.

The bill would give the government the flexibility it needs to be a more efficient manager of real property. It would improve service to the public in a significant way by allowing the government to use modern methods in dealing with Canadians when it buys, sells, leases or transfers land or buildings.

However, it is important to understand that these proposals are limited in scope. I would like to emphasize that they would not affect the management of lands governed by special legislation, such as the Indian Act, the National Parks Act or the Territorial Lands Act. In each case, the specialized legislation would override the proposed Federal Real Property Act.

Nor would these proposals affect the management of lands held by Crown corporations. Crown corporations would continue to manage properties in support of their commercial and public policy objectives under their own legislation, or under the Financial Administration Act.

The bill would, however, apply to the property transactions of about 20 departments of the federal public service that hold land for delivery of programs to Canadians. These holdings cover everything from cultural centres, roads, employment centres, lighthouses, nursing stations, research labs, and farms to airports, penitentiaries, police detachments and embassies. Most of this property, honourable senators, is devoted to providing direct services to the public. It represents the full range of facilities needed to deliver federal government services to Canadians.

In addition to streamlining government procedures to better deal with the general public, the proposed Federal Real Property Act would ensure a consistent and clear accountability regime.

The bill clarifies responsibilities for real property transactions within the federal government. First, a department does not own its real property; it is simply the steward of this property for the Crown. Stewardship carries with it two major responsibilities to the government and to the taxpayers: That is, the responsibility to use the property to deliver government programs during its temporary possession; and the responsibility to manage and maintain the property.

Second, the bill clarifies the role of Treasury Board as a source of central real property management policy and coordination. It provides the board with the powers and authorities to establish a consistent set of policies and regulations governing real property transactions.

Third, the bill clarifies the role of the Minster of Justice as the solicitor to the Crown on real property conveyancing. This underscores the role of the Minister of Justice in ensuring the quality of property transactions.

In conclusion, the legislation we are proposing today clarifies, codifies and simplifies existing practices in legislation to ensure good management of real property transactions. These measures are straightforward. They would clarify and simplify current arrangements for buying, selling, leasing, licensing and transferring federal real property. They are designed to eliminate inconsistencies between laws that treat similar transactions in different ways, and use modern methods in federal land transactions.

Passage of Bill C-3 would improve service to the public by reducing delays and frustration on the part of the public who deal with the government on land transactions. It would reduce the cost and increase the efficiency of how the government manages our properties.

Honourable senators, it is my hope that should this bill pass second reading, it would be referred to a Senate committee for further study. It appears to be a housekeeping bill. However, I have learned over the years to be very leery of housekeeping bills and would recommend it to the committee for study.

• (1510)

The obvious committee to which to refer this bill would be the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. However, I am told that the schedule of that committee is full until well into January. The alternative would be the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, since the Minister of Justice is involved in the administration of the bill. When the appropriate times comes, I would ask the Senate to refer this bill to that committee for consideration.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I intend to adjourn the debate for one of my colleagues, but I would ask Senator Doody if he could let us know as early as possible which committee the bill might go to.

Senator Doody: The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Molgat: I understand that committee is loaded with material, namely, the gun control bill and other legislation.

Senator Doody: I spoke to the chairman, and he assures me that he will treat this bill with the greatest possible expedience.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN GRAINS—ANTICIPATED LOW MONETARY RETURNS—EFFECT ON FARMERS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H.A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of September 17, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the prospects for sale of Canadian grain and the effects on farmers of anticipated low dollar returns from those sales.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words. It is appropriate that I speak on this inquiry, because the Minister of Trade and the Minister of Agriculture are in Geneva today.

The sale of Canadian grain in the international market has been drawn forcibly to the attention of all members of Parliament and all senators by the visit of 100 representatives of the political parties and the farm organizations in western Canada during the last two days. The goverment has not been able as yet, in spite of the efforts of the two ministers, to give any hope to farmers that there will be a change in the policy of the EEC or of the U.S.A. with respect to the export enhancement subsidies that have been used to devastate the grain producers in countries such as Canada, Australia and Argentina. I hope that the ministers will find a way to negotiate. Some days there appears to be hope of a negotiated settlement, and on other days it appears that international grain prices will remain where they are for a long time.

The government has already declared that it does not have any further funds to aid those people who are going bankrupt in the grain and oilseeds sector. We need to resolve this problem.

The other point I wish to make is that the government should take a long-range approach to the problem. Even if the devasting subsidy programs are withdrawn, if the EEC and the United States insist on taking action in the international market to obtain a larger share of the international market, it will not make much difference to the efforts of the Canadian Wheat Board. The Wheat Board will have to adjust its price to meet the competition. Therefore, I hope we can find some basis for negotiation.

A large part of the Canadian economy is in serious financial condition at this time. As late as yesterday, there did not appear to be much hope coming out of the discussions between the Canadian ministers and the representatives of the United States and the EEC as they attempt to find a solution to the competition problem.

This inquiry will probably be transferred to motions. We could perhaps finish the debate on this matter as a later date. At that time, there may be additional clarification as to whether or not those two ministers met with any kind of success in their discussions today.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES, AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULE—SPEAKER'S RULING DEFERRED

On Motion No. 7:

> That pursuant to rule 3 which supports practice, and based on rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, as it is a matter of universal privilege and of profound constitutional significance, therefore the Senate's vote upon Order No. 2 under Other Business, being a resolution to rescind the adoption of the present rules as resolved on June 18, 1991, with less than two-thirds majority at that time, in contravention of then-rule 47(2), will be resolved in the affirmative, though without thereby setting a precendent of general practice, if a simple majority of voting Senators assent.

The Hon. the Speaker: On Senator Haidasz' motion of last day, Senator Lynch-Staunton commented on the procedural acceptability of this motion. The Chair wishes to take this matter under advisement and report back to the Senate at the next sitting.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, pursuant to notice, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters and estimates as referred to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senator, I received a message just a few moments ago to the effect that the bill which I referred to earlier that might have come to us today and which we would have had to deal with expeditiously, will not be introduced in the other place until tomorrow. Therefore, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 3, 1991, at 2 p.m.

- Bill C-28, An Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

- Bill C-19, An Act respecting banks and banking, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereof, has, in obedience to the Order of reference of Wednesday, October 23, 1991, examined the said bills and now reports the same with the following proposed amendments and recommendations.

INTRODUCTION

On Friday November 15, 1991 the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce completed its mandated pre-study of the four bills with intensive public hearings from major interested groups.

These Bills are currently undergoing third reading in the House of Commons. The current Bank Act was last revised over 10 years ago and is due to expire on 1 April 1992 (after receiving a one year extension from its original expiry date of 31 march 1991); legislation governing the other financial institutions, the trust and loan companies, the insurance companies and the co-operative societies, has not undergone any major revision in more than 50 years.

The financial services industry and the public await the radical restructuring of the framework within which financial institutions in Canada will operate. The goals of the reform include :

1. Consumer Protection and Financial Institutions Stability

. improving consumer protection,
. ensuring the soundness of financial institutions and the stability of the financial system,
. controlling self-dealing and
. guarding against abuses of conflict-of-interest.

2. Enhancing Competition

- promoting competition and efficiency,
- enhancing the convenience and options available to consumers in the marketplace,
- broadening the source of credit available to individuals and businesses and
- promoting international competitiveness and economic growth.

3. Federal-Provincial Considerations

- promoting the harmonization of federal and provincial regulatory policies.

After many years of trying and several false starts the federal government finally submitted its major pieces of financial legislation for consideration by Parliament. The Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has had a major role in shaping federal financial policy toward financial institutions and the legislation now before Parliament bears witness to this influence. Many of the recommendations of the Committee's May 1986 report, "Towards a More Competitive Financial Environment" and its May 1990 report "Canada 1992 -- Toward a National Market in Financial Services" have been reflected in the legislation.

Regarding the ownership of financial institutions, the Committee recommended that a stand-alone trust company may be wholly owned, no matter what the size. However if it is part of a commercial or financial conglomerate, 35 per cent of its shares must be traded within a reasonable period of time. If a newly-created trust company is subject to the Committee's 35 per cent rule, it would have ten years to meet the requirement.

Section 379 of Bill C-4 requires that a company with equity, including minority interests in its subsidiaries, of $750 million or more take steps to ensure that at least 35 per cent of total voting rights of the company are attached to shares both widely held and belonging to classes listed for public trading on a recognised stock exchange. (A similar requirement applies to Schedule II banks in Bill C-19 and to insurance companies in Bill C-28.)

Since stand-alone trust companies tend to be small, the government has, for all practical purposes, followed the Committee's recommendation. With respect to large trust companies, which do tend to be part of conglomerates, the government required a 35 per cent float as the Committee had recommended.

With respect to banks, the Committee recommended that the government re-affirm that no one be permitted to have a significant interest in any class of shares of a bank (the 10 per cent rule), and section 372 of Bill C-19 contains this provision.

The Committee further recommended that a closely held trust or insurance company be permitted to own a Schedule II bank, subject to the requirement that its shareholding decline to 10 per cent within ten years. The 35 per cent rule would not apply because the long-run 10 per cent rule is more stringent. Section 376 of Bill C-19 deals with the issue in this manner.

The Committee recommended that any financial institution could own an institution in another pillar, subject to the ownership rules that apply to banks. Banks would be able own trust and insurance companies; trust companies, insurance companies and Schedule II banks (subject to the 10 per cent rule after 10 years), mutual insurance companies, trust companies and Schedule II banks. This is essentially what is permitted in the bills before Parliament.

The investment powers of trust and insurance companies have been expanded substantially, guided by the principles of a prudent portfolio. This is also in line with recommendations of the Committee. Further, the Committee recommended a broad range of networking opportunities for financial institutions, subject to conflict of interest rules. The federal government proceeded along this vein with two important exceptions. Deposit -taking institutions are prohibited from networking insurance products (with minor exceptions) and federally-incorporated institutions are still prohibited from automobile leasing through subsidiaries or networking arrangements.

The sections of the financial legislation covering self-dealing are in line with the Committee's views as expressed in "Canada 1992". In general, such transactions are banned.

Finally the government has strengthened the role of directors in providing for corporate governance in a manner consistent with the recommendations of the Committee. No more than 15 per cent of the directors of a financial institution may be inside directors (officers or executives of the institution) as the Committee recommended. Further no more than two-thirds of directors may be affiliated with the financial institution. The Committee had recommended a ceiling of one-half, but the definition of affiliation used in the bills is quite similar to that of the Committee. It includes employees, significant borrowers and suppliers or shareholders of the company.

The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in its previous reorts, laid out a very ambitious program for reform of the legislation and regulations governing Canada's financial system. Much of its work has made its way into the current legislation. No doubt other recommendations will have their impact through the regulations and further down the road in the re-examination of the current bills that is called for in five years.

The pre-study which was completed with public hearings on 14 and 15 November 1991 has raised a number of issues which are presented in this report. In some cases specific changes to the bills are called for to ensure that the legislation does in fact create the foundation for a sound financial framework. In addition a number of recommendations are made which will enable the Senate Committee to continue its constructive interaction with the government in the ongoing improvement of the regulation of financial institutions. What follows immediately are the general recommendations, after which the specific amendments proposed are presented.

CHAPTER I

RECOMMENDATIONS

Regulations

Once these bills become law there are important regulations that must be drawn up by the regulator - concerning demutualisation and the 10/50 rule with respect to permitted investments for example. (The bills list a number of permitted investments for banks, trust companies and insurance companies. However, a company must have either more than 50 per cent of the voting shares of the company or less than 10 per cent of the voting shares if they make such investments. Intermediate investments are subject to regulation.)

It is important that these regulations be timely and that they strike an appropriate balance between the sometimes conflicting goals of protection of a sound financial framework and the ability of the regulated parties to be successful in the increasingly competitive global environment.

1. The Committee recommends that public hearings by the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be held before the regulations take effect, to gain public input into those regulations that are considered by the Committee to be particularly significant to the financial system.

Financial Sector Developments

A related point deals with consideration of the impact of the legislation which will come up for review in five years. Because of the significant changes that are to be made to the financial system in Canada and because of increasing global competition in the financial sector, it would be useful to periodically review the impact of this legislation on the financial environment in Canada. If such a review were to be carried out, then when the time for reconsideration of the legislation arrives, there will be a solid foundation of information from which to operate.

2. The Committee recommends that the Department of Finance report at least every two years to the Senate Banking Committee on developments in the financial marketplace following the proclamation of the legislation, including regulatory issues and problems related to the legislation that may arise. Input from the public in general and industry in particular would also be solicited.

Restrictions on Banks, Trust Companies and Insurance Companies

The government's reform has gone a long way toward breaking down barriers among the pillars of the financial sector, as the Senate Banking Committee had recommended in its major studies of the financial system. In particular it would allow financial institutions to diversify into almost any financial area either through expansion of in-house powers or through subsidiaries. There are specific restrictions however. Automobile leasing is not permitted in federally incorporated financial institutions. Banks and trust companies are not to undertake the business of insurance (with some limited exceptions) and insurance companies are not allowed to accept deposits (again with some minor exceptions). Banks and trust companies may buy insurance companies; insurance companies may buy trust and loan companies; and any widely-held regulated financial institution may own a Schedule II bank. The Committee is quite concerned about the regulations that will be developed to implement these restrictions. Will they maintain the prohibitions specified in the statutes?

3. (a) The Committee recommends that the government follow through with clear regulations on its prohibition of in-house insurance powers for banks and trust companies and on deposit-taking by insurance companies.

(b) The regulations should make it very clear that a bank which owns an insurance company must disclose this fact to those clients to whom it provides financial counselling services.

Deposit Insurance

There is a complex, multidimensional relationship among governments, regulatory bodies and financial intermediaries. The four bills which are the subject of the pre-study deal with critical aspects of the relationship between the federal government, the regulators and the federally incorporated financial institutions.

There are however, important institutions which play a major role in the soundness of the financial framework in Canada which fall outside the scope of these bills and hence the pre-study of the Committee. The Bank of Canada, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC), the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Compensation Corporation (CompCorp) and the Property and Casualty Insurance Compensation Corporation (PACIC) are important examples. The first two are government bodies; the latter two, private sector initiatives of the life and health insurance industry and the property and casualty insurance industry, respectively. These institutions are critical to maintaining consumer and foreign confidence in the Canadian financial system.

During the pre-study questions were raised about the insurance system standing behind the financial institutions in Canada. Is it adequate? Can it be improved?

In December of 1985, the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce released the report, "Deposit Insurance". Recommendations were made in a variety of areas - the power to set standards for admission to and maintenance of insurance which was adopted by the government, for example - but by and large CDIC has remained unchanged. Given the serious problems which have arisen in the United States with its deposit insurance schemes it is important to ensure that the Canadian system continues on a sound, responsible basis.

4. The Committee recommends that it undertake an in-depth study of CDIC, CompCorp and PACIC. The structure, the powers and the operations of these insurance schemes should be examined with a view to making recommendations that the government will be able to use to improve the foundation on which the Canadian financial system is built.

Pari Passu Debt

While Bill C-28 would not prevent an insurance company from issuing non-subordinated debt, i.e., debt that would rank equally with policyholder liabilities in the event of the liquidation of an insurance company, the Winding-Up Act prevents this. The latter ranks the claims of policyholders above all other debt of insurance companies. Banks are able to issue pari passu debt; trust companies can issue certificates of deposit which the market treats as debt and prices accordingly. Insurance companies face a competitive disadvantage in the marketplace because of this situation.

One concern voiced concerning pari passu and insurance companies is capital adequacy to satisfy obligations in the case of liquidation. The banks and trust companies have the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. The recent establishment of the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Corporation (CompCorp), in which membership will be legally required under the Insurance Companies Act, now guarantees payment of benefits to policyholders in the event of a liquidation.

5. After its study of deposit insurance and policyholder insurance, the Committee will consider recommending a change in the winding-Up Act to remove the absolute priority of policyholders over all other debt. Change should only come however, after it has been made clear that policyholders will retain their current level of protection.

Client Information

One issue of considerable concern to the Committee is the protection of privacy and the transmission of confidential client information among financial institutions. This has become a global concern. The Committee is of the view that the interests of the consumer must have unquestioned priority.

The OECD has established guidelines on the protection of privacy and transborder flows of information. Some European jurisdictions have used regulation to tightly control the transfer of confidential consumer information among financial institutions.

In his most recent annual report the federal Privacy Commissioner has stated:

"... the Commissioner considers action on (a recommendation that Parliament amend the Privacy Act to require federally-regulated private sector firms t develop, file and implement privacy codes based on the internationally accepted principles established in the OECD guidelines) is urgent. Not only do Canadians deserve this much privacy protection but, without it, Canadian firms risk labouring under a significant competitive disadvantage in their post-1992 dealings with Europe."

Although the various industry associations have adopted voluntary codes of conduct to be followed by their members, the government has not expressed any views on these codes nor on what it would like to see in this area. The legislation provides little guidance. Section 444 of C-4, section 459 of C-19 and section 490 of C-28 state:

The Governor in Council may make regulations governing the use by a [company (C-4 and C-28)] [bank (C-19)] of any information supplied to the [company] [bank] by its customers.

There is no statement of intent to guide the making of such regulations. Many questions come to mind.

6. Given the intent of the legislation, the Committee urges the Department of Finance and the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to establish those regulations that will be needed to ensure that the goals of the legislation concerning the separation of insurance and banking are met specifically to prevent the transmission of client information from banks and trust companies to insurance companies. The Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce intends to undertake a study early in the new year to clarify the regulatory issues related to confidentiality of client information.

7. The Committee recommends that it undertakes a study early in the new year to examine and clarify the policy issues related to the confidentiality of consumer information.

Federal-Provincial Harmonization

The issue of federal-provincial harmonization has been addressed by the Committee before. The issue was raised again at the public hearings. It is an issue which runs the risk of not being taken seriously because it has been raised so often - but this should not happen. The plea of the Trust Companies' Association makes the point simply and directly.

"The right to regulate financial services outside the domain of "banking" continues to be claimed by both the federal and provincial governments. As you are aware, non-bank institutions are faced with multiple, duplicative, and sometimes conflicting regulatory regimes. The lack of simple harmonisation of the regulatory regimes means that trust and loan companies, in particular, will continue to bear a substantially heavier and more costly regulatory burden than will the institutions with which we compete, namely the banks.

For the trust industry therefore, the first, foremost and most important step which is left to be achieved in this round of reform is harmonisation or some form of designated jurisdiction scheme which will allow companies to operate under one set of rules with one supervisory agency."

This is a serious problem - one which was discussed by the Committee in its 1986 report, "Towards A More Competitive Financial Environment" and reiterated in its 1990 report "Canada 1992, Toward a National Market in Financial Services". The Committee recommended in the 1986 report - that the federal government take the initiative to establish, with the provincial governments, a Permanent Committee of Ministers Responsible for Financial Institutions. (Recommendation 80) This body would be responsible for achieving policy harmonization. In the 1990 report the Committee observed that:
"If Europeans can harmonize across national boundaries, then Canadians can surely harmonize across provincial boundaries." (Recommendations and Observations 53).

Further, the report also called for:

- a new consensus on key standards and principles
- a federal-provincial accord on regulation
- acceptance of the designated jurisdiction concept. (Recommendations and Observations 54)

8. The Committee wishes to reaffirm strongly its call for real progress on federal-provincial harmonisation.

Transition

When these bills become law, there are certain decisions that will have to be made by the financial institutions. For example, sections 70 and 71 of Bill C-28 require that certain decisions be made by insurance companies concerning entries into "stated capital accounts".

9. The Committee recommends that the government provide for a period of transition to allow the financial institutions to accomplish the specific directives that are to be met after the laws are proclaimed.

Some concern was expressed during the hearings about the concept of "well-being" and the difficulties auditors may have in reporting on this attribute of a financial institution.

10. The Committee agrees that this is a difficult concept. It wishes however to draw a parallel with the term "public interest". Many professions, administrative tribunals and institutions are charged with the responsibility of acting in the public interest - the CRTC and the National Energy Board, for example. The Committee views auditors as responsible professionals who are called upon to provide information that is critical to public confidence in the financial system. The Committee is confident that the auditing profession will deal with the concept of "well-being" in the same professional way in which it deals with financial statements.

Chapter II

Suggested Amendments

The Senate Committee Standing on Banking, Trade and Commerce was able during its pre-study to obtain the views of a variety of groups with a stake in the current reform of our financial institutions. These groups came before the Committee to express their concerns about the four bills involved. For the most part they had already participated in hearings held by the Commons Finance Committee, where they had made a number of suggestions, some of which were adopted. At the Senate level they came to reiterate what they considered essential points.

Having heard the witnesses, the Committee is now in a position to suggest amendments to Bills C-4, C-19, C-18 and C-34.

It should be noted at the start that the bill for which the most amendments have been proposed is Bill C-28, respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies. Only a handful of amendments have been made to the other three bills.

Overall the proposed reform of the legislation governing financial institutions should lead to greater competition through the larger range of services that the institutions will be able to offer, greater protection for depositors and insurees, more acute competition among institutions on both the domestic and foreign markets, and negotiations with the provinces on harmonizing the regulations.

Bill C-28, An Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies

The aim of Bill C-28 is to help complete the reform process that has been under way since 1985. More specifically, the Bill updates the provisions governing the way insurance companies do business, so that they reflect the modern vision of company law. Expanding the field of activities open to insurance companies is also part of the Bill's aim, as is the imposition of stricter rules governing non-arm's-length transactions and the requirement that at least 35% of the voting stock in the bigger companies be traded and held by the general public.

In essence the amendments suggested by the Committee are of a technical nature and do not change the intent of the proposed reforms. However, some of the Bill's provisions could, at least in the opinion of some of the groups that appeared before the Committee, be interpreted in a variety of ways, which could cause confusion: for this reason it is important that they be amended before the Bill becomes law.

Part VI - Corporate Governance

i - Shareholders and Policyholders

The Committee is suggesting three amendments regarding corporate governance by shareholders and policyholders. They concern the "record date" and the conditions required for a right to vote.

The Bill refers to a record date. The thrust of the first amendment is the way in which this date is set. As noted in clause 142 of the Bill, the directors may set a record date for the determination of the shareholders who are entitled to dividends, the shareholders or policyholders who are entitled to participate in a liquidation distribution, and the shareholders and policyholders who may receive payment of a policy dividend or bonus. The record date may affect the relative share distributed. Because these dates are set on a three-year basis, the resulting cycle may be more or less advantageous (given the relative financial position during this period) for shareholders or policyholders, depending on the good will of the directors.

Record dates should not be set by the directors when the matter at issue is the establishment of contractual rights regarding the distribution of earnings. The Committee therefore proposes:

1. That clause 142(1)(c) of Bill C-28 be amended by the insertion of a comma after the word "meeting", and the addition, after the word "bonus", of the words "and all other rights arising from the policy, other than the right to vote".

The other two amendments proposed by the Committee relate to voting rights. Policyholders' voting rights are defined in greater detail in the existing legislation than in Bill C-28. the Bill defines a number of ways that a vote can be cast, but neglects to be precise about the right to vote in itself. As a result, there is a risk that the legislation may take precedence over the contractual bond that establishes the right to vote. To prevent any confusion, the Committee proposes:

2. That Bill C-28, {clause 153} be amended by the insertion of a provision explicitly stating that anyone who holds a policy from a life insurance company, or a dividend-earning life insurance policy that does not require the payment of premiums, has the right to attend meetings of policyholders or of shareholders and policyholders, and to vote.

The third amendment would affect clause 164 of the Bill, which deals with the obligation to inform the policyholder of his right to attend and vote at meetings and to provide for proxies. Under this clause the policyholder must be sent a form that he can return stating whether he wishes to receive notices of meetings over the next three years. The clause requires solicitation every three years, but unless the policyholder requests notification in writing, there is no obligation to send him notices of meetings. The costs of such solicitations are another factor in informing only those who have expressed the wish to receive notices. The three-year cycle could cause problems for some companies and affect the rate of attendance at the meetings. The Committee therefore proposes:

3. That clause 164 of Bill C-28 be amended by the insertion, after the word "company" in the fifth line of the clause, of the words "or, in the case of policies already issued, in the 15 months that follow the coming into force of this section,", in order to extend the application of clause 164 and clause 143(1)(b) to policyholders who have the right to vote at the time this Bill comes into force.

ii - Structural modifications

Two amendments are being proposed in this respect, one regarding mutualization and the other demutualization. The aim is to clarify certain terms.

Bill C-28 contains an entire section on mutualization but its application is not clearly defined. The legislation suggests that there must be provisions governing mutualization but the way the provisions would be acted on is not spelled out. The Committee therefore proposes:

4. That clause 234(b) of Bill C-28 be amended to provide that Division X of Part VI, permitting a mutual company to acquire non-offered shares (up to 10 per cent of any category), be applied as follows:

- mutatis mutandis, as though the corporation were the offeror and each of the holders of non-offered shares an offeree, these two terms to be understood as defined in section 307(1), on condition that the corporation send interested parties an offeror's notice, in accordance with section 309(1), within the time limit set down in the mutualization proposal.

The Committee further suggests:

5. That the use in clause 237 of Bill C-28 of the term "mutual reorganization or demutualization" should allow the Minister and the industry greater flexibility vis-à-vis the proposed changes in the industry.

iii - Actuaries

With respect to actuaries, the Committee is proposing an amendment of a technical nature, which would simply make the English and French versions of clause 369(1) correspond:

6. That the French version of Bill C-28 be amended by the substitution, in the fourth line [of clause 369(1)] of the words "dont il a pris connaissance" for the words "portée à son attention".

iv - Legal recourse

A further amendment concerns actuaries' privilege of immunity from legal action. It is designed essentially to protect actuaries against civil suits arising from their work.

At issue is the question of whether the privilege that auditors and actuaries now enjoy is sufficient, given the risks involved. It can be argued that an actuary working under Parliament's orders who is the object of a civil suit arising from his work should not, in addition to having to defend his career, face the loss of personal assets because of the costs of such a suit. The Committee therefore proposed:

7. That clause 370 be re-numbered 370(1) and that new provisions be added as follows:

(2) an appointed actuary or former appointed actuary who in good faith makes an oral or written statement or report under section 363 or subsections 369(2) and 369(3) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom.

Part VIII - Business and Powers

Five amendments are proposed under this Part. The first two deal with business in general, and more particularly with the additional powers in the area of information services and insurance subsidiaries (clause 441(1)(d)) and insurance brokerage (clause 441(1)(h)).

In the area of the provision of information services by insurance companies to their subsidiaries (clause 441), section 10 of the existing Act sets out the following provisions with respect to life insurance companies:

"(1) ... with the consent of the Minister, carry on any business that is reasonably ancillary to the business of insurance transacted by the company" and

"(2) ... provide administrative, advisory and management services" to its subsidiaries.

Based on 10(2), some life insurance companies have been providing information to their subsidiaries for many years.

The current Bank Act extends relatively broader powers to the banks and has grandfathered these activities in Bill C-19, the new Bank Act.

The draft of C-28 initially submitted to the Commons Finance Committee would have allowed life insurers to continue providing information services to their subsidiaries, but:

(1) clause 441(1)(d), which would have enabled life insurers to "engage in such (activities in which an information services corporation ... may engage) as the company was engaged in prior to the coming into force of this Part" was deleted because it was redundant to the more general clause 441(1)(h) and then

(2) the more general clause 441(1)(h), which would have allowed life insurance companies to " with the consent of the Minister ... carry on ... activities that are ancillary to the business of the company" was changed so that the activities must be ancillary to the business of insurance. It was felt that the original wording might permit insurers to engage in deposit-taking activities. These changes may create significant problems for life insurers in the provision of information services to their subsidiaries.

The proposed amendment is:

8. Reinsert paragraph (d) of clause 441(1) in the following form:

(d) in Canada, engage in the activities in which an information services corporation within the meaning of subsection 491(1) may engage, but solely in respect of its subsidiaries.

Clause 441(1)(h) of Bill C-28 gives insurance companies, with the Minister's consent, the power to "provide ... services respecting ... insurance brokerage". The brokers contend that they offer independent advice regarding insurance contracts. The new power extended to insurance companies is not compatible with this independence.

Proposed amendment:

9. Eliminate "insurance brokerage" from clause 441(1)(h) of Bill C-28.

Another provision in Part VIII of the Bill deals with participating policies. Two amendments are being suggested here, one dealing with the type of account required for payment to shareholders, the other with elimination of the $2 million ceiling on one of the factors in the formula for calculating the amount of transfers to segregated fund accounts.

The correction of references to the "stated capital account" (clause 461) is a technical point. The clause deals with the transfers of participating account profits to shareholders. The specific account identified as the one to which the funds are to be transferred is the "stated capital account". This will create technical problems for insurance companies that may wish to do other things with the transferred funds. This removes flexibility from their decision-making.

Amendment proposed to Bill C-28:

10. Change "stated capital account" to "shareholders' account" in clause 461 of Bill C-28.

Let us now look at the $2 million ceiling on transfers from participating accounts to segregated fund accounts. Normally, insurance companies establish new segregated funds for product development. By transferring seed capital to these funds and then assigning to them the revenues and costs associated with a new product, the company can more easily monitor development of the new product.

Proposed amendment to Bill C-28:

11. Eliminate the two million dollar ceiling in clause 463(2).

The last amendment suggested for this Part of the Bill involves the addition of a clause under the heading "Miscellaneous". It would be a new clause 489, setting out requirements for the use of language comprehensible to the layman in documents and forms used by insurance companies.

When customers have access to more complete and comprehensible information, they are likely to make more enlightened choices. This is already a current practice in Quebec. Alberta is prepared to go even further with its Financial Consumers Act which has a provision to deal with plain language. This provision has yet to be proclaimed to allow the affected parties to make adjustments.

The Committee is of the opinion that this is an important measure, and it therefore proposes that a new clause be included that would read as follows:

12. (1) A company must use plain language in all information and documents supplied to its customers, including, but not limited to, contracts and policy, loan and mortgage applications.

(2) Proof that reasonable efforts have been made by the company to comply and maintain compliance with subsection (1) is a complete defence

(a) in a prosecution under subsection (1), or

(b) in a dispute about whether subsection (1) has been complied with.

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply to words or forms of documents that are required by law.

In the case of Bill C-28, a new clause 489 would be required. Bill C-4 would require a corresponding new clause 443, C-19 a corresponding new clause 458 and C-34 a corresponding new clause.

Bill C-19, An Act respecting Banks and Banking
Bill C-4, Trust and Loan Companies Act
Bill C-34, Cooperative Credit Associations Act

Bill C-19, as it stands, should open the way to freer penetration of traditional markets in the banking, insurance and trust sectors. The three issues that gave the financial pillars the greatest concern related to ownership, powers and federal-provincial harmonization, though by the time the legislation reached the Senate Committee only a few points remained. The Committee is proposing amendments to two Parts of Bill 19: that dealing with auditors and that dealing with business and powers.

Since the amendments also concern the proposed trust companies and cooperatives legislation, they have been integrated into this portion of the text.

Part VI - Corporate Governance (C-19)

The Committee considers that it would be preferable to maintain the provisions of the draft Bill. As originally tabled, the Bill did not change the number of auditors required: clauses 314 and 315 required the shareholders to appoint two auditors at each annual meeting.

Following amendments by the Commons Finance Committee, these clauses now enable the shareholders to appoint one or two accounting firms as the company's auditors.

The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce sees no reason to reduce the number of auditors required. The practice is a long-established one and contributes significantly to consumer confidence in the major chartered banks. This provides a sound justification for the costs involved.

13. The Committee therefore suggests that the clauses in question be reformulated to require that two auditors be appointed every year, as in the initial version of the Bill. In other words, the major banks would require two auditors.

A second amendment involves the generally accepted rules governing these activities. Auditors are usually obliged to do their work under generally accepted accounting principles (known as GAAP) and generally accepted auditing standards (GAAS). The CICA manual could constitute a primary reference source for auditors, but of course it would have to be understood that other sources might also be recognized. The Committee therefore proposes:

14. That it should be established in the legislation that a reference manual such as (but not exclusively) the CICA manual be regarded as the source for generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP) and generally accepted auditing standards (GAAS).

The Committee is proposing the above amendment on the grounds that it is important to have the legal obligation to refer to a reference source; the Committee considers it equally important, however, to ensure that one source does not become the sole acceptable source.

Part VIII - Business and Powers (C-19)

Two subjects are of interest in this Part of the Bill. The first, under general business, is that of automobile leasing; the second, under miscellaneous, is the level of language used in documentation supplied to a bank's customers. Automobile leasing powers would enable the banks to rent out automobiles and to offer car loans through subsidiaries.

Banks and trust companies have long wanted to acquire or establish subsidiaries in finance-related areas such as automobile leasing. In its report entitled "Canada 1991 -- Toward a National Market in Financial Services", the Senate Committee on Banking recommended that banks and other financial institutions be allowed to engage in these activities through the holding company concept, i.e. through subsidiaries. Clause 417 of Bill C-19 and clause 417 of Bill C-4 explicitly forbid banks to engage in any form of personal property leasing in Canada.

Given that retail leasing, commercial fleet leasing, lease financing and the "independent" sector of the industry are all dominated by foreign firms, the Committee sees no reason why federally-regulated firms should not be allowed to provide competition for foreign companies and in so doing enhance service for Canadians.

The Committee therefore promotes to:

15. Amend clause 417 of Bill C-19 and clause 417 of Bill C-4 to allow banks and trust companies to penetrate the vehicle leasing market through a subsidiary.

Provisions on accessible language should be inserted in Bill C-19, perhaps as part of a new clause 458, for the same reasons given in the discussion of this subject under Bill C-28.

Bill C-4 was the first of the series of legislative reforms to be proposed. The only amendments the Committee wishes to propose involve leasing, identical to those proposed for the banking legislation, and the use of accessible language. No amendments are proposed to Bill C-34 with the exception of an accessible language provision.

Finally, there is an amendment affecting Petro Canada and Air Canada. The Committee proposes:

16. That the Air Canada Public Participation Act and the Petro Canada Public Participation Act be amended so that the same provisions on resident status apply to investment in these corporations as apply to investments made on behalf of Canadian clients in the segregated pension funds of non-resident insurers.

This amendment is a significant change to two acts not currently before Parliament. Consequently, for procedural reasons, it may not be possible to introduce these changes during third reading of the four bills. The Committee will deal with this issue separately if the amendments cannot be made during consideration of the four bills.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

UKRAINE

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE—FELICITATIONS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, when I heard the results of the voting in the Ukraine yesterday, it brought memories of our late colleague Senator Paul Yuzyk, who always reminded us of his heritage and of the plight of the Ukrainian people.

Well, honourable senators, my parents, although of a different religious group, came from that same region of what used to be the Soviet Union, and my home town of Winnipeg has a very large number of Ukrainian people, all celebrating Ukrainian independence. Near the legislature in Winnipeg stands a statue of Taras Schevchenko, the great Ukrainian poet and nationalist who represents the great enduring spirit of the Ukraine. This statue was erected during the time of the government of our colleague Senator Roblin, who felt that the Ukrainian people, who did not have their own homeland, could at least pay tribute to one of their great heroes in a city where there was a large Ukrainian population.

Born into serfdom in 1814, Taras Schevchenko was purchased out of serfdom in 1838 for some 2,500 rubles. He was arrested in 1847 by the Czarist authorities for what was considered subversive activities in promoting Ukrainian nationalism. Czar Nicholas I had him sentenced for an indefinite period to hard military service. It was only in 1857 that Schevchenko was freed by Czar Alexander II. On February 26, 1861, one day after his 47th birthday, Schevchenko died under circumstances of extreme hardship.

Throughout most of these years, when not under interdict, he wrote poetry extensively. His poem written on October 21, 1845, entitled "Subotiv", speaks to us about today's events. He wrote

"Upon a lofty hill there stands
The coffin of Ukraine;
A crypt both wide and still,
It is the church of Great Bohdan
Where once he used to pray
That Muscovite and Cossack might Share good and ill alway.
May peace be to your soul, Bohdan,
Their gain has been our loss;
The Muscovites have snatched away
All that they came across . . ."

The Church was considered by Schevchenko to be the coffin of Ukraine because it was the burial place of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnitsky who had signed the Treaty of Peryaslav in 1654, which, in effect, united Ukraine politically with Russia in order to save Ukraine from Poland. The result was Ukraine's loss of independence for over 300 years.

He concludes his poem with these words:

"Yet do not laugh, ye foreign folk!
That Church beneath the skies
May crumble down, but from its vaults
A new Ukraine will rise.
To end the night of slavery
Injustice will be gone;
Our serf-born son's glad orisons
Will greet sweet freedom's dawn."

Although there was a brief rebirth of an independent Ukraine from 1917 to 1920, it is this past Sunday's overwhelming vote—over 80 per cent—for independence of the Ukraine which must herald freedom's dawn and the beginning of the "New Ukraine" which Schevchenko so fervently believed in. To be true to Schevchenko, Ukraine must stand for freedom and justice for all its citizens, regardless of ethnic origin, religious conviction or political persuasion.

We wish the people of the Ukraine good fortune in pursuing these goals.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-44, to amend the Canada Labour Code (geographic certification).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if you recall, on Thursday last I mentioned the possibility of this bill's coming to us on that day, but that its status was not clear enough to say whether it would come at all. As it turned out, the House leaders could not agree for Thursday, and then we adjourned until today. However, the legislation was passed with all-party support after agreement on Friday and now we are being asked to pass it as expeditiously as possible.

I have discussed this matter on a number of occasions with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition; he has kindly indicated that the other side will support this procedure. If so, it is our intention to ask, with leave, for second reading later this day and then to go into Committee of the Whole to hear the Minister of Labour who will be available to discuss the bill in more detail and, of course, answer any questions that either side may have to ask him.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as the Deputy Leader of the Government has indicated, we had some discussions regarding this matter on Thursday of last week, when it appeared that there would be a request that we pass Bill C-44 that day. I thank him for arranging at that time for us to meet with some of the officials of the department. They certainly made a reasonable case for the law itself. I did not believe that they made a reasonable case for it having to be passed that day. However, it did not come to us at that time.

I understand that the union, in particular, is anxious to have this law passed. The workers have been in a strike position for two months but have had no one with whom to negotiate. Although the House has proceeded to pass this legislation, we are reluctant because we do not like to bypass the normal parliamentary practice, which is something I think we should do as rarely as possible, but under the circumstances we have agreed to give leave.

Depending on when it is planned to have Royal Assent, we can determine what the next stages will be, but for the time being we agree to give leave for second reading later, with Committee of the Whole to follow so that we can hear the minister. I understand he will be available today. On that basis we are prepared to proceed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I thank the honourable Deputy Leader of the Opposition for his understanding.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CANADA PENSION PLAN
FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT
OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-39, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, December 5, 1991.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

RULES OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO RESCIND CURRENT RULES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I wish to give notice that I shall move at the appropriate day the following motion:

I move, seconded by Senator Robichaud:

> THAT pursuant to rule 3 which supports practice, and based on rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, as it is a matter of universal privilege, and of profound constitutional significance; therefore the Senate resolves that the question whether to rescind the adoption of the present rules as resolved on June 18, 1991 with less than two-thirds majority at that time, in contravention of then-rule 47(2), will correspondingly be decided by a simple majority, without intending thereby to set a precedent of general practice.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a), I move:

> THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have the power to sit at three-thirty o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, December 4, 1991, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if Senator Nurgitz would explain his motion before we proceed to grant leave.

Senator Nurgitz: The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has been considering what is commonly known as the gun control legislation. The committee heard witnesses last week and will continue to hear witnesses this afternoon. The difficulty we have, honourable senators, is that tomorrow we have six witnesses slated. We wish to call them today and assign to each a specific time, as several are from out of the city. We wish to set time slots so the witnesses can plan their day. This would save us the expense of housing witnesses overnight. Many senators are interested in seeing this legislation reach a happy conclusion before week's end. I would ask the indulgence of honourable senators in this matter.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I assume that the witnesses who will be heard tomorrow have had the unanimous approval of the steering committee; in other words, they are people whom the steering committee wishes to hear. Reluctant as we are to have committees sit while the Senate is sitting, under these particular circumstances and given the nature of this bill, we are prepared to give leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS

PROPOSED SALE OF RAIL LINES—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, December 5, 1991, I will call the attention of the Senate to the ramifications of the sale or proposed sale of certain rail lines in Canada.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECTS OF GOVERNMENT POLICY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, December 5, 1991, I will call the attention of the Senate to the economic chaos created by the government in its pursuit of lower inflation and high interest rates.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, some honourable senators will be pleased, and some less well pleased, to know that even now, almost a full year after the GST was —if I may coin a phrase—"rammed down the country's throat", that petitions are still coming in against the GST.

Senator Simard: Are they addressed to Mr. Chrétien?

Senator Frith: No, they are addressed to you, Sir.

Senator Simard: Perhaps they are addressed to Mr. Young.

Senator Frith: No, try again. They are addressed to Senator Simard, that quiet, retiring flower on the other side, increasing his reputation for good manners.

Senator Simard: Thank you, Sir.

Senator Frith: These petitions are addressed to Senator Simard and the rest of us.

Senator Simard: So they are addressed to everybody.

Senator Frith: They state: "Whereas the new 7 per cent—"

Senator Simard: Are you working on volume two?

Senator Frith: Well, make me an offer, senator. Yes, that is very kind of you.

Senator Barootes: Perhaps you should sell out the first issue first.

Senator Frith: I am glad you asked, because I was told today that the publisher has no copies left; they are all in the stores. Any other questions?

Senator Doody: How many more questions have you seeded around?

Senator Frith: No more, but what a good idea, thank you, senator. I will see that I do that next week. May I put you on the list?

The petitions are all in the form that we are now familiar with—certainly we were familiar with it last year at this time—and state:

> Whereas the new universal 7% Goods and Services Tax adopted by the Conservative Government will create serious, unjust and inhuman difficulties to Canadians; whereas the implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes, but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation, interest rates and unemployment; whereas the methods used by the Government are unworthy of a democratic country. They are rather the work of lawmakers who want to implement a dictatorship, snapping their fingers at the general opposition of the population.

As usual, the petitioners ask for an election to purge the sin. They come from the following places: From New Brunswick, four petitions with 76 names; from Ontario, nine petitions with 199 names; from Quebec, 18 petitions with 369 names. The totals are 99 petitions with 2,160 names.

The petitions from New Brunswick are from Brantville, L'Acadie, Lower Neguac, Pokemouche, Rivière-du-Portage and Saint John. The petitions from Ontario are from Crysler, Hallebourg, Hearst, Hornepayne, Kapuskasing, Kingston, LaSarre, Mississauga, Moonbeam, New Liskeard, North York and Toronto. The petitions from Quebec are from Asbestos, Bedford, Blandford, Danville, Dollard des Ormeaux, Montréal, Otterburn Park, Princeville, Rougemont, St- Amable, St-Eustache, St-Leonard, Val D'Or and Wotton.

QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

MEETING OF MINISTERS—REQUEST FOR AGENDA

Hon. H.A. Olson: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us an indication of what is on the agenda for the meeting of the Ministers of Finance, which I believe is to be held on December 12 or 13, or thereabouts.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I really cannot answer that question without having first consulted with my colleague the Minister of Finance. I will see what statement he feels he can properly make on that matter at this time.

Senator Olson: Perhaps the Leader of the Government could tell us whether or not there was a statement made at the time the Minister of Finance made the announcement. I did not receive a copy of such a statement in my office. That is why I am enquiring now whether the minister, in fact put out a communiqué as to what the purpose of this meeting was.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall enquire.

UKRAINE

RECOGNITION OF INDEPENDENCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, my question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is respecting the recognition of Ukraine. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform the Senate as to the Government's current position with respect to the recognition of Ukraine?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I can. I am looking to see if I have copies of the announcements that have been made on the matter. I do not have a copy of the announcements, and I should therefore take the matter as notice, unless the honourable senator wishes to ask questions about specific aspects of the matter on which I may have some notes.

Senator Grafstein: Well, has the Government of Canada recognized the Ukraine, either de facto or de jure?

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators, we have indicated that, as a result of the referendum of Sunday, we do recognize that Ukraine exists as a sovereign state rather than as part of another state—that is to say, the U.S.S.R.

Senator Grafstein: Are there any preconditions to our de jure recognition? I assume from that statement that the government, de facto, has recognized this new sovereign state, but it has not, de jure, entered into legal and binding methodologies for recognition. Assuming that is correct, are there any preconditions to the next stage? Is there any correspondence between the government or the Prime Minister of Canada and the authorities in the Ukraine that could be helpful to the Senate? Specifically, are there any preconditions with respect to the new sovereign state, which we will call Ukraine, entering into those treaties dealing with the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons and with human rights?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the next step would be to establish diplomatic relations with the Government of Ukraine. Before doing that, as the honourable senator has suggested, we want to work out assurances on the secure control of nuclear weapons, on Ukrainian compliance with existing arms control and security agreements, and on their adherence to, and implementation of, all the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe commitments embodied in the Helsinki Final Act, the Charter of Paris and other CSCE documents.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CANADA-SOVIET AGREEMENTS AND TREATIES

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Could the Leader of the Government table in the Senate all those treaties or agreements of a bilateral or a multilateral nature between Canada and the Soviet Union which would be binding upon the new sovereign state of Ukraine?

I will amplify my question somewhat, because I am sure the answer to it will take some extensive review by the Department of External Affairs. I assume some agreements will lapse and that some will be unenforceable. When I use the word "agreements" I mean agreements and treaties. I assume some agreements will require renegotiation, while others might bind the new state merely by its unilateral concurrence in them. Some agreements might require other methodologies for them to be binding.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate review those agreements and table an aide-mémoire in the Senate so that we may see which agreements are easily the subject matter of concurrence by the new state and which, in fact, require specific concurrence or negotiation?

When we come to those bilateral or multilateral treaties or agreements that require negotiation, could the Leader of the Government also advise in his aide-mémoire what the government's position will be with respect to negotiating or renegotiating such bilateral agreements and treaties?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is asking for information which I think he can only obtain if I hand him a key to go over to the Pearson Building and get into the files.

He has asked for information which is really in the nature of a speculative analysis on our part as to what the position of Ukraine might be on certain matters. I will have my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, study his question carefully with a view to tabling whatever information we properly can at this time. In particular, I note the honourable senator's request for tabling, I assume not the treaties themselves, but a list of either bilateral or multilateral treaties to which Canada and the U.S.S.R. are party and by which Ukraine would be bound. It will take more than a day to study the honourable senator's question. However, we will do so in a spirit of openness and table whatever information we properly can.

Senator Grafstein: I appreciate that answer of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I raise the matter because I do not think it is merely a problem for the new sovereign state of Ukraine, but because it also relates to Canada's relations with other countries which might have similar prospects in the future. I refer specifically to eastern Europe and the Croatian and Serbian problem. It might also be closer to home in the future. Thus, it will be useful for the government to lay out in effect what its position will be.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UKRAINE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps, first, I should put things in chronological order. Would the Leader of the Government table in this house the letter that President Leonid Kravchuk sent to the Prime Minister before the referendum was taken, and any reply that the Prime Minister has given in a letter to President Kravchuk? Would he table that correspondence, please?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not familiar with the correspondence that the honourable senator states has taken place between the President of the Ukraine and the Prime Minister of Canada, but I shall certainly make inquiries of the Prime Minister's Office to see what can properly be tabled at this time.

REPAYMENT OF DEBTS—PRECONDITION FOR RECOGNITION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate outlined many preconditions that the Prime Minister would like to see clarified. Is one of those conditions that any outstanding debt be paid by the U.S.S.R., including the portion Ukraine is responsible for? Is that one of the preconditions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the answer to that question is almost certainly no because I believe an agreement was recently reached among the former republics of the U.S.S.R. concerning those matters.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

YUKON—VISIT OF SOVIET RED ARMY HOCKEY TEAM—SEIZURE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY BY CUSTOMS OFFICER

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. An unfortunate incident occured in the Yukon over the weekend. The sports people of the Yukon had gone to great lengths to bring in the Russian Red Army Hockey Team to play against Whitehorse teams. Of course, everyone knows that when the Russian players come over, they do not have any money. So as part of this exchange, they had arranged for a little booth to be set up in one of the malls in Whitehorse where the players could meet the public of Whitehorse, and they had some souvenirs that they were selling for small amounts of money. They wanted to use the money they made to buy souvenirs to take home with them.

One of the off-duty customs officers in Whitehorse was shopping in the mall, saw this display, confiscated all the souvenirs, brought in the police, and they went to the rooms of the players and confiscated everything the Russians had brought over with them. In the process, the Russian players themselves were fined $2,000, plus, I believe, $500 customs on the items and, to add insult to injury, charged $300 to pay the overtime for the off- duty officer who had pulled off this intelligent caper. I would like to have given notice of my question, but I did not have an opportunity.

This is a rather urgent matter up in the Yukon. The players are there now and the people of Whitehorse are in the process of holding fund-raisers to try to pay these players back for what has taken place. It has been a terrible incident. I wonder if the minister could contact the Minister of National Revenue or the Secretary of State for External Affairs to see if this matter could be straightened out. I know the Government of Canada is a little short of money but I do not believe it is that short of money.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Has the customs officer been tarred and feathered yet?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall ask for a report from the appropriate minister.

Hon. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Would this be the same officer who charged Ben Johnson for bringing the gold medal to Canada?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CRASH OF HERCULES AIRCRAFT EN ROUTE TO ALERT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is with regard to the very tragic accident involving the Hercules aircraft on its way to Alert about a month ago. Would the minister tell us when we might expect a report on this matter?

As he knows, there are continuing flights to Alert—at least, I assume that there are because we have Canadian servicemen and women at that post, and they can only be fed and provisioned by air.

• (1440)

This is obviously a matter of major concern to those service people who were on the aircraft and to their families, because there were a number of comments made subsequently about such things as improper location of safety equipment. Can we have a report fairly soon on that matter?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence to give me an update on that matter.

LA FRANCOPHONIE

PARIS CONFERENCE—OMISSION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FROM PRESENTATION MAP OF CANADA

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, does the Leader of the Government have any further information as to why Prince Edward Island was left off the map used at the Francophone conference? I note that the Charlottetown Guardian, on November 30, reported that the map in question was a five-year-old map, according to the Department of External Affairs. In other words, this stylized map, which was put out in 1986, was intended only to highlight the territory of members of the international Francophone communities. Apparently, External Affairs is now highlighting only external affairs and trade in the Francophone communities. However, they will try to correct this matter on maps they put forth in the future. Can you give us a further answer to this question?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have a prepared response to the honourable senator's question. As I understand it, the map was prepared by Canada, by the Department of External Affairs—

Senator Bonnell: And the Trade Commission.

Senator Murray: —for a meeting of the Francophone nations, and the intent was to show where there are concentrated populations of Francophones in Canada. I am told that there are a number of places, islands and others, that were left off this stylized map. However, I do not have an official response from the department concerned. I am assured that the quite regrettable error in not including Prince Edward Island on that map will be corrected.

Senator Bonnell: Could the minister take this opportunity to ask the Minister of External Affairs and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to ensure that this map is withdrawn and a new map prepared so that Prince Edward is again put back into the world. It is bad enough to suggest that Newfoundland be dragged out to sea and sunk with an anchor, but Prince Edward Island was taken out of the world altogether. I suggest that the Leader of the Government take this opportunity to approach the Minister and ensure that these maps are withdrawn, since we cannot correct them now, and that new maps are prepared including Prince Edward Island.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I said, my friend should not draw such dramatic conclusions from all of this. The map in question was for a very limited use at a conference of La Francophonie. Its intent was to show the concentrations of Francophone population in Canada. Having said that, I agree with the honourable senator that any map of Canada, stylized or other, should, at a very minimum, include all ten provinces and the territories.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should further bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government that we do have Francophones in Prince County in Prince Edward Island. At least Prince County should be included, because there are quite a few Acadian French in that area and they certainly want to be recognized as Francophones. If you wanted, you could leave off Kings and Queens County where there are more Irish and Scots, but not Prince County.

However, in the very far north, the islands covered with ice where no one lives must be Francophone, because they are on the map.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am well aware of the point that the honourable senator makes in connection with the population of Prince Edward Island and where the Acadians are and have been even before the Irish and Scots got there.

THE CONSTITUTION

NATIONAL REFERENDUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to ask where the government stands on the possibility of a national referendum being held on the new constitutional proposals. The Vancouver Sun reports that the Minister for Constitutional Affairs, the Hon. Joe Clark, P.C., has backed himself into a corner. He apparently decided at one time to put forward a bill, seeking legislative authority to hold a national referendum. Then, having heard from a few people in one province, he is now backtracking, according to this article. Where does the government stand on the possibility of holding a national referendum?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): My friend will recall that the Speech from the Throne read in this Chamber in April indicated that we would be taking measures to enable us to consult the Canadian population on constitutional matters.

As the honourable senator knows, Mr. Clark and I and others have raised the possibility of holding referenda or plebiscites in that connection. However, no decision has been taken by the government as to how we will proceed. Nothing is excluded, but no positive decision has been taken in that respect, either.

Senator Olson: Perhaps we could have a federal election.

[Translation]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARIS CONFERENCE—ERRORS ON PRESENTATION MAP OF CANADA CONCERNING PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, in the same vein as senator Bonnell, I would like to address the hon. Leader of the Government. I have been following this fascinating debate ever since senator Bonnell raised the issue of the omission of Prince Edward Island on a map distributed at a Francophonie Summit. I am surprised to hear that the map dates back to 1985.

The Department of External Affairs is responsible for ensuring that international treaties are implemented. Yet, much to my surprise, I have discovered that New Brunswick western boundary indicated on this map depicts the situation which existed in 1713, when the Utrecht Treaty was signed. Initially, the United States of America claimed the territory shown on the map. In 1842, the boundary between the then New Brunswick colony and the United States of America was set once and for all in the Webster-Ashburton Treaty.

I suggest that it is unacceptable to argue that this is a stylized map to justify the perpetuation of such gross factual errors. A large portion of New Brunswick francophone population does not appear on this map. I am referring to the French-Canadians from the Madawaska region of New-Brunswick. With a stroke of the pen cartographers have struck them off, apparently with the blessing of the people at External Affairs who are specifically responsible namely for the implementation of frontier treaties.

So, I too rise in protest. Nothing, in my view, could justify the use of this kind of map by the Department of External Affairs to show to the world the true face of the French fact in Canada. Acadians from Prince Edward Island are not on the map, neither are the people from the republic of Madawaska, the Acadians from the island of Shippegan and from Lamèque nor many others.

Based on this map from the Department of External Affairs, our great big western provinces must be full of francophones.

It is time to wake up and to shake these people up. From now on, when we want to sell or give maps to our foreign friends or guests, let us give them maps that depict the Canadian reality and are consistent with treaties.

In closing, I would like to remind senator Murray that, as a member in the other place, I had introduced a bill about the need to print accurate maps of Canada. Just give up this habit of using stylized map altogether, because they are misleading when they are not plainly inaccurate. I serve him notice today that I intend to introduce this private bill here, in the Senate. So, we will have the opportunity to discuss this matter later.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I must confess that I for one have not seen this map. However, I take due note of the honourable senator's criticism of the drawing or drawing artist. I will ask the Department of External Affairs for a full report.

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate also obtain a report on this matter from the Trade Commission and from the Department of Trade and Commerce, because they also sent the map out?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I believe that since 1983 the department has been the Department of External Affairs and International Trade. Therefore I am not sure that the honourable senator is correct in implying, as he does, that the map served more than one purpose, which was the purpose of the Francophone conference, but I shall check.

Senator Bonnell: On the bottom of the map it says that the map is promoted by the Trade Commission of Canada as well as External Affairs. Both seem to be trying to obtain trade from abroad, using this map.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

DELAY IN RESPONSES TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I rise to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he has had any success in tracking down the missing answers to my questions relating to the Special Senate Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The short answer is yes, honourable senators. Let me just review the situation. My honourable friend's questions which were on the Order Paper during the last session died, as we all know, at prorogation. I am informed that responses had been prepared by the former minister's office but because of the sensitive nature of the issues raised, the new Solicitor General wanted to review the answers before having them tabled in the Senate.

I am informed that Senator Kenny has now put 26 new questions on the Order Paper and that these are subdivided such that there are really 103 questions in all. I am told that the questions numbered 21 to 35 are new questions, and six different departments of government have been contacted to answer them. The questions numbered 36 to 47 are in some cases repeats of his earlier questions and in other cases variations on the old questions.

My office has asked the parliamentary returns office and the offices of the ministers concerned to do everything possible to ensure that these questions are answered quickly and, if they cannot be answered quickly or at all, to furnish an adequate explanation why not.

Senator Kenny: The honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate is misinformed about the new questions. They are, in fact, all variations of the original questions asked 14 or 15 months ago. In fact, they were broken up for the convenience of the government because it seemed that perhaps the questions were too long to deal with, and that perhaps the answers were being delayed because just one portion of the answers were missing. Therefore in order to give the government an opportunity to answer the questions on which it had information, we went to some trouble to break them up into smaller pieces. Inasmuch as the answers to some of the question have been prepared for over six months, I hope that they will be forthcoming very shortly.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the points made by the honourable senator, but he knows that many of these questions cover very sensitive areas, and great care will have to be taken in replying to them.

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, over half the questions, in fact, relate to environmental issues such as double-hulling tankers, VTS control of tankers in harbours and cleaning up oil spills. I cannot believe that any aspect of them would relate to national security. They, in fact, relate to how capable the government is at preparing itself for cleaning up oil spills and other toxic waste.

The other questions all relate directly to a report by a Senate committee and recommendations that a Senate committee made over two years ago. They are simply questions asking whether or not the government has taken any action on the report of this committee of the Senate.

Senator Murray: I appreciate those points too, honourable senators.

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS

STATUS OF TIBET—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to supplement a question I asked the Leader of the Government last week on the subject of Tibet as an occupied country. At that time I said I did not have the document that prompted the question. I now have that document and I find that it is a statement issued by a member on the other side, but it looks to be on the letterhead of some Tibetan organization. I do not intend to put the entire document on the record, although it is only one page, but will use it as a retroactive preamble to the question I asked last week.

The dateline is Washington, D.C, October 29, 1991. The first paragraph reads:

> The United States Congress has declared Tibet an "occupied country" whose "true representatives are the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan Government in exile." The bill was part of the State Department Authorization Act which President Bush signed on October 28. According to Congressional staff, the State Department did little to lobby against the bill.

When I originally put the question, I said that I thought it was a document from the State Department. I was wrong. It is actually a bill, and the State Department only figured in the document to the extent that I just mentioned, namely that the State Department did little to lobby against the bill.

The second paragraph reads:

> The bill notes that numerous declarations by the United States since the 1949 Chinese invasion of Tibet have recognized Tibet's right to self-determination and the illegality of China's occupation. However, since the early 1970s, the United States government has done little to recognize the plight of Tibet.

The next paragraph speaks of a statement which the North American representative to the Assembly of Tibetan People's Deputies, the Tibetan government-in-exile, made in Montreal.

The next paragraph deals with a statement by the Chinese government.

The fifth paragraph reads as follows:

> Other portions of the bill are significant such as the definition of Tibet. The bill states that Tibet includes those areas incorporated into the Chinese provinces of Sichuan, Yunnan, Gansu and Qinghai . . . .

The paragraph continues with more detail about these definitions.

• (1500)

The sixth paragraph states:

> The bill was widely supported in both the House and the Senate. In the Senate, the bill was introduced by the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senators Pell (D-RI) along with Senators Helms (R-NC) and Moynihan (D-NY). In the House, the bill was backed by a broad coalition of members including Berman (D-CA), Dymally (D-CA), Gejdenson (D-CT), Gilman (R-NY), Lantos (D-CA), Porter (R-IL) and Rose (D-NC).

The last paragraph reads:

> This bill comes just 2 months after the United Nations Human Rights Subcommission passed a resolution expressing concern at the threat to "the distinct cultural, religious and national identity of the Tibetan people.

Honourable senators, I mention this matter because the question I put to the Leader of the Government was incomplete. By doing so, I am not pressing him for an answer, but simply making the record clearer when the two are read together, namely, what I said today and the question of last week. I will pass the whole document on to the Leader of the Government.

[Senator Frith.]

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: I have two delayed answers. The first is in answer to a question by Senator Bonnell regarding Prince Edward Island and the effect of the virus investigation on the seed potato industry. The other is in answer to a question by Senator Perrault regarding exclusion of Canadian lumber from the European Economic Community.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—LOCATION OF CONSTRUCTION HEADQUARTERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorne Bonnell on November 19, 1991)

The specific bridge designs from each of the three remaining consortia have been submitted to Public Works Canada (PWC). PWC will now - with the assistance of a panel of independent ice-experts-determine whether each bridge design meets the environmental criteria, including the 2 day ice-out delay as identified by the Environmental Assessment Review Panel.

Those companies which meet the environmental criteria will be asked to submit financial bids to Public Works.

Although Premier Ghiz has recently made a public statement concerning the location of the construction site office, he has not officially communicated this to the Minister of Public Works. A decision on the location of the construction site office would be made solely by the winning consortium.

The fixed link will proceed only if the project can be proven to be environmentally sound and financially viable.

FORESTRY

EXCLUSION OF CANADIAN LUMBER FROM THE EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Raymond Perrault on November 26, 1991)

The Government is deeply concerned that the European Economic Community (EEC) failed to take a decision on extending the derogation required to allow imports of green Canadian softwood lumber beyond the end of this year.

The Government expects that there will be a positive decision in our favour and is fully aware of the urgency involved. The industry is negotiating contracts now for delivery in the first quarter of 1992 and these are in jeopardy if the EEC does not move quickly.

The Minister of International Trade has instructed our ambassador in Brussels to press this concern and a letter outlining Canada's concerns was delivered on Friday, November 22 to EC Agriculture Commissioner, Ray Mac Sharry. Senior Canadian Mission officials have been in constant contact with high-level EC officials with the aim of accelerating the decision-making process.

On November 27, the Minister of Agriculture discussed this issue with Mr. Mac Sharry by telephone.

Mr. Mac Sharry indicated his confidence that Canada would receive a one-year extension of the derogation at a meeting to be held on December 16; The Minister of International Trade has written to Mr. Mac Sharry on November 28 re-emphasizing the government's concerns and requesting an even speedier resolution of the issue.

Canada and the EC are involved in a joint scientific research project which will hopefully lead to an acceptable solution to this problem. The Government's aim is to ensure long term, secure access to the EC market for all Canadian forest products.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION TABLED

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND REGIONAL TRUNK ROAD AGREEMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 14 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Canada Labour Code (geographic certification).

He said: Honourable senators, the legislation before us was tabled and passed last Friday in the House of Commons and deals with geographic certification in order to promote stable industrial relations in the longshoring industry. Section 34 of the Code permits the Canada Labour Relations Board to grant geographic certification orders in the longshoring sector to unions representing the employees of two or more employers in a given region or port, provided that the employers draw their employees from a common labour pool.

The purpose of this bill is to correct certain drafting deficiencies identified in the wording of section 34. The language therein has prevented the intended application of the geographic certification provisions.

[Translation]

When the Canada Labour Relations Board grants geographical certification under the present provisions of section 34, the employers of the employees in the bargaining unit must appoint a representative to act on their behalf and authorize that representative to discharge the duties and responsibilities of an employer, in the meaning of Part I of the Code.

However, there is no provision for the eventuality that one or more employers refuse to appoint a representative or authorize a representative to act on their behalf or that the employers do not agree on the choice of representative. In that case, it may be impossible to implement the provisions of section 34 as intended.

This is is what happened at the ports of Trois-Rivières and Bécancour, when one of the employers, who objected to the representative's appointment, obtained an injunction from the Quebec Superior Court, prohibiting the representative from entering into a collective agreement. The members of the union are now on a legal strike, which may go on for as long as the representative appointed by the employers is prevented by this injunction from entering into a collective agreement.

The proposed legislation would correct certain omissions in the Code.

Under the provisions of this bill, the Board can appoint an employer representative if the employers affected by geographical certification do not do so themselves within the timeframe set by the Board. The representative thus appointed is deemed to be the employer of all the employees in the bargaining unit, for the purposes of Part I of the Code, and has all the requisite powers to discharge the duties and responsibilities of an employer, including the power to enter into a collective agreement.

Moreover, the Board can determine any question that arises under section 34, including any question relating to the choice or appointment of the employer representative.

Under the bill, the employer representative must represent equitably the employers on behalf of whom he acts. This duty is similar to the one imposed by article 37 of the Code to unions representing their members.

If an employer thinks that the employer representative acted in a matter that is arbitrary, discriminatory or in bad faith in the discharge of the duties and responsibilities that he assumes as an employer, he can lodge a complaint to the Board. In case of inadequate representation, the Board can order the employer representative to correctly discharge his duties, or it can make any order that it deems appropriate to correct the offence.

Under the transitional provisions, the agents appointed under the existing provisions of section 34 are deemed to be employer representatives appointed under that bill as of the date that the legislation comes into force.

[English]

These are the essential elements behind the legislation before us. I believe, however, that it might be useful if I acquainted honourable senators with some of the historical background behind the current difficulties.

During the 1960s, the longshoring industry along the St. Lawrence endured several strikes which led to the establishment of three industrial inquiry commissions. Two of the resulting reports contained recommendations on the deployment of longshore workers, introduction of a job security plan, and the realignment of employers.

Over and above this, the federal government in 1966 charged the Woods Task Force to investigate the general condition of labour relations in Canada. The task force made recommendations on the concept of geographic certification. They resulted in the adoption by Parliament in 1973 of what is now section 34 of the Canada Labour Code.

Concurrent with the work of the Industrial Inquiry Commissions, the Shipping Federation of Canada and the Interprovincial Association of Stevedoring companies realized that the labour difficulties in the ports were due in part to a lack of coordination by the employers. In late 1968, the two organizations formed the Maritime Employers Association to represent dock employers in their dealings with the unions.

The adoption of section 34 and a better coordination among the employers have allowed for implementation of a job security guarantee plan for the longshore workers and an equitable sharing of costs among Stevedoring companies. These elements contributed substantially to peaceful and harmonious labour relations. There were only two longshoring work stoppages during 13 rounds of negotiations since the last back-to-work legislation affecting St. Lawrence ports in 1975.

It was not, in fact, until 1987 that the underpinnings of section 34 were shaken. In essence, it was a dispute involving longshoring activities in the ports of Trois-Rivières and Bécancour that made certain deficiencies in the wording of this article apparent.

This would be a good time to locate these two regions for those who are not familiar with them: Trois-Rivières is located about halfway between Montreal and Quebec City on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, while Bécancour is located directly across from Trois-Rivières on the south shore and both are linked by a bridge of approximately one quarter of a mile in length. Under an agreement, longshoremen in Bécancour and Trois-Rivières can work in either of the two ports.

In July 1987, the Labour Relations Board issued a geographic certification order covering longshore workers in Trois-Rivières and Bécancour. The board also ordered the longshoring companies in the two ports to appoint an agent to represent them. One of the employers did not respond and the board designated the agent chosen by the other employers. The dissident employer contested the two board decisions before the Federal Court of Appeal.

The Federal Court of Appeal rejected the two applications for review in August 1988 but noted the ambiguities and deficiencies it found in section 34. For instance, the section could be interpreted as requiring unanimous consent of all the affected employers on the choice of an agent. On the other hand, the Labour Code did not provide for the possibility of an objection by an employer to an appointment.

While the Federal Court of Appeal did not find the drafting deficiency fatal to the Labour Board's rulings, the Quebec Superior Court, by applying the civil law principle of "mandataire" or "agent", concluded that section 34 did not explicitly permit an agent to act on behalf of an employer without the latter's express agreement.

In August 1988, as a result of a request by the dissident employer, the Quebec Superior Court issued a temporary injunction preventing the agent from concluding an agreement in the employer's name without its authorization. The permanent injunction was issued in February 1990. A strike affecting the two ports commenced on September 27 of this year and continues to this moment. The injunction of the Quebec Superior Court has eliminated any possibility of a settlement and there is a risk that the strike could continue as long as the appointed agent is prevented by the injunction from concluding a collective agreement.

As you can gather, honourable senators, all these circumstances—plus the possibility of the spread of stalemates of this kind elsewhere—testify forcefully in favour of an amendment to the Code. These improvements, which have been made at the behest of both affected unions and employers, will clarify the intent of section 34 with respect to geographic certification.

Under the terms of the proposed amendments, once the Canada Labour Relations Board grants a geographic certification, it is also entitled to name the employers' representative if they do not do so themselves within a time period determined by the board. The amendments before us would empower the board to hear and to determine any question concerning the application of section 34, including the choice and appointment of an employer's representative.

Furthermore, under the provisions of the bill, the employer's representative is required to represent all the employers fairly. The board will hear complaints in this regard and may subsequently make rulings which it deems appropriate to redress any violation.

Honourable senators, this provision will protect the interests of individual employers, maintain the integrity of the legislative system introduced in 1973, and ensure continued application of existing geographic certifications in ports across the country. It will also provide the ports of Trois-Rivières and Bécancour with an opportunity to resolve their labour dispute.

As I indicated at the outset, the purpose of this bill is to correct drafting deficiencies identified by the courts by clarifying the application of section 34 as intended by Parliament when it was adopted in 1973.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is not much that can be usefully added to the clear and even exhaustive description of this bill just put forward by the Deputy Leader of the Government. I wish to say a word or to two to highlight why we support this bill. As pointed out, it concerns the longshoremen in Trois-Rivières who have been without a collective agreement since 1985 and who have now been on strike for two months.

There are two ports in Trois-Rivières. There is the port of Trois-Rivières and the port of Bécancour. Although the longshoremen in the two ports obtained certification, the marine employers in the two ports have been feuding, I understand, about who should be the employer with respect to this bargaining unit, with the result that the union has no one with whom to collectively bargain.

This is the reason why I think this bill deserves support. As Senator Lynch-Staunton has pointed out, or at least implied, it fills a potential hole in the collective bargaining process, one that one would not normally think about. Normally, one thinks of the employer and unions fighting for certification of a bargaining agent to deal with the one employer who is clearly defined. Here we have in a sense the opposite situation. Rather than the employer saying, "We do not know who to bargain with, you will have to give certification," the union is saying, "We are ready but we do not know who to bargain with because of the dispute amongst the employers."

The amendment in the legislation then provides, as Senator Lynch-Staunton states, a solution to that situation. When the Canadian Labour Relations Board certifies the local trade union "it may appoint an employer representative of its own choosing if the employer does not do it himself within the time frame specified by the board." That is a quote from Mr. Pierre Vincent, parliamentary secretary to the Deputy Minister and Minister of Finance.

For these reasons, and the reasons put forward by Senator Lynch-Staunton, it is understandable why the union very badly wants this bill. They have had no pay increase since 1985, and no possibility of obtaining one until they have an employer to negotiate with. As we understand it, the union would like this bill passed as soon as possible and, as far as we have been able to determine, therefore, they have no interest in appearing before the Senate to explain their position, as was done on the two previous occasions when we moved into Committee of the Whole to hear the minister on what was, in effect, back-to-work legislation. To some extent this is in the same category.

There is no reason that we should dwell on this matter any further, except to hear from the minister to ensure that what Senator Lynch-Staunton and I have said is correct. If it is, then there is no reason why we should dwell on this bill, particularly because it is beneficial to labour and apparently the employers feel that it is also necessary for their interests.

The only criticism that could possibly be laid on the government in this case is that they may have waited too long before taking this positive step. However, better late than never. We are ready to support the bill and support a reference to a Committee of the Whole in order to confirm with the minister that what we have now put on the record is correct. If it is, we will support the bill at third reading.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Briefly, I would add a word on the general parliamentary practice. The parliamentary practices that we follow, inherited from the British parliamentary system, have evolved over the years in a very sensible manner and have a reason for their existence. The stages of first reading, second reading, and the separation of those with time, ensures that all members have the opportunity to read bills before they are asked to pass on them, and that anyone in the general public who may have an interest in the matter has an opportunity to come forward and express their views to Members of Parliament.

I think it is very important that we keep that in mind and that we resist at all times the pressures of government and the bureaucracy who want to hasten all these things and find reasons why it has to be done instantly, instead of following the standard parliamentary practice. I make this point because this is the third time in this session that we have been asked to pass back-to-work legislation in a hurry. I understand the circumstances, but I just want to make my point very clear that if we resist this practice, it is because we believe that it is wrong in principal to proceed in this way. This practice should only be followed when it is absolutely essential to do so.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I move that the bill be now referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The Hon. The Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Gerald R. Ottenheimer in the Chair.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, if we are ready, I will ask the Minister of Labour to join us. I hate to say these are regular visitors, but I welcome the Minister of Labour back again, hopefully for the last time this year' for his sake and ours. Accompanying the Minister are Michael McDermott, Senior Assistant Deputy, Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, and, Marie-Claude Turgeon, Legal Counsel. I believe the Minister may have a statement to make.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-44, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code, (geographic certification). Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: I understand the honourable Minister has a statement.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Marcel Danis, Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Honourable senators, contrary to other bills that I had to introduce here, this one is rather of a technical nature and intends to correct an error in the legislation that was passed in 1973, I believe. That legislation which was about certification . . .

[English]

It was challenged in court in the early 1980s. The case is still pending. This has had the following effect on the people who work at the docks of Trois-Rivière and Bécancour.

[Translation]

The dockers in Trois-Rivières and Bécancour have not had an opportunity to sign an agreement with their employers, who seem to be divided into two groups, the group called MEA and another group, Les terminaux portuaires du Québec.

If you pass this bill, honourable senators, it will have the effect of allowing employers to group themselves into a marine association. In that case, assuming that an agreement is reached, dockers could have a collective agreement, a first since 1985. So, they have not had any salary increase, which is why this bill is urgently needed.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Chairman: Thank you, Minister. Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Minister, if this situation dates back to 1985, why this sudden urgency?

Mr. Danis: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It is urgent because the longshoremen have been working in the same port without any salary increase and without a new contract for over six years now. A strike was started about two months ago. It seems that it is legally impossible for employers to sign a contract until this bill is passed.

There was no real emergency, since there is not really a strike, but nevertheless, these people did not get a pay raise since 1985.

Senator Molgat: I understand very well the problem from a union perspective and I can see why the employees want a settlement.

What I do not understand, if they have been on strike for two months, is why you did not introduce this bill six weeks ago?

Mr. Danis: We were hopeful at that time that the two parties could settle their differences. We were expecting an agreement between the employers, and I met with the two groups of employers to try and obtain such an agreement, but it proved impossible.

I could not talk what I would call the minority group into joining voluntarily with the majority group, MEA, so that we could have a contract. TPQ won in the court and was granted an injunction preventing MEA from signing.

At that time we were confident a settlement could be reached. Knowing the way our court system works, it might be years before this problem is settled judicially.

I think it is in the public's best interest that we pass this bill.

Senator Molgat: When was this injunction granted to one of the employers?

Mr. Danis: I think there was a temporary injunction towards the end of 89. It was made permanent at the beginning of the 90's.

The case is now under appeal. Unfortunately, even though I often pleaded in front of the Court of Appeal, I cannot say. As far as I know, no hearing date has yet been given.

Senator Molgat: How long has it been before the Appeal Court?

Mr. Danis: I think, Senator, that the appeal was filed at the beginning of 1990.

Senator Molgat: So, why didn't you act before? I don't understand how your department could let that situation go on so long without taking action.

Mr. Danis: My department organized conciliatory meetings between the parties. In fact, the problem could very well be solved without a Court decision.

We thought that the parties could come to a friendly solution but they did not. That's why we waited before proceeding with the bill. We hoped that the parties could come to an agreement. We concluded that that was not possible and I would add, Senator, that the strike may have prompted my department into acting more quickly.

Senator Molgat: But still, the strike has been going on for two months, am I not right?

Mr. Danis: The strike is two months old. I met both parties to try to bring them together and get an agreement but that was simply impossible.

That's when, I decided to introduce the bill that is before you today.

• (1530)

Senator Molgat: On the union side, does everybody agree on the adoption of this bill?

Mr. Danis: Yes, senator.

Senator Molgat: There is no dissent?

Mr. Danis: Not that I know of, senator.

Senator Molgat: On the employers side, is there only one who does not agree, or are there several of them?

Mr. Danis: There are two employers associations. There is one called Maritime Employers Association, and that one agrees on this legislation. And there is another one called Les terminaux portuaires du Québec, and that one does not agree.

This bill would allow the Canadian Labour Relations Board to appoint a management representative. So, it would be up to both employers in the Trois-rivières and Bécancour harbours to choose a representative, MEA or TPQ. If they could not agree on this, then a representative woukd be appointed by the Canadian Labour Relations Board.

TPQ has told us that the companies they represent do not want to join MEA et prefer to settle themselves their labour relations problems. When the former government, in 1973 I think, adopted a bill on regional certification, they did so in order to prevent or reduce labour relations problems in similar locations.

I believe that the bill adopted by the then liberal government was a good one. Everybody seems to agree on the regional certification principle, but here we have two associations willing to represent the employers.

I think that there should be only one. I ask you today to adopt this bill et leave it to the Canadian Labour Relations Board to appoint a group, either one or the other, I do not mind.

Senator Molgat: Is there an equal number of employers in each group or is there a dominant group? What is the situation?

Mr. Danis: The TPQ group is representing itself as an employer and all the other employers have the MEA as their authorized agent for now.

Senator Molgat: In other words, the TPQ represent only one group. Despite conciliatory efforts, you have met directly with both these groups to try to explain to them the situation, but to no avail?

Mr. Danis: To no avail, senator. The main reason is that the TPQ group wants to negotiate on its own with the long-shoremen, without the presence of the MEA, the biggest employers' negotiator in Canada in that area. TPS wants to negotiate just for its group. We think it would be in the interest of the whole country to have only one group negotiating on behalf of the employers in that field.

Not that we favour the MEA, but we want only one group to negotiate on behalf of all employers.

Senator Bolduc: What would be the advantage in having an employers' coalition?

Mr. Danis: The advantage of having only one employer is that there will be only one collective agreement and a system where longshoremen working aboard one ship could at any given time work aboard another one and still belong to the same group of workers in both ports, those of Trois-Rivières and Bécancour.

We believe this will bring about more stable labour relations if there is only one employer on both shores of the St. Lawrence.

Senator Molgat: Will this bill, if passed, introduce a system of a kind that does not exist elsewhere or will the situation be similar to that in other ports?

Mr. Danis: Honourable senator, the same situation exists in cities like Montreal, Quebec City, Halifax or St. John's, Newfoundland. It is not unique in any way. In this case, we are trying to correct a problem by implementing a system similar to that existing elsewhere. Everywhere else, the MEA negotiates on behalf of employers.

Senator Molgat: Since that is the way things are done elsewhere and that TPQ knew you were ready to present that bill, was it not willing to back down and negotiate a settlement rather than have the Parliament step in?

Mr. Danis: I really thought it would happen and that TPQ would come to an agreement with MEA.

Now, should you decide to pass this bill today, nothing prevents employers in Trois-Rivières or Bécancour from choosing TPQ if they wish.

This bill will enable the Canada Labour Relations Board to designate an association to represent employers. It could be either one. TPQ does not think so and says that if the Board makes a decision, MEA will be chosen. It says that once an employer is represented by MEA in cities like Montreal or St. John's, Newfoundland, for example, it is bound to be MEA all the way. That is why TPS is against this bill. If there is an agreement between the employers and the MEA, I assume it is a private agreement. That is why the bill is worded in this way. The bill does not provide that the MEA shall be the employer association. The bill obliges the employers to have a representative. They can choose whoever they want.

Senator Molgat: If we have one employer with a specific point of view on one side and several employers with a different point of view on the other side, whoever is representing the single party will probably lose, right?

Mr. Danis: Probably. The Canada Labour Relations Board has already heard a similar case, and at the time, it chose the MEA.

I cannot anticipate what the Board's decision would be if it were asked to rule in the Trois-Rivières and Bécancour case.

Senator Molgat: I realize that your bill does not impose one, but to me, the situation is quite clear.

Isn't one of the reasons why Parliament should never act too hastily that someone's interests may be harmed as a result of our decision, and shouldn't this individual or group have a chance to express their point of view?

If we expedite this bill as requested . . . We didn't ask for the union to be present, because we were told they had no objections, that they all agreed. You just said so yourself.

Obviously, there is no agreement among the employers. This means that what we are about to do will be unfair to one individual or group, which will not have had a chance to respond. I don't think this is the right approach.

Mr. Danis: Honourable senators, geographical certification was discussed extensively by Parliament in 1972. It was then decided to go ahead. This bill simply corrects a technical defect in the 1972 legislation. I can tell you, honourable senators, that I have had a fair number of communications with TPQ; their counsel made representations to our party and, I believe, to the official opposition as well. I think that they have had opportunities to make their point. This bill is nothing new. I respectfully submit that this is simply to correct a technical defect.

At that time, I met with them to explain what was the situation. When I met with TPQ, MEA and the union, I even gave them a copy of the bill that I was preparing, to ask them for possible changes, amendments or the like. They came back with suggestions that were incorporated in the legislation in front of us, but those suggestions are not substantial.

I had no intention, senator, to change the substance of the 1972 legislation, the one from the Liberals, because I think that it was a good legislation. I gave them as much opportunity to be heard as I could; I even gave them copies of the bill so that they would not have any surprises and TPQ would not know for example what was going on. I think that they had a fair opportunity to be heard and that this bill is reasonable.

Senator Molgat: Mr. minister, it is always a pleasure to see you, of course, but we find that this is happening to often. With all those bills sent to us in such a way that we have to pass them expedetiously, we do not find that this represents a proper functioning of the parliamentary system. We believe that our parliamentary system reflects fundamental considerations and that it is not proper to by-pass our system. Thank you, this puts an end to my questions. With all due respect for you personnally, I hope that we will not see you for a while in similar circumstances.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the minister how many employees will be affected by this bill.

Mr. Danis: About 200. Between 140 and 200 employees work in these ports.

Senator Kinsella: Who is the bargaining agent for these 200 employees right now?

Mr. Danis: All in all, there are about 200 employees. I would say about 140 of them work in Trois-Rivières more often than on the other side. The MEA represents those 140 employees. On the other side, at Bécancourt, there may be 60 workers. The MEA was also representing them until the TPQ group got an injunction to prevent the MEA from signing the collective agreement. So, in Trois-Rivières, the MEA is the bargaining agent, but on the other side, although it should be the MEA, and we thought it would be the MEA, it could be the TPQ group. But with this bill, nothing would stop the employers on both sides to choose the TPQ group. If we look at what happened in the past, the Canadian Relation Board has chosen the MEA. But we cannot tell who they would choose in the future if the employers cannot reach an agreement.

● (1540)

Senator Kinsella: With the first group, what is the nature of the membership relationship of those employees with that syndicate? Is it a closed shop or is it not a closed shop?

Mr. Danis: It is a hiring-hall, closed-shop operation, Le syndicat canadien de la fonction publique.

Senator Kinsella: Therefore this bill does not affect that relationship, that closed-shop relationship?

Mr. Danis: None whatsoever.

Senator Kinsella: In closing, Mr. Minister, to follow on the honourable the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, we always look forward to your coming before the Committee of the Whole and we also look forward, in addition, to seeing your new assistant deputy minister Mr. Capello at your side.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: If there are no more questions, I would like to thank the honourable minister and his associates from his department for the assistance they lend the Committee of the Whole today.

Shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole to which was referred Bill C-44, to amend the Canada Labour Code (geographic certification), has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): At the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am ready to accept this suggestion, but I should make it clear that in the past, when we were asked to set our rules aside, the issues affected both labour unions and employers. Each time, we demanded that labour representatives as well as the minister have the opportunity to be heard. We did not make the same kind of request this time because we were given assurances that all unions were in agreement and did not oppose this bill. This should not be considered a precedent in the future, and I hope that we will not have to meet for similar reasons.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I move that Bill C-15, to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports, be read the third time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, will the sponsor of this bill make any more comments?

Senator Grimard: Not at this time, honourable senators.

[English]

Senator Frith: I wish to correct the record. On an earlier occasion, I said that this bill was a successor to a previous bill. It was in the sense that the previous bill was C-85 before prorogation. However, in this session, this bill has been before us on June 17, 1991, and September 18, 1991, for debate. In June, in the Debates of the Senate at page 220, I drew to the attention of the Senate a letter that I had received just a day or two earlier from the retiring Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. D'Iberville Fortier. It is at page 220 that the wording of his letter is read into the record, and he draws attention to this bill, and particularly to section 4(1) of the bill.

In June of 1991, having read into the record Mr. Fortier's letter in which he takes dead aim at that particular section, I then moved the adjournment of the debate, hoping that honourable senators would have an opportunity to read what D'Iberville Fortier said in his carefully reasoned letter, which asked that section 4(1) be removed because of the effect I later described in further detail in my remarks on September 18, 1991.

I do ask honourable senators on both sides to have a look at those two issues of the Debates of the Senate, that is June 17 and September 18, 1991, because I do want, if possible, to take all partisanship out of the proposal that I am about to make to the Senate by way of amendment.

Having had some experience in this field as a member of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, and as legal counsel to the first Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Spicer, I know that there are a number of people on all sides who certainly support the spirit and the letter of the Official Languages Act. I do believe that what is happening with section 4 (1) is a mistake.

I have some reservations about whether or not airports ought to be privatized, but I do not want to debate that now. I do, however, want to call on all senators to focus their attention on the fact that, in the course of this privatization, a very hard-won principle of the application of the Official Languages Act is being dashed. That is the principle that the Official Languages Act applies to federal institutions and to concessionaires or subcontractors of federal institutions where those concessionaires serve the same clientele as the institution does.

I can assure you, and as I pointed out in September, that principle was established after long efforts by the office of the Commissioner of Official Languages, of which I was a part at the time, to make it clear that, for example, at a car rental agency in a federal institution, namely an airport, service had to be provided in both languages—not just at Air Canada's counter; not just at the information counter for the Department of Transport, but at the counter of the concessionaire, in this case taking as an example the car rental agency.

Section 4 effectively reverses all that progress by saying that, in effect, the Official Languages Act will not apply to such concessionaires. They may offer services in both languages, but they are free to choose. They will not be required to offer service in both languages as they were previously under the principles established and then imposed by the Department of Transport. That is the point made by Mr. Fortier.

In September, I said I was certain that the first Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Spicer, would have opposed this amendment. I speculated with some certainty—and I have heard nothing from either of them to contradict or to quarrel with my assumption—that the subsequent commissioner, namely Mr. Yalden, would have disagreed with this change. Of course, we know where Mr. Fortier stands because we have heard from him. That leaves only the new Commissioner of Official Languages, Dr. Goldbloom.

Dr. Goldbloom appeared before the Committee on Transport and Communications and was asked what his feeling was about Mr. Fortier's position on the section that I believe should be amended.

At page 3:49 of the session on the 21st of November last, Senator Molgat said:

> Then the big question when we examine clause 4 is whether we should include Parts V, VI and VII in clause 4 as proposed.

[English]

Or, in the other column:

> Then the big question when we examine clause 4 is whether we should include Parts V, VI and VII in clause 4 as proposed.
>
> Mr. Goldbloom: That would be my recommendation.
> Senator Molgat: I would like to come back to a detail you mentioned a moment ago, third parties under contract. If I understood you correctly, some statements have been made through the Department of Justice. When we examine clause 4(2), it seems to me it could be subject to considerable dispute. Would it not be better simply to eliminate clause 4(2) and thus not have this problem?
> Mr. Goldbloom: I am not a legal specialist, and I cannot answer that from a legal perspective, but my impression is that that would be a desirable way of clarifying Parliament's intention.

Senator Molgat: So it would be quite clear that there is no way to circumvent the Act. Thank you. You have answered my questions fully and very satisfactorily.

Previously, Senator Molgat had put to Dr. Goldbloom, the new Commissioner, the position taken by D'Iberville Fortier and Dr. Goldbloom unqualifiedly supported the position taken by D'Iberville Fortier.

Therefore with regard to this clause, honourable senators, we are told in unqualified terms by a succession of commissioners of official languages, agents of Parliament established under the act to advise Parliament on the question of the Official Languages Act, empowered under the act, in fact given the duty under the act, to uphold the provisions of the act, that it would be a mistake to leave this clause in the legislation, that we should take it out because it is reversing years of progress in the administration of the Official Languages Act.

Why do we not take their advice? If it were a matter of dispute we might want to take the advice of one or two of the disputants, but in this case there is no dispute whatever that the legislation should not contain such a provision. Therefore I call on all champions of the Official Languages Act and the progress made since the late 1960s in this field to listen to the people whom we have picked to act as our advisers on the Official Languages Act. I ask all of you who feel that the Official Languages Act should be supported, that the advice of the constitutionally constituted champions of the act should be followed, to support the following amendment. I move:

> That clause 4 of Bill C-15 be deleted and replaced by the following:
> 4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date the Official Languages Act applies to the airport authority, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if
> (a) the authority were a federal institution; and
> (b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

That will remedy the vice discovered by Commissioners Fortier and Goldbloom, and I think it deserves the support of all honourable senators.

The Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Perhaps I can add a word, albeit not in debate. Perhaps I am being too Pollyanna about this, but I sense some support for the principle that I am talking about. Therefore I hope that we will not determine this matter today because if I am right that there are some who would support the amendment to this clause, then I think we should be sure that we get it right. It may be that some honourable senators on the other side, or even on this side, might have some differences with the wording of the amendment and feel that it might be otherwise worded to achieve an agreed objective. Senator Simard asked for a copy, and I hope that honourable senators will have a chance to look at the wording of the amendment as it will appear in tomorrow's Minutes of the Procedings of the Senate and Debates of the Senate. That is not intended to stop any debate on the issue now, of course.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I have no problem with Senator Frith's suggestion. It is perfectly justified. Did you suggest we should discuss this tomorrow, Senator Frith?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think the debate could go on. Senators way want to participate and Senator Grimard may wish to examine this amendment. It is the same as the one moved in committee. At the same time, there are other reasons we may wish to debate this amendment in the sense that there is a possibility we could agree not only on the principle but also on the wording.

The Hon. the Speaker: I should inform honourable senators that copies of the amendment in both languages are being made and will be distributed momentarily.

Senator Frith: This is certainly possible, honourable senators. As I said, we are in no hurry to end the debate today. Perhaps, we could postpone the debate until tomorrow. We could then examine in an official way the amendment made, as is required by the Rules of the Senate.

Senator Grimard: Honourable senator, your suggestion is fine with me.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Just to be clear, Senator Frith, I understand that you have proposed an amendment but have yet to move it.

Senator Frith: I am moving it. I have also moved the adjournment of the debate, but someone else may wish to take the adjournment. I was urging someone to do so in order that everyone could have a look at the wording of the amendment overnight and we could take a day or two to look at it.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Did Senator Simard ask for the adjournment in his name? I did not get that point. Does Senator Simard want to talk? I would also like to say something on that point, but not at this time.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I take great interest in this issue. I have spent several hours examining this bill. I have been in contact with the Office of the Official Languages Commissioner. For all these good reasons, I would like to propose the adjournment of the debate to enable me to study the amendment proposed by Senator Frith.

On motion of Senator Simard, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE
NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT
YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator DeWare, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella, for the second reading of Bill C-30, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, first of all, I wish to thank Senator DeWare for her explanation of Bill C-30 last Thursday. I have listened with interest in the hope that some of my concerns about the bill would be satisfied during her presentation. I regret to say that some of my reservations about some aspects of this bill are still there. Nevertheless, I hasten to assure honourable senators that I intend to support the principle of the bill so that it can be moved on to committee.

Bill C-30, by the long title: an Act to Amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act, is an attempt through legislation to address a serious discrepancy between how our current criminal justice system treats an accused person who is mentally disordered and what is acceptable treatment according to Canadian society today.

The Swain v. The Queen, a Supreme Court Charter decision handed down in May, underscored the necessity for a reconciliation between the specific law and the fundamental attitudes of Canadians as expressed in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The court found that the present law violated the Charter rights of the mentally ill, as well as principles of fundamental justice and freedom as a result of arbitrary detention. The decision requires Parliament to enact remedial legislation to address the concerns of the court. Therefore, the need for legislation is unquestioned. Where there is a question, however, is in making the determination of whether this bill will satisfy the needs of the Charter as well as being good public policy.

There are two objectives of the bill. The first is to improve protection of society against those few mentally disordered accused who are dangerous. The second is to recognize that those accused have the fundamental right to due process and fairness under the law. Both objectives are, of course, laudable.

The bill would introduce a cap on the length of time an accused can be detained on the basis of his mental health. Caps vary from two years to ten to life, depending on the severity of the crime. This mechanism is intended to generate more fairness in the system by providing a rough equivalence between the way law treats sane offenders and the way it treats those who are mentally disordered. The cap assures that people will not get lost in the bureaucracy of the system.

Also central to this bill is an effort to reconcile the justice system's relationship with the provinces and their review boards. Bill C-30 regularizes the system by making review boards compulsory and allotting them specific responsibilities. They take over the determination role from the provincial lieutenant governor.

Still, beyond the logic and need for these provisions and others, there are unresolved questions about this bill from a policy standpoint as well as from the standpoint of how the legislation would impact the existing policy environment. For instance, there is already a distinct lack of facilities and staff for the treatment that is needed to help those people who currently find themselves considered insane by the court system. I am concerned that the drain on the system is going unaddressed and that it will only get worse.

I would hope that the government will soon introduce social policies that will recognize the environment that will exist after the implementation of this legislation; and, similarly, for the parole legislation currently being debated in the other place. We cannot sit here, away from the working level of the system, and simply legislate. Changes to the laws—which changes are warranted—are not enough to address the pressures on the system. There must be a concerted effort to address the associated needs of the system.

In fact, not only has the government not targeted any resources with the introduction of this legislation, it shifts the burden to provincial review boards. This bill will increase the load on the shoulders of the already overburdened provinces. It would give provincial governments greater responsibility while neglecting to provide them with any additional resources.

Another concern I have had is not so much with the bill itself but with the government's handling of the bill. It is obvious that the government was under serious time constraints to amend the Criminal Code as a result of the Supreme Court ultimatum; however, the government was well aware of the problem long before that decision. Knowing this was the case, I would have thought that the government could have drafted and tabled this bill with more dispatch so that there would be adequate time for parliamentary debate. As a consequence of the government's schedule, I am not confident that the ramifications of this important legislation have been sufficiently studied.

I understand that it takes time to compose a bill, but I would have hoped that the minister could have done a better job of anticipating the ruling of the Supreme Court that had been expected for some time before it was announced in May. With a little anticipation, the minister could have had a draft bill waiting for final editing.

It is not, after all, the first time that this government has looked at this subject matter. The Honourable John Crosbie had tabled a draft bill on this subject as far back as 1986. Nevertheless, we are faced with consideration of this bill today with little time to study the implications. That is why the provision for a parliamentary check on the legislation was deemed so important.

Section 36 of Bill C-30 requires evaluation to determine whether the legislation is meeting its objective. Clause 36(1) states:

> A comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this Act shall be undertaken within five years after the coming into force of any provision thereof, by such committee of the House of Commons as may be designated or established for that purpose.

Clause 36 (2) continues:

> The committee shall submit a report of the review to the House of Commons within one year after commencing it, or within such further time as the House of Commons may authorize.

I hope that these clauses, which were introduced in the other place by amendment, will keep the minister on her toes with regard to the bill's provisions. I hope that if the legislation does not work as intended, we will see amending legislation. You will note that there is no provision for review or report in the Senate of Canada.

This is serious legislation that will have serious consequences on the criminal justice system as well as on those who work with the system and those who find themselves within the system. This bill should not be considered as being perfect or the last word on dealing with the mentally disordered accused.

As for our current consideration of the bill, I support the principle of the bill and agree with Senator DeWare that it should be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for closer consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator DeWare speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Stanbury for his remarks and say that I agree with some of his points. I am glad to see that he agrees that the bill should go ahead.

Bill C-30 has received months and years of consultation with the federal-provincial governments and departments, as well as with interest groups and members of immediate families of some of these interned mentally accused. What has happened over this time of consultation has strengthened the bill and has made it acceptable to the parties concerned.

● (1620)

Honourable senators, if the bill received second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[Senator Stanbury.]

On motion of Senator DeWare, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL
COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATION BILL
TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES BILL
BANK BILL

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (subject-matter of the following Bills: Bill C-4, An Act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters; Bill C-19, An Act respecting banks and banking; Bill C-28, An Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies; and Bill C-34, An Act to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters), tabled in the Senate on 28th November, 1991.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise to make a few remarks on the third report of the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee on pre-study of four bills which, together, constitute a significant reform of the financial services industry in this country. It is appropriate to speak on the committee report at this point because when the bills come to us from the other place later this week they will be too large and technical to fully digest. There are a number of policy questions worth raising because they are discussed in the committee's report, and there have been a number of senators appointed since the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee last reported on this issue.

I ought to perhaps make a couple of observations at the outset of my remarks, honourable senators. One is to stress that the committee report before you is unanimous. Historically, with the notable exception last fall of the GST bill, for more than a decade, reports of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee have always been unanimous. Precisely because they have been unanimous, the industry and the government have paid considerable attention to what the committee has had to say.

On the broad subject of financial institution reform, the Senate began its study of that issue back in 1985 when we had a series of hearings that continued through much of the fall of 1985 and on into the spring. In May 1986 at the conclusion of those hearings, chaired by Senator Ian Sinclair in his capacity as Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee, the committee issued a report in response to a green paper from the government. The Government's green paper came out in the summer of 1985. We had hearings in the fall and through the winter, and in May 1986 a report was tabled entitled, "Towards a More Competitive Financial Environment". The government accepted the recommendations out of that report, which received favourable reaction from the four pillars of the financial services industry.

Two years later, following the election of 1988, the government produced a second paper which it called a blue paper. That paper came out in the fall of 1989 and was the subject of very extensive Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee hearings. In May 1990, four years after our first report, we did a second report based on the Government's blue paper, this time entitled "Canada 1992, Toward a National Market in Financial Institutions".

The reason I draw these two reports to the attention of the Senate is that a great many of the major principles outlined in those two reports have been incorporated in the four bills which will come before us in the next few days. I raise that because it is important, particularly for new members in this place, to understand that there has been a long history of the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee having a significant impact on the position the government ultimately adopts on major issues considered by our committee.

I would like to give three or four examples of elements of the current package of bills—and I repeat "package of bills"—because the four bills need to be taken collectively in order to understand how they reform financial institutions. The bills are designed to be a package which treats the financial services industry as an industry sector, as opposed to the historical way of treating banks separately from insurance companies, separate from trust companies and separate from co-operatives. It is worth noting that three or four of the major principles in this legislation first saw the light of day in terms of being recommended, as a result of originating with this committee.

In the report of May, 1986, the committee wrestled with the difficult question of how to deal with the relationship between financial institutions. We were only talking about trust companies in those days. How does one deal with the relationship between a financial institution which happens to be affiliated with, and indeed in some cases owned by, a commercial company? How does one prevent a situation in which, for example, loans that are not good loans from the financial arm, the trust company arm of a conglomerate, take place with its noncommercial arm? How does one deal with that cross-ownership issue?

We recommended in 1986 that security be obtained by ensuring that there was adequate public scrutiny of the transactions of the trust company. The way we proposed to do that, in the case of a conglomerate where there was a mixture of financial services on the one hand and commercial companies on the other, was to require that there be a 35 per cent public float, either in the shares of the trust company or in the shares of the parent holding company. This was done in order to ensure that a combination of the regulations that govern any public company, including the auditing procedures, would be required to expose very clearly the nature of any transaction between the financial arm and the nonfinancial arm.

That 35 per cent rule, as it subsequently became known, first appeared publicly in the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee in May, 1986. That is precisely the requirement that is in the legislation which will come before us next week in the sense that what the government has said is that if a sizeable financial institution, particularly a sizeable trust company, is part of a conglomerate, it will be required to have a 35 per cent public float to avoid the type of non-arm's-length transactions about which the committee had been concerned during its 1984 and 1985 hearings.

A second example of an idea related to the financial services sector which originally came forward as potential public policy was the discussion of self-dealing and how that ought to be handled. In 1985, the committee took a very strong view that in fact self-dealing ought to be completely banned. That was not the concept that had originally been proposed in the government's green paper back in the summer of 1985, yet we find in these bills are now coming before us wording on the self-dealing section that is virtually identical to what was recommended in our May, 1990, report in the sense that self-dealing is completely banned in these bills. This is another example of a case in which the work of the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee had a very clear impact on public policy.

I will give you a third example, one which was very controversial because it was opposed by the banking industry at the time the committee proposed it. In May of 1990 we wrestled with the question of supporting the so-called 10 per cent rule for banks. That is a rule which says that no single shareholder can own more than 10 per cent of a company. At the same time, we wanted to ensure that the chief executive officer of that company did not have a purely captive board, because one thing the 10 per cent rule does is it guarantees management succession since clearly it means that once you have a majority on the board, you will always have a majority on the board because no one can own more than 10 per cent. Therefore, in effect, you can never wrest control away from those who have it.

We wrestled in those hearings in 1990 with the question of how to balance the need for the 10 per cent rule. Incidentally, this was argued for not only by the existing financial institutions who had it, but also by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and by every leading economist. Virtually every witness who came before the committee argued for the 10 per cent rule because of the need to ensure that the major banks in Canada remained in Canadian hands and because the free trade agreement prevented the government from passing legislation which treated Americans differently from Canadians. Therefore, if you were to allow a Canadian to gain, for example, majority control of a bank, you would therefore automatically have allowed Americans to gain control of it as a result of the free trade agreement which explicitly prevents any different registration on ownership provisions between Canada and the United States on this question.

Therefore, the committee concluded that the 10 per cent rule made sense. However, our view was that the way in which you ensured there was some honest dialogue and some constraining force on the management of the bank was to insist, as we did in May of 1990, that at least half of the members of the board of directors be unaffiliated with the financial institution.

At that time, we took "unaffiliated" fairly far. We said it not only meant that you were not a manager of the company, that you were not an insider, but in fact, in the case of a bank, you could not represent a company that had borrowed significantly from that bank. Since perception is perhaps even more important than reality in this instance, the perception was that it would take a very unusual person to be able to stand up to the CEO of a bank and disagree with that CEO if that individual also owed that CEO a substantial amount of money.

Our view was that in fact "unaffiliated" also meant that you did not owe the bank a significant amount of money, nor, for example, were you a lawyer doing a significant amount of your business with or from that bank. We took a very arm's length —

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): How did you define "significant"?

Senator Kirby: "Significant" meant anything. That is to say, if you were employed by the bank as a lawyer, for example, you would automatically be considered affiliated with that bank and therefore not an independent director.

We argued for 50 per cent of independent directors. As one can imagine, that particular proposal was not looked on very kindly by the industry. The first time that independence of director issue had ever materialized for lengthy public debate was in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee's report of May of 1990.

What is interesting is what while the legislation that will come before us next week does not go as far as we would have liked in the sense that we argued that 50 per cent of the directors needed to be independent, in fact it requires that a third of the directors be independent. That is a very significant change in the make-up of the boards of major Canadian financial institutions. Again, I point out that it is a change that came about directly as a result of the work of this committee.

In the third report of the committee which is before you, we have touched on some other illustrative examples of the impact that the two previous sets of hearings of this committee had on the legislation before you. I wish I could tell you that all the major things that we had recommended in the past had been adopted, but that is not the case. There are two notable examples where the government has decided not to accept the committee's report. Again, let me emphasize that the two previous committee reports were unanimous committee reports. I think that is an important point to note.

One of the areas the government failed to address dealt with the question of the ability of banks to actually network in insurance. The committee had twice recommended, both in 1986 and in 1990, that banks ought to have the authority and the right to network in insurance by using their distribution network of better than 6,000 branches across the country as a way of retailing insurance. We believed it would decrease the overall cost of selling insurance and therefore, in fact, would be of benefit to the consumer. The government has decided not to allow that, even though, frankly, allowing networking would have been absolutely consistent with the overall thrust of this legislation, which is the collapse of the four pillars.

As I said in committee on a couple of occasions to the minister, it seems to me that, rather than risk the wrath of independent insurance agents across the country, who were mobilizing a lobby had the government supported networking, the government backed down in the face of that threatened lobby. It never materialized because the recommendation never materialized. It is clear, however, it seems to me, that the blocking of networking of insurance by banks, in fact, is counter to the whole basic thrust of the legislation.

The second way the government backed down and effectively chickened out in the face of a potentially very strong lobby was on the issue of automobile leasing. Again, twice our committee had recommended that financial deposit-taking institutions should be allowed to get into the automobile leasing business. We argued in that particular case that it made sense not only because it was consistent with the collapse of the pillars, but we also argued that it made sense because the biggest automobile leasing companies in Canada are all foreign owned. They are owned essentially by the major automobile companies, and it seemed to us that it was wrong for legislation to explicitly prohibit Canadian companies from getting into this lucrative part of the financial services market. In any event, again because of concern about a very heavy lobby campaign by automobile leasing dealers across the country, that major policy recommended by the committee was not adopted.

With the exception of those two issues, the networking of insurance by banks and the allowing of deposit-taking institutions into automobile leasing, every other major policy thrust in the two Banking, Trade and Commerce committee reports that I referred to earlier have, in fact, been adopted in some form or another in the bills that come before us.

• (1640)

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Kirby, pursuant to rule 38(4), I must advise you that your 15 minutes have expired. If honourable senators waive the provisions of that rule, then you may continue. Thus, I ask honourable senators if that is their wish.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, thank you for allowing me to complete my remarks.

All too often, the work of this chamber goes unnoticed. It is important to note that many of the preliminary, long-range studies conducted by committees of this place have a significant impact on government legislation. That is certainly the case as it concerns the package of bills which will come before us tomorrow or the day after.

I do not wish to comment on the specific bills. However, there are two issues which I would like to mention. They are touched on in a brief manner in the committee report. They are issues related to financial institutions, which I think are quite noteworthy.

The first concerns the fact that, tentatively, this package of bills will not be proclaimed until March 31 of next year. It will be proclaimed just in time for the start of the next fiscal year. The timing is important because the extension of bank charters which was granted a year and a half ago expires on April 12.

To get from the current legislation to the date of March 31 will require the passing of a significant number of regulations. As honourable senators will see when we receive the bills, that is so because they involve many sections which deal with regulations.

One thing the committee asked the government was whether or not it would be prepared to submit, in draft form, the major recommendations to the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee. I think it is an indication of the respect which both the industry and the Department of Finance have for the committee that the minister, Mr. Loiselle, agreed that the major regulations will come before the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee in draft form so that we can hold public hearings on them before they are locked in. Again, it is an unusual situation to have the government agree voluntarily to hold hearings on draft regulations so that we can amend them and give the government input on them prior to their being implemented.

The second issue which ought to be noted concerns what happens any time major institutions or industries are changed. Frankly, while all of us, including people in the government, the industry, the other place and here, all have views on what the likely impact of these change will be, the reality is that no one really knows. Once market forces are let out, strange things can happen. Thus, approximately halfway through the five-year period during which the bills are to be in effect, the committee has decided to review the legislation. We will look back at the changes and recommend others midway through the five-year period. This, again, will be done with the full support of the government and the Department of Finance.

Given the massive amount of change that these bills will cause to the financial services sector, there will almost inevitably be some unanticipated changes. I say to senators, in particular those who have just joined the committee, that I suspect they will find those hearings extremely interesting because we will be considering in retrospect the impact of some of the changes which emanated from the reports of this committee in 1986 and 1990.

The third item is one upon which I want to comment briefly because the committee wrestled with it as recently as last week. It involves an extremely tough policy question. Essentially, the issue revolves around the degree of confidentiality that ought to apply when an individual gives information about himself or herself to a deposit-taking institution. To put it in a simple way, how confidential is one's conversation with one's bank manager?

Originally, that was not an issue which the committee considered. When we recommended that there be networking between, for example, insurance companies and deposit-taking institutions, such as banks, we automatically assumed that that meant it would be acceptable for the bank manager to convey information he had obtained as a result of a conversation with a customer to an insurance company for the purposes of attempting to sell insurance. We did not have to deal with the confidentiality issue, the so-called Chinese Wall issue.

Senator Frith: What is the Chinese Wall issue?

Senator Kirby: That is a technical business term for a situation in which there is a company in which one side is not supposed to talk to the other side. That is called a Chinese Wall. It is not a term I made up.

Senator Frith: It is poetic, though.

Senator Kirby: This is not like the debate of last fall in which some of us may have spoken for two hours on what constitutes a Chinese wall.

Given the fact that under this legislation it is not now possible for banks, for example, to network in insurance, an important question is raised. I remind honourable senators that banks can still own insurance companies. The important question that is raised is to what extent information given to a bank can be transferred to the bank's subsidiary. That is an issue which was raised by a number of people who appeared before the committee. It was raised almost in the broader context of to what extent a conversation with a bank manager is privileged. I use a bank manager simply as an example of an official of a deposit-taking institution. To what extent is it akin to a conversation with a doctor, a lawyer or a priest, which conversation, it is understood, will not go beyond the bank manager?

That issue raised a number of questions, some of a technical nature and some of a philosophical nature. In the technical vein, how is the flow of information controlled? In the philosophical vein, what exactly should that relationship be?

Again, the committee unanimously agreed that early in the new year we will hold a series of hearings on those specific questions, not so much with a view to amending the legislation but with a view to understanding what degree of protection consumers ought to have when they go to see an officer or a senior official of a deposit-taking institution. What degree of confidence should that customer have as to where that information will go and how it will be used? Given the nature of that issue and the importance of privacy issues in a variety of areas of public policy, I suspect that the output of such hearings will have a significant impact on government legislation down the road because it is an area of both considerable public interest and, indeed, consumer interest.

Honourable senators, that is really all I want to say about this report. I will make some remarks on the individual bills and on the specific amendments to them when they come before us.

I would again draw the attention of senators to the report. I urge you to note that one of the effective things about this committee is not only the fact that it has for a long time worked in a harmonious way, a way which ultimately led to all committee reports being unanimous, but that the reports of this committee are taken seriously, not only by industry, in particular the financial services sector, but also by the government. This is evidenced by the fact that virtually every major policy recommendation, with the exception of the two I mentioned on networking insurance and automobile leasing, has been adopted by the government. I think that is a very good sign and comment on the work of this committee of the last six or seven years since it began its hearings back in 1985.

● (1650)

I would hope that the past record of the committee is a very good indication of how seriously the work of the committee will be taken by the industry and the government in the next couple of years, dealing initially with consumer confidentiality and moving on to other issues such as deposit insurance and, ultimately, a review of the current legislation. It will also be interesting to note the impact those hearings, and therefore this place, will ultimately have on public policy in Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this order is considered debated.

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Norman K. Atkins, moved the second reading of Bill C-280, to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act (disability pension).

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-280, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act, a private member's bill introduced in the House of Commons by the Honourable Member for Don Valley East, Mr. Alan Redway. The bill, which was unanimously passed by the House, proposes an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan provisions governing the limitation period in qualifying for disability pensions.

Honourable senators may or may not know that there is a long history of problems associated with the current limitation provisions for disability pensions in the Canada Pension Plan. I would like to touch upon some of the key points of these provisions so that both the intent and the implications associated with Bill C-280 are understood by members of this chamber.

Presently, the Canada Pension Plan disability pension states that in order to qualify for such a pension, a disabled person must have made contributions in at least two of the last three calendar years or in five of the last ten calendar years of the applicants contributory period. A contributory period is defined as beginning either in 1966 when the plan was introduced, or when the applicant has reached the age of majority at 18, and ending when the applicant applies for Canada Pension Plan disability assistance. If a disabled person has not made adequate contributions during those years, defined by the plan as necessary to qualify, then that individual is barred from receiving a disability pension, regardless of the fact that they may have made valid contributions for many years. They simply had not made contributions recently enough to qualify.

[Senator Kirby.]

These qualification periods have inflicted hardships on hundreds of Canadians. Specifically, hardships are being felt by individuals who have developed degenerative diseases such as Parkinsons or MS. These types of illnesses do not render an individual incapacitated immediately, but rather gradually lessen the individual's ability to work and, consequently, the individual's ability to make valid contributions to the Canada Pension Plan.

By the time the individual can no longer remain self-supporting, several years may have passed during which the individual may or may not have paid into the plan. As a result, the individual has not continued to contribute recently enough to the Canada Pension Plan and will therefore not be eligible to receive their disability benefits. Once again, it is because they do not meet the requirement of having to make contributions in two of the last three years or five of the last ten years. These requirements have no regard for the fact that the individual may have made valid contributions for several years prior to the onset of their illness which necessitated their gradual withdrawal from the workforce.

Having recognized these injustices, Bill C-280 is remedying them. The amendment put forward in this bill proposes that a disabled person who has paid into the Canada Pension Plan for one third of their contributory period, and where their contributory period is deemed less than 15 years, that person must have paid into the program for five of those years to be able to qualify for a Canada Pension Plan disability pension.

In other words, if an individual applied for disability benefits in 1991 and had not made valid contributions to the plan in five of the last ten years or two of the last three years because they either wished to remain self-supporting or were unaware that they could qualify for any sort of disability pension, they would normally not qualify. This amendment proposes that as long as they have made contributions for at least five years or for one third of their contributory period, they would now qualify. Consequently, the proposed amendment will make available to hundreds of Canadians funds which they rightfully deserve since they faithfully contributed to the Canada Pension Plan for several years.

Honourable senators, I would hope that this house would give its support to Bill C-280, a bill amending the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the inclusion of the new category of disabled Canadians, those with long-term degenerative diseases who were unaware that their disability pension existed but, because of their unfortunate circumstances, need the benefit to help them survive.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think this is a good bill. I have had a chance to put together some notes on it. I thank Senator Atkins for expanding on the reasons to support this bill. I do want to adjourn the debate, however, because I am wondering about the fact that it has no Royal Recommendation attached. I hope that research will prove that it does not need it, because I like the bill. It has, of course, passed the other place and has been found, I take it, by the Speaker in the other place to be regular. However, that same Speaker has been known to comment on the regularity of proceedings in this place and, therefore, I am sure will be open-hearted and sympathetic to the fact that we might want to have a look at that question here.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I understand exactly what the honourable senator is saying. The idea now is that—

Senator Molgat: This is a reply to a question?

Senator Atkins: Yes. We would propose that it be referred to the Social Affairs committee and that it would not be dealt with until February, which would allow the ministry to negotiate and discuss the intent and implications of the bill with the individual provinces. At that time, the committee would call witnesses from the department, and perhaps from the provinces, to appear to discuss the financial implications of the legislation.

Senator Frith: I think that is a very good plan indeed, if I understand it properly; namely, that we will take the time to perhaps attract government support for the bill, at which time it would have the Royal Recommendation. If there is a question of order I am, of course, required to raise it at the earliest possible moment, which is now. So that is why I am not proceeding and I simply ask to adjourn the debate until we have a chance to look at that matter. In doing so, I will keep in mind the schedule that Senator Atkins has in mind, because I think it is a good idea to proceed with the bill on that basis.

In the meantime, I want to look at this procedural question. Therefore, I ask to adjourn the debate that I may have an opportunity to do so.

• (1700)

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Frith might be raising a problem that does not come to us. As I understand the constitutional prohibition, it is a prohibition against the House of Commons, not against the Senate. If the House of Commons has acted incorrectly, that is not our problem. But perhaps that is another aspect of the matter that might be considered during the Christmas recess.

Senator Frith: That is why I said that, of course, it had been found regular in the other place.

Senator Stewart: Exactly.

Senator Frith: That would normally mean that I would not raise it, but I did mention that it has become—although I hope not—a fashion. It should not become a fashion for the Houses to comment upon the regularity of proceedings in the other place, but I did not want to let it pass because it has happened with the present Speaker, which is why I wanted to have a look at it.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It happened that Senator Marshall recently made a proposal here which I thought had a lot of merit, but which was refused because it did not have a Royal Recommendation.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I do not know if the moneys come out of general revenues or whether they come out of the fund. That may be a distinction.

Senator Frith: I agree. That is exactly the question we have to look at. I do not want to imply that I know the answers to the questions I have raised, because I do not. The answers may be the ones just suggested by Senator Atkins, in which case there would not be a problem. All I ask is a chance to look at the matter.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith, calling the attention of the Senate to the violence against women in Canadian society and the desirability of investigation of the subject by a Senate Committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I only want to say one thing about this matter. I see that this inquiry has "(two)" beside it. We know what that means. If one looks at rule 28(3),

> Unless previously ordered, any item under "Other Business", "Inquiries" and "Motions" that has not been proceeded with during fifteen sittings shall be dropped from the Order Paper

Consequently, the number appearing in parentheses indicates the number of sittings since the item was last proceeded with. The next-to-last time that this matter came up, there was a "fourteen" or a "fifteen" beside it, which is why I rose and spoke on it, to save it from being guillotined under rule 28(3). Therefore, rule 28(3) should no longer apply to that inquiry because it says an inquiry "that has not been proceeded with during fifteen sittings shall be dropped". That inquiry was proceeded with during 15 sittings, namely just within the 15th sitting. Therefore rule 28(3) does not apply to it and the "two" ought to be expunged, because it now has received a life beyond rule 28(3). I will leave that for consideration by the Table.

Order stands.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

ANNUAL MEETING HELD IN MADRID FROM OCTOBER 17 TO 22, 1991

Hon. Duff Roblin rose pursuant to notice of November 27, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Annual Meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly held in Madrid, October 17-22, 1991.

He said: I am conscious of the fact that my time is limited. Perhaps it is better for me to proceed now, even though it may postpone the meeting of the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs for 15 minutes. I trust that the committee chairman will forgive me.

I have to say that my remarks with respect to the meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly in Madrid six weeks ago are necessarily superficial and somewhat abbreviated. The time element certainly indicates that I will have to be guided accordingly.

It is extraordinary to think how the events of the last seven weeks have put most of what was talked about it Madrid seven weeks ago into the shade, because the trend of events is moving so fast that we can hardly keep up. However, at that meeting NATO was, as I guess it is now, in an unsettled state. It was vaguely sure that it had an essential role to perform in maintaining peace and security in the world, but a little unsure of how it would do that and who would do that.

It is clear that NATO has the problem of reconciling its own sphere of activities with what goes on in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Western European Union, the French-German private army which is now being arranged, to say nothing of the European Community on problems involved with out-of-area activities, such as the Gulf War. Of course, recent events in Yugoslavia and the obvious disintegration of the Soviet Union underline the rationale for NATO which was advanced by its Secretary-General Warner at our meeting. I think he pointed out, with some reason, that the countries of NATO were unique in having shared values in a way which could not be said to be equalled by the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe; that only NATO has developed an effective military cooperation among these nations, the product of decades of activity, and is indeed a fixed star among the shifting European world. NATO is stability amidst instability.

I think the events in the U.S.S.R., particularly the extraordinary declaration of independence by the Republic of Ukraine, underlies that particular aspect of NATO's role. It is perfectly true, as has been said in this house earlier today, that NATO has to be concerned about what happens to nuclear weapons that ar now in the territory of the newly independent Republic of Ukraine. NATO has to be concerned about whether this new government and, indeed, whatever successor states there are in the U.S.S.R., will be able to carry out the agreement on conventional forces disarmament which was reached at the end of this summer.

What is to be said about an army of some 450,000 men and women that is proposed for the Ukraine, and the one-and-a-quarter-million troops of the old Soviet army that are stationed in their territory? There are the dangers of autocracy that are so attractive to a state in the transition in which Ukraine finds itself.

I am confident that there are sensible answers to all of those problems, and I have every good hope that those answers will be forthcoming in the not-too-distant future, and that we will find that we are able to accommodate ourselves to what takes place there. However, NATO is bound to take an interest in those developments, and that was certainly part of the message that was conveyed in Madrid.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization operates through a system of committees. There is a committee on defence and security, one on civilian affairs, a political committee, a scientific and technical committee. You will judge from their names that many of the urgent issues of NATO are being discussed in those committee meetings. Other members of our delegation were represented at those committee meetings. I myself was asked to take part in the affairs of the economics committee. Although these are important mattters, they certainly lack the glamour of the political and military aspects of NATO's future. I will say something about them because, although my report cannot be complete due to the circumstances of the moment, there are some interesting observations that were gleaned from what we were told in those meetings.

There were two reports offered, one about the U.S.S.R. and the post-perestroika situation in that nation and the situation of its republics, and another that had mainly to do with the situation in Poland. I will refer to both of those matters.

As far as the report on the U.S.S.R. is concerned, it merely confirmed what we had already feared with respect to the disintegration of that country, which is now, of course, underlined by the happenings in Ukraine the other day. The finger was pointed at the political and economic chaos which exists in that country today. It was shown how that made the countries of the west almost prisoners of the domestic developments of the U.S.S.R, developments in which we had little or no influence but which were extremely important when we decide how we are to approach the new states there and how we can help them in their dilemma. Only the U.S.S.R., if it continues to exist, and certain of its republics, which will continue to exist, can formulate the future for that enormous area of the world. Until they do so effectively, the role of the west is basically limited. It is hard to see how we could go very much beyond what I term a life-support system with respect to problems in that country.

For example, the question of how to handle their international debt, which we thought was settled when the Group of Seven made an arrangement with the U.S.S.R. about the servicing of that debt and the postponement of some of its obligations, was all very well until the four most important republics decided that the U.S.S.R. had no mandate to negotiate for them, and that they would not accept the arrangement that the U.S.S.R. had made. That now places the whole of that matter in limbo. Nothing can be done by the Group of Seven or the West until the people on the other side of the table decide how they want to regulate their system and to rearrange their lives.

But if the situation arises where food, medical supplies and basics of that sort are urgently needed, and that may well be the case before long, I hope that we will be able to resolve to do our part to relieve some of that quickly and reliably and, if necessary, for nothing. It is certainly not in our interest to allow such a situation to deteriorate in a way that is certainly possible.

With respect to some of the countries of Central Europe, in particular Poland, we received a report that that country is struggling manfully against the problems of time and inertia in the system, a subject with which we are all probably well acquainted. My own view is that one of the things that Canada might do is to write off the debt. The people of Poland owe us a lot of money which they spent to buy wheat to feed themselves quite sometime ago. It has been a problem for them to repay it. My opinion is that we should not expect them to do so. The best way to help them in the short run in that matter is to write off that approximately $3 billion-worth of debt. That would be a help to them.

Recent elections in Poland are a warning that the western democratic mores perhaps have very shallow roots in Poland. They need to be nurtured, fostered and encouraged. The multiplicity of parties in that country with really no one responsible at the present time except, let us hope, the president, brings Poland face to face with what are certainly savage economic conditions. I was surprised to hear our rapporteur at the meeting say that a return to pre-1939 authoritarianism should not be ruled out on the grounds that the situation might become so bad that some move of that sort might indeed threaten. I hope and believe that that is not a likely possibility, but it indicates the pressure on the ordinary people of Poland to keep body and soul together under present circumstances.

The World Bank spokesman who is in charge of their activities in Poland made the statement, which I found interesting, that as much money as could be digested had been pledged by Europe and the rest of the world to Poland in order to help them with the reform of their economy. I hope that is the case. It sounded a little optimistic.

Some 20 to 30 per cent of economic activity in Poland is, however, market based. It is an enterprise economy to that extent. Their problem, of course, is to be found in the dinosaurs, the enormous state institutions which are unprivatized, inefficient and sheltering workers from the real world. Of course that is an unresolved threat to progress in that country.

The plea was made, which I heartily supported, that the European Community could help Poland greatly if it would open its markets to Polish goods. Agricultural products in particular, textiles and steel, things that the Poles can make and do make well at reasonable prices, are not as freely exported into the European Community as they might be. There have been some recent improvements in that matter but it is still far from satisfactory. Self-help is indeed the best help, and if Poland could be encouraged to trade with the Economic Community in particular, it would certainly be very helpful.

One of the panel of experts that appeared before us made some comments about the U.S.S.R. that struck me as extraordinary. He was referring to the wastage, the loss, between the point where food is produced and the point where it is consumed. These figures are mind-boggling. One-third of the milk is lost in transit between the producer and the market. Half of the meat never reaches the stores in the U.S.S.R. In the case of grain, it is one-third. In the case of potatoes, it is one-third. It is obvious that this is a rich economy which is capable of an enormous agricultural effort and production which is not functioning efficiently because bottlenecks in transportation and distribution stand in the way. Those give some indication of the tremendous problem that confronts governments in that part of the world in getting back to an economic and efficient way of doing business.

The opinion of some of the wise men that we listened to was that we have entirely underestimated the difficulties of moving to a market economy. They do not expect recovery in that part of the world will start until 1993, and expect that it will take to the year 2000 to get back to the 1989 level. That is a terrible indictment of the situation and indicates that we have to be much more conscious of the problem and much more willing to do something about it to help than we have indicated so far.

The costs of economic transition are far higher than expected and of course the situation in East Germany, where they have the best of all possible help, I should think, underlies the difficulties of that situation.

One interesting side note was an observation by one of our experts that Austria had reinstalled the barriers on the Hungarian border. You may remember that these were taken down a little while ago and, as a result of removing those barriers, the whole of the eastern system collapsed including the Berlin Wall. Why are they going up again? The fear of people in Europe that there will be such a migration of economic refugees from eastern Europe to western Europe justifies, they feel, this kind of move. I find it a most disheartening event to have taken place, a new wall separating the rich from the poor, something we could very well do without.

● (1720)

Eastern Europe, it was opined, has embarked on the path of poor capitalism and imperfect democracy and is liable to wind up nearer to Latin America than to Western Europe. One has to hope that these observations, made by well-informed people, are too severe, that we will do better than that. However, there is certainly a need to recognize the economic problems confronting those nations.

At the close of the economic committee's meeting, there was a brief colloquy on GATT. As you can imagine, the Canadian delegation had its view with respect to the success of GATT. It is our view, and I think the view of the committee, that the success of GATT is vital to the future of NATO itself, because economic disharmony and economic disagreement will thwart NATO's unity of purpose and disrupt the values that nations share across the Atlantic. The current disputes are disputes that can do no good for the future of NATO, to say nothing of the rest of the world.

The fact that there are many unadjudicated, rule-breaking actions by various countries with respect to GATT is already cutting away at the structure of goodwill and of shared values between our countries. The failure of GATT would lend emphasis to the division of the world into large trading blocs.

Most members of the committee felt that the GATT problem was vital to NATO, and that a solution was essential. Perhaps their hopes will be justified as events take their course, although not without some unpleasant surprises for the people of this country.

Honourable senators, this annual meeting of NATO focused largely on the new role of that body and how it is to interact and cooperate with the international organizations that are now beginning to take form and are being considered or reconsidered as the world changes. The activities of the economic committee, while interesting to me, were probably not the most important things to happen. The important things were the questions of politics of NATO and the military activities of NATO. Those questions are still not completely resolved, although progress has been made towards resolving them.

Underlying these questions, though it is a rather pedestrian topic, is the question of economic viability. Unless we get a better economic performance out of the countries of Eastern Europe, our problems will be magnified rather than diminished. It may well be that in this country we should consider with a more liberal and magnanimous approach the question as to what we can do to help. Where we can offer assistance is in the realm of trade and personal interaction between the people of those countries and the people of this country.

That is my view of the Nato meeting. I express my appreciation at being able to represent this house at that gathering.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Nurgitz): If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

DEMOCRACY

2,500TH ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF DEMOCRACY IN ANCIENT ATHENS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau rose pursuant to notice of November 27, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to his attendance at the celebration marking the 2,500th anniversary of the establishment of democracy in ancient Athens.

Honourable senators, from September 26 to September 29, 1991, my wife and I had the privilege of representing the Parliament of Canada at the celebrations organized to mark the 2,500th anniversary of the establishment of democracy in Ancient Athens. We were invited by the Speaker of the Greek National Assembly, Mr. Athanasios Tsaldaris.

The celebrations commemorated more specifically the complete reform of the constitution of the city-state of Athens in 506 B.C. by Clisthenes, a remarkable Athenian statesman. After the moderate reforms of Solon at the beginning of the sixth century, Clisthenes' reforms embodied the philosophic principles of democracy, expressing the Greeks' love of liberty.

The people's Assembly, which brought all citizens of Attica to Athens, exercised sovereign legislative powers. The magistrates were accountable to the Assembly or to the tribunals of the Assembly which took care of judicial matters.

All citizens could and were indeed obliged to take a direct part in government. The equality of all citizens before the law was guaranteed, and freedom of expression and the right to criticize freely those in power was a safeguard that protected the political rights of citizens and limited the potential for abuse of power.

[English]

These events were, of course, of prime importance for the history not only of Greece but of Western civilization. The new unity, purpose and confidence which the reforms inspired in Greece, and in Athens particularly, affected the outcome of the Persian wars and formed a springboard for the golden age of classical Greece of the fifth century—a legacy of immeasurable value.

Throughout the succeeding centuries, people have felt the legacy of Greece. Since its emergence in Athens and the other city-states, the foundation of democracy has remained popular sovereignty, and this system of government, irreplaceable in that we have found nothing to excel it as the guardian of human dignity and civil liberties, has eventually triumphed. We see this in our own day when a new dawn of democracy is breaking. We see that the same deep instincts and love of freedom which inspired the people of Athens to find the best system for governing their city, instincts long suppressed in the countries of Eastern Europe, for example, are springing up with new vigour.

It was then a great privilege and pleasure to be invited to join in paying homage to 2,500 years of democracy in the company of the political, ecclesiastical and cultural leaders, and the people of our host country and city as well as a distinguished gathering of international dignitaries. Guests included presidents of legislative chambers of the countries subscribing to the Helsinki Agreements, of the European Parliament, of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Conseil de l'Europe, the European Community, as well as representatives of the interparliamentary union.

In addition, a considerable number of distinguished scholars from across the globe had been invited to attend a three-day philosophical symposium held at the University of Athens on the theme "Democracy in Classical Greece and Its Message to Contemporary Societies," an event which was very much at the heart of the celebrations and the closing sessions of which were attended by the visiting parliamentarians.

[Translation]

The highlight of the celebrations was the commemorative ceremony organized by the Greek National Assembly on the Pnyx, where the Assembly of the People of Athens met in ancient times. The ceremony, held on September 27, started when the rays of the setting sun illuminated the Parthenon which dominates the city and continued into the night, when the Acropolis was lighted on all sides by projectors. To be in such a magnificent setting, on the very spot where Pericles, Demosthenes and other historic figures spoke to the people, added incredible dimension to the solemnity and inspiration of the moment.

The ceremony was opened by the President of the Republic of Greece, His Excellency Constantine Caramanlis, who then gave a welcoming speech. After that, the Speaker of the National Assembly, His Excellency Mr. Tsaldaris, addressed us. They reviewed the development of democracy over 2,500 years and commented on the role of legislators as a new millennium approaches. I am convinced that these two instructive speeches will interest honorable senators and I have made arrangements to provide them with copies.

[English]

Following these addresses, the ceremony was concluded with a presentation of excerpts of works by Greek classical dramatists and writers and from ancient and modern texts on democracy ranging from the Magna Carta to the present date. These excerpts were interspersed with music played by the Greek Radio Symphony Orchestra and Choir.

(1730)

Incidentally, senators who happen to visit the Pnyx will notice a new stele near the podium, identical to one which stood there in ancient times, inscribed on which is the law of the protection of democracy promulgated by the Ecclesia of the Demos in 337 B.C. This new stele was unveiled at the end of the ceremony.

[Translation]

As part of the activities organized for the occasion throughout Greece, the local universities of Thessalonica, Ioannina, Heraklion in Crete and Cos arranged historical tours and visits to their regions' political institutions. When we arrived in Heraklion, our group was warmly welcomed by the mayor and Chamber of Commerce. We then spent several hours visiting the Palace of Cnossos and the remarkable archeological museum. We were thus able to get a glimpse of modern Crete and of Minoan civilization. On the last day of our visit, participants cruised the Aegean Sea, thanks to the president of Epirotiki Shipping of Piraeus.

The celebrations were prepared by an organizing committee chaired by Professor Marios Raphael, President of the Greek National Tourism Office. The whole program was carefully planned and executed and of course we were warmly and enthusiastically received by the Greeks on every occasion. We should congratulate all those who looked after the program of commemorative celebrations that were in keeping with the occasion.

[English]

I have spoken of "an event" but, as President Tsaldaris pointed out in his address of September 27, the main significance of Cleisthenes' reforms was that they "freed man's spirit".

That freedom of spirit is the basis of democracy and of the democratic institutions for which humanity owes much to the Athenians of 2,500 years ago. What more natural then than that we should join in spirit with the people and Parliament of Greece as they commemorate this anniversary with all the dignity and solemnity it deserves. I thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. The Acting Speaker (Senator Nurgitz): If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES, AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULE—SPEAKER'S RULING DEFERRED

On Motion No.7:

> That pursuant to rule 3 which supports practice, and based on rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, as it is a matter of universal privilege, and of profound constitutional significance, therefore the Senate's vote upon order No. 2 under Other Business, being a resolution to rescind the adoption of the present rules as resolved on June 18, 1991 with less than two-thirds majority at that time, in contravention of then-rule 47(2), will be resolved in the affirmative, though without thereby setting a precedent of general practice, if a simple majority of voting Senators assent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Haidasz has agreed to my postponing until tomorrow the ruling on his motion.

DEMOCRACY

2,500TH ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF DEMOCRACY IN ANCIENT ATHENS—MOTION TO CONVEY CONGRATULATIONS CONCURRED IN

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, November 27, 1991, moved:

> That the Senate convey its congratulations to the Parliament, Government and people of Greece, and the Municipal Government and people of Athens, on the occasion of the 2,500th Anniversary of the establishment of democracy in the City of Athens; and
> That the Honourable the Speaker convey the text of this motion to the President of the Hellenic National Assembly.

He said: Honourable senators, I regard it as an honour to twin with Senator Gigantès in introducing this motion to the Senate. I can think of no better way of expressing this HONOUR than to use the words of the President of the Greek Republic, Mr. Konstantinos Karamanlis, as he spoke at the meeting which you attended, Mr. Speaker. These are some of the words he used.

> The idea of Democracy had, of course, been conceived by the philosophers as an expression of the Greek passion for freedom. After the transitional experiment of Solon, it was Cleisthenes who actually put democracy into practice 2,500 years ago. He established it on firm foundations with bold statutory, political and social reforms, which were to make possible the Greek victories at Marathon, Salamis and Plataea during the Persian Wars. These victories were, in turn, to lead to the Golden Age and the cultural miracle of classical Greece, which became the foundation of European civilization.

He further states:

Freedom and Democracy have an almost identical meaning. For man, freedom constitutes an ideal way of life.

He further states:

Democracy, which according to Rousseau was suitable only for the gods, has, of course its weaknesses. These weaknesses spring, however, from its virtues, first and foremost from freedom, the abuse of which in any form leads to the degeneration of Democracy. This danger was succinctly pointed out by Aristotle, when he said "Freedom is not simply doing as one likes".

In these critical days when we as Canadians are reviewing our constitutional democracy, it is prudent to remind ourselves of these words of Aristotle and of the Grecian heritage.

This anniversary, senators, is a celebration for all countries and for all people who have a love and a thirst for democracy and freedom, and for all those people who thirst and strive for that ideal. It was this thirst, I remind you, that broke down prison walls and destroyed cement barricades in other countries to free oppressed people all over this world.

Therefore, honourable senators, I take great pleasure and I hope I speak for everyone in this chamber, when I move that the Senate of Canada convey its congratulations to the Parliament, Government and people of Greece and the Municipal Government and people of Athens on the occasion of the 2,500th anniversary of the establishment of democracy in the city of Athens, and that the Honourable Speaker convey the text of this motion to the President of the Hellenic National Assembly.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, of course I support the motion; however, as a classical scholar, I am forced to correct mistakes. Let us not forget that the Greek government aspired to hosting the Olympic Games next year. The year in ancient Greece began July 1 and ended June 30, so the year 509-508 B.C. was neatly 2,500 hundred years before the Olympic Games and could therefore be used as a basis for doing that. So we have the President of Greece, a man I much esteem, saying that what Solon did was transitional. Solon, in 594 B.C., in other words 86 years before Cleisthenes, made the fundamental change, and the fundamental change was that he answered the question, "By what right does anybody rule?" The democratic answer is, "By the consent of the Government."

It was Solon who first established the assembly of all the citizens as the bar base of Athens. Until then, Athens had been ruled by various heads of families, all claiming descent from some god. You will no doubt remember that Jupiter could hardly control his sexual drive and he used to appear here and there in Greece as a swan or as a bull and got lots of girls pregnant. The decendents of all these pregnant girls claimed to be demi-gods, and they claimed the divine right to rule.

However, Solon said no, the right to rule is the consent of the governed, and that is expressed by the individual vote. One person, one vote, regardless of how rich or how poor they are. He established a chamber of 400 representatives to act in the absence of the people who met for general elections. He also established a Senate like ours, which was described even in ancient Greece as a chamber of has-beens, hack-men, et cetera. It had democratic function astonishingly like ours.

Then, of course, the rich got together and decided it was not very good unless they had financial control of various areas of the country. They overthrew the democracy. With the help of his grandfather, Cleisthenes overthrew it. Then Cleisthenes found himself losing in a battle for election as the chief archon of Athens. He re-enfranchised the people and he re-established the democracy of Solon in order to be the ruler.

His reform, if you look at it, essentially was gerrymandering. He broke—

Senator Molgat: Even then.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, even then. He broke into pieces the electoral districts which gave the power to his rivals and dispersed the pieces. There were electoral districts in Athens that had noncontiguous pieces after Cleisthenes. If there was a chunk that was prepared to vote for his opponent, that chunk got stuck theoretically onto several other chunks that would vote for him in order to drown the vote for his opponent.

That is what we are celebrating, the 2,500th anniversary of gerrymandering, not the establishment of democracy. That was done by Solon.

But why quibble? Eighty-six years in 2,586 years is not very much. I wanted to mention this man who really performed the fundamental democratic reform, which is to say now, the consent of the governed. That is the only legitimate source of power.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-1992

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) PRESENTED

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, November 27, 1991, submits its report as follows:

Your Committee met on Wednesday, November 27, 1991 to review these supplementary estimates. Officials of the Program Branch of Treasury Board Secretariat were present as witnesses.

Supplementary Estimates (B), 1991-92 are the second supplementary estimates for the 1991-92 fiscal year. They amount to $2.276 billion, consisting of $872 million in statutory expenditures and $1.404 billion to be voted by Parliament, and raise the total estimates tabled to date for 1991-92 to $160.607 billion. Statutory expenditures account for 69.4 per cent of the latter total and appropriations for the remaining 30.6 per cent.

The budgetary portion of these supplementary estimates is $2.136 billion and raises total budgetary estimates to $160.092 billion. This exceeds by $1 billion the government's fiscal framework for budgetary expenditures of $159.0 billion that was described in Part I of the 1991-92 Main Estimates.

However, a number of offsetting items have been identified, as follows:

> $400 million of the recently announced $800 million assistance program for farmers appears under the Department of Agriculture in these supplementary estimates ($39 million in the Agri-Food Program and $361 million in the Grains and Oilseeds Program). As indicated in footnotes on pages 19 and 21, this amount is being offset by a reduction of $400 million in the 1991-92 spending authority of the Department of National Defence; > three items constitute changes in the estimated value of the government's financial assets and liabilities and have already been recorded as budgetary expenditures in the Public Accounts of prior years: $100 million in payments to the Farm Credit Corporation to convert debt to equity (page 23); under the Department of Finance (page 40), a $263 million contribution to countries benefiting from multilateral debt reduction initiatives—in other words, a partial writedown of uncollectible debts—that has the effect of reducing the value of the foreign debt owed to Canada; and under Transport Canada (page 70), $58 million for acquisition of shares in Ridley Terminals Inc. by the Canada Ports Corporation; these items cause a total reduction in budgetary spending of $421 million; and > anticipated lapses in 1991-92 authorized spending of $1.900 billion.

These offsetting items are projected to reduce total estimated budgetary expenditures in 1991-92 so far to $157.371 billion, leaving $1.629 billion in reserves for other revaluations of financial assets and liabilities and for funding a final set of supplementary estimates at the end of the current fiscal year.

As usual, the Treasury Board Contingencies Vote (Vote 5) was used to provide temporary funding for many of the items to be voted in these supplementary estimates prior to the approval of the expenditures by Parliament. Treasury Board officials supplied a list of the uses of this vote by department and program, showing total advances $336.4 million or 24 per cent of the amounts to be appropriated in Supplementary Estimates (B). The list is appended to this report, along with the tables normally supplied by Treasury Board: Summary of Expenditures Framework and Estimates Tabled to Date; Supply to Date for 1991-92; List of One Dollar Votes and Additional Explanation; and Summary of Items $5 million or Greater by Vote.

Passage of the appropriation bill will have the effect of replenishing Treasury Board Vote 5 by the $336.4 million spent, thus restoring it to the $400 million level that was approved in 1991-92 Main Estimates. According to Treasury Board officials, this level, in turn, represents roughly 1 per cent of total voted appropriation in the Main Estimates.

The purpose of Vote 5, as described in the Main Estimates, is to provide > funding for increased salary costs arising and of negotiated and non-negotiated agreements and other paylist requirements not included in departmental Estimates and for expenditures of a miscellaneous character which cannot be foreseen when the Estimates are drawn up.[1]

However, your Committee is concerned about the increasing use that is apparently being made of this vote to fund expenditures, particularly those unrelated to paylist requirements, that have not yet been approved by Parliament. At a later date in the fiscal year, we may undertake a study to determine if the uses of the vote have changed over the years and report on fundings to this House.

$1.168 billion, or just over half of these supplementary estimates, is being requested for the activities of Agriculture Canada. These expenditures increase the estimates of the department from $2.316 billion following the approval of Supplementary Estimates (A) to $3.484 billion, an increase of 50.4 per cent. $745 million, or 64 per cent, of the proposed expenditures are statutory and consist largely of payments under the new Farm Income Protection Act for crop insurance, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program (GRIP) and the Net Income Stabilization Account (NISA). GRIP and NISA were explained in some detail in the Committee's report on Supplementary Estimates (A), 1991-92,[2] which observed that some 76 per cent of total farm income in 1991 was expected to consist of payments from various government programs. Your Committee expressed concern in its earlier report about the increasingly heavy dependence of the agricultural sector on government support.

When reviewing these supplementary estimates, Committee members questioned the notion of a $400 million reduction in the authorized expenditures of the Department of National Defence being used to offset the $400 million appropriation in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to provide special assistance to Canadian farmers. They noted as well that, according to the Minister of Finance, the remaining $400 million of this $800 million program is to be requested in the estimates for 1992-93. That appropriation, in turn, will be offset by several tax measures, including accelerated payment of taxes owing to the Department of National Revenue and payment of a percentage of taxes in dispute. Members were advised by officials of Treasury Board that these tax measures would not have been implemented had the assistance for farmers not been required. They were deemed necessary in order to keep projected expenditures within the fiscal framework. Members expressed concern at the apparent precedent of funding an entire program out of lapses, which are not required for national defence purposes and accelerated tax collections that would have likely been justified even if the special farm assistance program had not been implemented.

A number of responses to questions are to be provided by Treasury Board Secretariat at a later date.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
The Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), report placed on the Order of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS CONFLICT OF INTEREST BILL

NOTICE OF MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-43

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Monday next, December 9, 1991, I will move:

THAT the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons empowered to undertake a comprehensive review of the subject-matter of Bill C-43, An Act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of Members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission and to make consequential amendments to other Acts;

That the Committee may, in fulfilling its mandate, review the conflict of interest approaches used in other jurisdictions and any other matter related thereto;

That the said Special Joint Committee be composed of 14 Members of the House of Commons and 7 Members of the Senate;

That the Members to act for the Senate on the Special Joint Committee be the Honourable Senators Balfour, DeBané, Grimard, Kelleher, Oliver, Olson and Stanbury;

That the said Special Joint Committee have all powers of a Standing Committee of the House of Commons pursuant to Standing Orders 108(l), 120, 121, and Rule 91 of the Rules of the Senate;

That the Special Joint Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate;

That the Special Joint Committee be empowered to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of its powers, except the power to report to the Senate;

That the Special Joint Committee be permitted to request adequate support from the government for drafting its final report in the form of a bill or report Bill C-43 with or without amendments or in the form of principles that could be embodied in the legislation; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly and to request that the Commons concur in the amendment made by the Senate increasing the membership to 7 Members of the Senate.

Honourable senators, with the indulgence of the House, I would make a very brief statement of explanation about this notice of motion.

Honourable senators will be aware that there had been discussions for some time concerning the appointment of a joint committee of this place and the other place to study conflict of interest matters. Negotiations among the parties in the other place came to a head a week ago Friday on November 26. I was kept informed by the negotiators for the government, as I presume my friends opposite were kept informed by their counterparts in the Liberal Party in the House of Commons.

During those discussions, I indicated agreement on behalf of my colleagues on this side as to the mandate that this joint committee might have. I had further indicated our agreement that an opposition senator should act as co-chairman, assuming a supporter of the government from the other place was chairman. I had also indicated agreement with the proportion of House of Commons members to senators, which was in the usual proportion of two to one. Imagine my dismay when the message arrived over here on November 28, a week ago Tuesday, indicating that the House of Commons had passed a motion creating a joint committee which would have had 5 senators and 14 members of the House of Commons.

It appears that what had happened is that, in order to accommodate the members of one of the third parties in the other place, additional members of the House of Commons had been put on the committee, with the result that we were left with a ratio of something more like three to one than the more normal two to one.

Since receiving the message here, I have had discussions with colleagues on this side. I believe my friends opposite have been notified. I have also had consultations with cabinet colleagues in the other place. The result is that I have presented today a notice of motion which is identical in all respects to the message that came from the House of Commons on November 29, except that we have provided for seven senators and 14 members of the House of Commons.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have indeed been kept informed on the proceedings in this regard. We have submitted our three names from this side in accordance with the discussions we have had.

I simply want to repeat what I said here last week. I think we should be heading towards the point where any joint committees should be made up of equal numbers from both houses on the basis that the two houses are independent houses. Both were established by the Constitution, and are independent, separate, distinct houses. When dealing with joint committees, they should be doing so on the basis of that independence, and not on the basis of numbers in each house.

Having said that, we are prepared to proceed.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY MATTERS RELATED TO NATIONAL SECURITY AND DEFENCE AND TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I give notice that, at the next sitting of the Senate, I will move:

> THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to hear evidence and to examine and report on matters relating to national security and defence and the future roles of Canada's armed forces;
> THAT the membership of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be increased to twenty (20) members and that Rule 87(1)(h) be suspended in relation thereto; and
> THAT the Committee present its report no later than March 31, 1993.

WEST INDIAN COMMISSION—NOTICE OF MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, with the indulgence of the Senate, may I bring to the attention of all honourable senators an activity of the committee in which they may be interested.

We have been informed that the West Indian Commission is to have representatives in Ottawa tomorrow. The independent West Indian Commission was established in 1989 by heads of government of English-speaking Caribbean countries to advise them on how best the region can prepare for the challenges and opportunities of the 21st century.

I am told that among those coming to Canada in relation to the work of the independent West Indian Commission, there will be Sir Shridath Ramphal, Chancellor of the University of the West Indies, and Chancellor of the University of Guyana, former Secretary General of the Commonwealth; Mr. Alister McIntyre, Vice-Chancellor of the University of the West Indies and former Assistant Secretary General of the United Nations; Mr. Leonard Archer, former President of the Caribbean Congress of Labour; Mr. William Demas, Governor of the Central Bank of Trinidad and Tobago. I believe that these names will be familiar to many senators.

The members of the Foreign Affairs Committee hope to meet with these representatives of the West Indian Commission tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock in a room in this building. Although this will be not be a formal meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I believe that all senators who can possibly arrange to be present will find the meeting most profitable. I thank honourable senators for their indulgence.

GOVERNMENT PERFORMANCE—DIVERSION OF ATTENTION TO ALLEGED CONSTITUTIONAL CRISES—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H.A. GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 98 residents of the province of Quebec who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Chicoutimi, Montreal North, Saint-Léonard and Saint-Dominique.

I have the honour to present a petition signed by 65 young Canadians from Murray River, Nanaimo, Vancouver and Kamloops, British Columbia, who deplore the fact that the Goods and Services Tax Credit is not available to young Canadians who no longer live with their parents, pay taxes and are under 19.

They call upon the Senate to ask the government to remedy this situation.

I have the honour to present a petition from 59 young Canadians from Murray River and Montague on Prince Edward Island, who deplore the fact that the Goods and Services Tax Credit is not available to young Canadians who no longer live with their parents, pay taxes and are under 19.

They call upon the Senate to ask the government to remedy this situation.

I have the honour to present a petition signed by 75 young Canadians from Saskatoon and Swift Current, Saskatchewan, who deplore the fact that the Goods and Services Tax Credit is not available to young Canadians who no longer live with their parents, pay taxes and are under 19.

They call upon the Senate to ask the government to remedy this situation.

I have the honour to present a petition signed by 31 young Canadians from Winnipeg, Manitoba, who deplore the fact that the Goods and Services Tax Credit is not available to young Canadians who no longer live with their parents, pay taxes and are under 19. They call upon the Senate to ask the government to remedy this situation.

Thank you, honourable senators.

QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

YUKON—VISIT OF SOVIET RED ARMY HOCKEY TEAM—SEIZURE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY BY CUSTOMS OFFICER—REQUEST FOR RESPONSE

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning an incident that occurred in Whitehorse over the weekend. Has the minister yet received any information concerning this incident?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am afraid I have not, honourable senators. I have sent forward an inquiry to my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue. I hope to have a report on the matter shortly.

REQUEST FOR REPAYMENT OF FUNDS AND FOR APOLOGY

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have received more information on the incident. I have heard that the people of the Yukon raised sufficient funds to pay all the fines levied against the Russian team. The amount needed to enable the players to leave for Anchorage was $2,800. Apparently, they could not leave until this amount was paid.

Because the players have now left and the money has been paid, I hope the minister will ensure that this does not change any of the consequences that should follow. I am still of the opinion that the fines should not have been levied in the first place, and that the money should be returned to the people of Whitehorse who collected it to pay the fines, and that there should be an apology nade to the hockey team for the incidents that took place.

With the advent of the Arctic Winter Games, it seems to me most likely that we will be inviting teams such as the Russian team to play in the Arctic Winter Games over the next short period of time. I hope that this situation will not be allowed to pass unremedied simply because the players have now left Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government: Honourable senators, I shall attempt to obtain a response to the representations of the honourable senator.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPLACEMENT OF VICTORIA CROSS—REQUEST FOR RESPONSE

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, over a month ago I asked a question about an announcement that Canada was considering the discontinuation of awarding the Victoria Cross in favour of a newly-developed Canadian award. I have had no reply to date. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate care to tell me what the decision of the government has been?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I recall the question. I also recall that I replied that I would consult with the Department of Veterans Affairs, which was the wrong department to have consulted. I now have made inquiry of the Department of National Defence, and I hope to have a reply very soon.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, on that question, for his information, I wish to inform Senator Molson that I introduced an inquiry last week on the subject of the Victoria Cross. I will be speaking to that inquiry today.

AWARDING OF MEDALS TO VETERANS OF KOREAN CONFLICT

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, the talk about the Victoria Cross reminds me of another medal which was to be awarded to many great Canadians who served in Korea. I understand that, finally, they will receive that medal. However, according to what I saw on the CBC News, the Department of National Defence has mailed these medals, via second class mail and they are just being thrown through the doors of the homes of these veterans. The only recognition these people are receiving for their service to this country is a medal, which is being awarded 30 or 40 years too late and is being thrown onto the floor of their homes by second class mail delivery.

Can that situation be corrected so that these people may be better recognized for their service to this country?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries in an effort to establish what the facts are in this matter.

FINANCE

MEETING OF MINISTERS—NATURE OF MEETING—REQUEST FOR AGENDA

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate help us understand the agenda for the meeting of the Ministers of Finance that will be taking place on December 12 and 13?

What I really want to know is whether this is a meeting in lieu of what several of the First Ministers of the provinces have been asking the Prime Minister to call, namely, a conference of first ministers on the economy. Or is there some more specific agenda for the Ministers of Finance?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as a general comment, I can say that it has been the practice in recent years for the Minister of Finance to consult with his provincial counterparts first, and, of course, with the private sector, prior to introduction of a budget.

While the minister has not stated a date for presentation of the budget, we are all aware that most of the previous budgets under this government have been in the month of February. In any case, I would think that a general tour de raison of the economic and fiscal situation in the country from the perspective of the various governments, would be the major item of discussion. The honourable senator asked a question about this matter, I think, yesterday. The precise answer to his question is that an agenda has not been released. A communiqué has not gone out, and it is not anticipated that one will go out until the week of the conference itself.

Senator Olson: The minister will, of course, recall, as I do, that the Prime Minister made a comment in response to a question put to him as to whether he would respond to four or five first ministers who are asking for a conference on the economy on an urgent basis. One of his replies was that he would consider it, but that he would wait until he first had a report from the finance ministers' meeting. That is why I was wondering if this was a preliminary meeting with the same agenda being requested by some of the provinces.

Senator Murray: No, I think the reply that I gave in answer to the honourable senator's first question is a more accurate description of what we had in mind. I am aware, of course, that various provincial premiers have called for a first minister's conference on economic matters. We would expect that, following the meeting of the Ministers of Finance, the Prime Minister and all premiers would reflect further, in light of the ministers' meeting, whether a first ministers' meeting is desirable and, if so, when and under what circumstances.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary, honourable senators. One of the reasons that I think all the provincial first ministers gave for asking for a conference of this nature on an almost urgent basis is because of the depth of the recession and the consequential costs to the provinces and the deprivation of a large number of Canadian citizens. Will that subject be high on the agenda when the Minsters of Finance meet, or is the intent to just review the economic situation which, as the minister has pointed out, is a normal event for all 11 Ministers of Finance to attend prior to the preparation of the budget.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are two comments I could make in reply to that. First, while we appreciate the straitened financial circumstances in which all governments find themselves, the fiscal position of almost all of the provinces is relatively better than that of the federal government as a result of the debt load which this present administration inherited.

Senator Olson: Inherited or created?

Senator Murray: We have not created the debt load, as the honourable senator is well aware. I can demonstrate that with statistics.

Senator Olson: You will have a chance next Tuesday.

Senator Murray: I understand that, and I look forward to it. The second comment I would make is that I am sure provincial finance ministers will, in fairness, want to express their considerable satisfaction at the relief that has been brought to their fiscal situation by the decline in interest rates and inflation. After all, the declines in inflation have had, and will have, a beneficial effect on their costs of governing, on their operational costs, and of course, the decline in interest rates has a beneficial effect on the interest costs of their borrowings.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, what is the status of negotiations with France with respect to the fisheries problem around the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. It has been months since this matter was raised in the Senate. There was a debate a few years ago about the whole issue. Where does the matter now stand? Has any progress been recorded on that front?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe I answered a question on this matter some time ago when it was put by our colleague, Senator Stewart of Antigonish-Guysborough. At that time I believe I reported that we expected a judgment on the matter early in the new year. I do not have here the notes that I was referring to at the time, but I will consult them again and I will take the occasion offered by Senator Corbin's question to see if there is anything new I can report to the Senate on that matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPLACEMENT OF VICTORIA CROSS

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, with respect to recent questions respecting the Victoria Cross, may I suggest to the leader that perhaps the Department of National Defense is not the logical place to direct these questions; it might be the Honours Division of Rideau Hall, where the change was made when the Order of Canada was to be worn in precedence over such British decorations as the Military Cross, the DSO and so on. This would appear to be a logical extension of that thinking.

ENERGY

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN COAL PRODUCERS—STATUS OF SALE TO ONTARIO

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government. It was reported recently that the federal government was preparing to aid the sale of western coal to Ontario. The news report indicated that the federal government was ready to spend some $27 million in this regard. Could the minister advise us where this matter now stands?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am afraid I cannot answer that question today, honourable senators.

Senator Molgat: Could the leader get us a report on that matter?

Senator Murray: Yes, I will do that.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

YUGOSLAVIA—PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN PROPOSED U.N. PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Government in the Senate entered the Centre Block by the front door today, I am sure he noticed many Canadians of Croatian origin demonstrating in front. I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he has any further information as to Canada's efforts to stop the civil war in Yugoslavia, especially the war between Croatia and Serbia, and whether Canadian officials at the United Nations have reported anything to the government with regard to the so-called peacekeeping forces of the United Nations that were supposed to have been sent to stop these warring factions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can only repeat that Canada has made a commitment to participate in a U.N. peacekeeping force, if the decision is taken to send one to Yugoslavia. Our priority remains to see an end to the violence. My honourable friend will be aware that at a peace conference in The Hague the parties were engaged in the process of negotiations, but the civil war intensified all the same. We think the key to a solution now is to encourage the moves by former U.S. Secretary of State, Cyrus Vance, who is a special envoy to the UN Secretary General, to establish whether the necessary conditions can be met for the dispatch of a UN peacekeeping force.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

COLLECTION OF PROVINCIAL SALES TAXES ON IMPORTED GOODS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable sentors, I have a further question for the Leader of the Government. I have delayed asking this question because I was expecting that there would be further statements from the government. The question is in reference to a news story from the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday, June 1. The headline is: "Ottawa to help B.C. collect provincial sales tax". I will read from the clipping so that the minister will know exactly what I am seeking.

> A day after saying Canadians are overtaxed, Revenue Minister Otto Jelinek announced his department will help the B.C. government collect provincial sales tax from cross-border shoppers.
> Canada Customs won't take the tax directly but will set up a system to inform the provincial Finance Minister of U.S. purchases by B.C. residents, Jelinek said yesterday.

[Senator Molgat.]

Has that arangement been put into effect? Is it in effect with all provincial governments?

The article reads further:

> Jelinek later told the chamber of commerce at Delta, a 15-minute drive from the busy Peace Arch border crossing, that the federal government is reviewing gasoline taxes, standards and labelling to help Canadian retailers become more competitive.

I would appreciate if the leader could find out exactly what the Minister of Revenue or the government has done with respect to gasoline taxes, standards and, particularly, labelling. What did the minister have in mind and what exactly has been done?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to the second part of the question, I would have to make inquiries of my colleague, Mr. Jelinek, and ask for a report from him. I shall do so.

With regard to the first part of the question, the offer by the federal government to provide provincial governments with information on purchases by their residents in other countries was made to all provinces, and certainly, as I recall, to Ontario. However, I would have to inquire as to what the status of that offer is and the extent to which it is being implemented.

THE SENATE

OFFICIAL REPORT—DELAY IN DISTRIBUTION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I note that although we have received the House of Commons Hansard of yesterday we do not yet have the Debates of the Senate of yesterday. I would like to have an explanation for this delay, since this is not the first time it has occurred.

The Speaker: We will make inquiries and report back to the Senate.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

DISPOSITION OF MOTIONS FOR DEBATE—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I have another question, honourable senators. If we compare the date of debate on my motion, yesterday's Minutes say it is slated for Wednesday, December 11. Today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate say that the motion comes up for debate on December 5. That is a jump of six days in one day. I should like to know the explanation for that, also.

The Speaker: We will look it up, Senator Haidasz, and report.

[Later:]

DELAYED ANSWER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have just received now the Debates of the Senate of yesterday and I find that the delayed answer which the Honourable John Lynch-Staunton gave to a question I asked about the PVY-n virus is not what I received as my copy of the answer. I received the answer to another question, which he did not tell us about and which has to do with the fixed link. Obviously that has nothing to do with the PVY-n virus. Could you please explain this discrepancy? I am looking at page 652 of the Debates of the Senate.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senator, when I find the answer, I will give it to you. I will have to verify this, because I do not recall the topic of the question to which I gave the delayed answer yesterday.

Senator Bonnell: If you read page 652, in the second column, you will see you are talking about the virus, and the answer is about the fixed link. There is not much connection between the fixed link and the PVY-n virus. I would like to have Hansard corrected, honourable senators, if possible.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I think I have the answer to your question about the PVY-n virus, senator.

(The answer follows)

AGRICULTURE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—EFFECT OF VIRUS INVESTIGATION ON SEED POTATO INDUSTRY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorne Bonnell on November 19, 1991)

On Prince Edward Island, 96 lots tested positive following bioassay tests to determine the presence of PVYn. A "Notice to Dispose" was issued in each case. Growers were given the option to sell subject potatoes to a processing plant. At the specific request of the PEI provincial government, the option to sell subject potatoes as tablestock was withdrawn.

The testing procedure that was used was developed in the spring of 1991, following careful consideration of scientific literature and consultation between Agriculture Canada scientists. The testing procedures were agreed to by the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA), Agriculture Canada and the PEI provincial government.

Based on additional research carried out over the past two months, it has been determined that symptoms produced on the bioassay test plants by mixtures of related potato viruses, PVX and PVYo, have been interfering with positive identification of PVYn. In five lots which were ordered disposed during the growing season, the presence of PVX and PVYo has been confirmed. The sister lots and the potatoes grown in the 200 m buffer area of these five lots are now eligible for planting on PEI.

With respect to compensation, regulations have been passed to allow for compensation to be paid. The rates that will be paid per hectare were agreed upon by the provincial government and the PEI Potato Board. Every farmer who received a "Notice to Dispose" is eligible for compensation.

Canada is signatory to the International Plant Protection Convention. Under the convention, it is each country's responsibility to inform its trading partners if new plant pests of quarantine significance are discovered. Canada was living up to its international obligations when it informed the United States of the presence of PVYn.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the third reading of Bill C-15, An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports,

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that clause 4 of the Bill be deleted and replaced by the following:

4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date the Official Languages Act applies to the airport authority, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if

(a) the authority were a federal institutions; and

(b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I believe that this order was adjourned by Senator Simard yesterday.

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think our friend, Senator Simard, intends to take part in this debate tomorrow. However, I suggest that our colleague, Senator Grimard, who sponsored the bill, now speak on this subject.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, would there not be a problem, since Senator Simard presented the report? I do not wish for anyone to be excluded from debate.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as we are now under new Rules, it is up to the government to determine the order of business, day by day.

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, with respect to the proposed amendment, I am aware of the seriousness of the subject and what I intend to do today is show that the proposed amendment should be defeated.

The government did not need to introduce Bill C-15 to get permission to transfer airports. But it did so to enshrine certain portions of the Official Languages Act, in particular Part IV which deals with language of service, Part VIII which deals with Treasury Board jurisdiction, Part IX which deals with the jurisdiction of the Official Languages Commissioner, and Part X with deals with legal recourse.

Honourable senators, why does the government not want to burden local airport authorities with the obligation of applying Parts V, VI and VII of the Act? Part V deals with language of work. Many reasons justify the government's decision on these parts of the legislation. First of all, the long term transfer of airports is not to individuals, not to public companies, but to private non-profit organizations. That is important.

The composition of these local airport authorities must also be taken into account. In committee, several senators opposite asked for the list of the board members of the future airport authorities in Montreal, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver. I congratulate them on this initiative, because that brought out that these board members were qualified businessmen from various backgrounds capable of administering local airports.

It is obvious that these authorities can be trusted. To give you an example, I would point out that the Montreal Airport Authority which will manage Dorval and Mirabel is made up of representatives of the City of Montreal, the City of Laval, the MUC, the Board of Trade, the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Laval, etc. These people definitely deserve our confidence and that is why the government has decided not to apply Part IV of the Official Languages Act, i.e. language of service.

Also, honourable senators, it should noted that application of Part IV concerning language of work is very limited, and can only apply in the National Capital Region, New Brunswick, certain parts of the Province of Quebec, and certain parts of the Province of Ontario.

[English]

● (1450)

Those provisions, Parts V, VI, and VII of the Official Languages Act, were not included in this legislation for one reason; because we recognize that we are creating private enterprises and, with all due consideration, that means that these private enterprises must be competitive within the business world. We want these private enterprises to do well, or better than well; we want them to excel.

The general policy of the federal government is not to force the private sectors, including local airport authorities, to respect Parts V, VI and VII of the Official Languages Act; but as far as possible, and when it is clearly constitutional to do so, to encourage and to force, if necessary, private corporations that are ready to acquire Crown corporations to offer public services in both official languages as stated in Part IV of the Official Languages Act.

This principle, honourable senators, has been fully respected in regard to the federal policy on airport transfer. These LAAs are private, non-profit corporations that try to be financially viable and autonomous. They are constituted in accordance with a federal or provincial law for the management of a local airport facility, and they are, at the same time, businesses which are competing in the private sector.

The official languages measures contained in Bill C-15 are, in most cases, stricter than those that were applied to privatized Crown corporations, with the exception of Air Canada.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, on the subject of Air Canada, when Senator Frith discussed his amendment before second reading of the bill, he referred to a letter he had received from the Commissioner, or should I say ex-Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. D'Iberville Fortier. I may add, for your information, that in addition to his letter to Senator Frith, Mr. Fortier sent a copy to Senator Castonguay, and in the last paragraph, Mr. Fortier wrote as follows:

> Finally, you will recall that under the legislation to privatize Air Canada, the company remains bound by all the obligations of the Official Languages Act.

This means all ten parts of the Official Languages Act. However, with all due respect for Mr. Fortier, there is a big difference between Air Canada and local airport authorities.

First of all, when Air Canada was privatized in 1989, in this Chamber and in the other place, the Government of Canada owned 57 per cent of Air Canada shares, which made it a majority shareholder, so that at that time, Air Canada was still, to all intents and purposes, a federal institution, subject to the entire Official Languages Act. And there is more. As I see it, Air Canada is a unique national entity, while airport authorities are multiple local entities. The problems that arise in Vancouver are not the same as in Montreal, and vice versa. That is why, for the time being, the government does not want to apply the entire Official Languages Act as suggested in the proposed amendment.

In any case, this is not a precedent. When Canadian National hotels were transferred, only the language of service, not the language of work was mentioned. The same applied to Eldorado when it was privatized: language of work, no, but language of service, yes. When Nordia and Teratronics International were privatized, it was: yes to language of service but no to language of work.

There is still the problem of Petro Canada, which can apply the language of service provision as the directors see fit.

This means that today's amendment would require local airport authorities to comply with the whole Official Languages Act, including language of work, but there is something else besides language of work. Before I conclude, I would like to tell you that the proposed amendment seeks to have parts 5, 6 and 7 of the Act applied in full.

Part 7 of the Act deals particularly with the promotion of French and English and the Act commits the federal government, or in this case, the local airport authorities, to encourage and support the development of linguistic minorities and promote full recognition and use of the official languages.

I respectfully submit, honourable senators, that it is going much too far to require a private non-profit corporation to promote the full recognition and use of the official languages. I think that is up to federal institutions and that is why airports, as long as they are administered by Transport Canada, apply the ten parts of the Official Languages Act in full.

In my opinion, honourable senators, and I conclude with the following points, the important thing is the language of service to the public and that is guaranteed in Bill C-15.

Do not forget that the Official Languages Act applies only to federal institutions. I do not believe that local airport authorities are federal institutions. For airport authorities, there is quite a difference between language of service and language of work. In an airport, the language of service is the one used by the public; the language of work depends on local conditions and is up to local management.

Honourable senators, whether the Official Languages Act applies or not, no airport, except for those in New Brunswick and some parts of Ontario and Quebec, would be required to work in both official languages. Imposing two working languages in airports like Montreal and not on direct competitors in regions that are not designated bilingual would I think be an economic injustice, especially since they are not federal institutions.

● (1500)

We can understand that federal institutions which do not always have to compete can be bilingual, but the same cannot be said for private companies like local airport authorities which are not mentioned in this law, maybe because they have to be competitive.

Honourable senators, for all these reasons, Bill C-15 should be adopted without the proposed amendments.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, would the hon. senator allow me to ask a question or two?

Senator Grimard: If I can answer you, with pleasure, Senator Corbin.

You said in your remarks referring to Petro Canada that there was a provision for service to the public in both official languages. You immediately added that it was also the case for Nordion International, Theratronics International and Eldorado Nuclear.

Yesterday I examined the laws privatizing these three companies and nowhere does it mention official languages.

I would like you to be able to reconcile your comment that these companies will continue to provide service in both official languages to the public requesting it and the absence of any reference to official languages in the laws creating these companies. I am puzzled.

Senator Grimard: If what you say is true, I think that we have all the more reason to assert today that the part concerning language of work should not apply to airport authorities since you tell me that the bills you studied do not mention official languages. The situation is much worse in our case. In Bill C-15, we specify that parts 4, 8, 9 and 10 will apply, whereas you are saying that the acts you examined made no mention of official languages.

I believe that the case you refer to is worse than Bill C-15. Bill C-15 enshrines those rights regarding services in the language of the public which, in my view, is the most important thing.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senator, I am not trying to say what is worse and what is wrong. You misunderstood me. I challenged you to tell me why you said something while the Act is silent. That was my question.

My second question is this: You defend these new airport authorities as though they were the poor relations in Canadian society. You talk as though Montreal's airports, Dorval and Mirabel, were not profitable. Yet, the committee was told that they expected to make net profits of more than $100 million and that they would reinvest $30 million each year in airport facilities.

I believe that you exaggerated when you implied that the airports were poor relations, since the facts absolutely contradict this, and you did not tell us how much it would cost to implement the official languages policy in these federal facilities that you now want to privatize?

Was that cost so exorbitant that it made the difference between profit and loss? Dorval and Mirabel airports made over $100 million in profit. My gosh! Then what does it cost to implement the Official Languages Act? I will shoot down your comments when I speak on the amendment.

I would like to conclude with a simple comment. I do not know if you have lived in a minority situation in Canada, but I find it hard to believe that you, as a Quebecer, defend an unjustifiable cause. I think you owe me an answer, because I come from a minority group which, from the very beginning until now, has had to fight to obtain recognition through provincial and federal regulations and laws. But why did they choose you, a Francophone Quebecer, to defend a bill that contains indefensible clauses? I do not understand that.

I am asking a question. That question was asked, so I ask another one.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think that allegations the honourable senator is making about senator Grimard are bordering upon—I am trying to find the right word—indecency.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senator, if you think that it is bordering on indecency for someone who champions the cause of linguistic minority rights to be asking a French-Canadian from Quebec to justify denying that the Official Languages Act applies to companies, you are wrong. I would like an answer. I have no lesson to take from you, honourable senator. I asked a question, thereby exercising my democratic right.

Senator Grimard: Honourable senators, I will give senator Corbin a brief answer. First, you want to know why I endorsed Bill C-15 and still do. There is the answer: it is because I requested it. When I made this request, I told my party that this bill was close to my heart and that is why I am here.

As regards your second question, you do not seem to see the difference between profit-making and non-profit-making corporations. You criticize the airport for making profits. I have been telling you from the start . . .

Senator Corbin: Senator Grimard, I do not need . . .

Senator Grimard: Listen, if that is the way you are going to talk to me, you are in contempt of the Senate and I refuse to answer.

Senator Corbin: You do not have to answer, but do not put words in my mouth.

Hon. Gildas Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would senator Grimard allow another question? Honourable senators, when Senator Grimard was talking about the difference between Air Canada, which was privatized, and the airports we are talking about today, he argued that one of the reasons for considering Air Canada as different and for not making comparisons was that the government was the majority shareholder in Air Canada. If that is a logic, since airports are wholly owned by Government, it would be all the more justified not to make the proposed changes in the act.

• (1510)

If Government holds 56 per cent of all Air Canada shares, we tell the company: "You have to abide by the Official Languages Act". So, where airports are wholly owned by Government, should we not conclude that it is all the more justified to abide by the Official Languages Act?

Senator Grimard: Honourable senators, I said also that there is another difference between Air Canada and the airport authorities. I said that Air Canada is a national entity. I said that the airport authorities are multiple local entities, as compared to the unique national entity that Air Canada is. This is a major difference. Air Canada has offices in Vancouver, Halifax, Rouen-Noranda, from coast to coast, but it is always Air Canada. It is the same organization. Airport authorities have offices in four cities only. Probably one day they will have offices in Winnipeg, Moncton or elsewhere. So, this was the major difference, honourable senators, when I compared Air Canada and the airport authorities.

I think those 57 per cent are a main factor, but what I just told you about a unique national entity versus multiple local authorities, this is the major difference from the language of work perspective.

On motion of Senator Murray, for Senator Simard, debate adjourned.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT CRIMINAL CODE

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino moved the second reading of Bill C-12, to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not mind telling you I have a sense of frustration and discomfort in dealing with this bill, not because I do not support it, because obviously I do. I am uncomfortable and frustrated because legislation dealing with youth in trouble is, in my opinion, indicative of a community malaise which should be of concern to all of us.

Seeing and hearing of young people in serious trouble is very painful to me, as I am sure it is for all honourable senators, and in particular those of us who dedicate much of our volunteer time to youth organizations. I have been involved in scouting for many years, as have Senators Molson and Lewis, and probably other honourable senators. The principles of organizations like scouting are meant to teach our youth to become responsible and respectful citizens. The fact that we have the Young Offenders Act points to a failure in our responsibilities to our young men and women.

I find myself saddened by the many painful stories told by relatives and friends of victims of crime committed by young offenders. I, too, at first respond with hatred and passion. Revenge is what I usually want. When I hear of a swarming in a mall in Toronto where 40 to 50 young men attack innocent people including senior citizens, frankly, all I want to do is get a baseball bat and break a lot of bones. Frankly, in the short run it would probably make me feel a lot better, especially if I were a victim or close to a victim. But what would that accomplish? What would happen to the rule of law if we were left to our individual solutions?

Honourable senators, I rise today to address you on Bill C-12, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code. This bill has a limited focus, intentionally. It is targeted at an extremely small percentage of young persons who are alleged to have engaged in the most serious of criminal behaviour.

The government proposes changes to the criminal law for this class of criminal behaviour. It does so with the full knowledge that the criminal law, by its nature, is a response to an act already done, and is no substitute for all the preventive efforts that need to be taken by society as a whole to nurture its children and youth in order that their risk of involvement in criminal behaviour is low. Having recognized the absolutely critical role of prevention, the government must nevertheless be able to respond when youth engage in serious or violent offences.

The Young Offenders Act was passed unanimously by Parliament. The overriding goal of the Young Offenders Act, then and now, is that as many youths as possible become fully participating and contributing members of our communities as adults in accordance with the values of our society. To attain this goal, the government remains committed to the philosophy of the act that was arrived at after years of study and consultation preceding its passage. That is to say, young people are responsible for their illegal behaviour and should be held accountable in a manner appropriate to their age and maturity; society must be afforded the necessary protection from illegal behaviour, and it is responsible for taking reasonable measures for preventing such behaviour.

Young persons who commit offences require supervision, discipline and control. Because of their level of development and maturity, they have special needs which require guidance, assistance, and caring. While each of these principles can be readily grasped in its own right, respectful adherence to the sum total is, in some cases, much more difficult.

For youth who are involved with murder, the capabilities and the limits of the juvenile justice system are clearly put to the test. The government has set out to ensure that the Young Offenders Act meets the challenges posed by youth involved in extremely serious offences, particularly murder. Its proposals reflect the collective experience of a wide range of persons involved with young offenders, including representatives of provincial governments and territories, Corrections officials, mental health professionals, members of non-governmental organizations concerned with juvenile justice, researchers, academics, the judiciary, Crown counsel, the police, defence lawyers and members of the House of Commons.

Let us now look at Bill C-12. By way of background, a number of cases involving youths have attracted national attention and have influenced numerous sectors actively involved in the justice field and many members of the public to believe that the transfer mechanism and sentences for murder in the Young Offenders Act should be revised. Regrettably, these cases have called into question the integrity of the act as a whole and its capacity both to rehabilitate the youth and to protect the public.

It is the balancing of the fundamental principles of the Young Offenders Act which we are striving to maintain by enactment of Bill C-12. The objective of the amendments proposed in Bill C-12 is to ensure that the best possible decision is made at a transfer hearing in the interests of both the youth before the court and the public. The bill's purpose is neither to increase nor to decrease transfers, as both these ends suffer from a fundamental flaw—the absence of an individualized approach to the young person, the offence with which the youth is charged, and all the relevant circumstances which is the essence of our law for young people involved in criminal behaviour.

In short, such interpretations of the government's objectives simply do not stand up to scrutiny. Three essential changes were considered necessary to allow for the best possible decision to be made in the interests of both the youth before the court and the public.

The first change is to clarify the test to be applied by the youth court in considering whether to transfer a young person's case to adult court. The test for transfer to adult court is currently being interpreted unequally with varying weight being given to the objectives of rehabilitation of the young person and protection of the public. The bill specifies that the court must consider both these objectives and determine whether they can be reconciled by the youth remaining in the youth system. The bill further states that where these objectives cannot be reconciled, the protection of the public shall be paramount and the case transferred to adult court.

The second change is to provide for more appropriate sentencing choices in both the youth and the adult systems for youth convicted of murder. As concerns the youth system, the current maximum sentence of three years custody for a young offender convicted of murder is considered to be entirely inappropriate for some cases.

Under Bill C-12, the proposed sentence, called a disposition in the Young Offenders Act, for a young offender convicted of first or second degree murder is a maximum period of five years; that is, three years of custody to be followed by a period of conditional supervision. The federal government has two objectives in structuring this disposition. The first is to enhance the potential for rehabilitation. The second is to offer increased security to the community at large.

The custodial term could be extended in two situations. The first is where the court is satisfied that the young person is likely to commit an offence causing serious harm or death. The second situation is one in which a youth court may order the return of a young person to custody where there has been a violation of a condition of release.

Under the adult system, the current sentence of life imprisonment with no eligibility for parole for 25 years in the case of first degree murder, and 10 to 25 years in the case of second degree murder, is considered too harsh. The bill proposes that the period of parole ineligibility be reduced and determined by the judge at the time of sentencing. This would diminish the negative effects of long-term incarceration and would reflect the belief that a young person has the potential for rehabilitation.

The third change was to provide for the most appropriate placement of a transferred youth in the interests of that youth's rehabilitation and the protection of the public. This motion responds to the concerns of many Members of Parliament, individuals and organizations with the current placement of youth in adult facilities. While the government had initially intended to deal with this issue as part of the second phase of a legislative review, time has afforded the opportunity to consult further and to resolve the issue at this stage. The provisions would require as a normal rule the placement of transferred youth who are under the age of 18 in youth facilities during the pre-trial stage. An exception could be made and a youth placed in an adult facility where a youth court is satisfied, taking into account the best interests of the youth and the safety of other youth that that is desirable.

A youth over the age of 18 years would normally be placed in an adult facility but provision is also made for an exception allowing the court to order placement in a youth facility using the same criteria. Where a youth is transferred and convicted in adult court and is under 18 years, provision is made for the court to select between youth, provincial adult or adult penitentiary systems, having taken into account a number of factors.

Bill C-12 addresses one component of the Young Offenders Act in the manner that I have just outlined. Further changes to the Young Offenders Act are being examined with the following objectives: First, to respond more effectively to the special needs of all adolescents given there state of dependency, level of development and maturity. Second, to determine the most appropriate legislative framework for custodial sentences and for sentence review. Third, to ascertain the most suitable provisions regarding admissibility into evidence of statements made by young persons to persons in authority.

The government is committed to moving ahead as quickly as possible with whatever legislative changes are desirable to make the act more effective in terms of rehabilitation and protection of society. Honourable senators, in closing let me ask all of you to support the speedy passage of Bill C-12 recognizing, with much sadness, that legislation will never solve the problem. The problem will only be solved when we as adults, as parents, as grandparents and as responsible members of society accept our responsibilities and strengthen our commitment to nurture, love and care for our children.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, Senator Di Nino in his closing remarks said that legislation will never have any impact on this particular problem. I do not think this particular legislation will have any impact on any problem. The knee-jerk reaction of this government to any correctional problem is to lash out with more punishment, notwithstanding the overall research and knowledge we have that punishment has no impact whatsoever with respect to the incidence of crime.

The murder rate in Canada has stood at about 2.53 or 2.54 per 100,000 over the last 30 years. Notwithstanding that we have devised more and vicious punishment for the offender, it does not change the rate. It does not matter whether we hang them or keep them in jail for 10 years or 25 years, we know that that punishment will have no impact on the crime. Notwithstanding that knowledge, this government can only respond, as it does, with more punishment.

Parliament was recalled four years ago to lash out with more punishment that would solve all our problems. We know that the rate of violence in society has not changed one iota, notwithstanding the punishment that has been heaped on the offender. I am sure that all senators in the chamber today will be a little more content tonight when they sit and watch The Journal to know that a young offender will serve two more years or 10 years before he can be paroled, and that somehow we will all be better citizens the more brutal the punishment we heap on the offender.

Honourable senators, we have followed this course without results. I do not see in this bill one word about rehabilitation programs or increased funding for programs in penitentiaries. This bill is a reaction to a few incidents that have occurred in society. Why do we not deal with the many programs that are working, where every inmate who has served his three years and been released has been a success in society. We do not want to talk about that, but only about the people who are on the warpath for more punishment. This government reacts to those people.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to hold up in any manner this government's having its way and lashing out with its punishment, but I would prefer to adjourn the debate to reply a little more fully at a later date.

On motion of Senator Hastings, debate adjourned.

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—SPEAKER'S RULING DEFERRED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino for the second reading of Bill C-280, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act (disability pension).—(Honourable Senator Frith).

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable Senators, I would like to raise a point of order on this Commons Public Bill C-280. Unfortunately I was not in the chamber when Senator Atkins moved second reading it and Senator Frith responded. On looking through the bill I find an inconsistency in the procedure that has been followed with regard to the bill. There is no Royal Recommendation. It is a money bill introduced by a private member in the House of Commons. It was passed, or approved, or agreed to, by the Speaker.

I want to make it clear at the outset that I have no objection to this bill for the disabled pensioners. They deserve it and I commend the honourable Alan Redway for introducing it.

However, my Bill S-5 had to do with the recognition of merchant seaman and contained a clause saying that it does not ask for money. Bill C-280, on the other hand, does ask for money. Clause 1 of Bill C-280 reads:

> —a disability pension shall be paid to a contributor who has not reached sixty-five years of age, to whom no retirement pension is payable, who is disabled . . .

The bill is, in fact, asking for money and has not been questioned at all by the Speaker. Bill S-5 did not ask for money, yet it was ruled as a money bill. I am wondering about the inconsistency between the two houses. Bill S-5 is also directed to merchant seamen who, while perhaps not having made contributions for at least one-third of the contributory period, yet offered their lives in time of battle.

I would ask Your Honour to make a ruling on this irregularity. I would like to find out what the difference is between the ruling in one chamber on a public bill and the ruling in the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Marshall, I shall take your point of order under advisement.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I may speak to the point of order. I mentioned yesterday that I found some difficulty perceiving the difference between requiring the Royal Recommendation for Senator Marshall's bill and not for this one. I sympathize very much with what Senator Marshall is saying. I want to make it very clear, however, as I think he has, that we support the bill. We think it is a good bill. We think it should move forward. I would not want to see it delayed in any way.

If Senator Marshall wants to proceed with a ruling by the Speaker, I will not object to that, but I wonder if we might not achieve the same purpose by asking the table to prepare a paper on this matter and, instead of waiting to pass the bill, agree to pass the bill so it can go forward to committee. Senator Atkins has suggested it would not be there until February in any case.

In the meantime, perhaps the table could take time to prepare a sound paper on this matter, because I think the matter is important. I think we have to make clear what the powers are for private senators here and private members in the other place. They should not be different. If we could get that sorted out we could proceed with the bill in the meantime. That is just a suggestion. As far as we are concerned, we like the bill and we would like to see it go forward.

Hon. C. William Doody: I do not want to speak to this particular problem with the bill. With regard to the suggestion that the table be asked to prepare a paper, presumably on the Royal Recommendation or its application, I would just mention that the National Finance Committee did an immense amount of work last year researching the Royal Recommendation and how it should apply to bills generally. I do not think we are that much further ahead now, having gone through that exhaustive process. I would not want to suggest that the table resolve something that has baffled legislators in both houses for quite a long while. If this bill's passage is going to be predicated on the assumption that the table can come up with a solution to the Royal Recommendation conundrum, it will take a long while for that bill to go anywhere.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, if I may intervene on that point of order, there may be a difference in your bill, Senator Marshall. It is due to the fact that the moneys required for this bill would come from the Canada Pension Fund. I am sure the table would know, but I am not quite sure whether in fact you need a Royal Recommendation to make use of the money in a special fund such as the Canada Pension Fund. So I think there may be a difference between the two bills, Senator Marshall.

Senator Molgat: If you say it comes out of that fund, the question would arise, what about the unemployment insurance fund? Is it then permissible for an honourable member in the other place or a senator here, to make proposals to change the unemployment insurance provisions because it comes out of the unemployment insurance fund? The matter is very unclear, but I think we should resolve it somehow or other. I am concerned that there not be a different rule for members of the House of Commons and members in the Senate. There is no reason that members of the House of Commons can pass proposed bills without Royal Recommendation if we cannot.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to the point of order as well. Obviously I would like to see the bill referred to committee. As I said yesterday, I had an opportunity to talk to the sponsor of the bill in the Commons as well as to members of the department. The department members wanted, through their minister, to refer the bill to committee which would give the ministry time to talk to the provinces and sort out the proposal of this bill and the significance of it in terms of cost.

If we can get this bill into committee the chairman of the committee will not call the committee together until February and then we will be clear on the implications of the bill. I would like to point out just one other thing with regard to what Senator John Stewart said yesterday. As I understand constitutional prohibition, it is a prohibition against the House of Commons and not against the Senate. Whether that is an appropriate judgment in relation to this bill I am not sure, but I think it is another consideration.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, we can discuss and debate this as has been done since time immemorial. If there is a will, there is a way. If it is fair for one group of Canadian citizens in a minority whom we should be looking after, it should be similar for a group of disabled people. I stick to my original intention, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind the matter going to the table, but I would like a ruling on who is right and who is wrong.

Senator Doody: I have to support Senator Marshall's position on this. I worry about approving the bill in principle if it is not in correct order. To send it to committee while we are doubtful about whether we have the right to deal with such a bill would, I think, be an error. I think we should ask for a ruling from the Chair on the admissibility of the bill before we proceed to approve it in principle. That is how I feel about it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I gather that I should give a ruling. It is a rather complicated ruling, so if you will bear with me, I will try to make my ruling as early next week as possible.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF "CANADIAN CROSS" AS HIGHEST DISTINCTION

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 19, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Canadian Government's ill-advised plan to introduce a so-called "Canadian Cross" as the highest distinction for courage, thereby replacing the historic Victoria Cross, and to recommend to the Senate that the matter be referred to the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology in order to examine the advisability of such action in light of the opposition of the vast majority of Canadian veterans, and the demeaning of the heroism of not only those Canadian VC winners who have passed on, but those few remaining — Col. Fred Tilston, Lt. Col. CCI (Cecil) Merritt and Sgt. Ernest Alva "Smokey" Smith.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to address my Inquiry No. 12 which I introduced here in the Senate on Tuesday, November 19 last. The inquiry calls the attention of the Senate to the Canadian Government's ill-advised plan to introduce a so-called "Canadian Cross" as the highest distinction for courage, thereby replacing the historic Victoria Cross. It recommends to the Senate that the matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology in order to examine the advisability of such action in light of the opposition of the vast majority of Canadian veterans, and the demeaning of the heroism of not only those Canadian VC winners who have passed on, but those few remaining — Col. Fred Tilston, Lt. Col. CCI (Cecil) Merritt and Sgt. Ernest Alva "Smokey" Smith.

[Senator Austin.]

• (1550)

Honourable senators, in order to first establish that such a plan is active within the Department of National Defence, let me place on the record some evidence of the proceedings of the House of Commons committee on Defence and Veterans Affairs. In response to a question from Pat Nowlan, a member of Parliament, General Ken Foster said,

> Mr. Chairman, we have for some time now been working on an series of orders and decorations that are Canadian—distinctly Canadian. In that regard, we have tried to emulate the best awards of other nations—and here we go again; every time there is a problem in Canada, we look to copy other nations—

> the other nations that you have mentioned, the Victoria Cross, for example. We are working on a Canadian Cross that would mean the same kinds of things, although the words may be slightly different. So there is no intention to change or cast aspersions on the value of that as a decoration in any way. We simply are completing the work to create a Canadian order of decorations. Further than that, it is before committee—and I presume he meant a committee in the Department of National Defence—> because it is such an important issue, and it is in discussion at the moment.

Honourable senators, now that we have established that the Department of National Defence is busy with designing a new medal to recognize the heroism of our Canadian fighting men and women, it should be better able to take the constant pressure to dilute the strength of our military capability, and that begs the question, Where are our priorities?

Honourable senators, I do not have anything original to say on this issue that has not been said already by many concerned groups of Canadian citizens and a majority of Canadian veterans. They have said it better than I can, and I intend to refer to some of the justifiable reactions and our seemingly usual Canadian way of belittling those who brought honour to our country. I harken back to Billy Bishop.

I will begin by reading a forward in a book called "Valiant Men" by Admiral of the Fleet, Earl Mountbatten. He said this:

> When I was asked to write a forward, I felt greatly honoured, for this book is the first to present, in a single volume, the story of Canada's Victoria Cross and George Cross winners.

He finished up this way:

> The Crosses were won in many parts of the world and in a wide variety of circumstances. The only common element was courage of an uncommon order as is expressed in the title "Valiant Men."
> Nothing I can say can add to the exploits of those men: they speak for themselves.

Honourable senators, here is another quote from a distinguished individual. I ask you to listen to what Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth said in 1959 when she described what she thought the Victoria Cross meant.

> In the past century thirteen hundred and forty-four men won the Victoria Cross—three of them more than once. They were men of all ranks and they came from all walks of life. They were of different colours and creeds. They fought in many lands and with many different weapons. But their stories are linked by a golden thread of extraordinary courage. Each man of them gave the best that a man can give, and all too many of them gave their lives. Some, careless of danger, stood firm in battle to hold or secure a position. Some with sublime self-sacrifice, gave their lives to help wounded comrades. Many of them exposed themselves time after time to death in conditions of battle beyond the imagination of our forefathers. All met with honour those demands of war which urge the valiant spirit to the limits of human endeavour and endurance. They dared mightily, and "turned their necessity to glorious gain."

Here is something written to the Prime Minister on March 22, 1991:

> The thought that the Victoria Cross may be displaced as Canada's highest award for valour in the face of the enemy is truly unthinkable. This award is part of Canada's military heritage and has been since its earliest award in the Crimea by Queen Victoria to a Canadian for valour in the Charge of the Light Brigade. In the eyes of both serving and retired members of the Canadian Armed Forces, there simply cannot ever be an equivalent substitute.
> The policy that started in 1972 to "Canadianize" honours and awards is a good one in our opinion. However, the Victoria Cross holds a special place in both the hearts and minds of Canadians as well as within the Commonwealth. We hold that the Victoria Cross must continue to keep its place of honour as the highest award that can be conferred by a grateful nation through the Queen of Canada, on the advice of Canadian officials, administered by the Honours Chancellery at Rideau Hall. This is the only way to honour our national heritage and our living traditions.

That is from a Colonel Miskiman of the Royal United Services Institute, from their newsletter of March 22, 1991.

To verify, confirm and support what Colonel Miskiman said, a letter dated March 18, 1991, has this to say:

> We understand that Australia has taken similar steps to ensure that its countrymen continue to qualify as Victoria Cross recipients. A new Australian order of military decorations has been instituted which retains only the Victoria Cross amongst all other British decorations formerly awarded to Australians. This has been done to preserve a proud military heritage—and to continue to recognize the most prestigious decoration "For Valour" the world has ever known. Canada should do the same.
> Yours respectfully,
> Lieutenant Colonel R.M. Dillon

I will quote now from a letter dated November 2, 1991—just prior to Remembrance Day—to the Ottawa Citizen from a Colonel Kenneth L. Barnaby.

> It was disappointing, and disturbing, to read the recent account of the Victoria Cross being replaced in the Canadian Armed Forces. One must assume this is the first indication that this decoration, which is older than our country, is about to be removed without discussion.
> At a time when we are so desperately attempting to keep this country together and survive a series of economic crises, why should we remove another link with our past?
> Presumably other decorations bestowed by a monarch—the George Cross and the George Medal—are also being removed quietly, or are on some shopping list of items to be relegated to the ash bin of history.
>
> The next step, and I hesitate to give ideas to politicians unnecessarily, would be to remove any connection with royalty from our famous regiments and battalions . . .
> If our forces are to shed their traditions, I suggest that Parliament set the example by dispensing with the Sergeant-at-Arms, Black Rod, the Mace, and all the other traditional trappings of this political rabble who know the price of patronage, but little of the cost of hard-won military traditions.
> What can one expect of a government that excludes the merchant marine from some veterans' benefits or recognition for service in the North Atlantic in the Second World War? . . .
> If the present attempt to substitute the Victoria Cross is a military initiative, which I doubt, it should be denied. If it is a political strategy, which I suspect, it should be damned.

● (1600)

Honourable senators, recently a group of veterans representing the three largest veterans organizations comprising some 500,000 to 600,000 members made a submission to the Minister of Veterans Affairs which included a section on honours and awards, and which contained the following.

> Our veterans are concerned not only about the lack, by the Canadian government, of tangible and demonstrable recognition for their participation in the various operations and campaigns, but also the reality that the Canadian government is intentionally minimizing the intrinsic value of the highest award for valour that a Canadian serviceman could win, that is, the Victoria Cross.

May I remind honourable senators that those are not my words. They are the words of the leaders of a majority of veterans who are good friends of the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

The historic and intrinsic value of the Victoria Cross is being denied to our veterans in particular and to Canadians in general.

The Department of National Defence, in concert with the Chancellery, recognizing the absence of awards for military valour, have initiated as a submission for three awards currently designated as the Canada Cross, the Star of Military Valour and the Medal of Military Bravery.

This submission was produced without any consultation with, or any input from, Canadian veterans or other interested parties. The submission appears to have been produced as an expediency to fill a gap in the Canadian honours and awards system.

They recommended that the Victoria Cross be repatriated to Canada and issued by the Queen of Canada, and that it be installed without name change as the special status and highest award for courage or bravery in the Canadian honours system ahead of the Cross of Valour.

Honourable senators, I want to read from a letter of Colonel John Weir Foote, a Victoria Cross winner. He earned his VC at Dieppe on August 19, 1942. I want to read from his letter because I became a good friend of his. Let me first read part of the citation:

> Then, at the end of his trial by fire, he climbed from the landing craft that was to have taken him to safety, and walked courageously into the German positions, that he might be taken prisoner and so to minister to those men whose fate for the next three years was to be barbed wire and chains.

He wrote to me and it happened to be around the time when we were examining the National Film Board's production of "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss." He said, in part:

> I was glad to see that it was only the Senate that stood up to the National Film Board re: the Billy Bishop story and the members of the Commons let them get away with it.
> The Board seems determined to keep the original film alive by refusing to withdraw and disclaim the original film.
> Senators have proven that the Senate can be a vital and useful part of government.

I have that letter which will remain in my possession as long as I live.

He also enclosed a copy of Air Marshall W. A. Bishop's decorations and medals, and of course the VC is on the left side. Unfortunately, I cannot pass these around, honourable senators.

We should hark back to another pilgrimage to Italy. I noticed in the press review a picture of our delegation standing with His Holiness the Pope. It brought back memories, and set me wndering just what we think of our past heroes, our awards, and our battles and the deaths and the sacrifices. His Holiness greeted the vets who were in the standard uniform of blue blazers and grey flannels, and then he came down and shook hands with them individually. He said:

> Some of you are returning to places where you were personally involved in the tragic events of the Second World War. May this be a time of serene reflection for you, in which you recall the experience of those years in the light of the progress which has been made since then in building a more just and peaceful world.

Honourable senators, in that battle in Italy, there was Colonel John Mahony who received his VC for action at the Melfa River in Italy. John Mahony served in Newfoundland after the war as a senior officer and he was a good friend of mine.

One of the two remaining heroes, Ernest Alva "Smokey" Smith, who was on many pilgrimages with us to the battle fields, received his VC for a battle on the Savio River in Italy on October 21-22, 1944.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Marshall, according to our rules, you have been more than 15 minutes. Of course, as usual senators may wish to waive the rules.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: One of the most striking letters I have and wish to read about the Victoria Cross was from Paul Triquet, who won his VC in Casa Berardi in Italy. I want to read a reference to him from a good friend of veterans and a good friend of the military, a life president of the Royal Commonwealth Society, a past president of the Royal Canadian Military Institute and of the Empire Club of Canada. He stated the following in a letter to the Right Honourable Prime Minister:

> May I draw to your attention a matter of great concern to the Loyal Societies and to many Canadian citizens.
> These are not exclusively English speaking anxieties and I can remember when Brigadier General Paul Triquet, VC and I were members of the Suttie Commission that he told me of the immense pride of French Canada in his winning of the Victoria Cross whilst fighting as a warrant officer with the R22nd Regiment in Italy. In these times of great constitutional unrest which seems to threaten the very fabric of our beloved country I would hope that you as Prime Minister would make a noble gesture to the Military of Canada and enshrine the Victoria Cross of Canada as the recognition for valour in the Canadian Order of Military Merit. This would be overwhelmingly important because the first Victoria Cross winner was Lieutenant Dunn, a Canadian volunteer from Toronto, who won it in the Crimean War.

He also said:

> The motto of Paul Triquet's Regiment is "Je me souviens"- I remember - which reminds all Canadians of the glories we have shared. By following that motto, the Prime Minister will be using his considerable powers of reconciliation to remind us of our noble history in Canada's wars of freedom. Canadians would be grateful to him for enshrining the Victoria Cross of Canada in our Canadianized system of honours and awards!

I should not forget Lieutenant Colonel Charles Merritt, who won his VC at Dieppe and who is one of three living heroes still with us: and Fred Tilston, who won his VC at the Hochwald in Germany.

Honourable senators, in a few days we will be commemorating 50 years after the war in Hong Kong. There was another VC there, John Robert Osborn. The following is a short excerpt from part of his citation:

> The Company was . . . completely surrounded by the enemy who were able to approach to within grenade throwing distance of the slight depression which the Company were holding. Several enemy grenades were thrown which . . . Osborn picked up and threw back. The enemy threw a grenade which landed in a position where it was impossible to pick it up and return it in time. Shouting a warning to his comrades this gallant Warrant Officer threw himself on the grenade which exploded killing him instantly.

The British named a barracks after John Osborn at Hong Kong.

Honourable senators, I will finish by reading the resolution on the Motion to Restore the Victoria Cross to The Order of Military Merit by The Royal Commonwealth Society, the National Council in Canada. Without reading the preambles, it is as follows:

• (1610)

> Therefore be it be resolved by the members of the National Council of the Royal Commonwealth Society that our Chairman should petition the Prime Minister of Canada, the Rt. Hon. Brian Mulroney, to restore the Victoria Cross as an award to be made to members of the Canadian Armed Forces "For Valour" as a Canadian award within the Canadian Order of Military Merit.

That letter was dated June 3, 1985, six years ago.

Honourable senators, in my inquiry, I mentioned that I would ask for a reference to the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs, but I do not think I have to do so. In our mandate, which has already received unanimous agreement by the Senate, I can deal with all matters and examine all matters related to veterans affairs. I intend to examine the award of the Victoria Cross and to retain it as our own Canadian heroism award.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, concerning the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall, I support what he has had to say. I bring to the attention of this house that great Prince Edward Islander by the name of Frederick Thornton Peters.

Frederick Thornton Peters was the only Prince Edward Islander ever to win the Victoria Cross. He is among the most decorated of all Canadians. Few have ever won the three highest British Commonwealth decorations for bravery. No one else ever won, in addition, the highest award for valour conferred by the United States of America on a non-American. It is also exceedingly rare that decorations for bravery such as these are won in two world wars a quarter of a century apart.

Frederick Thornton Peters was a Canadian serving with the Royal Navy. He was born in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, the only Islander ever to win the Commonwealth's highest honour for personal bravery.

Captain Peters never received his Victoria Cross with bar nor his Distinguished Service Cross from the United States. He died in action in an airplane crash on his way to Great Britain five days after the action at Oran Harbour, during World War II North African landings, which brought him his major decorations.

Captain Peters' medals are now for sale. The price is $100,000. There is a volunteer committee on Prince Edward Island at the present time under the distinguished patronage of Her Honour Lieutenant Governor Marion Reid; The Honourable Joseph A. Ghiz, QC, Premier of Prince Edward Island; Brigadier General John E. Ready, the Mayor of Charlottetown; Commander John Angus MacLean, former Premier, former Member of Parliament, PC, DFC; and Vice Admiral James C. Wood, CMM, CD. These patrons are trying to return this medal to Prince Edward Island where Mr. Peters received the distinguished Victoria Cross with the bar.

To me, it seems a sad day when we are doing away with the Victoria Cross. I would like to say to any members of the Senate or any citizens of Canada who wish to contribute to this fund that they can do so by contacting Jack McAndrew in Prince Edward Island at Post Office Box 2703, Charlottetown. I am quite sure that any contributions you might want to make to Prince Edward Island to help return this medal to its province would be appreciated by all.

I hope that Senator Marshall's review of the Victoria Cross before the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee will be investigated and that we can keep the Victoria Cross as our highest honour in Canada, because I believe it is a shame to see it leave considering the history that lies behind it.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable Senators, I would also like to participate with just a few remarks on this debate. I am glad to see Senator Roblin in his place. I would like to bring to the attention of honourable senators that a Winnipegger, Andrew Mynarski, died in his burning plane saving three other co-pilots, and he was also posthumously awarded the Victoria Cross.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, if we are discussing the rewards and decorations in my city, I bring to the attention of honourable senators the fact that one of our streets formerly called Pine Street was rechristened Valour Road, because, if my memory is correct, three Victoria Cross winners resided on that street. These awards were made during the course of World War I.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On the same subject, Senator Roblin is absolutely correct. There were indeed three Winnipeg Victoria Crosses. As Senator Haidasz has pointed out, Mynarski was also a Winnipeger, and there is a school now named in his honour. Senator Marshall commented on Sergeant Major Osborn. He, too, was a Winnipegger, and we have an arena in the city of Winnipeg named after Sergeant-Major Osborn.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES, AND ORDERS

MOTION TO SUSPEND RULE—SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTION REMOVED FROM ORDER PAPER

On Motion No. 7:

> That pursuant to rule 3 which supports practice, and based on rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, as it is a matter of universal privilege, and of profound constitutional significance, therefore the Senate's vote upon order No. 2 under Other Business, being a resolution to rescind the adoption of the present rules as resolved on June 18, 1991 with less than two-thirds majority at that time, in contravention of then-rule 47(2), will be resolved in the affirmative, though without thereby setting a precedent of general practice, if a simple majority of voting Senators assent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, last Thursday I informed the chamber that I would take under advisement the procedural acceptability of Motion No. 7 standing in the name of the Honourable Senator Haidasz. The chair has examined the said motion and feels that because it relates to a motion referred to in the motion as Order No. 2 under Other Business, which has now been dropped as it had not been proceeded with for 15 sitting days pursuant to Rule 28 (3), Motion No. 7, as it now stands, is not comprehensible and should therefore be removed from the Order Paper.

Senator Haidasz will note that he is at liberty to bring another notice of motion before the Senate in its corrected form at any time, which of course he did yesterday.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on a point of clarification, I would request some explanation of why my order was dropped as of a few moments ago, whereas in the name of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition this motion was kept standing since last June. I would like to know how the days are counted for someone adjourning a debate and for someone who has a motion on the Order Paper. For example, are we counting the motions on the Order Paper in chronological order or according to Senate sitting days, or does it just go by the five days from Monday to Friday on the calendar?

The Hon. the Speaker: It is sitting days, honourable senator.

Senator Haidasz: Well, then, my office yesterday received the wrong information from someone representing the Chair, because my legislative assistant was told that a motion is counted even on Mondays and Fridays when the Senate is not sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: That is not quite correct, senator. It is sitting days.

Motion removed from Order Paper.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

PENITENTIARIES

CALL FOR INQUIRY INTO SASKATCHEWAN HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENT

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I desire to make a brief statement with respect to the hostage-taking incident at Saskatchewan Penitentiary on March 25 and 26.

I have investigated the circumstances of this incident and to that end I have carefully reviewed the transcript of evidence of the coroner's inquest held at Prince Albert on May 14 and 15, 1991.

I have had the opportunity of pursuing a somewhat restricted version of the report of the Internal Board of Investigation by the Correctional Service of Canada which examined the circumstances of the incident. In addition, I have interviewed officials at national headquarters of the Correctional Service of Canada. Finally, I was able to have discussions with correctional officers and inmates, including Mr. Jim O'Sullivan, the Warden of Saskatchewan Penitentiary, and Shawn Murray, the surviving hostage-taker.

As a result of my efforts to date, I am convinced that a further inquiry is necessary to clarify in the public domain exactly why lethal force was resorted to in resolving the hostage- taking incident which resulted in two deaths.

There are two main grounds on which I make this submission, namely:

(1) No credible reason has been given for the failure to fire warning or wounding shots prior to the use of lethal force.

(2) There is an abundance of evidence that the hostage-takers may have been severely disabled or incapacitated by teargas prior to any shots being fired.

Mr. T.V. Taylor, the Commander in charge of the Emergency Response Team during the whole of this incident, emphasized in his testimony at the inquest that the usual accepted procedure in any hostage-taking occurrence was first to fire a warning shot, and then a wounding shot, before lethal power was authorized.

Before firepower is even considered, however, Mr. Taylor acknowledged that the invariable practice is to use tear-gas in order to attempt to incapacitate the hostage-takers.

A graphic description was then provided by Mr. Taylor as to the effect of the gas on individuals in the room where the hostage-taking was in progress. These individuals consisted of three inmate hostage-takers, a correctional officer hostage and an inmate hostage.

There were numerous gases available to Mr. Taylor, but the substance chosen by him was an extremely powerful substance, described as a "CN tear-gas", applied with an Israeli gas fogger which, according to Mr. Taylor, "gives a very fine concentration of gas that reacts very very quickly (and) irritates the eyes, any wet portion of the body, and makes it difficult to see."

A "one-second" burst of this gas would have an "instant reaction" on anyone in the room in which the hostages were confined.

Mr. Taylor went on to describe in some detail how the gas overcame the hostage guard. He also testified that the inmate hostage-taker Warriner was severely disoriented by the gas immediately before he became the victim of the second fatal shot.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Hastings, as you know, we have a rule of three minutes. As usual, you may wish to ask for leave to extend.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hastings: Mr. Blake Peters, the mental health coordinator at the penitentiary, who was active in the negotiations with the hostage-takers, and who also testified at the inquest, was equally dramatic in his description of the effects of the gas. Its effect on an individual, said Mr. Peters, was "basically to immobilize their visual senses and sort of immobilized them so that they cannot navigate very well." According to Mr. Peters, it "reacts instantly" and is "very potent." In subsequent discussions, I have confirmed that the reaction of the gas would be instantaneous with a very significant resulting effect on the occupants in the room in question.

It is obvious that the deceased hostage-taker McDonald took the full force of the blast of the teargas, leading to the inevitable conclusion that he could have been severely disabled and completely disorientated prior to the fatal shots being fired. It is common cause that the only shots fired were the lethal ones, with no warning or wounding shots ever taking place.

In summary, there is a strong and, indeed, almost irresistible, inference that lethal firepower was utilized after it became clear, or should have become apparent to the Emergency Response Team, that the discharge of the teargas had accomplished its stated purpose. By incapacitating or immobilizing the hostage-takers, it prevented the likelihood of further serious harm. If force of arms was still considered necessary, it should have been obvious that a warning shot would almost certainly have brought this most regrettable—and deplorable—episode to an end.

The actions of the inmate hostage-takers were reprehensible in the extreme, but I am persuaded that the proper application of established procedure would have avoided a tragic loss of life.

Honourable senators, I believe that the full and true facts of this unfortunate occurrence can emerge only through the medium of a full and open investigation. I respectfully call upon the Governor in Council to give serious consideration to causing such an investigation pursuant to the Inquiries Act.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

APPEARANCE OF GROUP OF 22—ABSENCE OF NEWS COVERAGE BY CBC

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, this morning the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada was meeting in Ottawa, and it was a rather memorable meeting. Appearing before them was the Group of 22, whose fame across Canada on constitutional matters is well known. A committee from that group was present, consisting of the Honourable Maurice Sauvé, the Honourable Allan Blakeney, the former Premier of Saskatchewan, the Honourable Bill Davis, former Premier of Ontario, Professor Kathleen Mahoney of Calgary, Mrs. Sherk from Newfoundland who is on the Economic Council of Canada, and Mr. Harrison McCain.

I found it deplorably surprising that although all the television networks were present, the CBC chose this morning to show some court case in Florida, an alleged rape, on their Newsworld program, although they had been warned in advance about the appearance of these rather famous people before this committee. I think it is to be protested that our national unifying network of television saw fit to show coverage of a rape trial in Florida rather than something that could be of use and value to all Canadians. I bring it to the attention of this house.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF TRAGEDY AT L'ÉCOLE POLYTECHNIQUE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, tomorrow is the second anniversary of a sad and dramatic event in our country—the murder of 14 women engineering students at l'Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal. As we will be recessed tomorrow, I wanted to say a few words of remembrance today about these young women.

● (1410)

We never will forget them: Genevieve Bergeron, Hélene Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Marie Klueznick, Maryse Laganiere, Maryse Leclair, Anne-Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michelle Richard, Annie St. Arneault, and Annie Turcotte. They were deliberately segregated from their male colleagues by a deeply disturbed man who expressed his hatred for feminists as he gunned them down and then killed himself.

Absolutely nothing can compensate for those deaths. Nothing can wipe away the anguish and the loneliness from the families and the friends who had shared the lives of these young women and had hoped to share their futures.

The sheer brutality of this act has forced a national awareness of the reality of violence against women, a reality that women of all ages in Canada understand but, for too long, suffered in silence. We all know the statistics. I will mention only two. One in ten women is assaulted by her male partner; 62 per cent of women murdered in Canada are victims of domestic violence, and guns are the single most common cause of death in cases of spousal murder.

We remember our young women from l'École Polytechnique, but the list goes on. It did not stop there. We have Patricia Allen, who was cruelly killed with a crossbow here in Ottawa only two weeks ago; and only last week, the headlines in Toronto were of a young woman assaulted, raped and beaten while jogging in broad daylight.

Across this country, all levels of government have been responding to this issue. There have been task forces, committees, and study groups. We have a strong federal panel on violence against women, which will report next year. The media has focused not just on violence and on death, but on other insidious forms of abuse in terms of sexual, psychological, emotional harassment and discrimination. We in this Parliament also have a strong recommendation from a House of Commons committee which tells us what we can do to deal with shelters for battered women and their children, education programs against gender discrimination and violence to be carried out in our schools, and tougher public censure for those who have these attitudes.

We have developed, and I say "we," important public allies. I look around me in this House, and you are wearing white ribbons in support of the White Ribbon Campaign this week. Men have publicly come together across this country in support of action against violence against women. As well, they have initiated discussions amongst themselves to better understand the attitudes that prompt this behaviour.

This afternoon, we in this House have a chance to take an enormous step forward. We have a bill which will be reported, Bill C-17 on gun control. We have an opportunity, honourable senators, to show our commitment by passing that bill. It would be a fitting tribute to tomorrow's day of remembrance and action.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

APPEARENCE OF GROUP OF 22—NEWS COVERAGE BY CBC

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the comments made by Senator Barootes having to do with the meeting of the Group of 22 that took place this morning. I would, however, wish to point out to honourable senators that, although I am not a fan of the CBC, CBC Newsworld did televise total coverage of what took place for almost an hour and a half, and questions were asked and responses were made.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-10, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, November 26, 1991, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JEAN-MARIE POITRAS
Chairman

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I do not intend to oppose this bill, but I want to reiterate what I have said several times. Speaking as a New Brunswicker, I believe that the governments of Canada and of New Brunswick have gone too far in raising tobacco taxes. They are not taking the measures that I consider necessary to educate young people on the harm done by smoking.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Thériault, I believe that you are out of order. You can speak later on the motion for third reading of the bill, at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Thériault: Can I not speak?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, it is a question of procedure. You do have the right to speak, but third reading has not yet been moved. Wait for third reading, Senator Thériault.

Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read for the third time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I ask leave to move an adjournment motion, I would explain that there have been discussions with my honourable friend opposite regarding the workload for the next few days, particularly the government's priorities prior to Christmas. It has been agreed, and it is obviously well known to most of us, that we would like to sit on Monday, and perhaps sit on Friday in order to adjourn until the end of January at the earliest, or early February at the latest.

With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> THAT when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, 9th December, 1991, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, leave is granted. I assume that, when the Deputy Leader of the Government says that it will be January or early February, it will be in line with the sittings of the House of Commons.

Senator John Lynch-Staunton: As much as possible, yes.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

If I have leave, I will be more than happy to say a word or two in explanation.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would like the explanation before leave is granted.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, those of us who were in the chamber yesterday will recall that mention was made of a visit to Canada by the independent West Indian Commission under the chairmanship of Sir Shridath Ramphal.

That commission has a very tight schedule. They have a meeting with a member of the government between three o'clock and four o'clock and they have another meeting between six o'clock and eight o'clock. Those of us on the committee wanted to be available to meet them at four o'clock, unless, of course, there was some pressing business here that absolutely required our attention. That is the purpose of asking for leave to make this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE—REQUEST FOR DELAYED ANSWERS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, in view of what the Deputy Leader of the Government said a few minutes ago—to the effect that we will be sitting all of next week, including Monday and perhaps Friday, and then will adjourn until some five or six weeks later, can he give us an undertaking to bring us answers to all of the questions of which he has taken notice so that we will have them before we recess?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): If that is the only question I have today, Senator Olson, I certainly will.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ARMENIA—RECOGNITION OF INDEPENDENCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I realize that we cannot get an answer to this question today, but could the deputy leader undertake to get an answer at an early date to the question: Why has Canada not yet recognized the independence of Armenia, and when will Canada recognize the independence of Armenia?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make every attempt to bring in an answer next week.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DELAYED COVERAGE OF CONSTITUTIONAL DEBATE—RESPONSIBILITY TO PUBLIC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the absence of the leader, and it follows up on the statement made by Senator Barootes. I had intended to ask during Question Period why the CBC chose to show an American trial instead of showing what is most important to Canadians, the Constitutional debate and the emminent people who appeared before the Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada this morning. I realize that Senator Kelly has explained that it was shown later, but surely from a Canadian standpoint it would be important to show the proceedings live. Would the deputy leader undertake to get that message to the CBC and obtain from them an answer on how they see their responsibilities vis-a-vis the Canadian public?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think everyone will have noticed that Senator Barootes' statement ended with applause on both sides, so both sides are anxious to have that answer.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY

FREIGHT SERVICE TO BE ROUTED THROUGH UNITED STATES—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a further question for the deputy government leader regarding a news report that I am told was given this morning on radio station CJOB in Winnipeg. This news report indicated that the President of the CNR, Mr. Lawless, had sent a memo last Wednesday to senior CN officials stating that a new north American freight service would be set up by CN, headquartered in Detroit of all places, and that they would proceed to move more CN freight over U.S. lines. Apparently this would be accomplished by having freight leave Canada at Fort Francis in northwestern Ontario, bypass Thunder Bay, and eventually end up in Montreal. A large part of the circuit would be on American lines which, I presume, are owned by CN, but which, nevertheless, means less employment in Canada.

Can the deputy leader undertake to get a report on this matter from the Canadian National Railway?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I certainly will.

LEBANON

STATUS OF CANADIAN HOSTAGE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, like all Canadians I am sure, I am rejoicing in the developments on the release of the hostages. Also I am a little distressed to hear from time to time in the media that there are only two western hostages still in detention, two people from Germany, knowing that there is, in fact, a Canadian lady under duress in Lebanon. I wonder if the acting leader, who handles his duties so very well, will ascertain for us what is the status of Mrs. Haddad and what the Canadian government can indicate as to the future prospects for the release of this Canadian citizen?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I did read in the Hansard of the House of Commons of yesterday that a similar question was answered in the following way, that the Canadian government has made every effort through all the channels available to it to trace where Mrs. Haddad might be, and so far to no avail. The sources available are those well-known for their involvement in such disappearances. I will try to get a full answer for next week.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

STATUS OF DELAYED ANSWER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question regarding procedure. Yesterday, I raised a question of privilege on the fact that a Delayed Answer to a question was not the real answer to the question asked, but another answer concerning the fixed link. Today I see in Hansard the answer to the question of November 19. How did this answer get in the Journals of today when it was never mentioned in this house yesterday. How did that happen?

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

Senator Barootes: It is called magic.

Senator Bonnell: I thought that the Journals reflected what went on in the house. Apparently the Journals are reflecting things that take place outside the house. How does this answer get in there without any explanation from the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government as to who made the mistake, where the mistake was made and how come this happened? All of a sudden the answer appears in yesterday's Hansard.

Senator Hastings: They just do what they want.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I spoke to a member of the clerk's staff this morning asking the same question and I am waiting for the answer.

While I am on my feet, I am very sorry that Senator Bonnell has not asked me where the Leader of the Government is. Assuming that he would still like to know, I would like to tell him that he is on government business in P.E.I. which should reassure him that the error on the map was a real error, that P.E.I. still exists—

Senator Molgat: Will he guarantee the fixed link?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: —and the honourable senator can feel confident that he can fly in there this weekend.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I did not intend to ask the question today but since I have been told the answer to it, let me say that he is doing nothing in Prince Edward Island today he could not do tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: Some people are hard to please!

● (1440)

Senator Bonnell: I hope when he is there he will explain to the Premier and the people of Prince Edward Island why, when they go to trade conferences and la Francophonie conferences, they drop Prince Edward Island off the map.

I also hope when he is there that he will tell the people of Prince Edward Island that they will soon receive money for the loss of their potatoes to the PVY-n virus.

I also hope that he will tell them that the headquarters for the fixed link will be in Prince Edward Island, otherwise it will not be built.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government for information about our discussions with France on the fishing rights off St. Pierre and Miquelon.

I noted with some attention the comment made by the deputy leader with respect to the absence of Prince Edward Island on that map. In case Senator Murray thought of flying from Prince Edward Island today to St. Pierre and Miquelon to find the answer to my question, perhaps the honourable deputy leader would give him a call and tell him that the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon have also been left off that map.

Is there an answer to my question about the fishing rights?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no answers about the fishing rights.

However, I can add that Anticosti Island and the Magdalen Islands have also been left off, so we are all wondering who our cartographers are.

CRIMINAL CODE
CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Eric Berntson moved third reading of Bill C-17, to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I urge this house to pass Bill C-17 on gun control this afternoon. I believe it should become the law of Canada as quickly as possible. This is not only a question of passing another piece of legislation; it is a question of the credibility of this Parliament and this chamber to clearly indicate to Canadians that we have heard and we have listened to their fear, their anger and their grief about the toll that violence is exacting within our society—violence against women, violence against men, violence against young people, seniors and children, and supreme violence spawned by internal turmoil and despair that leads to suicide.

This bill is flawed, and I think everyone who has studied it knows that. It needs future amendments.

This bill will not end violence. The Minister of Justice knows that. All of the witnesses who appeared before the Senate committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs know that. All of us who listened to them know that. And sadly, those who spoke on behalf of victims lost through violence, and survivors of violence themselves, all know that.

Honourable senators, this bill will help. It attempts to control a major tool of violence: the gun. It will place restrictions on the acquisition of firearms, the types of firearms that are permitted, the competence required to use them, and the security under which they are stored.

The fundamental principle of this bill as stated by the minister is public safety. It is based, as most of us know, on a rather hard-fought compromise, particularly over the last two years in the House of Commons. Debates within party caucuses and the house itself, both achieved high levels of tension, frustration and emotion. Changes were made, and changes were refused in an effort to balance an individual's right and society's right to be protected. As well, there was a political compromise in the House of Commons that ultimately produced the legislation that we see here this afternoon.

The effort to achieve this balance began with the first gun control legislation which was passed back in 1978, and which has remained unchanged until today. Bill C-17 is an attempt to plug some loopholes and make some advances.

● (1450)

Central to the bill is the limitation on access. The screening process for those applying for firearms acquisition certificates has been tightened. The minimum age has been increased from 16 years to 18 years. There is a mandatory waiting period of 28 days before a certificate may be issued. Applications must be guaranteed by two references, and a photograph is required for the certificate. Competence to use a firearm safely and an understanding of the law and of storage precautions will be part of some kind of test. Applicants will be charged a fee to try to maintain a self-financing system of certification. Limits will be imposed on the extent of allowable firepower that a gun can produce.

This certification process is also designed to reduce the opportunity for criminals and potential criminals to gain lawful access to guns, and it is an attempt, and I stress the word attempt, to make it much more difficult for potential offenders to steal guns from legitimate firearms owners for sale on the black market or for other criminal purposes.

Finally, the bill will increase the use of prohibition orders. The minister in her testimony emphasized the examples of domestic violence, of conditions of bail for persons charged with a violent offence, and of peace bond applications and offenses involving drug trafficking and importing.

The length of possible sentences for possession of or importation of a prohibited weapon and possession of any firearm in contravention of a court-imposed prohibition will be increased.

Is all this too much or not enough? Will it work, and is it worth doing?

Those are the questions that were discussed with us by the witnesses before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

Those associations who represent Canadians who use firearms for sport or recreation felt the bill should be amended. They did not feel it would meet its public safety objectives, and they felt there were unwarranted or unworkable restrictions on the rights of individuals to buy and operate their firearms in a reasonable and responsible manner. They felt the issue required amendments to the Criminal Code rather than reliance on government and bureaucracy to work through the process of regulation.

Some witnesses felt the bill violated the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and predicted it would be tossed out within the next two years through court challenges. Clearly, the minister rejected that view, as did witnesses for the Canadian Bar Association. Others were concerned about the constraints the bill would place on special groups, such as gun collectors and young people involved in acquiring expertise in marksmanship with firearms. Now, these groups uniformly supported the motivation of protecting society against the violence erupting from abuse or carelessness or malicious or criminal intent in the use of firearms, but they felt the proper balance had not been struck in this bill.

They urged amendments now which would send the legislation back to the House of Commons and indeed probably back to the drawing board in the Department of Justice. They felt the contentious nature of the politics surrounding gun control would mean that it would be a very long time before any government would come forward with new legislation containing the kinds of amendments that they felt were necessary.

Then, honourable senators, we heard from those who do not believe the bill goes far enough. They were the voices of the 80 per cent of Canadians who support tougher gun control laws.

The Coalition for Gun Control represents the police chiefs of Canada, as well as local associations, women's associations and care centres against assault and violence, mayors and reeves from cities and towns across this country, boards of health, hospitals, health centres, universities, churches, unions, boards of education, lawyers and doctors. And the list goes on.

Individual witnesses also came in person — mothers and fathers who have lost daughters and sons, and students who have lost friends.

One witness was Madame Suzanne Laplante-Edward, whose daughter Anne Marie was killed at l'École Polytechnique on December 6, 1989. Madame Laplante-Edward has worked tirelessly on behalf of the victims of Polytechnique for gun control, and particularly for the issue of truly effective safe storage of firearms. She wants us to recommend strong regulations and substantial changes to the minister's advisory committee on firearms so that that forum may receive strong representation by experts with experience in suicide, in family deaths and in accidents as opposed to submissions from mainly gun users, merchants and owners.

Another was Mrs. Patricia de Villiers, whose daughter Nina was killed by a single gunshot wound to the head after she disappeared while jogging last August in Burlington. Police have linked her death to a man who was out on bail having been charged with assault, forceable confinement involving threats with a gun and a knife, as well as uttering death threats following an attack on a Hamilton woman. He had been carrying a gun in his car when he was stopped at the border and sent back into Canada still in possession of the gun the night of Nina's murder. He killed himself with that same gun. Had this bill been in effect, there would have undoubtedly been a firearms prohibition in his bail conditions. Mrs. de Villiers told us to pass the bill and to urge that gun ownership be made impossible for those who pose a risk to society.

Mr. John Bickerstaff told us about losing his teenage son, who was killed during an accident with a gun while at the home of a friend whose parents were away on vacation. One of those parents was a police officer whose gun was in the house unsafely stored. Mr. Bickerstaff told us the number one priority must be the protection of the public and noted that gun owners and users, even policemen, are not experts in safe firearms storage.

Eric Sirois was at our meeting yesterday. He had to be helped to the microphone because he is blind, and he is blind through a suicide attempt when he was having difficulty during his teenage years. After a troubled and unfortunate evening, he found himself at home with a headache. While looking for an Aspirin, he found a firearm. He tried to take his life, and he lost his eyesight. He told us, "If that firearm had been in a safe place, it would not have happened."

● (1500)

We heard from Heidi Rathjen, the President of l'Association des Etudiants de Politechnique, who has spearheaded a gun control campaign, including a petition signed by some 600,000 Canadians urging some of the measures which are contained in this bill, but many others which are not.

Heidi graduated from l'École Polytechnique in 1990, and she reminded us that the man who came into the school on December 6, 1989, had legally acquired a Ruger mini 14 and two cartridge magazines. He shot 27 people, and 14 of them were the women who died. The passage of this bill would be a great tribute to her efforts and those of her fellow students who will now continue to push for tougher changes affecting registration testing, storage, certification for acquiring ammunition, stronger prohibition orders involving offenses on violence and drug trafficking, as well as no grandfathering of converted automatics.

Honourable senators, we heard from Dr. Rey Brown, who helped treat the wounded from Polytechnique who survived, but he is haunted by the 14 who died. He implored us to pass the bill as it is, noting simply that "guns are made to kill."

We heard from other doctors and lawyers from Alberta and Quebec who urged us to pass the bill and to help battle against suicides which play such a tragic role, particularly in the lives of young Canadians.

All of these concerns were included and expanded upon in the presentation of the Coalition for Gun Control headed by Wendy Cukier. The committee asked her for suggestions which we could convey to the minister while regulations are being drafted, and also recommendations for future amendments because, honourable senators, this bill, if it passes this afternoon, is not by a long shot the end of the issue. It is a foundation upon which we must build, not many years from now, but steadily.

When the committee agreed last night to report the bill without amendment, it also pledged itself to write a letter to the Honourable Kim Campbell next week outlining the priority suggestions from our witnesses so they will have some influence in the days ahead. The minister's officials told us last night that as soon as the bill passes, they will begin working through the holiday season on regulations. Some will be very complex and will require extra time, but the officials estimated that a large number of the regulations would be ready by the time Parliament returns from its Christmas break early in the new year.

I urge the House this afternoon to do the job that the witnesses, many of them with reservations, asked us to do. We must pass this bill, because parts of it are urgent. Also, at the moment, it is the strongest response we could give to all those who tomorrow will remember the second anniversary of the Montreal tragedy and all the other lives which have been so cruelly ended by violence with guns.

In a sense, Bill C-17, in a small way, may be the tribute of this House and this Parliament at this time to those who have died and to all of the families and friends who must forever live with their memories.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, Senator Fairbairn has clearly and eloquently recapped the contents of bill C-17 and the proceedings during the committee hearings. I wish to make a brief statement.

I wish to advise you that my position on this issue is quite extreme and, in addressing the minister, I have referred to it as "unreasonable." Frankly, my heart tells me that I should vote against this bill.

As a very young man, and one of four great white hunters many years ago, I went on a hunting expedition. I shot and killed a rabbit. Well, it is not a big deal for people who like hunting, but that experience had a profound impact on me. I have not had a gun in my hands since that time.

Some years ago, a very dear friend was shot to death by another very dear friend in a hunting accident. I am not sure which one of the victims suffered most.

As Senator Fairbairn has said, guns were only made to kill. Guns were only developed and invented to kill human beings.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to, and will not impose what I have already described as my unreasonable position on my colleagues, but I wish to share with you my reasons for having decided to vote for and support Bill C-17.

You have already heard that during the committee hearings we witnessed, among others, a father whose son was killed in a tragic handgun accident; a mother whose daughter was recently senselessly murdered; a young man, blind because of an attempted suicide. We heard from representatives of the Coalition for Gun Control, and, very touchingly, representatives of mothers and people involved in the horrible murders that happened at l'Écôle Politechnique. All of them, without exception, urged us to pass this bill.

Honourable senators, I will vote in favour of Bill C-17 because I see it as another step, although a small step, towards what I hope and pray will eventually be major changes to gun control legislation in this country, which will result in many lives saved and a safer place to live for my grandchildren.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I am not a member of the committee that heard testimony on this bill, so I am grateful to Senator Fairbairn for her strong, clear and convincing speech on this matter and to the senator opposite for the statement we have just heard.

I wish to ask Senator Fairbairn, or perhaps someone on the government side, to tell us whether the minister or any other member of the government has made a commitment to move towards the next stage. We have just heard a government member who is not convinced by this bill, and many of us share that point of view. As Senator Fairbairn said, 80 per cent of Canadians would like a stronger bill.

Is there any commitment on the public record that the next steps will be taken at an early date?

Hon. Eric Berntson: As sponsor of Bill C-17, and I think this view will be shared by all members of the committee, not only did the minister make a commitment for expeditious follow-up in terms of putting regulations in place, in terms of putting the training and safe storage aspects of the bill in place, but that commitment was put on the record today or yesterday by the officials of the Department of Justice. I think all members of the committee will confirm what I have just said. The commitment is on the public record.

• (1510)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I hope that we will pass Bill C-17 today for a number of the reasons that have already been stated. I say that even though, as has been pointed out, the bill is inadequate in terms of dealing with some of the problems that we are aware of concerning the lack of provisions dealing with the control of firearms which are presently in the Criminal Code.

I will not try to deal with, or even name, all the inadequacies that were pointed out at the committee hearings I attended. As was pointed out by the Minister of Justice, and I agree with her, this measure is another step in the control of firearms, one which is aimed in particular at the criminal element.

There are one or two items that trouble me about what is left out of the bill. The reason I wish to put those points on the record now is to ensure that the Minister of Justice and senior officials in the Department of Justice, as well as other people who are concerned about this matter, will deal with them when they come forward with amendments in the future. One thing about which they did not seem to be too concerned was that, while some types of firearms are banned or prohibited, other types of firearms may still be purchased legally even after the provisions in Bill C-17 are enacted.

One matter about which no concern was shown regards shotguns which may have a magazine of five shells, plus the ability to hold a shell in the chamber. The reason this disturbs me so much is that a firearm of that type cannot be used anywhere in Canada for sporting purposes, at least not as far as I know. I know, for example, that there is such a provision which forms part of the migratory birds rules which most jurisdictions have agreed to enforce. So, regardless of where Canada geese and ducks may be found, local provincial game laws are such that that type of gun cannot be use. If a hunter is caught in a field with a shotgun that holds that many rounds of ammunition, he will have it confiscated and he will be charged under the hunting laws of the province. Therefore, I cannot see the logic in allowing those kind of guns to be sold. They cannot be used in sporting competitions. At a trap or skeet shooting competition, only two-shot firearms are permitted, usually in a double-barrelled, side-by-side or over-and-under shotgun. If someone does come to one of those shooting matches with a semi-automatic shotgun, there can never be more than two shots in it. Where is the sense in allowing a weapon such as that to be sold in Canada? That is what I cannot understand.

Honourable senators should not misunderstand how potent and lethal is a weapon such as a 12-gauge shotgun, for example, that is loaded with three-inch magnum shells, and which has six shots, is if used as a weapon on people. It is a terribly lethal and potent weapon. One matter that was brought up at some of the committee meetings was that limiting the size of a magazine from whatever it was down to five for a long-gun, and down to 10 as the maximum for a short-gun, or a handgun, is a tremendous improvement. I agree. Make no mistake, honourable senators, a firearm that will hold six shots of the type that I have just described is also a very lethal weapon. There did not seem to be any concern that those are still legal weapons. They can be bought. Yet, they cannot be used for sporting or competitive shooting because they are against the laws of every province. So, why in the name of common sense sell them at all?

Senator Di Nino: To shoot people.

Senator Olson: I am sorry that is the case.

Senator Di Nino: I agree. I am sorry, too.

Senator Olson: I do not think those type of firearms should be around at all. Yet, I know that there are thousands of them out there now because there has not been a prohibition against their purchase prior to today, and there will not be one even after this bill is passed. No one can make a case that they need a firearm like that for sporting purposes, because they cannot have it. Provincial hunting laws prevent such possession, as I pointed out a minute ago.

I have used these semi-automatic guns for hunting geese in the past. They must be plugged so that they cannot take more than two shells. That is a measure which has been in effect for many years. I do not understand why the manufacturers do not change from making long magazines that hold five or six shells to ones that hold two. I know in Alberta a gun such as that cannot even be used for hunting upland game, a measure in addition to the agreement entered into under the migratory birds convention.

Honourable senators, I do not see any sense in allowing a whole lot more of this type of firearm to be sold to the public. It is legal. It will still be legal to buy them, after a permit is obtained, and all that sort of thing. They have no use that I can see. Yet, if the plug is taken out of them so that they can be fully loaded, they are extremely dangerous and lethal weapons when they get into the hands of some demented or mentally unstable person such as some of the people who have been alluded to today.

I hope that the Minister of Justice and those who support these measures will exert enough pressure during discussions concerning the next round of amendments to the Criminal Code so that the sale of these types of firearms will be disallowed.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my two colleagues have put very well the position that we take with regard to this bill. We think there are many flaws in the bill, but we will support it in the present circumstances.

There is no question that an important part of the bill will be the regulations. I would ask the government to ensure that, first, we receive the regulations as early as possible and, second, that when they are finalized, and I understand they will be published in the Canada Gazette, they be sent to all honourable senators as a specific follow-up on this bill.

Senator Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the minister has already made it clear that she wants the regulations made public as soon as possible. I am sure they are already being drafted. I will certainly make a point of seeing that all senators receive a copy of them when they are ready.

CANADA PENSION PLAN FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux moved second reading of Bill C-39, an Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to present to this House Bill C-39, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

The amendments that we will have to examine today were unanimously passed by the other House and are a real achievement in the ongoing reform of social policies. This bill also emphasizes the importance of federal-provincial cooperation in Canada.

This bill does not claim to meet the expectations of all Canadians for social protection, far from it unfortunately. Following the debates before the bill was passed in the House of Commons, the government will obviously have to keep working with the provinces on the outstanding issues. I will return to this later on.

Bill C-39 has two main objectives: first, to ensure the Plan's long-term financial stability, and second, to improve children's benefits under that Plan. The legislation also includes some minor amendments which, among other things, will simplify the administration of the Plan and clarify the eligibility criteria, if not make them more flexible.

Honourable senators, a few days ago, the administration of the Canada Pension Plan was once again questioned in an editorial of a large Canadian newspaper. There is no denying that an increasing number of people are skeptical about the Plan's ability to meet its obligations. So, I welcome this opportunity to assure the 9.5 million or so Canadian contributors who are wondering whether there will be money left to pay their benefits whenever their turn comes to retire that they have nothing to worry about.

The Canada Pension Plan has served the Canadian people well for the past 25 years, and the changes before us today will continue to ensure the reliability of the plan in the years to come. When the CPP was established, it was agreed that contributions would increase over the years, as the number of beneficiaries and seniors grew. So, in 1987, the Canada Pension Plan was amended, and the new provisions established what the contribution rates would be for each of the next 25 years. Every five years, the federal and provincial Finance ministers have to get together to review the financial status of the CPP and, if need be, look into changes to the rate schedule in the light of new actuarial data. As part of this review, the Finance ministers also have to extend the five-year schedule to cover a period of 25 years.

The Finance ministers have successfully completed their first five-year review last January. The provisions they have agreed upon, including a new contribution rate schedule, have been incorporated in the bill before this House. This new rate schedule will mean that employers, employees and self-employed worker's contributions will be higher than anticipated initially. Indeed, as a result of the actuarial report on the Canada Pension Plan Fund, projections had to be reviewed, because the latest figures contained in the most recent actuarial report are based on estimates which are lower than in previous reports as regards birth rate, immigration and growth in productivity.

Therefore, in 1992, first year of the new schedule, middle-income Canadians can expect to pay about seven dollars more toward the plan. I would like to point out, honourable senators, that the financial impact of this change on the contributors will not be as great as these figures would lead us to believe, since contributions to the Canada Pension Plan are allowable income tax credits for individual taxpayers. The end result will nonetheless be an increase in contributions.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I shall go on to address the second important modification contained in this bill. This is a measure to which I attach the utmost importance, because it affects one of the most vulnerable groups in our society—our children. The government is proposing a $35 increase in monthly flat-rate benefits to the children of deceased or disabled CPP contributors. This amount represents a 30-percent increase over the present benefit level of $113. Approximately 170,000 children, a large number of these in low-income families, may benefit from this increase effective January 1, 1992. This measure represents additional disbursements of $75 million in CPP children's benefits. Of course, everyone wishes we could do more when we think of the poverty in which many of our children live. Nevertheless, $75 million is still a significant amount.

The children's benefit increase was initially put forward in the federal government's 1987 Consultation Paper on Canada Pension Plan Survivor Benefit Reform. While federal and provincial finance ministers have not reached agreement on the concept of a new survivor benefit structure, they have nevertheless decided to raise the children's benefit without delay. This increase constitutes a recognition of the difficult circumstances facing many surviving spouses or disabled contributors with dependent children.

[Translation]

The bill also contains a number of changes with little or no impact on costs which nevertheless represent an improvement over the existing provisions. The proposals would ensure:

—that the disabled contributor's child's benefit under the Canada Pension Plan be converted into a CPP orphan's benefit without having to request it;

—that children's benefits under the Canada Pension Plan be payable to a child who is placed under the care and custody of a contributor to the Canada Pension Plan after the contributor has become disabled;

—that entitlement to benefits for Canada Pension Plan contributors be protected for those who, because of a disability, are unable to apply within the required time frame;

—payment of Canada Pension Plan disability benefits to the administrator of a disability insurance plan as directed by the beneficiary;

—sharing information between the Old Age Security, Canada Pension Plan and Family Allowance programs to improve services to contributors and beneficiaries;

—sharing information between these three programs and the provincial governments in a limited number of circumstances so that provincial benefits can be provided sooner and services can be provided more quickly to clients in common;

—other minor technical and administrative amendments.

This completes the outline of the provisions of this bill. Throughout the debate before it was passed in the House of Commons, members expressed their concerns, especially about the current provisions of the disability plan. Their concerns matched those of the groups representing the disabled that appeared before the parliamentary committee. These groups raised several important questions and suggested amendments that they would like the government to make to the present disability provisions. One of the main concerns is that contributors who take too long to apply may be allowed to apply for disability benefits.

It is important to note, honorable senators, that the bill has a provision partly to deal with this problem. As I said before, it is proposed that the eligibility of contributors to the Canada Pension Plan be protected for those who are unable to apply on time as a result of disability. I admit, however, that this provision would not apply to all late applicants.

Of course, members of the other place, groups representing the disabled and probably many of us would want the provision to go further. In this regard, remember that Private Member's Bill C-280 would make the rules for disability pensions more flexible. This bill is on the Senate's agenda and it came up for second reading this past Tuesday.

Another concern raised in the parliamentary debate was the definition of disability in the Canada Pension Plan. It is considered to be too limiting and not to do enough for the beneficiary's independence and rehabilitation. Honourable senators, we should recall that a contributor is considered disabled under the Canada Pension Plan if he or she is unable to hold a sufficiently well-paying job and the disability is prolonged or expected to last indefinitely or could likely lead to death.

Obviously, honourable senators, any significant change to the definition of disability would change the group covered by the present provisions. It would be a fundamental change in the present role of the Canada Pension Plan as part of the whole system of benefits for the disabled.

Finally, I would like to mention the suggestion made during the parliamentary debate to provide protection under the Canada Pension Plan to people who take care of handicapped children. Honourable senators, as you no doubt know, the Canada Pension Plan allows excluding from the contribution period years of little or no earnings spent raising children under the age of seven. Some members of the House of Commons asked that this provision be expanded to include periods spent raising handicapped children.

The three proposals that I just mentioned briefly would impact significantluy on the costs of the Canada Pension Plan and on contribution rates. Since any major change to the Canada Pension Plan requires the approval of two thirds of the provinces, which have two thirds of the population, these proposals will have to be submitted to them for in-depth review. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has undertaken to initiate discussions with his provincial counterparts early the new year.

[English]

In the meantime, I am appealing for your cooperation so that we may adopt Bill C-39 as promptly as possible. Our time is short if we want to see the new children's benefits measures take effect on the date that has been proposed, January 1, 1992. Once we have approved the bill and it has received Royal Assent, it needs to be ratified by two-thirds of the provinces accounting for two-thirds of the population. Based on the hypothesis of obtaining Royal Assent before December 10, we might hope to see a provincial response before the 21st of December. We would then have about ten days between the 22nd and the 31st, in other words over the holidays, to issue the federal Order-in-Council.

I am therefore asking you to approve this bill as promptly as possible so that the 170,000 or so children of disabled or deceased contributors may receive this $35 increase with their January cheque. Along with the indexation increase that they would normally get on January 1, the amount these children receive would increase from $113 to $150 a month.

I address these remarks to Senator Bosa in particular, whom I think intends to reply on second reading. These are what I call minor modifications in terms of concordance, clarification or technicalities. I think we will have a good opportunity to examine them in the Social Affairs Committee. We would probably get too many explanations here, so I think the right place to do this is in the committee.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowance Act and the Old Age Security Act. Before doing so I wish to congratulate Senator Lavoie-Roux for a very clear dissertation on the very complicated bill that she has just presented to us.

• (1540)

The Canada Pension Plan was introduced in 1966, and since that time it has played an important role in contributing to the financial security of many Canadians. In the more than 20 years since its inception, various governments have amended the legislation in order to make it more responsive to the needs and conditions of various groups in society. Increasing disability benefits and greater flexibility with regard to the continuation of survival benefits on marriage are examples of such amendments. It is quite clear that such changes will be an ongoing feature of this legislation, especially in light of change in demographic and socio-economic circumstances.

Bill C-39 represents a package of such changes and although it goes some distance in responding to certain inadequacies in the legislation, a number of issues remain unresolved and these warrant our attention.

Bill C-39 was tabled in the House of Commons and received first reading October 21, 1991. Major components of the bill allow for increases to the Canada Pension Plan contribution rates. As well, increases to the level of benefits being extended for dependent children of disabled and deceased contributors to the plan are included in the bill. Federal-provincial agreement for these increases was reached in January 1990-91.

Additional provisions in Bill C-39 include: an easing of time restrictions for benefit applications for CPP contributors who, because of incapacity, are unable to make timely application for benefits, prevention of the loss of survival benefits in certain circumstances, alterations to the rules regarding the division of unadjusted pensionable earnings, allowances for the assignment of disability benefits when advanced payments are received, changes to the appeal process, and greater flexibility in the release of exchanged information.

The increases in contribution rates for Canadians are intended to redress the miscalculation made some 25 years ago. It was believed that for each worker drawing CPP benefits, some six workers would be gainfully employed and, in effect, supporting the one person drawing benefits. Current estimates indicate that in the next 20 years there will only be three workers attempting to support one person collecting the CPP benefits. Consequently, the Canada Pension Plan, if it is to remain viable, faces an urgent need for contribution rates to be adjusted in light of this reality.

Making projections over long periods of time is indeed a risky business and we can all appreciate that changing demographics will have an impact on the accuracy of calculations. However, the deeper and more important question that we must address is what economic conditions and policies underlie and help to account for the shortfall in the number of workers who are actively contributing to the Canada Pension Plan. Surely an economy which faces rising unemployment and decreased worker productivity lies at the root of contibutor shortfalls. Band-aid approaches, such as increased contribution rates, only succeed in addressing immediate concerns and are not sufficient to address this more fundamental issue.

In the past year the federal government has introduced two bills, Bill C-69 and Bill C-20. Both of these bills had a major negative impact on transfer payments to the provinces. Subsequently, Bill C-32 put a 5 per cent limit on the rate of increases of Canada Assistance Plan funds to those provinces not receiving equalization payments. The decision by the Supreme Court of Canada upholding the federal government's right to do so means the possibility of further actions in this regard hangs over the provinces.

What are the provinces to do in light of these actions by the federal government? The options, particularly for the Atlantic provinces and increasingly for the prairies as well, are limited. Provincial governments face huge shortfalls in their operating budgets and they find themselves in a position where they must rely on credit. The provinces have already dipped into the CPP to the tune of approximately $42 billion. Surely the actions of government in limiting transfer payments created a situation where the provinces will borrow from the CPP fund to the limit of their ability.

In Canada we have at times prided ourselves on the social safety net we have created. We smugly compare our social conditions to those of our American neighbours and we assure ourselves that this country's social programs contribute to a better quality of life for Canadians. Recently, however, the Canadian public has been reminded that our safety net, our social net is tattered; that it is no longer able to support the increasing number of people who, for economic or health reasons, have come to require greater support. That situation is particularly desperate for disabled persons and for their families and children.

The legislation committee heard from representatives of the disabled community in this country during their hearings on Bill C-39. We must remember that the government has made a strong commitment to legislative review from the perspective of disabled people. Involving disabled groups in the process of legislative reform on the CPP at an earlier stage in the process would have sent a message of compassion to this group. It would have said we want to understand your concerns and we want to address them. However, disabled persons organizations told the committee that disabled Canadians face a number of problems which are directly related to the Canada Pension Plan as it now exists, and they would like to have been more directly involved in the process of amendments. I urge the government to keep their concerns in mind in the course of the future deliberations on this matter.

Advocacy groups for disabled persons claim that the disability benefit provisions of the Canada Pension Plan are discriminatory and that they have a disparate impact on disabled persons vis-a-vis other pension recipients under the legislation. In their submissions to the legislative committee, they made specific mention of the definition of "disability" as it stands in the act.

The definition of "disability" and, in effect, the test for qualifications is that the person's disability be both severe and prolonged. "Severe" is defined as a disability which makes a person "incapable of regularly pursuing any substantial gainful employment". In the experience of many disabled persons this means that anyone who works even on a very part-time basis, or anyone who attends training courses or sessions is not eligible for benefits. Disabled persons advocacy groups argue that this stringency enforces total dependence rather than fostering assisted independence. The effect of these definitions is profound. Those persons who would like to work or could be employed with retraining are forced to collect disability pensions. Over the long term, such a strident approach will cost this country increasing amounts of money, and it penalizes those disabled persons who are ready and willing to work. I believe we have seen the impact that such policies can have on people in this country.

There have been many calls to reform the delivery of both social assistance and unemployment insurance in order to remove or reduce the disincentive to work. The people receiving such benefits lose and the country, too, loses over the long run. It is apparent that these same problems exist within the Canada Pension Plan, and they must be addressed. There are indeed pilot projects that are now attempting to alleviate these problems but I would urge the government to expand such projects and eventually make them part of the disability program in Canada. Disability benefits must be about more than delivering money to people. They must also take issue with the quality of life considerations for disabled persons in Canada.

The other component of the test for disability is that which says that the disability must be prolonged. In the language of the legislation, this means that the disability is "likely to be long, continued and of indefinite duration or likely to result in death." This definition excludes those who are disabled for extended periods of time, those whose disability is episodic rather than continuous, those who have serious illness but who are likely to get better, or those who suffer from manic depressive illnesses. Once their employment-related sickness benefits are exhausted, these people must resort to social assistance and they may suffer the consequences of no access to support funds.

These problems related to the definition of disability are fundamental stumbling blocks for disabled persons in this country. They have asked the government to consider changes to the definition so that the words "severe" and "prolonged" would be replaced by the words "significant" and "extended". In light of their concerns, I would encourage the government to consider, in further deliberations on legislative reform, changing the definition as disabled persons advocacy groups have requested.

I will close my comments on Bill C-39 today by saying that our party supports this legislation. I would also like to bring to the attention of the other house that our esteemed late colleague Senator Croll alerted us to the problems of the CPP contribution rates some years ago. The report "Retirement Without Tears" warned us that major changes to the CPP would be required if we were to fulfil its mandate.

This bill before us fills some of the gaps in the Canada Pension Plan, and for those reasons, and particularly because it increases benefits to the dependent children of disabled and deceased contributors to the plan, we are supportive of the legislation.

We would urge the government to recognize that such changes do not go far enough in responding to the needs of persons, particularly disabled persons, who are directly affected by this legislation. Their concerns must be incorporated into further deliberations which affect the Canada Pension Plan. Here, I believe, is an opportunity for the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to do a study of the Canada Pension Plan legislation in order to ensure that the government has all the facts before it when it decides to introduce further amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. Since this matter will be referred to that committee, I hope that during the consideration of this bill they will bring up the subject of further study of the bill in the future.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of Senator Di Nino, seconded by the Honourable Senator Comeau, for the second reading of Bill C-12, An Act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, in my haste to respond to Senator Di Nino yesterday, I neglected to commend him for the manner in which he put this legislation before us on behalf of the government. I listened very carefully to what he had to say and I could not help feeling that he was doing the best he could with a very bad product. I found it easy to share his sense of frustration and discomfort at the legislation, especially when we all realize, or we should all realize, that we are dealing with tinkering and simple window-dressing by this government to the problems of youth.

It is wise to realize that the bill is part and parcel of this Government's law and order legislation, which entails a great crusade not so much to face up to the problems of violence in society, but to save this government from its 18 per cent support in the polls today.

Senator Thériault: They have gone up!

Senator Hastings: I think we have seen how this agenda is working when the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General will distort any issue or problem out of all proportion to reality and then add a generous dose of fear and loathing in the public mind, gallantly charge off with a piece of legislation to answer all the problems, and then, capably aided by their public relations hucksters, create the illusion of bringing forth the solution to the problem.

As we see today, honourable senators, it is important to realize how this government is always attracted to the exception. As Senator Di Nino said yesterday, we are targeting an extremely small percentage of young persons. Let us understand exactly what we are targeting. Out of 38,000 youths who appeared in youth court in 1990-91, the cases of three of them were raised to senior court for murder.

The government has created a real problem by taking the exception and magnifying it out of all proportion to reality, creating the illusion of a great problem that will be solved with this claptrap piece of legislation. For example, the Solicitor General, who announced last week a committee investigation into the Temporary Absence Program, a program that is successful 99.6 per cent of the time. The Solicitor General charges off to Edmonton on a great mission to convince the people of Canada that there is a problem here. He has created a commission to study a program which is 99.6 per cent successful, but it will study the .4 per cent of failure. Then the minister will probably bring forth some piece of legislation that will not answer any problem whatsoever with respect to public safety.

I think it is important, honourable senators, to appreciate and understand that in this bill we are dealing with punishment, pure and simple. I think it is important to realize that this bill increases the sentence for murder for those under 18 from three years to life. It is a very major increase in swinging open the doors of our penitentiaries.

This bill also contains the provision, of course, for parole in five or ten years. However, that is not certain. There is no certainty in parole. What we are doing is increasing the sentence for those under 18 from three years to ten years. In these days, when youth is in trouble and calls out for some leadership and guidance, what they receive from this government is brute, raw, negative punishment.

The Minister of Justice cries out that this bill will be a deterrent, and she says, and I quote: "Hopefully it will contribute to a climate of deterrence." Hopefully. Honourable senators, that hope is based on the misguided principle that the harsher we treat the offender, the better citizens we will be. As if some half-crazed youth, high on drugs or alcohol, or drugs and alcohol, on some insane mission, was about to stop and say, "What is the penalty? Is it five years? Is it ten? Is it three? When will I get parole?" That does not happen when it comes to murder.

The murder rate in Canada, as I said yesterday, has been at about 2.5 per cent. It has varied up and down a little over the last 30 years. It did not matter whether you hanged them or gave them 25 years, or 10 years, or seven years. The murder rate remained the same, but we have to always appeal to that attitude of society that if we punish the offender, we will all be better.

In Canada, we have the second highest rate in the western world for putting people in jail, 151 per 100,000. With respect to youth, we put in jail 194 per 100,000 population. We are running second only to the United States. If we try harder, as we are doing with this bill, to get more of them into penitentiaries, we will soon be number one.

The public concern about violent crime is fixated and stimulated by media counts of murders. The deterrent effect of harsher penalties in these instances is questionable. The vast majority of these homicides, especially those by youth, are spur-of-the-moment acts triggered by rage, jealousy and frustration, accompanied by drug and alcoholic-induced states, involving a friend, a relative or an acquaintance. They are always carried out by the poor and the uneducated and the unemployed. There is always a disproportionately high number of aboriginals involved because of the cultural and socioeconomic forces that make all of these problems of mankind and society bear heavily upon them.

Premeditation is rare when the offender is an adult. It is even virtually non-existent when the offender is a youth. Events and emotions move too quickly for a carefully calculated assessment of the consequences of the conditions. If any thought is given at all, it comes after the event, not before.

We are led to believe that the amendments to the Young Offenders Act enjoy a measure of support from a wide range of persons. We are told that their proposals reflect the collective experience of a wide range of persons involved with young offenders including representatives of governments, territories, correctional officials, mental health professionals, members of non-government organizations concerned with juvenile justice, researchers, academics, judiciary, Crown counsel, the police, federal lawyers and members of the House of Commons. At all events, it is just a section of the House of Commons: The bill did not pass unanimously.

What are the facts? The Canadian Criminal Justice Association, which represents a considerable number of Canadians engaged in the criminal justice system from parole to the police to the judges is a national voluntary membership organization which brings together various criminal justice professionals such as police officers, lawyers, judges, probation and parole officers, and other correctional workers, as well as volunteers and lay persons. What did they have to say?

> Whereas the Canadian Criminal Justice Association has previously gone on record stating that the basic purposes of the criminal law should be carried out with no more interference with the freedom of individuals than is necessary; and which was the predecessor to the present bill we are dealing with, C-12—
> Whereas Bill C-58,

> if passed would likely result in more youth receiving longer periods of incarceration, which the bill does—

> Whereas the Association does not believe that the proposed amendment will in any way strengthen the justice system or enhance public safety;
> Be it resolved that the CCJA declare its opposition to the proposed amendments contained in [the bill] and communicate the reasons for this position to the Minister of Justice.

So much for this wide-ranging support that the bill allegedly has.

● (1610)

It is interesting read what Chief Clancy of the city police of the city of Edmonton says about the bill.

> Increasing murder sentences for young offenders would be useless in dealing with youth crime . . . The proposed changes are only a distraction and will not make a significant impact on the problems of teen crime.

The chief of police prefers more counselling rather than stiffer penalties for the tiny fraction who murder; but we have to deal with that tiny fraction as we deal with it in this bill.

I have searched diligently, in vain, to find that measure of support from a wide range of persons as indicated by the sponsor yesterday, speaking on behalf of the government.

What about youth workers? The Canadian Council on Children and Youth has said that "of particular concern has been the increase in the use of custody and the apparent disparities and dispositional practices."

The public is understandably concerned about the use of violence, particularly by young persons. However, this legislation can only have a limited, negative impact on the offence patterns of adolescents. Significant changes in offence patterns are likely to require significant social change.

More fundamentally, our mental health, education and welfare systems must be made responsive to youth. We need improvements in how we deal with such problems as drug and alcohol abuse, adolescents with learning disabilities and visible minority youths, and with the integration of young persons into the labour force. More important, we must have a society that values its youth and recognizes their need for a nurturing environment, not easier access to crime schools in adult institutions.

[Senator Hastings.]

The young offenders themselves I do not think will earn their endorsement. They are not likely to be aware of the proposals, because the young people are too caught up in the turmoil of their own struggles today with education, job seeking, growing pains, sex abuse, substance abuse and family breakup. Potential offenders need guidance, help and direction. Will they get it from society, from the experts and the councillors, or will we refer them to the persistent, manipulative, dangerous offenders restrained in our adult institutions to have bodies, mind and spirit ravaged in ten years of incarceration?

This bill may be tougher; it is certainly not better. It is harder, and it is certainly harmful.

Senator Di Nino said yesterday, speaking for the government, how considerate the government was in granting parole in ten or five years, and he said this would diminish the effects of long-term incarceration. Let me tell you, in ten years or five years, a young man can be ravaged beyond recognition and destroyed for life; and the great government passes them out a five and ten year consideration that they will not be diminished while in custody.

A young boy of 18, after serving five or ten years, is practically certain to be institutionalized and his chances of ever living a normal life greatly diminished; but, that is what he gets from this government.

Honourable senators, the thrust of this legislation increases the possibility of losing these youthful offenders in the mass of confirmed, hardened adult offenders rather than marshalling a few imaginative resources to bear on the challenge.

What about the victims? Unless solely motivated by vengeance, most victims want reassurances that the perpetrator will not offend again. We had that explained to us, or a typical example of that, just the other day in the lobby of the Senate when victims from Barry's Bay came to this place. Tthe mother and father of a young girl, and their plea was not more time in jail; their plea was not life; their plea was could we not do something to make certain this young man who is charged, should he be convicted, will receive rehabilitation through any period of confinement.

Rehabilitation means the provision of resources, something this government is reluctant to do. Rehabilitation programs and efforts cost money. These legislative amendments are relatively cheap; however, in criminal justice, as in life, you get what you pay for. In Bill C-12, we are getting more punishment and less chance of lasting protection, and we are losing our troubled youth.

Those working with young offenders, and young offenders themselves, need resources, resources that are diminishing every day. This government, in May 1980, unilaterally imposed a cap on all contributions to the provinces for cost-sharing programs. Since this restriction ignores inflation, it becomes a brutal cost on available services. In 1984, the Prime Minister promised to assure financial assistance to allow equal access and availability of programs and services across Canada. However, today, in place of that promised funding, we have amendments that open prisons and penitentiaries more widely to the young offender.

If public protection is paramount, then surely it deserves more serious consideration and commitment than cosmetic tinkering with the existing act, cynically trumpeted as being some sort of reform. If the top priority is public protection, then let us get on with it in a positive, realistic matter. It should involve:

1) Preventive Programs—More effort must be made to reduce the source of delinquency rather than coping with the aftermath.

2) Rehabilitation Programs—The only protection is rehabilitation. The road to protection is not through providing more punishment for these young offenders; it is through individual attention, guidance and therapy; it is through education and training and the provision of opportunity for young people to lead productive, law-abiding lives; it is through family-like settings at most small group homes in normal communities; it is not in placing youth in overcrowded, understaffed youth facilities, and definitely not in adult prisons or penitentiaries.

3) Public Education Programs—The public must be protected; the public must be heard; but the public must also be informed if it is to provide realistic advice to legislators.

The report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General in his review on Sentencing and Conditional Release and Related Aspects of Correction chaired by David Daubney in August of 1988 stated:

> Canadians have a distorted view of crime, and it is reasonable to question their calls for greater harshness in sentencing.

Those were members of Parliament.

> While policy makers and politicians need to heed public opinion, they must be cautious in the criminal justice field of acting on an inadequate or incomplete interpretation of public opinion.
> Ultimately, the evolution of sound government policy, one that has broad public support, is dependent on an informed public.

The report then urged the government to provide public education about the operation of this criminal justice system, including the myths and the realities that surround it, a high priority through the effective use of their own communication capacities and through the financial and other support of the voluntary sector so that citizens can be more actively engaged in activities that increase their understanding of the criminal justice system.

We see little evidence of a concerted effort to meet these needs. Indeed, the reverse is true. The current bill could be construed as an exercise in delusion, focusing on the sensational rather than the underlying roots of the problem, focusing on the few notorious cases rather than the general plight of most young offenders, focusing on the availability of punishment rather than programs, and playing on emotions rather than providing sound, rational programs to prevent delinquency and promote rehabilitation.

This legislation provides a band-aid where a complete objective diagnosis and extensive treatment is required, along with a massive prevention program. The youthful offenders, those who work with them and other citizens of Canada have real needs and concerns. This legislation does not meet the real need, it subtly implies that punishment is the answer.

This legislation will do more to promote criminality through longer sentences, easier access to prisons and penitentiaries and promote public misconception than it will to overcome the problem.

Senator Di Nino, the government sponsor of the bill, said yesterday that he had a sense of frustration and discomfort in dealing with this bill. Senator Di Nino, I share your frustration and discomfort. I can only add my own contempt and disgust. Perhaps you can join me in sending this thing which purports to be a bill back to the place it came from.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I must inform honourable senators that, if Senator Di Nino speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, I wish to make a couple of brief comments before I recommend that this bill be sent to committee.

It is important, at least for the record, to state that Senator Hastings is being extremely selective when he quotes me. I think he knows that my discomfort and frustration had nothing to do with the bill, but with the fact that society as a whole should be condemned for having to consider such a bill as this. The job of looking after our young people will not be accomplished by legislation.

I will correct for the record what Senator Hastings said I said yesterday. He quoted me as having said that legislation will never have any impact on this particular problem. That is not what I said. I think there is a finite difference with regard to my comment that legislation will never solve the problem. It is you and I, Senator Hastings, who will solve the problem.

Senator Hasting: Then let's throw the bill away.

Senator Di Nino: We cannot throw it away. But I will tell you what we can do, senator. We can work together in committee to see what all of the different people involved in the matter of young offenders have to say about the bill, including those who support it. The Canadian Bar Association supports it, as does the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. As a matter of fact, the Canadian Council on Children and Youth supports it.

The proposals before us, honourable senators, are really much more humane and less punitive than the existing law. That is the position this government is taking. It is the way I read the legislation.

Let me also say very briefly that Senator Hastings and I have similar objectives. I believe that as we progress through the committee and other stages of this bill those objectives will become much more apparent. I invite Senator Hastings to participate in the process established by this chamber, which is to deal with the matter in committee. We can then continue our dialogue in this chamber. During the committee process we will deal not only with the issues that the honourable senator has raised, but with the issues that will be raised by others.

Senator Hastings: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Did I understand him to say that he is inviting us to participate in the committee, and that, on behalf of the government, he is saying that he is prepared to accept amendments?

Senator Di Nino: I made a very honest interjection by suggesting that since you have so many opinions, most of which differ from mine, at least in terms of the interpretation of the bill, we can discuss those in the committee process.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Di Nino, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 136(8), I must interrupt the proceedings at this time so that we may proceed with Royal Assent.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1630)

On the Order.

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the third reading of Bill C-15, An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports,

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that clause 4 of the Bill be deleted and replaced by the following:

4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date the Official Languages Act applies to the airport authority, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if

(a) the authority were a federal institution; and

(b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, the debate on Bill C-15, and particularly on clause 4 of that bill, has heated up a lot in the last few days.

You know my interest and my determination when it comes to protecting minority language rights of which we worked so hard to have recognized. Therefore, it is only normal that I enter this debate. I will admit, however, that my decision has not been very easy. I am not talking about how I feel (that was very easy), because my convictions have not changed. What is more difficult is to have to distance myself from the government's position on this bill.

Dear colleagues, I totally support the main objectives of the airport transfer policy, namely to enable airports to better serve the interests of the local community, to increase opportunities for regional economic development, and to allow for the more economical and commercial operation of the national airport system.

The main purpose of Bill C-15 is protect the established rights of the public to be served in both official languages, as well as the established rights of the employees of those airports.

I am satisfied that the rights to services in both official languages are maintained in this bill to the same extent that they are now. The only difference is that the role of the Minister of Transport in this matter is delegated to the local airport authority on the transfer date. Even though we might wish, that it will be otherwise. I believe that we should accept it for practical reasons, while taking comfort in the knowledge that the role of the Commissioner Official Languages is in no way diminished on this point. Indeed, local airport authorities will still have to satisfy the Official Languages Act requirements and Treasury Board draft regulations requirements on services to the public in both official languages in federal airports, sold or rented. Whether federal airports have been sold or rented to local airport authorities, the licensees obligations will be exactly the same with regard to services to the public in both official languages, with exactly the same requirements under the 1988 Official Languages Act and the proposed Treasury Board regulations on services to the public.

On that particular point, I did not agree with what senator Frith said on December the 3rd. So, I asked for a clarification and I did get it. I was assured, as I just said, that nothing will be changed on licensees duties and obligations with regard to services to the public in both official languages.

This brings me, honourable senators, on parts 5, 6 and 7 of the Official Languages Act, which were seperated from bill C-15. To make things simpler, let us say from the start that I am less concerned about the setting aside of Part 7. Official languages promotion is mainly, although not exclusively, the responsibility of the Department of the Secretary of State.

I went over the discussions and arguments on clause 4 of Bill C-15 and did not notice any kind of enthusiasm in the defence of individual rights, much less of vested individual rights.

There was a lot of talk about the competitiveness of airports and rights to services in both official languages, and about comparisons between Air Canada, Petro-Canada, and so on and so forth.

In my opinion, individual rights were not emphasized enough.

At this time, there are only three designated areas, namely New Brunswick, which is the only bilingual province, Metropolitan Montreal and the National Capital Region. Neither Edmonton, Calgary nor St. John's are designated. Honourable senators, any individual has a right to work in French or English and both official language communities are entitled to their fair share of jobs.

Honourable senators, Bill C-15 does not protect this right, this vested right that was secured thanks to lengthy representations and strenuous efforts by many and thanks also to traditions established over the years.

In all honesty, I cannot vote for a bill that, for all intents and purposes, withdraws this protection. I hope I can count on the support of all senators and more particularly on the support of my colleagues from New Brunswick who lived through that painful process of having the rights of the French-speaking minority in New Brunswick recognized.

I cannot support a bill that will mean this for an Acadian: your right to work in French at the Moncton airport was protected by the federal government but now, with our new policy and Bill C-15, that protection will be left in the hands of local airport authorities. They may act in good faith, but they sometimes lack the necessary sensitivity for the protection of this right. There have been just too many cases in the past where those rights were infringed upon.

In New Brunswick particularly, the Official Opposition in the Provincial Legislature, whose views are well known, advocates the abolition of bilingualism on the hand and the bilingualization of francophone institutions on the other hand. Honourable senators, you will certainly agree that it is not very reassuring in terms of potential support for the acquired individual rights of people now working in airports such as the ones in Moncton, Fredericton and St. John, or those who will be working there in the future.

I would add that these people and their leader, who supported the candidates for the Official Opposition in the recent New Brunswick election, do not want to see the Acadian flag fly over the Provincial Legislature any more. So, my reluctance to leave that kind of responsibility to a local airport authority in Moncton, St. John or Fredericton (in my province in general) is based on the reality that is perpetuated by the Official Opposition in New Brunswick. We simply cannot take the risk of asking a local authority to protect those acquired rights.

I keep in mind the positive comments of the Commissioner for Official Languages and many others. I will not repeat them because there's not enough time.

Furthermore, I take notice of the argument according to which the federal government being the owner of 57 per cent of the shares of Air Canada had to ensure the application of all of the Official Languages Act when it privatized that airline.

Honourable senators, what will happen when the federal government ceases to be the majority shareholder in Air Canada? Will they stop implementing the Official Languages Act in the following weeks because, like some argue and the government agrees, Air Canada being a private company, it doesn't have to abide by that Act anymore? I am very concerned!

They also say that Air Canada is a national entity because it operates coast to coast and has offices in most of the major cities in Canada, adding, all the while, that airports are multiple local entities. Honourable senators, that doesn't make sense. An airport can only exist in conjunction with others. It is not an isolated entity. It is part of a network. The airport network is as much a national entity as is Air Canada. Air Canada passengers who get on a flight in Moncton are not going to stay in Moncton. They are going to land in another airport.

We have also been told to remember that the Official Languages Act applies only and solely to federal institutions which the local airport administrations do not belong to. Honourable senators, airports are now federal institutions that were established with public funds and that will surely be extended and modernized or updated with public funds. Those local airport administrations do not exist for the moment. It is the federal government which is now indirectly creating them providing them with 60 year leases.

Senator Grimard said on December 4, and I quote:

> Imposing two working languages in airports like Montreal and not on direct competitors in regions that are not designated bilingual would I think be an economic injustice . . .

I must admit that I do not understand that argument. Who are Montreal's direct competitors? If someone wants to go to Montreal, he is not going to fly to Toronto. If cargo is bound for Montreal, you are not going to send it to Quebec City. How can the language of work adversely affect the competitiveness of the Montreal Airport? If you are only talking about the cost of translating operating manuals, press releases, memos between employees and with management, this in my opinion is not reason enough to violate the vested civil rights of English-speaking Montrealers to work in their native tongue. Similarly, cost cannot justify the refusal to let Acadians from New Brunswick use their own language, whether it be in Moncton, Fredericton or elsewhere.

Finally, honourable senators, how can we say that the federal government cannot force—this is what the spokesperson for the government said in this House—a local private enterprise to abide by the Official Languages Act, when, actually, bill C-15 does it, but only for part of the Act. But it still imposes a portion of the costs linked to bilingual services in those three areas.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, what I am asking for already exists. I am not asking to extend what we already have. However, if the government reviews the designated areas, we will want to discuss the extension of the designated bilingual areas. But that is not what we are talking about today. I just want to ensure that the rights and privileges stipulated in the Official Languages Act, as they apply to the actual airport program, will also apply to the proposed airport program, and specifically to the designated areas in New Brunswick, Greater Montreal and the National Capital.

In conclusion, I have to support the motion presented by senator Frith.

I thank you for the indulgence you have shown me.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Buchanan P.C., for the second reading of Bill C-3, respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have read carefully what Senator Doody said on second reading of this bill. I find little on which to disagree with him on insofar as what he said. However, I do have some comments on what he did not say.

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Doody: There is a lot I did not say.

Senator Molgat: I also have a question on an item that he did cover. He discussed with us the exclusions from the bill such as the Indian Act, the National Parks Act, the Territorial Lands Act, the Crown Corporations Act. Then he talked about all the inclusions: cultural centres, roads, employment centres, lighthouses, nursing stations and so on. One item he did not cover relates, I think, to the greatest landowner in Canada, the Department of National Defence and exactly where they stand. I looked in the bill and there is a reference to the Department of National Defence. I must confess I am not absolutely clear on how far it goes. I would hope that he will give us a response to that matter when we come to the conclusion of second reading. If he cannot do that, perhaps once we get into committee we can go further.

With regard to the bill in general, the approach of having one system to dispose of government property certainly appears on the surface to make great sense. I realize that at second reading we are dealing with the principle of the bill, but I do not know how I can deal with the principle without referring to an essential element in the bill. So I would like to refer honourable senators to clause 16 (1) and 16 (2) which outline what the bill will provide. Under 16 (2) it says:

> The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, make regulations

Then they list a great string of regulations from (a) to (k). These are very inclusive regulations covering everything that one might consider having to do with real property, the sale, the lease or other disposition, the purchase, the giving of licences, the surrender of leases, transfers to the provinces, transfers from the provinces, the acceptance and release of securities by way of mortgage or otherwise, authorizing provision of utilities and other services, imposition of fees, charges and rates, imposition of fees for the provision of copies of maps, plans, field notes, documents and papers and on and on—a very inclusive set of regulations.

However, clause 16 (1) says:

> Notwithstanding any regulations made under subsection (2), the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, in accordance with such terms and subject to such conditions and restrictions as the Governor in Council considers advisable,

So notwithstanding anything that it says in (2) the Governor in Council can do all these things by their own decision, completely contrary to the regulations. I suppose that could be acceptable under certain conditions. However, if one goes to the beginning of the bill, one then finds all those things that can be done by regulation and by the Treasury Board and the Governor in Council. In the delegation of powers in clause (3) it states:

• (1700)

> Any Minister may authorize in writing an officer of the Minister's department or of any other department, or any head of mission, to exercise on behalf of that Minister any power given by or under this Act to that Minister, including the power to sign an instrument.

Therefore, we find that not only the Governor in Council and the Treasury Board can make all these decisions by regulation and go against the regulation, if they so decide, but can also give that power to—and please note—"an officer of the Minister's department or of any other department."

In the French text it simply states "fonctionnaire de son ministère". "Fonctionnaire" is a very broad term.

[Translation]

In French, we would certainly say that a clerk is an officer. So, we could have a system where almost anyone in a department would have the right to do everything which is listed here.

[English]

Again, there might be sense in doing that. I am not opposed to decentralization of decisions. However, there must be very clear conditions. If we are to pass this bill, we must have a guarantee that all of those things that are done, such as disposition of property, purchase of property or leases and all the rest of it, are open to the public.

We are dealing here with public property. If we are dealing with public property, we have the right and the need to guarantee that the public interest is protected. The only way I can see that we can do that is to have disclosure. In this bill, I do not see disclosure of any of these things. We are giving this immense power; we are distributing it all over the place, but we have no way of knowing if that power will be used in the proper way.

We have to look at this situation and ask, what mechanisms can we put in place? In the bill there is a provision that someone who feels that they have been hard done by must come forward within six months or possibly a year. We should then have included in this bill that there must be full disclosure of any actions taken under this bill, under these immense powers, and under this distribution of power through the civil service, and that there must be full disclosure. If we do not have that, we are leaving ourselves open to all sorts of deals. What guarantee is there that the public interest is protected? What guarantee is there that these things are done by public tender or done by open sale? How do we know?

I submit, honourable senators, that that portion which was not in Senator Doody's presentation is essential in this bill. We must have a system of disclosure to the public, otherwise there is no guarantee of public protection.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Doody speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Molgat for his comments. They were well taken and much appreciated. It underlines my emphasis on the necessity of sending this particular bill to committee for examination. Many so-called housekeeping bills, or public administration correction bills, are very often those that have some land-mines that need looking at. I am not suggesting that is necessarily so in this case, but it certainly does merit consideration.

The national defence question is a legitimate one. I have no answer to that question. I could try to find one, but I think the answer can most properly be provided in the committee.

With regard to public disclosure, I certainly agree with that. I suspect that this legislation, like other similar legislation, is subject to the Financial Administration Act, the Public Tendering Act and that type of legislation. Once again, it is the type of thing that, for greater certainty, could be and should be examined and explored in committee. Therefore, I will recommend that it be sent to committee for study.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Molgat: I do not rise to object, only to make the point that I believe that this bill would normally be sent to the National Finance committee. While I will not object at this time, I would hope that we will not make a practice of sending bills, willy-nilly, to whatever committee is handy. Our rules do provide for reasonably clear disposition of bills to specific committees.

Senator Doody: On that point, honourable senators, I would not want my colleagues to think I am sending a bill to Willy Nilly! I have nothing against that honourable gentleman. I am sure that Mr. Milly is a lovely man.

The reference to another committee of the Senate was necessitated by the fact that I checked with the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. He informed me that he would not be in a position to look at the bill until well into January. That would interfere with the arrangements, however tentative they might be, between both sides with regard to the adjournment motion. Subsequently, I spoke to the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, Senator Nurgitz, who appeared to be fairly more accommodating in this regard and who undertook to give the bill consideration at a much earlier date.

Rather than being frivolous—or willy-nilly, I simply sent it to that committee, which was prepared to take it and examine it.

I might also add, given the opportunity, that some rule, procedure, precedent or system should be laid out in this place where preference is give to legislation as opposed to individual studies that committees might have before them, important though those studies might be. It would seem to me that if a piece of government legislation is passed in this place at second reading and sent to a committee, then that committee should try to make room for it ahead of any plans that it might have for the consideration of a study or a report.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRISONERS OF WAR COMPENSATION—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS—REVIEW OF ACT—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella:

That the Senate acknowledges the implied responsibility of the Government of Canada to compensate the Canadian Hong Kong prisoners of war for the suffering they endured in the Japanese prisoner of war camps; and prompts further action;

That the Government should consider the advisability of seizing the opportunity to provide benefits still denied to other prisoners of war, to which they should be entitled by right, by implementing the recommendations contained in the report of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, Its Almost Too Late, as a result of the evidence given by the following:

The National Prisoner of War (European Theatre) Association;

The Dieppe Prisoner of War Association;

The Merchant Navy P.O.W. Association; and

The Koncentration Lager Buchenwald Club.

The recommendations are as follows:

6. That the rates of compensation provided for under the Prisoners of War Compensation Act be reviewed with the objective of taking into account the severity of the prisoner of war regime forced on veterans by the award of additional compensation for each month deemed extremely severe, and that two additional categories be added at appropriate rates of compensation for those veterans who served 30 months or more as prisoners of war; and

7. That for the purposes of establishing entitlement to the Veterans Independence Program, receipt of prisoner-of-war compensation be treated as proof of undiagnosed medical disability.—(Honourable Sentor Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had intended to speak on Senator Marshall's motion regarding the Hong Kong situation, which is adjourned in my name, because Sunday, December 8, will mark the attack by the Japanese on Hong Kong. However, in view of the hour, and, in the circumstances, I will proceed with this on Monday.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 9, 1991, at 2 p.m.

AERONAUTICS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-5, to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next, December 11, 1991.

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-34, to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is one of four bills which were the subject of pre-study by the Banking Committee, the report of which was brought down last week and discussed in this chamber. For some reason the House decided to vote on this bill on Friday. The other three will be voted on at six o'clock today; so we can assume that they will come to us tomorrow.

The only time that the President of the Treasury Board, who is the sponsor of the four bills, can appear before the Banking Committee is tomorrow afternoon. I am sure that both sides would like to hear him. If honourable senators are agreed, I would ask leave that this bill be given second reading immediately so that it can go to committee tomorrow in time for Minister Loiselle's appearance.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government spoke to me about this matter of leave, and, as all senators are aware, we are reluctant at any time to give leave unless circumstances are such that nothing would otherwise move forward. We do not believe in this case that it is necessary. We get the same explanation regularly that ministers are not available at such and such a time, and I frankly do not think that the Senate should regulate its business solely on that premise. If the department wants this bill through, it must see to it that the people are there to respond. I am not prepared to give leave.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next, December 11, 1991.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

UKRAINE—RECOGNITION OF INDEPENDENCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. It concerns the recognition of Ukraine. If I understand correctly, the government position is that it is prepared to move very quickly in this regard, but there is a question about the nuclear arms that are presently in Ukraine.

I would like a report from the government on that matter. As well, what is the government doing about biological and chemical arms? These are a major concern, and they relate directly to the defence forces of Canada. Will those arms be included in any discussions? Will there be any safeguards regarding those arms prior to recognition of Ukraine?

• (1410)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have much to add to what I told the house the other day on this subject. We have moved to recognize Ukraine as an independent state and not as part of another state, the U.S.S.R., which it had been.

The next step would be to establish diplomatic relations with Ukraine. Before doing that, we want to engage the Ukrainian government in working out assurances on a number of matters, including secure control of nuclear weapons—as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has indicated—but also their adherence to and their compliance with existing arms control and security agreements and their adherence to and implementation of all CSCE—Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe—commitments embodied in the Helsinki Final Act, the Charter of Paris and other CSCE documents.

Therefore, the short answer to the honourable senator's question about biological weapons would be, yes, these are a factor in the discussions in which we will be engaging the Government of Ukraine.

STATUS OF SOVIET UNION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate relates to the same general area.

Last week I raised questions respecting the status of bilateral agreements and treaties with the U.S.S.R. as they apply to the new state of Ukraine. Yesterday, Secretary of State James Baker of the United States declared that the U.S.S.R. has ceased to exist. Does the Canadian government agree?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Obviously, major change is under way and new relationships are being developed. The fact that this is being done through a peaceful and constructive dialogue among the republics is very positive.

Senator Grafstein: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the Canadian Government's position is with respect to the self-proclaimed Commonwealth of Independent States which comprise the Ukraine, Russia and Byelorussia? Is Canada in the process of recognizing this new entity?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I answered that question when I spoke about the major changes that are under way and the process of peaceful and constructive dialogue that is apparently effecting those changes.

We have received reports from our ambassador in Moscow this morning. The government has been in touch with our senior official in Kiev who is meeting President Kravchuk tomorrow. As the honourable senator knows, European leaders are meeting today. My colleague Mrs. McDougall will be in Brussels next week for the NATO ministerial meeting which will include the new eastern European democracies, and they will be discussing those developments.

Clearly, dramatic change is under way and all the implications are not clear.

Senator Grafstein: The government, having recognized Ukraine, puts itself in a position where I assume it would give preference to the so-called new Commonwealth over the old U.S.S.R. Is that the trend that the government is taking?

Could the honourable senator give members of the Senate some clarity as to what direction the Government is going? Does it intend to stay with the old U.S.S.R., or does it intend to go with the competing force which is the new Commonwealth?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have just answered those questions to the extent that the government is in a position to answer them at this time. We have recognized the existence of Ukraine as an independent state, and we did so without delay because we wanted to waste no time in engaging Ukraine in a constructive dialogue on control and disposal of nuclear weapons, arms control, and especially human rights and the protection of minorities. There is no change in our relationship with the government of the U.S.S.R., and if and when there is such a change, we would announce it in the usual way.

Senator Grafstein: Is the Government of Canada then concerned about Mr. Gorbachev's statements yesterday and in recent days in relation to the instability and the civil strife arising out of the dismemberment of the old U.S.S.R. and, in particular, the state of independence created by Ukraine?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, obviously one listens with considerable respect to statements by Mr. Gorbachev, who has played such a key role in the recent history of the Soviet Union. Everything he says indicates that he intends to continue to make a positive contribution.

Senator Grafstein: I have one final question. If the Leader of the Government in the Senate cannot answer it today, I will understand. Does the government intend to move forward with recognition of Byelorussia and Russia itself as independent states?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend is perfectly right. I am not in a position to reply to that question today.

CANADA POST

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—PROCESSING OF MAIL IN HALIFAX

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to welcome the Leader of the Government back to the Senate. I was a little disappointed last Thursday when he was not here to answer questions, but I was told he was in that great province of Prince Edward Island. He took with him my good friend Senator Phillips. I wonder why, too, I was not offered a seat on the plane, since it was going all the way down from Ottawa. I suppose Mr. Crosbie had to go down there to do some fund-raising for the Tory party on the same plane, and there was no room for a poor old Grit like me in the back of the plane.

Honourable senators, I have another question concerning Prince Edward Island. As you know, you have taken Prince Edward Island off the map as far as land is concerned. We have sunk into the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Now you are taking away the Post Office as well. All the Prince Edward Island mail will now have to go to Halifax to be processed and stamped. No longer will tourists who come to Prince Edward Island be able to have their mail stamped in the beautiful province of Prince Edward Island, the garden of the gulf, the home of Anne of Green Gables. It will now all be postmarked Halifax.

It also will take another two days for Prince Edward Islanders to get their old age pension cheques, their family allowance cheques, their unemployment insurance cheques, and to get their orders from Eaton's catalogue and Sears'. All the tourists will now remark on their postage from Halifax, Nova Scotia. Prince Edward Island has lost its identity as a province.

Can you tell me what the Government of Canada intends to do to stop the Post Office from doing this?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, what this minister will do is obtain a report from Canada Post so that the facts of the matter will be on record in response to the question that the honourable senator has just asked, if it was a question.

With regard to my recent visit to Prince Edward Island, I may say that Senator Phillips had flown there on Wednesday. I went down on Thursday afternoon. I do not know how Mr. Crosbie got there, but he did not fly with me.

• (1420)

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, we now know that Mr. Crosbie is celebrating his 25th anniversary in politics—

Senator Adams: As a Liberal!

Senator Bonnell: —in many parties. When the times get tough, the tough get going.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

STATUS OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask another question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

There is another lady in this country, a nice lawyer, a nice looking lady, by the name of Maureen McTeer. Apparently, she is rather upset about the Royal Commission on Reproductive Technologies. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate bring us up-to-date on what is happening with this Royal Commission? Will Ms. McTeer win out, or will the chairman win out?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all I know about the matter is that a legal action has been launched against the government by four members of that Royal Commission. Frankly, I am unaware of the details.

In any case, the fact that it is now the subject of a legal action would cause me to hesitate before expressing an opinion on the matter.

Senator Frith: Only "hesitate", since it is not clear that the sub judice rule applies. It is a carefully selected word.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, in 1991, with all this genetic engineering taking place across the country, and all kinds of new viruses, new bacteria, and other new things being formed, which is perhaps even how AIDS got started, along with other new diseases, is the government considering any controls on the research taking place concerning all these new viruses and other things that have been turned loose in our society?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think it is clear that the type of question the honourable senator has just put would be part of the mandate of the Royal Commission that the government appointed some time ago. As the honourable senator indicates, these are extremely complex and difficult questions, not only in scientific terms but in philosophical terms as well.

We had hoped, and continue to hope, that that Royal Commission will give the government and all Canadians some guidance on the matter.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps I misunderstood the Leader of the Government. Is he telling me that the Royal Commission on Reproductive Technologies, for example, as it involves birth control, artificial insemination and other matters, has something to do with these new viruses being churned out by genetic engineering?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, without getting into excessive detail, I think the honourable senator is aware that one of the extremely difficult, complex questions that has arisen in recent years has to do with the use of foetuses, or parts thereof, in scientific research. I took it that that was the kind of question to which he was referring. I would have expected that it is one to which the Royal Commission would have addressed itself.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATIONAL UNITY—ROLE OF CANADIAN FORCES

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Honourable senators, I just read a report from Canadian Press in today's La Presse, which reads as follows:

> The role of the Canadian Armed Forces is not to fight to maintain the unity of this country but rather to act as a centre of stability, around which the elected representatives of this country will democratically decide on its future.

These words were attributed to the Chief of Staff, General John de Chastelain.

I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would like to know what the following means, and I quote:

> . . . a centre of stability, around which the elected representatives of this country will democratically decide on its future.

I certainly don't have total recall, but I think there is a hint of Franco in the terms used. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would like to analyse this text and explain the terms "the army as a centre of stability". They are disturbing, to say the least!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I will direct enquiries to the Chief of staff or to my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and I should be glad to report back to the Senate at the appropriate time.

METROPOLITAN GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-6, to amend the Act of incorporation of the Metropolitan General Insurance Company in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the Province of Quebec, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard moved that Bill C-18, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related Acts.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourables senators, I welcome this opportunity to lead off the debate on Bill C-18. The purpose of this bill is to amend the Income Tax Act and other related Acts, and the bill is, as I am sure you will appreciate, significant in both its physical size and its scope. I may add right away that Bill C-18 deserves to be supported by the members of this Chamber.

Honourable senators, as we all know, a fair and effective tax system plays an important role in generating the kind of stability that is indispensable to economic growth and prosperity. To be fair and effective is the very essence of the measures contained in the tax reform implemented by the government as part of its economic renewal plan since 1984.

The scope of this bill is a case in point. It includes income tax measures from the 1990 and 1991 budgets. It also includes several items announced through press releases at the time, as well as a large number of technical amendments which will help to enhance the equity of our Canadian tax system.

Honourable senators, we wish to express our appreciation for the very informative advice we were given on technical aspects of the bill during consultations with taxpayers and their advisers. In my opinion, these consultations have helped to refine these measures.

• (1430)

[English]

I would now like to take this opportunity to touch on some key points of this bill, starting with measures to help Canadians with disabilities.

[Translation]

In November 1990, the Minister of State responsible for the Status of Disabled Persons announced a wide-ranging government strategy to encourage equal opportunity for disabled Canadians. Some measures contained in Bill C-18 implement this strategy in the tax system.

First, the credit for disabled persons will increase in 1991 from $575 to a maximum of $700. This will bring federal aid for disabled Canadians to $35 million a year. Also, the present eligibility criteria for the credit will be codified so that they are applied fairly and consistently.

[English]

The medical tax credit will be broadened for the disabled. The list of medical expenses that are eligible for the credit is expanded, and nonworking Canadians with disabilities will receive a credit for part-time attendant care.

[Translation]

The cost of renovations to improve disabled persons' access to a building will from now on be immediately deductible by the owner, instead of deductible over several years. When an employer provides transportation or related benefits for a blind employee or one whose mobility is restricted or provides an assistant to help a disabled person do his or her job, these benefits will not be included in the employee's income.

Finally, someone who receives lump-sum disability benefits from the Canada or Quebec Pension Plan can have these benefits taxed in the years to which they apply instead of having the whole amount taxed in the year in which it is received.

As I said, these measures improve the ways that the tax system provides benefits to one of the neediest groups of Canadians, those with a physical or mental handicap.

Bill C-18 also contains measures included in the 1990 and 1991 budgets that express the government's commitment to strengthen culture and the arts in Canada and to extend their influence.

To encourage the development and dissemination of Canadian culture, the Income Tax Act provides a special tax plan for those who give cultural property to certain public institutions or agencies in Canada. Bill C-18 will strengthen the role of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board in assessing the value of this property and will thus simplify the rules for gifts of cultural property.

[English]

There are also new benefits in this bill that will benefit artists directly. Artists who are employed will now be allowed to claim a deduction for expenses incurred in the exercise of their artistic employment. A self-employed artist who donates certified works to designated institutions or public authorities will be allowed to claim a charitable tax credit without having the value of those works included in income.

Honourable senators, this bill also contains measures that will benefit small business.

[Translation]

No partner in our economy plays a more essential and critical role in generating growth as well as creating new jobs than the small business. Bill C-18 contains two provisions that reflect the government's commitment to promoting investment in small businesses.

One of these provisions, initially announced in the 1991 Budget, is designed to improve the tax provisions relating to shares in small businesses. For example, a person who makes a capital gain on the sale of shares from an eligible small business corporation is entitled to an increased capital gain exemption of $500,000. However, when a successful private corporation wants to expand and registers its shares on a stock market listed in Canada, it will no longer be considered as an eligible small business corporation. This means that this increased exemption will not be available to the initial shareholders, even as regards gains accumulated while the corporation was eligible. To penalize successful businesses in such a way is counterproductive.

In order to allow a corporation to sell shares to the public without giving up its shareholders' increased exemption, Bill C-18 will provide for the possibility to claim all or part of the amount of the not yet realized capital gain from the disposition of shares without actually having to dispose of them. This reflects the federal government's recognition of the major economic role of small businesses.

[English]

Bill C-18 also fulfills another government commitment to improving tax equity and control.

[Senator Simard.]

[Translation]

Honourable senators, a basic element of the governement's tax policy is the fair taxation of all income earned in Canada. The 1990 budget included initiatives to ensure that non-residents who deal in Canadian real estate or who create mutual funds to invest in Canadian real estate are taxed appropriately. The budget also proposed that the tax on financial institutions, introduced as part of tax reform, will be extended to life insurance companies. All of these measures have been incorporated in Bill C-18.

Another 1990 budget measure forming part of Bill C-18 is a refinement of the rules relating to registered educatin savings plans. Changes will limit the total amount that may be contributed in respect of each beneficiary and will allow the payment of benefits to a beneficiary under a new plan only if he or she is a full-time student.

In fact, the maximum will now be $1,500 per year per beneficiary.

Another 1990 budget measure concerns pension funds. For many Canadians, retirement planning centres on a pension fund which invests their own, and their employers' contributioins, to provide future income. Before 1990, such funds were subject to a special tax if more than 10 per cent of their assets consisted of foreign property. Recognizing the advantages of investment diversification, this bill includes the 1990 budget proposal to allow pension funds to invest up to 20 per cent of their assets in foreign property by 1994.

Finally, Bill C-18 includes a number of provisions announced separately. Some of these are essentially technical in nature, while others represent significant tax initiatives.

Perhaps I may say at this point that I have asked the department to inform the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, to which this bill will probably be referred, of the total cost to the government for each of these measures and also the total cost to the taxpayer. I know by experience, and others with me, that technical amendments often involve substantial amounts for the taxpayer and the government. So I wanted to quantify these figures. It is a catch-all term which may have a very significant impact on some taxpayers. In any case, the committee will be able to evaluate the total fiscal impact of each of these measures.

● (1440)

For example, and I conclude with this, honourable senators, the bill introduces new rules for national labour-sponsored venture capital corporations. These rules will encourage investments in small and developing companies. Other important amendments revise the tax benefits regime for northerners and residents of remote regions of Canada, simplify the calculation of tax on investment income from life insurance companies and implement rules for calculating certain expenses and credits.

In summary, honourable senators, Bill C-18 enacts some important tax measures already announced by the government and improves many technical aspects of the tax system. Since this bill clearly expresses the government's concerns for the fairness and efficiency of the system, it deserves the support of this House.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of my colleagues, I thank Senator Simard for his explanation of Bill C-18. I ask hon. senators to look at the bill in their desks. Some may say that this bill contains only technical changes, but as Senator Simard said at the end of his speech, technical changes occasionally involve changes that are not necessarily minor; a small technical change here and there and after a few amendments, the financial impact can be quite significant.

[English]

As Senator Dirksen is famous for having said in another context, "A billion here and a billion there and first thing you know you are talking real money".

This bill is the size of a telephone book of a respectably sized city. Perth is certainly respectable, but it is not yet a city. The telephone directory for Perth occupies many less pages than this bill, which has 258 sections and 397 pages.

I say that, honourable senators, to underline what I think is a reasonable request of the committee from senators on both sides to make a careful examination of the bill because often one finds important changes and often one finds mistakes lurking in bills of this kind. In my respectful submission, one of the Senate's principal functions is to pay particular attention to bills of this kind, which are so technical and involve so many sections.

As Senator Simard has said, the bill is an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada-Nova Scotia Off-Shore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related acts.

As I say, an act here and an act there and first thing you know you are talking about some very wide-ranging amendments.

Senator Simard explained to us that the bill would provide, under the heading of cultural properties, special tax treatment for persons who donate cultural property to certain Canadian institutions or public authorities. The role of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board will be expanded to allow it to assess the value of such property, thus streamlining the rules governing cultural donations.

On the subject of pension funds, this legislation would allow pension funds to invest up to 20 per cent of their assets in foreign property by 1994. Anyone who read the newspapers this morning will have noticed a small piece on this subject referring to this act and pointing out that presently such funds are subject to a foreign investment limit of 10 per cent. The change proposed in Bill C-18 recognizes the advantages of investment diversification and is a matter of importance to those who wish to develop helpful portfolios in their pension funds and RRSPs.

I would like to add a few caveats for the committee, honourable senators. I trust the committee will do a careful study—I assume Senator Simard intends to refer it to committee. I do not want my caveats to be taken as exhaustive, because I have not had the opportunity to study the bill in that kind of detail. Frankly, even had I had the opportunity, I do not think I would have done so because I would be counting on the committee to do its work.

First, let me make one caveat about the Registered Education Saving Plan. The changes introduced by the bill will limit the total amount that may be contributed in respect of each beneficiary and will allow the payment of benefits to a beneficiary under a new plan only if he or she is a full-time student. The objective is to improve controls over the plan. But, in a practical sense, I want the committee to inquire whether these amendments will work to defeat the purpose of such a plan, which is to ensure that the beneficiary will have the financial ability to pursue higher education. These amendments serve to classify those who should receive such benefits—only full time students, as I said—and also serve to limit the amount that can be contributed to such a plan, thus limiting those who will be financially able to pursue higher education. That is the first example of a dimension at which I hope the committee will look.

Senator Simard also told us that, with regard to Canadians with disabilities, the bill implements the government's strategy to promote equal opportunities for Canadians with disabilities. The disability tax credit will be increased for 1991 from $575 to $700, increasing federal assistance to disabled Canadians by $35 million a year. Also, the existing criteria for eligibility for the credit will be codified to ensure fair and uniform application. An individual receiving Canada or Quebec Pension Plan disability benefits in a lump sum will effectively be able to have those benefits taxed in the years in which they relate rather than have the entire amount taxed in the year it is received. That is the good news.

Ms. Beth Phinney, MP, however, gave us some bad news, which I would ask the committee to look at. She pointed out that, although the bill did give disabled people more money, the government was giving it through the front door, but stealing it out of the back door. In Bill C-32, which is now in the other place, the government is attempting to remove more than $2 billion from the Canada Assistance Plan payments, which in turn will cut home care, health care, rehabilitation programs, programs for independent living, and employment services for disabled people. Government cuts to established program financing in the 1991 budget, the Canada Jobs Strategy Fund—and we will be seeing some of that in legislation that I expect we might be getting even before Christmas—social housing and in cash transfers for medicare virtually negate the effect of the additional funds that will result from this bill, as these are the programs disabled persons rely on for help. The measures contained in this bill come nowhere close to compensating disabled Canadians for cutbacks in other legislation.

I take it, Senator Simard, that Bill C-18 will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I ask Senator Poitras and his colleagues, when they receive this bill, not only to take into account and to study these points I am raising, but to look at companion legislation, wait for some of these other bills, and study them together to see if they do have the effect raised by Ms. Phinney.

With respect to the tax treatment of small business shareholders, an individual who realizes a capital gain on the disposition of shares of a qualifying small business corporation will be eligible for an enhanced capital gains exemption of $500,000. However, this provision ignores the true "small businessman", the single proprietor and the small partnership that is not registered as a small business corporation. I ask the committee to look at that also.

This bill also rivises the system of tax benefits for residents of Canada's northern and isolated regions. Bill C-18 changes the boundary dividing those who will receive the tax benefits and those who will not. As a result—and I wish to know whether or not this is true—some people who have previously received the tax benefits will no longer receive it by reason of this boundary change. Perhaps the committee will pursue that, to see whether it results in any unfair effects.

There is certainly good news for artists in this bill. Employed artists will be able to claim a deduction for expenses incurred in the exercise of their artistic employment. I underline the word "employed" artists. As well, a self-employed artist—I suppose they are the ones most targeted for help—who donates certified works to designated institutions or public authorities will be entitled to claim a charitable tax credit without having the value of those works included in the calculation of taxable income.

Honourable senators, there are other amendments proposed by the legislation to existing statutes that I wish to refer to as well. Many of them are aimed at administrative fairness. For instance, the minister will be able to adjust the amount of tax payable and refund any overpayment in certain circumstances. There are also many technical amendments, such as one to provide relief for taxpayers in unanticipated situations where the existing law would operate inappropriately.

I have two concluding points that will put the bill in a slightly larger dimension. John Manley, the member for Ottawa South and a tax lawyer, used the opportunity presented by this bill to discuss tax reform in general. He made the point, and I think a point that deserves attention, that a fair system of taxation centres on principles of equality and should be based on a person's ability to pay. Where they have more, they should pay more; where they have less ability to pay, they should pay less. Under the present government's program, we find that individuals and families at the lowest end of the income scale are paying less in tax; but individuals and families in the highest income categories are also paying relatively less as a percentage of their income. That leaves you and me, I suspect. I am not sure whether all of you are in the same category as I am, namely, the middle class.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Fairbairn: You are an author.

Senator Frith: I am expecting help from the provisions dealing with artists.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: All authors should be so lucky.

Senator Frith: In order to understand that comment, you have to realize what Senator Fairbairn said. When I said "I am a member of the middle class," she said "You are an author." That was the point of my comment about the provisions in here for an artist.

I think the record should show louder laughter than I actually heard. Would you like to laugh a little louder at that description? What is that, Senator Doyle?

Senator Doyle: I wanted you to repeat the joke so that I could laugh.

Senator Frith: It was not a joke to provoke laughter. In fact, it was not that kind of laughter I was afraid of. I was thinking it would be more likely to provoke derisive laughter. Thank you for your kindness in not doing so.

At the top end of the scale, individuals and families in the highest income categories are also paying relatively less as a percentage of their incomes. The middle classes are bearing the burden of the tax system. Mr. Manley argued that the conservative reforms to the tax system since 1984 are breaking the spirit of the average Canadian, and considered some of the provisions in this legislation as examples to support his thesis.

Finally, there was a specific concern expressed in the other place by Sergio Marchi, the member for York West, about clause 194. This provision aims to put Canadian shippers on a more equal footing with international competition. It proposes to do this by allowing shippers with foreign incorporation not to pay taxes on profits generated from exclusively international operations. The concern is that this provision will encourage the employment of foreign shipworkers while forcing thousands of Canadian shipworkers out of work.

Honourable senators, again I thank Senator Simard for his explanation of this bill. I have drawn attention to some areas that I think merit study by the committee. I am sure there are others, and I do invite and encourage the committee to make a careful study of this legislation, both from the point of view of some of these caveats or questions and also from a technical perspective. I trust the committee will do its usual job, with the advice of technical experts, of ensuring that, apart from the possible dimensions of unfairness, there are not any errors in this lengthy and complex bill. I believe, traditionally, that the Canadian public and the Canadian taxpayer counts on the Senate and the committee now headed by Senator Poitras to do exactly that.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Translation]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Simard, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) BILL

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the third reading of Bill C-15, An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employee's pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports.

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that clause 4 of the Bill be deleted and replaced by the following:

4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date the Official Languages Act applies to the airport authority, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if

(a) the authority were a federal institution; and

(b) the airport were an office or facility of that stitution other than its head or central office.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I shall be brief. I have no prepared speech. I do not need one.

I have been working in the field covered by the Official Languages Act practically ever since I was born. A New-Brunswicker by birth, I have had the pleasure and the good fortune of growing up in a bilingual environment. Our neighbours spoke English, and we spoke French. So, they learned French from us as we learned English from them. We remained either French-Canadians or English-Canadians, but we became bilingual.

I have had the privilege of working with the group that considered the very first official languages bill in 1969. I had the privilege and the pleasure of presenting New Brunswick's amendments to be enshrined in the Constitution in the early 1980's, when I sat on the committee. I take a daily interest in everything that relates to the Official Languages Act.

I realize with sadness that the spirit and the letter of that act are not always followed. How often do we, in the Senate, receive official documents that are not available in French, and generally, the guilty party is on the other side.

I do not have a text to read from today. I will talk from experience and try to remember what was said in committee by some people.

Obviously, I rise to support the amendment proposed by Senator Frith, which stems from the very sensible comments made by our auditors, if I may use that word, with regards to the Official Languages Act, the Official Languages Commissioners. Mr. d'Iberville Fortier and the present commissioner, Dr. Goldbloom, both thought important to state that other provisions of the Official Languages Act should also be included in this bill in order to ensure the most respect possible for both languages as well as to preserve acquired rights.

This bill requires that the public be served in the language of its choice. The people who drafted this bill decided not to include any provisions regarding the language of work and the equal distribution of available jobs between both linguistic groups.

As Senator Simard told us so eloquently in his speech last Thursday, for which I want to congratulate him, what this means is that, for all intents and purposes, notwithstanding those two other factors in particular, francophones at Moncton Airport in New Brunswick, for example, could very well find themselves deprived of a large part of their acquired language rights if that airport were privatized. Those rights would thrown out the window.

People will say, yes, but as the local authority at Dorval Airport tells us, we have nothing to learn from anybody in Canada with respect to the Official Languages Act. We have always been upright in this. Granted, to a certain point. The fact remains that the Official Languages Commissioner has received numerous complaints not only from the public, but also from employees at the Dorval and Mirabel airports. Without guarantees, without the protection afforded by the law, rights do not exist any more.

That is why I think that Senator Frith's amendment, which is in line with comments made by the last two official languages commissioners—and I would guess that the previous ones would have agreed, had they been consulted—should be passed. I support the bill and urge all the honourable senators to support it too.

At present, there is a great deal of concern about the future of our country. Not just because of the constitution debate, not just because of the economy. The Canadian people are also concerned about the opening up of the North-South borders. We are wondering what is happening to Canada as an entity. We are wondering what will become of our good neighbour relations with the US.

We have every right to wonder—and I am sorry to be criticized for it but I will say this anyway—if we, the francophone minority outside Quebec, to which I belong, will still have the support of our fellow Canadians from Quebec.

In the past, the Quebec people have been generous with Canada's minorities. I worked as a journalist at the now defunct New Brunswick newspaper L'ÉVANGÉLINE among other places. It has been replaced by another French-language daily newspaper. Heaven knows that, had it not been for the generous donations of our fellow countrymen and women from Quebec, L'ÉVANGÉLINE would have ceased to exist back in the 1930s.

The francophone minorities in the country need the continued support of their friends in Quebec.

I am not criticizing any one for not supporting us. But in Quebec the focus on internal problems is such that the Canadian entity tends to be forgotten. That is why I call upon the French-Canadian community both in Quebec and outside, and even upon my fellow citizens who are English-speaking.

● (1510)

Most, if not all, of us here have already come out for a united Canada and an Official Languages Act. Therefore, honourable senators, I ask you to support Senator Frith's amendment, which takes nothing from anybody but which protects acquired rights and which will take nothing from anybody in the future.

We talk about the profitability of companies that will be privatized. We ask about the margin between profit and loss if the Official Languages Act is implemented in a privatized company. We already know that many private businesses have seen fit to hire French speaking employees. Some Quebec companies also have hired employees who can work in English, in order to get markets elsewhere in Canada and abroad. The same thing is being done in English Canada. Many private companies have programs to promote their French-speaking personnel.

I know for a fact, and Senator Simard can confirm this, that in our city of Edmundston, the Fraser company, which is a subsidiary of Noranda, although I do not know what the situation is right now and who controls Fraser, because there has been so much vertical integration.

In any event, 20 years ago, the Fraser company had room for French Canadians. Yes, there was room for them to chop down trees, to drive the teams of horses, to use the chainsaws, to drive the trucks and to make sure that the timber was going through the grinders and the plant, and that the pulp was taken to Madawaska to make paper for Sears catalogues in the United States, for Time magazine, etc.

One day, a president of the Fraser company, who was of American origin, came and did something that none of his predecessors had done before him. He went and paid his respects to the Roman Catholic bishop. He did the same thing with the ministers of other denominations, the priests, the mayor. He signed the golden book. And then, he asked about how the company operated. He said, How do you fit into Edmunston-Madawaska society? I want to know how you operate.

He realized that there was not a single French Canadian in senior management. None. Not one. Then he said, "That will change. We will start by giving French Canadians a chance. They are not dumber than anyone else. We will take them at the beginning. We will give them training courses. We will give them a chance to prove themselves." When a French Canadian got an engineering or forestry diploma in Fredericton, he often had to go elsewhere to practise his profession. If he worked for a company like Fraser, he was blocked at a certain level. All that has changed. Now a French Canadian—right, Senator Simard?—is the manager of the Fraser plant in Madawaska, Maine, other side of the St. John River, which is our border.

Do not tell me that implementing some parts of the Official Languages Act will make the difference between profit and loss for companies that are to be sold or privatized. I do not believe that. Many private-sector companies in Quebec and Canada have understood the opposite: that it is good to have representatives of both official-language groups at all levels.

[Senator Corbin.]

Canada being what it is, new Canadians who have come to Canada with an ability to speak other languages are also encouraged to seek management positions. They have their place too.

Today, we would say that the federal government is turning back the clock. On the grounds of the sacred criterion of profitability, it would remove these companies to be privatized from the spirit, if not the letter, of the Official Languages Act.

I am sure that I could find at least 50 per cent of English Canadians who would support Senator Frith's amendment.

We need only look at the most recent booklet published by the Official Language Commissioner's Office, Facts and Figures, on the results of a survey conducted by the CBC, the Globe and Mail and Canadian Facts in April 1991.

> Eighty-four per cent of Canadians said that French and English should be treated equally in Canada.

Here is the February 1990 Angus Reid poll.

> Seventy-four percent of Canadians would like their children to be bilingual.

Environics, February 1990.

> Seventy-two percent of Canadiens approve of the fact that Canada has two official languages.

Environics, May 1990.

> More than two thirds of Canadians continue to be in favour of the provision of federal services in both official languages; 92 percent of Francophones and 61 percent of Anglophones.

CBC, Globe and Mail, Canadian Facts 1991.

> More than two thirds of the persons polled stated that two official languages . . .

These are Canadians speaking. These are not parliamentarians, members of Parliament or senators. This is what Canadians are saying:

> Two thirds stated that their preferred option was two official languages throughout Canada. Seventy-five percent of Francophones and 59 percent of Anglophones.

I could quote you other polls. I recommend this pamphlet. It contains all the polls done on the issue, polls which are extremely positive. Canadians show an extraordinary open-mindedness. They want to keep this country together. They know the kind of cement which will allow it to stay together.

I don't know why the government, in order to appease certain individuals, for the sake of sacred profitability, goes against public opinion.

Honourable senators, I support wholeheartedly support Senator Frith's amendment. I thank those who will do likewise. I ask all honourable senators to think seriously about the consequences of not including this amendment in the bill. I thank you for your attention, honourable senators.

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate, with the intention to make my speech on Wednesday, December the 11th.

Meanwhile, if another senator wishes to take part in this debate, please feel free to do so.

On motion of senator Robichaud, debate adjourned.

BILL AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare moved the third reading of Bill C-30, to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I should like to make some remarks on Bill C-30 tomorrow. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Government Motion:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government's position on this motion was given when Senator Murray gave notice of it last Thursday. We were satisfied with its intent and, if our message is accepted, we ask that the number of senators to sit on this joint committee be increased from five to seven. I believe that meets with the approval of the other side. Perhaps we could pass it as a result of that.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Where is the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): That motion is not yet up for consideration.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I called it as Government Business.

Senator Frith: It must be wonderful to be in the government. Under these new rules you snap your fingers and anything comes up. I won't say, "our day will come", because I hope that if it does we will change these rules.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The motion itself is on page vii of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

Senator Frith: I know, but it is way down the list. In the good old days we dealt with things as they came up. The government could not just, like reaching into a hat, pull something up and bring it on whenever it wanted to. However, that is what the government can do under these new rules. I take it that is what it is doing now. We are now dealing with that motion.

Senator Murray is supposed to speak to it. Lo and behold, here he is.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand, honourable senators, that when Orders of the Day were called Senator Lynch-Staunton asked for leave to have this motion—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, no, no.

The Hon. the Speaker: That is what I understood.

Senator Frith: It was a bill he had asked to bring forward, and we accommodated him by debating it.

Senator Murray: If I may, my friend the Deputy Leader of the Government was availing himself of the provisions of the new rules according to which the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader can indicate the item of government business to be considered at any given time.

Senator Frith: Like Houdini, or like a card trick, bring the Jack of Spades to the top of the deck with a snap of the fingers.

Senator Murray: As the honourable senator knows, this is the practice that is followed in virtually all parliamentary assemblies with which he and I are familiar.

Senator Frith: Thereby contributing to the irrelevance and death of Parliament.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I did ask for the indulgence of the house on December 4 when I gave notice of this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Murray, I am sorry to interrupt you, but, if you wish to go ahead, or unless this is an explanation, you must move the motion.

Senator Murray: Mr. Speaker, you are quite right. I would move the motion standing in my name.

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS CONFLICT OF INTEREST BILL

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-43

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Wednesday, December 4, 1991, moved:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons empowered to undertake a comprehensive review of the subject-matter of Bill C-43, An Act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of Members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission and to make consequential amendments to other Acts;

That the Committee may, in fulfilling its mandate, review the conflict of interest approaches used in other jurisdictions and any other matter related thereto;

That the said Special Joint Committee be composed of 14 Members of the House of Commons and 7 Members of the Senate;

That the Members to act for the Senate on the Special Joint Committee be the Honourable Senators Balfour, DeBané, Grimard, Kelleher, Oliver, Olson and Stanbury;

That the said Special Joint Committee have all powers of a Standing Committee of the House of Commons pursuant to Standing Orders 108(l), 120, 121, and Rule 91 of the Rules of the Senate;

That the Special Joint Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate;

That the Special Joint Committee be empowered to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of its powers, except the power to report to the Senate;

That the Special Joint Committee be permitted to request adequate support from the government for drafting its final report in the form of a bill or report Bill C-43 with or without amendments or in the form of principles that could be embodied in the legislation; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly and to request that the Commons concur in the amendment made by the Senate increasing the membership to 7 Members of the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, when I gave notice of this motion on December 4, I received the leave of the house to make a brief explanatory statement. That statement is to be found at page 676 of Debates of the Senate for that date.

This motion is put forward in response to the message which came from the House of Commons seeking the establishment of the joint committee of that place and this place to consider the subject matter of the conflict of interest legislation that the government tabled some time ago.

The message which I am proposing here is identical in all respects to the motion passed by the House of Commons, except in respect of the number of senators on the committee. The original motion passed by the House of Commons called for five senators; the message which I am proposing would provide for seven senators.

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was not here last week on the day that Senator Murray gave notice of his motion. However, it is quite clear from reading his statement in the Debates of the Senate that, indeed, some indulgence was granted the honourable senator. He gave an explanation of his notice of motion at the same time as giving the notice. I underline that just to say that it did, in effect, mean an abridgement of the notice in this case. However, the good side of that is that it gave me an opportunity to read the explanation. He has added little today to what he said then, because there was very little he could add to what he said on December 4, 1991, as reported at page 676 of the Debates of the Senate.

As I think we all know, this motion is the result of an all-party agreement as far as I know, on all sides in the other place and certainly on both sides here—and flows from consultations, as mentioned by Senator Murray, of last week, as confirmed by Senator Molgat. Therefore, we intend to support this motion.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while under normal circumstances this motion might be the subject of a great deal of debate, we agreed that we would move forward with it and not hold it up today. I understand that in order to get the committee established before the other place leaves at the end of this week we have to get it back into their hands.

Therefore, I do not intend to debate the matter any further, to that we can have that committee established now.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith, calling the attention of the Senate to the violence against women in Canadian society and the desirability of investigation of the subject by a Senate Committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I object to the word "five" appearing beside this order, because as I pointed out last week, the provision is that, unless previously ordered, any item under other business, inquiries and motions that has not been proceeded with during 15 sitting days shall be dropped from the Order Paper. Therefore, while I do not mind their putting the number there, I will object if, after it reaches "fifteen", it does not still appear on the Order Paper, since it is not covered by rule 28 (3) because it has been proceeded with. I spoke to it and I adjourned the debate.

Order stands.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRISONERS OF WAR COMPENSATION—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS—REVIEW OF ACT—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE—MOTION ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella:

That the Senate acknowledges the implied responsibility of the Government of Canada to compensate the Canadian Hong Kong prisoners of war for the suffering they endured in the Japanese prisoner of war camps; and prompts further action;

That the Government should consider the advisability of seizing the opportunity to provide benefits still denied to other prisoners of war, to which they should be entitled by right, by implementing the recommendations contained in the report of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, Its Almost Too Late, as a result of the evidence given by the following:

The National Prisoner of War (European Theatre) Association;

The Dieppe Prisoner of War Association;

The Merchant Navy P.O.W. Association; and

The Koncentration Lager Buchenwald Club.

The recommendations are as follows:

6. That the rates of compensation provided for under the Prisoners of War Compensation Act be reviewed with the objective of taking into account the severity of the prisoner of war regime forced on veterans by the award of additional compensation for each month deemed extremely severe, and that two additional categories be added at appropriate rates of compensation for those veterans who served 30 months or more as prisoners of war; and

7. That for the purposes of establishing entitlement to the Veterans Independence Program, receipt of prisoner-of-war compensation be treated as proof of undiagnosed medical disability.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On Thursday last when this order was called, I indicated that I would be speaking today, because yesterday was the actual anniversary. However, I was speaking at that time at the request of Senator Marshall, he and I having discussed the matter. I would propose now that Senator Marshall proceed, and then I will continue after him.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Molgat for yielding to me on this order. Although much has been said about the 50th anniversary of the Hong Kong battle, and some excellent articles appeared in the Vancouver Sun and in the Globe & Mail, as I was reminded by Senator Frith, I would like to mark on the record this date of historical importance.

Yesterday, Sunday, December 8, marked the 50th anniversary of Canada's participation in the defence of Hong Kong against the Japanese. Of the 1,973 Canadian soldiers of the Royal Rifles of Canada and the Winnipeg Grenadiers, only 550 still survive. After a fierce battle marked actions resulting in by 53 decorations for gallantry, including the Victoria Cross—a decoration which is now under threat by our government—the Canadian troops were forced to surrender and endured nearly four years of cruel captivity.

As we reflect back a half-century, it is clear that our then as-yet-untrained soldiers should not have been committed to battle. Winston Churchill said that Hong Kong was indefensible, but Canada was deliberately kept uninformed of this, and Churchill turned out to be right. The two proud regiments were the least trained of any of the Canadian battalions in battle. Yet, despite the odds, the comparatively inexperienced Canadian soldiers pitted themselves with honour against a much more experienced Japanese force, even though we were outnumbered and lacking in air support.

That fierce 18-day combat was really only the beginning of a long ordeal. Many of our Canadian soldiers were bayonetted or shot by Japanese troops to whom they tried to surrender. Hospitals were ransacked, patients were killed, and nurses raped. This would become a familiar pattern as the Japanese conquest extended across southeast Asia.

The Royal Rifles of Canada and the Winnipeg Grenadiers were Canada's first infantry in action in the Second World War, but their greatest ordeal was nearly four years of imprisonment in which they were starved, beaten and wracked by tropical diseases. They worked as slave labour in Hong Kong. Nearly 300 died in combat; nearly 500 were wounded; and 266 died as prisoners of war.

The death toll in the aftermath of peace was worse still. The effects of captivity shortened their lives. Many died prematurely back in Canada. Now only a quarter of those who set out for Hong Kong still survive.

A little aside on the two famous regiments: Until they were disbanded in the 1960s, the Grenadiers and the Rifles were entitled to carry on their regimental colours the unique battle honour, "Hong Kong, Southeast Asia 1941", along with their honours from World War I. That symbolizes their courage in battle and during nearly four cruel years of Japanese captivity. It is part of the lasting honour which Winston Churchill once ascribed to the defenders of Hong Kong. I repeat, for 550 survivors, the honour remains, although the reason for their being there is still uncertain.

On Saturday, December 7, 1991, a small group from the Royal Rifles of Canada gathered in the historic Menage Militaire Armoury in Quebec City's Grand Allée, where they were once based, to re-dedicate plaques to the men of Hong Kong, more than a quarter of whom died in battle or in prison camps, and many more prematurely in the peace, from the treatment they received as prisoners.

Honourable senators, today, veterans of Hong Kong are waging another battle against the Japanese for compensation for atrocities, starvation, brutality and abuse as prisoners of war. Led by such stalwart ex-prisoners-of-war survivors as Harold Atkinson and John Stroud, who are the heads of the Manitoba and Ontario branches of the Hong Kong Veterans' Association, and supported by the War Amputations of Canada, they are part of 250,000 allied ex-prisoners of war claiming compensation before the United Nations Human Rights Commission. Yes, 50 years later, the Hong Kong veterans and others who served in support are determined to achieve deserved recognition for redress, as much as to serve as a future bulwark against maltreatment of prisoners of war.

The fight for overdue and deserved recognition for those ex-prisoners of war still continues one half-century later. I am sure we, in the Senate of Canada, pledge our support and respect. With Canada now in full fight on an international human rights campaign, it is only logical that our country should uphold the human rights of ex-prisoners of war, before the United Nations Human Rights Council, of which we are a member.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I want to follow and echo what Senator Marshall has said about the very sad events at Hong Kong 50 years ago yesterday, when it began, and ending on the 25th of December insofar as the fighting was concerned, but quite obviously the pain and suffering of those who were taken as prisoners of war continued much longer.

As a senator from Manitoba, I want to make particular note of the fact that one of the regiments involved was the Winnipeg Grenadiers. As we have had some discussion recently about the Victoria Cross, and the matter is before us again, I want to point out as well that one Victoria Cross was awarded as a result of the Hong Kong battle, and that was to Company Sergeant-Major Osborn of the Winnipeg Grenadiers.

On Friday and Saturday of the past week there was a meeting, which is held every two years in Ottawa, of the honorary colonels and honorary lieutenant-colonels of Canadian regiments. It was my privilege at the conclusion of that meeting to take note of the events at Hong Kong 50 years ago, and a two minute silence was observed by all officers present. Senator Marshall has referred to the excellent story that appeared in the Globe and Mail, and I certainly want to give credit to that newspaper for that coverage. I thank my colleague across the way, the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, who has also given me a copy of the very fine article that appeared in the Montreal Gazette that portrays the full story of Hong Kong.

It is important that Canadians take note of these heroic deeds of young Canadians. They were indeed very young Canadians, many of them barely 17 years of age. Because of the influence of our media, I think we have a tendency to look upon December 7 and December 8 as being a Pearl Harbor operation. Certainly from the American standpoint, that battle is very important to them, and I do not want to belittle that in any way. We sometimes forget that there was a major Canadian involvement as well—a regretable one, I agree. It is most unfortunate that we were involved but we were there, and those young Canadians acquited themselves marvelously. When I consider that there was absolutely no air cover and that they were vastly outnumbered, the fact that they could even hold out from December 8 to December 25 is a marvel in itself. So I pay tribute to all those young men from the Winnipeg Grenadiers and from the Royal Rifles of Canada, a unit based in Quebec City. I think it is fitting that we recall the sad events of that time.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, may I just add a word to support what Senator Molgat and Senator Marshall have said. It is true that it is almost an American tradition that we see on Canadian television each December 7 the film Tora, Tora, Tora about Pearl Harbor. That is as it should be, that the world should never forget the treachery of that attack. President Roosevelt described it as "a day that will live in infamy".

It is unfortunate that, while we do watch that film religiously every year—and I think that is good—the incidents and the heroism that Senator Marshall has talked about in his presentation are overlooked. For the first time in a long time we are now able to read about this matter in various publications in this country. It is important for present generations to do what we can in support of the proposed motion, and the redress that Senator Marshall seeks for these victims. It is important for future generations that the attrocities that took place and the heroism of Canadians involved not be forgotten. I congratulate Senator Marshall, and I think we should pledge whatever support we can to see that proper recognition is given to the people involved.

Hon. John M. Forrestall: Honourable senators, may I join with Senator Marshall and Senator Molgat, and others who have commented on those events, to draw to the attention of honourable senators that these two regiments, made up largely of reservists, were composed of young men who came, not just from the parts of the country that might be indicated by the regiment names, but from all parts of Canada. I can think immediately of a number from the Maritime Provinces. Indeed, I can think of several who came from that great province of Newfoundland. I should like to remind honourable senators that that force, almost expeditionary in nature, was universal in terms of its representation of Canada and young Canadians who wanted to serve at that point in time.

Motion Adopted.

RAILWAYS

PROPOSED SALE OF RAIL LINES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, December 3, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the ramifications of the sale or proposed sale of certain rail lines in Canada.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I want to alert everyone at the outset that I may finish my remarks within the 15-minute time period allotted under the new rules. That would be a welcome surprise for everyone, but in the event that I stray a minute or two beyond the time limit, because of the seriousness of the matter I am about to discuss, I would ask in advance for the indulgence of all honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, we are now faced with the imminent sale and possible shutdown of the Truro-Sydney rail line in Nova Scotia. This event is taking place with breathtaking rapidity, as have all the other railway abandonments in Atlantic Canada.

Senator Frith: With the speed of an express train.

Senator Graham: Well-put, Senator Frith. Comparisons are being made with the Route Canada fiasco. I believe those comparisons will prove to be accurate in the long term on the assumption that its sale to private interests will ensure its eventual demise. The Truro-Sydney line is an active living presence in my part of the world. It is essential to the economic survival and development of eastern Nova Scotia. In addition, it possesses enormous symbolic value to Nova Scotians. For the time being I would like to anchor the issue in a broader perspective.

To begin, there is obviously great pressure on CN to modernize and innovate in response to the increasingly competitive conditions of global shipping patterns. The struggle to maintain competitive rates throughout the next decade and into the next century will be undeniably intense. For a whole series of reasons, some related to globalization, some relating to financial cutbacks and others centred on the competitive advantage enjoyed by the trucking industry for small shipments, railways have begun to rationalize their systems by giving up what they view to be peripheral lines.

We are now faced with a critical situation in Nova Scotia. A logical railway-road balance no longer exists. The landscape is strewn with the wreckage of abandoned lines. The federal government aids and abets a process of almost casual divestment. The remaining lines are under-utilized. Critics argue, and I believe correctly, that the railways have not bothered to market their services adequately. Abandonment, it is claimed, is an easier remedy. In the meantime, pressures on provincial highways increase constantly, promoted by the federal government's deregulation legislation. Nova Scotia's road system simply cannot support the traffic.

It has been pointed out that one truck trailer does the equivalent damage of 9,600 cars to Nova Scotia's highways. One can only begin to imagine the dangerous conditions that would be caused by the potential closure of the Truro-Sydney line. At the same time the federal government is adding to the pressure on surface transportation by reducing its financial commitment to railways. The transport system will continue to deteriorate largely because we have a plethora of decision-makers in the transport world who employ different criteria in different areas.

Mark Twain once said that if you don't know where you're going, any road will take you there. This is an age of transport by "ad-hocery" on the part of the provinces, on the part of the federal government and on the part of crown corporations like C.N.

With respect to the latter, I am only partly sympathetic to the Promethean imagery so unrelentingly communicated to the Canadian public. As Ross Walker pointed out in the September issue of Policy Options, Canada's largest crown corporation faces regulatory delays in implementing new technologies which inhibit its ability to compete in global markets. Once the principal mode of freight transport in this country, railways are now hauling less than a third. Trucking has become the dominant means of freight transport and the rail mode has suffered. It is true that there is no level playing field for surface transport carriers.

Yes, railways are facing difficult times—perhaps much of that does have something to do with the burdens of history;—yes, they may be condemned to a kind of eternal torment. So be it. In the meantime, we live in the absence of any kind of rational policy regime. We do not know where we are going, but we are assured by the present government that the market will take us there.

The National Transportation Act of 1987 was based on faith in market forces. But there is also enshrined in it a recognition that national transportation policies include the objective of regional economic development. This is not helping us in Atlantic Canada right now because it is clearly a subordinate principle. Its actualization depends on the political will of the present government. The main thrust of our experiment in deregulation is that the railways may abandon any line—including branch lines—up to a maximum of 4 per cent of their mileage annually. Railways continue to abandon lines which are vital to local shippers. Many shippers who have relied on the rail mode in the past often cannot come up with the capital necessitated by the switch to intermodal packages.

Technically, under Section 175 of the NTA, shippers who cannot upgrade for intermodal conversion can be compensated in the event of economic harm from railway abandonment. The compensation packages are muddled and the methodology of ascertaining compensation enormously complicated. One applies for compensation at one's peril. There is really no way of knowing how many shippers have suffered conversion losses in anticipation of railway abandonments, or how many more have been demoralized at the prospect of wading through yet another bureaucratic maze in search of compensation.

The Truro-Sydney line is a vital presence. It has suffered from the closure of the Newfoundland railway, from the loss of the VIA Rail passenger service and from losses in coal and gypsum traffic, among many other things. Yet if one looks at the criteria for an essential railway network published by the National Transportation Agency, the Truro-Sydney line has many of the characteristics listed therein.

In 1988, the consulting firm of Peat Marwick was hired by the province of Nova Scotia to assess and analyze surface freight alternatives in order to advise the province on the formulation of rational transport policies into the 21st century.

Its lengthy final report was released in January, 1990. It warned of the dire consequences attached to the abandonment of the Truro-Sydney line under the continuation of existing government policy both at the federal and provincial levels. I would like to read a couple of paragraph from chapter VII, page 3 of this report.

> The possible abandonment of the Truro-Sydney rail line is the most serious concern. This would substantially harm certain shippers who now depend on the line. These include Devco (coal), Georgia-Pacific (gypsum), Sydney Steel, Stora Forest Industries (newsprint and pulp), Canso Chemicals (chlorine and caustic soda), Trenton Works Lavalin Inc. (railway cars and axles), and Michelin Tire. It would lead to significantly increased shipping costs which would have a detrimental effect on the shippers' ability to serve their markets. In today's competitive environment, the results could lead to plant closures . . .
> Safety and environmental impacts of loss of the Truro-Sydney line are additional serious matters, although they are more difficult to assess. In addition to increased truck traffic on the highways, the transport by road of dangerous commodities such as chlorine, caustic soda, and propane will increase public exposure to dangerous goods and the associated risks of an accident.

The sale of the line which, as sure as I am standing here, will lead to its deterioration and eventual abandonment, has alarming implications for existing businesses. That has already been well documented by concerns expressed through the media in Nova Scotia. But uncertainty with respect to the future of that line, even today, would seriously impair every effort to attract new business to that region of Canada.

We obviously have a threatening situation on our hands, but you cannot blame C.N. alone for this. We presently see no policy coordination in this country and disparate modal jurisdictions simply aggravate the situation. Greater provincial and federal policy cooperation is not the whole answer, but without it we will see a gradual deterioration of our freight transportation system.

The federal government has responsibilities under the NTA with regard to regional economic development which, in this case, the province of Nova Scotia must encourage the federal government to carry out. In the meantime, our chaotic transport environment precipitates economic disaster for our people, yet government officials tell us to let deregulation run its course. Catch phrases such as these, in my opinion, are deadly—particularly so when they become part of a government lexicon and become surrogates for genuine thought.

● (1600)

When Ernest R. Forbes wrote his well-known account of the demise of the old Intercolonial railway, and, commensurately of a regional transportation policy for the Maritimes in the first two decades of the century, he focused on the over-zealous application of the catch phrase 'rate equalization' by the then Board of Railway Commissioners.

[Senator Graham.]

Some honourable senators will recall that a differential had been built into the Maritime freight rate structure in the early years of Confederation to ensure that the Intercolonial functioned as an agent of a regionally-oriented transportation policy. John A. Macdonald repeatedly referred to the Intercolonial as "a political consequence of political union". Such policies of regional flexibility led to a spectacular period of industrialization and growth in Maritime Canada. As the historian, T.W. Acheson has shown, Nova Scotia's per capita growth in manufacturing exceeded that of any region in Canada between 1880 and 1910. Between 191220, the catch words "rate equalization" reigned. Consequently, the differential was abolished, the Intercolonial was absorbed into the C.N.R., the Moncton headquarters were dismantled, the special rates for sugar and coal were eliminated, and freight charges were equalized with Central Canada.

The new rates were a tremendous blow to the Maritime regional economy. As the Maritime Rights Movement consolidated strength in the post-war period, its advocates protested that the original Confederation agreement had not meant that the Intercolonial would be included in a symmetrical system. They argued that rate equalization and return on capital had become the only considerations. They knew that railways were not only a business, but that they had a responsibility to the communities they served.

As a result of what Forbes called attempts at "misguided symmetry", the Maritime economy lurched from disaster to disaster. Between 1919 and 1921, the total number of people employed in manufacturing declined by 42 per cent. The decline had the fatal ring of permanence about it. After the original collapse and the resultant failure to recover, the dramatic exodus of approximately 150,000 Maritime skilled workers and professionals began. We do not want that to happen again. We will not let it happen again.

In those days, the Railway Traffic Board's assumption that a mile is a mile is a mile led to disastrous consequences. Under the banner of that deadly catch phrase "rate equalization", Maritime Canadians were treated as a footnote to railway rationalization. Substitute the word 'market' or 'deregulation'—the government lexicon of the present day—for the term 'rate equalization' of yesterday, honourable senators, and you will then see the peril faced by real people in the event of official fascination with 'misguided symmetries' or 'contemptible configurations'—call it what you like.

However, along with this we must consider the enormous symbolism inherent in the potential abandonment of the line. It would mean a very explicit, very visual reminder to many Nova Scotians that they are even more permanently disadvantaged within the Canadian Confederation. Those 'two rusted lines of track' would not be so much indicative of our present economic discontent as they would be of our future incapacity. That thin spine of steel, honourable senators, is still a reminder to Canadians that we are a union.

The Truro/Sydney line is a railway indigenous to this century, not the last century. It is an active, living presence—a vital life force in our region. It is a symbol of our right to equity in our Confederation. It is symbolic of our 'right' to a better future. In a region where the official unemployment rate is presently over 17 per cent and the unofficial rate much higher, closure of the line for our people would represent the last straw.

As I said in this Chamber on September 24 in my response to the Speech from the Throne, we Nova Scotians are caught up in the ferment of adaptation to a new world of increasing interdependence. We know that there is an important link between the ability to think globally and the ability to act locally. We need a transportation policy, the development of a viable policy regime, which will facilitate the dynamism of people at the local level. We need a viable policy regime—a balanced railway/road policy— which will assure us of a ticket to the 21st century—a front row seat in the arena of global transformation. The abandonment of the Truro/Sydney line will impair our ability to act at the local level. It will ensure that we are not on the playing field, but only spectators in the bleachers of the future.

In conclusion, whether the reasons are historical or the simple, practical realities of the 1990s, this is an appropriate issue for Senate consideration. I invite other honourable senators to participate in the inquiry, and I give informal notice that, in the near future, I will seek support in the Chamber for a reference of this and other related matters to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

In the meantime, because of the uncertainty and because of its effect on future planning for expansion of existing industries, or indeed the development of new industries, I urge the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to convene a meeting of his committee on an urgent basis, and consider the possibility of sending a subcommittee to eastern Nova Scotia at the earliest possible date so that we can examine at first-hand the real seriousness of the situation.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, before I attempt a response to Senator Graham on a rail line that is very dear and close to our hearts, perhaps he could help by indicating exactly what he has in mind. I got the impression that he said—and if he did I agree with him—that the Canadian National cannot operate that line. Second, that the line is not being abandoned; in the future it would be a likely candidate for abandonment. There is a third alternative, to which Senator Graham did not refer. Before I begin, perhaps Senator Graham could respond to those questions.

Senator Graham: Perhaps the honourable senator could clarify whether he said that Canadian National can or cannot abandon the line?

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senator, I said that you gave the impression, with which I agree, that Canadian National because of its nature and structure, historically has been unable to service, market and make money on lines such as the Truro to Sydney line. It is now a marginally profitable operation and may in future be a candidate for abandonment, but it is not now. Canadian National is taking advantage of section 158 of the National Transportation Act to put that line up for sale or lease, which I will come to. That was the reference point.

• (1610)

Senator Graham: That is quite true. If I had the government controls at my disposal, and in view of the seriousness of the situation in that part of Canada, I would — and there are precedents for this—order them to abandon the process that they have now embarked upon and order them to continue operating the line from Truro to Sydney. There is no question that, under the legislation that exists in the country, CN has a right to do what it is doing. However, I plead with honourable senators that because of the serious nature of the situation economically in that part of Canada, we will suffer much greater ill effects. The easiest thing for the government to do at the present time, which is within its power, is to order CN to abandon the process that they have embarked upon.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, over the last seven years there has been a very active movement in Canada and the United States by large railroads transferring the operations of branch lines to local operators. These transactions are being structured as sales or leases, leases with purchase options, leases usually with capital expenditure commitments, and contract operations.

The same movement is beginning in Canada. The reasons for this transfer of branch-line operations are several: A local operator usually can operate trains with smaller sized crews due to the local nature of the work, at slower speeds and with more personal involvement of locally-based employees. A locally-based company whose entire business is dependent upon local originating and terminating traffic has great incentive to increase traffic. The large railroads seem to be focusing their sales efforts on major customers for long distance movements.

Local railroads have proven they can find new business, both local intra-railroad hauls and long-distance hauls. The shipper becomes the real beneficiary by switching from truck back to rail because the cost of rail shipment is much lower than truck shipment.

As well, the large railroads are finding they can significantly improve their return on their invested dollars by focusing expenditures on their main line, heavily-utilized routes rather than spending large amounts on branch lines where there may be only one train a day.

Large railroads have acknowledged that a high portion of their management time is devoted to branch-line issues where the carload activity is minimal. By turning over management issues to a local operator, the large railroad manager can focus on main line issues.

In most situations, the local operator will increase the frequency of service when compared to that of the previous operator, the major railroad. Often this means daily service instead of tri-weekly service. As a result, a rail car moves more quickly to and from the shipper with a car spotted in one day and out the next instead of an additional day's delay. More frequent service means increased rail car utilization. With a lower-cost basis of operation combined with local management, a marginal line has one last chance of survival before abandonment occurs.

How has this system worked in the United States? I will quote excerpts from this material, and then I will ask to have this survey tabled for those senators who might like to study it further. This is a report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Railroad Administration of the United States. It is entitled "A Survey of Shipper Satisfaction with Service and Rates of Shortline and Regional Railroads."

We are dealing here, as Senator Graham and others well know, with a possible sale of CN to an appropriate private party involving the Truro to Sidney rail line, which is hereinafter called a shortline. "Shortline" is the name given to operators of such.

The first part of this study by the Interstate Commerce Commission reads as follows:

> The Staggers Rail Act of 1980 (Staggers Act) ushered in a new era for the U.S. freight railroad industry and its shippers. By removing obsolete and restrictive regulations, the legislation gave carriers the flexibility to react quickly to the competitive marketplace, offering shippers rate and service levels responsive to their needs. In turn, market forces have required the railroads to reduce costs and promote efficient operations in order to attract and retain traffic. Often, these efforts have led to significant restructuring, as railroads have sold unprofitable or marginally profitable lines to operators whose lower costs allow them to continue to provide service.

Not to abandon it.

> The increase in the number of these smaller railroads has been dramatic. Almost half of the 424 independent shortline and regional railroads in operation in mid-1989 were formed since the passage of the Staggers Act. The creation of these new carriers has been aided by the ICC, which replaced burdensome and lengthy review of these transactions with streamlined procedures that allow lines to be sold to new operators in a timely manner, before service finally deteriorates.
>
> The ICC and the FRA support shortline railroad growth, and have undertaken projects to monitor this emerging segment of the industry and evaluate the effort of its growth on shippers.

Now, this is the most important part of the segment.

> The primary focus of this study was to determine how shippers compare the services and rates offered by their new shortline or regional carrier with those of the railroad that had previously served them. Additionally, we investigated whether perceived service and rate changes varied with characteristics such as shipper size and commodities shipped . . .
> The user survey results showed a clear pattern of shipper satisfaction with both service and rates offered by the shortline and regional railroads created after the enactment of the Staggers Act, with no significant differences between responses of shortline and regional shippers. Table 1 shows that an overwhelming 94 per cent of the survey respondents believed that service levels had been maintained or improved. Shippers also responded favourably when asked about their current railroad's rates—88 per cent reported that rate levels had either improved or stayed the same . . .
> In conclusion, the user survey results found a clear pattern of shipper satisfaction with both service and rates offered by the shortline and regional railroads created after the enactment of the Staggers Act. The surveyed shippers clearly believed that their current rail service had improved or stayed consistent with prior levels. Additionally, most appeared to believe that rate levels had not deteriorated.

[Senator MacDonald.]

The formation of more feeder railroads will become an important part of the evolution of railroads in Canada, especially in the province of Ontario. The Goderich and Exeter line, which I will come to in a minute, is the first of many new railroads as the larger railroads concentrate their management and investment on the main line routes. The feeder railroad may be the last chance for survival of many branch lines already facing abandonment. The Ontario Municipal Board, which is the body the Ontario government has designated as the regulatory body under provincial jurisdiction, will be reviewing the first of what will be many more such applications.

• (1620)

There are other shortline experiences in Canada. In 1986, CN sold its 174 kilometre Stettler subdivision in Alberta to the Central Western Railroad. This line, successful in the first venture, has just recently expanded with the purchase of 214 kilometres of railroad in the same area from CP Rail.

In 1990, CN sold 112 kilometres of its Goderich and Exeter subdivisions in southwestern Ontario. I gather that is the Goderich to Stratford line, although I stand to be corrected if I am wrong. CN sold it to the Rail Tex Corporation of San Antonio, Texas. Rail Tex is only one of a number of American companies that has an interesting and profitable history. It devotes its talents and resources to managing its 16 shortline railroads. These 16 railroads operate over 1,000 miles of track and are located in California, Texas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Michigan, Virginia, Georgia, New Mexico, Kansas and Louisiana.

The president of Rail Tex is a man by the name of Bruce Flohr, who is the current chairman of the executive committee of the Regional Railroads of America. He and his company have received several industry recognition awards. They are the Golden Spike Award, the Railroad Productivity Award, Entrepreneur of the Year, and the Golden Freight Car Award. I mention his name because Senator Graham might be interested in knowing that this gentleman has put in a bid to buy and operate the Truro-Sydney Shortline.

CN is not serving notice of abandonment of the rail line between Truro and Sydney. It is seeking permission under section 158 to sell or otherwise lease its line to several bidders whose names have not yet been disclosed and where a decision, I presume, is imminent. Its operation as a shortline railroad will position it as a viable feeder line to the mainline core network. I suppose it is the same thing in rail as it is in aviation; it is the spoke and hub concept.

CN is offering to sell this line to a buyer compatible with this prime objective. Every effort will be made, as usual, to protect the rights of the workers. CN will establish a base price under which it will not sell. However, a possible lease might be explored. The company will only entertain offers which are compatible with the objective. New owners will be required to have an adequate financial resource and an effective management team with a clear understanding of the business.

Experience in Canada and the U.S. has shown that railroad operators must have two paramount qualifications. First, they have to know how to run trains. Second, they have to have good financial management. The two of these combined create the marketing strategy and the customized service which is now clearly lacking.

This does not cover the language of the inquiry. However, since Senator Graham refers to it, we should be clear that we are dealing here with CN's right under section 158 to sell or lease this shortline railroad. I have attempted to show that not only has this system been enormously successful in the United States under similar circumstances, it is also gaining a great deal of credence in Canada, and in at least two areas it is working very successfully. I cannot assuage the fears of Senator Graham with regard to the matter of symbolism.

Senator Sinclair made the following remark—and I trust that Senator Molgat will not consider this to be unparliamentary language. As far as symbolism goes, he said, "If I hear somebody else referring to the wail of the railway whistle in the middle of the night on the Prairies, I think I'm going to puke."

Senator Molgat: But we miss that wail.

Senator MacDonald: I suggest that Senator Graham address himself to the second option, instead of throwing everything up against the barn door, hoping some of it might stick. That might make it easier to get into the reference when he gives notice of such.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Graham: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I am sure that if Cape Bretoners were assured of the wail of the whistle for the rest of their lives, they would be happy, even if the train went through their backyards or across their front lawns. My first concern is to find someone who will operate the line with pockets deep enough to maintain it. I said to Senator MacDonald that I would be happy to examine all the viable options. That is why I am suggesting that we bring this matter before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. The honourable senator made reference to a possible buyer from San Antonio, Texas. He must be one of the seven; is that correct?

Senator MacDonald: I do not know how many there have been.

Senator Graham: I understand there have been seven. We have attempted to determine the names of those bidders. You have been much more successful than have we.

The senator made reference to feeder lines in Ontario, and the sale of a line in Alberta. The only survey that he used was a survey of operations in the United States. With the greatest of respect to Senator MacDonald, we want made-in-Canada solutions. I urge him, and ask him, to consider referring this matter to the committee which he has the honour to chair, with the possibility of appointing a subcommittee to go to eastern Nova Scotia to examine the problem firsthand.

I am not ignoring any of the options that Senator MacDonald has outlined; but I think the proper forum for us as senators is to have that issue examined, including all his options, in the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Senator MacDonald: Of course, I will be happy to take the instruction of the Senate at any time to look into this matter. I hope that there will be more time for debate by others who might agree with me that we are not playing politics, that we are not saying, "We are not going to take this lying down. The government is going to order CN to do this. We will march on Ottawa."

Providing this committee inquiry is not quixotic, I am sure that all our colleagues on the committee will be happy to take it up. Personally, I am not yet convinced that Senator Graham is advocating anything but saying, "We are not going to take this lying down. We are going to force CN to do it. We are going to march on Ottawa." The Nova Scotia government has been doing just that in meeting after meeting after meeting. Could we just stick to the point? Could we examine the second option, the main option, which has been highly successful in the United States?

• (1630)

I do not understand what Senator Graham meant when he said "Let's have a made-in-Canada solution". Do we want someone who once owned a railroad, or do we want a Canadian? Do we want someone who can run a railroad, or must it be a Canadian?

Senator Graham: If we agree to examine option two and refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, would you agree to have that reference made? Would you agree today?

Senator MacDonald: I would like to hear more conversation. The fact is, as I say, I will take any instruction from the Senate regarding an inquiry, but I will not make any commitment at this time.

Senator Graham: You say that I threw everything against the barn door, and my first option is to order the government to order CN to cease and desist in the process. As a reasonable person, however, and understanding the seriousness of the situation, I express my fear that by the time the decision is made, the horse will be out of the barn as far as the expansion of some of our existing industries are concerned, if we agree on this side to examine option two, would you agree to have the matter referred to the standing committee?

Senator MacDonald: Senator, all you have to do is give one day's notice, and then it will be debated. The instruction will either be sent to me or otherwise.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wish to participate in this debate rather than to have a backfire from Question Period between the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications and Senator Graham from Cape Breton.

To me, this is a very important issue. It might not be very interesting for people who live in Montreal, Toronto or Ottawa, where they have trains going back and forth, but I can tell you, from Prince Edward Island's standpoint, we lost our train because nobody took up the fight on behalf of our province. Now they are selling the rails so that we will never get it back. Many of them are sold. The rails have been lifted.

I say to you that the economy of Cape Breton is very much like the economy of Prince Edward Island. The only industries they have in that area are coal, steel, construction or shipping. Without a railroad and all this traffic on the roads, it is a catastrophe. It is not only a catastrophe for the roads, it is a catastrophe for the economy of the provinces, because the provinces cannot afford to maintain these roads with 18-wheelers travelling over them. These trucks destroy the roads at a very fast rate.

Prince Edward Island did not join Canada in 1867, because it had to prove that it could get four senators. Now the NDP is trying to get rid of those senators. The people of Prince Edward Island were told that they would get continuous communication with the mainland. We have been promised that ever since, and we do not have it yet. We had to make sure that the farmers of Prince Edward Island could own their own land instead of it beieng owned by the landlords of England. We were promised that the government would take over the debt of the railroad and operate the railroads of Prince Edward Island, and that has gone.

I can tell you that the highways of Prince Edward Island are in a serious strait, and almost all the province can afford to do is to patch them, but not to reconstruct them with the present economy and the heavy destruction of those roads.

To me, this is a very important issue. It might not be as important for those people who do not understand Atlantic Canada. I know that Senator MacDonald understands, because he is well versed in the affairs of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia, and he knows where Prince Edward Island is. Now that it is off the map, it is at the bottom of the sea somewhere.

We have lost our railroads; we are losing our post office. We have lost our province, and we do not want Cape Breton to go the same way. I wish to adjourn this debate until I can get some very important statistical information about Canada and Cape Breton in particular.

[Senator Graham.]

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

EIGHTY-SIXTH INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE, SANTIAGO, CHILE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to revert to Inquiries:

Hon. Peter Bosa, rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, December 5, 1991:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Eighty-Sixth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, held in Santiago, Chile, from 7th to 12th October, 1991.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I spoke to the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and they were both agreeable to moving forward to December 9, one item standing in my name for December 10. I wish to make a few remarks this afternoon in connection with that item, if there is unanimous consent.

• (1640)

Honourable Senators, I am pleased to report to the Senate on the 86th Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Santiago, Chile, from October 7 to 12, 1991.

Chile has a long history of democratic government, and we rejoice with the Chilean people that it has again been restored after a 17-year state of seige. Allow me to share with you a brief background of its history.

Chile was discovered in 1520 by Ferdinand Magellan, with settlement by the Spanish beginning in 1536. Chile proclaimed its independence in 1817 after years of warfare against the Spanish. Unlike many other Latin American countries, there was limited military intervention in politics before 1973. Most of the regimes during the 19th and 20th centuries were constitutionally elected.

In the post-World War II period, power became increasingly dependent on political coalitions as no single party was able to control the Chilean political agenda. This set the stage for the election to the presidency in 1970 of Salvador Allende Gossans of the Popular Front, a coalition of left-wing parties. In 1973, following increased unrest throughout the country, the armed forces overthrew Allende and established a military regime under General Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, who was proclaimed president in December 1974. The government suspended civil liberties, incarcerated thousands of political opponents and violated human rights policy in every area.

From 1973 until 1990, Chile was governed by a firmly established military regime under President Pinochet. Under its new constitution, General Pinochet was to remain president until March 1989, when the country would return to a form of democracy in which the political parties would be permitted in a restricted form. It was considered a foregone conclusion that President Pinochet would be the single presidential candidate. However, a coalition forced the government to put Pinochet's rule to a plebiscite and he was rejected. This led the way to further reforms and, on December 14, 1989, Patricio Aylwin won a solid victory, with 55 per cent of the vote, in a free and fair election and was inaugurated president in March 1990.

However, the new president faces a number of substantial challenges. His party won a majority in the Chamber of Representatives but only a minority in the Senate. As well, Pinochet has remained Commander in Chief of the Army and, therefore, a key issue for the new government continues to be relations with the military. The human rights policy of the new regime is another major issue. How the government deals with the human rights abuses of the previous administration will affect political confidence within Chile and international support for the new government.

This, in turn, will influence Chile's economy as its economic plans are based on foreign investment. The optimism which has been cultivated so carefully could be seriously compromised if Chile is unable to show the international community that its human rights policy is working.

Chile is rich in raw materials and its economy has traditionally depended on the export of copper and other commodities. Since 1940, governments have attempted to diversify economic activities with varying degrees of success.

Pinochet's economic policy was to convert Chile abruptly from a socialist to an open market economy—challenging Chile's companies to compete with imported goods while offering tax incentives to promote research, development and investment. The adjustment process was a difficult one for the first three years, but Chile developed a strong economic base.

The new government has followed the same macro-economic policy lines in order to boost and diversify exports and attract investment, with the result that Chile's overall economic performance has continued to be superior to most other countries in Latin America.

Canada has placed a priority upon expansion of trade with Chile. A Memorandum of Understanding was signed by the Secretary of State in May in Santiago to promote economic and trade relations. Our commercial relationship is solid with exports to Chile of $188 million and imports of $180 million from Chile in 1990. Canada places emphasis on the mining, forestry, power/energy and telecommunications sectors. Canadian investment in Chile has amounted to over $1.4 billion U.S. over the years. In 1990, Canada was the largest single investor in Chile, most of that investment in the mining sector. It is estimated that over the next four years, Canadian investment in Chile will double—again primarily in mining.

In foreign policy terms, Canada and Chile share the same goals of reducing protectionism through GATT and the Cairns Group. For a few minutes, I would like to draw your attention to one of the subjects on the conference agenda which relates to the GATT negotiations.

On the first day of the conference, delegates selected a supplementary item on the agenda, a proposal submitted by the Australian IPU group, namely "The role of Parliaments in supporting efforts to achieve a greater liberalization of international trade, in particular through a successful conclusion to the Uruguay Round." My colleague from the other place, Gabriel Fontaine, and I represented Canada in the discussions in committee and served on the drafting committee which prepared a resolution for presentation to the final plenary.

During the discussion I noted that, after the failure of the Brussels meetings, the Uruguay Round of negotiations had resumed with support at the political level to overcome the recurrent issues, such as those on trade in agriculture and trade in services. Most of my remarks concerned agricultural trade. The substantial subsidies that the European Community grain producers receive has resulted in an over-supply of this product on the world market, with devastating effects on our prairie farmers and the farmers of other wheat-producing countries. Wheat is being sold on the world market at a price below the cost of production. As a result, many farmers have gone into bankruptcy. The European Community also faces great difficulties with its subsidy program which eats up some 60 percent of the community budget.

Of course, there are no easy solutions to this problem, but given the political will, a willingness to give and take in this and other ares of negotiations, this situation can be overcome. The period of readjustment will be painful.

I pointed out that Canada has some experience in this field. We signed a Free Trade Agreement with the United States in 1989 and, at present, we are negotiating a North American Free Trade Agreement with Mexico. We have experienced hardships such as plant closings and increased unemployment, but, in the process, we have also benefitted by securing better access to the U.S. markets for our exports. We can alleviate in part the negative consequences of trade liberalization by developing programs to assist those individuals and entities to adjust during the difficult period of transition. In the long run, everybody will benefit. I am pleased to report that the draft resolution which we prepared was adopted unanimously by the Conference.

● (1650)

In my brief remarks to you today I have not touched on many parts of the conference. These will be covered by other honourable colleagues who are participating in this debate, namely the Chairman of the IPU, Senator Nathan Nurgitz. However, I do want to pay tribute to the fine work of our Ambassador to Chile, Mr. Michael Mace. He and his staff provided us with excellent service and support. At the beginning of our visit, Mr. Mace gave a valuable and insightful briefing on the current political and economic situation in Chile. Throughout the conference, he took an active interest in our deliberations and attended many of the sessions. In addition he worked with us in arranging special meetings with Chilean legislators and officials.

Mr. David Bickford, Counsellor, was assigned to work with us during the conference and he provided exemplary service. Having participated in a number of these inter-parliamentary conferences, I can state without hesitation that the interest in and support of our work shown by Mr. Mace and his staff was the best I have ever received.

In conclusion, I want to say how pleased we were to be in a country that has returned to its democratic traditions. A major Canadian priority is to support the process of return to democracy in Chile. Formal linkages between Canada and Chile were greatly reduced during the Pinochet years, with Canada supporting the moderate opposition, including the granting of political refuge and the funding of alternative social and economic "think tanks". Many of those academics who received CIDA or IDRC funding are now in senior positions in government, and Canada is well placed to build its relationship with the new government.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, today we join with others around the world in marking Human Rights Day. It was on December 10, 1948, that the General Assembly of the United Nations, meeting in Paris, and with the support of Canada, proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Honourable senators might be surprised to learn that a few days prior to this proclamation by the General Assembly, it was not at all certain that Canada would be a signatory. Some commentators have written that when Canada saw the company it was in with respect to the states that were not signing or abstaining, we quickly came on side in support of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a universal standard of rights and freedoms which can be considered the Magna Carta of the 20th century.

Notwithstanding our hesitant start in the field of international promotion of human rights, Canada has become an important promoter of human rights internationally. Some of the highlights include the ratification by Canada in 1976 of not only the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, but also the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The ratification of this latter instrument, made with the full support of all jurisdictions in Canada, could well serve as a basis for a serious consideration of a Canadian social charter as is currently proposed in some parts of the country.

The work of the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development is another noteworthy international undertaking, as is the leadership of the Prime Minister and his international human rights initiatives, recently taken at the Commonwealth and Francophone meetings. It is our hope that Canada will, in the next few days, ratify the United Nations' Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Honourable senators, on Human Rights Day 1991, we might well ask, what will be the impact on human rights of globalization, of the new world order, of the possible changes to our confederation. The underlying value of human rights is human dignity. So also is human dignity the underlying value of democracy. For 124 years, our Canadian parliamentary system has, notwithstanding great pressures including two world wars, developed on principles of human rights.

Honourable senators, the Senate of Canada is a key institution in the system of checks and balances which has allowed the practice of freedom to have reasonably good success in Canada. I submit that there is a direct causal relationship between the practice of freedom and the control over state power, between the history of democracy in Canada and the presence of the Senate of Canada. Not only does this chamber serve as an important check on the exercise of state power, but the Senate can play a very special role in the protection of parts of Canada or of groups of Canadians who, by themselves, will never constitute the majority. This role of protecting the minority is especially important where a given minority group of Canadians might be perceived by the majority as a despised minority group.

Honourable senators will recall that, for the past several years, recommendations have been made by the Human Rights Commissioner for amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act to ensure better protection for disadvantaged groups of Canadians. The Justice Committee of the other place, in its 1985 report, entitled "Equality Now" had also made suggestions for improving the anti-discrimination provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act which, when compared to provincial human rights statutes, have fallen far behind. It is well known that one of the major stumbling blocks has been the divergence of opinion concerning the wisdom of adding sexual orientation to the list of proscribed grounds of discrimination.

The legislative assemblies of the Assemblée Nationale have been able to—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Kinsella, I am sorry to interrupt you but, as you know, we have rules. However, if everyone waives the rule, and you can conclude quickly . . .

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kinsella: I will take ten seconds.

Honourable senators, it is well known that one of the major stumbling blocks to amending the Human Rights Act has been a divergence of opinion concerning the wisdom of adding sexual orientation to the list of prescribed grounds of discrimination. As I said, the legislative assemblies of many provinces and the Assemblée Nationale have been able to make the decision in favour of protecting a minority. If members of the other place are having a more difficult problem because they do not see this as appealing from a numbers standpoint, then perhaps the Senate, with its interest in protecting minorities, should take the initiative.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

MADE-IN-CANADA DRUG POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would also like to make a statement today. It is a very important statement for Canadians.

I noticed in the newspaper today a memo congratulating the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney for his stand at GATT concerning the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association and the made-in-Canada policy for the drug industry of Canada.

I would like to add my support to the Canadian Drug Manufacturers' Association. I would also like to congratulate the Prime Minister for supporting this industry and trying to make Canada the master of its own drug industry.

This is quite a change for the government and the Prime Minister, who went to Quebec City and sang When Irish Eyes Are Smiling with the President of the United States, and who destroyed the Canadian Drug Manufacturers' Association with the Patent Act and, by doing so, supported the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada.

The Government of Canada has gone so far now as to put the president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada on the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board in order to see what it is doing. That is the wolf looking after the sheep.

However, the fact that the Prime Minister himself has now gone to GATT to promote this industry is worth bringing to the attention of honourable senators. It is a change of heart such as Saint Paul had on the road to Damascus.

The Canadian public fully supports the defence of this industry. Ninety-one per cent of Canadians believe that Canada should have its own pharmaceutical industry, and not one dominated by foreign-owned multinational drug companies. Seventy-four per cent of Canadians believe that Canada should design a policy for pharmaceuticals that is unique to Canada, not made in the United States, Europe or Japan. Seventy per cent of Canadians believe that Canada should not trade away its ability to formulate a made-in-Canada pharmaceutical policy while participating in international trade talks.

Clearly, Canadians want their own pharmaceutical industry. They back the Prime Minister against the foreign-owned multinational drug corporations which are lobbying furiously in Geneva and Ottawa to have their already generous patent monopolies extended. If the multi-million dollar pressure campaigns of the multi-nationals succeed, it would eliminate our industry in Canada and deprive Canadians of any low-cost generic drugs.

• (1410)

We travelled across Canada a few years ago and heard from the Canadian people on this matter, but because of the promise made by the Prime Minister to President Reagan on the Free Trade Agreement to limit the Patent Act so that the pharmaceutical companies would get 10 years' protection and set up the Pharmaceutical Price Review Board, they went even farther this year—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, you know what the rules specify. Is there unanimous agreement that leave—

Senator Bonnell: I will quit right now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am glad to report that petitions are still coming against the GST. Those today are in the same form as those previously presented to honourable senators dealing with the 7 per cent goods and services tax, and the petitioners humbly pray and call upon the senators to do everybody possible to abolish the new goods and services tax and demand a general election immediately.

QUESTION PERIOD

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STATUS OF SOVIET UNION—COMMONWEALTH OF REPUBLICS—CONTROL OF NUCLEAR ARSENAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting the change in the status of the Soviet Union and the new commonwealth of republics announced yesterday. One question I am asking is whether Canada has some information about the structure and process that this new commonwealth will be using for the safe control of the huge arsenal of nuclear weapons that is within those three republics. Most other countries in the world expressed some deep grave concern about this matter , whereas the Canadian Minister of External Affairs is quoted as having given a generally positive reception to the announcement.

Do we Canadians know something about how they intend to control this arsenal that most of the rest of the world does not know about?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have twice recently attempted to respond to questions on exactly this point with regard to the situation in Ukraine. Frankly, the situation is not far different in regard to the other republics. Our position continues to be that peaceful cooperation among the republics, as evidenced by the recent agreement, is exactly what we all want, especially given the important issues that the honourable senator has referred to.

The secure control of nuclear weapons, arms control, human rights, and the protection of minorities are, of course, questions that were raised here within the last couple of days, as well as those having to do also with debt and financial commitments.

Senator Olson: More specifically, can the minister tell us if the Canadian government, through the Department of External Affairs, has received any indication of how this new commonwealth of three republics will set up a structure to control these weapons? Apparently, such information has not been given to the United States or, for that matter, any other country.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will have to ask my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to reply in greater detail to the question of the honourable senator.

PRECINCTS OF PARLIAMENT

SAFETY IN THE WORKPLACE

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I have a question tht I am not sure whether I should direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate or to the Speaker of the Senate.

There has been a little job going on in the hall behind the chamber. Some honourable senators may have noticed in particular that there is work being done on the chimney. I do not know if it is being enlarged so that an overweight Santa Claus can come down it or not. However, there is a step-ladder which is being used just down the hall. It has the word "Senate" on it in large print. It started out being a four-legged step-ladder, but it now is a tired old ladder and it has two broken legs.

When I asked yesterday why it was being used, I was told that the step-ladder represents the Senate logo. If that is so, then it creates an extremely bad image for the Senate. If it were a horse, we would have shot it six months ago.

Senator Kenny: They don't have a leg to stand on.

Senator Lawson: If it were a building trade union job, we would have had a wild-cat strike by now. My real concern is that someone will use the ladder, and wind up spending the winter on compensation or in the hospital.

Surely, replacing such a ladder represents but a $50 or $100 investment. Since the Senate name is on it, the Senate—or the government—can afford the cost of a new ladder. I took the time on the way in, since it was still there from yesterday, to suggest that it be taken down to the garbage dump. It may have been improper for me to do that, but my appeal is to the Leader of the Government, the Speaker, or to whoever is responsible. Surely we can afford to buy a new ladder so that workmen doing work in this building will not have to work on something quite so unsafe.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in this chamber it would be the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee who would want to take this matter under advisement at once.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That's a step in the right direction!

THE SENATE

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has answered questions about Ukraine several times. I am still waiting for responses to my questions about Armenia and the Western Sahara. Perhaps he can answer those questions today. His gestures indicate that is the case. I would be glad to have them.

At the same time, perhaps the leader could explain why it takes so long to get responses to questions that are on matters of importance and interest to the people of Canada about which we cannot read in our newspapers and about which we would like to hear on a more timely basis.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I can demonstrate figures at the ready that our record in terms of answering questions has been remarkably prompt.

There has been some delay in replying to the question the honourable senator asked some time ago about the Western Sahara. I took that question up personally with the minister, and the answer arrived here in the form of a delayed answer. I was then told that it was waiting for translation before tabling, because Senate Hansard insists on having the replies in both languages.

I have insisted that the reply be made in the language in which the question was posed. I do not think it is necessary to table replies in both languages, there being facilities here for exactly that purpose. I will anticipate the delayed answer. I will give my answer to the honourable senator in English. Those who wish to listen to the translation may do so.

WESTERN SAHARA

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSED PEACE PLAN—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator asked a number of questions about the Western Sahara. The first was whether any Canadian observer or journalist is presently in the area, or will be shortly.

The short answer to the question is that there are presently some 35 Canadians in the area as part of an advanced deployment of MINURSO. These include the commanding officers, staff officers and some ten military observers and support staff. To the best of our knowledge there are no Canadian journalists or reporters actually in Western Sahara. Southam News and Canadian Press had expressed two months ago an interest in sending to the area their regional correspondents.

A question was also asked by the honourable senator having to do with conditions for civilians in the refugee camps. I will read the notes that have been provided to me on this matter as of December 5: Canada considers that the peaceful resolution of the Western Sahara issue would remove a major source of tension and conflict in the region and alleviate the plight of Saharan refugees. We have fully supported the United Nations Secretary General in his efforts to find a solution. Canada has contributed $500,000 in June 1991 to the voluntary fund set up by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for the repatriation of Western Saharans to participate in the referendum. Canadas's humanitarian assistance for refugees is channelled through multilateral agencies.

The Western Sahara refugee camps have received relief from the UNHCR, United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, to which Canada contributes a yearly average of $8 million. Through the World Food Program, Canadian assistance has also reached Western Saharans. In 1990-91, 3700 metric tonnes of food were provided to Algeria for the relief of refugees in its territory, including Western Saharans.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to thank the Leader of the Government for his response to that question and suggest to him that, since our newspapers are not covering the issue, I would appreciate being kept up-to-date on that situation and will, no doubt, ask a question in the new year. I simply alert him to that possibility.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO ACT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, given that it is Human Rights Day, I have a couple of questions I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In 1985, the Equality Now report recommended a number of amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act. During the past couple of years the Human Rights Commissioner, Max Yalden, has also called on the government to introduce a number of amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act. Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate able to advise honourable senators whether or not the government will be introducing legislation to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act and, if so, when?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first let me say that I am sure all honourable senators appreciate the interest and concern of Senator Kinsella in this subject. His record of activity in this field is well-known, he having been Chief Commissioner of Human Rights in the province of New Brunswick for, I believe, 20 years or more, and he is presently the Chairman of the Board of the Canadian Human Rights Foundation.

Having said that, with regard to the question he has just put, he will recall that the government responded to the report of the Parliamentary committee in a document entitled Toward Equality. We stand by the commitments that we made as a government in that document. There is a very comprehensive review under way by the Minister of Justice, Kim Campbell, of the human rights situation, and, yes, we expect to be bringing to Parliament amendments to the act in the course of the present session.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question: Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate able to advise at this stage whether or not the desired amendment dealing with the matter of reasonable accommodation, especially as it relates to problems facing persons with disabilities, will be included?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am aware that in at least one, and perhaps more than one province, provisions in human rights legislation have covered that point. I regret I am not in a position to say definitively today whether we will be able to do that in amendments to the federal act. I will make inquiries of my colleague the Minister of Justice to see whether she is in a position to make any statement on that matter now.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION—PROSCRIBED GROUND OF DISCRIMINATION—EFFECT ON ELIGIBILITY TO SERVE IN CANADIAN FORCES

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: One further supplemental, given that the governments of such jurisdictions as Ontario, Quebec, the Yukon and, only a few weeks ago, the province of Nova Scotia, have added sexual orientation to the list of proscribed grounds of discrimination in their respective human rights acts, is there an indication that the federal government will be catching up by including sexual orientation as a proscribed ground of discrimination of the Canadian Human Rights Act amendments?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): There again, honourable senators, I believe we made a commitment on that matter in our response to the report of the Parliamentary committee several years back, and we stand by that commitment. Meanwhile, I think that the honourable senator and all colleagues are aware that the Attorney General of Canada has taken the position that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground for discrimination. That position has stood up so far in the courts. Therefore, pending the kind of legislative amendments to which the honourable senator refers, the protection against discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation already exists in respect of people in the government sector.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): There is not the same serenity, however, in your caucus, but you cannot speak of that.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Is the implication of the government leader's response to the previous question that the Department of National Defense will then be opening the armed forces services to people regardless of sexual orientation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would have to inquire to see what the present status of that matter is.

Senator Marsden: Does that mean that the accounts we have been reading in the newspapers do not then adequately reflect the government's position on this matter?

Senator Murray: Accounts in the newspapers rarely do.

Senator Frith: That, sir, could turn out to be a two-edged sword.

EFFECT OF SEXUAL DISCRIMINATION ON ELIGIBILITY FOR VETERANS' BENEFITS

Hon. Jack Marshall: The Leader of the Government has indicated that amendments are being considered. In the report "Equality For All", recommendation No. 28 is that the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, which provide for benefit eligibility at different ages for men and women, be amended to provide that benefits for both male and female veterans be available at age 65. This is supported by Mr. Yalden. In annual reports over the past two years, the Human Rights Commission has stated that this is discrimination and should be corrected.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the fact that the honourable senator has brought this to our attention. I can assure him that that matter is under consideration in the course of the review that the Minister of Justice is conducting. However, I cannot anticipate the tabling of amendments themselves, so I cannot give an assurance to him or to the house as to what the amendments would contain. I do assure him that it is under consideration.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR BALANCED APPOINTMENTS TO REVIEW BOARD

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise me if the government would consider appointing the president of the Canadian Drug Manufacturers' Association to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board to counterbalance the appointment to the board of the president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada. Since the multinationals now have their president on the board reviewing the prices, I would like to see the generic companies have their president on the board as well to create a balance, so there is some kind of equality for the Canadian people.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take the honourable senator's question as a representation and convey it to my colleague Mr. Blais, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF AID TO INDONESIA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have another question which has nothing to do with drug policies, but has something to do with $30 million which the government no longer intends giving to Indonesia. I understand this is because of the atrocities that have taken place in Timor, resulting in as many as 50,000 deaths. However, at the same time, the government is not curtailing the amount of arms they are sending over there. Why are we not curtailing the guns and ammunition we are sending to that country, while we keep sending money to help the poor and the needy?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Canada closely controls the export of military goods to Indonesia to ensure that there is no reasonable risk that any proposed export of ours could be used against their own civilians. Export permits for offensive military equipment are being denied. Last year there were no Canadian military exports to Indonesia of any kind. This year, five export permits for non-offensive military equipment only have been issued.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senator, according to the minister's statement, that is Barbara McDougall, she says that $30 million in aid to Indonesia has been curtailed because of human rights issues, but further states that Monday's announcement did not include any ban on military sales. Therefore Ms McDougall will still continue to make money by selling the Indonesians ammunition with which to kill each other.

Senator Murray: That is exactly wrong, honourable senators. I have already placed the facts on the record. We have a system in this country for controlling exports of military goods, and we closely control those exports to Indonesia. Export permits to that country are being denied. There were no Canadian military exports to that country last year, and this year there were five permits issued, as I have just told the House, for non-offensive military equipment.

Senator Bonnell: I know the Leader of the Government will not have these figures in his head, but perhaps he could provide for us a list of the specific aid contained in the curtailed $30 million, and tell us what is in the list of military supplies they still intend to send over, and bring that back to us by way of a delayed answer. I will give him a few days to do that. He does not need to do it this afternoon; later this evening would be fine. There is no sense in procrastinating.

Meanwhile, since I am on my feet, since this $30 million will not now be going to the poor people of Indonesia, perhaps you could send it down to Prince Edward Island where they are having a very difficult time. Their budget is over $50 million in the red this year, and that $30 million could really help the economy of Prince Edward Island. We have already helped Quebec, and perhaps we will help the west. Let us think about the east, where the wise men came from.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMENT IN COMMITTEE REPORT—SCHEDULE OF COMMITTEE FOLLOWING CONSIDERATION OF BILL C-39

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, Senator David. He has presented today his committee's report, the second paragraph of which reads:

> Given the complexity of the subject matter of the bill . . .

Namely Bill C-39.

Given the complexity of the subject matter of the bill and the time given for its examination, the Committee will want to give further consideration to this matter in the early period of the legislation's application including the concern of the division of spouses' credits and matters relating to disability.

The basis for this question is Standing Order 24(1)(c), as a question relating to the activities of a committee.

Can Senator David explain what exactly the Committee's plans are? For instance, did the Committee set a date—in six months or a year from now—to give further consideration to this matter as mentioned in the second paragraph of the report? If not, can he tell us about the Committee's plans regarding the bill mentioned in that paragraph?

[Senator Bonnell.]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I will gladly answer Senator Frith's question. This morning, the Committee examined the said bill for some two and a half hours. The answers obtained from the Department of Finances and Health and Welfare officials were very clear and precise. They have enabled us to get a good understanding of the purpose of this bill. We have learned, in particular, that, unless this bill is passed immediately, the children's benefit cheques for those entitled to a $15 or $20 increase, from $131 to $150 which are due January 1st, will not be received on time.

The principles of the bill were approved by all provinces concerned several months ago. Yet, problems remain in this bill, including the two mentioned in the comment made with the approval without amendment of the bill that the committee would like to further examine.

We would like to undertake this study next year. To give you a specific answer, we think that six to nine months would be reasonable to cover these two issues, which does not mean that other issues would not be raised along the way.

Senator Frith: Unless I am mistaken, the committee intends to examine this aspect of the bill and complete its study in less than six months.

Senator David: Let's say by December 31, 1992.

Senator Frith: That means one year!

Senator David: More or less, yes.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have four delayed answers. The first is to a question asked on November 26 by Senator Frith on the status of Tibet. The next is to one of December 3, by Senator Lucier, on the visit of the Red Army hockey team to the Yukon. The third is in reply to a question of December 4, by Senator Bonnell, on the awarding of medals to the veterans of Korea, and the last answer is to a question asked on December 5 by Senator Macquarrie on the status of Mrs. Haddad.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I would like the answer on Tibet read, please. I might have some further questions about it.

CHINA-CANADA RELATIONS

STATUS OF TIBET

(Response to question raised by Hon. Royce Frith on November 26, 1991)

> The recent US congressional appropriations, which mentions Tibet, apparently does not necessarily constitute an official position of the US administration on the status of Tibet.
> No declaration that Tibet is an "occupied territory" has been made either by the US State Department, or by External Affairs and International Trade Canada.

In 1970, when Canada established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China (PRC), it recognized the PRC as the sole legitimate Government of China. Although Canada takes no position with regard to specific Chinese territorial claims, neither does it challenge them.

Canada has on many occasions registered its deep concern about the human rights situation in Tibet. Prime Minister Mulroney raised human rights issues during his visit to China in 1986. At the United Nations General Assembly in September of 1991, the Secretary of State for External Affairs met with Chinese Foreign Minister Qian Qichen and expressed Canada's concerns about human rights in Tibet. These concerns were reiterated by Minister of Agriculture Bill McKnight during his visit to China in October.

Our national statement to the UN Commission on Human Rights in February 1991 called for an improvement in the human rights situation in China, with specific reference to violations occurring in Tibet.

In August 1991, the UN Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities passed a resolution on Tibet for the first time.

Senator Frith: I would ask the minister to determine whether I am right in my understanding of that answer as it relates to the question I asked. I take it that the interpretation the Department of External Affairs gives to the document I provided is that it does not say that the United States recognizes Tibet as an occupied territory, and that in any event there will be no change in this government's attitude toward the question of whether or not Tibet is an occupied territory.

I will leave it at that. You will have to pursue it further.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

YUKON—VISIT OF SOVIET RED ARMY HOCKEY TEAM—SEIZURE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY BY CUSTOMS OFFICER

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Paul Lucier on December 3, 1991)

November 27, 1991, as a result of a local newspaper article, the superintendent of the Whitehorse, Yukon Customs Office became aware of an upcoming visit by the Red Army Hockey Team. The itinerary of the team was printed and reference was made to the sale of the merchandise.

November 28, 1991, the tour coordinator from the host team in Whitehorse was contacted regarding this visit and advised by Immigration that the Red Army Team could not sell any goods within Canada, but the host team could sell merchandise on their behalf. The customs superintendent also advised the coordinator of the duties and taxes applicable on the goods, and requested a list to assist with the expedited clearance of the goods.

November 29, 1991, the customs superintendent sent a fax to the host U.S. Team contact in Fairbanks, Alaska, where the Red Army Team was to play prior to entry into Canada, requesting that a list of goods to enter Canada for resale be forwarded by return fax. No reply was received to this request. Upon arrival in Whitehorse, the entire team was questioned, through a translator, regarding goods for resale within Canada. Customs was informed that the resale goods were left in Alaska due to previous information from immigration stating the players could not sell goods in Canada. Examination revealed only a few gifts, to be exchanged with the host team. These goods were released, as the value was nominal.

November 30, 1991, the customs inspector went shopping at the local mall. Upon entering the mall, she discovered the Red Army Team, selling merchandise which was noticeably different from the articles released at the time of arrival. The inspector immediately advised the customs superintendent, and after some discussion, the team was advised to close down the sale. All goods were returned to the hotel, and a complete inventory was done, establishing values and quantities. The decision was made not to seize the goods, but rather to collect the duties and taxes. The district manager was advised of the situation, and concurred with the decision. The Red Army Team representatives were advised of the various scenarios, and the action being taken. The representative apologized for the misunderstanding and agreed to pay the duties and taxes, along with special services. The inventory was completed and duties and taxes calculated. Payment in amount of $2,800.00 was collected. The value of the goods in Canadian funds was $10,000.00.

Local officers were prudent in avoiding any potential diplomatic incident by collecting duties and taxes, rather than applying seizure action. The Red Army Team appeared to be misinformed by coordinators from the U.S. Team and the Canadian Team, as all regulations were explained, yet this incident still occurred. Appropriate action was taken, in this instance, and the customs staff in Whitehorse should be commended for their use of sensitivity and responsiveness considering the circumstances.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AWARDING OF MEDALS TO VETERANS OF KOREAN CONFLICT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell on December 4, 1991)

On November 10, 1991, His Excellency the Right Honourable Raymond Hnatyshyn, the Governor General, presented the first of the Canadian Volunteer Service Medals for Korea to a gathering of 59 veterans here on Parliament Hill. This group of deserving men and women who served Canada and the United States during the Korean War in the early 1950s represented some 26, 000 eligible veterans and next of kin in all provinces across Canada. These medals must be applied for by veterans or families of deceased veterans.

The Chancellery at Rideau Hall, Government House, which has full responsibility for the production and distribution of this Canadian Volunteer Service Medal for Korea, is now in the process of mailing out the Medal to the remainder of those applicants across the country.

The process put in place by the Governor General's office requires all recipients to make an application and once it is verified, the medal is mailed to their homes. This process is similar to the one used for the First and the Second World War.

Veterans Affairs Canada has been in contact with the national headquarters of the Korea Veterans Association, the Royal Canadian Legion and the Army, Navy and Air Force Association in Canada suggesting that the local branches and units of these organizations consider arranging "presentation ceremonies" for these veterans.

LEBANON

STATUS OF CANADIAN HOSTAGE, MRS. HADDAD

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Heath Macquarrie on December 5, 1991)

Numerous interventions have been made in the past to locate Mrs. Haddad and the department of External Affairs' efforts are continuing. The assistance of the United Nations has been enlisted as well as that of governments in the Middle East and the United States.

The Government is requesting American officials to enquire of the recently released hostages if they have seen Mrs. Haddad or are aware of any information whatsoever about her.

Mrs. Haddad's son and members of the Canadian Committee to Free Henriette Haddad have publicly expressed satisfaction with the action taken by the Canadian Government.

CRIMINAL CODE
NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT
YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare moved the third reading of Bill C-30, to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I wish to make some brief comments on Bill C-30 prior to the conclusion of this debate. I mentioned at second reading that I had some concerns with the bill. I have since had the opportunity to consider those concerns and I am now willing to lend my support to this legislation. I would, however, like to put some thoughts on the record.

In particular, I want to make the Senate aware of the apprehensions of key witnesses before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee. Central to this act is an effort to reconcile the justice system's relationship with the provinces and their review boards. Bill C-30 regularizes the system by making review boards compulsory and allotting them specific responsibilities, taking over its determination role from the provincial lieutenant-governor. This is the aspect that will require ongoing review by the Justice Department. This aspect was dealt with by the Ontario Lieutenant-Governor Board of Review in its presentation before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee. Justice Callon, the board's chairperson, addressed what he characterized as "an omission in the legislation which makes it most difficult for our board to effectively carry out the scheme of the legislation".

Specifically, Mr. Al O'Marra, the board of review's legal counsel, offered an amendment to be added to section 11 as subsection (2). Essentially Mr. O'Marra and Justice Callon are asking for a provision to allow the review boards to order an assessment of the accused's mental state prior to conducting a hearing to render a disposition.

From my reading of the bill and my understanding of the Justice Department's position, it is not clear whether the Ontario board of review is correct in its assumption that, because there is no provision for the type of review they want in the legislation, they cannot conduct such a review. Honourable senators should know that the Ontario board currently does order such assessments but they are afraid that they will not be able to do so in the future without specific power to do so being prescribed by the present legislation.

The Ontario board's concerns point out the complexity of the issues at hand in this legislation. There is the Charter to consider. An amendment of the type the board suggests could lead to a conflict with the provisions of the Charter that were addressed in the Swain decision. With that in mind, the Department of Justice has chosen to go ahead with legislation as it stands, with the promise to evaluate its practical performance.

During the presentation of the Department of Justice to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee, officials assured committee members that they had studied the board's concerns and that they have been taken very seriously. The justice officials told the committee that the minister has undertaken to monitor the legislation very carefully over the next 12 to 18 months, with the option of going back to the drawing board to bring an amendment if the new system proves problematic. Furthermore, the Department of Justice has shown a willingness to work with Justice Callon and his review board to find solutions to his concerns.

As I mentioned in my comments during second reading, there is an important provision for parliamentary review included in this bill. This provision will afford some level of assurance that this bill, when it becomes law, will perform as intended. I believe that these undertakings are the appropriate course of action, given the complex nature of the legislation. Therefore, honourable senators, I am satisfied that this bill is satisfactory for the present time and should now pass unamended.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-1992

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (B) 1991-92).

Hon. Fernand Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, the Supplementary Estimates (B) are the second supplementary estimates for the 1991-92 fiscal year.

As usual, the Treasury Board Contingencies Vote (Vote 5) was used to provide temporary funding for many of the items to be voted in these supplementary estimates prior to the approval of the expenditures by Parliament.

Treasury Board officials supplied a list of the uses of this vote by department and program, showing total advances $336.4 million or 24 per cent of the amounts appropriated in Supplementary Estimates (B). The list is appended to this report.

Passage of the appropriation bill will have the effect of replenishing Treasury Board Vote 5 by the $336.4 million spent, thus restoring it to the $400 million level that was approved in 1991-92 Main Estimates. According to Treasury Board officials, this level, in turn, represents roughly 1 per cent of total voted appropriation in the Main Estimates.

However, the committee is concerned about the increasing use that is apparently being made of this vote to fund expenditures, particularly those unrelated to paylist requirements, that have not yet been approved by Parliament. At a later date in the fiscal year, the committee may undertake a study to determine if the uses of the vote have changed over the years and report on fundings to this House.

When reviewing these supplementary estimates, Committee members questioned the notion of a $400 million reduction in the authorized expenditures of the Department of National Defence being used to offset the $400 million appropriation in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to provide special assistance to Canadian farmers.

They noted as well that, according to the Minister of Finance, the remaining $400 million of this $800 million program is to be requested in the estimates for 1992-93. That appropriation, in turn, will be offset by several tax measures, including accelerated payment of taxes owing to the Department of National Revenue and payment of a percentage of taxes in dispute. Members were advised by officials of Treasury Board that these tax measures would not have been implemented had the assistance for farmers not been required. They were deemed necessary in order to keep projected expenditures within the fiscal framework.

Members expressed concern at the apparent precedent of funding an entire program out of lapses, which are not required for national defence purposes and accelerated tax collections that would have likely been justified even if the special farm assistance program had not been implemented.

Thank you, honourable senators. I apologize for my voice.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SYNFUELS PROJECT

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hays, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, be empowered to examine and report upon the Synfuels Project;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the aforesaid subject before the Committee during the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than June 30, 1992.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I wanted to discuss this matter with Senator Hays, who is Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources. I have had the opportunity to do so, and we have no objections to proceeding with this Inquiry. We understand that it is, in fact, in process now and that a good deal of the information has already been collected, so we have no objection to this study, and we are prepared to agree to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith, calling the attention of the Senate to the violence against women in Canadian society and the desirability of investigation of the subject by a Senate Committee.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I notice that the time for this Inquiry is still ticking along. The clock should not be running because the rule does not apply to that inquiry, its having been "proceeded with".

Order stands.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECTS OF GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. A. Olson, rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, December 3, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the economic chaos created by the government in its pursuit of lower inflation and high interest rates.

He said: Honourable senators, there is a great deal of chaos in the economy, such as higher and higher levels of unemployment, even rising above the projections that were made by the Minister of Finance earlier this year when he brought down his budget. I believe that the unemployment rate stands at 10.3 per cent today.

There are a number of issues I would like to raise. However, in the 15-minute limit I have, I wish to focus my remarks on the debt and the debt service charge situation that has arisen in Canada because of the monetary policy that has been pursued during the past few months by the government and its main agency, the Bank of Canada.

It is true that interest rates have come down somewhat in the last six months.

Senator Di Nino: Somewhat?

Senator Olson: In fact, quite a lot. Honourable senators opposite should recognize that the damage done to the economy along the way is still there. Many people, including some senior economists working in various institutes and banks, seem to be somewhat puzzled by what has happened now that interest rates have come down as much as has been pointed out, and wonder why that does not stimulate the economy to get moving again. It seems to me that there are some new factors in the economic and financial structure that have contributed to this situation very significantly.

The problem is that individuals, small businesses and large corporations are still feeling the consequences of the monetary policy that was followed by this government and its agencies some time ago. At the moment, I suggest to honourable senators that neither the government nor its agencies seem to know what to do about it, although that could be an overstatement of the situation because even if they do know what to do about it, which I doubt, they are not willing to do anything.

A few days ago the Minister of Finance was quoted as stating:

> We're not changing course. I mean the course that we're on is producing results and that's why we're going to stay the course.

That is the answer that one recives from the government when it is asked if it is willing to make some changes in the management of the economy, particularly the monetary policy, to correct some of the high unemployment levels, the distress and, in many cases, the downright privation that has followed as a result.

It is not only me who believes that that should be done. I do not believe that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has ever publicly criticized the government on its economic policies, particularly its monetary policy, in the past. However, this is what that body stated a few days ago:

> The national economic crisis is upon us. Canada's real growth performance will fall far short of the Federal Government's forecasts.

That was contained in a news release from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce published on November 21, 1991.

Honourable senators, there are two things that are different now than have ever been the case in the past with respect to where the monetary policy has led this country and why the economy is not making any reasonable recovery. There were one or two months when there was movement upwards of something less than 1 per cent, or about 1 per cent. I suggest that the reason consumers are not rushing into retail stores to buy more merchandise of any form, even for the Christmas season, is because of the debt service charges that they already have loaded upon them.

I do not think it is news to anyone to state that if an individual, a small business or a large corporation has to suffer debt service charges that go along with an overhang of debt, there is one thing to do and that is to get out of debt. All resources are diverted to reducing the amount of debt rather than borrowing more money simply because the interest rates have come down somewhat.

I recently checked these numbers and the amount of outstanding consumer credit in 1986 was $63.125 billion. By 1987, while this monetary policy was being followed, it went up to $72.539 billion; in 1988 it rose to $82.307 billion; in 1989 it had gone up to $90.881 billion; last year, consumer credit peaked at an all time high of $95.636 billion. That was the same time that the prime rate peaked at 14.75 per cent because of the actions of the Bank of Canada.

Honourable senators, just so there is no misunderstanding, the kind of consumer debt that I am talking about here does not include debt owed on credit cards. This is just consumer credit for all and various purposes other than that. As a matter of fact, the outstanding balances on credit cards, in 1990-91, have gone up to about $13 billion, too.

The outstanding business credit in billions of dollars in 1986 was not available to us. In 1987, it was $309 billion. This has now gone up to $402 billion in 1991. That, of course, is the level for the first nine months.

The reason I am quoting all these figures, honourable senators, is because in my view, and in the view of a lot of people I have talked to, there is no possibility that people will go out and borrow, make bank loans and do all those other things to obtain some funds so that they can start to speed up the economy with either capital investment by business or by consumer spending in the retail areas. That is because they cannot meet the service debt or the debt charges that they have now.

The other thing that I think is important to recognize in this situation is that Canadians do not have any confidence that the economy will get better. There was a time not very long ago — and I think probably furniture companies were the best example, but there were others — where companies thought they could get consumers in to buy things because there would be no down payment and no interest and no payments for three or four months. Even that does not work any more. People have been caught with that once or twice. If you have been caught in a situation where your income did not change so that you could meet those payments when they did, in fact, come due about three or four months down the road, you do not do it again. You get very shy of doing it again.

Honourable senators, if you look in the paper now, you can find some of those offers where there will be no down payment for furniture—other things too, but particularly furniture—and no payments and no interest. Now we are stretched out to September, 1992. Some furniture company is offering those kinds of terms because no-one is willing to take a chance that their income will be such that they can cope with the debt service charges and the payments if they come any earlier than that.

Honourable senators, I have to be careful here. 15 minutes goes by so quickly you hardly know you got started. However, there are some other distortions in the numbers that you look at. One of them is that in November alone there were 45,000 people who stopped looking for jobs. Those people do not show up on the statistics of the unemployed. As a matter of fact, Statistics Canada reported even this week that job prospects are at their bleakest in seven years. That just about spans the time that this government has been in office. In other owrds, the job situation is the worst that it has ever been, senators, and an indication, of course, that there has been a steady deterioration ever since 1984. When this government gets in office, they make a mess of everything.

Hon. Pat Carney: I was wondering, Senator Olson, if you would permit a question at this time.

Senator Olson: I will have a hard time getting my speech finished in 15 minutes if I do, but very well.

Senator Carney: You have outlined the problem as you see it, but I have yet to hear of your solution. I have not heard any alternative proposed by you. I was wondering whether you were getting to that portion of your speech where you are outlining your strategy to improve the circumstances you describe.

Senator Olson: Now, if that is not a happy thought. That is the same excuse that every Minister of Finance has used since these Tories came into office. I might say it is unique, because it has never been used before. When Mr. Wilson was the Minister of Finance, every time he got cornered on the mismanagement that he had made of the Canadian economy and his monetary policy and everything else, he turned to the person and said, "Well, what would you have done?"

Senator Carney: What is your answer?

Senator Olson: The answer is that when you are in government, you have the facilities to examine all kinds of alternatives. The Minister of Finance has about 4,000 people to help him design his systems. You expect me, one person, to be able to give you a complete, detailed, better plan?

I am pointing out to you what people have on their minds. They have watched this government, and they do not like it. They do not like the mismanagement of economic affairs in this country over the last seven years.

Senator Carney: What about the 21 per cent interest when Marc Lalonde was finance minister?

Senator Olson: I will tell you something—

Senator Carney: Answer the question.

Senator Olson: I can tell you something else about that 21 per cent that you are talking about. The Canadian people are not listening any more to that lousy excuse that somehow it was the Liberals that created these economic problems that we have now. I tell you this without any reservation whatever: If you believe that the Canadian people are buying that argument any more, you are dead wrong. They want some results from this government in the management of their monetary policy and the subsequent economic policy that comes from it.

In any event, we know that the junior Minister of Finance, Mr. John McDermid, says, "We expect conditions to be much better in the future." That is all the hope that he gives.

Finance Minister Don Mazankowski admitted on November 22 that the jobless rate has gone up to 10.3 per cent. It went up to 10.3 per cent, even though he had predicted that it would be about 10 per cent earlier in the year.

Honourable senators, the sad part of all of this is that people have no confidence that the situation will change. One of the largest corporations in Alberta, a multi-billion dollar corporation, is now in the process of downsizing. They are selling off assets that they know are good assets, or usually good assets, because they cannot cope with the debt service charges. That is happening to all the middle-sized companies in Alberta. By the way, we are told that Alberta is better off than any other province in Canada, and this is how bad it is there.

This is the kind of cynicism that we get from the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and I quote:

> The fact that things don't turn around very rapidly is, of course, disappointing . . . .

It is disappointing to him, but it is devastating to a great many other people who have lost their businesses and have gone into bankruptcy in record numbers. I want to finish the quotation.

> —but it is not something to become overly distressed about.

Honourable senators, I would not be distressed for a guy who has had his salary range increased by about 100 per cent in the last 18 months, but I will tell you it is pretty distressing to some of the farmers that I know who have had to pay 14 and up to 15 and 16 per cent interest not so very long ago. I admit the rates are down now, but the farmers are still carrying the burden of all the changes in the monetary policy that caused them to pay interest charges that were more than 50 per cent in excess of what they were—

• (1530)

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Olson, according to the rule, I must warn you that you may have 30 seconds, unless honourable senators wish to waive the rule, allowing you to finish your remarks.

Senator Simard: Give him two minutes.

Senator Olson: It will not take more than two minutes. I will take but a few.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Senator Carney: No.

Senator Olson: You said two minutes, did you not? I don't have two minutes? All right, I will have to raise another matter.

In the meantime I want to say that if anyone is so naive as to think that the actions of this government and the Bank of Canada will change, and as a result, kick-start the economy, they had better start to look at some of the facts. Some of the facts are, as I pointed out, the problems that are involved in that situation.

If I had more time, I would indicate why corporations, even large ones, will not borrow money even at these interest rates. It is because they have no confidence that there will not be enough economic activity resulting in the kind of income they need to service their debts when they come to them in the future.

Senator Frith: Maybe if you beg and crawl, they will throw you a crumb of another minute.

Senator Olson: If they are using these rules on me, that is fine. I will find ways of getting around them tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Everett.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak on this matter now, I will adjourn the debate in my name.

However, since we are at about the end of today's business, so far as I know, I wonder if whoever refused to grant leave for Senator Olson to continue would like to reconsider. He is making a most interesting speech. With respect, I think it would be wise to give him leave to continue—

Senator Carney: No.

Senator Everett: —and to conclude his remarks. I wonder if that senator or senators who refused leave would reconsider.

Senator Carney: No.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I appreciate the offer from Senator Everett. He can only make the suggestion. It takes unanimous consent to waive the rules. I will not ask for unanimous consent because I do not believe a senator should stand up here at the grace of other senators. I want to stand and make a speech about something that is on the minds of my people. It is my right. Senators opposite have wrecked our rights to do that. I must find a way around that and, believe me, I will.

On motion of Senator Everett, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

WINTER FISHING AT THE ENTRANCE TO THE GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, December 5, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to a matter of concern for our fellow citizens of the Atlantic Provinces, namely winter fishing at the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

He said: Honourable senators, I will be brief and I do not think that I will have to ask for two or three minutes more.

On December 5, I gave the Senate notice that I would raise the subject of winter fishing by the deepsea fleet at the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Before I read my statement, I would like to read to you a letter that I sent today to the minister and told him I would table.

Ottawa, December 10, 1991

Hon. John Crosbie
Minister of Fisheries and Oceans
House of Commons
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0A6

Mr. Minister:

Here is a copy of a statement that I made in the Senate on December 10.

With the support of corrected data from the Atlantic Fisheries Scientific Advisory Committee (AFSAC) on overfishing by the deepsea fleet and considering the need to preserve employment and income in the inshore fishing industry, I recommend that your predecessors' commitment be respected and that winter fishing by the deepsea fleet be forbidden in sector 4Vn.

Best wishes for Christmas and the New Year.

Yours truly,

JEAN-MAURICE SIMARD
Senator for Edmundston

Honourable senators, by way of explanation, I would add that the coalition of inshore and midshore groundfishing fleets of the Gulf of St. Lawrence brings together inshore and midshore fishermen from Quebec, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton and New Brunswick. It is probably the first time that a coalition of this size has been set up in this industry in Canada. This should show there is a problem, which I will try to explain to you in the next few minutes.

So on November 18, 1991, a coalition of inshore and midshore groundfishing fleets of the Gulf of St. Lawrence asked the Hon. John Crosbie, Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, to close winter fishing by the deepsea fleet at the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, specifically in zone 4Vn.

This request, which I find very well-developed, states the efforts made by all stakeholders in the fishing industry, especially the Gulf fishermen, to replenish the ground fish stocks which were depleted toward the end of the 1970s.

Great many sacrifices were made in hope of averting a repeat of this crisis. Fisheries and Oceans Canada, in co-operation with the inshore and mid-shore fleets operating in the southern part of the Gulf, phased in new ways of managing fisheries in order to streamline and stabilize this industry.

I see that Senator Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour) is with us at this time. I think he can attest to the efforts that have been made by many of the interest groups and the federal government has certainly worked closely with advisory committees to promote better management methods so that everybody's job can be protected: plant employees and owners, as well as inshore and mid-shore fishermen of the provinces affected.

In spite of these efforts, the cod catch in the Gulf of St. Lawrence keeps going down. This year's harvest is particularly disastrous. Once again, the cod industry in the southern part of the Gulf will be doomed unless difficult political and management choices are made immediately.

At the present time, the fishermen are seriously concerned about the proposal made by the offshore fleet for an overall increase in the total allowable catch for 1992. Under the present circumstances, such a demand placed on cod stocks is simply out of the question. Short term gains called for by the offshore fleet will be possible only at the price of sustainable development for the whole ground-fish industry.

Honourable senators, to force the offshore fleet to refrain from fishing in zone 4Vn during the winter will reduce the catch in that zone by approximately 4,000 metric tons. The offshore fleet, however, is at liberty to supplement their total catch by harvesting their quotas in zones that border upon 4Vn while being within territorial waters. In other words, to close winter fishing to offshore fishermen in zone 4Vn in no way reduces their ability to maintain the same catch levels but contributes significantly to the protection of groundfish stocks, and therefore protects our inshore fishermen.

The scientific advisory committee on Atlantic fisheries has found and documented overfishing by the offshore fleet that totals 11,700 metric tons: that is 7,700 metric tons in 1990 and 4,000 tons in 1991. The overfishing of total allowable catches in 1990 is the direct result of the fishing effort of the offshore fleet, both within and outside the Gulf. The same kind of overfishing took place this year. In my opinion, we cannot afford to wait to see the consequences of such a practice. Moreover, the coalition documented some inaccuracies in the last report of the scientific advisory committee regarding groundfish stocks.

The corrections made indicate that the situation of these stocks is more critical than was shown in the last report. The committee is considering issuing a correction. However, we must act before it is too late.

Honourable senators, the fishermen's coalition represents more than 7,000 members from various groups in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec and Newfoundland. Of these 7,000 members, more than 3,000 are active in cod fishing within the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The catches of these 3,000 fishermen provide jobs for more than 6,000 workers in fish plants. Thus, there is a lot at stake for our Atlantic workers.

Honourable senators, the fishermen's coalition advocates four measures which, given the present situation, must be taken immediately.

1. That at least winter fishing by the deepsea fleet in zone 4Vn at the mouth of the Gulf cease.

2. That scientists accelerate data collection on winter catches in zone 4Vs and that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans take the necessary corrective action.

3. That efforts to conserve, protect and replenish fish stock in zone 4T be intensified.

4. That the Department of Fisheries and Oceans take compensatory measures until the stock is reconstituted.

In closing, honourable senators, I urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to receive positively the recommendations from the fishermen's coalition to safeguard the base of the fishing industry, i.e. to preserve the stocks, groundfish and cod, and thus safeguard the livelihood of thousands of small-scale fishermen on the Atlantic coast.

I ask you senators to read the excellent document presented in the form of a request by the fishermen's coalition, of which I now table a copy in the Senate, with your permission.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): You have completely talked me out of any compassion I ever had for anyone fishing at the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Ssenators: Agreed.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, is Senator Simard's document in both official languages?

Senator Simard: Yes.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I will move adjournment of the debate, but before doing so formally, I want to congratulate my friend Senator Simard on his position and offer him my support.

On motion of Senator Thériault, debate adjourned.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

CANADA

COMMEMORATION OF PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am sure that when we came to Parliament Hill this morning, we all noticed that on the courtesy flag-pole there is flying the Royal Union flag, often called the Union Jack, an ensign of which I am very fond. As every schoolboy knows, as Macaulay would say, it is basically the flag of a free Scotland with a couple of other crosses superimposed.

The reason it is flying today is a very important one. December 11, 1931, is the day when the Statute of Westminster was proclaimed, which statute underscored—or legitimized—the independence of this country. As the then Prime Minister, R. B. Bennett said in moving the motion:

> I do so with the utmost pleasure because I realize that it is the culmination of the long, long effort that has been made since we were a colony, to become the self-governing dominion that we now are.

There are people who think that "constitutionitis" is a disease of the present generation. It is not. It has been a long, long story from Borden down through to the present time.

This was a magnificent day, when, within the then-existing empire or Commonwealth, it was decreed, agreed, and legitimized that the then-overseas dominions—and indeed all the dominions—were autonomous and in no way subordinate one to another.

My great professor Arthur Lower who, if I were Saint Paul, would be my Gamaliel, used to say that, if Canada had an independence day, it would be December 11. He said:

> The Statute of Westminster came as close as was practicable without revolutionary scissors to legislating the independence of the 'Dominions'. There is good ground for holding December 11, 1931 as Canada's Independence Day, for on that day she became a sovereign state.

I look at the flag, and I like it. But that is not the flag that should be there today. In 1965 in the lower house, I departed from my party's view and supported a resolution by Réal Caouette suggesting that the Canadian Prime Minister should go to the Commonwealth meeting and propose the establishment of a Commonwealth flag, just as we have one for the United Nations and for NATO. I suggest that that is the flag that should be up there.

With hope in my heart, I will write the present Prime Minister and suggest that to him, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

MEETING OF ATLANTIC PREMIERS

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, I will go along with my good colleague from Prince Edward Island about the flag. However, I have a much more important issue than changing the flag at this particular time.

It is that the four Atlantic premiers are meeting in Halifax to discuss the economy of the region. The Prime Minister of Canada has refused an invitation to attend, or even to talk about the economy of Atlantic Canada.

Senator Barootes: It is not true.

Senator Bonnell: If it is not true, then why does he refuse to go?

Senator Carney: This is not question period.

Senator Barootes: He does not attend sectoral meetings. He is a national Prime Minister.

Senator Bonnell: That is the reason.

Senator Barootes: He doesn't attend regional meetings.

Senator Bonnell: I guess we are only a section now. We have lost the province. We are now down to a section, according to Senator Barootes. I thought we were the Atlantic area, a region of Canada, and just as important as any other region.

The Prime Minister should make every effort to consult with those premiers. They are the first ministers of their provinces. He happens to be the first minister of Canada, for a short time. If he does not negotiate with those people, I am quite sure their support on other matters might fall away. I know that the premiers are now saying that they will not bring constitutional matters into the economy, or the economy into constitutional matters. But keep snubbing them, keep rubbing them the wrong way, keep ignoring them, keep cutting back on them, and I would say we are likely to end up with them not fighting very hard to hold this country together with the leadership we have in this country today.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1991-92

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1991.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday next, December 13, 1991.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, December 12, 1991, I will move:

> That the membership list of the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be increased to include 15 members and that section 87(1)(m) of the Rules be suspended for the duration of this session.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some petitions to table. These petitions state and call upon us, the members of the Senate and of the other place, the true representatives of the people, to do our utmost to counter the new goods and services tax and ask for elections to be called immediately.

Today, these petitions are from New Brunswick. I have four of them signed by 81 citizens from Bas-Caraquet, Brantville, Maisonnette, Pokemouche, Rivière-du-Portage, Shediac Bridge and Saint Sauveur.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 2,397 residents of the province of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Windsor, Cambridge, Hamilton, Thunder Bay and Terrace Bay.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 4,364 residents of the province of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Hamilton, Cornwall, Ottawa, Niagara Falls, North Bay, Toronto, Belleville, Owend Sound, Kingston, St. Catharines, Pickering, Mississauga, Midland, Rexdale, Downsview and Scarborough.

Do we have a page strong enough to come and get these 6,500 names?

• (1410)

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have some petitions here with a few hundred names on them. These petitions are signed by aboriginal people, largely Indian, from various parts of the country, who are in opposition to the GST. These petitions were passed on to me under the auspices of the Association of Iroquois and Allied Indians from London, Ontario.

The signatories to these petitions are from Southampton, Ontario; Fort Nelson, B.C.; Surrey, B.C., Nelson House, Manitoba; Winnipeg, Manitoba; London, Ontario and Muncey, Ontario. They are in the correct form as required by the Senate.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table 202 petitions from veterans across the country in support of the report of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs,"It's Almost Too Late". The petitions are far-reaching, including some from Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There are many from Ste. Anne's Hospital in Quebec, the only hospital remaining under the auspices of the Department of Veterans Affairs. Some of the signatories are patients there, many of them merchant seamen, who are wondering why they have to wait so long to be recognized.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, may I have leave to revert to Notices of Motions?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): That depends on what you want to move.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Frith: Would Senator Nurgitz explain why he wants leave?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. I seek leave to present a motion for the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to sit this afternoon at four o'clock. I take it if I had leave to do that at that time you would then ask for an explanation as to whether it should be given; if I could get to that point.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You mean you will raise the matter again at four o'clock? I am prepared to give leave for to you present it, but I am not prepared to tell you I will agree.

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a), I move:

> THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at 4 o'clock in the afternoon today, Wednesday, December 11, 1991, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

I trust that my friends opposite wish to hear an explanation. There are two matters before the committee. One of them is the consideration of a letter that has been drafted. Both sides have consulted with respect to urging the Minister of Justice to proceed more swiftly than originally proposed on the second phase of the gun control legislation. The committee believed that it was in the interests of all concerned that the bill receive speedy passage, but it did not want to have the comments not made, even though they were assisting or cooperating in speedy passage. It was agreed that the committee draft a strongly worded letter to be sent to the minister, the idea being that if approved later today, we could send the letter and make it public tomorrow so that it would be a matter of public record. I would do it during Senators' Statements.

As well, the committee will consider Bill C-3. There are a large number of witnesses, all of whom would love to be able to coordinate their presentations. We need the certainty of time.

Senator Molgat: I thank Senator Nurgitz for his explanation. I understand the House of Commons will adjourn tomorrow; the last information I have is that it is adjourning tomorrow. On that basis, it is important to get that letter to the minister before the House adjourns. Under those circumstances, I agree to leave being granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

QUEBEC FLAG—BROADCASTING OF BROCKVILLE INCIDENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a written question, Question No. 50 on the Order Paper, standing in the name of Senator Molgat.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What is the delayed answer?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is about an incident regarding the Quebec flag.

Senator Molgat: Is it a lengthy response?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No.

Senator Molgat: I wonder if you would be prepared to read it into the record.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): It goes on the record, but read it viva voce.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The question has to do with an event regarding the treatment of the Quebec flag in Brockville, Ontario, in September 1989, which was shown on the CBC and picked up by other media. The answer is as follows:

> This matter has been brought to the attention of the Canadian Radio, Television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) and to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC). We are informed as follows:
> Broadcasting regulations require retention of broadcast tapes for only 28 days following the date of broadcast. Unless a complaint is received within that period, tapes are then allowed to be destroyed. Given that usage of taped material which is the subject of this inquiry took place several months after the initial incident, and that usage was more than a year ago, there is no practical way for the Commission to ascertain how many showings took place.
> CBC records are not maintained in a fashion that makes it possible to extract the specific information required to respond to this question. The records do indicate, however, that neither the CBC's French nor its English network carried reports of the flag incident in Brockville at the time it occurred in September 1989 on any national network news programs, i.e. The National, Le Téléjournal, etc. Tape of the incident was, however, relayed at that time to all CBC owned and operated stations across the country as part of the regular daily news feed of items provided by the network for inclusion in local/regional news programs at the option of the individual stations.
> Several months after the events in Brockville, at the time when it was becoming obvious that the Meech Lake Accord might not be ratified by its deadline, the Brockville item resurfaced in the general media throughout the country. It was cited or discussed in various magazine articles, newspaper and radio reports, and clips from it were used to illustrate points in television reports about Meech-related stories and issues. During that period from February through June 1990, it is likely that CBC's national network news programs, French and English, carried clips from the original Brockville tape at one time or another.
>
> On November 5 and 6, 1990, The Journal broadcast a special two-part documentary entitled "The Brockville Incident". The program documented how a single incident, virtually unnoticed at the time it happened, evolved into a major symbol in a national debate.

● (1420)

Senator Molgat: I thank Senator Lynch-Staunton very much for reading the answer.

Was the Brockville incident, which was broadcast on CBC, also broadcast on Radio-Canada in the French version?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: As I recall, it was, and repeatedly.

Senator Frith: It was in French? Would you make sure of that?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I know that I saw it more than once.

Senator Molgat: I wonder if you might give us the details as to when it was shown on Radio-Canada?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If the records are still available, certainly.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that of Senator Molgat's.

It would be interesting to know not only how many times it was repeated but the names of the programs on which it was used. It was my observation that it was not used exclusively in what I would call information, news and public affairs programs.

CANADA PENSION PLAN
FAMILY ALLOWANCE ACT
OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJEOURNED

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton, for Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, moved the third reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, before this bill receives third reading, I wonder if I may take this opportunity to speak for my side on the bill.

My party has agreed that delaying the payment provided through this bill for children of people with disabilities would be unacceptable, and indeed I would not want to contribute to such a delay.

On the other hand, the bill has grave problems in at least two areas which I believe the Senate should consider.

Honourable senators will have read Bill C-280, which has been received in this chamber, and which the government is not very fond of, but which got through the House of Commons, and so it should have. Bill C-280 amends the Canada Pension Plan, as does the bill that is under consideration now. Bill C-280 amends it to provide additional protection for the disabled.

I recommend this bill to you, but the moral of the bill and the process through which it has come are also very important. Bill C-39, the bill we are being asked to pass now, neglected the situation of people with disabilities in ways it should not have done. There is a time limit on applying for disability pensions, the only CPP benefit which has that stipulation. How could Bill C-39 pass the other place without this being changed? Thankfully, Bill C-280 provides us with an opportunity to rectify that situation.

No such rectifying legislation has come from the Commons to change the situation of another group of Canadians who are badly disadvantaged by the current CPP scheme. I am referring to old women living in poverty. It used to be that the largest group of people in poverty in Canada were the old people. The guaranteed income supplement and the old age pension and the CPP have improved that situation. However, if you look at poverty statistics in this country, there is still a very large number of people in old age in poverty. The majority of them are single women, unattached women, divorced or widowed women, but most particularly divorced women.

All senators are familiar with the financial constraints that arise on the situation of divorce. Indeed, senators ought to be, because the Senate of Canada was one of the first and early great advocates of divorce reform in Canada, principally I believe because the Senate had to pass individual divorce cases for many years. An entire Senate committee was devoted to hearing the details of divorce cases which were then passed individually as Acts of Parliament. The history of the Senate and its concern for divorce is an interesting one. It illustrates the extent to which senators, of both parties, of all religious backgrounds, and of both genders, urged divorce reform in the 1950s and 1960s, and indeed much earlier.

Having achieved considerable divorce reform in 1968 and subsequently, and property law reform in the provinces as a consequence thereof, we come to the economic situation of the spouses upon divorce and separation now.

There is still in this country a generation of women who did not enter the paid labour force for the same number of years as men and who did not accrue benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. In general, the expectation was that they would retire with their husbands. Both of them would then be supported by pension arrangements, including pension benefits from CPP. However, if a divorce occured, the husband's pension credits went with the husband, or rather the earner's credits went with the person who had earned them, and that was almost always the husband. The wives were left without those pension benefits.

After many years of agitation, the situation was changed so that CPP credits could be split upon divorce. This is important in two instances. It is important for the spouse who has not accumulated pension credits to survive in his or her old age, but it is particularly important when the partner with the CPP credits remarries and upon his or her death leaves those credits with the new spouse. Even during life, they can split those credits with a new spouse. The discarded spouse, as that person is unfortunately referred to, is left without those pension credits.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Where is the person referred to as a "discarded spouse"?

Senator Marsden: In the official literature, you will find "the discarded spouse".

For all intents and purposes, the people with the CPP benefits are men. Those left without sufficient support in their old age are women.

We are told in a recent article published by Statistics Canada that younger women, women generally speaking younger than I, who enter the labour force and who work on average as many years as men, will not suffer the same fate as their older sisters or their mothers. However, the labour force participation rate of women even in middle age and higher is still not as high as that of younger women, or indeed of men in general. Many women over the age of 50 and older are highly vulnerable to old age poverty.

• (1430)

The situation is exacerbated by the fact that, while CPP credits may be split upon divorce, this is not automatic and it must be requested at Health and Welfare Canada. Until 1987 one could only request the splitting of pension credits for three years after divorce. In 1987 the situation was improved so that there is no longer a time limit on the application. However, as with so many other benefits, especially for people in poverty, it is not good enough to make the benefit available. People have to be aware of it. Then they have to follow through and ensure they get it. This is one of the concerns we all had with respect to the GST rebates. It is not good enough that they are there; you also have to do the paper work to get them.

The experience in Canada has been that many lawyers do not counsel their clients upon divorce to request a splitting of the CPP credit or, even worse, they encourage the wife to trade off CPP credits for the future against immediate benefits that may be more important to them at that time, such as funds for looking after children or some kind of property settlement on a house. In the case of people who are not married under the law but who are co-habiting, this situation may even be exacerbated. That is because divorce is a provincial jurisdiction and the information does not flow to authorities issuing CPP credits. There is a Central Divorce Registry but there is no such registry for common law or co-habitation situations.

We know that the take-up rate for CPP pension credit-splitting is low. Between 1978 and 1990, there were half a million divorces in Canada but only 22,572 pension credit-splitting cases recorded by Health and Welfare Canada, and that only includes those people who were legally married. It does not include the many relations that were common law.

This situation of the difficulties with CPP pension credit-splitting has been known for a very long time. People have been making representations on this for a very long time. The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women continuously makes representations. The National Council of Welfare, women's groups and other groups concerned with poverty across the country are always talking to the government about the pension credit-splitting issue. After all, either all citizens should have the right to pay into a pension fund such as CPP or, if there is a wage-earning spouse responsible for the family, then those years in which such an arrangement is agreed to should be reflected in the benefits of old age.

What makes one so angry about Bill C-39 is that this was precisely an opportunity to put into effect an automatic credit-splitting provision. I quote from a report of the National Council of Welfare called "Women in Poverty Revisited" published in the summer of 1990. They say:

> Splitting of CPP credits could be made automatic by using the information collected by the Central Divorce Registry of the federal Justice Department. The Quebec Pension Plan already has such a system. QPP administrators get copies of divorce judgments and automatically split the credits of ex-spouses. This is much better than under the Canada Pension Plan, but it is not perfect. Quebec couples, like those in Saskatchewan, can still decide not to have their credits split.

This bill, which does quite a few things to improve split credits, does not put in any kind of automatic or easy registration system. While the bill amends subsection 55 in a variety of ways, it does not ensure that credit-splitting is automatically done. It improves and clarifies the situation with respect to credit- splitting but does virtually nothing for the majority of the women who are not pension-wise and who, especially because divorce is likely to occur at a much younger age than one normally contemplates retirement, are not thinking about the consequence to their old age.

Honourable senators, to put it in simple terms, I must say I think it is disgusting that this bill has received such speedy passage through both chambers of Parliament. The practice of putting together in a single piece of legislation a "sweetener", such as an additional benefit for children with parents with disabilities, with a great many other changes that are inadequate or less palatable is an unfortunate one. In fact, if we were reasonable people, we would divide this bill; pass the section dealing with children of the disabled; and retain the sections dealing with subsection 55 until we had brought some backbone to those provisions.

I am quite surprised at the lack of concern shown, especially in the Senate. Surely, everyone is aware of women living in poverty in old age, and particularly of the poverty of those who have divorced, especially those who have divorced at an age over 50 or 55. Such divorces are no longer uncommon. While they may be a relief to the individuals involved, they lead to an extraordinary degree of poverty among single women of advanced years who must be supported from the public purse in other ways. Since the Senate cannot escape its reputation as being a chamber of older people, perhaps it behooves us to look especially at the interests of older people.

If we give passage to Bill C-39 this afternoon, we will have allowed an important opportunity to slip by. The bill was sent to our committee only last Friday. It was dealt with in this chamber only last Thursday. Because the schedule was changed on short notice, many of us were prevented from attending sessions which we might otherwise have attended. This is not a partisan criticism because Senator Kinsella and others on the Social Affairs committee and, indeed, I am sure, the chairman of the Social Affairs committee share concerns about the rapidity with which this bill had to go through.

In my view, this is simply not good enough. The bill is not good enough. Its insensitivity and lack of concern about a matter that has been public knowledge for years is not good enough. The often-discussed concern about poverty will only be dealt with if we pay attention to the laws we are passing and to the details and opportunities of those laws. As you can tell, honourable senators, I am very unhappy about this matter. If there are others who share my views, perhaps we can take some better action in studying this matter once more.

The situation is quite clear. Divorce leads to financial inequity. Financial inequity leads to poverty, mostly among older women, and there is a remedy. CPP credits can be split automatically on divorce or the break up of a common law relationship. It is an administrative matter. It requires no additional expenditure of funds. It helps to reduce poverty in old age. It makes the system more fair. It recognizes the contribution of spouses, both those in the paid labour force and those who work at home. It maintains the flexibility of divorce. I urge the Senate to take better action than it is about to do.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I was at the committee meeting yesterday that was mentioned by Senator Marsden. From the point of view of the bill, I was interested in what was said by the witnesses who appeared before that committee. I was surprised to learn that consultation on the bill started back in 1987.

I raised a few questions, which makes me wonder about the procedures in Parliament and what has happened since the consultation process started back in 1987. The matter was discussed with the provinces. It came before cabinet, and there was a consultation paper which was put before Parliament. That was discussed. Then, all of a sudden, the night before we read the bill, it comes to us and we are supposed to deal with it in its full extent having to do with Old Age Security, family allowances and the Canada Pension Plan.

I would like to read parts of the unrevised transcript of the proceedings of the committee. I asked the following questions:

> Senator Marshall: From the point of view of procedure, this was all agreed to by the provinces, it went before cabinet and then they prepared a bill. Where do the Members of Parliament who are elected by the people come into the process? Is it only after the bill is introduced?

Mr. Fortier, whose title I have forgotten, replied:

> No. With respect to the survivor's reform, Mr. Epp . . .

I presume he was talking about the Hon. Jake Epp, who was the minister at the time.

> . . . presented a series of proposals in a consultation paper that was referred to Parliament for study. There was a study carried out by Parliament and a report prepared by Parliament on the proposals.
> Senator Marshall: By Parliament?
> Mr. Fortier: By a special committee.
> Senator Marshall: I am just thinking about the Constitution and the responsibilities of the Senate vis-à-vis the House of Commons and who really makes the decisions in Parliament.

[Senator Marsden.]

> Are you aware of a Bill C-280, a Private Member's Bill, which concerns disabled persons?
> Mr. Fortier: Yes.
> Senator Marshall: Was that bill an afterthought by an individual Member of Parliament? Did Mr. Redway consult with you or the department on the bill? It has to do with disabled persons and the time for them to receive benefits.
> Mr. Fortier: Mr. Redway was concerned about people who . . . do not apply on time in order to receive a disability pension. The time may lapse because, having not applied on time, they no longer meet the recent provisions under the eligibility conditions for disability benefits.
> Senator Marshall: Was the department aware of this before the bill was presented?

I remind honourable senators that this is a bill on which consultation started in 1987.

> Mr. Fortier: There were representations made to the department. One of the ways to analyze proposals made to the department is to refer a specific issue to the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Board, which was done in this particular case. We thought that we should obtain the advice of the advisory board in this case.
> The advisory board reviewed the proposal and concluded that something should be done for those who are not capable of applying because of illness.

Why was something not done since 1987 or since the Honourable Alan Redway saw the need? I then asked:

> I understand what you are saying. What I am getting at is this. How come, after all this consultation process which started in 1987, another matter is forgotten and these disabled persons are not able to apply for their pensions?
> Mr. Fortier: I do not think we can say that it was forgotten. The proposal was considered. A decision was made to proceed in a more limited fashion than what Mr. Redway would have liked.

So there was something in the bill already to provide the time factor, or whatever benefits there were, to go to disabled persons.

Mr. Fortier continued and said this:

> That condition is now included in this bill.

That is the condition which disabled persons are seeking.

> Senator Marshall: The same provision is included in Mr. Redway's Bill C-280?
> Mr. Fortier: A much more limited approach. The provision in the bill is intended for those who are incapable of applying for either physical or mental reasons. The report of the CPP Advisory Board was tabled in Parliament, as a matter of fact, and included that particular recommendation. The department decided to proceed on the basis of that recommendation.

I should have asked him why the bill was not amended to include it.

Then the question arose as to where the money comes from, which was the main contention. I asked this:

> Senator Marshall: From where does the money come to finance this bill? Does it come from the Consolidated Revenue Fund or from the pension plan fund?
> Mr. Hagglund: The money comes ultimately from the Canada Pension Plan contributions that are paid in by employers and employees accumulated in the Canada Pension Plan account, invested in the Canada Pension Plan investment fund, accumulating some earnings and flowing back through the Canada Pension Plan account to beneficiaries. So the track of it is a little more complicated than just a yes or no answer, but it flows into and out of the accounts of the Government of Canada without actually forming something that is backed or subsidized by the general revenues of government.

That is something that John Diefenbaker used to call obfuscation.

> It is backed entirely by the employer-employee contributions and the investment fund earnings.
> Mr. Fortier: The short answer is CPP pays for all expenditures.
> Mr. Marshall: Including administrative costs.
> Senator Marshall: Then that is my argument, I think.
> Mr. Hagglund: I am not sure, technically, what it would do to that argument.
> Senator Marshall: I am sorry to take up the time but it is an important issue. The Private Member's bill to which I was referring, Bill C-280, has no Royal Recommendation looking for funds. The question is where the funds for that are coming from when a private member can introduce a money bill in the House of Commons and have it approved there, and a similar bill . . .

and I am referring there to my Bill S-5

> . . . is turned down in the Senate because it is a money bill.
> Mr. Hagglund: It is way beyond our legal expertise to get into the question you are raising and I am not sure that our answers really affect your thinking on that point. You would have to consult with people who—

He mentioned the lawyers, but I do not know why it is not included in the evidence.

> Senator Marshall: I realize that but you mentioned that up to a point it comes out of the pension fund and then there is some relationship with the Consolidated Revenue Fund.
> Mr. Hagglund: Yes, sir.

● (1450)

So, honourable senators, there is certainly some confusion as to the difference between the two bills. One introduced in the House of Commons with no Royal Recommendation, asking for money, is approved, and the one not asking for money, Bill S-5, is turned down. I am sure you will deal with that later.

Senator Frith: I propose to adjourn the debate on this bill. The debate here at third reading has raised the question of severability, a question that we on both sides have had to face from time to time. That is a bill where we support one part but have difficulties with other parts. It is a bill that deals with an aspect of a subject yet fails to deal with another aspect. This question, as I say, comes up frequently in Parliament and, in fact, was the occasion, as we can remember, for some two weeks of bell ringing by the Progress Conservative opposition in the other place, in response to the Liberal government's refusal to sever an energy bill.

In this case, the Senate unanimously supports certain aspects of this bill, the principal aspects, I suppose we could say. It seems, however, that there are, at least, the seeds of potential unanimity on the aspects of the bill that we have reservations about. The first appearance of that apparently bipartisan or unanimous concern is contained in the report that was tabled by the Chairman of the Committee, Senator David. In the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of yesterday, December 10, 1991, at page 460, at the end of the second paragraph of his report, Senator David says:

> "Given the complexity of the subject matter of the bill, and the time given for its examination, the Committee will want to give further consideration to this matter in the early period of the legislation's application . . ."

And I now underline the following words:

> ". . . including the concern of the division of spouses' credits and matters relating to disability."

My suggestion is that we adjourn the debate. We heard today, as I say, an impression of widely-shared concerns. Certainly, I can speak for our side, as did Senator Bosa, that we support this bill, but we find today that there is a serious weakness in the bill, an opportunity missed to solve a long-standing serious problem. We were told today that Senator Marsden has the feeling that Senator Kinsella has some of the same concerns. Therefore, I propose that we adjourn the debate until tomorrow in the hope that perhaps we can agree on a unanimous addendum to Senator David's report that would draw a tighter focus on the weaknesses described by Senator Marsden, and in the hope that a message can be sent to the other place showing our support for the bill's positive principles and our serious concern about the points raised by Senator Marsden, apparently shared by Senator Kinsella and, as far as I know, Senator David as well.

I therefore move the adjournment of the debate in the hope that someone better informed than I—Senator Marsden, Senator Kinsella, the Chairman of the Committee—might explore this possibility and let us know tomorrow whether we can add another paragraph to Senator David's report accordingly.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) BILL

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the third reading of Bill C-15, An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employee's pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports.

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that clause 4 of the Bill be deleted and replaced by the following:

4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date the Official Languages Act applies to the airport authority, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if

(a) the authority were a federal institution; and

(b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution other than its head or central office.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, this debate which has been going on for almost three months in committee or in Committee of the Whole is no routine matter. While it deals with certain aspects of Bill C-15 on airport transfers, it brings out a profound conflict between the Official Languages Act, which flows directly from the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and the way the government privatization and transfer policy is applied. In the name of a policy that may have some merit, the Bill jeopardizes hard-won individual rights. We know what a certain short-sighted conception or rather misconception of the rules of the game in the private sector has cost us in terms of effort, delays and anxiety.

That is what it is all about and nothing less. It is no coincidence that my colleagues, senators Corbin, Molgat and others, have so brilliantly spoken expressing their views with logic, reason, knowledge and with an open heart. It is no . . . It is no coincidence that one of them courageously broke party lines to try to correct what we think is a dangerous injustice. It is no coincidence either that we all represent provinces where Francophones are a minority. And prestigious voices of the English-speaking community have said the same thing for the same reasons, as the proposed amendment tabled by Senator Frith reminds us. All these colleagues know what they are talking about and the government would be well advised to listen to them carefully.

Obviously, there is no place for partisanship here! We appeal to the government's sense of fairness and remind it of the commitment it made in the 1988 Official Languages Act to encourage the development of Francophone and Anglophone minorities. Does Bill C-15 do this or the exact opposite?

[Senator Frith.]

I will be brief, because my colleagues have already covered much of the ground, but it would be hard for me not to challenge certain arguments against the full application of the Act which were presented to us as being obvious but which I think are often fallacious and even contradictory.

For example, ensuring that the local airport authorities, LAAs, are competitive. Why is the obligation of providing service in both languages considered compatible and not the obligation having to do with language of work and equitable participation for the two groups? It has never been shown to be more costly. Who will believe that equitable hiring and the right to work in the minority language only in the designated regions of Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick will involve significant additional costs? Why was the suggestion repeatedly made by the Commissioner of Official Languages in his annual reports of first evaluating the cost impact rejected out of hand? At least we would know what we are talking about instead of having the threat of financial disaster bandied about.

The Minister of State, senior officials of the Department of Transport and our colleague who sponsored the bill all said that the public sector has one set of rules and the private sector another.

● (1500)

In that case, why was the requirement to provide services to the public in both official languages included in Bill C-15, while those concerning the working language and equal opportunities were not? The third party to an agreement, those who at present, have an airport franchise, must, in view of their contract, meet all the obligations required of a public service.

It would seem, and I quote the sponsor of the bill on this, that "we can trust the local airport authorities". Fine, but no more than the government departments and institutions which certainly did not always live up to this trust. So, let us not be too naive here or look like gullible fools.

We are told, and this is a good one, that the privatized CN hotels inherited no constraints. Perhaps the government will have noticed, in its wisdom, that we can easily change hotels if we are dissatisfied. However, with airports, it is quite another story.

We are told that Air Canada had remained under the authority of the Official Languages Act because the government is still, for the time being, the majority shareholder of the company. It can be dangerous to be too convincing. No one reminded us that the then chairman and chief executive officer of the national airline, Air Canada, had categorically stated that he could live and prosper under such legislation. There is worse. Were we thus issued a warning that the government would amend the act respecting the privatization of Air Canada when it would see fit, in order to limit, as does Bill C-15, the linguistic rights of Canadians? If that is the case, we have the right to know. If not, why use an argument that proves nothing but creates confusion.

We are told that, as things stand, the Official Languages Act would apply fully only to Montreal airports and that the foreseeable majority of local airport authorities would actually be located in non-designated areas with regards to the choice of the working language. What sophistry, what callousness! Is there no English-speaking community in the Montreal area?

Secondly, have we not been told that negotiations are under way concerning the other eight airports, including Moncton and some in Ontario? Therefore, Montreal is in no way the only one concerned. There are also airports in the three provinces with designated areas. Finally, if airports are now governed by the distinction between provinces with designated areas and the others, why would the minority communities of these three provinces lose acquired rights and the other provinces and their minorities not gain anything? I do not have time to explain the impact that this will have in Moncton, but I could paint a picture that would not be pretty. Do we not have enough with COR in New Brunswick and the Reform Party in Canada?

That is what those arguments for maintaining unjustifiable provisions are worth. That is also why my colleagues, well-informed citizens in our regions and I are deeply worried and ask the government to thoroughly review its position on this issue, especially at this critical time in our history. Are there not enough clouds already? Must we really add Bill C-15?

In its present form, Bill C-15 will be a bad piece of legislation because it contradicts, at least in spirit, a fundamental and almost constitutional law of this country. In the case of New Brunswick, which is the only officially bilingual province whose two communities are designated by law and soon, we hope, in the Constitution, it is more than a setback, it is offensive nonsense.

While discussing the testimony of two successive Official Languages Commissioners, the sponsor of this bill in the Senate suggested that we should not let ourselves be impressed because they were only doing their job. When he said that, I am sure that he did not want to show contempt for Parliament, of which the Commissioner is an officer. But in my opinion, he has done just that since, in fact, the government is now asking Parliament to go back and erode rights that it granted, to set a precedent which, on two important points, tends to weaken, for no valid reason a homogeneous and irreplaceable system of language rights.

Honourable senators, that is why I support the amendment made in committee by Senator Molgat, and I will vote in favour of the motion tabled in this House by Senator Frith, seconded by Senator Fairbairn.

Hon. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I will be very brief since, as I well know, coming after Senator Louis Robichaud has never been an easy task. I would also like to express my support for the comments made by Senator Simard. I find him very courageous. Once again, I congratulate him. I agree with the comments made by my colleagues on this side of the Chamber.

I especially appeal to a few senators, namely Senator Robertson, who fought, with Senator Simard, for the enactment of the Official Languages Act in New Brunswick, my friend Senator Ross and the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who knows the situation. I implore them to accept Senator Frith's amendment or to review the whole structure of Bill C-15.

There is no hurry. I am told that it is already in progress. I am concerned as a minority Francophone from New Brunswick. I am also concerned, in the present climate, with what is going on in Montreal because the people of Quebec should know that Francophones outside Quebec have suffered enormously from the enactment of Bill 178. I am concerned every time the Francophone community in Quebec takes steps which might seem necessary. They may be necessary, I do not judge them. But, in the eyes of the majority, these actions impinge on the rights of the Anglophone minority in Quebec and Francophones outside Quebec pay the price.

I cannot concieve, as Senator Robichaud so aptly said, that the authorities being created might be forced to set aside the section of Official Languagues Act that should apply.

On the subject of Air Canada, the excuse is often given that the Official Languages Act applied to Air Canada because the government still controlled, I think, 57 per cent of the shares. I am told that the government would eventually like to sell all its shares in Air Canada. Will the Official Languages Act apply then, or will we try to invoke the same arguments as today?

I would first urge Quebecers to understand the point of view of us Francophones outside Quebec. If they refuse, I would urge Anglophones in the Maritimes, in association with the Government Leader in the Senate, to make representations to the government so that, through Senator Frith's motion or by any other means, Senator Simard's suggestion can be accepted before the end of the third reading of this bill.

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I propose the adjournment of the debate. I intend to participate in the debate on this issue. As the previous speaker said, I think other senators, namely those from Quebec, should also take part in it, mindful of what Canon Groulx, this great Quebec nationalist once said: what Quebec never understood is that French Canadians from other provinces are the first line of the French fact in Canada and, were they to disappear, the French in Quebec would soon follow them.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I had some comments to make on senator De Bané's remarks.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Mr. Speaker, there is a motion from senator De Bané for the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Does Senator Lavoie-Roux wish to participate in this debate right now? I am sure Senator De Bané would be willing to give her the floor. Or does she want to comment on what Senator De Bané said? I just want to make sure, it is not a negative reaction towards any intervention Senator Lavoie-Roux would make.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, if I have heard, not understood, but heard correctly, Senator De Bané wanted to know if Quebec senators on this side would keep silent during this debate. Have I heard correctly?

Senator De Bané: Honourable senators, I just wanted to invite all senators and in particular Quebec senators from both sides to take part in this debate. I think it is the responsibility of opposition senators as well as government senators to participate in this very important debate.

We, the Quebec senators from both sides, should not keep silent on this issue which affects every Canadian.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I want to thank Senator De Bané for his explanation. If we assume that we will have other opportunities to speak about this, I want to tell him that it is certainly my intention, and that of some of my colleagues on this side of the House, to take part in that debate. For now, I agree to his request for an adjournment debate.

I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for this opportunity to speak.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Mr. Speaker, before you present the motion to adjourn of Senator De Bané, I would simply like to say clearly that the Senator can quote the late Canon Groulx all he wants, the position of the federal government on this issue has absolutely nothing to do with Quebecers' attitude towards French minorities outside Quebec, an attitude I have always found to be constructive, at least as far as members of this House are concerned. The position of the federal government on this issue is based on its policy towards the privatization of corporations. We will have another opportunity to talk about this after my colleague has spoken.

On motion of Senator De Bané, debate adjourned.

AERONAUTICS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall moved the second reading of Bill C-5, to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it is with some pleasure and recollection that I rise to speak to Bill C-5, an Act to amend the Aeronautics Acts and to amend an Act to amend the Aeronautics Act. I recall how long ago we started on some of these amendments. Many of you may recall that in 1985 the first major amendments to the Aeronautics Act in over 60 years were processed through the House of Commons and through this chamber. It took sixty years to bring about the first amendments, and I am pleased to note that the government is now causing to be brought about amendments only five or six years after the somewhat relatively new act was brought into play. We are demonstrating that we can keep pace on behalf of the aeronautics industry with the legislation that, in fact, supports it.

Honourable senators, these amendments to the act are brought forward to update the existing legislation to deal with issues that have arisen since the last act was passed in 1985. They will also—and very importantly—provide the legislative framework for implementing undertakings of the government regarding penalties for noise violations and federal-provincial recommendations with regard to airport zoning.

First, I would like to address the section which will provide an increased maximum for administrative monetary penalties. The 1985 amendments introduced the concept of administrative monetary penalties which authorized the minister to assess a penalty to a maximum of $1,000 for the contravention of certain provisions of the act. These provisions are designated in regulations which also establish the maximum penalties in respect of these provisions subject to the limit of $1,000 set out in the act.

In some cases, honourable senators, the $1,000 limit has been shown to be ineffective as a deterrent, especially with regard to violations of noise abatement procedures at larger airports such as Lester B. Pearson International Airport in Toronto. To overcome this problem, the act is being amended to increase the maximum penalties to $25,000 for corporations and $5,000 for individuals. Bill C-5 will allow the regulations to be amended, increasing the maximum penalty for these offences where such an increase is warranted. In other words, it is not automatic.

Second, a new section is being added to the zoning provisions of the act authorizing the minister to make agreements with local zoning authorities that will allow the local authority to make and enforce zoning regulations for local airports using provincial procedures. The amendment is based on the recommendation of a federal-provincial working group on airport zoning which met to explore methods of increasing federal-provincial cooperation in preparing and enforcing zoning regulations on land surrounding airports.

Height zoning around aerodromes comes within the exclusive power of the federal government since it relates to the very vital question of aviation safety. At the same time, provinces have authority to zone such areas for other purposes. Additionally, zoning procedures under the existing Aeronautics Act are more complicated and expensive than those followed by many of the provinces and the municipalities in those provinces in which the airports may be located.

This amendment establishes a system whereby provincial zoning authorities will be able to make height zoning regulations apply to airports at a time and in a manner that will be in accordance with other zoning regulations applying to the area. If the local authority does not wish to make such an agreement, however, it is not obligated to do so. The airport may eventually be zoned by the federal government if it comes within its zoning requirements and policies.

Bill C-5 also proposes amendments to the act to allow more expeditious response to urgent safety recommendations. Occasionally, a body investigating an aviation accident or incident will make a recommendation to the Minister of Transport that requires immediate implementation in the interests of aviation safety. A new provision is being added to the act that will allow the minister to make interim orders that will give these recommendations an immediate and mandatory effect while the formal regulation is undergoing the normal process. The interim order will remain in effect until the regulation development process is completed but, in any event, will not exceed a maximum of two years.

Another provision of the bill we now have before us will give the minister a new power to act to withhold, suspend or cancel a Canadian aviation document where, in the Minister's opinion, the past record of the document holder justifies that action. This would also apply to any principal of a company which holds the document. This will enable the minister to deal appropriately with situations where an operator whose certificate of operation has been cancelled attempts to continue his or her operation by starting a new company or buying an existing one. Where the minister suspends or cancels the document on this basis, the decision may then be reviewed by the Civil Aviation Tribunal.

Two new provisions expanding extraterritorial jurisdiction to the act are being added. Senators will recognize the need for this. The first will make all the provisions of the Aeronautics Act apply, as appropriate, to passengers as well as crew members on board Canadian aircraft operating outside of Canada. For example, one that immediately comes to mind is the use of seatbelts.

The second provision will authorize the Governor in Council to make regulations implementing obligations that Canada has already accepted in principle in ratifying article 3 of what is known as the Chicago Convention: For instance, setting out requirements for aircraft that may be intercepted when overflying another country's territory.

An amendment to the original bill was unanimously agreed to by the members of the Standing Committee on Transport. This amendment adds a new regulatory authority to the Aeronautics Act to limit the hours of work of crew members, including flight attendants, in a move that recognizes their important safety functions as members of the aircraft crew.

Finally, Bill C-5 provides for amendments to the security provisions in the act to implement the system of establishing security measures to be carried out by air carriers and airport operators. Instead of security measures being "approved" by the minister, specific ministerial orders will establish those measures that must be carried out. This system will overcome certain legal objections to the earlier method.

Honourable senators, I have given only a broad-brush picture of the amendments that Bill C-5 proposes to make to the Aeronautics Act. I hesitate to call them "housekeeping". Certainly, they are technical in nature, but generally they are designed to keep the Aeronautics Act up-to-date with the industry it serves.

I am confident, honourable senators, that you will find these amendments worthy of your attention and allow us to bring the helpful measures that are in here through our legislative process in an expeditious manner. To this end, I would invite honourable senators who have detailed questions to avail themselves of the opportunity that a hearing in committee would provide.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I recognize that the honourable senator wishes all questions to be directed to the committee. However, perhaps he might be able to give us some guidance about these new amendments which he says will improve the Aeronautics Act. My question is a fundamental one: What additional costs to airlines and to the travelling public will result as a consequence of these additional regulations and the enforcement procedures? What will be the cost to the Canadian taxpayer? Does the honourable senator have that information readily available?

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, I do not have that type of detailed information available, but I can advise the honourable senator that it is my understanding that these provisions will not entail any additional costs to airlines. It will be a matter of some inconvenience to perhaps one of the airlines with respect to the hours aircraft will operate, but that is the only indication of additional costs that I know of.

Senator Grafstein: I have one other point, and I assume this could be explored in committee. As the honourable senator is aware, and I am sure all members of the Senate on all sides are aware, Pearson Airport is now one of the most inefficient major airports in the western world. It is inefficient every day. Travellers to Ottawa suffer from a form of misrepresentation when we fly by Rapidair. It is neither rapid, nor is it on time. I prefer to call those flights the NOT Airlines—never on time.

Additional costs to the travelling public, additional costs to the taxpayer, additional dislocation of the neighbours in the community are all affected by countless delays in the airport. This results in stifling the growth of Metropolitan Toronto as an international city which has been the engine of growth in this country.

I ask the honourable senator and the government: Will these regulations improve the efficiency in terms of the number of incoming and outgoing flights at Pearson Airport, or will they seriously or continually erode the already inefficient method by which the airport is managed?

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, certainly to the degree that Canadian carriers would wish to violate certain regulations, there will be very possibly more costs.

With respect to the direct question the senator is asking as to whether this bill will improve the efficiency of Toronto international airport, the answer is no, not necessarily.

Senator Grafstein: My final question is this, and again this could be dealt with by the committee if the honourable senator does not have the answer at his fingertips. One of the difficulties that municipalities across this country are facing is the indirect taxes that are imposed by federal government regulations. My question is this: Will the cost of the municipalities of Greater Metropolitan Toronto be increased as a result of this new bill in order to regulate, from a municipal aspect, the enforcement of these provisions?

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, to the best of my knowledge, no, that would not happen. There might be incidental increased costs at the provincial level with respect to the implementation of zoning provisions, but not increased costs directly to the municipalities, as far as I can see. Again, I would urge senators who have very legitimate questions like this to avail themselves of the opportunity to monitor or take part in the committee hearings.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the questions raised by Senator Grafstein touch on some of the aspects of this bill that I think require some study. Particularly, I have some notes that indicate that many take the view that the initiatives in the bill should include measures to divert traffic from overcrowded airports such as Pearson to other areas. There would be a beneficial result of such measures, namely, economic growth in certain areas. At second reading, we are only speaking of the principle of the bill, and we support the principle of the bill.

My recommendation will be that we give Bill C-5 second reading now and send it to the committee, providing we have an undertaking that it will receive study and will not bounce back here within a few days. I am a bit uneasy about some of the bills that we have moved along expeditiously and sent to committee. We see them as bills that require careful study by the Senate. They require the exercise of that important constitutional function of the Senate to seriously consider bills of this kind, to study any disadvantages that may result from their passage, to give opportunity for criticism, and, of course, to scrutinize them to ensure that there are no mistakes.

Could we have some assurance from the government that this bill, if we allow it go to committee now, will receive some study and not bounce back on us within a week? In fact, I would like to have the assurance that the bill, if it goes to committee, will receive serious study and will not be back in the Senate before the Christmas adjournment. The committee will then have the opportunity of using the intervening time to study the bill carefully and to give attention to some of the questions that we have raised. If we have that assurance, then I recommend that we give Bill C-5 second reading now and refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot give assurance as to how the committee will proceed on this bill. I certainly can give assurance that it can take all the time it needs. If it is not here by Christmas, we will look at it again when we return from our break.

Senator Frith: The chairman is here.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: I can give you the assurance, Senator Frith, that you will not be hearing the committee report before Christmas.

Senator Frith: Put the motion, then. It is a pleasure to do business with you, senator.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Grafstein.]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Forrestall, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECTS OF GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the economic chaos created by the government in its pursuit of lower inflation and high interest rates.—(Honourable Senator Everett).

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I would like to inquire with you for a moment whether it would be possible to lower the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar in terms of the U.S. dollar—whether there is a case for that, and whether it can be done without inflationary consequences.

The stance of the central bank as articulated by Governor Crow is that his sole target is price stability. Therefore, he has embarked on a restrictive monetary policy. The results are that the Canadian dollar is at the level of 88 cents in terms of the American dollar; that the three month rate on Treasury Bills in Canada is 7.21 per cent versus 4.38 per cent in the U.S.; that 30- year bonds in Canada achieve a rate of 9.16 per cent versus 7.7 per cent in the U.S. Over the average of the 1980s the Canadian dollar is up 5 per cent as against its major trading partners, but when you look at the average in the United States it is up over 10 per cent, and of course the bulk of our trading is done with the United States.

So what is the fallout of that policy of the Central Bank and Governor Crow? First of all, everybody knows that our export industries are suffering. Since 1989 we have lost 300,000 manufacturing jobs, and manufacturing output is down by 14 per cent. Our primary producers who depend on exports are hurting. An example of a primary producer is the prairie farmer. The cost to the prairie farmer of the dollar being at $.88 instead of $.80 is some $400 million a year. That $400 million we have to meet through government subsidies. It is a fact that a 1 per cent decrease in the exchange rate equates to a 2 per cent change in farm income to prairie farmers. So what I am saying is that if the Canadian dollar were to be reduced from $.88 to $.80, it would do more than any negotiation that we could conclude successfully with the GATT.

Not only are we suffering difficulty with our exports, we are finding that imports are cheap and are increasing. In addition, we have the problem of cross-border shopping. The combination of those two factors has created a situation in which retailers are suffering mightily. If you take 5 or 10 per cent off the volume of any business you can be sure that the profits are either thin or nonexistent. You will have noticed today in the Globe and Mail that over 500 stores in ladies' wear retailing have gone under this year.

That is not the real problem, however. The really ominous problem about the policy of the Central Bank is the current account deficit. In the first nine months of this year it has gone to $22 billion from $18.2 billion last year. Our trade surplus dropped in the last quarter. Our travel deficit was $1.5 billion in the third quarter. Cross-border shopping has added $4.1 billion to our current account deficit in the first nine months, and our nonmerchandise deficit is now at an annual rate of $33 billion. The current account deficit has gone from 1 per cent of gross domestic product to 3 per cent today. It is the highest among the G-7 countries, and the difficult part to stomach is the fact that most of that money is going for nonproductive purposes; that is, to the government to finance consumption.

If we have this current account deficit, we have to examine how we finance it. Our net foreign debt in Canada is $280 billion. That means that $27 billion was paid to foreigners last year as compared to $4 billion in 1980. Foreign debt is up by $23.3 billion in 1991 alone. Eurobond issues in 1991, so far, equal $14 billion as against $4 billion in 1990. It has been estimated that by 1995, if we maintain the dollar at the current level, we will add $50 billion to the foreign debt as a consequence.

Mr. Mazankowski was in Japan the other day. He promised the Japanese the continuation of a high, if not higher Canadian dollar. He said we will not lower interest rates. His policy is not to confiscate foreign assets by having the dollar adjust to a lower rate. I can understand the Japanese being very pleased with that statement, for they hold $44 billion in federal and provincial debt. Indeed, the Japanese have been attracted to buy our debt because they have low interest rates and the Americans have low interest rates. The high Canadian yield accompanied by the promise of the Minister of Finance that there will be an even higher yield by virtue of appreciation of the Canadian dollar naturally creates a market for our indebtedness.

So what do we have? The government's and the governor's objective is price stability. He has reduced inflation, which will result, as he says—and he is right if inflation is lower—in lower interest rates over the longer term. He proposes that that will cause a containment of costs and result in increases in the competitiveness of our industries. At that point, he says, the Canadian dollar will stabilize with the American dollar because our rate of inflation will be lower than theirs and our efficiencies will be equal to theirs. There are problems with that policy. First, it is a long and painful process. It will involve bankruptcies, layoffs and downsizing of many firms. If the maintenance of the dollar goes on at the present level without cost improvements, we will destroy the trade sector of this country. So what we have is the possibility of permanent losses of industries and of jobs.

As our deficit grows, our foreign indebtedness increases, and our interest payments to foreigners increase. So what we face, then, is a vicious circle. It does not matter that the indebtedness is denominated in Canadian dollars. All that means is that there is no exchange risk for the issuer. The money still has to be paid out to the foreign holder and translated into the currency of that holder. So what we are doing here with an increasing current account deficit that is caused by an inordinately high dollar is mortgaging the future of this country.

I believe the Canadian dollar will, on that account, adjust in any event. In the first place, there is no indication that the cost of government, as related to the taxes paid by people, will decrease. There may be more efficiency within industry itself, but I see no indication that the incidence of tax on industry will be lower.

It is a fact that a 12 per cent cut in pay would be required right now to justify a dollar at $.88 and remain competitive with the United States. The current account problem is very large now, and it is growing. One asks, then, is there another route? At the present time, inflation is below the target rate of 3 per cent. In fact, it is below the inflation rate of the United States, if we do not take into account the one-time effect of the GST.

What is the purchasing power parity of the Canadian dollar? That is to say, how much money in terms of American dollars will $1 Canadian buy in goods and services? The answer is $.80. That is the purchasing power parity. That is as good a proxy as any for what the value of the dollar should be.

Honourable senators, we must bring the current account deficit under control. In the past, we have achieved equilibrium in Canada, as, indeed, the Americans have achieved equilibrium, by adjusting exchange rates. In the 1983 to 1986 recovery, the change in the monetary conditions index was achieved by an 11 per cent depreciation in the Canadian dollar.

I contend that the climate is right for that adjustment. We have a low inflation rate. We are suffering from low output. The budgetary deficit as opposed to the current account deficit requires less borrowing. I predict that the budgetary deficit will fall faster than has been expected, if for no other reason than that there is a saving in our budgetary expenditures on account of interest of $1.8 billion for each 1 per cent decline in interest rates. If we make an adjustment now in our currency, it would be a one-time adjustment. It is true that we will have to increase the money supply to do it, and there is some risk of inflation involved, but we are talking about a one-time adjustment which I believe in today's climate can be accommodated. In any event, I think it will happen regardless of what the government does, purely and simply because the higher dollar is creating a larger current account deficit. The outflows to service that debt to foreigners will increase and increase.

I would like to deal for a moment with the Free Trade Agreement in this context. There is no doubt that in order to accommodate the Free Trade Agreement a restructuring has to take place. But, it would be easier if industry in Canada were making profits out of its exports so that investment money is available. If there is no adjustment in the Canadian dollar, we are talking about an adjustment in industry that will be a very long and very painful process. Very grave losses within industry will be possible and, I believe, probable.

It has been said in the government's constitutional paper that it would like to see the mandate of the Bank of Canada being solely that of price stability. I think that is a dreadful mistake. The bank must be concerned with much more than price stability. Surely, it has to be concerned with economic growth, employment levels and balance of payments as well.

I wonder, honourable senators, whether the governor has not sold the government a bill of goods. Has he said, "I will get rid of inflation. Interest rates will stay low. The Canadian dollar will stay high. Imports will be lower priced. Industry will adjust to the competitive environment, and a clearer road to economic success will open up"?

Or, is this the scenario, the scenario that I think is possible? The adjustment, as I said, will be slow and painful. We will experience permanent loss of industries. People will be more inclined, as they are more and more each day, to look north-south rather than east-west. The current account deficit will increase, and the cost of servicing it in terms of foreign exchange will increase. As a result, there will be an unintended devaluation of the dollar to at least its parity pricing level if not beyond. So that the road that presents itself will be one of constrained economic activity causing a reduction in government revenues and a possible decrease in budgetary revenues, and all the consequences that flow therefrom.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Everett, according to the rules, I must advise you that your 15 minutes are up. If honourable senators agree to waive the rule, the honourable senator may continue his remarks.

Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Everett: That is very kind of honourable senators. I really do not require additional time because I was just finished my speech.

I hope in some way that I have made the case that the government itself should look at the policy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and that within that policy there is an opportunity, without departing from proper monetary control, to make the adjustment from $.88 to $.80, with all the good consequences that would flow from it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I hope this is a good day to talk about economics because my honourable friend opposite who introduced the motion to which I address myself attempted to analyze in his speech the condition of the Canadian economy. I think his presentation suffered from a defect, at least from my point of view, as it was, to put it mildly, rather one-sided. I say that because the substance of his resolution and his speech was that it is the government's fault and that we are facing a situation of "economic chaos".

Senator Olson: I still believe that.

Senator Roblin: I would encourage him to extend his analysis. I think he can find a better balance because there are other players in this field. Let me assure him that there is plenty of blame to go around. We could accept his strictures, perhaps, if they were on a more balanced basis.

Before I get into this gloomy exercise of looking at the problems, I wish to examine a few of the facts of the present situation which, to me at least, are hopeful. There are some positive factors to be found. As we have just been told, inflation is down to 2 per cent at the present time. That is very good. Indeed, the bouts of inflation that we experienced earlier this year were mostly the result of higher taxes, assisted by the impact of administered prices. Interest in the bank prime is now 8 per cent. That has come down in a rather short period of time from 14 per cent. I regard that as dramatic.

• (1600)

Another factor that is positive for Canada is that the spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates have been closing. It was 5.5 per cent last year. It is about 2.5 per cent now. It is also a fact that Canadians are out-saving Americans on a two-to-one basis.

Canadian corporate profits reached their bottom, I hope, in the first quarter of this year when they were $8.6 billion. In the third quarter they have come up to $13.1 billion. I merely introduce that fact as evidence of progress, not as a figure with which to be satisfied.

The deficit requires some review. In 1984 the deficit was $38.3 billion, of which no less than $16 billion was required to pay for what I call groceries, the ongoing normal operating expenses of a government. In 1991 the deficit is estimated to be $30.5 billion, although I expect it to come in a little higher than that. But in this case there is a $13 billion surplus on the program account. In other words, there are no funds in that deficit needed to pay for the groceries, as there were in 1984. There has been a switch of some $30 billion on the right side. I think that is a satisfactory fact for us to reflect upon, as it indicates progress. However, none of us will be satisfied with that as a target.

Budget deficit comparisons between Canada and the United States are interesting because, on the basis of the comparable unified budget balance of the two countries, the U.S. budget deficit is a larger proportion of their gross national product than ours is of our gross domestic product. It is 5.7 per cent in the United States as compared to 3.5 per cent in Canada.

Federal spending programs are part of this mix. The fact is that before one takes into account the cost of paying the interest bill of the deficit every year, from 1984 to 1990 the average increase in program spending has been 3.7 per cent. I do not think there is a country in the western world that can offer a similar figure. In fact, I would be surprised if many, if any, provinces of Canada can say the same. So we see that there has been a very rigorous control and restraint on the regular programs spending of government.

While I am on the topic, perhaps I should offer some comparisons with respect to tax burden, because that is a matter which concerns Canadians, particularly those who live close to the border. According to the OECD, the three levels of government in Canada produced a tax burden of 34 per cent of the gross domestic product. In the G-7, only the United States and Japan have a lower figure. In fact, the Canadian tax represents a figure of 4.2 per cent over that recorded in the United States. However, when I make that statement I remind myself that we tax for medicare. The United States medicare cost is 12 per cent of their gross national product. If those costs were all run through the tax system, as they are in Canada, the 4.2 per cent tax advantage now recorded in their favour might very well disappear. I think it would disappear.

Yet, and I do not burke this fact, the gravest economic problems face Canadians. First, we are in the midst of a recession that not only still affects our country but is worldwide. We see it in the United States and there does not seem to be any evidence that Europe and Japan will escape the kinds of problems that we have here. Far too many Canadians are tragically not working, and the personal tragedy of unemployment that that involves can scarcely be imagined by anyone who has not experienced it.

We know that business profits are poor so we see that business investment is largely on hold. We see that Canadians are not spending, they are not borrowing, they are paying down their debt. Every time we open the paper we see evidence of new bankruptcies, and that has been referred to this afternoon.

What has become of what John Maynard Keynes described as "entrepreneurial animal spirits" when the psychological attitude of the people of the nation, I think, can safely be described as having seldom been lower. No matter what upbeat statistics I might be able to recite to the house on certain aspects of this matter, this is a problem which ought to have our first consideration.

When I look at this question I ask myself, as I guess we all do, "what to do". I have a few suggestions on that point. First, we should persuade the Governor of the Bank of Canada, as my friend who just spoke indicated, to declare "victory". We should persuade him to declare that the fight for inflation has been won, that it is well and truly won, and that he can think of other problems to solve. We can point out to him that the inflation villains in the past little while have been government taxes at all levels. They have been the effect of administered prices of various kinds. I do not know what he thinks he can do about those particular factors with inflation.

Right now, having digested those humps in the inflationary cycle, we do not see rising prices in this country today that threaten inflation. We do not see rising wages to any great extent now, although they have been very serious. We do not see demand pressures pushing up the inflationary rate in Canada. We do not see commodity input prices being too high. They are falling, not rising. So the problem in Canada today, no matter what it has been in the past, is not one of inflation but of deflation.

Deflation is our problem. This was referred to by the gentleman who has just spoken. If you look at the record of commodity prices of crude oil, mineral products, forest products and wheat, all those things that enter so largely into our national economy, those prices are, all in all, the lowest they have been in the last five years. So we have a severe deflation in commodity prices, with all that that means to the farmers of my part of the country, to say nothing of the rest of Canada.

We have something more than that. We have a fierce deflation in company balance sheet and in asset valuations. Every day in the paper we see the effect of the deflation of asset values like real estate, the effect of too much debt, and matters of that sort. We see how deflation is eroding income and profits and is pushing the economy down, not only in the commodity sector but in capital assets which are now being written down on the balance sheets of so many companies.

What to do? It seems to me that the desirable policy is very easy to state and very hard to implement. It is, namely, that we need a strong dose of fiscal and monetary stimulus in this country as soon as possible. When we look at the situation of the federal government it has to be said, in all fairness, that the room for federal fiscal stimulus is indeed limited. We do not need a bigger deficit; it is big enough. We want to try to persuade the federal government and, I emphasize, the provincial governments, that this is no time for them to increase taxes further. But I suggest that there must be some room in the economic policies of governments to encourage workers and business, even if it is only on the margin.

What do I mean? The other day, truckers in this country received a relatively modest and minor concession in respect of the taxes that affected them, but a concession which will do them some good. I am not sure that it will revive that industry in the way it would be desired, but it certainly will not hurt them. We need to look through the whole of our fiscal, taxation and other such policies and to identify those areas, small as they might really be in the total context of things, to see where the federal government can offer encouragement and a pat on the back to those who are trying to make ends meet these days.

I suggest—and here is where I join company with my honourable friend at the end other end of the room—monetary policy offers more promise than fiscal policy in connection with the problems we face. I agree with him that a lower Canadian dollar could speed up recovery. The Bank of Canada says that it does not, and cannot, set the value of the Canadian dollar. Maybe so, but what it can do is influence the value of the Canadian dollar. To take a phrase from Shakespeare, if I may, "By indirection, find direction out." In other words, you do not have to tackle the problem head on; there are other ways of dealing with this matter.

A year ago, the G-7 was looking for a way to devalue the American dollar. Do honourble senators remember that? They have devalued the American dollar all right, and it was done by all the central banks in that constellation of nations. If their influence could deal with the question of the value of the American dollar, how more likely is it that they could do something with respect to a relatively minor currency like the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Would it be in their interests to do so, though?

Senator Roblin: I say that the Bank of Canada is not without some influence in dealing with this matter. I think that the adjuration we had a few minutes ago that they should act on that possibility is well taken.

Senator Frith: Why would the G-7 do that, senator? Would it be in their interests to do it for the Canadian dollar?

Senator Roblin: That is for us to argue, is it not?

Senator Olson: We should persuade them.

Senator Roblin: The Bank of Canada is discrete. It is well known for its caution and prudence, and I am not persuaded that measures encouraged by them would re-ignite inflation or move interest rates higher. The bank, however, is not helpless. A moderate downward pressure on the dollar of the kind indicated would be a sign to Canadian exporters and the Canadian economy as a whole that there is light at the end of the tunnel. If the value of the Canadian dollar were reduced, export sales and profits would certainly revive. The balance of trade, as we have heard today, would certainly improve. The chance of the Free Trade Agreement being more productive than some people think it has been so far would be markedly advanced. The domestic market would be helped. Jobs would grow, and the tax take would grow as well.

Coming back to my opening remarks where I outlined some of the measures already in place, which will help significantly in working for a return to sound growth and prosperity, the basis for sound growth and prosperity having been brought into effect by policies I support, I say now that that is not enough. We have passed beyond that stage. The inflation battle has been won. It is time for us to declare victory, and time for us to see how the Bank of Canada and other financial authorities can move to undergird, improve and enhance the economic prospects of the country. We are not in good shape, and we must take measures to improve the situation.

The first and best initiative we could take under the present circumstances is to work for a lower Canadian dollar. The trade-off, of course, and we hear this ad nauseam, is that if you lower the Canadian dollar, you run the risk of more inflation and increasing interest rates. I do not believe that, under the present economic situation in Canada, that is a risk; but, if it is a risk, I am prepared to run it because the advantages that would accrue to jobs, profits and the recovery of the nation would make such an exercise abundantly worthwhile.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is now considered debated.

Senator Everett: I had understood that Senator Murray wanted to speak in this debate, and I am wondering if it should be adjourned in his name.

Senator Frith: He certainly would agree with what Senator Roblin has said.

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have had no indication that he wishes to speak on this matter.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I support Senator Everett's comment, and I can inform honourable senators that Senator Murray told me directly that he wanted to speak on this debate. I assume, and I do not know if I am right, that Senator Roblin might have been speaking for him. I like what he said. I hope that is the position of the government. Senator Murray did say he wanted to speak to this matter.

Senator Frith: I would like to hear more about what the Bank of Canada will do.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is this matter considered debated?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, for Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

WINTER FISHING AT THE ENTRANCE TO THE GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Simard, calling the attention of the Senate to a matter of concern for our fellow citizens of the Atlantic Provinces, namely winter fishing at the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.—(Honourable Senator Thériault).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I was asked to stand this Inquiry. In doing so, may I point out that at page 751 of Debates of the Senate, I made an impertinent comment, in the true sense of the word "impertinent"; that is, a bit cheeky and not directly pertinent. If the comment is to remain on the record, I might as well get it right. I am reported to have said at the end of Senator Simard's eloquent and persuasive intervention, and I quote:

> You have completely talked me out of any compassion I ever had for anyone fishing at the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

I must learn to articulate and speak more clearly to the back of the hall, or I will get no more roles at the Ottawa Little Theatre. I wanted to say, "You have completely talked me out of any passion I may ever have had for winter fishing at the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence."

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Explanation accepted.

PROPOSED CANADIAN AID TO SOVIET UNION AND CURRENT CONSTITUENT REPUBLICS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to proposed Canadian aid to the Soviet Union and its current constituent Republics.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I will be brief, but this issue is so topical that I do not believe I should pass up an opportunity to say a few words about it today.

I wish to acknowledge that on October 29, Senator Murray and I had a discussion about this matter; that is, Canadian aid to the Soviet Union during this winter. I appreciate the response given by Senator Murray at that time. However, certain things have happened that have exacerbated this situation with respect to shortages of food supplies in many parts of the Soviet Union. Indeed, I can say that Senator Murray, at the end of the discussion we had on October 29, did give an undertaking at page 505 of the Debates of the Senate that he would bring back a more detailed response to the matter I raised.

To put this matter in perspective, honourable senators, I put down this inquiry the first day we returned after the summer recess, I believe on September 16 or thereabouts. Senator Barootes and I had been with the Canada-European parliamentary group to Turkey and to several parts of the Soviet Union. While we were there, we were told that they would not have any difficulties during the summer season because there were kitchen gardens and various other things. Even though the economy was in very bad shape and the infrastructure for processing and distributing food and other consumer supplies was in very bad shape—in fact it was disintegrating— they did not expect to have any difficulty until the winter season, because at that time the local food production was adequate even for large cities such as Moscow.

I was concerned, and perhaps Senator Barootes may also speak on this, that we needed to take some action then to ensure that there were increased supplies of basic food requirements such as wheat, flour, and many other things, and that some action should be taken in September to see that it was available. There are two reasons: one is the political and military instability that would come as a result of people being hungry. That is serious enough. I think that the Canadian people would want to help out in this situation simply from a humanitarian base because of the massive and enormous changes that have taken place in that country over the past year or so, particularly in the last six months.

I have to acknowledge that there has been some change in the Canadian government's attitude that I salute. I agree with it. I was very disappointed when Mr. Gorbachev came to London to plead his cause at a meeting of the G-7 that was going on in the latter part of August, and he was turned down. I thought that was sad and inhumane and I was even more disgusted when I heard the reason. The reason was that they were not satisfied that the republics—since the Soviet Union was coming apart—would take on the obligation of paying the $65 billion or $68 billion in foreign debt that the Soviet Union owed mostly to the G-7 nations.

Honourable senators, that is the wrong reason, and Canada should not have supported that reason. This is a situation involving nearly 300 million people. Also, some parts of that country are in charge of 27,000 nuclear weapons of various types, such as ballistic weapons and other things, and surely it is in our own interest to ensure that the changes taking place could proceed without having riots and other political instability that would flow from starvation of those people. I am sorry to say that that has happened.

However, since then—and this is why I feel somewhat better about the situation insofar as Canada's participation is concerned—the Prime Minister, when he was at Stanford University, acknowledged that we needed to throw them a lifeline now. I know that most of the Canadian people would support that view and I acknowledged that a few days ago.

Honourable senators, the reality of what we predicted and what a number of people in Moscow and in Leningrad—now St. Petersburg—told Senator Barootes and I is catching up to us. Inflation on food and other consumer supplies has been so severe that people in outlying areas will no longer bring food into Moscow to exchange it for rubles. I suppose some are still doing so, but if members of collective farms and those in outlying regions are to bring in wheat, meat, vegetables and other things, they do not want rubles. They want some type of barter exchange in order that they can get something useful. They do not want rubles to take home and watch them deteriorate in value so rapidly that they cannot get access to some of the things that they need from the few factories and other businesses that are still operating in the big cities.

As a matter of fact, when Senator Barootes and I were in St. Petersburg we had a meeting with the mayor of St. Petersburg in the city council chambers. He is a very loyal Gorbachev supporter. He said a few days ago that a military coup would now have the support of the people because they are so concerned about having security of supply for food and other consumer goods. There are many other quotations that I could cite about how serious that situation is.

Canada has come a long way since the G-7 meeting that took place in London. I hope that there will be no consideration given to who is to pay the bills for some of this food that we have in surplus supply in Canada, in fact all over North America. If they need it and we can get it to them—and I know we can if we try—we should ensure that it goes there so that we do not run the risk of very serious political instability that could lead to what the mayor of St. Petersburg is now saying about the current situation.

Canada should lead. Senator Murray, Leader of the Government in this chamber, said that he would bring back a much more detailed response to the question that I raised as to what Canada is doing. I encourage him to do that.

As a matter of fact, only yesterday the Prime Minister of Canada has again praised the President of the Soviet Union, Mr. Gorbachev. He stated that there is speculation of an ouster apparently in the making, or in the news. The Prime Minister said that Mr. Gorbachev is a remarkable asset and we should make sure that he stays in place because the risk of severe instability would be worse if he is supplanted or replaced or made redundant because of the other structures that are being set up with respect to the new Commonwealth of three of the major republics.

I understand that the Right Hon. Mr. Mulroney sent a message to Mr. Gorbachev three days ago offering to be "helpful" by continuing to send food shipments to the Soviet Union this winter. I appreciate that. I think that is the right attitude. However, I am not aware of any indication that they intend to do it in a magnitude sufficient to meet the situation. I have not heard that the Minister of External Affairs and the Prime Minister are trying to encourage the same response from other nations who have some surpluses of food that are so desperately needed in the large cities such as St. Petersburg and Moscow and a number of others. I say that because I think that should be done.

I do not think that anyone should hold back due to some consideration of who will pay the old debt and debt service charges that were owed by the Soviet Union. I think that should never be considered. When we had to do things in the Gulf situation that cost Canada something like $690 million, there was no consideration for that kind of thing at all. It needed to be done, or at least the government felt it needed to be done, and the announcement was made and the ships were sent. As a matter of fact, Parliament was not even in session when all of that transpired.

The decision by Russia, Byelorussia and Ukraine to form a new commonwealth included some positive signs, Canada says, but Canada has a very serious concern about political and military instability, Mr. Mulroney told the House of Commons the day before yesterday.

I just want to conclude my remarks here by giving the government and the Prime Minister credit for the change that has taken place since they refused to respond to Mr. Gorbachev's plea last August, but there is more to do. I think Canada can play a very important role in making sure the situation over there that grows more dangerous by the day is kept in check. If we can do it with some consumer goods, surely that is a whole lot less expensive than what the consequences would be if we do not help.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Pat Carney: Is there still time under the rules to ask my colleague Senator Olson some questions?

Senator Olson: You have 15 minutes like everyone else.

Senator Carney: I want to ask you some questions.

Senator Olson: By all means, do so.

Senator Carney: The question I have to ask is one that I have asked you before, Senator Olson. This subject is very much on our minds. We are very interested in the experience that you bring to this matter. The question I asked earlier dealt with the problem of infrastructure. The difficulty of trying to deliver aid is the inability of the former Soviet Union to actually move the goods to where the need is. Have you been able to reflect on how this problem might be overcome?

Secondly, in terms of barter, I know that when I was Minister of Trade there was genuine interest in bartering with Russia. Have you any suggestions on what bartered goods might be utilized?

Further, based on your experience, have you thought of communicating directly with the Secretary of State for External Affairs? The officials will be very familiar with the situation but may not have your practical experience in knowing how or what would be useful at this point in time.

Senator Olson: First of all, let me say that when I used the term "barter", I used it in the context where it was not barter between the nations, although there may be some useful avenue that can be pursued there as well. What I was talking about is that the Soviet citizens themselves are now unwilling to trade goods for rubles, and therefore all that is left for them is barter. For example, if farmers in the regions surrounding Moscow were to bring food into Moscow, in exchange they would want some of the things that they need, such as building supplies, instead of taking rubles, which are deteriorating in value so rapidly. I have to say I do not know whether there is any interest now in barter for whatever reason between the Soviet Union and Canada.

As far as infrastructure is concerned, there are what we would consider horrendous inefficiencies in the transportation, processing and distribution of food supplies in the Soviet Union. There is no doubt about that. One of the reasons, of course, is very simple. They have outlawed the Communist Party now in Russia and in Byelorussia. Prior to that happening, the Communist Party was, in fact, managing most of that system throughout the entire country, of course. The whole structure falls apart. I understand that. I am not trying to play down the problems that are involved here, because obviously they have to have transportation. For instance, if you are making bread, you have to have flour mills that are running on a large scale, and all the rest of the things that go into that process.

What I think Canada can do, and ought to do and certainly should encourage the other G-7 nations to do, is assure the Soviet Union that these supplies, as much as they can handle, will be delivered to a port position, whether that is at St. Petersburg or the ports along the Black Sea or wherever. There is then no question that they cannot order these things in and take them. We will worry later about the bookkeeping and the paying for it. They could use these goods in such a fashion that all of their system would be utilized to the maximum.

In addition to that, I would suggest that we in North America particularly have some expertise in setting up distribution systems or transportation systems that might be useful to them. I expect that they do not even have enough highway trucks and that sort of thing at the present time, so I think we could be helpful in that area as well.

Honourble senators, I have not been back to the Soviet Union since then, but we did spend quite a lot of time particularly around the two big cities that I mentioned. There are some very practical things that we take for granted here in North America that could now be helpful to the people of the Soviet Union because of the collapse of the communist-dominated structure that had existed there before.

Senator Carney: Why not convey your experience? You are a farmer. You are a former Minister of Agriculture. You have been to Russia recently. Have you thought of submitting to the minister some concrete suggestions on how this could be done? I am sure she would very much appreciate input at this time.

Senator Olson: I would be very glad to do that. I thought I tried to do that on October 29 and again today. In order to give some advice on the practical applications of the services that would be necessary, obviously you need to have some expertise on the ground and to see what is missing in Odessa and in St. Petersburg and all the other places. Then we do what we can and get what help we can from the G-7 nations to replace and augment the efficiency of what is there.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS AUTHORIZED TO INQUIRE INTO DECISION TO SELL RAIL LINE

Hon. B. Alisdair Graham, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, December 10, 1991, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be empowered to inquire into and report upon the decision of Canadian National Railways to sell the main railway line between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia; and
> That the Committee present its Report no later than April 14, 1992.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I could say a few words at this time. I know that Senator MacDonald, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, would also like to participate, however briefly.

When I introduced this motion on December 9, I pointed out that the Truro-Sydney railway line is an active, living presence in Nova Scotia and that it is integral to the economic life and future development of that region. We were assured by Senator MacDonald that a private operator could, in the likelihood of its sale, operate the line efficiently. Senator MacDonald told us that an effective entrepreneurial management would, "give a marginal line... one last chance of survival before abandonment occurs." CN, we were assured, would sell the railway to a buyer interested in establishing a viable feeder line, interested in protecting the rights of the workers, and so on. There are those of un even in this chamber, who might feel that those assumptions might be just a bit optimistic.

Honourable senators, this whole question of choice, placed in the hands of Canada's largest crown corporation, a corporation which Senator MacDonald has very astutely observed to be interested entirely in the operation of its main line, is not just about buyers and sellers. The Truro-Sydney line is absolutely vital to our region, to our local shippers, and as well it serves as the principal barrier to serious congestion and safety hazards on our roads.

Therefore we are not merely looking at the question of buyers and sellers. We are looking at the question of buyer and operator responsibilities. That buyer and operator responsibility is not just to the Syscos and the Devcos and the Stora Forest Industries of today, all of whom are shippers of the present to whom the line is a fundamental necessity. As I said when I spoke first on this motion, uncertainty with respect to the future of the line will seriously impair every effort to attract new business to the region.

I am talking here about investor confidence. For this reason, a stable operating presence is absolutely essential. Shippers and potential investors, and indeed ordinary people all over eastern Nova Scotia, are greatly affected by the present uncertainty; an uncertainty which is compounded by the fear of a transitional sale to an entrepreneurial organization whose sense of responsibility to regional interests in our part of the country is still an unknown factor.

As I said in this chamber two days ago, we do not have an adequate railroad/road balance in Nova Scotia, and the situation is deteriorating. This is not an area where the market alone can serve as a regulator.

Maritimers were subjected to deadly catch phrases like "railway rationalization" at the beginning of this century. We lost a great deal as a result. The greatest loss was felt by our people. The lesson we have learned is that our future equity in Confederation depends on eternal vigilance. The future will not wait on chance; the future will not be constructed on the underpinnings of luck and circumstances. The future must not be played out like a game of Russian roulette.

With regard to the sale of the Truro-Sydney line, it is clear that the government must play a pivotal role in the preservation and protection of the interests of the people. Our Canadian association must never be managed by principles of disinterest or casual divestment. Governments must undertake the complex bargaining needed to unequivocally protect and preserve our unique regional compact.

I have already had what I consider to be beneficial discussions on this matter with Senator MacDonald, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. I would hope that if the Senate gives approval to this motion the committee would see fit to invite as witnesses a representative group of successful shortline operators, CN, federal and Nova Scotia transport officials, and a representative group from both the shippers and the communities involved. I view this issue to be not only timely but urgent and appropriate for the Senate, and I commend it for favorable consideration by all honourable senators.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I intend to support the motion by Senator Graham as a result of conversations we had and to clarify certain points that arose during our discussion last Monday. I notice that the wording of his inquiry is somewhat different than the wording of the motion. The wording of the motion restricts the inquiry to an examination of the line between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia, although I acknowledge that we will not necessarily be restricted because, in the course of committee hearings, questions will be raised with respect to other areas of Canada where there might be a line that is a candidate for abandonment.

There is no question that Senator Graham did bring up as we spoke, and I have read his presentation of last Monday, the fact that there is a problem with regional economic expansion. There seems to be something falling between two stools here. Senator Stewart drew my attention to a quotation by Senator Graham last week with respect to the comments by the author, Mr. Ernest R. Forbes, who draws a remarkable similarity between the present situation and the time when there was a dramatic decline in manufacturing industries in Nova Scotia as a result of the arrival, if you will, of the CNR or the taking over of the Intercolonial by the CNR at that particular time. The honourable senator has raised some very good points which cannot be overlooked. That is why I welcome and congratulate him on initiating this inquiry and this reference.

As well, of course, there is no question that the shippers must be heard. The honourable senator will recall the fears that I expressed and I will not go over them again. The only thing I wish to apologize for is the facetiousness with which I referred to Senator Graham's remarks with regard to symbolism. As Senator Graham now knows, in 1893 my father was the first station master at Point Tupper. He worked for the railroad to save money to go to law school. I spent my fourth, fifth, and sixth birthdays in the dining car of the train on that particular line, going from Sydney to Ottawa when my father was the Member of Parliament for Cape Breton South, and they were the happiest birthdays I ever spent in my life.

Therefore, I join Senator Graham in talking about the symbolism of this railroad and understanding the fear and apprehension of the people of that area. I hope that this committee will get down to looking at the facts in order to give the people of that part of the world, not false expectations, but some positive evidence that that line will not only survive but will improve in the future. So with those remarks, I congratulate Senator Graham. I certainly will vote in favour of his motion.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator MacDonald a question? He has spoken, I think, very effectively in favour of Senator Graham's motion. It seems to me that there is one additional point that needs to be made. It is that this line of railway, originally called the Eastern Extension of the Intercolonial, not only serves the people of Pictou County, Antigonish County and, of course, all of Cape Breton and Guysborough Counties, but it is the line of railway which serves the people of Newfoundland, insofar as railway services are concerned.

• (1650)

I hope that when the committee selects its witnesses it does not neglect the interests of shippers in Canada's most eastern province.

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, it would be remiss on my part if I were not to say something about the inquiry raised by Senator Graham.

First, I definitely support the inquiry, and I have told Senator Graham that. For many years I have been an opponent of CN closures in Nova Scotia and in the Atlantic area generally. We fought, sometimes with success and other times without, against having branch lines abandoned. However, through the years in western Nova Scotia there have been closures in the Annapolis Valley, western Nova Scotia and the South Shore. We witnessed the abandonment of VIA Rail in those areas, as well as from Truro to Cape Breton. We fought all these closures to a point at which we considered going to court over the VIA closures, but decided against it.

I think history will record that we were probably right in fighting the abandonment of all those lines. Nevertheless, some of those lines definitely should not have been closed. I refer specifically—and I think Senator Graham would agree with this—to the abandonment of the Truro to Sydney VIA Rail line. That is a closure that should not have occurred.

We are now at a point at which CN is saying that it is not abandoning the line from Truro to Cape Breton, but putting it up for sale. That is certainly just the first step towards an abandonment, as far as I am concerned.

Psychologically, it is the wrong time even for CN to be considering such a measure. It is a time when we are in a recession and when unemployment is higher in that part of Nova Scotia than in any other part of the province. It is a time when we are witnessing difficulties in the steel industry. We are having difficulties in attracting new industries. We are watching some companies and industries go out of business, something we have done over the last few years. It is the wrong time for CN even to be talking about selling its line from Truro to Sydney.

Psychologically, it will do great damage to investor confidence in that area, particularly Cape Breton, especially when investors see that Canada's national railway company appears to be giving up that part of Nova Scotia. There is no doubt in my mind, and I have spoken to many down there, including the mayors and the wardens of the area, who have confirmed that this will be a psychological blow to the confidence of people in the area. It will also be a blow to Pictou County and the Antigonish areas. There is no question about it.

If we go back over the years and consider the reasons for a national rail line, particularly those parts of the national rail line in the Atlantic provinces, we see that they were not set up for profit. They were set up as tools for economic development for this country. They were specifically set up in the Atlantic region as a tool for economic development. That was recognized for many, many years.

Perhaps Senator Stewart remembers the name of a commission back in the 1920s that looked into this matter. I should remember the name because I researched it myself. However, there is no question that the findings of that commission report were that the old Intercolonial railroad was set up as a tool for economic development, and any deficiency in terms of the cost of transportation of goods would be borne by the Dominion. Those words were practically set in stone at the time.

There is no question in my mind what should be done now. The proposed sale of this section of the railroad should be abandoned by CN. There should be no talk of it. Perhaps at some time in the future, when the economy is better, when new industries are starting and industry is thriving, CN can look into the matter again. But right now, in an economic and psychological sense, it is the wrong time to do it. Such a move will not encourage new investment, and could hasten investment coming out of the area.

I congratulate Senator Graham, and I support his motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacDonald: I just want to say to Senator Stewart that I take his point and we will look into it.

I have to say that I disagree with Senator Buchanan. If I were not so optimistic about the future of this line under private hands, I do not think I would be anxious to take on this inquiry. This is not a precursor to abandonment. It spells a whole new life for this line. Indeed, the sale of the line may take place before we have a chance to have committee hearings. Therefore, we have to apply ourselves to a whole new dimension and a whole new set of circumstances.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: If Senator Graham speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to say.

I should point out that if Senator MacDonald spent his fourth, fifth and sixth birthdays on the train, that was in 1927, 1928 and 1929. He was obviously travelling with his father, to and from Ottawa. His father was the distinguished Member of Parliament for Cape Breton South between 1925 and 1935.

When Senator MacDonald was sworn into the Senate, he had a dinner party that evening. He was kind enough to invite me as one of his guests. Senator MacDonald's younger brother, Dr. Cameron MacDonald, was in attendance, and he reminisced about their long-lost youth. He told the story about when they were in the backyard playing together, very close to their father's big car, a Hup mobile. Cameron told us about Finlay taking a hammer in his hands and driving a big spike right through one of the tires.

Hon. Senators: Shame, shame!

Senator Graham: They heard their father coming around the corner, and Finlay handed the hammer over, putting it right into Dr. Cameron's hand.

I thought of that story when Senator MacDonald was speaking on this motion and when he referred to one of the potential buyers, Rail Tex Corporation of San Antonio, Texas. When he was eulogizing the chairman of that corporation, he talked about him receiving the Golden Spike Award!

I thank Senator MacDonald and other honourable senators for their cooperation. I congratulate Senator MacDonald as chairman of the committee for continuing to hold the hammer in his hand.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

LETTERS TO MINISTER OF JUSTICE ON GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, today in my capacity as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, I am delivering a letter in both official languages to the Minister of Justice. We thank her and her officials for appearing with respect to the gun control legislation. The letter goes on to say:

> The decision to report Bill C-17 back without comment was not, however, without controversy. Various members of the Committee, from both parties, wished to see the Report incorporate a statement as to how the Bill could be improved.
> However, Committee members agreed that it would make a strong symbolic statement about the sad events of 6 December 1989 if Bill C-17 were to become law in time for the second anniversary of the Polytechnique tragedy. Since it was not possible to complete a Report incorporating the Committee's various concerns with Bill C-17 by that date, I would like to convey them to you by this letter. I am sure that, under the circumstances, you will give them as much weight as if they had formed part of the formal Report.
> As Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and on behalf of my colleagues on that Committee, I would urge you to take the following steps towards ensuring that the use of firearms in Canada is as safe as possible, and that no further lives are unnecessarily lost:
> 1. Ensure that officials have all the necessary resources to expedite the drafting of regulations and the speedy implementation of Bill C-17;
> 2. Ensure that officials give the greatest possible attention to the three areas consistently mentioned by the witnesses before our committee:
> * development of a firearms registration policy;
> * regulations ensuring better control over safe storage; and > * the implementation of better training procedures.
> On the first point, there was a general consensus that Bill C-17, with the accompanying regulations, must be implemented as expeditiously as possible. I realize you have already made such a commitment, and your officials testified that they would be working through the Christmas season to try to ensure that an initial regulatory package will be ready for the return of Parliament in early February. The Committee would, therefore, encourage you to ensure that your officials have all necessary resources to accomplish the job as quickly as possible. In addition, we urge that you give priority to the programs necessary for the effective implementation of Bill C-17, such as educating Crown attorneys, police officers and others on the use of prohibition orders in bail and peace bond proceedings.
> Second, we wish to reinforce the message delivered to the Committee that effective gun control can always be improved. Towards the close of the hearings, one Senator summed up the testimony of witnesses wishing stronger gun control as follows: better information through firearms registration, better control over safe storage and better training for firearms users.
> Our Committee recognizes that not all social problems can be solved by more legislation. There are competing interests, and the citizens being regulated often feel the restraints to be unnecessary or overly harsh. However, we feel that improvements in the three areas mentioned (firearms registration, safe storage, and training) would not place an unfair burden on firearms' owners or users. In fact, these are areas in which further regulation would only bring gun control into line with how we handle other dangerous implements, whether automobiles or toxic chemicals.
> Registering automobiles, for example, does not stop automobile accidents, or the criminally negligent use of automobiles, or the theft of automobiles for the commission of crimes. It does, however, help to control such conduct, in part by making it clear that it will be easier to trace those responsible. As the Association des Étudiants de Polytechnique said on the issue of registration—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Nurgitz, I must interrupt you—

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We give leave for the honourable senator to continue.

Senator Nurgitz: Thank you. I will continue with the letter.

> "As you know, most gun-related deaths are not created by career criminals but by people who know each other . . . We believe you cannot control something about which you have no information." Registration would also encourage firearms users to comply with future safe storage regulations.

Safe storage of firearms is a necessary precaution to ensure that third parties, who are not fully aware of the dangers involved in firearms use, cannot harm themselves or others. We regulate the safe storage of toxic materials which may be less lethal than firearms, and we would urge that you give safe storage regulations priority. Additionally, safe storage regulations would discourage the theft of weapons by unstable or anti-social personalities. At present, as one witness testified, even "current police procedures for safe storage of a gun at an officer's home do not protect it from theft or from unauthorized family use. This is the area that the statistics show most deaths come from."

Similarly, training should be required for the use of any potentially lethal objects. We do not let individuals get behind the wheel of a car on public lands without proving their competency, and their seems no reason to treat firearms use more lightly. We know that you have declared your resolve to implement the training provisions in Bill C-17. We would only add our conviction that they must be implemented without delay to prevent unnecessary injuries or deaths.

Concerns were also expressed about continued access to semi-automatic firearms. We suggest that the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms should be asked to consider the appropriate uses of semi-automatic firearms, and that you should consider putting on the restricted list all semi-automatics which are not suitable for hunting.

Finally, we would urge you to take quick action on the continuing importation into Canada of military and paramilitary firearms.

The Committee thanks you for your courtesy in appearing before us, as well as for the serious consideration we are sure these concerns will receive.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I also would like to draw the attention of senators to another matter arising out of the consideration of Bill C-17, the gun control bill, by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

At the hearings of the committee we heard from Wendy Cukier, who is President of the Coalition for Gun Control. She made a very good presentation. She was asked to provide a short document which would set out some suggestions they might have as far as regulations that they felt might be useful.

Unfortunately, that submission did not come in in time for the committee to consider it before the bill was reported and passed last week. The committee asked, and the chairman, Senator Nurgitz, undertook, to write the Minister of Justice and send along these suggestions.

I would like today to read the letter which Senator Nurgitz has undertaken to write to the Minister of Justice.

It is addressed:

The Honourable Kim Campbell, P.C., Q.C., M.P.
Minister of Justice and Attorney
General of Canada
House of Commons
Ottawa K1A 0A6

Dear Ms. Campbell:

As you know, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which I chair, recently held hearings on Bill C-17, (Gun Control). During those hearings, we asked the Coalition for Gun Control if they could provide us with a short document indicating the areas of regulation which they would consider most urgent or most important.

Although the Coalition responded promptly, my Committee had already reported Bill C-17 back to the Senate by the time we received their document, and it did not form part of the record. Therefore, I would like to draw their submission, which is attached, to your attention by way of this letter.

Sincerely,

THE HONOURABLE NATHAN NURGITZ,
Chairman.

Attached to that letter is the submission, which is very detailed and useful. It is three pages long. It is attached to the letter and will go to the minister, and the department will have the benefit of their suggestions.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Do you plan to have that become part of our record today?

Senator Nurgitz: If I might say, honourable senators, I was concerned because I am not sure there is provision for the tabling of documents at this stage of the proceedings. However, it certainly became part of the record of the committee last night.

Senator Molgat: I think it is always proper, if someone is reading from a text, for another senator to ask that the material be tabled. Therefore, I so ask.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would like to suggest that in this case we do not just table it. I was away when this bill was passed. I congratulate all my colleagues on both sides for the way they handled this bill, the timing of it and its reception by the media, and in particular for the acclamation the Senate received for its role in the passage of this bill.

• (1410)

The letter that has been read by Senator Nurgitz will be a part of the record. I think we should make a special case and ensure that the submission is also a part of the record so that someone following up on Senate activity on gun control has the entire record in Debates of the Senate and need not go elsewhere for the documents. I think both the letter and the submission should be in today's Debates of the Senate so that someone who wants to follow up can examine the whole record in one place.

I congratulate the committee on what it has done and on its plan to keep on top of the situation. We should all congratulate the committee for the work it has done up to this point and particularly for what it is doing today in keeping the question alive.

If Senators Nurgitz and Lewis can find a way to give a little extra push to what they did today by way of a press conference or press release, I hope they will do so.

Senator Lewis: I would like to make clear, senators, that this letter has not actually been sent yet. It is a letter which Senator Nurgitz, the chairman, has undertaken to send.

Senator Frith: I understand that. He is sending that letter.

Senator Lewis: The letter and the submission are not in both languages as yet.

Senator Frith: It will be translated if we put it in Debates of the Senate.

The Speaker: Is that agreed honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of letters, see appendix, p. 794).

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

REPORT OF CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, on another matter, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has recently released a report that will be of particular interest to all members of this chamber.

The report details the results of an extensive study on the impact of the goods and services tax on Canadian business. The study found that the GST has been a tremendous burden on Canadian business with a disproportionate load being placed on the shoulders of small business.

The CFIB conducted a survey of its members six months after the implementation and received 25,362 responses. This was the strongest response ever received from its membership.

The findings of the survey indicated that 70.6 per cent of the responding membership found that the GST had a negative impact on their business. Only 8 per cent believed the effect to be positive. That sounds like the 8 per cent who support the Prime Minister. Another 14.4 per cent found that the GST had no bearing.

The major complaint about the GST expressed by members of the federation was the costs associated with the implementation of the tax for their business. With respect to cost, 85 per cent of survey respondents said that the implementation of the GST had increased their costs. Most respondents suggested that time needed to deal with GST-related matters was a considerable cost to their businesses and, of course, these costs disproportionately affect smaller businesses because the related duties are more likely to be taken by the owner or manager rather than the accounting staff which a larger firm may already employ.

I was particularly interested to find that the majority of the CFIB members involved in the manufacturing industry, the industry which it was said would be helped most by the introduction of the GST, had a negative response to the GST. Only 16.7 per cent of respondents found the effects of the tax to be positive, while 52.1 per cent of the manufacturers were negatively affected.

In a statement on their report the federation concluded that:

> After several months of living with the GST, Canadians can now safely conclude that the GST simply does not work. The government owes this country an apology in the form of rapid policy changes to reduce the enormous and regressive burden of this tax.

Finally, honourable senators, considering that tomorrow, Friday, the 13th of December, is the anniversary of the third reading of Bill C-62, the GST bill, I would ask my colleagues on the other side of this Chamber, as they celebrate their proud victory of that day, to remain mindful of the disaster they have inflicted on the people of Canada through this tax.

Senator Frith: Well said.

Senator Olson: Hang your heads a little.

An Hon. Senator: Shame, shame.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Murray: What is it that Mr. Chrétien says?

Senator Frith: That is the best thing he can come up with? Maybe he can blame it on Mr. Trudeau, or maybe even Mr. Pearson. Don't talk about your policy. Talk about ours. Never talk about your own policy.

Senator Murray: The policy has changed.

Senator Frith: Maybe he can find fault with something Mr. Saint-Laurent said.

Senator Perrault: What about Mackenzie King?

Senator Frith: Why not? Maybe Sir John A.

Senator Barootes: What about the provincial sales tax? So easy to collect—8, 9, 11 per cent?

Senator Frith: Shout out your penitence; confession is good for the soul.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please, honourable senators.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL FINANCE

CONTINUANCE OF MONETARY POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he give us a complete explanation of what "stay the course" means? The Minister of Finance has been saying that for several weeks; in fact, he said it again yesterday. I wish to know whether that means we will continue with the monetary policy that has led us into the worst depression that Canada has had in 50 years?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: How can you be so partisan just before Christmas?

Senator Olson: I am just stating facts. Does the government really believe that to "stay the course" will bring Canada out of this current economic depression?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend is inviting me to make a statement which would take much longer than is normally permitted on an oral question, but perhaps I could give him a few highlights of the government's economic and fiscal policy—

Senator Perrault: Or more like low lights.

Senator Murray: —in which we are persevering because of the excellent results that have been shown. Let me simply mention that the course we set in economic and fiscal policy for this country in 1984 represented quite a change from the policies of our predecessors.

Senator Perrault: It is going straight down now.

Senator Olson: It has gone straight down ever since.

Senator Murray: For example, in the 15 years prior to 1984, program spending by my friends opposite increased by 14 per cent every year for 15 years.

Senator Perrault: Tell us about unemployment.

Senator Murray: During that period of time, the debt in Canada increased by 1,100 per cent. That was a course that had to be changed.

In the last six years, as I have told the honourable senator on many occasions, program spending by the federal government has increased at an average annual rate less than inflation of 3.6 per cent. That represents a change in course which is helping to bring inflation down; which is helping to—

Senator Perrault: You are bringing the country down; that is what you are doing.

Senator Murray: —bring interest rates down, which is creating new investment in the Canadian economy. That is an economic course in which we are persevering.

Let me remind the honourable senator that 10 years ago when he was in office, and partly responsible for economic policy, short-term interest rates were 18.8 per cent.

Senator Olson: For a very short time.

[Senator Hays.]

Senator Murray: Today they are about 7 per cent and declining. That is the course on which we have put Canada and that is the course in which we are persevering with the results that the honourable senator knows.

The honourable senator bitterly fought the Free Trade Agreement. I just want to mention to him that since the Free Trade Agreement was brought in there has been a net inflow of foreign investment in Canada of some $4 billion—

Senator Perrault: And an outflow of jobs.

Senator Murray: For the first time in 15 years there is that type of net investment flowing into Canada creating the new jobs that Canadians need. When we say—and Mr. Mazankowski says—that we intend to "stay the course", that is the course that we are persevering in to the great benefit of Canada and Canadians.

Inflation is dropping, interest rates are falling, the economy is on track for what the International Monetary Fund says will be the strongest economic growth among G-7 countries in 1992. That is what we mean by "staying the course".

Senator Olson: There are more questions. As usual, the minister has displayed his great talent for giving a reply but no answer. He did not even answer the question I asked him.

Does "staying the course" mean that you will continue the monetary policy that has driven bankruptcies in Canada to their highest level?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: And in the United States and in Europe and in Australia? Did we cause all that, too?

Senator Olson: There is some noise here. I want to ask the minister seriously—if Senator Barootes can contain himself for a minute—whether or not the government means by "staying the course" that it will continue with the monetary policy that it has been following insofar as interest rates are concerned and the consequent influence that that has on the Canadian dollar?

For example, the minister has said on many occasions that the Canadian dollar can find its own value according to market conditions. Yesterday, because of whatever was happening in the market, the Canadian dollar began to decline and the Bank of Canada intervened to buy significant quantities in order to keep it from dropping. Do you intend to stay on that course, too?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Olson will have seen the statement by the Governor of the Bank about the reasons for the intervention of the bank on the occasion to which he refers.

The honourable senator talks about monetary policy; it is a large subject. He asked whether we intend to stay the course. He asked what the results have been. Let me give him one statistic: The prime rate today is 8 per cent, the lowest in 18 years. Yes, we intend to stay the course.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to ask one more question. I wonder if the minister could do a little more arithmetic. It is true that the bank rate and the prime rate have come down, but the percentage of difference between the Canadian rate and the United States rate has not changed. In fact, it has become worse.

Senator Barootes: It is 2 per cent.

Senator Olson: It is two and a half per cent.

Senator Barootes: It is coming down.

Senator Olson: Foreign capital buying in Canadian dollars or Canadian instruments can now attract about 60 per cent more interest in Canada because of the government's monetary policy. Obviously that will keep the Canadian dollar at an artificially high level in relation to the economic activity that would otherwise support it at whatever level that would be. Most people who study those things think it would be somewhere around $.80 or slightly less. The intervention of the Bank of Canada and its percentage of increase over interest rates in other countries is what is keeping the dollar up and, consequently, keeping our trade statistics in a very bad position because our exporters are having difficulty. Is that what you mean by "stay the course" also?

Senator Perrault: They have had the course!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend is not well informed as to what has been happening in terms of the spread between U.S. and Canadian interest rates. The fact is that the spread has been narrowing, and has narrowed from 5.5 per cent to 2.5 per cent.

Senator Olson: Not as a percentage.

Senator Murray: I am talking about Canada and U.S. interest rates.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to continue this line of questioning. I think it is a simple truth that when capital costs more money in Canada than it costs our neighbor and our largest competitor, Canadian industry and Canadian consumers will not assist in the construction of the Canadian economy. What is happening with the high level of the Canadian dollar in U.S. dollar terms is, as Senator Olson has said, that Canadian consumers are on strike and they are shopping south of the border where cost advantage is offered to them. It will not be very long before the impact of the current situation in the retailing industry is felt in Canadian manufacturing and in the Canadian natural resources sector.

I suppose that the minister is not aware, to take one industry, of the condition of the B.C. coal industry. The B.C. coal industry has lost, in their estimate, something in the order of $220 million since 1988 as a result of the government's policies with respect to the relationship between the Canadian and U.S. dollars. The B.C. coal industry continues to lose money and if the downturn continues in this same fashion through 1992, I can tell you that the government's policies with respect to inflation management will create a critical structural downsizing in manufacturing, in the primary sector and in retailing in this country. That downsizing is not easily recovered. In fact, it is unlikely to be recovered.

I would ask the minister if the government is considering with the question of stimulating the Canadian economy—one measure being to allow true market action with respect to the Canadian dollar in terms of other currencies—or whether the minister believes that simply by staying the course the Canadian economy can be brought on side?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am astonished that Senator Austin believes that the monetary authorities in this country are not following what he calls a true market approach.

Senator Olson: They are not, because there is an artificial interest rate.

Senator Murray: The fact that the Bank of Canada may intervene from time to time, as it always does, to stabilize the fluctuations that occur because of market conditions does not mean that, essentially, market conditions are not setting the value of the Canadian dollar. Senator Austin has made a speech concerning the coal industry in British Columbia and other matters that would be better made on senatorial statements. Senator Olson asked a question, or referred in the course of a question to our trade and to exports. I have to tell him that exports increased 22.2 per cent in the second quarter of this year. The record is pretty positive in that respect. The honourable senator should study the facts before he makes these doom-and-gloom pronouncements.

Senator Austin: I think in fairness, Senator Murray should also take a look at the performance of Canada's current account balance on the import side and note that the net balance has dropped to a negative balance for the first time in many years. That is an issue of some concern. I am saying to Senator Murray that, with respect to the level of the Canadian dollar, it has been the policy of the Bank of Canada, and that is the information I have from economists with whom I have spoken, to ensure that Canada is able to borrow to meet its debt requirements. That is one of the reasons why the interest rate is the prevailing managed rate in this country. I am sure Senator Murray will deny that and say that it is a true managed rate. If he would like to continue that debate, I think we could have some economists come before our banking committee on the subject. I would be delighted if he would propose a motion to enquire into this matter.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Ordinary people do not believe you, anyway.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES ON BUSINESS AND EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is interesting to listen to Senator Murray give us all these glowing figures. It is unfortunate that the unemployed people in Canada do not have the same view as he, and I think their view is the correct one.

Not too long ago, General Motors announced that they were planning to shut down their plant in Scarborough, Ontario. That Scarborough closing scheduled for 1993 would result in the loss of 2,700 jobs. Then yesterday we get the announcement from GM again that they will now proceed with the shutting down of an Oshawa plant, this one with some 3,700 jobs.

The Minister tells us all about the beauties of the GST and the FTA, and here we have an industry of vital importance to Canada, an industry in which prior to the FTA we had a good understanding with the United States under the Auto Pact. We are now hearing of closing after closing, and unemployed people increasing in numbers every time.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have had a recession, and during a recession—

Hon. H.A. Olson: Have we ever had a recession. We are still having it, too.

Senator Murray: During a recession, the country loses jobs, as it most emphatically did and to a far greater extent in the recession of the early 1980s. But that is another matter. I think it is an indication of the recovery that we have now recovered more than half of the jobs that were lost during the recession. If you want to look at a longer time frame, since 1984 you will find that almost 1.4 million new jobs have been created since that time in this country under this government, and to some extent thanks to this government's policies and to the course on which we launched the country with respect to economic policy.

Senator Molgat: Could the Minister tell us whether the protection that we previously had under the Auto Pact with the Americans is still in place? It seems to me that what was working very well prior to the FTA is now falling apart.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact is still very much in force, as the honourable senator knows. I mentioned a few moments ago that exports had increased more than 22 per cent in the second quarter. I can add that automotive exports accounted for more than two-thirds of that increase.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE

INCREASE IN SPENDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, the question I am about to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate is prompted by a story I read this morning in the Ottawa Sun. It is headed:

> The Prime Minister's Office spends $102 million.

A title does not necessarily upset me, but I kept reading.

> Spending in Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's Privy Council Office has ballooned to $102 million from $46 million only two years ago.

I kept reading, but the rest is immaterial.

[Senator Molgat.]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Marie Simard: Honourable senators, perhaps the honourable Senator could keep on reading. The rest may not be totally immaterial. There is even a reference to certain senators from a party which, by the way, you have supported indirectly during the big debate on the GST.

Senator Robichaud: No, no. There is a whole list, but it is not related to the question I am about to ask the leader of the government. Senator Simard, who talks non-stop, had better be quiet at this time.

Senator Simard: The Liberals have asked me that for years. It is but one of their recommendations that I did not follow and I am none the worse for it.

[English]

Senator Robichaud: My civilized question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Considering the fact that the Privy Council Office is costing the taxpayers of Canada $102 million, and considering the fact that the Senate of Canada is costing the taxpayers of Canada much less than half that amount, would it not be better to abolish the Privy Council Office rather than continue talking about abolishing the Senate?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will not be incited by the honourable senator—

Senator Robichaud: Can we hear the answer, please.

Senator Murray: I should say that I welcome the opportunity to explain that the increase in spending in the Privy Council Office is due in very large measure to the increase in the number of commissions of inquiry that have been established. In 1980-90, the commissions of inquiry activity spent approximately $3 million, while the 1990 expenditures totalled $44.4 million dollars, for a difference of $41.4 million.

In 1989-90, the two major commissions in operation were the Royal Commission on the Future of the Toronto Waterfront and the Commission of Inquiry into Use of Drugs and Banned Substances Intended to Increase Athletic Performance. During 1990-91, in addition to the two previous commissions, there were an additional five commissions in operation, the Commission of Inquiry into the Air Ontario Crash at Dryden, Ontario, the Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation, the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies, the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing, and the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. There is something wrong with the sound system.

The Hon. the Speaker: Excuse me, honourable senators—

Hon. C. William Doody: Could we have some order, please?
