POETRY.

ORIGINAL. Written by a Father upon parting with his Daughter after her Marriage.

There is a pang—a bitter pang,
When child and parent part,
The father sheds no burning tear
But oh! it wirings the heart;
To look on that he loved so well,
And then to see it sever,
Perhaps, for oh can mortal tell
To meet again, no never.

Is there a plain domestic thing Is there a plan domestic thing
That we were wont to see,
Inanimate, but being there
We'd always wish would be.
Remove it, and the eye will turn
Upon the lonely spot,
And tho no anguish makes you mount
It is not soon forgot.

Pew years, and on the parents knee
The little infant smiled,
And seems it but the other day
He looked upon a child.
Yet ere the rose is hardly grown
To grace the parent stem,
We wait not till its fully blown,
But pluck the fragrant gem.

Ee'n the consigned to worth and love,
And every care at rest,
The pang of parting still will rise,
Within the parent's breast.
For there's a pang—a bitter pang,
When child and parent part,
The father sheds no burning tear,
But oh! it wrings the heart.
J. L. W.

The Daughter's reply to her Father

There is a pang at parting known,
Most when affection smiled,
My Father thou that pang didst own
At parting from thy child.
Yet in thy breast alone confined
Say did the sorrow dwell,
At no! the pang that touched thy mind,
Thy daughter shared as well.

Affection like a summer rose, Blooms sweetly in the heart, May ours my father never close. Its fragrance ne'er depart. But live to bless us many a day, The same thro' good and ill, And ee'n the' life should fade away, Unchanged and fragrant still.

The sorrow that at parting swells Our hearts, would long remain, If 'twere not for the hope which tells Of meeting soon sgain.
But though we feel the pang severe.
My father twill be sweet,
To find that plessare doubly dear,
When child and parent meet.
