Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Then I shall be very glad to make it.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT. 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved concurrence in certain amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service. He said: The amendments will be found on pages 885 and 886 of the Votes and Proceedings for the 9th of August. The first amendment is the insertion of the definition of the word "tribunal" in section 1. The amendment is merely this:

> Tribunal means a tribunal constituted under this Act.

The next amendment is to section 7. Section 7 makes provision for appeals of tribunals. By inadvertence, when the Bill went through the House of Commons, there was no appeal tribunal provided for the Yukon Territory. The Senate has accordingly amended section 7 by the addition of subsection 2 in these words:

> The Judge of the Territorial Court, or the person appointed in the place of the said judge under the provisions of the Yukon Act, shall constitute the Appeal Tribunal for the Yukon Territory.

The third amendment is one that was suggested in this House by an hon. gentleman on the other side, I think, the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), and which it was intended to insert before the Bill went through this House. It is an amendment to section 16 which provides penalties for certain contraventions of the Act and of the regulations. The amendment, which is by the addition of subsection 4 to section 16, is in these words:

> No conviction in a court of criminal jurisdiction for an offence against this Act or the regulations made thereunder shall be had, unless the prosecution has been consented to or approved by the Attorney General of Canada.

It is not necessary that the approval of the Attorney General should be obtained before the prosecution is commenced. It is necessary, however, that that approval should be obtained before there is a conviction.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish very respectfully to ask the Prime Minister why the consideration of these amendments has been delayed for so long, namely from the 9th to the 18th of August?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not aware that there is any particular reason, except that other business has been engaging the attention of the House, from time to time, and in any event, there is really no delay as the Bill cannot go into operation until it receives the assent of the Governor General.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not expect this matter to come up to-day, and therefore I will ask my right hon. friend for information in regard to a matter with which he is perhaps more familiar than I am. What is the effect of the amendment in regard to the word "tribunal" so far as habeas corpus and the right of prerogative are concerned?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The amendment is merely a definition of the word "tribunal," which definition the word would bear in any case. The word "tribunal" is used throughout this Act everywhere in that sense in which it is first mentioned, that is, a tribunal created by this Act for the purpose of this Act. The Senate, in the definitions, has provided that the word "tribunal" shall be used in that sense. I think it would be understood in that sense in any case.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The definition is quite proper and I do not object to it. It is an improvement in the Act that we should know exactly what is meant by the word "tribunal." By this Act a special tribunal is created. I cannot, however, find the provisions as to the application of habeas corpus or the right of prerogative. Do they apply to this tribunal or not?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. I think that was fully explained when the Bill went through the House. I do not think the amendment affects that particular point at all.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Permit me to point out to the Prime Minister that the word "conviction" does not seem to be the proper word. Would not "prosecution" be better? Would it not be possible under this provision to start a prosecution, to issue a warrant and to take certain proceedings against an offender prior to conviction, without securing the approval of the Attorney General? I think it would meet the case if we said that no prosecution shall be had.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would hardly agree with my hon. friend. For this reason: it might be most important to apprehend an offender immediately, and that could not be done in some instances, if the local authorities had first to obtain the consent of the Minister of Justice. As I understand it, the word "conviction" is used purposely in order that an apprehension may not be interfered with, and so that, on the other hand, before a conviction can be obtained, the approval of the Attorney General shall be procured.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Which means that the defendant can say to the judge: "You cannot convict me because the suit has not been authorized."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There can be no conviction unless the suit is authorized, and that is what the defendant could say when he was brought before a court.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is it precisely. Before there is a conviction there must be approval of the proceedings by the Attorney General of Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: This reminds me very strongly of the proceedings in the Macdonald election in Manitoba, where men were arrested without charge, and after being incarcerated for a period, were released without trial. Of all the remarkable provisions of this Act, I think this is the most remarkable.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think this amendment was suggested from the other side of the House. I do not regard it as remarkable at all, and I do not see the slightest analogy to the proceedings to which my hon. friend alludes, of which I have no knowledge. It merely amounts to this: that proceedings can be commenced against an offender under this Act without the approval of any person, but before a conviction is obtained it is necessary that the matter should be submitted to the Attorney General in order that he may determine according to his best judgment whether the case is one in which the proceedings should be carried to conviction. I am pretty sure that the amendment was suggested by an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, and I know the Minister of Justice promised at that time to give consideration to it, but it was overlooked before the Bill went through, and the amendment was made in the Senate.

Mr. OLIVER: If the suggestion came from this side of the House, may I ask if it was not in the form suggested by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair)?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend may be correct about that; I am not sure. But if the suggestion was made in that form, it seems to me that it would not lend any weight to the argument which my hon. friend has just made.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I had occasion once to look into a similar provision. I had not thought of the matter until I heard it discussed the other day, but the Supreme Court has held that it would be necessary for the Attorney General to sign that consent in person and not by deputy. It would certainly be putting a heavy burden on the Minister of Justice to require his personal consent. I had this question under consideration in setting aside several convictions that were made against an offender under the Lord's Day Act, which has a somewhat similar provision in it, and it was held by the Supreme Court that unless the Attorney General signed the consent in person the conviction should be set aside. I think this amendment would prove to be very cumbersome in practice.

Mr. MURPHY: I was going to suggest the very same thing, namely, that under this provision it would be possible to have people all over the country apprehended and put in jail and held there until the Minister of Justice could personally deal with each particular case, when it might be found there was no reason at all for the apprehension in the first place. I have no recollection, although I listened to the debate very closely, of any such amendment being suggested from this side of the House, but if there was, I think it must have been in the form suggested by my hon. friend from Guysborough. If not, I should like the hon. member who suggested the amendment to explain what he meant by it.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Prime Minister was good enough to refer to me in connection with this amendment. The suggestion was made by myself to the Minister of Justice on the second reading of the Bill. There was quite a heated discussion in the House on the point that any person might lay an information and have a person arrested for some trivial reason, and I suggested to the Minister of Justice that it would allay the suspicions and fears of a great many people if it were provided that no prosecution could be commenced except with his consent, and Hansard will show that the minister said he would take that suggestion into consideration. That was the suggestion I made. I certainly would not think of proposing that you should go on up to the stage of conviction without getting the consent of the Minister of Justice. This amendment is certainly not what I proposed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Regardless of which side of the House the suggestion came from, I think we all want to see the provision made right. If it is worth the form of an amendment, it is surely worth amending in the best form we can devise. The law recognizes that a man should be preserved and protected against something vexatious. The presumption is that the only vexatious thing would be the prosecution. If the conviction is a just one, no man should be protected against that, and all the Attorney Generals in Canada should not forbid a judge from registering a conviction where a conviction should be registered; if the conviction be unjust, then we must presume that there will be no conviction, but the jury will say, "Not guilty." The thing on the face of it seems to me to be absurd. The principle is that we should not lead up to a conviction where no conviction is possible; it is those proceedings which cannot end in a conviction that it is desired to protect a man against. Where there is going to be a conviction against a man, he deserves no protection. Therefore, I think the amendment as it stands at present is an absurdity. There is something in what the Prime Minister says, that there might be exceptional cases where it would be necessary that the law should reach out its arm more swiftly than could be done by going to the department at Ottawa. But even to cover those cases it is not necessary that the protection against vexatious proceedings should be withdrawn to the extent of protecting a man only against conviction. Surely it is not the intention of this legislative body to say that we are going to allow all the vexatious proceedings of a trial to go on when they might just as well be stopped. Therefore, to meet the Prime Minister it is enough to say, that. barring the right of the law to keep a man under supervision or in custody, there shall be no prosecution against him without the leave of the Attorney General. This would avoid all the expense and delay of the preliminary proceedings. On the face of it, whichever ground you like to stand on, I think the amendment is an absolute absurdity.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But in the other way: "No trial shall be proceeded with until, etc."

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, something along that line, although I do not see much need of the amendment at all. It would be better, I think. to leave it to the local Crown Prosecutors, and the agents for the Attorney Generals. It seems to me it would be very cumbersome to have to come to Ottawa for consent to proceed in these cases. I think the amendment should be redrafted, even from the standpoint of the Prime Minister.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot agree with my hon. friend at all. I think he is conjuring up imaginary difficulties. For the reason I have already mentioned, it would be impossible to accept the section suggested by the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) because it might lead to failure to apprehend persons seriously offending against the Act or regulations. The administration of this Act is entrusted to the Minister of Justice, and it is thought desirable that his approval should be secured before any conviction is obtained for contravention of the Act or the regulations. My hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) and my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) have described a situation which I would not think likely to arise. In case of a prosecution under this Act, that would happen? Immediately after the man was apprehended or the summons served upon him, as the case may be, the persons undertaking the prosecution would request the approval of the Minister of Justice, which would be given or withheld at once. There could not be any delay such as my hon. friend from Russell has described, because the proceedings against any person apprehended must go on according to the provisions of the Summary Convictions Act or the other enactments governing such cases, and it would not be possible to hold people in prison for a long time while the Minister of Justice was deliberating as to whether or not his approval should be given. It seems to me the provision is an eminently reasonable one, having regard to the fact that it requires the approval of the minister to whom is entrusted the duty of administering the provisions of the Act.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Under this motion it is not competent for an hon. member to address the House more than once. I have relaxed the rule in the case of the Prime Minister, for the reason that in the absence of the Minister of Justice it seemed reasonable that some explanation should be forthcoming.

Amendments concurred in.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Civil Government—Office of the Governor General's Secretary. To provide for the promotion of John Guy, to doorkeeper and principal orderly, $1,000.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This is merely to carry out the provisions of an Act passed at the present session with regard to the increase of salaries of men in the lower grades of service. Mr. Guy has been doorkeeper for a long time, and is entitled to the promotion.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Privy Council Office—To provide for the promotion of Arthur W. Merriam from Third Division, Subdivision A, to Second Division, Subdivision B, at his present salary, $1,150.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This does not involve any increase in expense at the present time. Mr. Merriam has been in the Third Division, Subdivision A, for six years. He is a very efficient official and is entrusted with fairly important dutes. I thought it was only reasonable to give him promotion at this time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is the increase $1,150?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, there is no increase in salary at all.

Mr. MURPHY: I have no objection to the promotions provided for in those two items, but in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister that they are to give effect to the provisions of some legislation introduced earlier in the session—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not this one. The previous one was.

Mr. MURPHY: It strikes me that the two gentlemen here provided for seem to be singled out for attention, while a great many others in the lower subdivisions of the Civil Service, whose cases were brought to the attention of the House when the Civil Service Act was under consideration, have been overlooked. There are men in the lowest division who, by reason of the application of the Civil Service Act and their inability to obtain the certificate provided for under the regulations, have been stranded—marooned, so to speak. They have reached the maximum of their class and are unable to obtain further advancement. There are several hundreds of such employees, some of them in the Post Office Department, some of them in the Customs or other departments. There are anomalies presented in those departments of men being in charge of a room who are in lower grades than their subordinates. It seems to me if there was a provision made in the estimates for the relief of any of the civil servants receiving small salaries and discharging important duties, it should apply to this class of men.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will observe that item 411 provides a general vote for a number of them.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, I noticed that. Perhaps we will have an explanation as to whom that item will apply to, when we reach it.

Department of External Affairs—To provide for an increase in salary to the assistant Under Secretary of State for External Affairs to $4,000, $425.

To provide for one clerkship in Third Division, Subdivision A, $900.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is this assistant?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. W. H. Walker. My hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) who was Secretary of State for External Affairs probably knows this gentleman's qualities as well as I do. He is a highly educated man, who entered the public service many years ago.

I have found him exceedingly diligent and very efficient. In the absence of Sir Joseph Pope, inevitable on a great many occasions during the past three years when he was called upon to discharge important duties elsewhere, Mr. Walker has fulfilled the duties of the under-secretary with marked ability. Sir Joseph Pope has brought his case to my attention on many occasions during the past three years and, having regard to the extremely important duties that Mr. Walker has been called upon to fulfil during that period, it seemed to me that I could not delay the matter any longer.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these appointments made under the Civil Service Act?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Walker has been there for thirty years.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this a promotion by virtue of the Civil Service Act or by special vote?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: By special vote.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the Civil Service Act is not now sufficient to cover a case of this kind, or is not sufficiently comprehensive to meet each case that may come up from time to time, I would suggest that the Act be amended. This tinkering with the Civil Service, taking a man here and there, promoting him over the head of somebody else and coming here for his salary, does not seem to be satisfactory. If the machinery of the Act were so arranged as to provide for dealing with matters of this kind in accordance with the Act it would save a good deal of trouble and would avoid dissatisfaction amongst civil servants. Of course there cannot but be serious trouble and annoyance when two or three are singled out for promotion, while a great many others are of necessity left who are looking for promotion. I would seriously suggest to the Government that sufficiently comprehensive and workable machinery should be provided under the Civil Service Act so that the Government would not be obliged to come here for special votes to provide for special appointments:

Royal Northwest Mounted Police—subsistence, billeting, forage and dog feed, fuel and light, clothing, repairs and renewals, horses, arms and ammunition, stationery, medical stores, transport, water service, building repairs and contingencies—further amount required, $260,000.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Before the explanation of this item is given, I would like to give the information which was asked for when a similar item in the estimates was under consideration. The inquiry was as to the number of men in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police who had enlisted for service for overseas. After the war broke out there were 56 Imperial reservists in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police and they were allowed their immediate discharge, they having been called to the colours. There were a number of applications from the members of the force to proceed to the front, or failing leave of absence, for their discharge. It did not seem expedient at that time that in these cases leave should be given. On the 2nd February, 1915, an order was issued as follows:

That any non-commissioned officer or constable who has less than three months to serve to complete his present engagement, may be permitted to purchase his discharge for the purpose of joining any contingent being raised for war services, provided he produces certificates that he will be enrolled in a contingent as above stated, if he is permitted to purchase his discharge from the police. This privilege is not to be extended to men who engaged for one year's service on account of the war.

That relates to the additions made to the force during the first months of the war whereby men were enlisted for one year instead of the usual three years. That order has never been cancelled, but it has recently been found necessary to temporarily suspend its application. One hundred and five men have been permitted to purchase their discharge, 75 of whom are known to have enlisted for service overseas and all of whom, with the exception of about six, have already gone overseas. In addition to those who have purchased their discharge, a considerable number of men whose terms of service have expired since the outbreak of the war have taken their discharge from the force, and, although there is no official record of these men having joined overseas units, the comptroller of the Northwest Mounted Police is strongly of the opinion that the majority of them have done so. The loss of strength due to the release of men at the expiration of their engagement was so serious that I was obliged to address a special appeal to all ranks with the view of retaining their services in Canada. The present authorized strength of the force is 1,200, exclusive of officers, but the actual strength of all ranks on 3rd August was 742 only, and the commissioner is now actively engaged in an endeavour to bring the force up to the authorized strength above quoted.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: This vote of $260,000 is made necessary by the fact that on January 1, 1917, the Mounted Police were released from duty in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba and on March 1 from duty in the province of Alberta. This meant a loss of revenue to the police, on account of the subsidies that were received from these provinces being withdrawn, as follows:

Subsidies from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba for the fiscal year 1917-18 not now available on account of the release of the Northwest Mounted Police from the duty of the maintenance of law and order in those provinces	$155,000
Refunds not now available for the causes above referred to	$92,500

These refunds were on account of amounts paid for patrols and escorts, etc., of convicts and lunatics that were paid out of police funds and afterwards refunded by the provinces to the police. The balance is an item of $12,500, which, the commissioner states, is necessary for one hundred remounts.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not exactly apprehend the explanation. The House is asked to vote $260,000 additional to what has been voted already. As I understand the explanation, there is no addition to the amount of money really voted and to be expended, but that this is simply to make up the amount of money which was paid by the three provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan for the protection of the police. This money, as I always understood, was paid into the consolidated fund and was not expended by the police themselves. I do not understand why we are called on to vote more money because we receive less revenue. That is not the spirit of the Act or of our financial system. The principle is that money is voted here and is expended here, and any revenues go into the consolidated fund. This year we shall receive less money and so we shall have less to expend, the expenditure will be reduced because the police force which was employed in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan will no longer be employed there, as the Provincial Governments will have to look after their own police work.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: The amount asked for in the main estimates was $1,513,169. From this amount the sum of $355,000 was deducted, which represented the subsidies that we received from these three provinces as well as refunds, leaving a net amount required of $1,158,169. As I said, on 1st of January and 1st March, the police were released from duty by the provinces, and consequently the subsidies stopped, and a considerable portion of the $355,-
4 p.m. 000 that we used to receive will, of course, not now be available. In January, 1917, when the commissioner sent down his estimates, while these estimates were made after the change was made by the provinces. These figures did not reach the Minister of Finance in time to go into the main estimates, and the amount of $260,000 is required to make up the difference.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But it does not make it up. My hon. friend asks for $1,300,000 in the main estimates for subsidies, subsistence, billeting, forage, dog feed, fuel, light, clothing, etc—that is, for the general expenses of the police. Now he asks for $262,000 more for the same purpose. He is authorized to spend by this not only $1,300,000 but over $1,500,000. It is no answer to tell us there is less revenue; that is no explanation at all. Whether there is less or more revenue does not matter. Do we require this amount for these purposes? I could understand my honourable friend saying that owing to the increased cost of all commodities this increased amount was necessary, but certainly it is no explanation to tell us that we have less revenue than we had before.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: I am sorry I have not made myself plain. I said that the amount required was $1,513,169; but that, on account of this new arrangement, this had been reduced by the amount of $355,-000 which we used to receive from these sources.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That does not help the situation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If there is any difficulty we shall let this stand so as to have a full explanation. It would appear that the amounts which have been received from the provinces have been placed at the disposal of the Controller of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, but he made his estimate up for each year to ascertain the amount which would be required, and he then deducted from it the amounts which were made available through the subsidies of the provinces. Then he came to Parliament and asked for the balance, whatever it might be. When those subsidies cease to be available for a portion of the year he finds it necessary to come and ask for an additional amount, which, in the first instance, would have been provided for except for the fact that these subsidies were available for the maintenance of the force.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is highly irregular.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I think I have a little knowledge of the transaction in my province. There was an outstanding agreement between this Government and the Provincial Government. Under that agreement the province was to pay a certain sum to the Federal Government for the use of the police and to pay part of their cost of upkeep, etc. That sum of money was deducted from the total cost and this Parliament voted the difference, and what we passed in the main estimates was the difference between the total cost and the sum received from the provinces under the agreement. What we are now voting is that sum, which represented the payments made by the provinces under the agreement, and what the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says as to our voting the whole sum and then taking the amount received from the provinces into the consolidated revenue fund would, undoubtedly, be the proper course.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But in practice this Parliament voted only the difference between the total cost and the amount contributed by the provinces.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand the explanation, but the practice is not regular. In my time it was not done. This conveys a wrong impression; it conveys the impression that we have been spending $1,300,000, whereas we have been spending $1,500,000.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I can assure my right hon. friend that I made no change in the practice. Whether the practice is right or wrong, I think it must have been in force all along, as I never directed any change.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The change is in the controllership. Is this not to be rectified?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is nothing to rectify now, because the system has been changed. I shall ascertain whether or not the practice referred to has been universal ever since the agreement was first made. I am inclined to think that under the Order in Council embodying the agreement between the provinces and the Dominion it was regarded as perfectly proper and regular that the amounts received from the provinces should go directly into the funds available for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Representing an eastern constituency, I should like an explanation why Parliament is assuming a liability that was formerly assumed by the western provinces.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Commissioner of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, Mr. Perry, strongly recommended that during the war the force should be relieved from the duties which it had hitherto performed—duties of an ordinary police nature—and that its services should be retained for federal purposes. It has been thought expedient to establish a good many patrols that were not formerly necessary and to take other precautions in respect of contingencies for which the police are available. It was upon his report that the negotiations were entered into with the provinces in question and that the present arrangement has been arrived at.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We understand, then, that the Mounted Police are not doing the same provincial work that they formerly did.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They formerly did all the police work of the Northwest Territories before those territories were incorporated into provinces. They were the only police there at that time. After the provinces were established, I suppose local police forces were established in the cities and towns; nevertheless the Royal Northwest Mounted Police had detachments in all cities and towns and co-operated with the civil authorities whenever required; in fact, they were under obligation to do so. Conditions in that respect have changed a good deal in those provinces during the last ten or twelve years. Further, on account of the exigencies of the war the commissioner thought that the services of the force should be reserved for purely federal purposes. I think that I sent my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at the time a copy of the report of the commissioner in regard to the matter, before the negotiations were consummated.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes. I understand the matter, after the new provinces were created in 1905 the Governor in Council made arrangements with the Provincial Governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan to continue the services of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, $150,000 being devoted to that purpose. The Mounted Police performed provincial as well as federal duties; they acted as constables in matters purely provincial. In view of the conditions relating to the war, however, it was advisable that the Mounted Police should be relieved from provincial duties and enabled to perform duties at the frontier incidental to guarding against the danger, I will not say of an invasion, but of a raid, or something of that kind, from the south. I think, therefore, that it was advisable, under the stress of the times, that the Mounted Police should be available purely for federal purposes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) know of his own knowledge that the provincial bonus was paid out without the vote of Parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: I was told that it was sent to the comptroller of the Mounted Police and by him deposited to the credit of the Mounted Police fund, and that against that fund they issued cheques without the matter being dealt with by Parliament at all. My information was the result of my making some inquiries in consequence of the termination of the agreement. I may not have the full explanation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not at all familiar with the rules of the Auditor General's Department, but it seems remarkable that he should authorize the payment out of such large sums of money without the authority of Parliament.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The Mounted Police Department handled their own cheques.

Mr. KNOWLES: It ought to have been done through the Auditor General's Department. Suppose they decided to give $100,000 to the Liberal campaign fund?

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I did not think you had one.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, to start one with? Surely the Auditor General checks these payments out.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Every payment must come under the supervision of the Auditor General. The question is simply this: were the amounts derived from provincial subsidies paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or were they paid directly to the comptroller of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police as an amount which could be used by him, under the supervision of the Auditor General, in the maintenance of the force? I have never made inquiry into the subject, but the latter must have been the case.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not make any suggestion that anything occurred in connection with the matter that was not perfectly sincere and bona fide. Under either Government, no department has been more readily granted money by Parliament than the Northwest Mounted Police. The Prime Minister personally has always had charge of the department, the traditions and records of which have commanded the respect and confidence of the people. I understood the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition to approve of the present status of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I regard its present status as very unfortunate and very poor business indeed. We have 800 men there.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Where?

Mr. KNOWLES: In the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I am sorry to say that we have 800 idle men. Men are very scarce in Canada to-day, for fighting, for enforcing the law, for protection against crime, or for the performance of ordinary civil duties. The men of the mounted police are all able-bodied men; they are not lazy. Members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, officers and men, have more than once told me that for a while after this change was made they were very happy indeed, but that now they find absence of employment very irksome. Some of them fill in their time playing tennis or golf. These men formerly worked hard, and the change has been too radical to result in happiness and contentment. Besides, the men would naturally be happier if they had something to do. I cannot offer a solution of the problem, but I present it to the Prime Minister as a matter that is worthy of his consideration. At a time when we are so anxious to organize properly our man-power, we should not have such a large number of men insufficiently or not completely employed. It is common knowledge in the West—confirmed, I understand, by the Prime Minister—that Commissioner Perry some months ago became very much impressed with the idea that there might be certain perils at our door, and that the men under him should be available for the purpose of meeting that alleged danger; that they should not be occupied with ordinary police work out on the prairie. I am not in a position to criticise Mr. Perry; his judgment in a matter of this kind should be a great deal more valuable than mine. But it is always possible for Mr. Perry or some one else to get a one-sided view of his life's work. Mr. Perry may get an exaggerated idea of the military side, and unconsciously, and with the best conscience in the world, get away from the police side of his duty; and it is not impossible that Mr. Perry has got a little extra enthusiasm about the military side, and might be better pleased if he had a little army of his own as distinguished from a police force. He is, however, doing splendid work and is proving a very efficient head of that service. I know that because I am close to him geographically and have had considerable opportunity of judging of his work. The present condition of affairs would not be satisfactory to the country if the people knew everything about it. I do not bring this matter up in a contentious way, but so that the Government may find a solution for it. I know those men would be happier if they were of more use to the country. Many of them want to go overseas and fight for their country. Since the United States has come into the war and is organized for protective purposes, the danger that Mr. Perry saw, that is, the probability of anything like organized hosilities against Canada from the country to the south of us, is reduced to a minimum and almost entirely eliminated.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do the Mounted Police do any patrolling now?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think they do some patrolling, but it is a mere bagatelle as compared with the work they did in the early days.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: In my province they do considerable work.

Mr. KNOWLES: But not so much as before. There are some in Moosejaw, but I do not know what they have to do there. There is certainly no country to patrol. There are no possible dangers there.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: How many mounted policemen are there in Moosejaw?

Mr. KNOWLES: I really could not say.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Some of them have been taken away from my province.

Mr. KNOWLES: I see them on the street pretty often, and I know the officer in charge of them. He is there all the time; he has not been moved. My belief is that there are just as many of them there now as there were before. If they have been sent elsewhere, it is reasonable that we should have that information from the Government. Since the United States have come into the war, there is no need of patrol work, certainly not more than there was on the 1st of December last, and, at that time, we were able to get along with a limited number of men we had set aside. The Government should take advantage of this large body of man-power. If there is no police work for them to do, why not let the men have their ardent wish gratified, that is, let as many of them as can be spared go overseas?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend has perhaps not an adequate realization of the apprehensions that were entertained about a year ago, not alone by Commissioner Perry, but by very important persons in the western provinces. The representations which were submitted to me from time to time and which were of sufficiently grave character to justify some action, were placed before Commissioner Perry who was brought down here and who was in consultation with the military authorities. Pretty careful arrangements were made. The whole question was discussed in every aspect, and my hon. friend will recollect that, at that time, we could not foresee that the United States would enter into the war in April of this year. I was in this position with regard to the matter—and I hope my hon. friend will appreciate my position—that if I disregarded the very grave warnings which came to me from important persons, and if anything occurred in the nature of a raid, the character of which would be exaggerated throughout the world and would produce a great deal of apprehension amongst our people, besides the loss and damage that might result, I could hardly justify myself nor could the commissioner justify himself before the House and the country. The matter was taken into the most attentive and careful consideration, not only with Commissioner Perry, but with the military authorities and with the authorities of some of the provinces, if I recollect correctly; and on the whole, we thought the circumstances justified the action which was taken. If there are men there who are doing nothing, who, as my hon. friend says, are simply tired from being idle, that is a condition to which attention must necessarily be given. I shall forward the observations of my hon. friend to the commissioner of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, invite his attention to them and ask for a report in regard to the matter. There is no disposition on my part to have men stationed or engaged where their duties are not of a useful character, but I would have my hon. friend bear in mind that any organized group of men employed by the people of the country for garrison or protective purposes cannot, in the very nature of things, be fully occupied all the time. It goes without saying that there are men engaged in the military service of this country in garrison and outpost duty whose time is not always fully employed. They are kept there waiting for a possible condition in which their services would be required. That, to a certain extent, is the case of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. Still, my hon. friend's observations are of a character which makes it desirable that I should communicate them to the commissioner and ask for his observations and report with regard to them.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I think what my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has said, while it naturally is entitled to the utmost consideration with respect to the territory to which he alludes, cannot find very much application in the province in which I reside. There are not very many idle mounted policemen in that part of Canada. There are the officers commanding various divisions at centres; they have always been there, and they discharge more or less administrative duties with respect to those units of the force that are out on patrol duty. They have always done that while I have been in the West—before there were provinces, and since. Undoubtedly the conditions to which the Prime Minister referred were very serious. Nothing in my judgment will ever take the place of the red coat of the mounted policemen in Western Canada as regards the preservation of regard for order and respect for the law. I have seen nothing that quite equalled it with the newcomers who come to our western land from abroad. It is saying nothing that is not common knowledge to every member of this House when I intimate that Commissioner Perry reconsidered the whole question of the placing of his patrols, and located them throughout western Canada, having regard not only to border conditions, but to our foreign-born population of enemy extraction. I remember, not long since, looking over the points at which those patrols were located, and you will find that, in every section, there is a very strong and earnest opinion on the part of English-speaking citizens that the force is too small. I have received many communications urging that the force be increased because of the conditions that have arisen, and if my hon. friend is reading the newspapers, as doubtless he is, he will observe that ,in more than one case—aye, in more than half a dozen cases recently—barns have been destroyed in western Canada, and some of the crops have been threatened under circumstances that speak of very great activity on the part of the enemies within our gates. And the earnest appeals that have been made to some of us at least to insure, by taking timely warning, against a recurrence of these evils, especially having regard to the ripening of the harvest, have been very pressing. If there are only 800 men in the force, when you come to consider that they are patrolling a territory a thousand miles in length and eight times the size of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, I do not think this House will be greatly impressed with the suggestion that 800 men are too many. They are preserving law and order 300 miles north of Edmonton. There is also a detachment at Fort McMurray, and a detachment further north, which, of course, is in the unorganized Northwest Territory. Part of these 800 men are also preserving law and order 100 miles south of Macleod, which is distant from Edmonton 300 miles. So, you have in Alberta detachments of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police carrying the gospel of observance of the law and regard for property and civil rights over a territory 700 miles in length. They are also preserving law and order along the boundary from Manitoba to the Rocky mountains, a distance of 800 miles at least. So, while there may be instances such as those to which my hon. friend has referred, it cannot be said that these men are in any sense idle. Most of the young men in the force have sought, and sought in vain, to get into the regular forces. Now and then some of them have been released, but it was found necessary, I believe, to prevent discharge by purchase in order to maintain the efficiency of the force.

While men in garrison have duties to perform awaiting attacks, it may also be truthfully said that they are awaiting raids and attacks which we hope will never happen. Take for instance, the case of Gibraltar and Malta, where men are performing duties of the highest order, but it is always hoped that there will never be an attack against either Gibraltar or Malta that will necessitate calling the military activities of these men into service.

With regard to the report of Commissioner Perry, hon. gentlemen will remember that it was suggested that the provincial forces were established purely for political purposes, and quite a controversy took place in the newspapers as to whether the provinces would be better protected with a police force of their own. Most people, however, thought it better to increase the force of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and maintain the arrangement between the Dominion and the provinces. But the provincial legislatures met and authorized the establishment of provincial forces. It was contended, and not improperly it seems to me, that with the passage of prohibitory legislation in the two western provinces a burden was put upon the mounted police of what might be called domestic police duty that interfered with their usefulness in the larger sphere of the preservation of order and respect for constituted authority which their uniform has always impressed on a new population. It was not in accord with the eternal fitness of things that those who were charged with maintaining that respect and reverence for constituted authority that always should be maintained in the midst of our new population, should have at the same time to go out and search for a quart of beer or a pint of whisky that might be brought into localities in contravention of the law. That was the paramount factor, I believe, that influenced the mind of the provincial legislatures in passing the necessary legislation to bring into being a provincial force.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it not the case in Alberta, as it is in Saskatchewan, that the provincial Governments appointed their own police to enforce liquor legislation?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: In our province no force had been created especially for that purpose up to the time the new force came into being, but I am aware that in Saskatchewan they did find it necessary to appoint such officers to give effect to the prohibitory legislation. Nevertheless, large duties were still cast on the mounted police and I remember seeing communications that came from some of them, objecting to that course being followed, because they thought it placed them in an invidious position and lessened the authority with which they could maintain respect for law and order in districts newly settled by those who came from foreign countries. I think that, on investigation, my hon. friend will find that most of the mounted police in the West are pretty active, and that those who are not so are at least men of non-military age. I have in mind now the case of several men who are over fifty, who have been unable to leave the force, but they will be allowed to leave this year. They have been over twenty years in the force and are entitled to a pension. I have always felt that it was a very great mistake to dissociate the maintenance of law and order in the provinces from the mounted police, except with respect to the liquor traffic, and I had always hoped that we might be able ultimately to absorb the forces in the provinces. For the great traditions that lie behind that force give it an incomparable place, it seems to me, in the life of the country; the scarlet uniform of these men—and it is the only scarlet uniform left in Canada, or that you see at least in days like these —impresses the newcomer to our land as no other thing can, in converting him to the idea that however new may be the country and however sparse the population, reverence for constituted authority and respect for the law will be maintained at any cost. Just this week a trial is proceeding at Edmonton of two Eskimo charged with murdering two priests. These men have been brought thousands of miles to Edmonton with infinite toil and at no small expense by the Royal Northwest Mounted Police to answer for an offence wi'h resepect to which there was little evidence, but which they have been able to unravel after months and months of weary toil.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to explain what I said. I was not making any criticism because the change was made some months ago. I have no doubt it was done in good faith. I said the problem existed; I did not pass an opinion on it. My hon. friend says that his experience is different from mine as to whether the men are busy or not. I do not earmark my information as applying to Moosejaw only, for I have been in a number of towns and cities in western Canada and I distinctly remember at the moment a city in Saskatchewan where an old-time friend of mine, a couple of months ago when I was there, was talking to me about the change and wishing the old days were back again, because now he had nothing at all to do. He happens to be between forty-five and fifty years of age. But my experience in different places has been that the police have very little to do and do not like it. If what my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) throws out as a suggestion is correct, namely, that they have added duties because of the existence of aliens in our midst, it would be only right for the Government to tell us so as part of their explanation, rather than leave that to be suggested by the hon. member. During all these years this force has been doing the great work of policing the prairies, and now that that work is not laid on their shoulders, it necessarily follows that they cannot be as busy as they were before. If you have one hundred per cent as many men and remove seventy-five per cent of the work, your men are not going to be busy. There is no need of my saying I concur in all my hon. friend has said as to the good work the mounted police have done. That is not the question. The fact remains we are very much in need of man-power, and we have 800 of the most stalwart, the more ready, the best trained and most hardy men in the country, and I submit there is not sufficient work to keep them busy at present.

Mr. OLIVER: I think I will have to go a little further than any of the speakers have yet gone in discussing this vote. There are two sides to this question of the mounted Police in the West; one is sentimental, the other practical. I might be considered to be exaggerating if I said that the sentimental side is more important than the practical side. All my hon. friend from Calgary has said in that connection is true and more than true. This force has been identified with the development, the settlement, the progress and the maintenance of law and order in the Northwest ever since 1874. It has been looked upon by the people as an institution in that country, and as one of the institutions upon which they could absolutely rely, upon which they were always able to depend. When that institution has been taken away, and set aside as though it were a broken can, it strikes the people of the West very strangely. It hurts their feelings to think that this institution which has existed so long should be set aside simply by the turn of a hand, without any reason being given to the public, and winout any sufficient reason being given to Parliament. It impresses upon them the idea of a disregard of conditions in that country on the part of those in authority—a disregard of the responsibilities which rest upon them in the administration of affairs.

The practical side is that we are called upon to vote one and a half million dollars, a quarter of a million dollars more than we voted in past years, for the maintenance of a force which is not now employed in the work for which it was instituted. These are times when we are short of both men and money. My hon. friend from Mosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has drawn attention to the fact that we need man-power both in Canada and on the fighting line, and if we can afford to withdraw the Mounted Police force from the work which they have done for so many years we can afford to employ them in something more useful than the work in which they are employed now. A burden has been thrown upon the Provincial Governments by this action. They have been compelled to provide police administration which they formerly received through the mounted police, and for which they paid at a certain fixed rate. It is a fact, I think, that in the payment they made for the services of the mounted police, they had the best of the bargain from a financial point of view. It was thought advisable by the Dominion to have a force of men in that country under military discipline and control employed in maintaining law and order. Those men were engaged in that duty, and were fulfilling it last year surely as much as they are to-day. They were also providing for the requirements of the Provincial Governments in the administration of their laws. Why they should be withdrawn from that duty of assisting in the administration of the laws of the provinces, and still be maintained in the country, at an additional expense, is something that no man in the Northwest can understand from any point of view of good business either for the provinces or for the Dominion. The Provincial Governments did not want this change. They were satisfied with the arrangement that was in force with the Dominion Government. They were satisfied to pay their share of the upkeep of the mounted police and receive the services of those police as they were being rendered. I am informed it was a shock to those governments when they were notified that they would have to make provision for the maintenance of law and order in their respective provinces. They were compelled to enlist other able-bodied men, suitable for work in civil life—or, indeed, suitable for service at the front—in order to carry out the duties from which mounted police were withdrawn. The transaction seems to me to be as indescribable as it is unaccountable—that the provinces and the country should have an additional burden imposed upon them by the withdrawal of an efficient, able-bodied and ample force from their previous duties and assigned to other duties, or not assigned to any duties at all.

I have not any information in regard to the circumstances or reports the Prime Minister has suggested to the House he had received as to the need of withdrawing these men from the performance of the duties in which they were engegad—that is, that there was a certain possibility of danger. The change of status of the force has not reduced their numbers; nor did it increase their efficiency in any way that I can see. They were there before, and they are there yet. They cost the country more now than they did before. The only difference is they are not now performing the duties they performed formerly, and other men have to be hired and paid for this work. The suggestion that there was a possibility of difficulty coming from the United States is, to my mind, absurd on the face of it—and I say this with all due respect to all parties concerned. If there was any danger at any time, it was when the war broke out, and during the succeeding months there may have been very good reason for strengthening the forces in 1914 and 1915; but when the position of the United States having become settled, I cannot admit there was any reason, or any evidence of any reason, or any foundation for any reason, for doing so in the latter end of 1916. I cannot admit that such a condition of affairs existed as would warrant the withdrawal of these men from the useful work they were performing and the assigning of them to positions in which they did not have useful work to perform, thereby requiring the province to hire other men to perform that useful work. The hon. member for Calgary has spoken of the undesirability of this force being called upon to enforce the Liquor Act. They did not, as a matter of fact, take the responsibility on themselves of enforcing the Liquor Act. There was nothing to gain or lose in that. There was no difference in the arrangement. They had not enforced the Liquor Acts that were in vogue up to 1916 and they were not called upon to enforce those that were in vogue in 1917. If there is any question about that I might say that I was a resident of the Northwest Territories almost from the advent of the Mounted Police, and during the years when the great business of the police was the enforcement of the then drastic liquor law, and there never was a time in the brilliant history of the force when they stood as high in public esteem as they did then.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There was no provincial organization or authority then. It was a federal liquor Act that they were enforcing.

Mr. OLIVER: It was a federal liquor Act, but the administration of the law did not in any way derogate from the authority or prestige of the force at that time. So that, any ground of that kind that is brought forward in support of the action taken by the Government in regard to this force is without justification from any point of view. I repeat what I said in the beginning, that it is the sentimental side that strikes the people of the Northwest even more than the practical side, something that hon. members of this House may not be aware of. But, dealing only with the practical side, I have been unable to find any reason for the action that has been taken and I am here to take the responsibility of absolutely condemning that action.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I may say that if this course had not been taken, and if any such event as was apprehended in the West had occurred, there would have been no one louder in his denunciation of the Government for its lack of foresight and precaution than the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The course which I took was taken upon the recommendation of the commissioner and after very careful consideration with him and the military authorities. More than that, I submitted the reports which I had received to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), both because he was the leader of the Opposition and more particularly because he had for fifteen years been the head of the force which is now under my direction. He concurred entirely in the course which I proposed to adopt, and I took that course accordingly. Therefore, when my hon. friend suggests that there was not a shadow or a tittle of reason for taking it, he is condemning not only myself, but his own leader, who, as I say, for fifteen years had charge of the force, and who was very intimately acquainted with the duties that it was called upon to perform. My hon. friend is mistaken in some respects. We had a formal notice from the Government of one of the provinces—the province of Alberta—that they did not purpose to continue this agreement. They gave us notice some months before the occasion on which the agreement was last renewed that they proposed to establish their own police force, and that they would not continue the agreement. It is perfectly true that after that they did reconsider the matter, and, following the example of Saskatchewan, they did enter into a further agreement for a limited term. But it was perfectly evident that in both the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta there was an intention of creating a provincial police force and declining to continue further the arrangement which had been made between these provinces and the Federal Government for certain subsidies for the maintenance of the force. It is also perfectly true that from one of these provinces at least the commissioner received notice that the force were expected to undertake the enforcement of the enactments respecting the use of spirituous liquor. My hon. friend is not accurate when he says that no such proposal was ever made. The proposal was made and made in writing. I remember perfectly well having seen it. The demand was communicated in writing to the Commissioner of the Northwest Mounted Police.

Mr. OLIVER: That they should enforce the Liquor Act?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That they should undertake the enforcement of the Liquor Act. The commissioner had that in mind in connection with the other considerations to which I have alluded. In his opinion it was desirable and necessary that the services of the force should be reserved for purely Federal purposes under the conditions which obtained and which still continue.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to this danger which is supposed to have existed, the Prime Minister says that he has the authority of the commissioner of the police to say that there was such a dangerous condition as to call for the withdrawal of the mounted police from the performance of police duties. I would have to characterize the suggestion of the commissioner, with more or less respect, as being absurd, from the fact that from the outbreak of the war in 1914 until the present time, or quite recently, there have been thousands of men under arms in the Northwest Territories continuously, and whether there were a thousand mounted policemen doing police duties or not, doing police duties did not make any difference in the absolute power of the military forces of the West to resist any aggression from any source from which it might come.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I can tell my hon. friend that his suggestion in that regard is not at all new. All these suggestions had careful consideration. A proposition that one battalion should be assigned from time to time to patrol work while in course of training was taken up but it was declared by the military authorities who were consulted to be absolutely impracticable for reasons which I could very well state if it were necessary to do so.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister be good enough to communicate to the House any information which he receives from Commissioner Perry, or any other official, as to whether it is not possible to make some profitable use of the energies of the police force in some other direction?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall be very glad to communicate any such information as I receive it.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to ask if the right hon. gentleman has the correspondence between the Provincial Governments and the Dominion Government with regard to the withdrawal of the police force and replacing it with the civil force?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot recall that there is any correspondence. The negotiations were carried on by the commissioner himself with the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan and, I think also, with the Government of Manitoba although I am not absolutely sure as to that.

Mr. OLIVER: At what date would that agreement have expired?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should think, in two or three years.

Mr. OLIVER: It would not have terminated within a very short period?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, it had a substantial period to run.

Mr. OLIVER: In fact it had only recently been made.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it was made two years before, or more, and was for five years.

Arts and Agriculture—for the eradication or control of the white pine blister rust, $25,000.

Mr. BURRELL: This vote covers the expenses in connection with the attempt at eradication and control of a very bad fungus disease threatening the life of the white pine in Canada. Early this spring the United States authorities became alarmed at the spread of this disease and we discovered its infection in Canada and realized that the $200,000,000 worth of white pine left in Canada would probably be destroyed unless we could control this pest. We therefore entered into arrangements to co-operate with the United States authorities and the Provincial Governments of Quebec and Ontario, where the infection has occurred. We appointed Mr. McCubbin, one of our plant pathologists who had studied the disease for some years, to take charge in Ontario and make a general survey. There is some infestation, principally in the Niagara district. The disease was introduced through pine seedlings imported from Germany. The authorities on this continent were not aware that the disease was very general in Germany, in fact all throughout Europe, and that the American white pine cannot be successfully grown there on account of it. The European pines have apparently become immune to the disease. The fungus spends a portion of its life cycle on the red and black gooseberry and the raspberry plants. The measures necessary to eradicate the disease, apart from the general survey to watch for its appearance in different localities, include the destruction of infested trees and the cutting out of current and raspberry bushes on which the spores are found during June and July. It will be necessary to follow up each of the shipments of these pine seedlings and to watch the plants.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As the forests of Ontario are owned and administered by the province, why does the Dominion assume the duty of eradicating this pest?

Mr. BURRELL: There is some strength in that argument, but if it were carried out in all matters we would have to stop our work in connection with plant pathology. As a matter of fact, we have practically the only men who are skilled in these matters and the provinces are very glad to have us co-operate in them.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where is Mr. Gussow now, formerly chief botanist?

Mr. BURRELL: Mr. Gussow is now doing some botanical work in the laboratory in connection with the Central Experimental Farm. It was felt that a civil servant of German nationality who had not become naturalized in Canada should not occupy the position of chief botanist, which would involve his travelling all over Canada. This gentleman was appointed by my predecessor, the Hon. Sydney Fisher, about eight years ago and is a very skilled man. He has a wife and five small children, and for humanitarian reasons, although many have taken the view that he should be dismissed, his services were retained in the position I have mentioned. As a matter of fact he has been offered a position in one of the southern universities and I have told him that we shall raise no objection to his accepting it.

Arts and Agriculture—for the purchase of seed grain, Governor General's warrant, $500,000.

Mr. BURRELL: This is to repay the Governor General's warrant which was advanced. I think that, altogether, $1,200,000 was advanced, all of which has now been repaid and has gone into the hands of the Receiver General. We have been entirely repaid and have a little to the good, and have also a considerable number of bushels of oats still on hand. We thought of disposing of these oats but came to the conclusion that it might be well to hold them over, considering the character of the oat crop in the West, until next year. We bought, cleaned, bagged and sold nearly 1,000,000 bushels of wheat and oats—largely wheat.

Mr. OLIVER: When and where?

Mr. BURRELL: Practically the whole of the wheat was sold in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. It was distributed among municipalities, farmers' organizations and farmers who chose to pay for it in carload lots. We have received a large number of letters from municipalities expressing their appreciation of the action taken by the department in this respect last year

Mr. OLIVER: Was that the season of 1916?

Mr. BURRELL: The spring season of 1917. The action was taken chiefly because the ravages of wheat rust last year, together with the conditions affecting frozen grain in some districts, were such that about thirty municipalities were afraid that they would not be able to get any seed grain at all. Machinery was put in force under provincial statute enabling the municipality to advance money on behalf of the farmer who could not afford to pay. We sold to the municipalities about 600,000 bushels of grain.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was there not a vote last year for the purpose of purchasing seed grain?

Mr. BURRELL: No, that was in connection with a different matter altogether. This action was taken for the purpose of selling high-class seed to farmers who might not otherwise be able to get it.

Mr. OLIVER: Has this money been almost entirely repaid by the farmers?

Mr. BURRELL: The whole of it has been repaid.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was it done in the same way that the seed grain was distributed in former years, by taking a lease on the land?

Mr. BURRELL: No. Our expert officers bought the seed; it was re-cleaned, bagged and made ready for sale to municipalities and farmers.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why was it necessary to advance this sum of money by Governor General's warrant? It seems to me that this was an extraordinary step to take, especially when Parliament was in session.

Mr. BURRELL: My recollection is that this action was taken either during the recess or before Parliament met. I think that it must have been during the recess.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It seems to me that Governor General's warrants are resorted to with very little provocation in these times.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is this a new expenditure, or is it supplementary to an insufficient vote made last year?

Mr. BURRELL: It is absolutely new work, never undertaken before.

Mr. KNOWLES: Parliament remained in session last year up to a time that must have been subsequent to the activity of the farmers in getting seed grain ready.

Mr. BURRELL: I am sorry that I cannot give the exact date. I hope that my hon. friend has not any suspicion in connection with this matter, because we have an absolutely clear record in it. The conditions were such that it was very desirable, especially in these times of needed production, that the farmers in the West should have a supply of first-class seed. There must have been some obvious reason for getting the Governor General's warrant; otherwise we should gladly have come to Parliament for the money.

Mr. OLIVER: How did the minister buy the $1,500,000 worth of grain if he had only $500,000?

Mr. BURRELL: As fast as we bought grain and sold it, the money was turned in.

Mr. COPP: Was this grain supplied generally throughout Canada, or only throughout the West?

Mr. BURRELL: The provisions for its distribution were applicable everywhere, but only oats were taken in the East. Something like 200,000 bushels of No. 1 grade oats were shipped from the West on order by carload lots to Governmental authorities, municipalities, individual farmers or dealers.

Mr. KNOWLES: How much is now on hand?

Mr. BURRELL: I cannot give the exact figure; I think about 40,000 or 50,000 bushels.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where is it?

Mr. BURRELL: In the Government elevators in the West.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where was it bought?

Mr. BURRELL: It was bought through the Seed Purchasing Commission, the details respecting which I laid on the Table when the main estimates were under consideration. This commission was composed largely of our own expert officers in the seed department.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the multiplicity of commissions, this one may have got lost. Personally, I never heard of this Seed Purchasing Commission. Will the minister tell us something about it?

Mr. BURRELL: Mr. Wilson was at the head of the commission; he is a very well known man in the West. The grain was bought all over the country, wherever the best grain could be secured under the best terms. It was sent to the Government elevators, cleaned and bagged; then it awaited orders from different municipalities and farmers.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was it bought in the prairie West?

Mr .BURRELL: Altogether in the West.

Mr. KNOWLES: From individual farmers?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, or from elevators—from all the sources from which grain is usually obtained.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under what rules, instructions or limitations was it bought? To what extent was the public given information that supplies of wheat and oats were desired for this purpose?

Mr. BURRELL: The whole western country was thoroughly apprised, through the press and through circulars, of all the proceedings of the commission.

I am pretty sure that amongst grain men in the West, they were pretty thoroughly known. I am sorry I did not give my hon. friend the satisfaction of seeing the bunch of letters we received from various municipalities in the West expressing the utmost gratification at the benefits derived from this whole transaction. One letter, which went into the whole matter, was signed by the secretary of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers. If my hon. friend is really interested, I shall be glad to get from the department a complete report of the transaction.

Mr. KNOWLES: How many bushels of wheat and how many bushels of oats did the commissioners buy in all?

Mr. BURRELL: Between 600,000 and 700,000 bushels of wheat, and between 200,000 and 300,000 bushels of oats.

Mr. KNOWLES: They paid money for the grain and then they would sell it and use the same money over again?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: The money did not go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Mr. BURRELL: It went in as fast as necessary. All the money has been paid back.

Mr. KNOWLES: The money received from the sale of this wheat did not go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund?

Mr. BURRELL: It went into the hands of the Receiver General.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought the minister told the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) a moment ago that a large sum of money was not needed, because the commissioners used the money as they went along.

Mr. BURRELL: I will not be positive as to the details, whichever way the money went, whether enough was got from time to time in order to buy grain, and then as the wheat was sold, all the money went to the Receiver General, or whether a portion was used again as the transaction went on.

Mr. KNOWLES: Of course, $500,000 is not anything like sufficient pay for 600,000 bushels of wheat, and 200,000 or 300,000 bushels of oats.

Mr. BURRELL: About $1,200,000 was used altogether.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are voting half a million. Was there a former vote?

Mr. BURRELL: I will not speak positively about that at the present moment.

Mr. KNOWLES: We cannot honestly and conscientiously pass these Estimates until we know whether this is the whole appropriation or not.

Mr. BURRELL: If my hon. friend wants to let the item stand, all right.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not want to dictate as to whether the item should stand or not.

Mr. OLIVER: If the minister can buy $1,200,000 worth of grain with $500,000, the sooner he is made Minister of Finance the better.

Mr. BURRELL: I did not say that.

Mr. MACDONALD: I can understand the Government entering upon a project of dealing in seed in cases in which there is a shortage or some particular necessity, but apparently the situation is this: The Government went into various parts of the Northwest and purchased seed grain, had it cleaned, and then sold it again. That may be a good thing to do, but why could not that matter be left to private enterprise? Is the Government going into the seed business in normal times throughout this country? Usually intervention of a Government in regard to matters of that kind arises when there is some peculiar local necessity. Here the minister admits frankly that there was no necessity. There is no reason why the individual farmer could not buy the grain in the Northwest just as well as the Government could buy it. If my hon. friend were introducing some new kind of seed from some other part of the world I could understand the reason for the intervention, but upon what possible basis are we going to have, in perfectly normal times, the Government turning aside and engaging in what is purely mercantile business?

Mr. BURRELL: I am glad my hon. friend thinks times are entirely normal, and that they do not justify action. The action we took is justified to this extent, that it has met with the most widespread gratification throughout the country affected, and even through the East, to such an extent that in Quebec Premier Sir Lomer Gouin was exceedingly anxious to avail himself of this opportunity in his province because the farmers there were very short of good seed. Unfortunately, he applied a little too late, and the only way in which I could help them out was to get the Purchasing Wheat Export Company to release some of the best of their grain in the Montreal elevators. The circumstances were not normal. In 1916, we had lost at least $100,000,000 worth of wheat by the wheat rust of the West. Western members, of course, know these facts. The result was that in at least thirty municipalities there was danger of the farmers not being able to get any good seed. It is true they could have secured it through private parties, but we thought the national situation was grave enough, with the absolute necessity of getting every ounce of production we could, for the Government to step in and, in this way through the expert officials of the department to secure, by purchase and resale, the very best class of seed that those people could have. With all due deference to my hon. friend I must say that, although it is not usually good policy for a government to go in and do these things, the conditions existing at that time justified the Government in stepping in and taking that action.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has not yet told us whether the bills for the purchase of this grain are paid through the Finance Department or how they are paid. It would be a very objectionable matter if they were paid without reference to the official course through the Finance Department.

Mr. BURRELL: The matter is all arranged through the Finance Department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understood from the discussion that the minister was a little uncertain as to how the business was really done—where the money goes when it is paid in by the farmers or who keeps the accounts. I trust the minister understands how those matters are handled.

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the minister's policy for the future? Is it intended that there shall be a regular distribution each spring to the farmers of Canada, and will it be open in all the provinces for the farmers to come to the minister for their seed if they find that more convenient than buying in the usual way? If we are to understand that there was not an emergency, we want to know what is to happen next year, and what is to be done with the 50,000 bushels we have on hand.

Mr. BURRELL: I would not like to lay down, at this particular moment, what might be the policy for the future. So far it has been open to farmers of other provinces to avail themselves of this opportunity of buying seed grain. I have already explained that it was open last year, and a large amount of oats was shipped to the eastern provinces because those provinces were short of the best seed oats. The policy is sufficiently justified by its results to be continued, especially at a time like this when war is on and when the production of grain is of such vital importance. Anything that can help the farmers to get first-class seed grain at a moderate price in order to ensure a fuller crop would go a long way towards justifying the Government to do what they would probably not do under normal circumstances.

Mr. MACDONALD: How does a farmer in an eastern province apply when he wants to purchase seed grain from the Government?

Mr. BURRELL: Last year notices were put in the press giving the particulars. The applications were made to the Seed Department, and we kept in touch with the Seed Purchasing Commission constantly as to what stores were on hand and what the transportation facilities were. Very full publicity was given to the whole matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think this item should go through. We are without information on nearly every point. To start with, we find a very abnormal condition of affairs in regard to the use of the Governor General's warrants.

There has been no explanation why the transaction was effected in that way, and I think the committee should have an explanation before we are asked to ratify it —it goes without saying that before we ratify an unusual proceeding we should know why it was done in an unusual way.

The minister says that we do not cast any reflections upon him. Of course we do not, but it does not necessarily follow, because we have every confidence in him personally, that everything in his management of public affairs was done in the best interests of the public. For instance, there was a most unfortunate condition of affairs in connection with the administration of the Seed Grain Act in former years. The Government, under the Minister of the Interior, set out to get the farmers seed grain at $1.50 a bushel. It was sent out to all the different villages and some of them refused it; they would not allow it into the settlement because it had so many weeds.

Mr. ROCHE: That is not quite in accordance with the facts.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is true in one case to my knowledge. There are whole districts out West in which the farmers hold up their hands in distress because the homesteads on which they had worked so diligently are now full of dirty weeds. I do not blame the minister for that, but I am saying that we should have more information about these matters before we vote the money; otherwise, we might as well vote the money in blank. I may say that I never saw as poor a crop of oats as this year. I do not say it is the minister's fault.

Mr. BURRELL: The hon. member surely does not put that down to me?

Mr. KNOWLES: It may be due to something else, but still it may be due to rotten seed. I think this item should stand for further information.

Mr. MACDONALD: The House is certainly entitled to information as to what the Government paid with the seed, what they received back, and what the cost of depreciation was. Was any profit made upon this transaction, or was any profit sought? What was the cost of organization? These are natural and reasonable questions to ask in connection with a transaction involving the expenditure of this large amount of money.

Mr. BURRELL: We have not got all those details yet, as the whole thing has not been cleaned up. But I am in a position to say this: so far as the Government is concerned, we have actually made a little on the transaction, not that we wanted to make anything out of it, but by virtue of the fact of purchase and sale and the differences in markets, we have repaid every cent of the money and have a balance in hand at the present time.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have asked the minister for information on certain points. Why does he not proceed to tell the committee on what basis these goods were bought and on what basis they were sold, and whether they were sold at a figure to cover the cost of purchase, cleaning and a profit besides?

Mr. BURRELL: They were sold at the cost of purchase, re-cleaning, bagging and shipping. No profit, of course, was made.

Mr. KNOWLES: Evidently the minister does not agree to let the item stand. I think it is an unfortunate position to put us in. I do not think we should have to ask that the item stand. It is only reasonable that the Government should be willing to give an explanation of these matters, even without it being asked for. The fact of the minister not agreeing to my suggestion that we should have fuller information before passing this vote is not at all to his credit. He says there is nothing to suppress. I do not say there is, but let us have all this information. The session will not be over for some days, possibly weeks, and there is no reason in the world why we should not be given this information.

Mr. BURRELL: I think my hon. friend has misstated me entirely. I have not the slightest objection to allowing the item to stand.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do you not think it is a reasonable request?

Mr. BURRELL: I am not disputing it. I have tried to give, and I think I have given, a fairly good explanation of the whole subject. As to giving all the details of the purchase and sale of this wheat, my hon. friend could not expect that information this afternoon, because I did not know this matter was coming up. I did not come here prepared with a lot of details, and my officers cannot be got. This subject could have been discussed pretty fully on my own Estimates when the seed vote was put through. I had a lot of information at that time, but I have not got it now, and I regret I am unable to get it. I have no objection to allowing the item to stand. I am always ready to give the fullest information on this or any other subject connected with my department. I do not care how much publicity we get; the more the better, as far as I am concerned.

Item stands.

Experimental Farms—Maintenance of Central Farm and establishment and maintenance of additional branch stations—further amount required, $40,000.

Mr. BURRELL: This vote is very largely in connection with the publications. We did not put a sufficient amount in the Main Estimates, as sufficient allowance was not made for the extension of the work this year. We have 300,000 names on our publication lists, and owing to the war and owing to the production campaign, which has been carried forward very vigorously this year, owing also to the decision to issue some special and rather expensive bulletins in connection with wheat rust and one or two other matters, we thought it advisable to put in this amount of $40,000, which we think will cover the expenditure.

Mr. MURPHY: Would the minister inform the committee generally as to the sale of products from the Central Experimental Farm and whether there is realized from the sale of the products of the farm each year a sum sufficient, or approximately sufficient to defray the expenses of the farm? There is some public curiosity on this point.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not know how the sales of the farm will compare this year with other years, but speaking generally, my hon. friend will understand that no experimental farm in the world could pay by the sale of its products for the operation of the farm, because these articles that are sold are only a sort of by-product. The object of an experimental farm, of course, is not to grow stuff for the market, but to carry on perhaps five hundred different experiments out of which perhaps only one or two would be of any commercial profit at all. I am sorry I cannot give anything like an approximate estimate of what was sold at the farm, or as to what proportion it would bear towards the general expenditure of the farm, but speaking offhand, it would be a very small percentage. The money goes, of course, to the Receiver General.

Mr. MURPHY: There is a good deal of stuff sold?

Mr. BURRELL: Oh yes. We have been experimenting, for instance, in the manufacture of certain types of cream cheese and things like that. In regard to cattle, the milk has to be used.

Mr. MURPHY: Fruit, in the same way?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes. I am sorry I cannot give the details.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the location of the additional branch stations that the minister proposes to establish?

Mr. BURRELL: We are not establishing them. This vote is very largely in connection with our publications, which we have enormously increased. This year we have issued something like 3,000,000 publications altogether. The publications vote is always a pretty heavy one.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The item is improperly placed in these Estimates then? There is nothing here about publications.

Mr. BURRELL: The whole vote goes in in that way. I am simply carrying out the practice that has always been followed. This vote covers all the operations of the farm, including publications and everything else. It is then subdivided in the Estimates and taken up more or less in detail.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister explain what has been the cause of the delay in the receipt of the usual blue-books of the Experimental Farm, which in other years have always been available early in the session? A large number of my constituents are very much interested in these reports, and, we only got them about a week ago.

Mr. BURRELL: That is for the last fiscal year?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes. It seems to me if the House had not been sitting we would not have had them at all for distribution among the members and consequently among our constituents.

Mr. BURRELL: I think my hon. friend will have to stir up the Printing Bureau. We get our reports out as fast as we can and they are got out in fairly good time. I am afraid I will have to transfer some responsibility to the Printing Bureau. I will make an inquiry about it.

Mr. COPP: Are there accounts kept in the Experimental Farms as to the crop of different grains, how much per acre is grown and so on? Is that all given in the report?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. COPP: And what becomes of it?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. GLASS: I would like to ask the minister if any satisfactory progress has been made in conection with the flax experiments during this year?

Mr. BURRELL: We are not in a position to give any details yet. I may say, however, we are making satisfactory progress.

Mr. GLASS: I understood samples of flax for fibre have been grown on the different Experimental Farms throughout the Dominion and that samples had been sent to the Experimental Farm here, to be tested out?

Mr. KNOWLES: I had never heard about the flax business before, and would like some information. For example, there is the problem of straw on the prairie farm. Recently there has been established at Moosejaw a plant which produces gas from straw revolutionizing the methods of heating. Inasmuch as the work of the Experimental farms is in the interest of the farmers, I have often thought it was unfortunate that the Government had not looked into this matter before. We have also the problem with regard to our flax straw. I presume that is why my hon. friend from East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) speaks of. If the department have been experimenting along these lines we would like to know it.

Mr. BURRELL: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend full information about it. We have been doing a good deal of work during the last year. There was quite a discussion amongst the flax growers of the different provinces—it started in Ontario, I believe—partly on account of the seed, but largely on account of the straw. As to the fibre industry, a great many difficulties have had to be faced, because in this country they have never been able to solve the problem of dew retting. This has been done in Europe, and in Russia. It is an open-air process, and the installation of tanks for dew retting is expensive. Comparatively little work has been done. As a result of representations made by the Flax Growers' Association and others interested, we appointed a man about a year ago and attached him to the Experimental Farms with the idea that he should give his whole attention to flax. We started growing different varieties of flax seed on the Experimental Farms. We have also entered into contracts in a small way with some of the farmers to grow flax. We are establishing some machinery and tanks and intend to experiment with it. We hope to see what developments may be made in a profitable way and to make a report this fall. There are climatic conditions here which are not met with in Europe, and which may make it more difficult for us. At the same time, I am convinced a great deal can be done.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the idea to utilize the fibre of the natural flax—to get both seed and fibre?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: And, under present process, when the seed is mature, the fibre is not in a condition to be used?

Mr. BURRELL: I am not positive about that. I would not like to enter into a technical discussion of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the minister taken any interest in the question of using straw for the production of gas on the prairies?

Mr. BURRELL: We have not gone into it. It was done by the Canadian Pacific Railway, I think.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister would find it worth his while to stop off and see it, any time he happens to be in Moosejaw. They have lately taken one of the professors from the Saskatchewan University, and he is giving all his time to it. The idea is, they draw the gases from the straw. This gas is used for lighting, heating and so on. If it can be worked out commercially, it would be worth a great deal of money.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: How successful are they?

Mr. KNOWLES: The results are very satisfactory. It has never yet been put on the market, but the owners of the invention have it working very satisfactorily. A load of straw will go very far in heating and lighting a farm house.

Mr. ROCHE: The by-products are sufficient to pay for the cost of manufacture.

Mr. KNOWLES: They are able to run machinery and so on from one little retort. They have not had sufficient money so far to put the thing on a commercial basis. They have often expressed the wish to me that members of the provincial Government, and especially members of the Federal Government, should go and visit the place.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Have they tested out different kinds of straw?

Mr. KNOWLES: I cannot say as to that. When I was there they were always using wheat straw.

Mr. GLASS: I understand some of the most valuable experiments in the utilization of cereal straws have been conducted by the Research Department of the Canadian Pacific Railway, under the direction of Dr. Harrison Howe. Dr. Howe attended the Flax Growers' Convention, which was held in London on March 31 and April 1, and read a very interesting paper on the utilization of straws generally in industry. When this department was established by the Canadian Pacific he was instructed to direct his energies along the line of the utilization of cereal straw in industry generally, but particularly the use of flax straw. I understand that in the West they have succeeded in producing a linen paper of very superior quality, the fibre for which can be produced from that straw on a commercially profitable basis. The idea is that pulp mills for the manufacture of this paper can be established throughout the West, and this pulp shipped to the mills to be manufactured into paper. I thought at one time, and I still think, that a department under such a capable firm as that of Little & Company, of Montreal, of whom Dr. Harrison Howe is chief, would facilitate matters and hurry along the experiments. We want to have the Department of Agriculture co-ordinated through efforts made by such men as Dr. Harrison Howe, and hasten the determination as to the ultimate success of the use of this straw.

My hon. friend will readily admit that if flax straw can be used in the manufacture of paper, and if it will produce a high-grade linen paper, surely it must produce a very much more valuable product for the country and one to which the department might give closer attention rather than directing their energies to producing a fuel from the material. At the Flax Convention in London it was shown that Mr. Howard Fraleigh, as a result of the experiment which he has carried on in the district of Forest, Lambton county, has been able to grow a very superior quality of hemp. His experiment in growing hemp on an area of five acres was so eminently successful as to indicate that people living in similar districts can grow an equally high-grade quality of hemp. The use of some 500 acres in that district has been volunteered by owners for the purpose of being seeded to hemp to show what can be produced. Howard Fraleigh's crop of hemp was said to be as fine as has been grown in any part of the world. It was of a very superior quality. As a result of the meeting up there a very large acreage will be devoted to the cultivation of flax. Howard Fraleigh is said to be the best flax expert in Canada or on the continent of North America. He has, by his own enterprise, conducted a series of experiments in tank retting and he has achieved very good results. He told me that last year the flax crop in his district produced fibre to the value of $200 an acre which was certainly a very creditable production. That flax was grown for fibre alone. Generally it is understood that where they grow flax for fibre the seed is regarded as a by-product. It does not amount to very much because they do not allow the flax to mature sufficiently to ripen the seed. But Mr. Fraleigh has been making these experiments and his success, I understand, is so well established that in so far as he is concerned the principle of dew retting has been entirely abandoned and he is confining himself on a large scale to tank retting. I think that a man of the enterprise and energy of Harold Howard Fraleigh might have the co-operation of the Department of Agriculture and be assisted in carrying out experiments of this kind. It has taken him two or three years to find out what would be found out with a great deal more despatch if encouragement were given to those who are devoting their energies to this enterprise. I was going to suggest to the minister that in any report of the flax fibre industry generally that may be issued by the department—and I speak of the flax fibre industry generally because it will include sisal and other things—it would be very interesting if we had incorporated in that report the results of the experiments of the department of reasearch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because I think that in the Northwest Territories the experiments so far have produced results that are of enormous value to that western country. If we could have a report of what Harrison Howe has produced in connection with the flax fibre industry incorporated in our report it would be very useful and probably very helpful to the farmers in the West.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

Monday, August 20, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PROPOSED INCREASES IN SALARIES TO PERMANENT MESSENGERS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to present to the House my recommendation and the report of the Clerk of the House in respect to the increases in salary to the permanent messengers of the House provided under the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1917.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks).

THOMAS MAGLADERY, M.L.A.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Did Thomas Magladery, M.L.A., for Timiskaming, enlist in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces?
2. If so, when, where, and by whom was he medically examined?
3. Did such examination show him to be physically fit for service?
4. What military rank did he hold when he enlisted, and what is his present rank?
5. What length of time did Mr. Magladery serve in the trenches, and between what dates?
6. At what rate per diem is he paid, and do any of his dependents draw separation allowance?
7. What amount has been paid to date on both accounts?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.
2. Was examined on August 29, 1914, at New Liskeard, Ont., by J. G. McKie, M.D.
3. Yes.
4. Lieutenant.
5. He served in France with the 15th Battalion, C.E.F., from June 18, 1916, to November 5, 1916.
6. $4.10 per diem pay and allowances. Separation allowance to wife, $40 per month.
7. Pay and allowances, $2,829.95. Separation allowance, $960.

NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WAR.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Have any copies of a pamphlet entitled "National Organization for War" been printed at the public expense?
2. If so, how many copies have been so printed, and how many distributed?
3. What amount, if any, has been or will be paid to Mr. Leacock in connection with the pamphlet mentioned?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. Yes. By order of the National Service Board.
2. 200,000 copies. All distributed.
3. No payment.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE—FORMER OCCUPATIONS OF RECRUITS.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Has any record been kept of the occupations of the men who enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force?
2. If so, how many farmers have enlisted?
3. Of this number, how many came from the western provinces?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes, relating to men who have gone overseas.
2. 45,797, up to June 30, 1917.
3. 24,592.

WAR PURCHASING COMMISSION.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. How many men, officers and employees of the War Purchasing Commission are of military age?
2. What are their names and respective salaries?
3. Who, if any, have military badges, and on what grounds in each case have they been granted?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Six.
2. Mr. Thomas Hilliard, $350 per month; Mr. W. S. Lecky, $275 per month; Mr. A. E. Howard, $250 per month; Mr. G. C. Gerow, $125 per month; Mr. G. Sims, $125 per month; Mr. F. E. Nodine, $110 per month.
3. None have military badges.

NATIONAL TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Has Hon. Sir Thomas White been directly or indirectly owner of or interested in shares of the National Trust Company, Limited, since the 1st January, 1914?
2. If so, until what date?
3. Is he still owner or interested in said shares, and to what extent?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by reply to No. 1.

I may observe, in connection with this question, that the hon. gentleman seems to be inordinately curious as to my private affairs, but I have no objection to informing him that, when I was connected with the National Trust Company, my stock holding was ten shares, the amount necessary to qualify me as a director. My interest was not as a proprietor but as general manager.

DEPOSITS IN SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. What was the total amount on deposit in savings banks of all kinds in Canada on June 30, 1917?
2. How much was on deposit in Government savings banks at said date?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. Approximately $998,856,922.61.
2. Dominion Government savings banks, $13,167,436.64. Post office savings banks, $41,105,644.92.

CAPTAIN KENNETH C. MACPHERSON.

Mr. PROULX:

Referring further to the answers of the Honourable the Minister of Militia and Defence as reported at page 4592 of unrevised "Hansard" of Monday, August 13, 1917, relative to Captain Kenneth C. Macpherson:

1. How long was Captain Macpherson in England during his eleven months' absence overseas?

2. What portion of the said eleven months did Captain Macpherson spend in France, and what portion in Flanders?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Five months and one week.

2. Five months in Flanders, balance of three weeks at sea, travelling from Canada to England and return.

WAR PROFITS TAX AND INCOME TAX—COST OF COLLECTION.

Mr. KAY:

1. What has been the yearly cost to the country of the collection of the war profits tax?

2. What is the amount of the estimated yearly cost of the collection of the income tax?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. For the portion of fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, during which the Act was under administration, the cost was $58,-174.81. Estimated annual cost, $150,000.

2. $600,000.

CANADIAN BANK OF COMMERCE.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is Sir Joseph W. Flavelle, Chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, owner of shares in the Canadian Bank of Commerce?

2. Is Sir A. E. Kemp, Minister of Militia in Canada, owner of shares in the Canadian Bank of Commerce?

3. Is Sir William Mackenzie, President of the Canadian Northern Railway, and a director of the National Trust Company, a shareholder in the Canadian Bank of Commerce?

4. Was the Canadian Bank of Commerce a subscriber to the bonds issued for $45,000,000 under the guarantee of the Canadian Government given in 1914, and to what extent?

5. What was the premium or commission paid to said bank for negotiating or keeping said bonds, has the bank disposed of them all, and what amount did the face value of said bonds represent?

6. Is the Canadian Bank of Commerce one of the pledgees referred to by the Minister of Finance in connection with the common shares of the Canadian Northern not actually in possession of the Canadian Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. No information.

2. Yes. Number of shares held, 120.

3. No information.

4. No.

5. The bank was not employed as selling agent or as custodian of the bonds referred to.

6. Yes.

In connection with the answer to this question, the hon. member has upon two occasions made inquiry as to the holding of the $45,000,000 Canadian Northern Railway 4 per cent bonds, guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada under chapter 20 of the Act of 1914 and Trust Deed of July 15, 1914. I desire to say, for the information of the hon. member and of the House, that, so far as I am aware, none of those bonds, except those which are held by the Dominion Government, are held in Canada. I place upon the Table, in connection with the reply to this question, a statement showing that, of those bonds, $12,500,000 par value were pledged to the Dominion Government as security against advances of Dominion notes to the amount of $10,000,-000. That was in 1914. There were sold in London through Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Company in July, 1914, £3,000,000 at a net price to the company of 91½, that is to say, for $14,600,000. There were sold in London through Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Company in February, 1915, £500,000 at a net price to the company of 91 plus accrued interest, making $2,433,333.33. There were pledged to the Columbia Trust Company, New York, as security for a note issue of the Canadian Northern Railway Company of $11,500,000; $15,333,333.34, making the total amount of the issue disposed of, $44,866,666.67, leaving a balance of $133,333.33 still at the disposal of the company. All the bonds were sold outside of Canada. This is the statement:

August 20, 1917.

Statement re authorized issue of $45,000,000 Canadian Northern Railway 4 per cent bonds, guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada under Chapter 20 of the Acts of 1914 and Trust Deed of July 15, 1914.

Pledged to the Dominion Government against advances of Dominion notes to the amount of $10,000,000, August to December, 1914	$12,500,000.00
Sold in London, through Messrs. Lazard Brothers & Company, July, 1914, £3,000,000—at a net price to the company of 91½	$14,600,000.00

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. FORTIER:

1. Was Colonel Rev. Dr. A. E. Burke a chaplain in the Canadian Expeditionary Force?

2. If so, was he associated with one Rev. Dr. Roche in the editorship of the Catholic Register at Toronto?

3. Were reports made to the Government as to Rev. Dr. Roche's associations with Austrian enemies and with one Max Pam, of Chicago?

4. If so, did the Government take any steps in the matter?

5. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the said Dr. Roche left Canada at the outbreak of the war?

6. Since his appointment as chaplain in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, did the said Burke visit Chicago? If so, was his business there of an official character?

7. Is the Government aware as to whether or not he met the said Roche at or near Chicago?

8. Has the said Burke at any time since his appointment as chaplain been under surveillance by Dominion officials?

9. If so, were reports made to the Government, and will these reports, if any, be laid on the Table of the House?

10. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the said Burke visited Canada about the end of 1916 and in conjunction with a representative of the British diplomatic or secret service, made certain representations to the Government?

11. Is the said Burke now in Ottawa? If so, is the Government aware as to what he is doing?

MR. THOMAS J. PARKES.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other communications passed between the Government or any member thereof or the employees and officials of the Department of Militia and Defence or any other department, and one Thos. J. Parkes, insurance agent, of the city of Sherbrooke, province of Quebec, concerning the release or promotion of his two sons now on active service with the Canadian Expeditionary Forces.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Would my hon. friend be good enough, before this motion passes, to supplement it with the Christian name of the person to whom he refers, the rank, the battalion number and the number of the soldier himself. It is almost impossible to find in the record the information asked for by my hon. friend unless he gives me the information for which I ask.

Motion stands.

WHEAT REGULATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): On Saturday I asked a question in the House relating to the Department of Trade and Commerce, during the minister's absence. Perhaps he will be good enough to answer it to-day.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can perhaps best state the position by reading the orders that have been passed by the Board of Grain Supervisors for Canada. The first is as follows:

It is hereby ordered by the Board of Grain Supervisors for Canada that until the 31st of August, 1917, inclusive, the price of wheat, basis No. 1 Northern in store at public terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, shall not exceed nor be less than two dollars and forty cents ($2.40) per bushel. This applies to all wheat, whether of the old or of the new crop, in store in public terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur up to and including August 31, 1917. Holders of warehouse receipts, which hold any date prior to and including August 31, 1917, will be entitled to the above basis price of $2.40 per bushel, No. 1 northern wheat, only on condition that they have sold the wheat at Fort William and Port Arthur and delivered the receipts therefor not later than noon of August 31, 1917.

Under the other order, trading in wheat for future delivery will cease on all grain exchanges in Canada on August 31.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister be good enough to state the reason for the order being made, and its expected probable effect?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I would rather my hon. friend put that question to-morrow, as communications are now under way with respect to the details.

Mr. OLIVER: I also drew the minister's attention on Saturday to what appears to be an inaccuracy in a statement he had previously given to the House in regard to the price of grain at Minneapolis. I thought it only fair to give him an opportunity to correct or explain the inaccuracy.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The figures I gave to the House were derived from actual transactions, and transactions in Canadian No. 1 Northern, so that eliminates all difficulties of comparison as to the difference in quality between Canadian No. 1 Northern and No. 1 Northern United States. On August 16, the following actual transaction took place: No. 1 Northern, to arrive in Minneapolis ten days thereafter—this sale was at $2 per bushel. On August 17, two other actual transactions took place as follows: No. 1 Northern, to arrive on the 25th of August, $2.20; loaded on cars in Canada $2.

I might also give Saturday's quotations at Winnipeg, Duluth and Minneapolis: No. 1 Northern cash wheat at Winnipeg, $2.40; at Minneapolis, cash wheat, $2.40 to $2.45. No. 2 Northern at Winnipeg, $2.40; at Minneapolis, $2.35 to $2.40. No. 3 Northern at Winnipeg, $2.40; at Minneapolis, $2.15 to $2.30. It will be noticed that on Saturday the three grades approximated in value and reached the maximum price. In Duluth on the same day the price of No. 1 Northern was $2.40, and No. 2 Northern, $2.35. I could find no quotation for No. 3 Northern.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I point out that the quotations the minister has given for August 16 and 17, Minneapolis, are not quotations for cash wheat, but for future delivery.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is correct.

PENSIONS TO CANADIANS IN IMPERIAL FORCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asked a question on Saturday as to the pensions of members of the Canadian forces who had been transferred to the Imperial forces, and vice versa. So long as a soldier, non-commissioned officer, or officer continues to be a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, he is pensioned at the Canadian Expeditionary Force rate, but if he if he is transferred to the Imperial forces he loses his status as a member of the Canadian forces, and is therefore non-pensionable at Canadian Expeditionary Force rates.

This Order in Council relating to this subject was passed on January 30, 1917:

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 24th January, 1917, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, stating that the terms of a proposal made by the British Government regarding pensions of officers or their dependents are as follows:

In case of those who have been lent for service in the field, each government shall undertake full pension liability for its own officers; that is to say in respect to the service of Canadian officers loaned to the British forces or British officers loaned to the Canadian forces in the field such service shall be treated so far as pensions are concerned as if it had been with the officer's own home forces.

The Minister submits that such proposal has been referred to the Canadian Board of Pension Commissioners which is in favour of its adoption.

A similar proposal was made by the Commonwealth of Australia in respect of the exchange of officers between their forces and the Imperial forces and has been adopted by both governments.

The Minister, therefore, recommends that the Order in Council of 13th October, 1916, providing "that Canada should bear her proportionate share of the service pension or widows' pension at the ordinary rate and in addition the excess of war over peace charges" be cancelled and that the later proposal of the British Government that each government should pay pensions of its own officers, irrespective of their service with the other, be adopted instead.

[Sir George Foster.]

The Committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

EMPLOYMENT OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John City): Has the Minister of Militia received the resolution which I referred to some time ago which was passed by the Veterans' Association of St. John with regard to the employment of returned officers and soldiers to take the place of those now employed in a military capacity, but who have not been to the front? The minister stated at the time that he had not received the resolution, but that when it came to his hand, he would consider the matter and make an announcement later. I call his attention to the fact that there is quite a good ground for complaint, inasmuch as many positions are held by those who have not been to the front which might just as well be filled by returned soldiers.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I cannot recall at the moment whether the resolution has ever reached the department, but I shall look into the matter.

THE MILITARY VOTERS' ACT, 1917.

SECOND READING OF BILL AND CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 127, The Military Voters' Act, 1917.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on the introduction of this Bill I went into a somewhat full exposition of its provisions. That exposition was, perhaps, fuller than it would otherwise have been because of questions put by members of the House who, naturally, were interested in having information on the subject at as early a moment as possible. The principle of the Bill is that our soldiers should be afforded an opportunity to vote in the coming election; that adequate provision should be made to enable them to register their vote, precautions, however, being taken to ensure the regularity, fairness and genuineness of that vote. I think we can safely assume that the principle of the Bill is not in question. I apprehend that any further discussion of the matter, which would be as to the method rather than as to the principle could be more conveniently dealt with in committee. I do not feel, therefore, that it is necessary for me at this stage to go over what I said on the introduction of the Bill, or to elaborate argument with regard to the principle of the measure.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I feel quite sure that all the members of the House approve the desire of the minister to give to our soldiers an opportunity of casting their vote. While every reasonable opportunity for their doing so should be afforded, it is necessary to surround with every safeguard the casting of the vote and the return of the ballots to Canada in order to make sure that the ballots finally counted shall be the ballots which were cast by the electors. Certain provisions which might well be inserted are absent from the Bill; but, as my hon. friend says, that is a matter which can be considered in committee. I should like, however, to take this opportunity of asking the minister if we are to assume, from the fact that women engaged in the expeditionary forces are to be allowed to vote, that during the present session a Bill will be introduced giving the women of Canada generally the right to vote. It would be somewhat anomalous to give this right only to those who serve in the expeditionary force; there should be one law dealing with women generally throughout Canada. Those women who have remained at home and have performed duties in connection with Red Cross and patriotic work generally in such manner as to call forth the admiration of the world are just as much entitled to recognition as those who have gone to the front in the capacity of nurses.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not prepared at this moment to give a categorical answer to my hon. friend's question. In the preparation of this Bill we were looking at the whole subject with a view to seeing that the right to vote was conferred upon every person who had taken part in the active military service of the country. That being so, we did not, by reason of sex, exclude from the provisions of the Bill those women who were doing service with the Canadian Expeditionary Forces. My hon. friend speaks of that as being an anomalous condition. But if that is anomalous it would be equally anomalous to include expressly the Indian, who is excluded from the general voting because he is an Indian. Likewise, this measure makes no distinction of age; it does not require that the soldier who votes as a soldier should be of the full age. That, I suppose, might, according to my hon. friend, be subject to the same suggestion of being anomalous. The quality of having given active military service—service in any way connected with the military operations of this war—overrode other considerations. But that did not, we thought, imply that with regard to other persons those considerations should be overridden. We have been looking at the matter exclusively from the point of view of the military vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sorry that my hon. friend is not able to give an assurance that the inclusion of women in the provisions of this Bill is an indication that the Government intends to ask Parliament to extend the franchise to women generally. I am not prepared to say that I would favour the granting of the right of suffrage to women simply because they served with the Expeditionary Forces, unless that principle is to be applied also to a broader measure that would extend to all women of the country the right to vote.

It is provided by the Bill that any person, who has enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, whether a resident of Canada or not, shall be entitled to vote at the next general election. I think that is going entirely too far; the right should be limited to those who have been residents of Canada. For instance, a British subject who is a resident of the United States, and who, because of his desire to engage in the war in the interests of the Empire, enlists, for the sake of convenience, with the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, would be entitled to vote as a Canadian elector. I do not see why that should be the case. I assume that such a man joins the Canadian Expeditionary Force because of a desire not to aid Canada but to aid the Empire. I am unable to understand why, simply because of that fact, he should be allowed to vote at a Canadian election. If he is a British subject resident in any other part of the Empire, he would have the right to vote in that portion of the Empire in which he is resident. The right to vote should be limited to those who have been residents of Canada. Section 3 of the Bill makes provision that if this class of voter is not able, by reason of non-residence, to select any particular district in which he is entitled to vote, he is allowed to select any district he pleases. That strikes me as being very objectionable. A British subject resident in the United States, never having resided in Canada, may select any district that he pleases, in any portion of the Dominion, in which his vote shall be cast. To my mind, very great inconvenience and injustice would result from such a provision. I trust that on reflection my hon. friend will agree that the right to vote should be limited to those who have, even for a short period, been resident in Canada.

I would suggest also that my hon. friend amend the Bill to make it absolutely clear that an elector may vote only for one who has been nominated as a candidate.

The form of the ballot is calculated to mislead because it provides that the voter, if he desires to vote for any particular person, may write his name on the blank space. I presume the Act means any particular person who has been nominated as a candidate. I think the ballot paper should declare that he may vote for any particular person or persons who are named as candidates. The plural should be there, because there are some constituencies in Canada wherein more than one candidate may be chosen. In the city and county of St. John two candidates may be elected, and the same applies to the county of Halifax. I think, therefore, the ballot should provide that the voter may vote for "any particular candidate or candidates" instead of "any particular person or persons." The elector, seeing the language on the ballot paper, may presume that he would have the right to select some person whom he might like to vote for but who had not been nominated as a candidate. I think it is desirable to make the provision so clear that no misunderstanding shall arise with respect to it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to ask the minister why it is not his intention to address the House explaining the principle of this Bill. We have our existing legislation, chapter 11 of the statutes of 1915, and the minister sees some points that he wants to improve upon, but instead of simply bringing down an amendment to the Act, he is bringing down a Bill dealing with the matter de novo and repealing the old Act. If the minister had proceeded by the other method, and bring down an amending Bill, he would have explained the principle of his amending Bill and pointed out the reason it was necessary to make these amendments before asking us to consent to the second reading. I submit that we should ask the minister to give us his reasons for this change, and that we should not merely regard it as sufficient for him to refer to the previous legislation. The new points should be dealt with.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. DOHERTY: On the introduction of the Bill, I went very fully into an explanation of the reasons which led us to believe that the provisions of the legislation of 1915, while they might have been adequate and practicable under the conditions that prevailed at that time, are hardly sufficient to meet the exigencies of the present day. There are two notable changes in the conditions, the first being the very much larger number of voters that have to be dealt with overseas than when the legislation of 1915 was passed. The other outstanding change of conditions results from the difficulty, and no doubt the danger, that surround the transportation between this country and the overseas countries at the present time which did not exist, at all events, in such degree when we were dealing with the legislation of 1915. I do not think there is any substantial difference in principle between the legislation of 1915 and this legislation. There is this marked difference of conditions which in our judgment, at all events, and I submit in the judgment of the House, calls for providing a different procedure in the taking of the soldier's vote. We might have proceeded by calling this an amending Bill, and attaching every change to some particular section as an amendment to it, but that would have been a very inconvenient way of doing it. It is clearer and simpler to put before the House, in the shape of a measure complete in itself, both what is preserved of the old Act and what is new in the present Bill. Beyond the changes in the method of taking the vote, there are the changes in regard to the persons who are to be qualified to vote; that is to say: we have included women. We will make no distinction based upon sex. We have also included minors; we make no distinction based on minority and majority, and although for clearness, I believe in the old Act Indians were included, we have expressly mentioned Indians in order to do away with any doubt.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister not call it a new principle where he permits a soldier to ear-mark his vote for any constituency under certain circumstances?

Mr. DOHERTY: I respectfully submit that questions of this kind, although I would be very glad to answer them, are questions which would naturally come up in committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think it is a principle.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not consider it a question of principle.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is not much principle about it.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not have the good fortune to be present when the minister made his explanation of the principle of the Bill and of the differences between this Bill and the present Act. May I be permitted to say that I think the proper time for making such a full explanation as the House is entitled to under such circumstances is upon the second reading of the Bill. However, the minister has seen fit to take the other course. The suggestion of my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) was not an objection to the form in which the Bill has been introduced. I think he would agree, as I would, that it would be very much better to introduce the Bill in this form than in the form of an amendment. But his point was, if I caught it aright, that the minister, seeing fit to introduce the Bill in this form, should make to the House the same explanation as to the differences in principle as he would necessarily have made had he introduced a Bill in amendment to the present Act. This is a long Bill, it is intricate in many respects and members will have considerable difficulty in comparing its provisions with those of the previous measure. Therefore, the House is rightly entitled to consideration at the hands of the minister. While we can deal with certain of these matters of detail in committee of the whole, we make up our minds as to the merits of the measure on the principles laid down in the discussion on the second reading. Those of us who had not the privilege of hearing the minister on the introduction of the Bill are hardly in a position to deal with the subject to-day as it should be dealt with. It is all the more impressed on my mind from the fact that repeatedly from the other side of the House, from the lips of the Prime Minister as well as, I think, other members, it has been stated that it was a practical impossibility to take the soldier's vote overseas.

That being the case, and a new measure being introduced, it is particularly in order that information should be given why if it was impossible to take the soldiers' vote under the existing measure, it will be possible to do so under the measure now introduced. This is a measure of very great and far-reaching importance. Everybody will agree that a citizen of Canada, entitled to vote in Canada, should be entitled to vote when he is serving Canada in a military capacity, although he may be outside its limits. So far as that principle is embodied in the Bill, certainly it will have the support of myself and, I am sure, of every hon. member of this House.

But there are other principles involved in a franchise Act besides the principle of providing for the casting of the vote. There are principles connected with ensuring that the vote shall be counted as it has been cast. There is the principle of the right of the several parties who are concerned in the voting to be sure that, first, the vote is cast secretly; second, that it is cast without pressure of fear or favour; and, third, that, having been so cast, it shall be counted as it was cast. I am unable to say whether these principles are provided for in the Bill, and I would say to the minister that I do not consider them details at all; I consider each one an essential principle. If they are not provided for in the Bill, there is a possibility that, instead of the privilege of the franchise being exercised as a right and a duty, the intention of the voter may be diverted from its proper purpose, and, instead of being of assistance in expressing the mind of the people of Canada, it may be a means of misdirecting the minds of the people. I can only hope that the minister, in the preparation of the Bill, has had these points in mind. I am not able to say whether they are properly safeguarded or not, as I have not had the opportunity to discuss the Bill, and in any case would not be able to form an opinion on these points without having the minister's explanation.

There is, however, one feature that I find in section 3 in which, following the suggestion of the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), I must say I cannot see an evidence of good faith on the part of the minister or the Government in the preparation of the Bill, and if this provision of which I speak is a fair sample of the Bill's provisions throughout, I would be compelled to take very strong exception to it and to say that it may have been that the fact that the Government did not have a majority in the Senate was a protection to the public interest in the passing of the other Bill; but that now that the Government has a majority in the Senate, it feels free to introduce such a measure as it pleases and as it thinks may best serve its purpose, whatever that purpose may be. The liberties and rights of the people of Canada are involved in this measure, and I can only take the provision of subsection 3 of section 3 as a deliberate and intentional and very serious and far-reaching attack upon the rights and privileges of the people of Canada in the expression of their vote. The provision of the section of which I speak is:

(1) Every military elector shall be qualified and entitled to vote at a general election.

(2) If he can state the electoral district wherein he last continuously resided during at least.....months of the year immediately preceding his appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service, or so particularly specify a place or places within an electoral district whereat during such period of time he so resided that such electoral district can therefrom be ascertained, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or to be ascertained, and his vote shall be applied thereto.

I can only characterize such a provision as a deliberate outrage on the right of expression of opinion by the people of the country. It creates a possibility of the massing of an unknown or untold number of votes, strictly under law, in any constituency against any candidate. To place such a power in the hands of a government which has necessarily the whole direction and control of the operation of this measure is certainly an attack upon the rights of the people such as we have seldom seen, even at the hands of this Government.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that the Prime Minister some months ago, shortly after the opening of the session, declared most emphatically that it was not possible for the votes of the soldiers who are in France to be taken in a general election, and this statement was made in such a definite and positive manner, without any reservation at all, that I think it is due to the House that, before this Bill passes the second reading, the Prime Minister should say to the House what change has occurred in the meantime which enables the votes to be taken when apparently it was not possible to take them before.

Then again I think it is in order that the minister should inform us what understanding, if any, has been had with the British authorities in France as to the taking of the vote in the way proposed in the Bill. I assume that, in view of the fact that it has been clearly shown that the control and direction of overeseas forces while on the soil of Great Britain is vested in the Canadian military authorities as represented by the overseas Minister of Militia, there can be no doubt about the capacity of having these votes recorded in Great Britain or in any other part of the world, within the Empire, where they may be. But as regards France, the statement of the Prime Minister was so definite and positive on the subject that I think some explanation is due to the House and the public as to what change has taken place in the meantime. I quite agree with the hon. member for St. John that, while the men who are overseas have a right to the franchise of this country and should be given an opportunity of exercising that franchise, and while we should all endeavour in this House to prepare and put through a reasonable Bill which would be absolutely fair to all parties, ensuring the honesty of the vote and the certainty of its proper recording, it is a novel principle to say that a person who was not a resident of Canada, who had no interest whatever in our internal affairs or conditions, and no knowledge in fact of what is best for Canada as a whole, or for any part of it, merely because he had the franchise in some other part of the Empire, or in the United States, where, if he chose, he could exercise that franchise, should be entitled to vote as a Canadian soldier in a Canadian election. There are numerous cases of men who have never been in Canada, who have been transferred to Canadian forces. At one stage a large number of soldiers were transferred to the Canadian forces—men who had never been in Canada and who, I suppose, never expected to be here. The question as to whether or not such could exercise the franchise intelligently in regard to Canadian affairs is not arguable, leaving aside the question as to whether they could determine whether the individual candidate might or might not be a proper person to represent a constituency in Parliament. To say that a person who had never been in Canada should be permitted to determine as against the votes of the people of a certain locality, who live here, and whose interests are here, and who ought to be the persons to say who should represent them in Parliament, seems to me a very unreasonable proposition. There are other matters of detail in connection with the Bill, but, as the minister intimated that he would hear suggestions, I presume we might discuss very frankly in committee these points which are entirely apart from the principle that a soldier should have the right to exercise his franchise. I think we should hear from my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has the right to reply now, and should he do so that will close the debate.

Mr. DOHERTY: In regard to the statement by the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) in which he was pleased to refer to certain motives on the part of those who are promoting this Bill, I do not hesitate to say that the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in his imputation. There is no desire to do anything, except, so far as may be found possible, to meet the very principles which he himself has laid down. If I did not think it necessary to elaborate those principles, it was because, upon the principles that ought to underlie this measure, there should be substantial agreement. On those principles I am not in disagreement with my hon. friend. The provisions meet what is required, viz.: that questions which arise are whether those the soldier,—I am speaking generally—should record his vote, and that proper safeguards should surround the taking of the vote. We are not blind to the fact that, even under this measure, it will be exceedingly difficult to get a complete vote of the soldiers, but I do not think it is wise, simply because of the difficulty, that we should not make the best effort possible to achieve the end desired. As to the particular instance the hon. gentleman has mentioned: whether a soldier not a Canadian, who has been merely transferred to the Canadian Expeditionary Force, should have a vote as a Canadian soldier, I shall be open to consider suggestions in committee. We shall welcome suggestions towards making the law more workable in securing the soldiers' votes as fully as possible, and surrounding the voting with all the precautions that the conditions make possible.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister is not referring to the statement of the Prime Minister in that regard?

Mr. DOHERTY: We fully recognize, that, even after this measure is enacted, the taking of the soldiers' votes will be surrounded with very great difficulties. But by this measure we are endeavouring, so far as possible, to obviate these difficulties, which, without this legislation, in the opinion of the Prime Minister. might make the taking of the soldiers' votes impossible.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there any provision by which voters' lists will be provided, under this Bill, to the respective parties?

Mr. DOHERTY: No. We gave consideration to and tried to elaborate, a plan by which we could get a voters' list, but it proved in our judgment to be impracticable, and I may further say that a similar endeavour was made in Australia. We consulted with those who had the administration of the Australian Act, and they suggested to us that it was only an embarrassment, and in a general sort of way, they reported that rigidity in the provisions of the Act would tend to defeat its real purpose. There is no provision for a voters' list.

Mr. MURPHY: Could a copy of the nominal roll be obtained?

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps we could do better with these questions in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a question of detail more properly dealt with in committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee on the Bill—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On clause 1—application:

Mr. MURPHY: What is the practical application of the words "but before complete demobilization"?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand the word "demobilization" has an accepted meaning, in military parlance, so long as soldiers are still on active service in connection with the war, and are held together as soldiers in consequence of their enrolment for this war, they are mobilized, but when they have been disbanded and allowed to return to their homes, they are demobilized. The committee, I think, will understand that there necessarily will be a period, after the war ends, when our soldiers will still be in England, or France, or on their way home, or after they have reached here, before they will be demobilized. It will take some time before they can be all dealt with, according to their respective positions and discharged, and the regiments broken up.

Mr. BURNHAM: We can all appreciate the efforts made by the gentlemen responsible for this Bill to provide ample means for the taking of the soldiers' votes.

But it seems to me, and I think it will seem to many other hon. members, that considerations arise in connection with it, such, for example, as have been outlined at a certain meeting held at Joliette as reported in the Gazette of Montreal, of Monday, August 20th, 1917. The report says that a meeting of the Liberal assembly at Joliette yesterday was a great success. It also gives the remarks, direct as well as indirect, of two members of this House, and I would like to call the attention of the committee to some of those remarks, which will have a very serious effect upon the community at large. The article itself is under double headlines and is given great prominence. It says:

Particular stress was laid on the crisis which the province of Quebec is facing to-day by the Hon. Jacques Bureau, M.P. for Three Rivers.

Mr. GERMAN: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is quite out of order. He is not discussing anything relevant to the section under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is well taken. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. BURNHAM: The article goes on to say—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That is not relevant to the section. The hon. member must confine himself to a discussion of the section under consideration.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—definitions:

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is meant by the word "receptacle"? Would that definition enable an officer to carry ballots around in his pockets without having a regular ballot-box in which they would be deposited? This is a great departure from the usual way of conducting an election, and I see no reason for such a general term as "or other receptacle" in the section. That opens the door to placing the ballots anywhere at all. Why is it necessary to have such general language as that in the section?

Mr. DOHERTY: The purpose of this section is only to enable us to use the word "box" wherever, through the Act, we are dealing with receptacles, but there are, in this measure, other provisions providing for the way in which the ballot is to be placed in the receptacle and as to the sealing of the receptacle. This definition is only so that we shall not have each time to say box or bag or some other form of receptacle, but we have provisions further on that the receptacle shall be a suitable one and especially that it shall be suitably closed and sealed and so forth. The effect of this is only to tell us what "box" means when we use it in this Act.

[Mr. Burnham.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why do we depart from the old system of having a ballot-box?

Mr. DOHERTY: The ballot-box as we have it in this country would not be a very convenient thing to carry around on the field in France or Flanders. The only object is to make the taking of this vote as convenient as it possibly may be made, because it must be recollected that every inconvenience that is put in the way of taking the vote is so much of a difficulty in the way of a soldier registering his vote. When we come to deal with particular provisions, the hon. member will see that there are provisions for the holding of what are called polls, but there is also provision for affording opportunity to a soldier to register his vote, where that is possible, otherwise than at what might be called a poll, where the conditions are such that if he is not allowed to register his vote at the time and place at which he tenders it, he may be entirely deprived of the opportunity of registering his vote. I cannot conceive of anything that would be much more awkward for an officer taking votes under the conditions under which they are to be taken than the form of ballot-box as we have it in this country. It seems to me that, as long as we ensure that the ballot-box shall be in a proper receptacle, properly sealed and closed so as to be safe, we are doing all that is needed, and in departing from the absolute requirement of a tin ballot-box, we are certainly facilitating the taking of the soldiers' vote.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What section provides that the box, or bag, or whatever it is, will be locked or closed?

Mr. DOHERTY: Section 11 deals with that, and I think there are other provisions besides. Section 11 says:

The deputy presiding officer may use the same ballot box, if it be sufficient, at all polls committed to him to be held, until it has become filled, and upon the conclusion of his last poll, or whenever he shall decide to discontinue the depositing of ballots in any box, he shall seal it in such manner as to make evident any tampering therewith, plainly mark it with the words "military votes" and send it by registered post or other safe and expeditious means, addressed, (a) if the votes therein have been polled within the United Kingdom, to the secretary of the High Commissioner of Canada, at London, England; (b) if they have been polled on the continent of Europe, to the Canadian Commissioner to France; and, (c) if they have been polled elsewhere, to the General Returning Officer at Ottawa.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There ought to be some provision for a ballot box so that, when the ballots are put in, they cannot be removed. This definition—

"Box" or "ballot box" includes bag or other receptacle for containing ballots.

—is so very loose in its character that a returning officer might very well use any open vessel, anything that might be the handiest, even his pocket, if necessary.

Mr. MURPHY: Or his hat.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There should be some provision, the same as we have in the Dominion Elections Act providing for an ordinary ballot box. I do not think there would be any inconvenience in supplying the proper officials with those boxes, and it would be a certain safeguard; whereas, if an officer feels that, under the law, he can carry the ballots about in any receptacle he pleases to use he might think that people could be trusted, and then when he would come to seal up his ballots in some particular receptacle, he might find that he would have a good many ballots that were never cast by the electors at all. It is due to the soldiers that proper safeguards should be placed around the taking of the vote and the return of the ballot, so that the soldier, when he casts his ballot for a particular party or candidate, may have some reasonable assurance that that ballot will be sent back to Canada and counted at the proper time. The only reference to depositing ballots in the ballot box will be found in paragraph (b) of subsection 2 of section 9 which says:

. . . the deputy presiding officer, who shall without unfolding it—

That is in the case of counterfoils.

—ascertain by examining his initials and the number of the counter-foil, that it is the same paper as that furnished by him to the voter, and shall then, in the presence of the voter, remove and destroy the counterfoil, place the ballot in the proper envelope and deposit in it the ballot box.

That should read "deposit it in the ballot box". The words "in" and "it" have been transposed. It is intended, of course, to put the envelop in the ballot box, but, as the clause reads, the ballot box is to be put in the envelope. Paragraph (e) of section 9 provides that the voter shall place the ballot in the ballot box, which might mean that it could be placed in a pail or a tin can or in an open bag. I think the minister will see that there should be a section providing that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall secure a sufficient number of suitable ballot boxes which could be kept under lock and key, and sent forward to the different officials who are to take part in the taking of the vote. Here are some four hundred thousand voters whose ballots are to be cast. Why, in the interests of the soldiers themselves, and in the interests of the Canadian people, should there not be the same reasonable safeguards surrounding the procuring of a proper ballot box, and the placing of the ballots in a secure ballot box, as in the case of an ordinary election? In an ordinary municipal election all these safeguards are provided, but here, where we are providing for the taking of the votes of 400,000 soldiers, we are providing no safeguards whatever so far as the procuring of proper ballot boxes is concerned.

Mr. DOHERTY: It may be that there should be more exact description of the nature of the receptacle; but, assuming that to be so, this is not exactly the section where that provision should be made. This is only a definition of what "box" is understood to mean when it occurs in this Act. To avoid giving a description every time we want to mention the receptacle that is to hold the ballots, we say that the word "box" shall mean the receptacle that is to be used, whether it is a box or a bag. When we come to deal with the manner of taking the vote, I shall be pleased to consider whether it would not be desirable to insert, as far as that may be possible, a specific description of the receptacle. The operations on this side of the ocean will rest upon the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and on the other side of the ocean on the Acting or Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who is to be appointed and who will perform on the other side of the ocean the functions of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

It is true that the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act may be more specific as to the kind of box, but if I am not mistaken, it is part of the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to provide the boxes that are required; and I would assume that it would be part of the duties of the Acting Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the other side to provide the receptacles, whatever they may be, which are deemed best and most suitable. It did seem to us desirable that we should not prescribe absolutely that the receptacle must be a box in any particular form. Otherwise, we might create a condition where the soldier would be deprived of his vote just because the officer properly authorized did not have a box of the particular shape.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 122 of the Dominion Elections Act prescribes the form of ballot-box thus:

> The ballot boxes shall be made of some durable material, with one lock and key, and a slit or narrow opening in the top, and so constructed that the ballot papers may be introduced therein, but cannot be withdrawn therefrom unless the box is unlocked.

I think it would be well to introduce that paragraph in Part IV of the Act. If that were done, I think it would fairly well meet the objection.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have a provision here that Part IV is to be read in conjunction with the entire Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think that could be done, because section 119 of the Dominion Elections Act provides that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall provide the required number of ballot-boxes, which must be of a uniform size and shape, such instructions being first approved by the Governor in Council. The definition which we are discussing seeks to make the term more elastic, to meet the case where a "box," within the Dominion Elections Act, was not obtainable.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not say something like this, "which cannot be removed except by the person duly authorized"?

Mr. DOHERTY: It occurs to me that in this clause is not a proper place to give any description of the ballot box. All we are doing here is compiling a dictionary so that we shall know what the words mean that are used in the Act. I quite agree that it may be necessary before we get through with this Bill to make some provision as to what is to be the form of the box.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not say, "as hereinafter provided"?

Mr. DOHERTY: I can see no objection to that.

Mr. GERMAN: Why not accept the definition in the Dominion Elections Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know whether I can get it home to the mind of the committee, but at present we are not defining at all. If some more precise description should be required, I would suggest that it be provided somewhere else in the Act. We are here simply saying that when in this Act we use the word box, we mean whatever may be the proper receptacle for receiving the ballots. We do not want to have it said that, because we use the word box in the different sections, the deputy returning officer would not be entitled to put the ballots in a bag or some other receptacle. The only desirable thing about using the word box, even if it should be a bag, is that we are using the same word as is used in the Dominion Elections Act for the receptacle in which the ballots are put.

If the description in the Dominion Elections Act, read by the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), be held not to apply to this Act, perhaps it would be well to set out, in that part of the Act where provision is made for the manner in which the vote shall be taken, some one form of receptacle.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why not let this clause stand until we decide what the specific kind of receptacle shall be?

Mr. DOHERTY: The subsection was so worded simply to relieve the draftsman of the necessity of going into details every time he had to mention the receptacle. However, if it is thought that the description so employed is in any way objectionable or might be rendered objectionable by our subsequent description, I have no objection to letting the section stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Dominion Elections Act does not give a definition of ballot box, but it describes what the box shall be. If it is considered desirable under this legislation to have a sealed bag instead of a ballot box, that could be provided for. But it is undesirable to include "bag" in the definition of the receptacle for containing the ballots. That would convey to the person taking the votes that any loose receptacle that he might get hold of would do just as well as a ballot box; it would depend upon his own interpretation of what would be a reasonable safeguard. The statute ought to provide some receptacle that can be kept under lock and key and from which ballots cannot be removed except by the proper official. Those receptacles should be uniform so that when they are returned to the proper official he will know that those are the receptacles that went out from him and that others have not been substituted in their places. It came under my notice some years ago that in one case considerable delay was incurred in returning a ballot box. It was stated that when the box was received, the returning officer was able to say that it was not the identical box that he had sent out. The same safeguard should be thrown around the returning of the ballot boxes as is contained in the present Dominion law.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I have said, this is not a description of the ballot box which is to be used; the provision is so worded in order that it may not be necessary frequently to go into a detailed description of the receptacle. I understand—I shall look into that—that the general requirements read by the member for Halifax apply to this box; we are making no exception in regard to the provisions of the Dominion Act which in themselves do not call for a specific kind of tin box. But when we come to deal with the manner in which the presiding officer shall deal with the ballot; with the question of where he is to put it and how he is to secure the receptacle so that it may not be tampered with and so that it may be identified as being the receptacle that he sent out, I shall be glad to consider whether we ought to go into more absolute detail with regard to the form of the receptacle. For the present, perhaps the section had better stand; we shall clear this up accordingly as the committee may be satisfied with the present requirements or may think that they are susceptible of improvement.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think that any particular provisions of the Dominion Elections Act must be specifically incorporated in this Act before they would apply. I make that suggestion so that the minister may have it in mind in connection with the definition of ballot box.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The present Dominion Elections Act consists of over 300 sections; it is divided into three parts. When this Act becomes law, how much of the Dominion Elections Act will apply to the taking of the soldiers' votes? For instance, in taking the ballots at election, agents representing the candidates interested are present in the polling booths. It is not regarded as legal or proper to take a vote unless representatives of each candidate are present. Under this legislation, will it be in order for an officer who has charge of the ballot box or bag to take a soldier's vote in the absence of the agent appointed to represent any particular candidate?

Mr. DOHERTY: We would get on better if we dealt with the sections as they present themselves. It is in connection with the sections providing the method of representation of candidates or parties at the taking of the vote that this question would most naturally arise. However, the provisions made in this Act in that respect are substantially the same as those contained in the present Soldiers' Voting Act. If we are to enable the soldiers' votes to be taken in a practical way, it is not possible to make it imperative that no soldier shall vote unless a representative of each candidate, or a representative of each political party is present. But, just as the old Act did, this Act does provide for the appointment of persons who are designated as scrutineers. Six of these scrutineers are to be appointed by the Governor in Council—that is the provision of the existing law— three on the nomination of the leader of the Opposition and three on the nomination of the leader of the Government. These three scrutineers are to have the liberty of appointing as many deputy scrutiners as they think will be useful to them. Each deputy scrutineer will have all the powers of a scrutineer on this side of the Atlantic. It is made the duty of the officers taking the vote or holding the polls to give public notice, so far as possible, of the time and the place when they propose to hold the poll and to give special notice, so far as possible, to scrutineers of whose names they may have been notified. It is the duty of everybody in connection with the taking of this vote to do everything that conditions will make possible to afford opportunity of representation of the respective parties at the taking of vote. I do not think that it is suggested as practicable that we should require the presence of a representative for each of the 468 candidates because, if we have contests in the 234 constituencies, that is what you would need to have. I do not think that is practicable. But we have preserved in this Act the provision contained in regard to scrutineers in the present law upon the subject. My impression is that this method came as a suggestion from some hon. gentleman on the other side of the House and that at the time, if my memory serves me, it was looked upon as being as complete a provision for the representation of the parties as we could make under the conditions. If it can be improved upon, without preventing the soldier giving his vote, I shall certainly be happy to consider any suggestion that may be made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That clause stands?

Mr. DOHERTY: The subclause stands.

Subclause allowed to stand.

On section 2—camp:

"Camp" means and includes base, barracks, rest station, ship, dockyard, hospital or other place whereat or whereon any military or naval unit or other body of military electors, as defined by this Part, is assembled under a commanding officer for the performance of any military or naval duty, or for rest, cure, exercise, or training;

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the purpose of the words "under a commanding officer"? Might it not be possible that there might be a number of military electors assembled at any of the places specified in the subsection but they might not be under a commanding officer? Perhaps these words are rather restrictive in their effect.

Mr. DOHERTY: On inquiry I was informed that at all of these places there would always be somebody found in command. If we struck that out you might have a group of soldiers gathered together in some place which would be very unsuitable to take a ballot. I am not suggesting any improper place in that regard but it was thought well, in so far as the holding of polls are concerned, that they should be held in every place where you could find any gathering of soldiers for any purpose whatsoever who were assembled under the direction of an officer. Furthermore, we make provision that a soldier who might not be able to reach a poll of that kind, and who is exposed to the loss of his vote, is allowed to tender it and have it taken at the place where he is and where, of course, there is present a presiding officer provided with the necessary equipment to take the vote. I was assured, as coming from the military authorities, that I would be running no risk of missing any place where soldiers are properly gathered together by leaving in this provision. On the other hand, I do not think it would be desirable that we should include in the definition such a place, for instance, as a boarding house where half a dozen soldiers might be gathered together. If half a dozen soldiers are gathered together at any place for pleasure, say, it would hardly be a suitable place to hold a poll.

Mr. NESBITT: A "commanding officer" would not mean an officer of any particular rank but whoever was in command at the place?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. For instance, at a hospital, I understand it is the medical officer who is in command.

Mr. KNOWLES: If there were some wireless operators in the Cape Breton county, why would they be defined as military electors?

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. DOHERTY: We have not made any special mention of wireless operators but any person who has been——appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service as one of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, whether as officer, soldier, sailor, dentist, nurse, aviator, mechanician or otherwise, and who remains one of any such forces or services or has been honourably discharged therefrom.

is included as a voter. The words were intended to be large enough to cover everybody in whatever capacity he was acting who was enrolled, or enlisted, or appointed, to any service which makes him a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. KNOWLES: The reason I asked that was that when you co-relate it with the expression "under a commanding officer" it may have a bearing on the case of a young man from my constituency. He had himself trained in wireless telegraphy, was taken on by Mr. Edwards, the naval man here, and for awhile was at sea. Only a few days ago I had a letter from him and he is at some lonely place in charge of a wireless station by the sea. As I understand it, although I speak subject to correction, he is there without any commanding officer over him, simply receiving and transmitting messages by the wireless system. He is not "assembled under a commanding officer."

Mr. DOHERTY: The right to the franchise does not depend on being in the army. If he forms part of the Canadian Expeditionary Force then he is entitled to vote. The word "camp" is put there so that it might be used without regard to the particular situation of the places at which it is provided polls shall be held. I am assuming that this wireless telegrapher is a part of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces and therefore a military voter within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. KNOWLES: He is in the Naval Service.

Mr. DOHERTY: If he is, then he is a voter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think these operators are civilians.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that this class of persons is organized and recognized as part of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. It will be noticed that we have specially mentioned mechanicians in our enumeration of the people who now form part of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Our next clause, which defines what is covered by the term "military electors", is:

"Military elector" means and includes every person, male or female, who, being a British subject,—whether or not ordinarily resident in Canada and whether or not a minor or an Indian, has been, while within or without Canada, appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service as one of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Militia on active service, or the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, or has been, while within Canada, appointed, enlisted or enrolled as one of the British Royal Flying Corps, Royal Naval Aviation Service, or Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol Service, whether as officer, soldier, sailor, dentist, nurse, aviator, mechanician or otherwise, and who remains one of any such forces or services or has been honourably discharged therefrom.

I have been doing some thinking myself as to whether the terms of that clause are sufficiently wide to cover every class that ought to be covered, and I am making note of this suggestion with the view of making such amendments as may be necessary to make it quite sure that we are covering everybody. It was pointed out to me that it is desirable to include persons who are undoubtedly Canadians but who are on service in the Imperial military force, or possibly in the French military force, as being reservists. I said that we had considered that, that we thought it desirable that they should have votes and that the reason they did not figure in our present definition rested on the difficulty of providing machinery to give them votes. Since the matter was brought to my attention I have given it some further consideration and what occurs to me is that even if we cannot provide machinery to give votes to these men, it would be particularly desirable that we should include them in the category of people entitled to vote because many of these men find themselves in conditions where they will be able to reach our presiding officer who is taking the votes of the Canadian force and if we recognize their right to vote, then they would be enabled to vote by that circumstance. Perhaps it is not a satisfactory reason for not recognizing his right to vote that we cannot provide special machinery for him. In that connection, I intend asking and should be glad to have any observations by hon. gentlemen about this definition of military voter, because it is a very important provision of the Act. I had intended, after hearing the different suggestions that would be made, to ask that that clause should stand so that, before it is finally passed, we shall have made as sure as we can to have included in the words "military voter" every person who fairly ought to be recognized as forming part of any force, whether actually combatants or members of a subsidiary force, telegraphers or others, actually taking part in the struggle in their respective capacities, and who have at least this much connection with Canada, that they either form part of a Canadian force and therefore, as soldiers, are Canadians, or, failing that, that they should have a connection with Canada which at the present moment it seems to me would have to consist of something in the nature of permanent residence in Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We all agree with the minister that it is of great importance that he should find language comprehensive enough to include every real military elector; but there is also the danger that we may make the language too broad and include people who are not intended to be classed as militaary electors. For example, I see in this definition that we have included "such persons as are appointed." That is a very comprehensive word, and it may include people who are not meant to be included. I am told that there are scores and hundreds of young men and women appointed by the patronage committee of Ottawa who are serving in the Plaza building and many other places in this city, who are doing military work in the sense of clerical work. I am not sure that this language is not broad enough to include men and women of that class, and I do not think it is the intention of the minister to allow every person who assists in any kind of work, like clerical work in Ottawa or Halifax, to vote under this Act. I should like the minister to look into that and see if my criticism is well taken.

Mr. DOHERTY: It says "appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force." These young women employed in the buildings here have never been appointed as members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the significance of the word "appointed"?

Mr. DOHERTY: A private enlists, but an officer is appointed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I mentioned, when the Speaker was in the Chair, on the second reading, an objection which I entertain very strongly to this clause. It defines "military elector" to mean and include "every person, male or female, who, being a British subject whether or not ordinarily resident in Canada," and such person is to have the right to vote. Then, as a corollary or a consequence of that, sub-section 3 of section 3 has been drafted. This is a most extraordinary provision. It provides that such a person may select any electoral district which he pleases. The result of that would be that, if the ballots of these non-residents were judiciously distributed—and I know some gentlemen who could distribute them judiciously—they would control practically every electoral district in Canada, and could turn the vote for either one party or the other. I do not think that should be permitted, and I do seriously call the attention of the minister to that provision. I saw the other day that there were said to be some 5,000 British citizens living in the United States who were desirous of serving the Empire, and it is very convenient for them to come to Canada and join the Canadian expeditionary force. These men, perhaps none of whom have ever lived in Canada, some of whom have not been in Canada since childhood, presumably engaged in various occupations in the United States, come to Canada and enlist. They go to the front and they are allowed to vote as Canadian electors. They have no place of residence in Canada and all they have to do is to say they have no place of residence and then their votes may be distributed throughout the various electoral districts of Canada. I ask if that is right. Why should the mere fact of non-residents engaging in the battles of the Empire as members of the Canadian force entitle them to be allowed to take part in an election which is to determine the government of Canada for the next few years?

Mr. HAZEN: Should not the man who fights for the country have the right to vote?

Mr. PUGSLEY: He is not fighting for Canada, but for the Empire, and because he is a British subject.

Mr. HAZEN: He is fighting for Canada too.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, he would be doing so just as much if he were to join the army of the United States or the Imperial army. Why should you give a man who is, to all intents and purposes, an alien, so far as Canada is concerned, the right to take part in the determination of the domestic affairs of, and the government of Canada in the future, simply because he finds it convenient to join the Canadian Expeditionary Force in order to fight for the British Empire?

Mr. HAZEN: He has to be a British subject.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, that is all.

Mr. HAZEN: But a British subject is not an alien.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He is a foreigner.

Mr. HAZEN: A British subject is not a foreigner.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He is a stranger to Canada, a non-resident of Canada. I would suggest to the minister that the words "whether or not" be struck out, so that the clause would read:

Who, being a British subject, ordinarily resident in Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not fix the time?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not see why the time should not be fixed. He should be a resident of Canada for three months, or perhaps six months, long enough, at any rate, to have an intelligent interest in Canadian affairs.

Mr. NESBITT: The Act of 1915 provides for "thirty days in any district."

Mr. PUGSLEY: But resident in Canada for six months.

Mr. NESBITT: A resident for thirty days would define the place to which he belonged.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the hon. minister tell me what time he proposes filling in, in subsection 2 of section 3? There is a blank there.

Mr. DOHERTY: The intention was to fill it in by "a period of four months within the last year."

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the minister should give a reason for this very great change he proposes making in the law. Section 1, of the Act of 1915 reads:

Every male British subject of 21 years of age or upwards serving in the military forces of Canada in the present war (hereinafter called "volunteer"), who, within six months immediately preceding the date when he was appointed to or enlisted in such forces, had been resident in any electoral district in Canada for a period of not less than thirty days, shall be entitled to vote in the electoral district in which he was last so resident, in the manner hereinafter set out, notwithstanding his absence from such electoral district or from Canada; provided that if any person was, at the time he was so appointed or enlisted, qualified to vote in any other electoral district in Canada he shall vote in such other district only.

Any one can understand the reason for that provision. The idea which Parliament had in view then was that only those who had been residents of Canada should be allowed to vote. It was not thought desirable to require a long period of residence, but they must be residents of Canada. A most radical change is proposed by this Bill, and it is declared that these men shall have the right to vote, whether they have been residents of Canada or not. What knowledge would a man who has all his life been a resident of the United States have of the political parties or of the questions which engage the attention of the people of Canada, simply because, being a resident of the United States, he comes and enlists in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces and goes overseas. I can conceive of no reason why he should have a vote. It seems to me to be entirely objectionable. The minister should be able to present the reasons for this remarkable change, before asking the committee to adopt it. I do not believe he can suggest any good reason. Every argument is the other way. No person should be allowed to vote in the coming election, unless he has been, for some period at all events, either short or long, a resident of Canada.

Mr. MORPHY: Replying to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from St. John, I cannot conceive it possible that he should take such ground. Here we see the patriotic spirit of Canadians, living in the United States, whether they have lived there for one or two, or ten or twenty years—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not necessarily Canadians.

Mr. MORPHY: —without having lost their citizenship of this country, and, rather than discourage them, I, as a Canadian, would give them credit, in a measure, for holding their allegiance to Canada. We find these young men, free from conscription, loyally coming forward, from patriotic motives, to fight for the dominion of their birth—young men who would be entitled to pensions once they have enlisted, young men who take the risk of the horrors of war, and go to fight for the British Empire, including Canada; young men who have been paid Canadian money, who will receive treatment in Canadian hospitals at Canadian expense, whose dependents will receive every benefit this country may give,—and we cannot give them anything too good. These young men have been away from this country for years, without forfeiting their allegiance, and without taking out papers of naturalization in a foreign country, they have kept in touch with the affairs in Canada, and, on the specious argument of the hon. gentleman from St. John, alleging ignorance, and alleging that these men do not understand political questions, we are asked to provide that they shall not be permitted to vote. To my mind the proposition is ridiculous.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This section does not limit it to the case of persons who have been born in Canada, but it is extended to every British subject. This person or his parents may never have spent a single day in Canada until the day he enlisted, and, indeed he may never have been in Canada, because he might enlist abroad in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, and yet, under this Bill he is entitled to vote.

Mr. MORPHY: That does not detract one iota from my argument. If a British subject comes here and chooses to enlist in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, he should be treated as a first-class Canadian. If a man who comes from theUnited States, or anywhere else, and enlists in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces is to get every benefit under the sun from the treasury of this country, it seems a monstrous thing that we should deprive him of his vote. I am astonished at this time to hear, on the floor of this House, an argument so specious and so much against the very first principles of patriotism as the argument advanced by the hon. member from St. John.

Mr. GERMAN: There is another phase of this section that strikes me as rather peculiar. It allows minors to vote. The clause reads:

"Military elector" means and includes every person, male or female, who, being a British subject, whether or not ordinarily resident in Canada and whether or not a minor or an Indian, has been, while within or without Canada, appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service as one of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Royal Canadian Navy.

Every one knows, that the men enlisted in the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve are not really serving on active duty at the front. So far as I know very few of them are on active duty at all, but what would be the effect of this provision? The Government, if they saw fit, could appoint or enlist any number of young men who were minors, not entitled to vote at all, for service in say, the Royal Canadian Navy, or the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, who would never go on active service, who had no intention of going on active service, but who when they enlisted would be entitled to vote. Young men of such political calibre as suited the ideas of a certain party might be enlisted for the purpose of voting. There should be protection against that kind of thing, because enlistment in the Canadian Militia or active service is quite a different thing. I am quite willing to allow the minors who have been on active service to have a vote. But I am certainly not willing that minors who, just before an election, may be appointed to or enlist in a service which is not really an active service, should be given a vote as minors when they would otherwise not be entitled to vote. If that were done, voters' lists throughout the country could be padded to an unlimited extent with disastrous results to an opposition.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The point made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), is almost unanswerable. It should not be permissible, under this measure, for, say, twenty persons from Newfoundland to enlist for service upon one of the Canadian Naval Service boats of Nova Scotia two or three days before the date of polling and thus obtain the franchise. There is a great distinction between those serving in the Canadian Naval Service and those serving at the front. For instance, all the Fishery Protective Service boats are, I think, in the Canadian Naval Service at the present moment. I do not think we should go so far afield as to provide for the voting of persons so engaged.

I quite agree with what the hon. member for St. John says as to the granting of the franchise to those who are not ordinarily resident in Canada, and I do not agree with the remarks of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy). I hardly think that the position taken by the hon. member for St. John is controvertible. It does not seem to me arguable that a man who has never resided in Canada should be given a vote under this measure. Such a question should not seriously engage our attention for a moment. We appreciate services rendered to the cause by all those who have enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force but let us be reasonable about it. Do not let sentiment carry us to a point which will make us all appear foolish and irrational. In the Canadian forces you will find many men from the British West Indies, from Newfoundland, and from other parts of the British Dominions. Upon what basis of reasoning can you argue that they are entitled to a vote in a Canadian election? They do not ask for it; they could not intelligently exercise the franchise. I do not think they would thank the Canadian Parliament for giving them that privilege, and I can conceive of no reason why it should be given to them. This is a Canadian Parliament legislating for and in the interest of the citizens of this country, and, therefore, any legislation contemplated by this measure should be intended to cover Canadian citizens only. I agree, therefore, with the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. John that the military vote should be confined to those who have been Canadian citizens for at least a certain period of time. The limit should be four or six months, because you are giving a great privilege in granting the franchise to those who may have been citizens of this country for but a short time. The minister should give serious consideration to this part of the section. I do not think he can present reasons which will satisfy a reasonable man that this part of the section should remain.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has pointed out that there are some extraordinary provisions in this section, and my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) objects to one particular provision. I agree with my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) that the circumstances in which this Bill is brought before Parliament are extraordinary. The whole thing is founded upon extraordinary circumstances. Our idea is that the man who enlists, who risks his life to save this country and the liberties of this country, ought to have something to say as to the government of the country, especially during the time that a war is on. Under this measure we purpose giving the Indian a vote. Without it, he would not have a vote. Why are we giving a vote to the Indian? Because the Indian is showing more patriotism and courage than many others, and is risking his life for the salvation of his country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Indian is a resident of Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: We are not giving him the franchise because he is a resident of Canada. If that were the only ground, we would have given it to him years ago. We purpose, under this measure, giving the franchise to the female nurses who go to the front and take care of our wounded soldiers, not because they are 21 years of age, not because they are entitled to the franchise under any other statute in existence in Canada, but because they are risking their lives to assist our fighting men at the front. It is a recognition of their services that they should have something to say as to how this country shall be governed, especially during the balance of this war. We purpose under this measure giving the franchise to a young man who may be only eighteen years of age. Our general election law provides that a man must be 21 years of age before he is entitled to vote. We are giving this young man a vote because he has shown sufficient patriotism and courage to go to the front and risk his life for his country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No one is objecting to that.

Mr. CROTHERS: There are many extraordinary provisions in this measure because the whole thing is founded upon extraordinary circumstances. Even if a man has lived in the United States for years, whether he was born in Canada or not, if he feels sufficient interest to join the forces of Canada—and, to risk his life for Canada, he should have something to say as to how this country shall be governed while this war is on.

Mr. COPP: No one controverts the general argument made by the Minister of Labour in so far as giving a minor, even as young as eighteen years of age, the right to vote. They may be even younger than that, because there are young lads of sixteen in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and they will be included in this measure. I cannot, however, agree with the Minister of Labour or the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) as to giving the vote to a man who knows nothing about the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: He knows enough to fight.

Mr. COPP: Yes. I agree that the franchise should be given to such as have an intelligent idea as to what the duty of a Canadian member of Parliament is, and what the Parliament of Canada is for, but if you grant the franchise to a British subject who happens to have been a resident of the United States, who may never have been a resident of Canada, who knows nothing about Canadian affairs—

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. gentleman object to bestowing the freedom of Canada upon men who are fighting for this country, even although they were born and lived in foreign lands just as the freedom of a city is given to a distinguished foreigner? That gift carries with it the privilege of that city, just as the freedom of Canada would carry with it privileges for distinguished services.

Mr. COPP: I would give every British subject the freedom that any citizen of this country is entitled to.

Mr. MORPHY: Except the right to vote.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend is wrong there. Take the case suggested by the hon. member for St. John, of a British subject who has enlisted in our forces after residing in the United States for a number of years. Now, although that man knows nothing about Canadian politics, he is to be given the right to vote. Then subsection 3 of section 3 says:

> If he cannot, because of non-residence or otherwise, so state or specify, he shall be deemed an elector of, and his vote shall be applied to, such electoral district as he may indicate.

He may not know a single candidate or a single electoral district in all Canada; so how can he intelligently indicate what district his vote shall be applied to?

Mr. MORPHY: It will be done for him.

Mr. COPP: By whom?

Mr. MORPHY: Don't ask me.

Mr. COPP: I repeat that it is absurd to expect a man to vote intelligently who knows nothing about Canadian politics, and who knows nothing about the candidates and the electoral districts.

Mr. TAYLOR: There is a very simple answer to the argument of hon. gentlemen who would disfranchise a British subject simply because he had entered the military service of Canada. If any of these Britishers from abroad to whom reference has been made came to Canada for the purpose, let us say, of avoiding military service in the United States, and remained in this country a few months, they would be entitled to vote in Canada. Why then, should we, as advocated by the hon. member for St. John, the hon. member for Halifax, and the hon. member for Westmorland decline to give the franchise to them because when they come to Canada they propose to do their duty and join our military forces and fight for us? If you exclude these men from this Act, you are penalizing them for fighting for Canada, and making it plain to them that they were foolish to do this for so ungrateful a country, when, if they had stayed at home in Canada and declined to do their duty, they might have exercised the franchise and had a voice in determining whether other citizens of Canada should go to the front. It seems to me that we must of necessity give a vote to all British subjects who come to fight for us. I do not know what is the residence qualification in Ontario.

Mr. ARTHURS: Three months.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Twelve months.

Mr. TAYLOR: I am informed by a resident of Ontario that the residence qualification is three months. In the province of British Columbia you can exercise the franchise if you have been six months a resident in the province and one month resident in the electoral district where you propose to vote. Now as the period of training for a member of the Canadian expeditionary force is seldom less than six months, it may be taken for granted that any man who is serving with our forces abroad has had at least six months training either in Canada or abroad, and surely, residence in a Canadian trench in France ought to be regarded as equal to residence in Canada, seeing that the very best of Canada's manhood is on service in those trenches. It seems to me a monstrous proposition to tell any man on service with the Canadian forces abroad, and who may have been two or three years in the trenches, that because he joined the Canadian forces on coming to Canada he cannot vote, whereas if he had remained idle in Canada, or had come here to avoid military service, he would have been able to vote.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. member misapprehends the attitude of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. We are simply saying there is no justification for going back on the well settled policy which we all agreed upon in 1915, that the men should be resident in Canada for a certain period before being allowed to vote. We are simply saying that in 1915, after very mature deliberation, Parliament agreed on certain restrictions as to residence, and we can see no reason for making a change now. This measure provides that a man, for instance, who has been transferred to the Canadian forces in England shall have the vote, although he may never have been in Canada at all. Now that does not seem reasonable. Section 2 says:

> "Military elector" means and includes every person . . . . whether or not a minor or an Indian, who has been, while within or without Canada, appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service.

Some of the men in the Bermuda regiments, for instance, have probably never been in Canada, because most of those regiments have gone direct to England. We can easily see how little sense there would be in giving a vote to a West Indian who had never been in Canada, or to a Britisher who had been drafted into the Canadian forces in England, and knew nothing at all about Canada. We say that that is a reasonable proposition. After all, the test of a man's right to vote is the test of citizenship and residence; the two go hand in hand together. And why should we now depart from that policy? A Britisher who happens to have been temporarily assigned to the Canadian forces may have a vote in England, and could vote at a general election there without any difficulty, and similarly, a West Indian would be able to vote in a West Indian election. That is quite reasonable, and all that we on this side of the House are asking is that the well-settled policy regarding residence shall be observed. It will also be noticed that under the provisions of this Bill the Canadian who has enlisted in an Imperial regiment in England—and quite a number of them have—is not entitled to vote. The right is confined to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Militia on active service, the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, the Flying Corps, and the Motor Boat Patrol. The Canadian who has enlisted in the British regiments on the other side is not given a vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have already said that we shall endeavour to meet that.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are here dealing with the definition of "Military elector," and my hon. friend has not included in the definition a Canadian citizen who is attached to a British regiment in England or France. A great many of my constituents are serving with the British regiments, and will thus be debarred from voting unless the clause is amended. I do not think we should give the vote to a minor who volunteers or is conscripted—I do not care whichever happens—just before the election, because he has not been away from Canada and has not endured any great privations. The man who has gone across to the other side, even if he be a minor, should have a vote. If my hon. friend, in common with every other hon. gentleman in the House, desires to recognize the rights of citizenship of a man who has given service, he should not open the door to possibilities of unfairness and of difficulties which, no matter what the result of the election contest might be, would leave a blot on the fair name of Canada. It is absurd that it should be possible, for instance, to hire ten men on one of our naval service boats—men whose only qualification to vote is that before election day they were placed on that boat. No one would seriously eulogize the services of such men, because they would be doing nothing worth talking about. I am sure that the hon. gentleman will approach the consideration of this measure from the desire that we all have on this side that the man who has made sacrifice and given service, provided he has had residence in this country, I care not how short, may know who to vote for; may know who the people of this country are and what they want.

Mr. NESBITT: Let us not illustrate our patriotism—according to the Johnstonian definition of that word—by going too far in a case of this kind. I suppose we all like to be called patriots, some of us, apparently, more than others. Subsection 3 of section 3 is the ultimate result of the clause that we are now discussing. A person who might be a patriot but who might not be honest in elections, might gather up a great many votes, from fellows who did not care whom they voted for, and apply them all to one particular constituency. I am sure the Minister of Justice has nothing of that kind in his mind, because I do not think he is that kind of man; but it is wise to see that nothing like that shall be done. It is all right to talk about being loyal to the country; nevertheless, no matter what else we want, we are desirous that the country shall be honestly governed. We should not, under the head of patriotism, go into anything that is not honest. The member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) has said that ordinarily the men are trained in Canada for a certain length of time and that they would, therefore, have certain residence in Canada. There is no reason why my hon. friend should not provide that there should be a certain residence in Canada. I am willing that every person who has enlisted or has gone to the front should have a vote, provided he is a British subject; but I am not willing that corruption should follow our anxiety to give these men that privilege. The member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) pointed out that these men would get pension, separation allowance, etc. With that we all agree; it is their right, no matter where they come from, provided they enlisted with the Canadian forces. But let us not, I repeat, under the head of patriotism do anything that will react injuriously upon the fair conduct of the election. I am sure that we all desire that the election shall be conducted properly and honestly; I can say that for the Minister of Justice, anyway—and certainly that is all I want. I do think that subsection 3 is a very dangerous provision to insert in this Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: It does not surprise me that at first glance this provision should look like an objectionable one. Some hon. gentlemen have said that no argument can be made in support of it, but I think that we have already had fairly strong and conclusive argument in support of it. But if hon. gentlemen had been called upon to think this out as it has been my duty to do, they would see that a good deal may be said in the way of argument in favour of this proposal. I do not think it is an extraordinary thing to say that the man who fights for this country evinces interest in the country by doing so. The member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) suggests that it is a mere matter of convenience that he comes, say, from the United States, and enlists here. There may be cases of that kind, but I know it to be a fact that, at least since the United States has taken part in the war, facilities have been afforded in that country for the enrolment in British forces of British subjects in the United States. If a man says: No, I want to be enrolled in the Canadian forces, he does so for some reason; he has a preference, perhaps, for this country. The member for New Westminster pointed out that if a man spent six months in this country in any other occupation and was settled down in that occupation when the making out of the lists was in hand, he would be entitled to vote, assuming he was a British subject. We say to that man: You spent your time making money in this country; you came here, perhaps, merely because there was an exceptional opportunity in connection with the war to work on munitions or something of that kind; we will give you a vote; we will not investigate what you know about the interests of this country; we will not investigate what your degree of intelligence is. But you, Mr. Soldier, you settle down in this country with a view to going away to fight for Canada—and we doubt your intelligence; we do not think you have a comprehension of what the interests of this country are; we do not think you should be allowed to vote. When one reflects on that, one realizes that if we take that attitude we refuse to give to the man who came to join our forces something that we readily give to the man who came into the country to look after his own interests. After all, is it an exaggeration to say that the man who has resided for two years in Canada as a member of a Canadian regiment is as closely connected with Canada as the man who happened to pass a year or two here, devoting his time to his own enjoyment, his own business or his own advancement. These men are living among Canadians.

These men are fighting for Canada—you may make a distinction if you like between fighting for the Empire and fighting for Canada—but these men are fighting for Canada just as are their Canadian comrades who are standing beside them. These men are fighting for Canada, these men are living with Canadians, these men have by their own action made an election as soldiers to be Canadians and we are asked now to say to them: You shall not be Canadians.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it not possible that 100 or 200 citizens of Great Britain have enlisted in the Canadian force in Great Britain since leaving Canada, both officers and men, for the purpose of securing a higher rate of pay?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am prepared to concede that there may be exceptional cases of men coming into this force under conditions which would necessitate our making an exception to the general rule I was rather influenced by the idea of, say, a British officer in the United Kingdom transferred for service to our force and who remains an elector in the United Kingdom. If we are going to meet that, which after all, must be a very exceptional case, we must do so by making provision for such an exception, and it would be proper to give it serious consideration. But there is present to my mind the general case and the general case is the case of the man who came to Canada to enlist. We will give a vote to the man who comes to Canada to make money but we will not give a vote to the man who comes to Canada to enlist and fight for us.

Mr. GERMAN: Why not assign his vote to the constituency where he enlisted?

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. DOHERTY: We might do that. The first question is: Should he have a vote? and the second is: Where should he vote? The principal objection of the hon. member for North Oxford to giving him a vote entails the making of an amendment to subsection 3. But, there is another ground, speaking of this general plan, for giving him a vote. We have to look at what he is entitled to on Canada's part and I have given the reasons which, in my estimation, entitle him to the vote. But, I think we have to look at Canada's interest too. He is a pretty good kind of a man who came to Canada to fight for Canada and I think we have a right—

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is giving the vote to a man who did not come to Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who had never been here in his life.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have tried to point out the distinction between what might be the exceptional case and what will be the general rule in regard to this class of men. I have already intimated that I would be ready to consider the desirability of making an exception for such cases as the hon. member for Pictou suggested. But for a moment, may I be allowed to talk about the class of man coming under this section who will make the general rule, and that is the man who came to Canada to enlist and fight for Canada? We must not only consider what Canada ought to give him, but we must also give thought to what is Canada's interest in regard to him. Canada's every interest is to bind that man to herself if she can. Now, there is an opportunity. He has come here, he has joined her forces, he has fought her battles, he has risked his life for her defence. It is in vain to say that he has fought only for the Empire, because we take glory and credit for every achievement of our Canadian regiments.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is nobody objecting to the principle.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then, if nobody objects to the principle, it is of no use my discussing it. I was told that there was no argument that could be made in support of giving the vote to a man who did not belong to Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend argued about the man that came to Canada. When my hon. friend passed his legislation in 1915 he gave a vote to the man who came to Canada to enlist provided he had been here a certain time.

Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. friend wants to put a penalty on the man who enlisted too soon. He should have waited thirty days and then he would have got the vote.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman laboured in justification of that principle in putting through the law in 1915.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for Pictou talked about the Act we had passed by agreement, and now he has forgotten how he struggled and laboured to prevent that Act being passed.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is sidestepping.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am afraid that if I am trying to do any sidestepping I am entering into a hopeless competition with the hon. member for Pictou. I think we had better get back to the question. I quite realize that we made this thirty-day provision, and I also realize that all the difference made was that we were refusing the vote to the man who had resided six months in Canada in training because this period of time was not immediately before he enrolled, and we were giving a premium to the man who had loafed around for thirty days before he had enlisted over the man who came in and took up his military work at once. I do not want to be understood as condemning that law. I am free to admit that at that time, as the question presented itself to my mind, we were making a good law, and I am not now saying that it was a bad one, but there is such a thing as a good law and a better one. I think we can reach a better one.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister see any difficulty in giving a vote to a man who was never in Canada, who does not know the name of a single county or electoral division, has no idea of our public affairs, and does not know one political party from another? There might be a man of that stamp who would be entitled to take part in our affairs. Has the minister considered that?

Mr. DOHERTY: There might be a man of that stamp among the people who have stayed at home and not gone to fight. There is quite a number of people in this country who do not know very much about public questions and there are not a few people who require to be told the name of the electoral district in which they vote. We do not exclude them from the vote.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I want to know if it is the purpose of the minister to cover a case of that kind.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not assume that a man who is going to enlist in the Canadian forces is below the average of intelligence.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Not at all, but he is a perfect stranger to the country.

Mr. DOHERTY: If he is not below the average intelligence, and if he has lived, as he has, for a year or two in close daily contact with our Canadian soldiers, I do not think we should class him as not knowing anything about the questions which will come before the electors at the next election. Do hon. gentlemen think, for instance, that, through our forces on the other side, the knowledge is not general on one of the great questions that will have to be dealt with in this election and that is the question of the Military Service Act? I think there is a pretty general knowledge of that question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are many other questions besides that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is no need of the minister labouring the point. I want to know if he proposes to cover a case of that kind?

Mr. DOHERTY: I give credit to the British subject who has come to join our forces for being the possessor of as much intelligence as the average Canadian citizen. Giving him that credit, I have no doubt that a man living among our fellow Canadians for that period of time will gather knowledge especially in regard to questions that arise and conditions that exist here.

Many, I should say the great majority, of these people, it is fair to assume, are intelligent men, who will know something of our conditions and appreciate the questions at issue in the election. They have given the greatest possible service to Canada. Canada has every reason to induce them to remain Canadians when they have ceased being soldiers, and I think one way to do that is to open our arms to them and to take them in as Canadian citizens. I think we are running no risk by granting them votes. I do not think there is any greater risk involved in giving the vote to a British subject who has done that service than in giving it to a British subject who may come to Canada and live here for six months or a year. If we get down to arguments based on the suggestion that such a man does not know anything about our problems or is not interested in them, we strike an argument that would apply to a good many of our citizens in Canada. I realize that we are taking an unsual step, but, after all, we are between giving to the British subject soldier who did not happen to reside in Canada that recognition which we think, as a general rule should be given to the man who fights for Canada, and not treating him on an equality with other Canadian soldiers. I do not think that Canada has any danger to apprehend from this vote.

As to the registering of the soldiers' votes and the possibility that the present provisions might permit votes being crowded into a particular constituency that some one may be especially interested in carrying, it may be that there is a possibility for the exercise of influence of that kind, but I think there is equal possibility in one direction or the other. But may I point out the difficulty that we are face to face with when we concede that these men ought to have votes. It is suggested that we ought to give them votes at the places at which they enrolled. That suggestion was seriously considered, but we found that the practical result would be that, in certain constituencies where there was a large enlistment, you would take the control of the constituency from the ordinary elector of the constituency, absolutely.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not in the Bill, that surely was never seriously considered.

Mr. DOHERTY: It was suggested here a moment ago.

Mr. MURPHY: I think that was a limited class.

Mr. DOHERTY: If you allowed all the men who had enlisted, say in the city of Toronto, to vote there, you would crowd out the electors of that particular constituency. And may I mention in passing that subsection 3 of section 3 has application to a class other than this particular class, that is the class of man who is not in a position to define his constituency, although he may have resided in Canada. You do not want to refuse that man the vote and must make a provision by some method to determine where he shall vote. If you took the men who could not define their constituencies, and all the men who never resided in Canada, and crowded them all into the places in which they are enrolled, you would, in regard to many constituencies, take those constituencies bodily out of the hands of the people actually resident in them and transfer the control of them to these men who gathered there accidentally, merely for the purpose of enrolment. Another serious objection is that, by that system, you would give no opportunity for the vote of those men of whom I am now speaking, who, although they did reside in Canada, were interested in Canada and registered as from that part of Canada which they knew best and in which they were most interested. So that you cannot take subsection 3 and treat it as applicable only to men who had not resided in Canada.

May I point out that the number of votes that will be covered by this provision with regard to men who have not previously resided in Canada will not be very considerable?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is that not a good reason why we should not break in upon a well-established and sound principle? If there were, say, some 50,000 or 100,000 British subjects who had enlisted in the Canadian army from some of the other Dominions of the Empire or from the Old Country, it might be worth while to meet their case; but where only a few hundred have done so, is it worth while departing from sound principles?

Mr. DOHERTY: I should think that if their numbers had been exceedingly large, it would have added to the force of the argument against their being allowed to vote. But if it were made to appear to me that we were going to give this very exceptional privilege to so large a number of people that we would transfer over the control of Canada to people who had never had resided in Canada, I would think the objection was much stronger than when we were face to face with the question of allowing, I should suppose, 5,000 or 10,000 voters at the outside. It is not going to make a material difference, the election is not going to depend on these men, and we are not involving Canada in any serious danger that the people of Canada, as such, will not control the outcome of the election by granting the right to vote to these men who, after all, deserve well of Canada, and whom Canada has an interest to encourage by every means to remain with her and to continue, after the war, to be her citizens, as she is, by this operation making them, so far as voting is concerned.

Mr. MORPHY: May I refer to a question arising out of what was said by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) about the ignorance of Canadians who might be living for some years, say in the United States? My view of that, from letters I have received from a few friends, is that these people have kept a very close touch on their home life through their home papers and the large daily papers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to correct my hon. friend. The hon. member for Westmorland, like myself, was not dealing especially with Canadians. This Bill allows British subjects who have never been Canadians, whose fathers may not have been Canadians, men from Australia or other places, to vote. That class of people would be just as numerous, perhaps even more so, than those who themselves, or whose parents, came from Canada. The hon. member for Westmorland said they would be ignorant of our affairs, and I say so too.

Mr. MORPHY: I am particularly referring to Canadians who have never lost their nationality although living in the United States. I understand it is from that country that we get the largest number of outside enlistments. These men individually and in the aggregate, universally, especially men who did not forsake their allegiance, invariably kept in touch with their home towns, with the provincial life, and to say that they are ignorant, when they get their home papers and so on, is quite incorrect.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I was very much surprised at the attitude of the hon. gentleman from Pictou, in reference to this section. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), and the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) argued that because these men had never been in Canada, notwithstanding the fact that they had fought in Canadian armies, they were not entitled to the franchise. Are these hon. gentlemen aware that, by the law of Nova Scotia, it is possible for a British subject in England, Australia, New Zealand, or any other part of the Empire, to have a vote in Nova Scotia, without ever having been a day in the Dominion of Canada, and without having resided a day in Nova Scotia?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the hon. gentleman make his meaning a little clearer.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Under the present law in Nova Scotia, residence is not a qualification for a voter. If a man is a British subject, and owns $150 worth of real estate in the province, he need never have spent one day in Canada. These gentlemen are perfectly content to allow that condition of affairs to obtain, and that has been the law in Nova Scotia for a long time. If a man invests $150 in land in Nova Scotia, it is all right for him to have a vote, but if a man risks his life in the defence of the Dominion of Canada, he has no right to citizenship at all. It seems to me a very extraordinary doctrine, and I do not believe it will be accepted in the province from which I come.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there not a residence qualification?

Mr. DAVIDSON: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a residence qualification for some class of voters. The hon. gentleman from Annapolis may be right in regard to citizens qualifying as landowners, but a residence is necessary for some class of voters.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am quite sure I am right, and my hon. friend from Halifax is right in saying that residence qualification is required by some other class of voters. A person voting on income requires a year's residence in the province, but the owner of land, irrespective of residence, has the right to vote. That was the law in Nova Scotia during the time my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) was Attorney General of the province.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the law of Nova Scotia not provide that the voter must vote in the district where he resides?

Mr. DAVIDSON: No, the law of Nova Scotia provides that if a man resides in a certain district, and has a vote in that district, he must exercise the franchise there, but if he is a non-resident, and owns lands in various districts, he can elect in which of the districts he can vote. I believe the same is true in the province of Quebec. A man in Australia owning land in Quebec, even though he never saw the shores of Quebec, is entitled to vote in the province. After all, when a man is fighting and risking his life for his country and its institutions, has he not the right to have some voice in the administration of affairs of the country, and to exercise his franchise?

Mr. BURRELL: This has been rather a controversial question, and I desire to ask my hon. friend a concrete question. Suppose a British subject in New York State never set foot in Nova Scotia, but bought property in that province, would he be able to come in on election day, and cast his vote?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Yes.

Mr. BURRELL: If that is true, the whole argument on the other side falls to the ground.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The only qualification is that a man is a British subject, and owns land of a certain value.

At six o'clock, the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) is not going to resume his remarks, I would say that, in my judgment, the Minister of Justice ought to withdraw this provision to which exception has been taken. My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) made the statement before recess that he would not suggest that the minister had any ulterior motives, but I am prepared to say that if the minister, after his attention has been called to the injustice which may be done by continuing this provision in the Bill, insists upon its being continued there, he must not object if we suspect him of having ulterior motives and of having designed this Bill in order that unfair practice may be exercised and unfair advantage obtained in an election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What can be done under this provision? A Canadian soldier who has gone to the front is limited in his choice of a constituency to that particular constituency in which he has resided. He has one vote and one choice. The American soldier, the man who is not a resident of Canada, who may happen to be a British subject, no matter in what country he may have resided, who has joined the Canadian Expeditionary Force, not necessarily enlisting in Canada, possibly enlisting in the United States, or in England, possibly enlisting on this side, because, if he enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, his expenses across the ocean would be paid and he would receive a higher rate of pay than if he went to England and enlisted in the Imperial Forces, is to have the choice of 230 odd constituencies in Canada in the casting of his vote. That is grossly unfair. It gives opportunity for fraud of the worst kind. It gives opportunity for men who may not have been residents of Canada to join together, to make up their minds, perhaps under proper guidance, as to the constituencies in which their votes shall be cast, in which the contest will be close, in which the majority will be a narrow one, and thus, they may possibly control many constituencies in Canada in favour of the Government of the day. The Government, under this Bill, appoints its own presiding officers; with the choice of those presiding officers the leader of the Opposition has nothing to do. That, in my judgment, is wrong. It is contrary to fair and proper administration, and it would not be too much to say that, if the minister persists in continuing this provision in this measure, it is designedly intended to offer an opportunity to steal the election from the people of Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: I hope my hon. friend is not judging other people by himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am judging by what I see in black and white. In 1915, a Bill fair in its provisions was presented to the House, a Bill to which both sides of this House could give their assent. To-night we find that, absolutely without reason, contrary to proper principles, the Government has departed from what was agreed to in 1915 and is giving an opportunity to a thousand or so of American citizens—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —not naturalized American citizens, but men who have had their residence in the United States, who may never have set foot upon the soil of Canada, to join together and distribute their votes judiciously amongst certain constituencies and thus carry the election against the voice of the people of Canada, that is, against the votes of those in civilian life resident in Canada and of our Canadian soldiers who have a real interest in the affairs of this country. That is absolutely wrong, and if the minister persists in continuing this provision and so departing from the principles of the legislation of 1915, he cannot find fault if hon. members on this side of the House draw the reasonable, and indeed, the necessary conclusion from what is printed in the Bill.

The Minister of Justice has said that we have suggested that those who have enlisted from the United States and from other countries are not intelligent. We have not suggested anything of the kind. We have said that the man who either has not lived in Canada at all, or has not for years been a resident of Canada, has not that knowledge of the affairs of this country which would enable him intelligently to cast his vote either in favour of the Government or against the Government, or in favour of one candidate or another. Is not that reasonable? That is the view the minister very properly took in 1915 when he provided that there should be residence, but here we have a Bill which enables men who, to all intents and purposes, are foreigners, to cast their votes in England or in France in any one of the constituencies of this country and in respect to the election of a candidate in a constituency in which the parties are pretty nearly evenly divided. They might thus have a controlling influence, and their votes might decide the election against the votes of those who have remained at home as well as of Canadian boys at the front. That is an injustice of the worst possible kind to the people of Canada and to the Canadian soldiers who have gone to the front.

This section is most objectionable in other respects. Men who have not gone to the front, men who may have enlisted in the Royal Canadian Navy, minors, boys of fifteen, sixteen and so on up to twenty-one years of age who may have enlisted as midshipmen in the Royal Canadian Navy, will, under this section, belong to that class who will be entitled to vote. That is also unfair. This Bill gives opportunities for fraud, for enabling men to control elections who ought not to be permitted to control them as against the votes of the mass of the general public. Such a section ought not to be in a measure of this kind. The Minister of Justice may say: Men will not do anything of that kind; those who have charge of the elections will not do that. If he thinks that is the case, he is very innocent.

I am sorry to say that the ordinary political machine in this country—and I do not charge this entirely against the Conservative party—will leave no stone unturned to carry an election, and this Bill presents the greatest opportunity which any party machine could possibly desire. It gives to those in control of the machinery of government a most unfair advantage, and one which ought not to be given. My hon. friend has suggested that as those who come to this country and join the Canadian Expeditionary Force are prepared to fight for Canada, therefore, they should be given the opportunity of voting on the question, who shall carry on the government of this country? And my hon. friend said that one of the great questions with which they would be familiar was the question whether we should have compulsory military service in this country or not. But does my hon. friend forget that there are many other questions upon which the election which is about to be held ought to turn? Does he forget that there are questions connected with the conduct of the war from its very beginning down to the present time which the electors ought to consider, and which ought to be a controlling factor in the issue? Does he forget that when our boys were sent to the front at the commencement of this war, they were sent without machine guns with which they could defend themselves, and that in the early battles thousands of our boys were shot down who might have been saved if they had been properly equipped with machine guns? Does he forget that our boys were sent to the front, equipped with a rifle which they found to be inefficient? Does he forget that the excuse which was made in this Parliament was that the failure of the rifles to work was due to the defective ammunition with which they were supplied? Does he forget that there are other questions connected with the scandalous waste of public money in connection with the supplies which were purchased by this Government? Does he forget that all through this war from the beginning to the end everything has been carried on from a partisan standpoint—from the standpoint of how much patronage could be given to the Conservative party and to the Conservative machine throughout this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific? Does he not think that these questions ought to be considered by the electorate of Canada? Does he suppose that these non-residents who have lived all their lives in the United States and other countries, even though they be British subjects, are familiar with all these questions to the extent that the Canadian boy at the front or the Canadian electorate at home is familiar with them? These men surely could not be expected to be familiar with all these questions. The sound principle is that which was adopted in the Act of 1915, to give the vote to those only who have been residents of Canada for a certain period, and who can fairly be classed as Canadian citizens and interested in the proper government of the Canadian people.

I am sorry to have been obliged to make these remarks. I have great respect for my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I thought that this Bill had not been drafted by him. I thought it had been prepared for him by others connected with this Government, and that he had introduced it perhaps without a thorough appreciation of the faults which it contained. But he suggested before recess that he approves of this Bill, approves of this extraordinary and iniquitous provision in it——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not hesitate to use the word iniquitous. When I find the minister approves of this iniquitous provision, I find it difficult to acquit him of the intention of deliberately introducing a Bill, the provisions of which can be utilized to over-rule the will of the Canadian boys at the front, over-rule the will of the Canadian people, and enable those constituencies in this country where the vote may be deemed to be close to be stolen by means of the non-resident vote.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. member for St. John has said that he was very sorry to make the remarks he did.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Very sorry to be obliged to make them.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think the obvious reply to that is the question, why, then, did he make the remarks? If they caused sorrow to him, I am quite sure they did not cause pleasure to anybody else in this House, and as we all want to get along in this world with the least possible suffering, I think it would have been better for him not to say those things which were likely to produce sorrow.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When I am brought face to face with something of a horrible character I must speak out.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Before six o'clock, I expressed my view as to the law in Nova Scotia relating to elections. I think my interpretation of those provisions was inclined to be challenged by hon. gentlemen opposite, and for that reason I have fortified myself with the statutes. I would direct the attention of the committee to clause 6 of the Dominion Elections Act, which reads:

> For the purposes of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province, the voters' lists shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which, on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for such Dominion election, were in force, or were last in force, under the laws of that province, for the purposes of provincial elections.

By the Dominion Elections Act, the lists in the province of Nova Scotia which were to be used were the lists of electors for the provincial elections of that province. To find out what is the list used in the province of Nova Scotia for provincial purposes I would direct the committee to section 48, of chapter 5, of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, which reads:

> Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, all male persons whose names are registered on the lists of voters for polling districts in any county, in force under the provisions of the "Nova Scotia Franchise Act," on the day of the polling at any election for any county, shall be entitled to vote at any such election for such county, and no other persons shall be entitled to vote thereat.

The Nova Scotia Elections Act says that the list to be used shall be the list prepared under the provisions of the Nova Scotia Franchise Act, and the Nova Scotia Franchise Act defines what persons shall be entitled to vote. Section 3, of chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia reads as follows:

> Every person shall be entitled to be registered in any year upon the list of voters for the proper polling district of any county, if such person—
> (1) Is of the full age of twenty-one years, and is not by this chapter or by any law of the province of Nova Scotia disqualified or prevented from voting; and has not since the last revision of the lists of voters received aid as a pauper under any law of the province of Nova Scotia, and
> (2) Is a male British subject by birth or naturalization, and
> (3) Either
> (a) Was, at the time of the last assessment, assessed in respect of real property to the value of one hundred and fifty dollars, or, in respect of personal property, or of personal and real property together, to the value of three hundred dollars, or
> (b) Was, at the time of the last assessment, in possession of real or personal, or of real and personal property together, of the respective values hereinbefore mentioned, but was by law exempt from taxation, or
> (e) Was, at the time of the last assessment, the owner of real property of the value of one hundred and fifty dollars, or of real and personal property together of the value of three hundred dollars, and his name was omitted from the assessors' return or appears therein with an assessment less in amount than the sum requisite for qualification.

By the provisions of the Nova Scotia Elections Act the list to be used for a provincial election shall be the list prepared under the provisions of the Nova Scotia Franchise Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the member for Annapolis was right in the contention that he made before six o'clock; that British citizenship plus real estate would entitle such a man to vote. But in the case of personal property and income qualification, residence in the province is necessary.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think my hon. friend is correct. Residence is required for an income voter, but not for a property voter. The member for St. John said that the ordinary Canadian soldier who was serving at the front had not the option of deciding where he should vote; that he must vote in the district from which he comes. That may be true while serving overseas. But if he came from Nova Scotia and was proceeding under the Election Act in that province, he could select the county in which his vote should be cast if he owned property in several different counties and was not residing in any county in which he was registered as a voter. I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman, who has such a vast knowledge of the law, should, in view of these facts, lay down the doctrine that it is a great wrong for a soldier, fighting in Canadian uniform in a Canadian regiment, for the Canadian nation, to be allowed to vote if he had not been a resident of the country prior to the time he joined the colours. Yet, in all the years during which my hon. friend was a minister of the Crown, he was a party to allowing British subjects who were not resident in the Dominion to vote in Nova Scotia in large numbers. Let me give my hon. friend an illustration. A wealthy broker in the city of Boston, a British subject, was the owner of a certain mortgage on land in Nova Scotia. He was obliged to foreclose that mortgage and his solicitor in Nova Scotia bought the mortgage under foreclosure sale. That capitalist of the city of Boston, who, I suppose, never set a foot in Canada, is entitled to vote in this country. Yet, there are no screams from hon. gentlemen opposite because of that; there are no assertions that that is unfair. I cannot understand why these hon. gentlemen should discriminate particularly against our soldiers. In order that a man may have a vote, he must possess certain qualifications. He should have an interest in the country; he should have an intelligent insight into the country's affairs, and he should belong to the country. These qualifications are not always possessed by a voter, but it strikes me that if a person possesses these qualifications, he has a perfect right to vote. These qualifications the soldier who has joined a Canadian regiment and is fighting for this country at the front, even though he never resided in Canada, possesses to an eminent degree.

Section 1 of the Bill provides that this Act shall apply only to a general election held during the present war, or after the conclusion of peace, but before demobilization. This is a war measure. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that a British subject who has joined a Canadian regiment but who has not previously been resident in this country has no right to vote because he has not an intelligent interest in the country's affairs; he does not know the issues. This Bill applies only to one election: to the election which it has been found necessary to hold in Canada during a period of war. The main issue at this time is how this war shall be conducted. That is the most important question that confronts the country at present—indeed, it is the only question. The question is not whether the member for St. John shall return to that post which he filled with such conspicuous notoriety under the late Administration—Minister of Public Works. The question is not which party shall be in power. The question is whether we shall have a country at all or not. We must decide whether we are going to have a country before we decide the lesser point as to who shall be the rulers of it. Who, then, are in a better position to judge of what is required in the conduct of this war than the men who are actually in the theatre of war? The hon. gentleman says that there are other questions besides conscription. He says that the question of equipment for the soldiers will have to be discussed; that the question of whether or not the Government did right in supplying the soldiers with the Ross rifle will have to be considered.

What better authority on that subject can you find than the soldier at the front? He knows what kind of boots were suplied to him. He knows whether the assertions made by hon. gentlemen opposite were true, or whether they were mere buncombe. He knows that the Ross rifle was put in his hands, but perhaps he does not know who is responsible for it. Possibly he is not well enough acquainted with history to know that it was the Liberal Government and the Liberal party that foisted the Ross rifle on the soldiers of this country, despite the fact that the British War Office, the highest authority on the subject, advised that Liberal Government that it was not well that Canada should have a separate rifle; that the type of rifle used in the British and Canadian forces should be uniform; that it was better for the Empire that Canada should adopt the Lee-Enfield. The soldier knows all about the boots; he knows whether or not there is partisanship in the giving of commissions in the army; he does not have to take the second-hand statements of hon. gentlemen opposite on that subject.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He knows about the horses, too.

Mr. DAVIDSON: He knows all about the horses; he has seen them. He does not have to read the public accounts to find out the twisted stories of perjured witnesses; he gets the information first-hand. I can readily understand why my hon. friend is not content that a man like that should pronounce on the record of his party.

Hon. gentlemen opposite object to a Britisher who has joined a Canadian regiment voting because he is not acquainted with the history of Canada. He, perhaps, has never sat at the feet of the Gamaliel whom I see opposite. He, perhaps, has never read the speeches delivered in this Parliament. He, perhaps, has never attached himself in election time either to the Grit or to the Tory camp. But I do not think that disqualifies him from voting; he has been taught in a better school. The men who have gone from the country that I have the honour to represent to join the Canadian army are the pick of the manhood; they are the men with the keenest sense of public duty. They are familiar with the affairs of this country; they know Canada's needs. These comrades in arms will constitute the school that will teach the British recruit Canadian history. It will not be upon the instruction of hon. gentlemen opposite that the British recruit in the Canadian regiment will form his views; it will be through association with the comrades who have been there and who have been true enough, loyal enough, and intelligent enough to see Canada's needs and to join the colours in order to defend the country they love.

When hon. gentlemen opposite say that a soldier of that kind is not sufficiently acquainted with the affairs of this country to vote intelligently, I wonder if they forget that there are a great many people in Canada who are not thoroughly posted in public affairs, but who nevertheless enjoy, without challenge, the right of the franchise.

Only last Saturday, if Mr. Chairman you will excuse a personal reference, I was in the province of Quebec and I happened to meet a citizen of that province. In the course of conversation, I asked him what he thought of the Military Service Bill, or of conscription. "Oh," he said, "it is a very bad measure. We were all Conservatives in this country a little while ago, but Borden has ruined this country and we are all for Laurier now." I said: "Are you quite sure you are right"?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did he say that Borden had ruined this country?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Ruined the party—that was the cry.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Did he say that he was responsible for what would happen after the Bill had been signed?

Mr. DAVIDSON: He did not say that but I think he could have said that the man who was responsible for this troubled condition of affairs is the professional politican, the agitator, who makes firebrand speeches. But, to finish my narrative; I said: "Are you sure that you are quite right about this matter? I do not think it is going to be so serious as you think." He said: "It means taking us all away from our children and sending us into a strange land to be shot down." I told him that that was not the case, that probably not very many men would be required and that probably men who were farmers and the heads of families would not be called upon. But this is what especially impressed me. He said: "That is not the worst part of it. If I have a pig that weighs 100 pounds it is all right, but if my pig weighs more than 100 pounds I have to send all that weighs more than 100 pounds over to feed the soldiers; if I keep twelve hens it is all right, but if I keep more than twelve I have to send all over twelve to the soldiers." That was a man living right near the capital and almost in the shadow of this building. My hon. friends opposite would give the vote gladly to men of that kind but they would deny the right to vote to a man who is fighting and dying for this country in the theatre of war? To me that seems absurd. Men over there who know all about the situation, who know all about our military needs who know why we fail and why we succeed, who go to sleep to the music of the artillery and are wakened by the crash of shells, these men who bivouac day after day with death, are to be told that they cannot be entrusted with the sacred task of deciding what the policy of this country should be. Some hon. gentlemen opposite contend that it is almost a crime to allow these men to vote.

One hon. gentleman this afternoon—I think the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt)—claimed that it was going to lead to a great deal of corruption which would mean a dishonest and corrupt election. I am bound to say that I cannot accept that doctrine. I think it is possible perhaps in this country to find men—and I hope they are few—who will accept bribes, men who will decide upon issues not because of their merits but because of personal, and perhaps party, considerations, but I believe that these men who are fighting for our country, who are living in constant fear of death, who are bivouacked with death itself, who realize the stupendous danger of the situation, will spurn any attempt to influence them to vote in any way which would not be in the interest of the country. These men, whether they have been previously resident or not, are our soldiers and, as long as they wear the Canadian uniform, as long as they are in the service of our country, are our citizens. If any one of these men should die it would be to this country that his dependents will look for support and that support will be gladly given. When news comes out reporting achievements of one of these men if they have brave achievements, there is no place in the world where these achievements will evoke so much pride as in Canada. That is the kind of man that this Bill proposes to give a vote to. While I am perfectly agreed that at this critical juncture in the affairs of this country the franchise should perhaps be restricted, we should hesitate long before we deny to the man who is fighting our battles the right to have a share in determining what the policy of this country shall be during this crucial war.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) stated that this Bill does not involve the question of what Government should be in control of public affairs; nor is it important to consider which party is in power in this country. In that statement I am sure we can all agree with him. For the life of me I cannot see how it is possible for the membership of the House of Commons to divide on party lines upon a question of this kind. I regretted hearing one or two hon. gentlemen opposite rather insinuating that, because one does not agree with the principle of this Bill, therefore, he is discriminating against the Canadian soldier. That is an unfair suggestion to make, and, as far as I am concerned, I resent it altogether. Personally, I would not care if every soldier enlisted in the Canadian force was given the vote. It would matter little to me personally; personally it would matter little to any member of this House, but we are dealing with a piece of substantive legislation which has to do with the franchise. The franchise has always been in all countries a question of citizenship. We should settle this Bill upon some principle. There is no desire on the part of any hon. member on this side of the House to do an injustice to anybody who is fighting in the Canadian forces to-day. It is rather unpleasant to make any suggestion in the way of an amendment to the Bill which gives anybody an opportunity of making any insinuation. I do so simply because I believe the principle involved in the particular section which we are discussing is unsound. The member for Annapolis justifies his position by reference to the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia wherein it is provided that ownership of real estate carries the right to the franchise on the part of any British subject. That will only carry the hon. gentleman a certain distance because in most of the provinces of Canada residence in addition to ownership of real estate is necessary to qualification to vote. So, my hon. friend does not get very far with the argument because the majority of the provinces require residence as well as real estate property qualifications. I doubt very much if England would follow our example if they were enacting legislation of this character. Take the aviation service; I am told that in the Royal Naval Air Service sixty-five per cent of the men are Canadian born. It is quite proper that we should provide a method by which they could exercise the franchise at the first election but I doubt if the British Parliament would give them the franchise simply because they constitute a large portion of that force.

I think the suggestion in the Bill is fundamentally wrong, and it is for that reason that I oppose it. It is true, as the Minister of Justice says, that there are only a few men in the whole Canadian force who will be affected by the Bill, and by that reasoning possibly we might forego our objection, as little harm would come if they were allowed to vote. But there is a principle involved.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the hon. gentleman explain the difference between a couple of hundred non-resident voters of British nationality voting in Nova Scotia and an equal number voting of those who were born outside of Canada and who join our forces, say in England? The number is very small in each case.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is quite true. But I understood the minister to be impressed by the contention raised on this side of the House that a British subject joining the Canadian forces in Great Britain might well be disqualified, and he promised further consideration. If it transpires eventually that the Minister of Justice will submit an amendment that British subjects, citizens of Great Britain, joining the Canadian forces in the United Kingdom, shall not exercise the franchise under this Bill, I should say that was quite a proper provision. But if he does that I think he is precluded from asking this House to accept the principle contained in this section. This section is, I think, out of harmony with the whole purport and spirit of the Bill. In order to make my point clear I must refer the comittee to section 3 . That clause is not before us, but really we should look at that in considering this clause. Subsection 2 of section 3 requires that a voter, on presenting himself, must state the electoral district wherein he last resided, during a restricted period at least. Then there is another provision to the effect that if he cannot state or specify a residence he shall be deemed an elector from such electoral district as he may indicate. Supposing he had never been in Canada prior to his enlistment. Imagine the case of his proceeding overseas the day after he enlisted. Theoretically at least he would not know the name of a single electoral district in Canada. Take a case put to me after six o'clock this evening by a member of this House whose next opponent is an officer commanding a Canadian regiment in France. Say that, of 1,000 men, 999 came from the colony of Newfoundland and the British West Indies, and that they did not know any of the electoral districts of Canada; it would be quite evident that they could not state the electoral district in which they resided continuously for a certain period in Canada, because they had never resided here. They could not indicate any electoral district to which they desired their vote allocated. What would be the consequence? They would be entirely under the domination of their commanding officer. I do not say that would happen, I have no fear whatever of any improper influence being exerted in the taking of these votes overseas. But I submit that, when you point out the possibilities for the exercise of improper influences, you thereby point out fundamental weaknesses in the Bill, and we, as representatives of the people, seriously considering an important piece of legislation, are bound to take that into consideration.

I was rather impressed by the suggestion made by some hon. gentlemen opposite that the Canadian enlistments include a large number of Canadian born who, prior to the outbreak of the war, were residing in the United States. I think that case might be fairly met in some way or other. They were British subjects, they were Canadian citizens, and I think that it is quite a fair suggestion to make that, having returned to Canada, enlisting in the Canadian forces, that should be considered as tantamount to a return to Canada, and their training period should be considered as a period of residence to qualify them for registration under the Franchise Acts of the several provinces. That is a different proposition, however, from the case of men who never resided in Canada or whose parents never resided here. I suggest that an amendment should be prepared to meet a case of that kind, and I should be very glad indeed to support it.

Mr. ARTHURS: I think this argument might be divided into two parts; first, the man who enlists from a foreign country, and second, the British citizen who has joined the Canadian forces at some point outside of Canada. I consider that if these men were numbered they would be found to be very few indeed, and I would suggest that they might easily offset those men who under like circumstances might vote, for instance, in Nova Scotia. But, leaving that to one side—because I believe that there is perhaps something in what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) says and the Minister of Justice said something about accepting an amendment along that line—the other arguments he has put up do not appear to bear any weight, for various reasons. It has been said, I think by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that these votes could be bunched in certain places, that these men could be forced to vote in certain named constituencies. I venture to say that there are thousands of men in any province in Canada today who cannot name the constituency in which they are living. This is equally true of the men overseas. There is a second suggestion. I know whereof I speak regarding Ontario, and I believe that it is true of many other provinces. We have part three of the voters' lists, or manhood suffrage registration. These men, workingmen in various parts of the country, are registered immediately before an election. They may be in one constituency at one time and in another at another time, and if they were required to have fixed residence in a constituency for any certain length of time, other than a very short one, they would be unable to qualify under the Ontario Act. That is one reason why the Act of 1915 regarding the soldiers' vote was manifestly unfair, and it would have disfranchised thousands of men who went overseas at that time, men who perhaps were residing in the Northwest provinces, who came home a month or two before enlisting and who lost their residence in the West, and in any event might not have chosen to let their votes go if they had a choice, but would have preferred to vote in their home constituencies. These men would be disfranchised under the 1915 Act, and I think it legitimate that these men should, under the terms of this Act, be allowed to vote and have their vote counted in the constituency named by them. In 99 cases out of 100 they would be able to name the constituency they came from, the constituency in which they were trained, at least. Their residence there would have given them a very fair insight into local conditions in that constituency and of general conditions throughout Canada. These men, on the average, are trained in Canada from six months to nine months, and I think that should count as full residence, even to men from outside points who enlist in Canada. I know the case of a couple of men originally from Guysborough, and who came, one from the Fiji Islands and one from Australia. They were civil engineers who came to Canada with the intention of taking out commissions, but found that there were no vacancies and eventually enlisted in the battalion which I took overseas. These men will undoubtedly desire to have their votes recorded in Guysborough if they are allowed to vote. I think they have a perfect right to vote, although not residents of Canada at the beginning of the war, and although they only came here for the express purpose of enlisting. I think this Act can be worked out easily and fairly, and I am satisfied that in working it out there will be none of this trickery we have found so many times in Canada. I am satisfied if a man is given a fair opportunity to record his vote over there. he will do it in all fairness, and nobody will suffer.

Mr. GERMAN: My hon. friend made an exceedingly patriotic speech such as we usually hear from Conservative politicians at election time, who shout for the old flag and an appropriation, and say that every one who opposes a suggestion made by them is unpatriotic. No one in this House will contend that men who are fighting the battles of Canada should not have votes. I, for one, most certainly would not. But that is not the object of this discussion. The object is to have the Bill framed in such a shape that when these men cast their votes, those votes will be recorded in proper places, and that the votes may not be colonized or hived in some localities, to suit the exigencies of the occasion, which could be done very easily under this Bill. Whether it would be done or not is another question. However, it is better to avoid temptation than to be led into it. The Minister of Justice is allowing himself to be led into temptation in this matter. The hon. minister says that every elector, having joined the Canadian forces, whether in Canada or outside of Canada, whether ever having been in Canada or not, shall be entitled to vote. He may never have seen Canada, may know nothing about the country and may know nothing about the election or about constituencies. He is a British subject, having joined the Canadian forces, outside of Canada, and he casts his vote. How does he know in which constituency his vote will be recorded? Who will record it? How easy it would be for any one—I do not say this would be the case, but it might happen—by a little manipulation over there, to colonize a lot of those votes in some constituency where there is a close contest, and thereby change the result of the election by that very vote. Anybody who knows anything about elections knows that could be 9 p.m. easily done, and I submit that before the Bill is passed provision should be made to prevent the possibility of manipulation. We cannot afford to place on the statute book a law which will present such opportunities for fraud. I am not charging that any one will be guilty of fraud, but it will leave the door open for such glaring fraud that it should not stand on the statute book of Canada.

Then, I ask who is a minor? Any one below 21 years of age is a minor, and a minor, either male or female, can be appointed, enrolled or enlisted in some force a few weeks prior to the election, and have the right to vote at the election. Hundreds of thousands of them could be appointed under this Bill. I ask the Minister of Justice if that is proper legislation to be placed on the statute book, permitting such latitude as that. No one can deny my statement.

Mr. DOHERTY: Is the suggestion that because we provide that people who are enlisted in these different forces are to have votes, it means that we can make voters by enrolling people for the express purpose of voting?

Mr. GERMAN: That is absolutely the suggestion.

Mr. DOHERTY: I plead innocence to that charge. It never occurred to me that it would be suggested that the military authorities of this country were going to proceed to enroll people, merely for the purpose of allowing them to vote.

Mr. GERMAN: They may be innocent also. Let me call attention to another phase of the situation. The ordinary constituency, say in Ontario, will consist of about 60 polling subdivisions, on an average. You could take three young men under 21 years of age, under this Act, prior to the election, in each polling subdivision, without any fuss or feathers, without any knowledge, perhaps, on the part of the Minister of Militia, of there being any wrong-doing, and you could enroll or appoint them to the Royal Canadian Navy, or to the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, they do not go overseas—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Or the aviation service.

Mr. GERMAN: Yes, but particularly the Naval Service. They are not called out to fight. They could be enrolled, and no one would notice it, or think anything about it. If you appointed three in each subdivision, on the day of the election you would have 180 votes, which might easily turn the scale. All you have to do is to direct attention to this, and hon. members can see what might happen. I am not saying it will happen; but I submit no law should be placed on the statute book which would permit a latitude of that kind, and I insist that it must be changed. I am not opposing the right of the soldier to vote. If a soldier enlists as a British subject, whether he comes from the United States of Hong Kong, he is a British subject, has joined the forces and gone to fight the battles of Canada, and I am prepared to give him the vote, but I say that his place of voting should be designated, and should not be fixed by some political manipulator.

[Mr. German.]

Mr. DAVIDSON: Where would the hon. gentleman suggest that a person who had never resided in Canada should poll his vote, if not where he wanted it polled?

Mr. GERMAN: I say it should be cast in the electoral constituency where the regiment to which he was attached was raised. If that provision were inserted, it would be known where all these votes would be counted, and a bunch of them could not be colonized in one particular place. The great danger is in a bunch of votes being cast in one constituency. A few votes of that kind might be recorded and counted promiscuously throughout the whole electoral district, and would not be of much consequence, but the colonization of them in some particular locality might have the effect of turning the scale. We should have some provision with reference to minors. A young man who enlists for overseas is supposed to be 18. Why go under that age? Some are under 18. Under this Bill, you may have a minor ten years old, or five years old or an infant in arms. Of course, they would not vote, but you are leaving the door open to an opportunity for wrong-doing, and that opportunity should not be given in a measure such as this providing for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, at all events, in one respect, that is, that there are two distinct questions involved here: First, should we give the vote to the soldier who had not been a resident of Canada? Second, if we do give him a vote, then where are we going to allot his vote? The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) warned me as to what I would have to consent to being suspected of if I adhered to this proposal, and he expressed a great deal of scandalized horror that the proposal should have been made. As regards giving the vote to the soldier, even although he had not resided in Canada, I gave, before the committee rose at six o'clock, some reasons which, in my judgment, seemed to quite justify that action on our part. A great deal is made of this question of non-residence in Canada. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) has demonstrated that there are to-day in some parts of this country, and there certainly have been in the past—and not a very remote past—in other parts of this country, a perfect recognition of the right of the British subject, non-resident in Canada, when he has certain other qualifications, to vote. In Quebec, until 1912, when we had the introduction of the "one man, one vote," and when in consequence there were certain modifications made, including, I believe, the requirement of residence for the exercise of the franchise—I am not saying that positively, because I have not had occasion to look very carefully into the statute—the British subject, who owned real property in that province, was an elector in that province and, being such, was an elector in this Dominion. Not only does that result from the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act from which the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) read, making the lists provided by the provinces valid lists, but we have a special section of the Dominion Elections Act still in force recognizing the right of non-residents to vote, and it is headed "Non-resident electors," and provides that:

> The provisions of the law of the province as to the places where non-resident electors shall vote shall apply mutatis mutandis to any Dominion election, and the returning officer at such election shall have the powers and be charged with the duties of the sheriff or returning officer under such provisions; but nothing herein shall enable any person to vote by schedule or otherwise than by appearing personally.

Mr. GERMAN: Is that vote counted except on a recount?

Mr. DOHERTY: That vote is counted. That man presents himself at the poll and registers his vote. What is guarded against is anybody voting otherwise than by presenting himself personally at the poll. But the fact that, as I understand it, still in Nova Scotia and certainly prior to the time to which I referred in Quebec, a person, being a British subject and a property holder in a constituency in one of those provinces, had never resided in the Dominion would not prevent him, if he came over and presented himself at the poll, from registering his vote. I mention this only to point out that this is not the astounding innovation that is suggested.

Mr. MARCILE: It is a mistake to say that a non-resident in Quebec who is a property holder has a right to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not stating that that is so at the present time.

Mr. MARCILE: He must be a resident.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will follow me—I have under my hand the Quebec statute of 1912 which modified the law in that regard, but the law, as it stood before 1912, not only recognized the possibility but expressly declared that people who had not been resident for a year past in the province, with the exception of proprietors of real estate, should not be entitled to vote. The statute of 1912, by which the "one man, one vote" system was introduced, amended that law by striking out the exception, so that I am not contending that to-day it is so. I am pointing this out only to show that this is not the extraordinary innovation that is suggested. It follows that residence has not been a universal provision; at all events, it has not been looked upon in the past in this country and to a certain extent at present it is not looked upon in this country as an essential qualification for voting. There is room for difference of opinion, but I am not going to be led into discussions about motives. If it does anybody's heart good to suspect me of evil motives in this regard, then I hope his heart may rejoice to its full extent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We shall say that the minister is absolutely innocent.

Mr. DOHERTY: I hope the hon. gentleman on the other side who smiles at that assurance will derive all imaginable happiness from the confidence and the conviction that my motives are of the very worst. That will not alter what is right or wrong about this question. The question as to giving the right to vote after all comes back to this: Does a man, by constituting himself a member of the Canadian Forces and risking his life for the defence of Canada, giving to Canada the credit and the glory of whatever he may achieve, link himself sufficiently with Canada to entitle him to be put upon a footing with any British subject who may steal into this country looking to make some money and settle down in some place for five or six months with a view to earning what he can earn there, and who may go away the next day. I am not saying that the argument is all on one side, but it seems to me that the soldier, under those circumstances, has as intimately connected himself with Canada and has, in addition, demonstrated that his desire is that the connection on his part should be one of service and of sacrifice as has the gentleman, who has come in here merely for his own pleasure or his own profit, and certainly demonstrated that his desire for connection with Canada has not as its basis any desire to be of service to Canada. That it is a proper thing to give the vote to the soldier—I still cannot get away from the conviction, even at the risk of having imputed to me the motives that are suggested, that it is the proper thing to give him the vote, both because he deserves it and because it is good policy on Canada's part to try to bind to herself the man who has given such evidence of desiring to be a serving citizen of Canada—that is one question.

The other question is, if we are right in giving them the vote, how are we going to deal with the allocation of the votes? In giving the vote, I would point out that we are not in reality making a substantial departure from the provision of the Act as it stands, because, although that provision requires thirty days residence in Canada before enlistment, all the objections that are made to giving a vote to a man who never resided in Canada surely apply with equal force to the man who has been but thirty days in Canada before enlisting. Is there any remarkable difference, as to their knowledge of political questions and the candidates and the constituencies, between the man who came into Canada the day before he enlisted, and the man who came in thirty days before he enlisted? The provision of the present Act has been spoken of as being eminently fair, and was agreed to by this House when the Act was passed.

Mr. NESBITT: The man who had resided in Canada thirty days before enlisting would know what section of the country he was in.

Mr. DOHERTY: He might have that knowledge without having knowledge of the name of the constituency. But I understood the objection of my hon. friend to rest mainly on the question of allowing him to select his own constituency. I understood that also to be the main objection of my hon. friend from Welland, and I was endeavouring to point out that these were two perfectly distinct questions. I am quite prepared to admit that there is possibility of abuse under the system that allows a man to indicate the place where he may vote, but there is possibility of abuse, I think, under any system which we adopt with regard to that man; and if you adopt the system—and we have thought of many different systems—of saying that he shall vote in the constituency in which he enlisted, you have not only the possibility, but the certainty, of hiving, because it happens that in certain constituencies of this country there were very large enlistments of people who came from different places.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Since the Soldiers' Voting Bill was passed we have had a Redistribution Bill, and a certain portion of the county of Laval has been divided into four parts, one part forming the new division of St. Denis, and the other three parts being annexed respectively to Two Mountains, Jacques Cartier and Maisonneuve. I feel satisfied that some of my constituents who are at the front would not know what constituency they were in. It seems to me that instead of the soldier being allowed to make his choice, his vote should be cast in the parish from which he enlisted.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to dispose of one question at a time, I will conclude what I was endeavouring to say, and then be very glad to deal with his question. We did consider different systems, notwithstanding that we were intent, according to the hon. member for St. John, upon finding a method whereby fraud could be committed. We looked at the different systems with a view to finding a practical way out, and we have not closed any door yet. The hon. member for St. John may be as offensive as he knows how—and that is saying a good deal—but he will not succeed in inducing me to close a door to anything that will insure a fairer application of this law in my judgment than the present draft does. I give him carte blanche, let his language be as strong as he likes. I am here to get through the House a measure which, as I lay it before hon. gentlemen, I do not believe to be perfect, but which was intended to produce the result I announced at the outset, of securing the vote for as many of our soldiers as possible, surrounding it with all possible safeguards, but not so as to make it practically impossible for anything like a full vote to be taken.

Let us suppose for a moment that, with the exception of myself, everybody is trying to find a fair way of doing this thing. I am the man that was found out by the hon. member for St. John—

Mr. PUGSLEY: The man whose Bill was found out.

Mr. DOHERTY: Let us put it that way; the hon. gentleman is beginning to moderate. What are you going to do with that soldier vote? Are you going to hive all the votes in the places where the soldiers happen to have enlisted? Is that fair to the constituencies where the largest enrollment took place? Is it fair that because they attracted soldiers, and got a large number of enlistments, that all these men should be forcibly put upon them? I understand that many of these men would be in the position pointed out by the hon. member for Laval, and would have difficulty of their own knowledge in defining the limits of particular constituencies in Canada, but I hardly think that they would have passed the period of training, which in many cases extends over a period of six months, without finding out something, if not about the electoral divisions, at least about the village or town or city in which they enlisted; and if they found that out, they would at least know something of that constituency. I do not think it unreasonable to suppose that they would hit upon the particular constituency in which they enlisted. But that is one thing, and it is another thing to impose them absolutely on that constituency.

One suggestion was, that we allocate the votes to the places where the soldiers enlisted. If we did that, we should have an undue proportion of these men landed into constituencies which happened to be good enlisting centres. The suggestion was also made that these soldiers should be made to vote at the address that they gave in their attestation papers, and I may say that that was a method that suggested itself as having much to commend it, and I believe it was the method that was adopted in Australia, but we did not get very far with that before it was pointed out that with that too, you would get an undue proportion—a large number of drifting people, so to speak—who would give their address as being in the place where they attested.

For instance, with regard to the first contingent that system would probably have captured for somebody the county of Quebec, because in and around Valcartier there would have been a large number of people who never had any connection with that county at all, but who had named as their addresses certain places in that neighbourhood. So that there, instead of creating the possibility of hiving people, you were getting a certainty of hiving people. It is possible that some people may endeavour to use influence to induce these men who are given the opportunity of indicating their place of voting to vote in one place rather than in another. But before we get through with this Bill we will see that there is the same opportunity for exercising that influence on the part of one party as there is on the part of another. It is true that the presiding officers are, as in this country the returning officers are, to be named by the Government, and that the presiding officers are to name the deputy presiding officers, just as in this country the returning officer names the deputy returning officer. But provisions are made to secure representation for the different parties interested. All these presiding and deputy presiding officers are to be taken in the military forces; all this is to be done within what might be called the military home. Why is it presumed that there will be greater power on the part of one party than on the part of another to indicate places which they would desire these men to select as their places of voting? The field is open, I have no doubt that there may be requests, solicitations or suggestions that the men vote in one place rather than in another. But why we should have reason to anticipate that, from one side more than from the other, there should be an endeavour to concentrate these people on any particular constituencies, I am quite at a loss to see. When we cannot find any method of defining where these people are voting, without actually by the law itself making them swamp some particular constituencies, why should we think that it would be a greater evil that that might possibly happen under this system than that it would certainly happen under the other? I do not want to close the door upon any suggestion that will meet the real difficulty that presents itself. For my part, I think that these men ought to be given the vote. As has been pointed out, this legislation is only for an election that may be held during the present war. We are not going to make these men voters forever; we are going to recognize them as voters so long as they are soldiers.

Mr. GERMAN: But their votes will have an effect long after this war is finished.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: So long as there is a general election during the war, not a by-election?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not a by-election, no. But to answer the question of the member for Laval: I quite believe that a large number of soldiers who have actually been resident in Canada will not be able to give the name of their electoral division. I could pick out numbers of people in the city of Montreal who, I am quite satisfied, if somebody did not explain to them once in a while when an election is coming on where the boundary line runs between St. Anne and St. Antoine, would not be quite sure whether they were voters in the one district or in the other. And there will be soldiers on the other side who will not be able to give that information. But we have not left the matter in the position in which the hon. member for Laval supposes it to be. Subsection 2 of section 3 reads as follows:

If he can state the electoral district wherein he last continuously resided during at least ..... months of the year immediately preceding his appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service, or so particularly specify a place or places within an electoral district whereat during such period of time he so resided that such electoral district can therefrom be ascertained, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or to be ascertained, and his vote shall be applied thereto.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: That is what I object to.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does the hon. gentleman object that the man will not be able to indicate his electoral district?

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What I object to is that a man who was resident in the county of Laval as it stood before redistribution should choose as his place of voting any part of that county that now belongs to another constituency. I wish his name to remain on the lists of the electoral district in which he lived; then he will be bound to vote in that electoral district. I want him to have the privilege of voting, but under this measure the civil or military authorities can say what part of the county that man comes from, and he will have to vote there, notwithstanding that it may now be in another electoral division.

Mr. DOHERTY: Suppose a gentleman resided in the village of Ste. Rose, which is in the county of Laval. There has been a redistribution. That gentleman now knows that he lived in the village of Ste. Rose, but he does not know in what electoral district that is. In that case, he will say: I resided in the village of Ste. Rose for such a period of time. From that statement that he resided in the village of Ste. Rose, the electoral county to which he belongs can be ascertained. The fact that he stated that he resided in the village of Ste. Rose will be on the back of the envelope in which his ballot is contained. The first operation of the returning officer to whom that goes is to assort the ballots, and he will see on the back of that ballot that this man resided in the village of Ste. Rose. He will be provided by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with the necessary charts and documents showing the limitations of the constituency. He will turn to those and see that the village of Ste. Rose is in the present constituency of—whatever it may be. That envelope, unopened, will be assorted with the votes for the county in which the village of Ste. Rose is situated and the man's ballot will be counted in that very county in which he as a resident of Ste. Rose belongs. The only man who is to have a chance to indicate where he desires to vote is the man who neither knows the name of his electoral constituency or is in a position to name a place or places in which he resided or from the naming of which the constituency can be ascertained. In the case suggested the man was in a position to tell where he resided. He will be asked where he resided, not merely in what electoral district he resided.

If he says, "I resided in such a county," we know as far as he can tell us. If he says, "I cannot tell the county," he will be asked, "What place did you reside in?" In the instance mentioned, he will give Ste. Rose and Ste. Rose will give the constituency. You may have to get more particulars when you get into city constituencies, such as streets and numbers. From streets and numbers you will ascertain by reference to charts, which have been prepared showing the limits as fixed by the Redistribution Act, in what constituency the man is. There is no ground to apprehend difficulty in so far as regards a man who knows where he lives, whether he knows the name of the constituency or not; that man will vote in the constituency in which he lives.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Except that he is required to select the district.

Mr. DOHERTY: If my hon. friend expects to find in this section all the provisions of the law I am afraid he will not find them because this does not say so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the minister will kindly look at form B, page 16, he will find the following:

6. Specify the names of the place or places in Canada (giving streets and numbers when possible) whereat you last continuously resided during at least.... months of the year immediately preceding your appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service.

7. State if you can the electoral district wherein such place or places in which you so resided are situate.

Electoral district .....

Province .....

8. If because of non-residence or otherwise you cannot specify or state as required by questions No. 6 and No. 7, to what electoral district do you desire your vote to be applied?

Unless he can answer both 6 and 7 then he selects his own district.

Mr. DOHERTY: If he cannot answer 6 and 7 he shall elect; that is if he can answer neither one nor the other.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: If he can answer either one then he is not in a position where he cannot answer one or the other.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Unless he answers both he selects his own district.

Mr. DOHERTY: This is brought to my attention in the middle of the discussion of another section. It is possible that the word "and" should be "or" and perhaps we will have to make it "or" when we get to it. But if we could keep to the section we are dealing with, possibly we could get at a practical result. I am anxious to receive criticisms and suggestions in a good spirit and try to meet them. I would remind hon. gentlemen that it is the section that makes the law, the form should comply with the section and if it does not, we will have to correct it.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: If the language of the law was as plain as the language of the minister, I would not complain. But what is reported in Hansard is not the law. What will be brought before the courts and before the electors will be this Bill after it is passed. I cannot read subsection 3 in any other way than as it is set down here.

If he cannot, because of non-residence or otherwise—

Or otherwise.

—so state or specify, he shall be deemed an elector of, and his vote shall be applied to, such electoral district as he may indicate.

Supposing he says "I am a resident of Ste. Rose; I do not know in what county it is now, and I do not care"—what county do you choose? If a man so state or specify his vote shall be applied by somebody, not himself, to such electoral district as he may indicate.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will read what the voter has to state or specify, he will see that it is one or other of two things. In subsection 2 we have no trouble about our conjunction:

2. If he can state the electoral district wherein he last continuously resided during at least .....months of the year immediately preceding his appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service, or so particularly specify a place or places within an electoral district whereat during such period of time he so resided that such electoral district can therefrom be ascertained, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or to be ascertained, and his vote shall be applied thereto.

Subsection 3 is for the man who cannot state his electoral district and who cannot specify the name or place where he resided so that from the name or place it will be possible for the electoral district to be ascertained. If he can do either one or other of these two things the subsection does not apply to him. It is only if he can do neither of these two things that subsection 3 applies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister ignores the form altogether.

Mr. DOHERTY: The form is not in the present section and we are dealing with the section. If the form has not been printed to conform to the section, we will amend the form when we reach it.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What would the minister suggest will be the procedure with regard to the man who says: "I am from the United States; I do not know anything about the electoral districts of Canada; I want to vote and I want to vote for the Government," let us say. "I do not care where I vote." How will you apply that vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: If he cannot give information under section 2 which will indicate where he would like to vote, I am afraid he will have to do without voting. This is a Bill to afford an opportunity of voting; but it is not a Bill to compel people to vote. We are providing not to take the horse to the water but to take the water to the horse, and when we have got it there we cannot make the horse drink. If a man will not indicate any constituency you cannot make him vote.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: He does not know any.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should think that a man who desired to vote and who had the right to select a constituency would ascertain from his comrades.

I should think that, if he cared to vote, he would ascertain the name of some constituency from the other soldiers or from the representatives of the two parties who would be present. His one desire would be to register a Canadian vote, and he would have no trouble in ascertaining the name of a constituency.

Mr. NESBITT: That is the difficulty; he will have no trouble, but he will be influenced entirely by the officer.

Mr. DOHERTY: As things are in our elections at home people are apt to be influenced by men all around them. Is it a serious objection that a man should be asked to vote in a certain constituency? Perhaps I would say to him: I would be glad to have you vote in Ste. Anne, and the hon. member for North Oxford might say that he would be glad to have him vote elsewhere.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Or out in the Yukon; some place where there is a very narrow vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: If it is right to give him the privilege of voting, are we to refuse to him that right because he may be influenced in its exercise? At that rate we would have to refuse the ballot to every voter in this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Supposing it was suggested that every Canadian soldier, although he has a residence in Canada, should be permitted to select his constituency anywhere in Canada. Why not give him the same privilege that you give to the American, the non-resident?

Mr. DOHERTY: Because it is possible to attach the man who has resided in Canada to a constituency.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But why treat him worse than you treat the non-resident?

Mr. DOHERTY: Because if we could pick out a constituency for the other voter we would do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister must think it an evil to allow a man to pick out any one of the 230 constituencies in Canada and to allocate his vote to it, and yet he proposes to give to the non-resident that right, although he may have no interest in the future of Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does my hon. friend say that a man, even although not a native-born Canadian, who has come to this country and enlisted and gone overseas, might have no interest in the future of Canada? That was the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have not said that. The Bill does not limit it to the case of a non-resident who has come to Canada to enlist, but extends the right to a man who may have enlisted in England. He may never have set foot in Canada. He may have enlisted in the Bermudas, and yet, because he attaches himself to the Canadian Expeditionary Force, he is permitted by this Bill to vote and to select his own constituency in any part of Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would my hon. friend not allow that man to vote?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am opposed to giving the vote to any man who has not been a resident of Canada. Yes.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. EDWARDS: I am very glad to have my hon. friend on record.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have been on record all afternoon.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. The Bill defines military voters to include all members of the military forces mentioned here, or anyone who has been honourably discharged therefrom. Some 65,900 men were discharged from the Canadian forces up to the 14th of June who never proceeded overseas. I assume that they have obtained discharges, although I am not sure. Under this section they would be military electors in this country. Supposing 20 per cent of them were under age, that is under twenty-one years of age, that would mean that 13.000 or 14,000 of these people in Canada would have votes.

Mr. EDWARDS: As a matter of fact, how many are there?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know, but I assume 20 per cent. Many of these would be in the force from a few days to six months, and the question arises in my mind whether it is necessary or proper that they should be made, by statute, military electors in Canada. Many of them never intended to proceed overseas. I think the provision should be modified in some way. Then there were discharged in England, up to June 30, some 4,380 men. I assume that these were British-born who enlisted in Canada and proceeded overseas with various regiments, men who were entitled to be discharged in Canada but preferred taking their discharge in England because they intended again taking up residence there. It is worth the minister's while considering whether these should be qualified as electors in Canada under this section.

Mr. ARTHURS: A number of those men were probably discharged in England for the purpose of taking out commissions in either the Canadian or the Imperial army.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like the minister to keep these two points in mind. I wish he would explain what is covered by the auxiliary motor boat patrol service. Is that service organized, and, if so, where does it exist? Is it to proceed overseas?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is overseas.

Mr. EDWARDS: In what position is the Canadian soldier, having enlisted here, but having gone overseas and been transferred from the Canadian force to a branch of the Imperial Army?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the section in the Bill as introduced, the vote would not be extended to Canadians who form part of the Imperial Force. As I explained when the Bill was introduced, the reason we had not included Canadians in the Imperial service was that we had not been able to devise means whereby we would be able to take their votes. A suggestion was made when I introduced the Bill which led to further consideration being given, and we have reached a conclusion to amend this definition, so as to include men of Canadian citizenship serving in Imperial forces. We might not be able to find the men, and the presiding officer might not be in a position to obtain their vote. We shall amend the section to meet that case.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: The Bill says that every military elector shall be qualified and entitled to vote at a general election. That is quite clear, and then the Bill tells us what a military elector is. The section reads:

"Military elector" means and includes every person, male or female, who, being a British subject, whether or not ordinarily resident in ada, appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out dian, has been, while within or without Canada, appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service as one of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

My two points are on the words "minor" and on the words "called out". Under the ordinary law in our province an elector must be 21 years of age and a British subject

There are some other provisos.

10 p.m. but the age must be 21. I desire to ask if this Bill is applicable to the conscription law, because, under section 2 of the Military Service Bill, the Government will take the right to call out classes of the ages 20 to 35. If the Government calls out classes 1 or 2, that will include everybody who will be conscripted, and it will also call out electors who would otherwise have been considered minors. Thousands of young men would be called out. I am not opposed to these young men having a vote, but it would make a big difference in the city of Montreal. It would be interesting to know that at any moment the Government could put in a constituency like mine thousands of young men, who, I thought would have no vote. I should like to know, if this measure is applicable to the conscription law, because I see in clause 2 of the Military Service Bill the words:

2. (1) Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described in section three of this Act, shall be liable to be called out as hereinafter provided on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the defence of Canada.

These are exactly the same words as in the Bill before us. If this Bill is passed, thousands and thousands of young men in my hon. friend's district in Montreal could be called out and given a vote. I should like to know if that is going to be done. I might go a little further than my hon. friend from Welland who speaks of three votes in each of 60 different polling subdivisions, which give a total of 180 votes. We might have a good many more votes in each division in Montreal than my hon. friend from Welland suggests.

I was going to raise the point suggested by my hon. friend from Halifax, in regard to the discharged soldiers who are not 21 years of age. They have enrolled from the age of 18 up, and the Government could put a lot of voters in the different divisions of Montreal and in other places, because, in my opinion, at any time the Governor in Council by proclamation could call out on active service, as aforesaid, for the defence of Canada—exactly the same words as in the other Bill—thousands of young men would have a vote, three weeks before polling day. I desire an explanation on that point, because I want to know where I stand.

Mr. DOHERTY: I might first deal with the question asked by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I understand his first question to be whether it was intended that the honourably discharged soldier should have the vote as a military voter. I may say that was the intention, and I think that is the effect of the section. The intention was that the military vote should belong, not only to the soldier actually in the performance of his duty, but to the man who has been a soldier. The principle object in view was to assure the vote to the returned soldier, but it operates, and it was intended to operate, so that the vote could be secured to the honourably discharged soldier. It is quite true that the provision may operate to give a vote to a certain number of soldiers whose service was, perhaps, of not very great value, but it will only be such soldiers as gave the service that they were able to give, and ceased to be soldiers simply because they were honourably discharged from service. It is true they have not done anything in the way of actual service to be compared to the men who have actually carried the work through and been to the front, but on the other hand, is it an undue consideration to give to the man who was willing to be a soldier, who, so far as it depended upon himself, did everything within his power, and was, at all events, sufficiently qualified that he succeeded in passing the first examination at the time of enrolment or enlistment? It may be and, I dare say, it is quite true that amongst those young men could be found some who did themselves know of or who suspected their disqualification and who did not anticipate going overseas, but if that were done under conditions in which one could be quite satisfied that in the particular case the individual had been guilty of conduct such as that, I doubt if he would be honourably discharged.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not remove the qualification so far as such a man is concerned? This Bill is not intended to cover the case of such men. They are under no disability. It is true they joined the service, but they were struck off the strength later on and they never went overseas. Why include them within the scope of this Bill? I suppose most of the men struck off the strength and over 21 will have votes in any case. After being struck off the strength, they will return to their own homes, so that all who will have the vote will be minors. It is rather objectionable to have minors vote in some electoral districts of Canada when other minors are not permitted to vote. Amongst that list you might find a small number of women who enlisted for hospital service overseas, but who were unable to proceed overseas for one cause or another. I do not think it is advisable to have them enrolled as electors in the forthcoming election.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is a difficulty as to where such persons shall vote. I do not know whether the minister intends to reorganize the franchise of the country and make different rules in different places, but I can see a difficulty about a young lad in the case referred to finding a place in which to vote under the regulations. He is not in the county in which he belongs, and I do not suppose the minister is going to provide a ballot box with an officer to take the votes of men of that character who happen to be in various places throughout Canada, so that I think there will be difficulty in their exercising the franchise even if you give it to them.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a provision later on under which men in that position in Canada, honourably discharged soldiers, are declared to be entitled to vote in the constituency in which they reside. They are entitled to have their ballots taken upon their affidavit and upon production of the certificates of their enrolment and their honourable discharge, so that no confusion is caused. Such a man will not be on the list.

Mr. SINCLAIR: His name will not be on the list?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, but under the statute he will be entitled to vote upon presenting himself, upon producing the evidence of his discharge and making affidavit as to his identity with the person mentioned in the documents. It will be the case of a man voting who is not upon the list. I do not see that there is any great anomaly in allowing this young man who is a minor, even although he be in Canada, to vote, while other minors in Canada are not voting. There is this substantial difference between the minor we are dealing with and the other minors in the constituency, that this particular minor has, at all events so far as within him lay, been a Canadian soldier.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Other minors who are soldiers are overseas performing military service, and they have not an opportunity of voting in their own country. The particular case of minor we are dealing with never proceeded overseas. Surely that is a distinction.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no doubt that, if we could do more for the minor who has gone overseas and is performing a service, than we are doing, we would be glad to do it, and no doubt, if we were to weigh the real merits of each one, this minor is entitled to a great deal more gratitude than the boy who has not been called upon to serve, but we have to consider the case of the boy who volunteered his services and who, so far as depended upon himself, made himself a soldier.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Even in the case in which the parents were obliged to ask for his discharge because he was under eighteen? There are many such cases.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know to what extent that would occur. It is inevitable that, if we are to make a law of general application, there will be some instances in which, perhaps, there may be reasons why it is more difficult to justify the granting of a vote than is the case, speaking generally; but we have to make a rule that is going to be generally applicable, and I do not think we can go so far as to discriminate between individual soldiers. The only safe rule is this: A man was a soldier or he was not a soldier; if he was a soldier, he ought to have the vote, and I do not think, speaking generally, he ought to be deprived of that vote because, although he had been a soldier, at some period before he was enabled to go overseas and become actively engaged, it was ascertained that he was not suitable for a soldier and he was discharged.

Mr. GERMAN: Surely the minister would not call a man a soldier who was never accepted as a soldier?

Mr. DOHERTY: A man who was not accepted as a soldier never was a soldier and never was a discharged soldier, so that he would not come within the scope of this Bill. We are dealing with soldiers who actually are soldiers and soldiers who were soldiers and were honourably discharged. A man who was stopped at the outset and was never taken on the strength was not a soldier at all and does not come under this Bill.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Will men of the ages of 20 in classes one and two, who are called out for active service under the Military Service Act, have the right to vote as soon as they are called out? Will a minor who is conscripted have the right to vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps the best answer that I can give is to compare the two measures and see whether the hon. gentleman is right or not. In the drawing up of this Bill we were endeavouring to cover all the methods by which a man might have become a soldier, because we wanted to cover every soldier. We had not presented to our minds in any particular way the provisions of the Military Service Act, and if on comparing them the result would be produced that, by reason of the wording as it stands here, the conclusion would have to be reached that, when a whole class of men from 20 to 34 would be called out for active service, before any individual man came to participate in any way in military operations, this wording would give him a vote, that result was not intended to be produced, and if the combined wording of the two Acts would produce that result, we should have to find a remedy for that condition of affairs.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the minister explain about the motor boat patrol service?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that the Motor Boat Patrol Service is an Imperial Service manned by Canadians, their principal work being to patrol the seas that are infested by submarines.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no such thing as a Canadian Motor Boat Patrol Service? I understand there are quite a number of men in Halifax at present who belong to this service. They have been there all winter, but as there are no boats for them, they have been doing nothing for some months. Do I understand these men are in the Imperial service?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that the Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol is an Imperial service. If it were a Canadian service we would consider them to be included. I understand that our Canadian service includes the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Militia on active service, and the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve. The others are all Imperial services.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I think that a great number of the men who went across for the Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol joined the Imperial Navy, and I think they should be given the vote.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not objecting to their being given the vote.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I think we should amend the clause by adding "The Royal Navy."

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to the Imperial service, it is our intention to modify the section by making a provision giving Canadian citizens in the Imperial service, whether naval or military, the right to vote. There may be difficulty in the way of exercising that right, but they will be given the right.

Mr. DESCARRIES: Clause 3 says:

(1) Every military elector shall be qualified and entitled to vote at a general election.

(2) If he can state the electoral district wherein he last continuously resided during at least ..... months of the year immediately preceding his appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service, or so particularly specify a place or places within an electoral district whereat during such period of time he so resided that such electoral district can therefrom be ascertained, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or to be ascertained.

Suppose that military elector, either in error, or deliberately for political purposes, declares that he had resided during those four months in my constituency, when really he had resided in the constituency of my hon. friend. Suppose that fifty or a hundred electors make the same mistake, either intentionally or deliberately, could the election be contested on that ground?

Mr. DOHERTY: We should have to rely on the strength of their affidavits, for the information on which they are entitled to vote. If I am not mistaken, that is the system in Alberta and Saskatchewan to-day.

Mr. DESCARRIES: Suppose he makes a false affidavit?

Mr. DOHERTY: The ballot would have to be counted for the time being, just as in Canada, when a man makes a false oath, his ballot is deposited in the box, and not being susceptible of indentification, is no doubt counted. I presume that upon a contestation of an election, if it could be shown that a number of votes wrongfully designating an electoral constituency had been polled sufficient to effect the result in a particular constituency, that might be a proper ground for contestation. To-day, of course, a man who has no vote at all, if he commits perjury and swears to his right to vote, will get a vote, and his ballot will be deposited in the box and counted. To find a practical remedy is pretty difficult. Similarly, if under this Act, a man swore that he resided in one place, when he resided in another, I do not think it would be possible to control that at the time of voting. In this election, just as in the elections in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, we shall have to rely for this information on the truthfulness of the soldier when put upon his oath.

Mr. DESCARRIES: Is there any provision in the law that would cover such a case?

Mr. DOHERTY: I will look into it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was going to move that this clause be amended by striking out the words "whether or not." If this amendment was agreed to the clause would read "military elector" means and includes every person male or female, who, being a British subject, ordinarily resident in Canada." I understand, however, that the minister is not quite sure whether my hon. friend from St. James is correct in saying that the result of this section would be that the moment the proclamation issued under the Military Service Act every young man in Canada would ipso facto become a military elector, and be entitled to vote. I think a little reflection will convince the minister that my hon. friend is right.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am inclined to think he is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under the Military Service Act the Governor in Council issues a proclamation calling out—that is the word used—all the single men in Canada between certain ages. The effect of this clause would be to make every young man of twenty years of age a military elector, and give him the right to vote. As the minister is inclined to agree with that view, perhaps this clause might stand.

Mr. NESBITT: One branch in which some Canadians have enlisted is not included in the Bill, and that is the Royal Kite Balloon Branch. If you are going to include all branches of the service, you had better include that branch with the others.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should be sorry to omit any.

Mr. NESBITT: That is a branch of the service which some Canadians joined when they went across the water.

Mr. ARTHURS: It is included in the Air Service.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It has been suggested by some gentlemen during the course of the discussion that the Fisheries Protection Service is connected, departmentally speaking, with the Royal Canadian Navy. A large number of these boats are engaged, in that service, along the coast, quite a number of men being employed. A number of the men so employed are under the age of 21 years. I am not objecting to their votes being taken, if it is a proper thing to do. However, I should like to know from the minister if it is his intention to give votes under this legislation to men who are not engaged actually in the war, but who are employed upon these fisheries protection boats along the coast?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think they would come under any of these designations. There is the Fisheries Protection Service, and there is the Royal Canadian Navy, which, I understand, is a separate service. I understand, however, from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that a large number of boats that would in peace times be engaged in purely fisheries protection service have been engaged in doing work in the nature of naval service, patrolling the coast and doing trying work under difficult conditions—conditions in which the men in the boats are exposed to serious danger. The crews of such fisheries boats would, I understand, come under the designation herein provided.

Mr. MACDONALD: Most of the dangerous work performed in connection with patrolling is done by the American boats. Everybody in the Maritime Provinces knows that the boats of the Royal Canadian Navy are doing inshore service. The member for Guysborough is quite right; the men employed in the fisheries boats under the Naval Department are not at all in any position of danger.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall get that cleared up. I do not want to cover anybody who is not really doing what may properly be described as naval service.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that the minister is to pay some attention to the point raised by the member for St. James Division (Mr. L. A. Lapointe) in connection with this proposed legislation. Upon the proclamation in connection with the Conscription Bill being published, every man between the ages of 20 and 35, both inclusive, will become a soldier, and, under the Soldiers' Voting Act, will have the right to vote. But a great many of them could never pass the test which must be passed before they can become soldiers.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall lay together the texts of the two Bills, and if what the member for St. James Division suggestion may be brought about, I shall take measures so to modify this legislation as to exclude the result that is apprehended.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the proclamation is issued before the election these men become military electors and poll their votes accordingly. But when they come to be examined, many of those who have polled their votes may be pronounced medically unfit, and can never be soldiers. Others may make application, under the law, for exemption. The men exempted have voted, being military voters within the meaning of the law, but they can never be soldiers. Such conditions will arise unless some steps are taken to prevent them. I listened very attentively to everything that was said tonight. As I listened to the various objections and to the answers given, I could not help thinking that the Prime Minister, if he were here, would feel more strongly confirmed than ever in what he said in this House on January 22 last as it appears on page 37 of the revised Hansard. If any hon. gentlemen on this side should say that to take this vote is a practical impossibility, he would find himself backed up by what the Prime Minister said on the occasion referred to. This is what the right hon. gentleman said:

> I know something of the conditions at the front, and I venture to put this thought before the House and the country; the men at the front will be not only practically, but actually, disfranchised if an election does take place in this country while they are in the trenches. That is my conviction. I say they would be actually disfranchised because, although I render every tribute to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the committee which had in hand the preparation of the Soldiers' Voting Act of 1915, I am not disposed to think that the arrangements made in that Act or in any other Act that could be devised are such as to enable those men to vote, or at least any considerable number of them. You cannot predict what conditions may exist. Suppose an election came on in this country when the fiercest drive of the war was taking place. Do you imagine that the paymasters of those regiments and their commanding officers could busy themselves with handing out ballots to men whose souls were engrossed and whose lives were at stake in the enterprise in which they were engaged? There is something more than that. These men at the front have it not in their disposition; they have it not in their heart or their soul to consider matters of party controversy under the conditions with which they are there confronted. I believe those men would want to put aside any one who came to talk to them about political issues or partisan controversy, under conditions of life or of death, of victory or of defeat such as confront them in the trenches or while making a drive to bring this war to an end. Further than that, there may be perhaps a hundred thousand men not in France. You might be able to have some of those men vote for Government or for Opposition, not for a candidate, as provided in the Act alluded to; but do you imagine that those men who are putting their lives to the supreme test in going overseas to fight for their country, will be greatly interested in political issues, or that they will desire to hear political speeches, or that they will welcome the distribution of partisan literature? I am not saying whether or not these considerations should determine the issue, but I do say that they are considerations that must be taken into account by every member of this Parliament when upon him the responsibility falls as to whether or not there shall be a general election during this war, and I leave it at that.

The Prime Minister argues that it would be impossible with any degree of practicability to take the vote of the soldiers. When the Act of 1915 was before the House and before the committee I expressed that opinion, and I still hold the view that it would be absolutely impossible with any degree of fairness or justice to take the vote of the soldiers in the manner proposed.

Men have joined regiments and remained with them for a few days or a few months for the purpose of making up the number and starting the battalion. Though not physically fit these men have been allowed to join but they never intended to go overseas. Does the minister think that a man who was not physically fit but who was allowed to join to give the battalion a start should have a vote whereas a man of the same age, 20 years, who is working in a munitions factory, doing excellent work, or who is working in a coal mine, getting out the coal for the manufacture of steel, cannot vote because he is not of age? The man down in the coal mine is more deserving in my judgment than the man who may have been loitering around doing nothing for some weeks in connection with some regiment and who, because he has got the name of being a soldier, is to be entitled to vote. The points taken up by these hon. gentlemen are full of meat and call for the consideration of the minister. I make the broad statement, and I think it will be regarded as a non-partisan and fair statement, that no man should vote in Canada unless his name is duly on a list somewhere in Canada where he had a right to get his name on the list. If a man who has a right to vote in British Columbia is in Halifax, let his vote be taken there by a proper officer and sent back to British Columbia. I would not take the responsibility of requiring him to go home and vote unless that were considered best although in many cases persons under these circumstances can go home to vote. But I do submit that no man or woman in Canada should be permitted to go to the poll and poll a vote unless the name of that person is properly found on some list. I have always had the notion that the theory of this legislation is that the war should not deprive anybody of a vote who could vote if there were no war. I would not like to see anybody deprived of the right to vote who could have voted if there had been no war, but I am not very much enamoured of the idea that the mere fact that there is a war should qualify people to vote who otherwise are not qualified. Any person who has not yet left Canada has not, in my judgment, qualified himself, to be an elector if he otherwise could not be. It is for that reason I say that no man should vote in Canada unless his name is properly entered on some list or unless he has a right to vote in some municipal polling division. If the minister will so provide I think he will go a long way toward getting confidence for his Act; that is that no person should vote in Canada unless his name is on some list. Let him make provision that every man who is entitled to vote shall vote and let him make it plain that there shall be no wholesale vote making amongst those who, if there were no war, could not have exercised the franchise. The test should be that no man should be deprived of the franchise who could have voted if there had not been any war. Otherwise, under this Act, you are going to open the door to a class of persons to exercise the franchise because of the war who may never have any interest in this country except that they happen to be in the ranks, many of them because it suits them better than anything else. When the Civil War was on in the United States hundreds of thousands of our young men went to the United States, enlisted and fought because they wanted to get the pay and not because we in Canada had any enthusiasm as between the North and South. There are millions of men in this world who are soldiers, that is their business; that is their training. They come to do soldiering for Canada because there is no soldiering going on in any other country that suits them as well, but that does not entitle them to claim the right to have a say as to what will happen in this country. The minister was mixing two principles this evening in connection with the franchise. He said that he does not know the difference between a man who is fighting and yet had no residence in Canada and the man who has property in Canada and is a non-resident. The minister knows well that British institutions and law always recognize the right of property, almost as great a right as any which a man can possess. Wherever a man has property he has the right to vote for the purpose of protecting that property. That is why, in the smaller municipal elections, a man owning property in a certain polling district has the right to go and vote and take part in the election of councillor for this district. He has the right to see the man elected who has to deal with his property. That is an underlying principle. The man who has property in the country, if he is a British subject, although residing outside, has the right to come in and vote and to say who shall make the laws governing that property. But that is entirely different from the man who has no stake in the country, who may come as a professional soldier while the war is on, and who, when the war is over, will leave and will never be seen again. I hope the minister will consider some of the points raised by the hon. members to whose remarks I have been addressing myself, and that he will give some attention to the suggestion that people residing in Canada should not be given the right to vote unless they are qualified in some district in which they have a right to be qualified.

Section 2 from line 20 to the end, and section 3, allowed to stand.

On section 4 (election officers, etc.), subsection 1, clause (b), general returning officer:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This reads that the general returning officer "shall have and perform within the city of Ottawa" certain duties. Would it not be better to say within the Dominion of Canada as in the preceding clause providing for the appointment of the assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery?

Mr. DOHERTY: The duties of this officer are of a very limited character. He is to receive the returns from all Canada and the returns from overesas and to compile them so as to establish the result of the election in each particular constituency. The intention was that this should be done in Ottawa. He does none of the work that is done by a returning officer in connection with the holding of an election. Under this system no one will know the result in a particular constituency until he has added the results from the different places where the voting takes place, in the constituencies, in the military camps in Canada, and overseas, and has issued his statement.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Who looks after the polling of the votes at military camps in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: What are called presiding officers, who occupy the role of returning officers in so far as the direction of the election itself is concerned.

Mr. NESBITT: Under the existing law the ballots, after being marked, are to be returned to the different constituencies and there counted by the returning officer, at which time the candidates or their representatives would have the right to be present. There is no such provision in this Bill. That is one reason why I object to subclause 3.

Mr. DOHERTY: We shall deal with that in due time, in connection with the method of counting under this Bill.

Mr. GERMAN: The returns will not likely be received and made up by the general returning officer at Ottawa for some weeks after the general result of the election throughout Canada is known. There is to be no voting later than eight o'clock on the day of the voting in Canada, but the next morning, throughout Canada generally, the result of the election will be known as usual.

Mr. DOHERTY: So far as the Canadian vote is concerned.

Mr. GERMAN: Then from all the camps and soldiers' polling places in Canada the returns are sent to Ottawa.

Mr. DOHERTY: In Canada, yes.

Mr. GERMAN: To the returning officer, who retains them. Until he receives the returns from the overseas camps, he makes no calculations.

Mr. DOHERTY: The returning officer counts them, but he does not do any additions. The counting is dealt with under the next section, the counting by the special returning officer.

Mr. GERMAN: But there is no publication by him.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, not necessarily.

Mr. GERMAN: Can there be as to what has taken place in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: The result within the constituency will necessarily be known because we have made no modifications of the present position under which, when the ballots are counted in each polling place, the representative of each candidate goes away with the statement of the result of the poll. We do not propose to interfere with that, so that the result, in so far as concerns the polling which actually takes place in a constituency in Canada, will be known on the night of the election, as the final result in each constituency is presently known. But, of course, it will be impossible to declare anybody elected until you have taken the vote in a particular constituency, have gathered in and counted the votes that may be applicable to that constituency in the camps in Canada, and received the results of the votes taken overseas. All of these will come to this general returning officer. When he has them all he will add them together and announce the result. That is his function. The details of the counting are attended to by the officers who are to do the counting, but this is done by the general returning officer and that is practically his entire office. I do not think it will be possible to get a proper declaration of the result of an election conducted as this one will be in different parts of the world really, unless you have somebody at the head to whom all results are to come and who will announce the effect of the combination of those results. While his office is a very important one, he has a very simple duty to perform.

Mr. GERMAN: And in the meantime the results throughout the Dominion of Canada as to close elections in certain constituencies will be well known to the gentleman who has charge of the ballot papers that are being sent from England and France, which may be manipulated by them as they see fit, from the time they leave there until they reach here, and all manner of fraud may be perpetrated.

Mr. DOHERTY: All the ballots would have to be so manipulated by one gentleman nominated by the leader of the Opposition, and one gentleman nominated by the leader of the Government. There will be no manipulation of the ballots, except by a combination of the representatives of both parties. If the hon. gentleman can suggest something that I can do to make the thing fairer than that, and to prevent manipulation, I shall certainly be very glad to consider it, but I thought I had reached the point where we might safely count that the matter would be dealt with fairly. I do not see what room there is for a general returning officer to do any manipulating. He only gets results from other people but no ballots. He gets reports of those results, which are checked before being sent to him, so far as the overseas vote is concerned, first by telegram and second by registered communication, which passes through the office of the Canadian Commissioner to France, and the secretary of the High Commissioner's Office in London. These reports are transmitted to them, to be transmitted over here, and any possible manipulation on the part of any of those gentlemen would be necessarily known to the special returning officer handing in those returns.

Mr. NESBITT: They check them first and then send them to the commissioner in England?

Mr. DOHERTY: All they hand to him is the statement to be sent over here.

Mr. NESBITT: No doubt they keep tab on the statement.

Mr. DOHERTY: They have a record book from which the statement is taken. It is known to members of this House that the Canadian Commissioner in Paris was appointed by the late Government, and we have every confidence in him.

11 p.m. Nothing goes through his hands, or the hands of the secretary in London, except the statement made by the special returning officers who are to be appointed in the manner I indicated a few moments ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the minister will agree with me that this Bill should be framed so that it will be as free as possible from any opportunity for partisanship. There is a provision for certain officials being appointed by the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition, and I think there are two quite important omissions in that regard. I refer to subsection (c) of section 4——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have not reached that section yet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well we are dealing with the returning officer who is referred to in this subsection. I think the leaders of the two parties should have a voice in the appointment of all the officers who are to administer this Act. It is an Act of extraordinary character. Votes are to be taken under very exceptional circumstances, and I think there is just as much reason for having the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition agree as to the returning officer, or if by any possibility they could not agree he could be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, but I think it would be most unlikely that they could not agree. Then it is provided that the special returning officers shall be appointed, but their duties are confined entirely to the counting, reporting and return of votes. But the presiding officers, who are really to take the place of returning officers in the ordinary election under the Dominion Act, are partisan appointments.

Mr. DOHERTY: Just as all the appointments in Canada are partisan appointments.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister is professing to give to this Bill and to its working out a non-partisan character. but in respect to two of the most important appointments he omits that principle entirely as to the general returning officer and as to the presiding officers.

Mr. DOHERTY: In what respect does the hon. gentleman suggest that there is any danger from the general returning officer being appointed in the usual manner by the Government? We have departed from the general rule under which officials are appointed in a business of this kind because we have been anxious to ensure a perfectly fair contest, but the general returning officer has to perform his functions in Ottawa, and those functions are to consist in receiving returns that are going to be sent in from other people. Those other people are in a perfect position to check what he does. The one thing which it could be suggested that that man could do to affect the result of the election is to falsify the returns. In all frankness, is it fair to suggest that it is necessary, to protect this election, that we should, with regard to this officer, depart from the general rule under which officers are appointed by the Government of the day? We have departed from it where there was, as it seemed to us, a possibility of suggesting unfairness, but apparently that did not save us from the suggestion in regard to the appointment of an officer of this description. I think there is no good reason why we should depart from the ordinary practice of the Government charged with the administration of the affairs of the country to appoint an officer to administer the measure.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The only reason is the Government is professing to make this Bill non-partisan in its character.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does that mean that we must depart from the ordinary rule of appointment, even when adherence to it can produce no partisan effect? I do want to be fair in this matter, but I do not think I should be asked to do things, that would only on their face be just as the hon. gentleman expresses it, professing to be non-partisan. To provide that the general returning officer should be appointed by the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Government would be a mere profession on its face. I do not see that I should depart from the general rule, simply to make a greater profession on my part of a desire to be non-partisan.

When it comes down to the real thing of the counting of the ballots, where I can realize the immense importance of securing proper representation, I think I would have been entitled to be considered to be non-partisan if I had made provision to ensure representation of both parties at that counting. That is all that has been done from time immemorial with regard to counting ballots in this country, but I have gone further, and I have said that this counting shall be done by people nominated by both parties, putting both parties on a footing of perfect quality as regards this essential operation of the counting, which produces the statements which are handed to the General Returning Officer. The one thing the General Returning Officer could do would be to alter the statements, and if he did so, he would at once be confronted with the authors of them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why does the minister call the officers to be appointed under paragraph (c) of section 4, to be nominated jointly by the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition, special returning officers? That is rather a confusing term.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have had some difficulty in endeavouring to avoid confusion because, of course, we have to duplicate functions. There have to be people on this side who are doing the work of taking the votes, carrying on the election and counting the votes. That is done on this side by returning officers and deputy returning officers. The deputy returning officers do the counting on this side. On the other side, we have to provide some officer to do the counting of the ballots.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That special returning officer does not receive the ballots himself.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, he does not take the vote at all.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He is not the presiding officer?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, his function is to count the votes after they come in.

Mr. NESBITT: He and his clerk.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: And his clerk has to be of the opposite party.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. We have to divide up the work of the returning officer to meet the conditions. We have an officer that is called a presiding officer. He may be appointed a presiding officer for a camp, or possibly in England, for a section of the country in which there are different camps. He is in the position of a returning officer for a constituency. He will, of course, be taking votes for numerous constituencies, but he is in the position of a returning officer in the sense that it is for him to set the machinery in motion and to provide the deputies who are actually to hold the polls and take the votes. He conducts the business of a returning officer so far as providing for the holding of polls and the taking of ballots is concerned. Then he stops. The deputy presiding officers, who are doing the work of deputy returning officers in holding these overseas polls or military polls and who take the votes, make their returns not to each one of those presiding officers, but direct, if the vote is taken in France, to the office of the Canadian Commissioner to France; if the vote is taken in England, to the secretary of the office of the High Commissioner at London. When those two officers have those boxes, they notify those special returning officers, that on a certain day at a certain hour they will hand over to them the boxes they have so received. They convene those special returning officers, and their clerks, and deliver over to them the sealed boxes just as they got them. The special returning officers, having received those ballot boxes proceed to open them. As I say, each special returning officer has a clerk who is the representative of the party or appointed on the nomination of the party other than that which suggested or appointed the special returning officer. When we come to the details of the taking of the vote, we shall see that the ballot, when it is marked, is deposited in an envelope which is sealed. On the back of that envelope is the information that enables him to determine to what constituency it belongs. Those envelopes are sealed and put into the ballot boxes. When those ballot boxes are handed over to the special returning officers by the Secretary of the High Commissioner or the Commissioner in France, they proceed to open the boxes, and their first operation is to assort the envelopes. They do not open the envelope. They do not know anything about the ballot that is in the envelope. They assort the envelopes, guiding themselves by the information that is on the back of the envelope. Having assorted them, they have the result that they have in separate boxes or receptacles of some kind in their possession, or in separate heaps, the envelopes containing ballots for each particular constituency. Having done that assorting operation, they proceed to do the counting operation or to do the operation perhaps of opening the envelopes as a separate operation. It is prescribed that, when they come to open the envelope and take out the ballot, they shall lay that envelope down on the table with the back on which the information is on the table so that they shall not be able to connect the ballot with the information on the envelope. They shall open that envelope and drop the ballot just as it stands into the ballot box marked for that constituency. Having done that operation of opening the envelopes and dropping in all the ballots, they will then open that ballot box, having brought about a condition of affairs in which they will not be able to connect any particular ballot in any particular case with any particular envelope. They will then proceed to count the ballots.

Mr. PUGSLEY: From my experience in carrying on elections, the most important position and the one in which it is very dangerous to have a partisan officer is that of the presiding officer. In ordinary elections he is called the returning office or the deputy returning officer. Here the name is changed. He is the presiding officer or the deputy presiding officer. The leader of the Opposition has the duty imposed upon him of choosing one-half of these special returning officers, and one-half of the scrutineers. It is now after eleven o'clock. Might I suggest that this section be allowed to stand so that the leader of the Opposition might be here when it is considered?

Mr. McKENZIE: Have we, in the ordinary elections, any officer who corresponds with this general returning officer mentioned in paragraph (b)? As I understand it, we have not.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, we have not.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery does everything except what is done by the ordinary presiding officer.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not everything. We need this returning officer, because some one has to make a return saying who is elected. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery does not make a return saying anybody is elected. The returning officer for each constituency now returns a man as elected to represent that constituency. He cannot do that now, because he only has the votes taken in Canada. We have to gather together in somebody's hands all the votes that apply to a constituency, and have the combined results of these votes declared by somebody, and that is what the general returning officer is going to do. Under the Act as it stood all ballots would have had to come back from France, be sorted by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and sent by him to the returning officers in each constituency. However that might have worked out when you were dealing with 30,000 or 50,000 ballots, and under transportation conditions as they existed at that time, I think it is obvious that at the present moment to make the taking of 350,000 or 400,000 ballots dependent upon those ballots being safely transported across the seas to be sorted and counted here, would be a very unwise thing. It is to obviate the difficulties and the unsafety of that method that we are providing this machinery for counting the ballots overseas. Of course, the ballots will all be sent over here eventually, to be available in case of contestation. The reason why we have this general returning officer is that he may be a sort of clearing house. We are sending everything in to him, and he will be able to return that a particular man was elected for a particular constituency, because he has all the results from all the different sources.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would it not be better for the local returning officers to make the returns? If you are going to have only one returning officer for the whole Dominion, you are going to have a lot of difficulty. Why should not the man who will receive all the overseas votes communicate to the returning officer in my constituency, or in any other constituency, the total votes, and let the local officer make the return?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not see what advantage is to be gained by that additional operation. The returning officer in Canada is directing an election in a constituency in Canada only so far as the votes in Canada are concerned. Other men are directing it so far as the votes in France are concerned, other men are directing it so far as the votes in England are concerned, and other men are directing it so far as the votes in Bermuda are concerned. By this operation we gather together the results from all the different sources, and the man who has received them all proclaims the result. Personally, if anybody wants it, and can suggest what gain can possibly come from it, I have no objection to providing for this additional trouble, namely, that the man who has received all these results shall send them back to the men from whom part of these results came, in order that they may make the proclamation.

Mr. GERMAN: Why not let the information be sent direct to the returning officer in each constituency?

Mr. DOHERTY: It must be remembered that the results will not come in for more than a month after the returning officer in Canada has done everything that he is called upon to do. If any hon. gentleman can point out the advantage in making the man on the other side make 234 separate packages, and send them to 234 individual men over here, rather than have him send all the returns to one man, I shall be glad to consider the suggestion, but I must confess that my impression is at the moment that the suggestion is made only for the purpose of suggesting something different from what is in the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister consider the question of allowing the leader of the Opposition to have a voice in the appointment of the presiding officers?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I made the suggestion on the first reading of the Bill that we should make better progress if it was referred to a special committee. It will take two weeks to get the Bill through the House in this way, and I think it would facilitate the passage of the Bill to have it referred to a special committee.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have given some thought to that suggestion, and have consulted with the Prime Minister and my colleagues about it, and I think perhaps our little experience this afternoon goes to justify the plan we adopted. This Bill is one with regard to which it is to be expected that many hon. gentlemen will have suggestions to make, and it would not perhaps be quite fair to them, or in the interests of the improvement and perfection of the Bill, that they should not be afforded an opportunity of making those suggestions. In the first place, I think that is a sufficient reason why we should not withdraw the Bill from Committee of the Whole. In the second place, I think it would lead one to the conclusion that after a special committee had dealt with the Bill we should have to submit it to the House to give hon. gentlemen an opportunity of making their suggestions. Might I make this suggestion? If a few gentlemen from the other side of the House would be good enough to join with two or three that we might name on this side, we might in a perfectly informal way carry on simultaneously some little examination of the Bill and some little discussions that would not interfere with the progress of the Bill in the House, but might on the other hand expedite it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The leader of the Opposition will have to have an opportunity of thinking over this suggestion.

Mr. COPP: I understand that the General Returning Officer receives the results from overseas and also from the different constituencies in Canada. He is, in fact, the real returning officer. Does he also receive from the returning officers of the election held in Canada as well? Is he the real returning officer?

Mr. DOHERTY: For the purpose of proclaiming who is elected, he is the real returning officer.

Mr. NESBITT: He receives all the reports?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill does not read that way.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have not defined his duties as yet.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: May I ask the Minister of Justice, who is leading the House, if we are to have a general franchise Act this session? It is rumoured that there is to be such a Bill. If so, is it likely to be presented to the House shortly, and what is its nature?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to make an announcement on that subject this evening. I shall submit the hon. gentleman's question to the Prime Minister; perhaps we may hope for an answer to it to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Tuesday, August 21, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HONOURABLE ROBERT ROGERS.

HIS RESIGNATION FROM THE CABINET—THE LETTERS THAT PASSED BETWEEN RT. HON. SIR ROBERT BORDEN AND THE HON. MR. ROGERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I desire to inform the House that the Minister of Public Works has resigned, and that his resignation has been accepted. The correspondence which has taken place is under my hand, and His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to give me his permission to communicate it to the House. I shall accordingly read it:

Ottawa, August, 15, 1917.

My dear Sir Robert,—

Never during the six years that I have endeavoured to faithfully and loyally serve you as leader of our party do I know of any part of my efforts that have ever been kept secret from you. In that same spirit of loyalty and devotion let me say a plain word, and it is this—that, in my opinion, as a party we are face to face with very serious difficulties, difficulties, to my mind, that have largely been created by our kindness to our opponents. The question with me is, "What are we doing about it?" Our opponents are strong, active and hopeful. They do not hesitate in adopting the most sordid methods imaginable. They have been covering the country for months past with literature of the most damnable character. They have a strong press, through which they are promoting a most cowardly malevolent campaign. I am often made the target for many of their attacks—attacks which they are unable to support with any substance. However, with them it is not a question of substance, of truth, or of common decency. They simply follow their instructions to attack any one that they regard as a menace to their success.

And what are we doing? Nothing that I know of except going on treating the promoters of this slanderous campaign as gentlemen. Surely it is plain that there is only one end to all this. Hard and difficult as it is for me to do so, let me say that if our present inaction and indecision are to continue, may I with feelings of the greatest possible respect and with feelings of the very deepest regret, ask that at your convenience I be relieved from sharing the responsibility for the results that will be sure to follow continued inaction and indecision.

Never in my long experience have I witnessed more clearly than I do to-day the opportunity that rests with us for great good. We have only to remember that we are in a war in which Canada's all is at stake. If we do not win, then the plans for Canada's future development will not be made in our own capital city of Ottawa, but in the capital city of some foreign country. There is no use deluding ourselves upon this point, for a great, fat, tempting prize like Canada would never be allowed to escape were she to go undefended by the full power of a victorious British Empire. Canada's hope for the fulfilment of her full share in this great struggle largely rests with the party that you represent. Therefore, our responsibilities are great. We must be equal to them, and above all we must be equal to our obligations to our gallant soldiers. Under the banner of loyalty, decision and action, we can accomplish these high purposes. We cannot afford to delay. We should waste no time tarrying and disputing with opponents whose apparent purpose to-day is to prolong Parliament until the end of its term, in the hope that if they succeed in this they will be able to add a new chapter to their slanderous campaign by attempting to make it appear to the country that we are hopelessly helpless.

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier two months ago refused your most generous proposal for coalition, surely, then there was only one course left, and that was to proceed determinedly and fearlessly with our task. I can, of course, well realize that you delayed in honest, hopeful expectation that some strong action for union would be taken at the Winnipeg convention. True, you have not had the opportunity to know and understand the method, and the designs of those in western Canada who stood up in that convention in support of Laurierism. Under normal conditions, in times of peace, it is always inadvisable and dangerous to have either truck or trade with your enemies when you know them to be such. It is a million times more dangerous at this solemn moment when the fate of our country is hanging in the balance.

The Canadian people understand that at the outbreak of the war, and every day since the Government have had forced upon them conditions the like of which no Government in Canada had ever before been called upon to meet. Loyal Canadians everywhere realize this, and I am confident they appreciate to the full the many difficulties the Government have had to contend with, and above all they know and understand the sordid means being employed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as the leader of our domestic and foreign enemies to defeat our honest efforts to faithfully fulfil, in Canada's name, a full and worthy part in this great war. Therefore, to my mind, our course is plain. It is this: "Carry on" without delay and with resolute determination to assist to the fullest extent of Canada's power in preserving the unity of the Empire and the future destinies of our own country.

As for myself, let me say whatever the outcome may be, I will in the future as in the past ever remain loyal and devoted to my country and to my friends, prepared at all times to respond whenever and wherever duty calls.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) R. Rogers.

Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden,
Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

To that I made the following reply:

Ottawa, August 17th, 1917.

My dear Mr. Rogers,—

I have given attentive consideration to the views expressed in your letter of the 15th inst. which reached me last evening.

You do not specifically define the lack of action of which you complain, but you do in general terms declare that there has been during the past three months continued inaction and indecision and that you desire to be relieved from responsibility therefor, or for its continuance. I am unable to accept your conclusion nor am I aware of the slightest foundation for the view which you have thus expressed.

As to inaction let me call the following considerations to your attention: Since my return to Ottawa in the middle of May numerous questions of the very highest national importance have been taken up and dealt with. I realize that you have not taken so active a part in their consideration as some other members of the Government, but I know you appreciate the immense difficulties and complexities by which many of them have been surrounded, and the vast amount of labour which has been involved in their determination. To refresh your memory let me enumerate some of these matters.

1. Compulsory Military Service. All my colleagues know the enormous amount of time and labour bestowed upon this question and in the preparation of the measure in which it is embodied. That measure was introduced by me on the 11th June and has passed the House of Commons and the Senate, and it now stands for the consideration of some minor amendments made in the Senate. Its importance in providing needed reinforcements for our gallant men in the trenches cannot be over estimated.

2. The imposition of a Tax upon Incomes above a certain amount. This subject required the most attentive study in the consideration of its scope and details. After much deliberation the measure was perfected, passed through its various stages in the House of Commons, and now stands for Third Reading.

3. Extension of the Parliamentary Term. While this subject did not involve long debate the course of the Government had to be most carefully considered; and you will agree that in importance it does not rank below any of the great questions which have been determined by the Government during the present session.

4. Railway Legislation. Only those who have been called upon to face the problems with which the Government have been confronted can realize the difficulties and complexities which had to be met in dealing with this question. It has demanded and received the most earnest and unremitting study and attention ever since my return. After long deliberation the policy of the Government has been formulated in the Bill which has recently received its Second Reading in the House of Commons and which as I believe embodies a policy greatly in the interest of the country. This subject alone would under ordinary circumstances have been regarded as sufficient to engage the attention of a government during an entire session.

5. Military Voters Bill. It is apparent that under the conditions which have developed during the past two years and having regard to the greatly increased Canadian forces in France and in Great Britain the Act of 1915 has become wholly unworkable It is most essential that all the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force shall have every possible opportunity of exercising their franchises. The holding of an election in Canada alone necessitates the comprehensive provisions embodied in the Dominion Elections Act to insure full opportunity for voting and every reasonable safeguard to prevent fraud. But under present conditions we must hold an election not only in Canada but in Great Britain, France and other countries as well. The holding of such an election abroad requires equally comprehensive provisions to cover not only the ordinary arrangements for an election in Canada but the very different and highly complex conditions presented in extending the franchise to an army of 300,000 men in the midst of military operations. I am sure that you realize the magnitude of the task thus presented to the Government in order to insure full opportunity and at the same time adequate safeguards. This we have endeavoured to accomplish in the measure now before Parliament.

6. The Government also gave close attention to arrangements for assisting the settlement of returned soldiers upon the land and suitable provision for that purpose was made in the Soldiers Settlement Bill which has passed both the House of Commons and the Senate.

7. Conduct of the War. In addition to this vast programme which has been carried out since the middle of May the Government has had to consider and deal with many problems arising out of war conditions. As you know, questions of the first importance are presented for our consideration almost daily. During the period mentioned we have established a Board of Grain Commissioners to regulate the price of grain and to provide for the greatest possible exportable surplus. We have appointed a Food Controller and conferred upon him extraordinary powers of regulation. We have appointed a Fuel Controller and given him power essential for the provision of fuel at a reasonable price. We have dealt with a difficult labour situation in Western Canada through the appointment of a Director of Coal Operations whose efforts have been attended with notable advantage to the public interest. Besides all this the administrative activities of various departments for war purposes have been incessant. Large purchases of food and supplies for the British and Allied Governments have been made, the funds necessary to pay for these purchases and for enormous supplies of munitions have been provided for the British Government and our part in the war has been thoroughly sustained in the midst of a very active session.

Under these circumstances your suggestion that there has been inaction on the part of the Government seems entirely unwarranted. So far as I am concerned I cannot recall any period of my life when I was more actively and intensely occupied or when I gave my time and energies more abundantly and unreservedly to the duties that lay before me.

I do indeed admit (and perhaps your charge relates to this) that during that period I have not occupied myself in party controversy or resorted to partisan attack. That has been my course since the outbreak of war and I propose to maintain it. I have defended the administration from attack when I thought such defence necessary and I shall pursue that course in the future.

It is perfectly true that the official Liberal Press Bureau has been disseminating throughout the country in vast quantities for many months, campaign literature of a most unworthy and offensive character. I have sufficient confidence in the good sense of my fellow countrymen to believe that such gas attacks will not prevent victory for the right when the time comes.

You express the apprehension that the Government will encounter obstructive tactics in the House of Commons. While I do not share that apprehension, I may assure you that any such tactics will be met and firmly dealt with.

You charge also indecision. My duty never lay clearer before me than I have seen it since my return in May last and not for one moment have I swerved from the purpose which I then reached. I arrived at the conviction that a union of both political parties was necessary in order that Canada might obtain the united effort of all those earnest in their desire to throw our full national force into the war. On the 25th May I proposed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier that a coalition should be formed in which both political parties should be equally represented outside the Prime Minister. Negotiation went on for about two weeks but eventually he declined my proposal for the reason that he was opposed to compulsory military service. I then determined that I should ask those Liberals who supported compulsory military service to unite in the formation of a government in which they would be fairly and equally represented. It was and is my purpose to include in such a government special representation of agricultural and labour interests. In seeking to form such a government I naturally placed my proposals before those Liberals who are in active public life and who must thus be regarded as leaders or representatives of their party. Negotiations with them have since continued but have not yet been concluded. I regret that my efforts for the formation of a government based upon a union of all elements prepared to carry on this war to a successful conclusion have not hitherto met with the success which I think they deserved. I am possessed, however, of considerable patience and persistence and I have not discontinued my effort. If Liberals in active public life to whom naturally one must first resort are not prepared to play the part which I think they should play in forming such a government it will be my duty to invite prominent Liberals not in active public life to join with me in consummating the national purpose which I have in mind. Thus I see my duty before me. I cannot agree that it is a time when the fortunes of the country should be entrusted solely to the determination of one political party. I hold on the contrary that at this juncture when the destiny of our Dominion and the whole Empire hangs in the balance I should, notwithstanding every discouragement, persistently seek to bring about a union of all men of good will in both political parties who are animated by the patriotic desire and determination of throwing Canada's full force into the winning of this war.

It is apparent from the terms of your letter that your views as to what has been accomplished and what remains to be accomplished, as to what conditions have demanded in the past and as to what they shall require in the future, are extremely divergent from those which I entertain. I greatly regret this; but under the circumstances I cannot urge you to reconsider your decision and I shall submit immediately to His Excellency the Governor General your desire to be relieved from your responsibilities as a Minister of the Crown.

Let me assure you in conclusion that I appreciate most deeply and sincerely the loyal service which you have given as one of my Colleagues during the past six years.

Your faithfully,

(Sgd.) R. L. Borden.

Hon. Robert Rogers,
Ottawa.

To this, I to-day received the following reply, dated August 18:

Ottawa, August 18, 1917.

My dear Sir Robert,

I have yours of yesterday's date and regret that it still seems impossible for you to see and realize the force of my reference to inaction and indecision. With every possible respect let me say that in my humble judgment, to me this is very plain.

You recount various important measures that have recently engaged the attention of the Government. In my letter of the fifteenth I was clear, and I was equally clear in our conversation of yesterday, in pointing out that it is, of course, accepted everywhere, that since the outbreak of war the Government have had forced upon them conditions the like of which no Government in Canada has ever before been called upon to meet.

I am indeed truly sorry to note your rather implied insinuation regarding political controversy. I think that on reflection you will admit that this was undeserved, or perhaps it is that you may have misunderstood me. It is quite true that I have always observed and always will observe respectful loyalty to my party, the party to which I will ever plead guilty to being devoted. When our opponents violated that now famous so-called truce and carried on, as they are carrying on to-day, their slanderous campaign, I believed then, as I believe now, that it was our duty to have taken steps in the interest of our party to counteract the effects of such campaign.

I entirely share your regret that your efforts for coalition during the past three months have been so unsuccessful. You well know that you had my earnest co-operation and support when making your proposals to Sir Wilfrid Laurier as official leader of the Opposition. You also had my support in your efforts to effect union with other leading Liberals in the House of Commons, for I quite appreciate that such a strong union under the present circumstances would have been most desirable. Of course, as you say, you still have a chance of a union from outside. I fear that at this period of our crisis that any such union that leaves the official Opposition intact is not likely to inspire much confidence.

Under these circumstances, I of course cannot help but deplore your admission that the fortunes of our country should no longer be entrusted solely to the party you represent. This admission, I am sure, will be read with feelings of pain by your friends in all parts of Canada.

I can assure you I will welcome the time when His Excellency the Governor General may be pleased to approve of my request to be relieved of my responsibilities as a Minister of the Crown.

Believe me, my dear Sir Robert, I am,
Yours sincerely,
(Sgd) R. Rogers.

The Right Honourable
Sir Robert Borden, G.C.M.G.,
Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

I have nothing to add to what is disclosed in the correspondence except that I desire to disclaim any intention to cast a reflection upon Mr. Rogers in that portion of the letter to which he alludes in his reply of the 18th August. I was merely stating my own position and I did not intend to cast the slightest reflection upon him.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, the resignation of the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) had been expected, as everybody knows, for some time past. It takes nobody, therefore, by surprise, but it comes under circumstances which had not been anticipated. The expectation had been that it was my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) who would ask for the resignation of the Minister of Public Works, but, it is the Minister of Public Works who tells the Prime Minister that he is not satisfied with his leadership of the party. The whole question resolves itself into one of party tactics; a difference between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Public Works. As to that, of course, neither we on this side of the House nor the country need have any opinion. The matter resolves itself, into not merely a party quarrel but a domestic quarrel, a difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and a prominent member of his cabinet as to the manner in which the Prime Minister sought to carry on the business of the country. If the resignation had come on a question of principle, I would have been justified in offering some comments upon it, as it would have been my duty to do, but it being a party and a domestic quarrel altogether, I do not feel warranted in offering any suggestions or observations. I have only this to say that, while I have had differences of opinion with my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden), yet on this, as upon all occasions, it has been my endeavour to discharge the duty with which I am entrusted according to the best light I possess, and to further the effort in which we are all concerned, viz., to participate in the most effective way possible in the high task in which we are now engaged.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY MR. JACQUES BUREAU DENYING THE ACCURACY OF A NEWSPAPER REPORT OF HIS SPEECH AT JOLIETTE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On my return to Ottawa yesterday my attention was called to an alleged report of a speech by me which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of August 20, and which is headed:

Declare Laurier will save country.

On page 4, column 6, there is a report purporting to give what was said by me at a meeting at Joliette on Sunday, the 19th August. Among other things, it is stated:

Particular stress was laid upon the crisis which the province of Quebec is facing to-day by Hon. Jacques Bureau, M.P. for Three Rivers.

Here are the words to which I take exception:

> He declared emphatically that, without Sir Wilfrid Laurier at its head, the French Canadian race would be extinct in a few years.

I declare emphatically that I never said any such thing. Mr. Speaker, it never has entered my mind that the French Canadian race would ever be extinct; I am a firm believer in the survival of my race. Further, it is stated in this report in quotation marks, as if it were the ipsissima verba of what I said:

> The English are trying to provoke us in order to exterminate us.

I deny emphatically ever having used that language or any other language which would justify or even suggest any such interpretation. Further, this newspaper reports me as saying:

> They will not be content with killing us; they will violate our wives and daughters; they will treat us as the Germans did the Belgians and the inhabitants of Northern France.

I never uttered those words nor any words that would carry such a meaning. I used no language which could be construed in any such sense. Not only did I not use such language, but I can sincerely say that no such idea was ever in my mind. I characterize this report as malicious and false, and as attempting to convey the impression that I insulted my fellow Canadians of English origin, and tried to stir up strife and disunion. What I did say was absolutely the contrary of what is represented in this report. In every word I uttered, I counselled, insisted, and prayed that the sentiments that should prevail ought to be sentiments of tolerance, of peace, and of moderation. That was the tenor of my remarks when I spoke about conscription, and that was the idea in my mind. I again qualify that report in the Montreal Gazette as being absolutely malicious and false.

COLONEL WILSON.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the Prime Minister, or the Government, aware that Col. Wilson, one of the most distinguished medical officers in the service of the Dominion, has been degraded and sent to France, the only excuse that we can find for it being that he happened to be a member of the Bruce Commission? Has the right hon. gentleman any information in regard to it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not heard of the matter to which my hon. friend alludes. I shall make inquiries in regard to it.

[Mr. Bureau.]

THE MILITARY VOTERS' ACT, 1917.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

The House again in committee on Bill No. 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917—Hon. Mr. Doherty—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 4, subsection 1, clause (c), special returning officers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This clause ought, I think, to be considered in connection with clause (d). I have grave doubts whether the leader of the Opposition ought to assume the responsibility of taking a part in the appointment of these special returning officers unless he also has the right to take a part in the appointment of the presiding officers. The presiding officers are the important officials; they are the ones who make the appointments as to the time of taking the vote, and, while they are called presiding officers, they are actually taking the same place as the returning officers in the carrying on of an ordinary election. It is to my mind absurd to convey the impression by this Bill that this is to be an election in the carrying on of which both parties are to have an equal voice, and yet, in respect to the most important officers, the men who have most to do with the holding of these elections, have the appointment controlled entirely by the Government of the day. These elections, so far as the soldiers' vote is concerned, are to be held under very extraordinary circumstances. Ordinarily when an election is held under the Dominion Elections Act there are voters' lists, and there are special days appointed for the nomination and the election, of which the entire public has notice. The candidates and their agents have an opportunity of being present. There is every opportunity to see that a fair election is held. In the case of the soldiers, there are to be no lists. Certain qualifications are called for under this Bill, but the only qualifications are that the soldiers shall be British subjects. Provision is made that if it is necessary in order to enable the soldier to cast his vote, the presiding officer may take his vote without any notice to the special returning officer or the scrutineers, or without any opportunity being given to exercise any care whatever in the taking of the vote. Therefore I say that, in order to give any appearance of fairness, the presiding officer ought to be chosen by both parties, just as are the special returning officers. I should like to have the minister allow this to stand in order that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who, I regret to say, is not very well, may have an opportunity of expressing his view with regard to this section. I have expressed my own sincere opinion with regard to it. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman would be prepared to accept the responsibility that is thrown upon him in reference to these minor officers, when he is to have no voice in respect of these important officers designated presiding officers under section (d).

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: I agree in the view expressed by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that the retaining in the power of the Government alone, without consultation with the leader of the Opposition, the appointment of the party who is to take the vote, is a most anomalous proceeding. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) has intimated the great desire of himself and the Government that everything in connection with this matter should be done with perfect fairness, and yet my hon. friend picks out the one particular official who has to do with the taking of the vote and retains the appointment of that official along partisan lines. Recently the votes of the soldiers of British Columbia were taken by returning officers appointed by the Government of that province on a referendum as to prohibition. Charges were made as to the manner in which these votes were taken by the officials who had power similar to that given under this Bill to the presiding officers.

Mr. TURGEON: That vote was taken in England?

Mr. MACDONALD: In England and in France, and these officers had powers of the widest description. My hon. friend here provides for the appointment of presiding officers by subsection (d) of section 4, which says:

(d) A sufficient number of Presiding Officers, who shall be military electors. They shall have and may exercise over designated camps and other places, subject to the provisions of this Part, the like powers, privileges, and functions as returning officers, particularly the power to appoint and direct sufficient Deputy Presiding Officers and Poll Clerks, who also shall be military electors. Deputy Presiding Officers shall have and may exercice in the camps or other places to which by Presiding Officers they may be assigned, subject to the provisions of this Part, the like powers, privileges and functions as deputy returning officers;

These are the officers who are to take the vote, and to have the ballots marked. An investigation has just been concluded in England and France by the committee appointed by the British Columbia Legislature, and that committee found that the election was conducted by a partizan returning officer appointed by the late Government in such a way that the whole referendum vote would be set aside on account of the numerous irregularities. My hon. friend takes great credit because he provides that after the marking of the ballot his partizan officer has the right to appoint certain officials to count the ballots. He states that the presiding officer can go around the camp with a bag, but there is no provision that it shall be locked. He gives this gentleman carte blanche to take the votes with or without scrutineers being present. He is not obliged to notify the scrutineers when he is to take the vote of the soldiers—the Act gives him absolute power and control, without anybody to supervise him. With all these possibilities to do various things open to these officers, in the light of what transpired in the vote on the referendum in British Columbia, the Minister of Justice says: Come and admire us for all our generous and fair provisions in this Bill, because, forsooth, after opportunity is afforded for all the harm to be done that could be done, we provide that, after the ballots come back, the scrutineer can have access to them. My hon. friend, after professing to be so particularly unctuous, is going to leave this essential part of the Act in its present absolutely weak condition.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As was stated last night by the minister, it is clearly a difficult matter to draft, in a satisfactory way, a statute to meet all the unforeseen conditions which may arise in the taking of the military vote. We all realize the difficulty in the mere drafting of such a statute. Under section 4 we have a multiplicity of officers, and it is very difficult to understand clearly what the duties of the several officers to be appointed under this section will be. I admit that this is a very difficult matter to make clear, and it would be difficult for any body of men to draft a statute which would meet everybody's views and demands. I suggest for the consideration of the minister that, instead of having an assistant clerk to the Crown in Chancery, a general returning officer, a special returning officer, a presiding officer, deputy presiding officers and scrutineers, it might be worth while considering the appointment of a non-partisan commission of six or eight, half of whom would be appointed on the nomination of the leader of the Opposition, and the other half by the Prime Minister, granting to this commission all the powers which the Bill proposes to give to the several officers mentioned in section 4. A great many questions may arise during the taking of the military vote, in Europe and Great Britain particularly, which one cannot foresee, and, therefore, cannot provide for in the statute. It seems to me that if a commission of six or eight, which was non-partisan in character, were given general powers sufficiently wide to meet all the exigencies which might arise overseas, possibly that would be the best method of taking this vote. I submit the suggestion to the committee and to the minister for consideration. Such commission, in which the House and the electors of the country generally would have confidence, would be better machinery for the taking of the vote than the appointment of the officers designated in the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: In reference to the observation of the hon. gentleman from St. John and the hon. gentleman from Pictou, I only wish to say that they seem to me to be wasting their time in demolishing the foundation for claims which I do not recollect having put forward. I may say at once that I have neither the ambition nor the anticipation of receiving their admiration. I am not particularly concerned with what people may think about my purposes with regard to this Bill, but I am very much concerned in getting as effective a Bill as can be got to attain the purpose in view. I do not think I am making a profession of any superior virtue, or being particularly unctuous, when I say I desire to work out the measure on as fair a principle as it can be worked out on, but while I desire to do that, I am not prepared to accept the suggestion that, with regard to this election, and to the law that should govern the election, this Government should abdicate the functions that belong to it, and which have belonged to the governments of Canada so long as there has been an election law. We must be responsible for this law. We are, because we happen to be the Government of the country, carrying all the responsibility with regard to all those matters which, under the general election law, have been in the hands of the government of the day as long as we have had an election law.

The suggestion is now made that we should hand this responsibility over to, or, at all events, share it on a footing of equality with the gentlemen who happen to be leading the Opposition. That comes pretty near to asking me to admit that this Government is unworthy of confidence; that I should alter the whole law of the country so as to take away from the Government all the ordinary functions that belong to it, and hand them over either to a combination to be formed of representatives of the Opposition and representatives of the Government, or, according to the suggestion of the member for Halifax, to a commission. At first glance, the latter suggestion appears to be not as absolutely objectionable as the first idea which evidently underlies the complaint of the two other gentlemen. Both these hon. members have pointed out that this presiding officer is precisely what the returning officer is in this country. Under our election law the appointment of the returning officer is made by the Governor in Council. Why should we depart from that in regard to the man who is to perform similar functions over there? The member for Pictou seems to have a very special objection to the man who is actually to take the vote; he looks upon him as specially untrustworthy because he is going to use a bag instead of a tin box. Do hon. members realize that he is not going to be appointed directly by the Government? This Government is going to appoint the presiding officer—that is to say, the man who will hold a position equivalent to that of returning officer in this country—and that presiding officer, who, it is stipulated, shall be a military officer, will appoint the deputy presiding officer.

Mr. MURPHY: He is to be a military officer?

Mr. GRAHAM: A military elector?

Mr. DOHERTY: He shall be a military elector. Under the letter of the law, he may be a private soldier.

Mr. GRAHAM: But he will not be.

Mr. DOHERTY: Having regard to the fact that the election will extend over a considerable district, including, if not more than one camp, at least a very large camp, reasonable people would think it well to appoint as presiding officer one who was accustomed to exercising general supervision and direction. I said "officer" because, to my mind, an officer would be a suitable man to appoint. At all events, he is to be a military elector, and he is to be appointed by the same power that appoints the returning officers here. His functions will consist of determining where polls shall be held, of making arrangements so that the vote may be taken, and of appointing a sufficient number of deputy presiding officers, who also shall be military electors, and who will take the vote. On the whole, in this country we have had honest elections for a very long time, and those elections have been held precisely under that system. I have endeavoured to adhere as closely as circumstances would permit to the law as it applies to elections in this country. That law has been accepted; it has been acted upon; there have been no complaints about it, and I thought that the proper course was to depart as little as possible from its provisions. When I was dealing with a new class of officers—officers to whom there are no similar officers under the general law—I thought it desirable to extend the opportunity to the Opposition to have fair representation among that class of officers. In view of the fact that under this Bill, just as under the law in this country, ample provision is made for the presence of scrutineers at the counting operation, one would hardly apprehend something fraudulent simply because the counting officer was appointed by this Government. It seemed to me, as matter of convenience, that it would be a great advantage if we could combine with the counting officers the representatives of the parties. It seemed to me also that, if practicable—and I think it would be—the operations of assorting the ballots and of counting them should be carried on simultaneously, as regards different constituencies.

Quite a gathering of people—even if you have in mind only the special returning officers and clerks—would be engaged in those operations, it would be desirable to have them perform the two functions. By adopting this plan, the absence of scrutineers or the impossibility of obtaining enough scrutineers to supervise
4 p.m. the operations of each special returning officer and his clerk, would not leave either party unrepresented. I have not claimed any credit or glory for that. In order that gentleman may not feel themselves impelled to argue that I should not be entitled to credit, I disclaim in advance any credit or any glory. But it does look to me like a practical method of ensuring an impartial counting of the vote. We have to deal with this novel situation: the ballots will be assorted from a bulk of envelopes applicable to all the constituencies of the country and then counted, under the conditions which I have mentioned, outside of the country—not as they are in Canada, by the individual who actually took them and who is called upon to deal only with a comparatively small number. There was reason, therefore, for taking pains to surround that operation with such precaution as would inspire confidence in everybody concerned. I am sorry that the only result of my endeavour to provide an effective way of counting the ballots of and safeguarding everybody's interests served simply as a pretext for an attack on me on the ground that I was debarring people from certain privileges which, under any law that I have ever known of, they have not previously had. With regard to the presiding officer, we simply adhere to the established law. With regard to this newly created officer, I have thought it desirable to make this provision—and I have not heard any criticism of this provision itself. All that has been said is that this involved some debarring operation, because I did not go on and do something more.

As to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, it is entirely for him to say whether he thinks it proper to avail himself of the authority which this Act proposes to confer upon him, and I have no observation to make on that subject.

As to the suggestion that we should appoint a commission to conduct the election, I of course want to be careful about the election, but after all, what is there about it to necessitate this new departure? What is there about it to necessitate the appointment of this commission, which appointment would in effect be an abdication of the duties and responsibilities of government on the part of this Administration? I cannot anticipate any specially complicated questions arising over there, but should they arise, we shall have over there precisely the same machinery to deal with them that we have in this country. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will be represented over there by the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery who is to be appointed, and who will have at his disposal all the advice that may be required for the purpose of unravelling any difficulties that may arise. I confess that my desire was to keep as closely as possible to our existing Dominion Elections Act as conditions would permit. I have been asked to allow these two subsections to stand over, and I have no objection to doing that, because I do not want to preclude any observations the right hon. leader of the Opposition may think it proper to make. I think I am correct in saying that subsection (e) is simply reproduced from the existing Soldiers' Voting Act, dealing with the provision for scrutineers.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite agree with the minister that the presiding officers and returning officers have always been appointed by the Government in power, but he must bear in mind that no provision is made here for scrutineers to be present.

Mr. DOHERTY: The presiding officer does not go into the booth at all.

Mr. NESBITT: He goes around and takes the vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: He appoints deputy presiding officers to take the vote.

Mr. NESBITT: Just as the returning officer appoints deputy returning officers. But the minister must bear in mind that under the Elections Act each party has a scrutineer in every polling booth, and I am unable to find any similar provision here.

Mr. DOHERTY: Subsection (e) of section 4 provides for the appointment of scrutineers, and confers upon them all the powers that scrutineers have on this side. Then subsection 3 of section 8 provides that:

> Where conditions make it reasonably possible, the deputy presiding officer shall give public notice of the time and place of an intended poll, and, in cases of polls to be held without Canada, a special notice to any person whose appointment as a scrutineer or deputy scrutineer has been communicated to him, with the request that he so notify.

So we have been at pains to provide for scrutineers wherever it is at all possible.

Mr. NESBITT: If the minister will read subsection 5—

Mr. DOHERTY: That provides for the exceptional case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is where the sting is.

Mr. NESBITT: If the two subsections are going to stand I have nothing more to say at present.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman's remarks would, perhaps, be more pertinent under subsection (e).

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are not the subsections so interlocked that we should consider them all together? We are conferring upon the deputy presiding officers extraordinary powers, which you do not find in the Dominion Elections Act, and which would enable the deputy presiding officers to succeed in having a large number of ballots put into the box or bag and counted, when the other party would have no opportunity of being present or having a voice in the matter at all. If the minister will pardon me for the suggestion, I would think that if these clauses stand the whole section should stand, because subsection 2 and paragraph (e) are so closely connected with the subsection we are now discussing. I think it would be of great advantage to allow this section to stand and proceed with section 5.

Mr. DOHERTY: In subsection (e) we are simply reproducing the provision with regard to scrutineers that exists in the present Soldiers' Voting Act, which was passed after a good deal of conference and discussion, and which I understand met the requirements as far as the appointment of scrutineers is concerned. I should like to pass those subsections that do not call for criticism, if there is anything in this Bill that does not call for criticism, and subsection (e), as I have said, is simply a reproduction of the provision in the present Soldiers' Voting Act. It is to enable each party to be represented, and the scrutineers are appointed by the Government only to this extent: six scrutineers are appointed by the Government, three on the nomination of the Opposition, and three on the nomination of the Government. Those six have unlimited power to appoint deputy scrutineers, who will have all the powers of scrutineers on this side. This provision has nothing to do with the administration of the Act itself. It is simply providing machinery to enable the respective parties to appoint all the representatives in the way of scrutineers that they desire, and conferring upon those scrutineers and deputy scrutineers all the powers and priviliges that belong to a scrutineer, or to the agent or representative of a candidate, under the Dominion Elections Act.

On subsection (e)—Scrutineers:

Mr. MACDONALD: The necessity for taking every possible care to prevent the contravening of this Act, is apparent to any one who looks at what has occurred in previous elections held. I have under my hand a report of the findings of the commission appointed to inquire into the overseas prohibition ballot, published in the Vancouver Daily Sun of August 15th, which deals with the methods in which votes were taken on the other side. It is only right the committee should be acquainted with the facts before the question of scrutineers is settled. In the report I find the following:

The evidence taken at the military records office will be found in the stenographer's report of the fourth day's proceedings of the commission. For convenience, however, we refer to one or two examples of what appeared to be fraudulent voting. The first card selected for examination was that of William Brillat, No. 155063. Brillat is supposed to have voted at Crowborough on the 22nd of December, 1916, whereas the military records show that Brillat deserted on the 16th September, 1915, and had not since been reported.

The second card selected was that of Arthur Bacon, No. 429173. The military record showed No. 429173 to belong to Albert Alfred Bacon. In the one case the residence of A. A. Bacon is given as Vancouver, and that of Arthur Bacon at Victoria. Captain Sellon produced the military record of Albert Alfred Bacon, No. 429173, which showed that this man went to France on February 3rd, 1916.

Another card selected for examination was that of Alfred John Knight. It appears that four votes had been cast in this man's name, and in each case the number is given as 707244. The records show Alfred John Knight, No. 707245, 103rd Battalion, and Mr. Helmore's cards prepared from the poll books show that he was a resident of Victoria on three of the occasions when he was supposed to have voted and on the fourth occasion a resident of Vancouver. In each case the votes were cast at Epsom convalescent hospital, three times under the name of Lonergan as presiding officer, and once under the name of H. A. Douglas as presiding officer. The correct number of Alfred John Knight was 707245, the only other A. J. Knight on the records was No. 80, and he belonged to the C.A.M.C.

Another example of a fraudulent vote was found in the case of Oscar Edward Hawes, No. 487388, he was returned as having voted at Crowborough on December 22nd, 1916, the records show that Ortho Ewart Hawes, No. 487388, was killed in action on October 8th, 1916

Another case of illegal voting was that of a man who voted as Walter Lyness and William Lyness respectively, and in the one case the number is given as 183060, and in the other case no number is given. In one instance the residence is given as Vancouver, and the other as Alberni. He is supposed to have voted at Hastings on December 15th, 1916, and at Crowborough on December 21, 1916. The records show only one man of the name of Lyness, and his number is 183060, but his name is Wilbert Lyness, belonging to the 7th Battalion, who was reported missing on October 12, 1916.

Out of the total number of 132 parcels of votes, the following in England were taken without any notice to the scrutineers acting for the prohibition party and were therefore not sealed by the prohibition scrutineers: Parcels No. 25, 26, 27, 31 to 41 inclusive, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53 to 60 inclusive, and 82. In France, the parcels of votes taken without notice to the prohibition scrutineers were as follows: 83 to 89 inclusive, 95, 98, 99, 100, 107, 115, 117, 120, 121, 124, 125, 126, 128 and 131.

According to Mr. Bayley's evidence the voting in France was in charge of Regt-Sergt-Major H. A. Douglas and Sergt. Pyle. Douglas did not, while he was in France, have any proper receptacles to put the ballots in as they were polled by the voters, but he and his deputy returning officers appear to have carried them around with them from place to place and finally deposited them with the Agent General in London—

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what this Bill provides for.

Mr. MACDONALD (reading):

—on January 12, 1917, in proper cardboard receptacles. It would further appear that although Bayley requested Douglas to allow him to put his seal on all parcels of votes which he had, he, (Douglas) did not allow him to do so and also that a large number of polls were held in France of which the scrutineers of the prohibition party had no notice, or such short notice that it was impossible for the scrutineers to arrange to be present at the polls either personally or by deputy.

From our own personal experience in visiting military camps in France, we think there was no legitimate reason why such notice of every poll held in France could not have been given as would have enabled the scrutineers for both parties to be present at the taking of every poll. In connection with the taking of the vote in France, between December 14 and December 31, it is worthy of note that, in a letter from general headquarters by the adjudant-general for the commissioner-in-chief of the British armies in France, dated November 25th, 1916, a statement appears to the effect that at that time the number of men who had not voted was estimated at 2,533. The votes purporting to be taken in France between the dates mentioned, numbered 4,131, according to the report made by Douglas.

A number of witnesses were called before the Commission and examined. The first witness was Pte. Carl Henry, No. 154254, C.A.M.C. He stated his residence to be Vancouver, and that he had voted twice. He understood one was an election and the other a by election. He was not positive whether he had voted on prohibition the first time, but was definite as to voting on prohibition the second time at what he believed to be a by election.

The next witness was Pte. Leith Gordon, No. 22058, a Winnipeg man. He testified that while he had signed some papers he had not taken any oath whatever, but that he had marked a ballot. This witness stated that he had been told by someone in the camp that any man who had resided in British Columbia could vote.

"When did you reside in British Columbia?"

"I resided there six or seven years ago."

Sergt-Major George Parker Cruikshank, No. 54014, testified that he belonged to the 18th Battalion of London, Ontario, and that he had enlisted in Galt, Ont., his place of residence at the time of enlistment, that he had never lived in British Columbia. Cruikshank stated that he had argued the point with his senior as to his voting and was informed "that it does not matter whether you have lived there or not so long as you have been there." Cruikshank swore that he had just signed an envelope and had not marked any ballot paper.

Sergt. John Beauchamp Daly, No. 432441, gave evidence that his place of residence was Edmonton, that he had only been in British Columbia on two occasions, once in Vancouver for three days, and once in Fort George for a day or two. This witness stated that he had voted against prohibition. He was asked the question: "How did you know about the poll?" He answered: "I was coming in the gate of Pass and was called into the orderly room just inside the gate. They said: 'Have you ever been in British Columbia?' I said 'Yes. I was in Fort George once and Vancouver another time.' They said: 'That is all right then. You are entitled to vote". They gave me a form and I voted."

Pte. Creil Everard William Reginald Durden, No. 147890, 78th Battalion, Winnipeg, stated that he signed an envelope, but did not mark a ballot.

Sergt. Lee Bernard Cogan, No. 6316, stated that his residence was Detroit, Mich., and that he had never been in British Columbia and did not vote, though his name appears in Lonergan's poll book as having voted.

Pte. Edgar Field, 8th Battalion, No. 45, gave his residence as Winnipeg, and stated that he had not actually voted, but that he had signed an envelope on the outside.

Pte. John Gage, 2nd Battalion, Eastern Ontario, No. 401017, stated his place of residence was Detroit, Mich., that he had voted but did not know on what question. He had signed an envelope which had not been read over to him.

Sergt. Cecil A. Hamilton, No. 13106, 5th Battalion, gave his residence as Saskatchewan. He stated that he had voted at the polling at Epsom Camp in the fall of the year. He signed the affidavit form but did not take an oath.

Corp. Frank Taylor Harrop, No. 108274, stated that his residence was 1146 Zuill street, Medicine Hat, Can. He voted at the election but stated that some one marked his ballot for him. Pte. Vivian Potter, Battleford, Sask., stated that he had signed an envelope at the time of the polling at Epsom, but had not voted, nor was he sworn. He had not resided in British Columbia with the exception of six months in the winter of 1909-10.

Sergt. William Henry Bradley, No. 13081, 5th Battalion, stated his residence to be Saskatoon, Canada. He had been in British Columbia from the winter of 1911 until July, 1912, but not since that time. He signed his name to an envelope but did not take an oath.

Corp. Ralph Percy Biggs, No. 12968, 5th Battalion, stated his residence to be Swift Current, Sask. Some one asked him if he would vote for a wet province. He signed his envelope and marked his ballot.

Pte. Samuel Egginton Hodgins, No. 464666, Manitoba Hotel, Yates street, Victoria, swore to having voted twice on the prohibition referendum, once in London and once at Epsom. He stated that Sergt.-Major Lonergan, the presiding officer, told him that the first voting was off and he was to vote a second time.

On July 3, 1917, your commission proceeded to Seaford and the following witnesses gave evidence: Major Pringle—

That is the Dr. Pringle of Yukon fame.

—senior chaplain at Shornham camp said that he notified Sergt. Trim that he had been appointed scrutineer for the prohibition party and to notify him when the vote was to be taken. Major Pringle asserts that he received no notice and Sergt. Trim admits that he gave none.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. What has this to do with this Bill?

An hon. MEMBER: Everything.

Mr. CURRIE: We have had obstruction of all kinds, but this is the most flagrant obstruction we have had during the session. I ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to whether this is in order.

Mr. GRAHAM: This shows how the Bill will work out.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): I understand this is going to be used by the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) as a reason why this law should not be enacted. I understand that the hon. gentleman proposes to use what he reads as an argument against the Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: He proposes using it to stop the passage of this Bill; to hold it up.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend (Mr. Currie) interrupts me to distract attention from the point. (Reading):

Major Pringle was in a position to act at any poll held by Trim had the latter given him notice.

Corp. William Harrison Welsh, No. 703426, 102nd Battalion, said that his residence was Vancouver and that he had voted for the second time on the B. C. prohibition referendum at Epsom during the first week in January, 1917. He stated that the man who took his vote at that time was Regt. Sergt.-Major Lonergan. He told Lonergan that he had voted before at Bramshott at the end of July or the first week in August, 1916. He was informed at Epsom by Lonergan that they were only holding the prohibition by-election. The votes before were not good. They had been ruled out or something.

Asked how he fixed the date of his second vote as the first week in January, 1917, he replied: "I left Irmstone hospital at Eastbourne on the 30th day of December, and it was not till eight or nine o'clock that night that we got into Epsom convalescent camp, and it was four or five days after that I went out and voted."

On being asked the following question by the chairman: "Were there many who voted at the same time you did?", the witness replied: "There was a big line-up. They voted there three or four days."

Then this evidence goes on—

An hon. MEMBER: Read it all.

Mr. CURRIE: Read the ads. too.

Mr. MACDONALD: I hope my hon. friend will be instructed by this, although

I have no confidence in my ability of being able to do that.

Mr. CURRIE: It is not relevant at all.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do not worry about that. (Reading):

Private Henry Ashdowne, No. 706108, 103rd Battalion, residence 950 North Park street, Victoria, swore that he had voted twice on the prohibition referendum, once in September at Bramshott and once in December, 1916, at Seaford. At Seaford he informed the sergeant that he had already voted at Bramshott. The sergeant replied: "That does not matter, the voting is being taken over again."

Corp. Harold J. Cowherd, No. 706880, 103rd Battalion, residence Victoria, said he also voted twice, once at Bramshott and once at Seaford in December, 1916. This witness gave as a reason for voting the second time the following:

"It seemed they came around and told us that the vote was cast out, or irregular. We naturally thought it was in order."

Pte. Arthur Leadbetter, No. 706995, 103rd Battalion, 1211 Pembroke street, Victoria, said he voted once at Bramshott, and stated: "When we came down again they said there was something the matter with the election so they called a parade again and we all voted.

Pte. Arthur Page, No. 707235, Victoria, voted once at Bramshott on the prohibition referendum and voted again at Seaford in December, 1916, on the same question. He was asked the following question:

Q. Would you mind explaining to the commission how you came to vote a second time?

A. We were given to understand that the first vote was no good.

So they go on in detail in regard to this matter.

Sergt. Pyle stated that when taking votes in France in September, 1916, there was always a scrutineer present at the polls he took,—

Which shows that there is no reason why a scrutineer should not be present.

—but there was not always a scrutineer present during the polling in December. Sergt. Pyle stated that he had no receptacles for placing envelopes in—that he simply tied the envelopes up with tape or string and sealed them with wax.

Now, I have concluded this report. The commission reported that the evidence before them indicated:

That grave frauds and irregularities were committed and that the regulations laid down for the taking of the vote were in many instances not observed.

The commission go on to deal with specific classifications of votes and they point out cases where the identification numbers and names do not agree with the record or else the numbers given had never been allotted.

It is noted by the auditor that more than one-half of these 532 cases were polled at Epsom Convalescent hospital, and that the voters concerned had no connection with British Columbia, either through themselves or their relatives.

Mr. CURRIE: Was this a non-partisan commission appointed by the legislature of British Columbia?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR: The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. This was a commission of three partisans.

Mr. MACDONALD: In this case it must be observed that what they were dealing with was a non-partisan question.

Mr. CURRIE: How can the hon. gentleman draw any conclusion with regard to this Bill from the reading of a report that is not relevant to it?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am dealing with the taking of the votes under an Act of the legislature.

Mr. CURRIE: A different Act altogether from that we are considering.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman does not know anything about the Act I am talking about. He has not seen the Act dealt with in the report. The point I am making in regard to this matter is that I am here dealing with a matter which was a non-political question. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) will not dispute that. The political parties in British Columbia did not divide on the question of prohibition according to whether they were Liberals or Conservatives and on taking that vote on a non-political question the circumstances under which the vote was taken were as they are disclosed by this commission. The point I want to make in regard to this is that, when we are undertaking to deal with the taking of a vote on the question as to who are to be the members of this Federal Parliament, the provisions of the Act ought to be such that it would not be possible for conditions to arise such, as this report indicates, did arise in the taking of the vote on this non-political question. There we have evidence, for instance, with regard to the question of scrutineers. The direct and positive statement of this commission after having investigated the matter was that there was no reason why there should be any provision for dispensing with scrutineers even in France, much less in England, where the men are in camps or in hospitals and where the whole thing can be done as regularly as it can be anywhere else. Even in France the position is such that provision should be made for scrutineers where a presiding officer may be appointed who would not be absolutely non-partisan as he ought to be.

I submit that, with respect to the clause concerning scrutineers and, in fact, all of the provisions made here, we on this side are seeking only, and my object in reading this extract from the report of conditions in British Columbia was only to impress the Minister of Justice and the Government with the fact that these irregularities, errors of the gravest possible character, double voting and voting in the names of men who were dead, or in prison, or absent, were conditions that would only entail scandals on this country after an election, no matter what the result was, and why should we not endeavour to so frame this Bill as to prevent the occurrence of these things?

Mr. DOHERTY: We are on a section which provides unlimited power of appointment of scrutineers to the respective parties. That this may have some bearing on a subject that arises later on in the schedule, is the strongest possible argument in support of this particular subsection which is providing the unlimited right of appointment of scrutineers to each party. When we come to the question later on as to their being notified, etc., we shall try to deal with that; but surely the hon. gentleman does not suggest that what he has read is a reason why we should not provide scrutineers, and this subsection is simply providing for scrutineers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They are all so connected together that it is entirely proper—

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman seriously thinks this is so connected with the others, it can stand with them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I want to convince the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would do it without being convinced.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister cannot throw me out in that way.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If my hon. friend must speak, we cannot stop him without closure, I suppose.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to say to my hon. friend that he has no right to stop a member of this House at all, and he has no right to threaten any member of this House with closure.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Later on.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend can apply closure whenever he pleases. But let me tell him that in the discussion of an important Bill he cannot throttle the members of this House. He has not the power to do it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The minister said he was quite willing to do as the hon. gentleman asked without the hon. gentleman speaking, but he is not satisfied.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have a perfect right to state my views, and I want to take the opportunity now of calling the attention of the minister to the fact that, under the clauses of this Bill which provides for the appointment of a partisan presiding officer who is to take the position of the returning officer and allowing that man to appoint the deputy presiding officers, in whose appointment the leader of the Opposition is to have no voice, the opportunities for irregularity and fraud will be far greater than they were in the case of the taking of the vote on prohibition in British Columbia.

I wish to call attention also to the provision with regard to scrutineers. It provides that the deputy returning officer may go around with a box or bag and take the votes of the soldiers and that while provision is made for giving notice to scrutineers, yet if the deputy presiding officer chooses to do so, he may take the vote without any notice to scrutineers. Then I would call attention to this fact, that all these deputy scrutineers are to travel about without pay, they are to follow these deputy presiding officers whenever they are taking the votes, and they are to get no pay. They are not even to get their travelling expenses.

Mr. CURRIE: When did the hon. gentleman pay Tory scrutineers?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: When he was a Tory.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend thinks he can justify a Bill like this, which will enable the will of the bona fide electors to be thwarted, on any ground that these deputy scrutineers should not be paid even travelling expenses, he is welcome to entertain that view. What I say is, that under the provisions which the minister has made with regard to these deputy scrutineers, these partisan deputy presiding officers may take the vote, may travel as they please, if this Bill is to go through in its present form. I think the minister ought to see, and I trust he will see, that it demands consideration and that the suggestion we have made that these presiding officers should be non-partisan is a reasonable proposition. All we on this side want is to see that the soldiers' vote is honestly taken, to see that the soldier votes once and only once, and to see that the votes of the honest Canadian boys at the front shall not be overturned by the votes of the people who may be willing to vote two, three or four times, just as was done in the case that has been cited.

Mr. WRIGHT: How does the hon. gentleman propose to have any man appointed whom somebody could not charge with partisanship?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just as the minister proposes in regard to the inferior officers. He proposes that, in the appointment of the special returning officers, the leader of the Opposition shall name one and the leader of the Government shall name one alternately. I would do the same with returning officers.

Mr. WRIGHT: You propose that there should be two returning officers, one appointed by the Government and one by the Opposition?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all. I would suggest that they should agree upon one and if they fail to agree he should be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. The Bill provides that the Prime Minister shall name one special returning officer and the leader of the Opposition shall name the next one, alternately, until they get the requisite number, and the leader of the Government shall name a clerk and the leader of the Opposition a clerk to the extent that may be necessary. But in respect to the important officer who is to appoint all these deputy presiding officers who are to control the election, I say he should not be partisan, and the fact that no provision is made for the payment even of the travelling expenses of the deputy scrutineers would show the very strongest reason why the presiding officers, who are really the returning officers to hold the poll, should be non-partisan so far as their appointment is concerned. That is why I think all this section should stand if any clause ought to stand, because they are all so linked one to the other. I would again urge upon the minister what has been urged so well by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that it is necessary that every possible safeguard should be placed in the Bill in order to prevent fraud and irregularities.

That is especially important, where there are no lists and the vote is to be taken by the presiding officer travelling around from camp to camp. I think the suggestion of the hon. member from Halifax, that a non-partisan commission should be appointed for taking the votes, is a good one. That is one alternative, and the other alternative is that the returning officer be appointed jointly by the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. STEVENS: I merely wish to clear from the minds of the committee a misunderstanding which might result from the statements of the hon. member from Pictou. The investigation which was held into the taking of the British Columbia soldiers' votes referred only to the taking of the plebiscite regarding prohibiton and which was extended beyond the time for the general election in the province, from September 14 until December 31. With regard to taking the soldiers' votes in the regular election, there was, I think, perfect satisfaction on both sides. A lawyer from Montreal, Mr. A. Reeves Hall, represented the Liberal party in Great Britain and France in taking the soldiers' votes, and at the conclusion of the election he wrote a letter in which he stated he was perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the vote was taken. I am not aware of a single criticism or protest being filed regarding the taking of soldiers' votes during the period of 42 days previous to September 14, which related to the election of members of the legislature. But by the Bill of the British Columbia Legislature, the taking of the plebicite for prohibition was extended beyond the date of the election, until December 31, as a result of that, certain irregularities were alleged, and I believe the commission which was appointed by the British Columbia Legislature demonstrated to the satisfaction of the public that these irregularities occurred. But my hon. friend from St. John and the hon. member for Pictou are needlessly alarmed regarding the taking of the vote under regular arrangements and regulations, such as are provided in this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why?

Mr. STEVENS: For the reason that this Bill provides that both political parties in this House shall be represented by scrutineers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not always.

Mr. STEVENS: Why, most certainly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: The difference is that, as my hon. friend suggests, instead of the Government naming the presiding officer, he shall be named jointly by the leader of the Opposition and Prime Minister, and if they disagree, he shall be nominated by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that where two political parties are concerned they are naturally going to name their friends as officers to represent them, but this Bill provides that, in addition to the presiding officers, there shall be scrutineers at every poll, named by the leader of the Opposition, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, and named by the leader of the Government, so far as the Government party is concerned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I want to correct the hon. gentleman. It is not necessary in all cases that scrutineers shall be appointed. That is left, in certain cases, to the judgment of the deputy presiding officer as to whether there shall be notice of the poll, and it is also left to his judgment to say whether he shall take the vote without any polls being held at all, if he thinks it is reasonably necessary to take a man's vote. Thus, if it should appear that a man would not be able to attend the regular poll, his vote may be taken.

Mr. CURRIE: That applies to taking the vote of the wounded men. How could you take them any other way?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not limited to the vote of the wounded. It is left entirely to the judgment of the deputy presiding officer. If he thought a man was going to leave England within a certain time he could take his vote. No one can review his judgment, and, therefore, the result is that you allow the partisan deputy presiding officer, at his own whim and pleasure, to take hundreds or thousands of votes, and nobody would ever have the right to question whether it was necessary to do so or not. My hon. friend says that notice must be given in every case. That is not so. Section 8, subsection 3, says:

> Where conditions make it reasonably possible, the deputy presiding officer shall give public notice of the time and place of an intended poll.

But he is to be the judge, and the sole judge, as to whether it is reasonably possible or not. I mention these things for the purpose of meeting the suggestion of my hon. friend from Vancouver, that we have no right to demand that the presiding officer should be non-partisan in his character.

Mr. STEVENS: I suggest to the hon. gentleman that we are not on section 8. We will come to that some time to-morrow, perhaps, but we are now discussing the question of scrutineers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But does my hon. friend not see that, if we go along step by step, and the various sections are carried, finally we will have the whole Bill carried, with all these iniquitous, unfair and unexampled provisions in it, and we are powerless then. If we pass this section, when we get on to another section which is related to it, we are told that section so-and-so was passed, and we cannot refer to it again. As one member of this committee I shall endeavour to the best of my ability to point out, if I can, in a way to convince the minister—if not to convince the minister then perhaps it would not be unreasonable to hope that I might convince some members of the committee on the other side—that that provision is unreasonable, and ought not to be adopted. We cannot make a perfect Bill, but we want to make it reasonably perfect. We say that the Bill as we now have it is absolutely imperfect. It provides no guarantee that we will secure the expression of opinion of the honest voters, but it gives an opportunity for dishonest deputy presiding officers, and for dishonest voters, to override the will of the honest voters. The Minister of Justice has stated that he has never heard any complaint as to the conduct of partisan returning officers and deputy returning officers. My hon. friend has really and truly been in a state of innocence during his political life if he has not heard any such complaint.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the hon. gentleman ought to keep himself somewhere near the section. This section makes it possible to appoint scrutineers, and it goes no further. Has the hon. gentleman stated one word of objection to the subsection? He does not say that he does not want the scrutineers. He is discussing a lot of other things he wants, and, among them, two subsections which, at his request, I allowed to stand. With all respect, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it is difficult to carry irrelievancy further than that. We should have to sit here and listen to a discussion with regard to those two subsections, which, at the request of the hon. gentleman, I have allowed to stand. I submit we ought to proceed according to rule.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister raise a point of order?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the Chairman decides the point of order, I would like to call his attention to the fact that the reason for not passing paragraph (e) at the present time applies equally to paragraph (c) and the hon. minister yielded to the request as to paragraph (c).

Mr. DOHERTY: I might have added, that about three-quarters of an hour ago, at the request of the hon. gentleman from St. John I agreed to let subsection (e) stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the minister allowed that section to stand, that is something gained. Does the minister not think he should let subsection 2 stand, because that provides that the deputy scrutineers shall not be allowed even their travelling expenses? If there is not to be a non-partisan presiding officer surely some provision ouhgt to be made for the payment of actual travelling expenses incurred by the deputy scrutineers.

Mr. DOHERTY: That subsection is not yet before the committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has been dealing with other provisions which were not read.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have been lead into temptation.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The minister has pointed out something that I think the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) should not overlook; that is, the desirability of keeping as closely as possible to the clause under discussion. I know that it is difficult to adhere strictly to the clause under consideration, but hon. gentlemen are old parliamentarians, and I hope that they will endeavour to keep within the rule.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the minister is going to be pernickety about that, I suggest that the whole section be read. We are taking an irregular course, at the minister's own suggestion, of dealing with particular subclauses. The proper course is to take up the whole section.

Mr. DOHERTY: May I correct the hon. gentleman? His persistence in making statements in regard to which he is mistaken is remarkable. We began reading the section right through and it was on the suggestion of the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that we proceeded to take the matter up subsection by subsection. I think that was a very reasonable suggestion; if we wanted to deal with one thing at a time, it is the most desirable way of proceeding.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was not complaining of the suggestion of the member for Halifax. What I complain of is that the minister is trying to confine us to one particular clause. The very idea of having a number of clauses in a section is that those clauses are related to each other. It very often happens that you cannot with propriety adopt one of those clauses without knowing what is to be the final language of another. All these sub-clauses are closely related. For instance, there is the question whether these presiding officers are to be non-partisan, and there is the question of the power given to a party to have scrutineers and deputy scrutineers. If you are going to have a partisan presiding officer, the least the Government could do is to provide that the Opposition, that has no voice in the appointment of presiding officers or deputy presiding officers—men who may be of a most partisan character—should be allowed something to pay the travelling expenses of scrutineers. These men are to be the watch-dogs who will see that, in some measure at all events, these presiding and deputy presiding officers discharge their duties in an honest and non-partisan way. You cannot intelligently discuss one of these clauses without having some reference to the others. I think the minister was unduly critical of my course. It is our duty to consider this Bill as carefully as we can.

Mr. MORPHY: As I read subsection 2, the scrutineers may be paid their actual travelling and living expenses. The matter, therefore, that the hon. gentleman complains about is apparently provided for in the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The three scrutineers are allowed their travelling expenses, but the deputy scrutineers, the men who are to go round and see that these partisan deputy presiding officers do their duty, get not even their travelling expenses. Let me read the provision for my hon. friend.

Mr. WRIGHT: With regard to that point—

Mr. PUGSLEY: One at a time, please.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If the member for St. John objects to the interruption, he has the right to proceed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) made the statement—inadvertently, I am sure—

Mr. MORPHY: There was no inadvertence about it; I read from the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman said that these scrutineers were to be paid. In subsection 2 it is provided that the deputy scrutineers shall not be reimbursed out of the funds of Canada any sums whatever.

Mr. MORPHY: I was referring to the hon. gentleman's direct statement that scrutineers were not paid anything for expenses.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend was not listening carefully, because I used the words "deputy scrutineers."

Mr. COCHRANE: The Conservative scrutineers are not paid, so that they are all on the same footing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the Minister of Railways desire to speak? We should all welcome his special opinion.

Mr. COCHRANE: If others would not speak so much we would get on much better.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am glad to see that the Minister of Railways is getting back to health and strength again. He is a good fighter, and we should all be glad to hear from him with regard to this Bill. What I say is that we ought not to be asked to consider subsection 2 until we know what the Government proposes to do with regard to the appointment of these presiding officers. If they are to be non-partisan, then we need not be so particular about these deputy scrutineers.

5 p.m.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I rise to a point of order. A few moments ago the Minister of Justice said that subsection (e) should stand. There is nothing before the committee now to discuss. If we are discussing any particular subsection I would ask that the chairman read it so that we shall know what we are considering.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is well taken. Subsection (e) stands; subsection 2 is not before the committee. Rule 55 says:

> In proceedings in Committee of the Whole House upon Bills, the preamble is first postponed, and then every clause considered by the committee in its proper order; the preamble and the title to be last considered.

I would prefer to read, so that order may be preserved in the committee, the remainder of the section before the discussion is proceeded with:

> (2) Such officers and functionaries and their deputies, clerks and assistants, except scrutineers and deputy scrutineers, may be paid and reimbursed as the Governor General in Council may provide, authorize or allow; scrutineers may be paid their actual travelling and living expenses only, at a rate to be fixed by the Governor General in Council; deputy scrutineers shall not be paid or reimbursed out of the fund of Canada any sums whatever.
> (3) Before in any manner acting under this part, the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, general returning officer, his chief election clerk, and every presiding officer, special returning officer, deputy presiding officer, poll clerk, and clerk of a special returning officer, shall be sworn to the faithful performance of his duties.
> (4) The Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the general returning officer and his chief election clerk, shall be sworn before a judge of a court of record; presiding officers, special returning officers and clerks of special returning officers, before the assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a regimental or battalion commanding officer, notary public or official authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the country where such duties are to be performed; deputy presiding officers before a presiding officer or any of the officers or functionaries hereinbefore named; and poll clerks before a deputy presiding officer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would suggest that subsection 2 should be allowed to stand for consideration, together with paragraphs (c) (d) and (e), all of which relate to the payment of special returning officers, presiding officers and scrutineers. To my mind it is unreasonable to ask the leader of the Opposition to assume responsibility for the carrying on—

Mr. DOHERTY: I rise to a point of order. The committee has decided that the clause regarding the appointment of presiding officers shall stand, but the hon. gentleman persists in discussing that clause, when what is before the committee is the question whether payment shall be made to certain officers or not. I have endeavoured to be considerate to the hon. gentleman and have met every request that he has made, but I cannot help seeing at this moment that when I accede to one request for a subsection to stand he makes that the ground and reason why the next one should also stand. To be perfectly frank, there was absolutely no reason advanced by the hon. member for St. John upon which one could rest a contention that the section relating to scrutineers should stand, but I consented to let that stand because he asked for it. As I have already pointed out, this provision already exists in the Soldiers' Voting Act, and so does the subsection we are dealing with now. If we are going to make progress with this Bill at all, the hon. gentleman should realize that it is hardly reasonable to ask that every section and subsection, as it comes up, shall stand. The reason I consented to the standing of the provision with regard to special returning officers was that it was represented to me that the right hon. leader of the Opposition was not present, and would like to speak on it. I, of course, would not refuse a request based on that ground, but I would point out to the hon. gentleman that he is getting to a stage where it is impossible for me to close my eyes to the fact that he is simply endeavouring to abuse my readiness to try to meet him, by endeavouring to have every section ordered to stand as it comes up. This Bill is before the committee to be dealt with. I do not want to curtail fair discussion of any portion of it, but I cannot undertake to say that we shall allow all the subsections to stand after the hon. gentleman has talked all he wants about each one of them, and then further goes on discussing them after they have been allowed to stand. I think we must try to get down to some regular method of procedure, and I appeal to the hon. gentleman's own sense of fairness. We are here to do business, and we cannot do business if, after we have allowed a section to stand, we still have persistent argument about that section and are prevented from going on to the consideration of other sections as they come up.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the minister has allowed the section to stand, that is all right.

Mr. DOHERTY: I allowed the provisions with regard to the payment of presiding officers and the subsection with regard to scrutineers to stand. We are now on subsection 2, and I have not as yet heard the hon. gentleman address himself to the discussion of that subsection, except that he has suggested that it ought to stand because of certain arguments that he made with regard to a previous subsection.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the minister does not desire to see that I am addressing myself to subsection 2. I do not want to offend the minister, but I do not propose to allow him to lecture me in regard to the course I shall pursue in this committee. The minister has one course open to him: he can gag discussion in this House if he chooses, by applying the closure. Hon. gentlemen may do it; they are in the majority.

An hon. MEMBER: We can do it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let them try it. I invite hon. gentlemen who make these threats to try it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Why does he want to talk on the section after it has been allowed to stand?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I shall exercise my own judgment. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken if he says that subsection 2 has been allowed to stand. If that is so, I will take my seat.

The CHAIRMAN: Subsections (c), (d) and (e) were allowed to stand. The subsection now before the committee is subsection 2, relating to the payment of election officers.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not want a bad precedent to be established. I think the Minister of Justice is entirely in error when he says that because a section has been allowed to stand, either by the leader of the Government or some one else, hon. gentlemen are precluded from further discussing the section. It very often happens that hon. gentlemen who may not be present on future occasions wish to place their remarks on Hansard when they have the opportunity. The minister will remember, if he was faithful in his attendance last week, that after the Minister of Finance had decided at a certain hour that the Canadian Northern Railway Bill should be held over till this week, discussion proceeded for an hour afterwards.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is not addressing himself to the question before the House. I think it is about time that something was done to get the business of this country proceeded with. The people will not stand for this deplorable waste of time; it is ridiculous.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Moosejaw was rather questioning the decision of the chairman.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was answering the Minister of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN: I have ruled on the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. KNOWLES: I did not understand him to raise a point of order. I should like to know what his point of order was.

The CHAIRMAN: His point of order was that as subsections (c), (d) and (e) were allowed to stand they could not be further discussed. I ruled that the point of order was well taken, although, of course, I should not interrupt an hon. gentleman who was making a passing reference to the subsections that had been allowed to stand.

Mr. KNOWLES: If you will allow me to respectfully make one observation, I would submit that a minister cannot shut off discussion on a section by saying that it shall stand. He must have the consent of the House before he can pass from that section. I submit, therefore, that I was quite in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: If it is desired to reopen the discussion on the subsections that have been allowed to stand, I have no objection, but as we are now on subsection 2, I should be glad if the hon. member would confine his remarks as much as possible to that subsection.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would you decide that because we are on subsection 2 we cannot deal with any other part of the Bill which has relation to subsection 2? As I understand Your Honour's ruling, it is that we must take the clauses in order, and that implies and involves we must discuss them intelligently as they relate to other portions of the Bill. That is all we ask.

Mr. NESBITT: I have no desire to delay the committee, but I would like the minister to take into consideration what my hon. friend from St. John has said with reference to clause 2, that the deputy scrutineer's expenses are not paid. I see no reason why their travelling expenses should not be paid, if they have to travel any distance.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is as fair for one as for the other.

Mr. NESBITT: Surely. as far as that is concerned. At the same time, if they have to travel any distance, I think it would be only fair to pay their expenses. I only put this forward as a suggestion to the minister, because I think he wants to do what is reasonable and right in the matter.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I have already stated, this provision, as well as the preceding one, are reproduced from the existing Soldiers' Voting Act. With regard to the suggestion that we should pay the expenses of deputy scrutineers, their number is left entirely in the discretion of the party which is to be represented, just as on this side of the Atlantic the candidate determines how many agents or representatives he requires. If we provided for payment of those deputy scrutineers, we could hardly undertake to allow the liberty which I think each party ought to have to provide the number of representatives it requires. On this side of the Atlantic the parties provide their representatives, and there has never been a suggestion that the people of the country should pay for them. The suggestion now made is that persons who are there purely as representatives of political parties should be paid by the general public. I must confess this hardly commends itself to my judgment. It would certainly be a new departure. Both parties at every camp and every place where there will be voting will have their adherents. No one suggests that in any camp there will not be many Liberals as well as many Conservatives. The deputy scrutineer at a particular camp would in all probability be a man appointed from that camp, so that if the parties act reasonably in providing their representatives there will be very small expenses involved. In any event, the function of these officers is purely and simply to be party representatives, and in all our past history I do not know of a case where the public authority has been asked to pay the expenses of purely party representatives.

Mr. NESBITT: As a matter of fact the candidate pays it.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is paid by the candidate, or the party, or whoever the funds may come from. In any event, it is not paid by the Government of the country, that is, by the people generally. This is another instance in which we are merely following what is a general and well-established practice and custom, and to pass a law providing for the payment of the expenses of such an indefinite number of party representatives might entail upon the country an expense which certainly I am not in a position to foresee at the present time. Aside from that, it would be a new departure in principle if we should provide for the payment of the travelling expenses of party representatives. It may be suggested that we have departed from the principle to the extent of the six scrutineers who are to be jointly appointed. But at the time Parliament passed the existing legislation, that action was thought justifiable under the circumstances, so that if it were considered necessary or desirable by either or both parties to send three representatives from this country to take charge from the party point of view of the conduct of the election, that they at all events would be enabled to go over there and have their expenses paid. Then it was put into their hands to provide all the deputy scrutineers they thought proper for their respective parties in the manner they thought most effective and best. I do not remember that at the time this legislation was adopted it was urged that we ought to pay the expenses of those party representatives.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think a moment's reflection will show that subsection 2 is closely related to paragraph (d). I do not see how we can fairly dispose of the former until we know what disposition is to be made of the latter. If those presiding officers as provided for by paragraph (d) are to be non-partisan, selected by the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, then there is not the same necessity for scrutineers, because they will be careful to have the deputy presiding officers also non-partisan in character and fairly representative of both sides. I submit to the committee, however, that if the minister should insist that we are not to consider paragraph (d) open for amendment, and that the right to have partisan presiding officers should be retained, then the Liberal party should not be compelled to pay the expenses of deputy scrutineers to go around to the various camps in England and in France and see that those partisan deputy presiding officers do their duty. I do not think that would be reasonable, and that is why I respectfully submitted my suggestion to the minister, not imagining for a moment that I would arouse his ire, that subsection 2 and paragraph (d) of subsection 1 should be considered together. The minister says that under no circumstances should those deputy scrutineers be paid. It is all very well for the minister to say that, when he has the appointment of the men who are to carry on the elections, who are to control the elections, who are to take the vote, and who may go around, as provided for by the other dispositions of the Bill, in charge of the ballots. It is all very well for the minister to say the Government party will pay their own scrutineers, but our position is different. If subsection (d) passes in the language in which it is at present drawn, we would have no voice in the appointment of those deputy presiding officers. They would be appointed by and in the interests of the Government party. However, if the minister insists upon subsection 2 being considered now, without waiting to dispose of paragraph (d), of course there is nothing for me to do but interpose my objection to it.

It has not been made very plain how these votes are to be taken. We have been told how the vote shall be counted, that the ballots are to be put into this bag, but I submit to the committee that the important thing is that the votes shall be properly put into that receptacle. So far all I have been able to learn about these officers, whose pay we are providing for, is that somebody will go round the country with a receptacle into which he is permitted to put votes. We are told that we may have scrutineers. I have no idea how many of these men will be engaged in taking the vote or at how many places those votes will be taken at the same time. Will there be any particular number of those places at which votes will be received? How many scrutineers will a man naturally need to have in order to be represented at these polls? It is absolutely impossible to apply the machinery of an election in Canada to the branch of the election which is to be conducted as provided for in the Bill. It is no use to attempt to apply that machinery which is made for the ordinary home election to an election taken in France, or Great Britain. The minister says to us: "You can appoint your scrutineers at home; why not do the same thing abroad?" When an election is going on in my own county I know a few people in every polling district. I can trust my friends in each polling district to see that the poll is being properly conducted. A great many of them would not ask any payment for doing it—perhaps none of them would—but here we are told that the same machinery is to be transferred to France, where I do not know anybody, where I have not the faintest idea of how many polls there are going to be and in regard to which this Bill does not help me. The minister says to me: "You can appoint a scrutineer." I do not know how many places I will have to arrange for; I do not know who may be taking the vote; but the minister says: "this is what happens at home and this is what you must do abroad." What has been suggested by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) is what strikes me as the only fair and decent way to everybody; that is to appoint a non-partisan commission. Let them all meet together, and go around together and take these votes.

Then there should be confidence and an opportunity of avoiding those horrors which happened in the British Columbia election. As to asking us to pay for the scrutineers and giving us an opportunity of doing so, I regard it as absolutely impossible for myself to be represented in England, France, Belgium, Scotland and all those places where a soldier may be found and in which I have not the faintest idea where a poll will be held. If I had the money of a Vanderbilt, and was able to pay all the men whose employment is suggested under this Bill, I cannot see how the thing could be done. The whole thing, as the Prime Minister has said, is absolutely impracticable and impossible.

Mr. MORPHY: With respect to clause 2, it has occurred to me that the Minister of Justice has got into trouble because he has been too fair. It is difficult for me to conceive of anything that is fairer than this clause. Hon. gentlemen complain that scrutineers are not paid. Paragraph 2 says:

> Such officers and functionaries and their deputies, clerks and assistants, except scrutineers and deputy scrutineers, may be paid and reimbursed as the Governor General in Council may provide, authorize or allow; scrutineers may be paid their actual travelling and living expenses only, at a rate to be fixed by the Governor General in Council; deputy scrutineers shall not be paid or reimbursed out of the fund of Canada any sums whatever.

The functionaries mentioned in that section are to be paid.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who are they?

Mr. MORPHY: Such officers and functionaries, and their deputies, clerks and assistants, as are taking the election, except scrutineers and deputy scrutineers—

Mr. PUGSLEY: All appointed by the Government.

Mr. MORPHY: Never mind by whom they are appointed; we will come to the question of partisanship later on. They are to be reimbursed as the Governor in Council may provide, authorize or allow. Scrutineers may get their actual travelling and living expenses. Outside of this second paragraph, there is a paragraph referring to scrutineers and deputy scrutineers. Who are they? If you will refer to subsection (e) you will see that it provides that:

> Any scrutineer may, by writing, appoint any necessary deputies—

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Any necessary deputies. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) says: We do not know how many there will be. There will be as many as may be necessary and each party shall name its own particular scrutineers. There are allowed to the Liberal party under this Act three scrutineers and they can appoint as many deputies as they like and they can send them where they please. The Conservatives can do the same thing for the conduct of the election. There is absolute fairness between the parties. The minister has gone further in this Act than any minister has ever been known to go in the history of partisan politics in Canada when he has given to the Opposition the right to appoint scrutineers to represent them, to preside over the election and to count the ballots. To my mind the hon. gentlemen opposite are unfair in their criticism. The Minister of Justice has brought it on himself because of his extra fairness in departing from what has been from time immemorial held as a Government prerogative that governments conduct the elections by their own officers appointed by themselves. The moment that this Government gives a concession to hon. gentlemen opposite, we have the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) talking, and talking, and talking by the hour over a clause which he was told was to be allowed to stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not by the hour.

Mr. MORPHY: Yes, really by the hour. Although the clause had been allowed to stand the hon. gentleman talked persistently and travelled entirely abroad from the clause, apparently approaching pretty close to the idea of obstruction. Is the hon. gentleman wishing to cast an aspersion on the ability or intentions of their own scrutineers? Does he mean to cast an aspersion on the conduct of this election by the men whom his leader will appoint? Can he not trust anybody? Can the hon. gentleman not trust men appointed by his own leader? What is the matter? What has gone wrong with the mental attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite who are imbued and thoroughly soused with suspicion about what is one of the fairest clauses ever put upon the statute book, giving hon. gentlemen a chance of preventing unfairness, giving them the right to name officials contrary to the past practice, applying the principle of fifty-fifty, three Liberal scrutineers to three Conservative scrutineers and giving them every facility to see that the election is conducted honestly, and yet the suspicion is still there, still engendered in the individual minds of, I am thankful to say, a few only of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would tell me at how many places and by how many officers the vote will be taken on the same day.

Mr. MORPHY: It is not for me to say that. I suppose that is all worked out in the Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the good of having these six scrutineers when we may have thirty places at which votes are being taken?

Mr. MORPHY: Deputies could be sent there.

Mr. TAYLOR: If hon. gentlemen would think a little about the conditions they would not see so many difficulties about the deputy scrutineers. Deputy scrutineers would be soldiers residing and on duty at the place where the ballot was to be taken. They would have no travelling to do in ordinary cases, because a strange soldier would not be nearly as proficient to act as scrutineer as one familiar with all the men stationed at that polling place. Then these men are already under pay as soldiers. Their pay would not be diminished, and if they had to travel, as some hon. gentlemen apprehend, they could only travel by permission of their superior officers. The Government, both in France and England, control the railways and issue transportation to soldiers, who cannot travel except by permission, so that in practice there would be no difficulty about travelling expenses of deputy scrutineers or their living expenses while on duy.

Mr. McKENZIE: May I point out the difficulty. Suppose a vote is being taken at a certain camp in England. There may be dozens of people from my county there of whose whereabouts I do not know, and I should be absolutely helpless in trying to find some one to represent me.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman is no worse off than any other member.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was speaking generally; every one is the same.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Every other hon. member is the same except in this, that the Government appoints the men to carry on this whole business of taking the vote and the country pays for them. The Liberals of this country pay as well as the Conservatives. We pay all of these returning officers and deputy returning officers.

Mr. ARTHURS: Not the scrutineers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You do not need scrutineers if you have deputies. You will be careful, il I know you well, to have the right kind of men as deputy returning officers and as deputy presiding officers.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Good, honest men.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no doubt of that. But unless the minister changes his mind there is to be no voice by the Opposition in the appointing of the presiding officer or the deputy presiding officers. Take myself or the hon. member for Cape Breton as an example. What do I know about selecting a deputy scrutineer in France? Will the commanding officers allow the soldiers to act as deputy scrutineers? I doubt very much if they will. They have other duties to perform and it will simply mean—

Mr. EDWARDS: Perhaps they would not let them vote because they have military duties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is different. They might let them vote but might hesitate about letting them perform political work in the way of representing a political party.

Mr. ARTHURS: It is quite impossible in most cases, especially in France, to have other than military scrutineers, as civilians would not be allowed to go to the lines where it would be necessary to hold most of the polls.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister is proposing an election which would be similar to an election held in Canada without the opportunity for people to be represented at the polling places, and I submit again that the only way to do that is by a commission.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the proposal is a reasonable one and that the minister should consider whether the deputy scrutineers should be paid their travelling expenses. It has been pointed out that the Government appoints the returning officers and they will naturally be friends of the Government. They will be men in whom the Government have every confidence, and they will feel that the election will be held fairly, as far as they are concerned, by the officers whom they appoint. The only officer who will represent the Opposition at the poll will be the deputy scrutineer. There are six scrutineers, but I presume these six will be reserved for the counting of the ballots after the election is over and that it is not pretended that these six scrutineers who are appointed and whose expenses will be paid can be present at the various polls where the election is held. Consequently there is no way in which the Opposition can be represented at the different polls excepting by the deputy scrutineers, and as the officers who take the poll are Government officers, appointed by the Government and paid by the Government out of the funds of the country, is it not fair to consider whether the deputy scrutineers should not also be paid? I think it is. I think it is a proposition the minister ought to consider. I have no doubt that the Minister of Justice desires to give us a fair ballot and that there should be fair play on both sides. We all know it would not be likely to be a fair election unless both sides were represented at every poll where ballots were taken.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did the hon. member say both sides?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I did.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thought there was only one side now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then they have all come to the Liberal side?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should say that officers should be present to represent the Opposition in every poll where votes are taken, otherwise you cannot expect to have a result in which the people will have confidence. It is not like an election in Canada, where a man has his friends in every polling district, who take an interest in his election. That we all know is the practice in Canada. But it is a very different thing when we are carrying on an election in a foreign country among men scattered in various places, none of us knowing where they are and it being impossible for us to be fully represented. Consequently the circumstances are so entirely different that I think the minister ought to take that question into his consideration.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is the hon. member contending that the Opposition should have the privilege of sending men from Canada to England or France to act as scrutineers in the interest of the Opposition?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, I would not suggest that it would be advisable to do that. I do not think that could be done. I have no doubt that men on the other side, soldiers or civilians, will be selected who will have leisure to attend to these matters. It would be very expensive indeed to send men across the ocean, and I do not think that would be practicable. But there may be some expense in connection with travelling and attending to places where the vote is taken, and I think that that would be a legitimate expense for this country to bear.

The language of the section is rather peculiar. It says: "the deputy scrutineers shall not be paid or reimbursed out of the fund of Canada." I do not know any money that is described as the fund of Canada. I have heard of consolidated revenue, but I do not think this is the ordinary legal language. The impression given by this section is that there is a fund somewhere that is not the fund of Canada on which one side, at all events, professes to draw in order to pay its officers. I suppose that is the inference; it is a fund but not a fund of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman from North Perth should not complain about hon. members on this side of the House discussing this question, in view of the statement of the Prime Minister that one of the questions which occasioned the Government a great deal of care and worry for a long period was in regard to the soldiers' vote, as is referred to in the correspondence with the ex-Minister of Public Works, when the Prime Minister pointed out that the Government had spent a long time in preparing this Bill and bringing it to Parliament, with tremendous detail. I think the hon. member should withdraw the suggestion that we are discussing this Bill unduly. Voting is to take place in France and England, and hon. gentlemen say there is no use in arranging for civilian scrutineers, as the scrutineers must be in military service. Where is the provision that, if a man wants a vote taken in a particular camp, he is to have the right to go there, and that transportation will be given to him? My hon. friend from Cape Breton might discover some friend over there whom he would like to have appointed scrutineer in a certain district. This man may come along and get his rations, but he is not going to get any money for his trip. The Government has the lists of all the men overseas, and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are not in the same position in that respect. How are people to know, when engaged in a contest in a county here, whether the interest of particular candidates over there are being looked after?

Mr. COCHRANE: Our three men from the Opposition will nominate the scrutineers.

Mr. MACDONALD: These men are not going to be omniscient. Suppose the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton has a battalion in a particular place, and desires to appoint some friend to be deputy scrutineer, to see that the vote is properly taken, how would it be worked out? Apparently the voting is taking place simultaneously all over; the soldiers are not going to vote in one camp one day and in another camp another day.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman from Cape Breton would have nothing to say about it. The three men nominated over there would have the say.

Mr. MACDONALD: But they do not know everybody from Vancouver to Sydney, and the only way they could know would be by my hon. friend from Cape Breton, or some one else, writing them and saying he would like to have a certain man appointed scrutineer.

Mr. MORPHY: Every member is in the same position.

Mr. MACDONALD: I know that. How is the man he might want to have appointed scrutineer to get his expenses? I should like to have that question answered.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I have explained several times that this is the section that exists in the Soldiers' Vote Act, and the question was all threshed out when that Act was passed, and this is an entirely novel suggestion that the people of Canada should be called upon to pay party representatives. The hon. gentleman asks: where are we going to get the transportation for the gentleman the hon. member for Cape Breton will select as scrutineer, and who will have to travel from place to place? If an election is being held in Montreal and I determine I would like to have a man from Vancouver to act as my scrutineer, I do not know what reception I would get in the House, if I came and said the people of the country should pay the expense of that gentleman from Vancouver. I must confess I have difficulty in following the reasoning that suggests that the expenses of party representatives on each side should be paid by the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman is discussing this question as though the hon. member for Cape Breton was going to select his personal friend to be scrutineer for him. If hon. gentlemen look at the Bill they will see we are not undertaking any gigantic scheme to provide scrutineers for individual candidates. If any hon. gentleman thinks he can afford that luxury, we will not prevent him, but we are following the method which met the approval of this House when the Soldiers' Vote Bill was passed. That leaves it open to the party to provide themselves with such representatives as they desire. We give them absolute liberty in that regard, and recognize all the representatives and give them machinery to provide for representatives, but we feel that, when we have done that, we can hardly be called upon to go further, and pay the expenses of these representatives.

Just as candidates in Canada find scrutineers available at the places where they are required, I should think the representatives of the respective parties would be able to find persons at the different places where polls are going to be held whom they could appoint as deputy scrutineers. It was not really incumbent upon Parliament to make this legislation to provide for party representation at all, but we have done it because it seemed to us a fair thing to do, under the circumstances. To suggest that it should be pushed further, and that we should impose upon the people of Canada the expense that properly belongs to the respective parties is a suggestion which it is quite imposible for me to accept.

Mr. McKENZIE: No person, so far as I know, is looking for any charity from the Minister of Justice in regard to any legitimate election expense that the candidate should bear, but we are looking for an opportunity for proper representation of each party at every place where the poll is to be taken. Let the minister form a commission under this Bill; let the Government appoint some competent man as chairman, with whose appointment we will have nothing to do. Let an equal number of men be selected on each side, and let the Opposition pay their share of the expense, and the Conservatives pay theirs. Then the commission could report, and could assure us that every vote was taken.

Then we shall know that things will be done in a proper and honest way. Under this provision certain persons have the right to travel around the country trailing bags after them, with the opportunity of piling into those bags the ballots of men that they meet on the streets. Yet I am told that we have nothing to complain of. The hon. minister says: a scrutineer will be appointed; we will not pay him; you can pay him if you like. Is that a satisfactory answer to the suggestion that these officials will be trailing bags around with them and filling them up with paper; that the fate of the people so far as government during the next five years is concerned will depend upon what those officials put in those bags? That is what I complain about. The provision is not fair; it is absolutely partisan; it is capable of producing absolutely scandalous results. We have evidence from British Columbia that on a non-partisan question—that of whether liquor shall be sold in British Columbia or not—corruption of the worst kind developed; there was double and treble voting; rascality in its worst form was perpetrated. If these things happened in such a case as that, what will happen in this case, during the full force and agitation of a Dominion election? We have reason to suppose that under this law conditions will be a thousand times worse than those that prevailed in British Columbia. I have to run my election in Cape Breton county and so far as the vote of the soldiers is concerned I shall be absolutely unrepresented. The minister says that if he should want a scrutineer to look after his poll in Ste. Anne division, he himself would have to pay for that man's services. That is no answer; that does not touch the point at all.

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said, this is not a matter that affects any particular member. It affects every member of the House; it may affect each member in the same way. I have listened to the discussion during most of the afternoon, and I have not heard any reason why the number of deputy scrutineers who may be appointed by the scrutineers is unlimited. I assume from what the minister said that the deputy scrutineer will correspond to the scrutineer who acts inside the polling booth during an election in Canada. If that be the fact, I should like to know why an unlimited number of these scrutineers may be appointed. I should also like to have an explanation from the minister with regard to the expression referred to by the member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair): "the fund of Canada".

Mr. DOHERTY: To answer the last question first, I think that probably the letter "s" has been left out; it being intended that the word "funds" should be used as designating the moneys of Canada. It is not intended to convey any other sense than that no money of Canada shall be paid to these people.

Mr. MURPHY: Then it should not pass in that way.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. DOHERTY: I will have that corrected. As to why we allow an indefinite number of scrutineers, it is not possible for us to anticipate how many scrutineers each party may require in order to provide themselves with representatives at the polls and at all the different operations of counting that will be carried on. We therefore leave it to each party—each party being represented by its three scrutineers—to name the deputy scrutineers. The reason why we do not limit the number of deputy scrutineers to be appointed is in order that each party may be able to provide whatever number it deems necessary. It is prescribed how many representatives each party may have at a particular operation, such as the taking of the vote. We are now dealing with how many people may be empowered under this Act to act as representatives or agents. We leave it to the discretion of each party as to how many they may require. I do not see that we could definitely prescribe the number. One party may think they need more than another; neither party is in a position to determine at the present moment how many persons they may require as agents. That will depend upon the number of polls that may be held. The intention is to provide as many polls as may be needed to enable us to offer opportunity to all the soldiers to vote. Just in proportion as the voters may be more or less scattered, you will have to have a greater or less number of polls. It is impossible, therefore, to define how many occasions there may be for a party needing the services of a representative. When we come to the particular operation, of course each party is entitled to a definite number who shall be present, say, at the taking of the vote. At the taking of a poll each party is entitled to have one representative, but where a number of polls are held at the same time a party may need large numbers of representatives, if it is to be represented at all, at each of the polls. That is why we left this mater to the discretion of the respective parties.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MURPHY: When the House rose for dinner the minister had just explained the reason for not limiting the number of deputy scrutineers to be appointed, and the probable disposal of them in case of an election. Did I understand him to say that there was some provision in this Bill similar to that in the Dominion Elections Act, which prohibits more than two agents for each candidate from being in the polling booth at the same time as an elector?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, the provision will be found in subsection 4 of section 8, which provides that:

> The deputy presiding officer shall permit any scrutineer or deputy scrutineer, or, in the absence of both, any one military elector, to be present at any poll, and to act thereat as agent on behalf of any party, with the powers of an agent of a candidate at a poll held under Part III.

The only difference between this provision and the similar provision in the Dominion Elections Act is that we are imposing on the deputy presiding officer the obligation of permitting one scrutineer on behalf of each party rather than two. We cannot, of course, provide for representatives of the individual candidates, or we might have to have 468 scrutineers at each taking of votes.

Subsection agreed to on division.

On subsection 4, section 4—Before whom sworn:

Mr. MURPHY: I observe that some of these officers may be sworn before a regimental or battalion commanding officer. Is there any authority empowering a regimental or battalion commanding officer to administer oaths other than that contained in this Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: The only other provision that I know of for their administering the oath is when the soldiers attest. The Military Voters' Act of 1915 confers this power upon the officers.

Mr. ARTHURS: I would suggest that the minister add, after the word "officer," in line 6, the words "or officer in charge of an independent unit." I have in mind certain cases where large bodies of our troops in France are not in charge of a regimental or battalion commanding officer. For instance, the three Canadian tunnelling companies who are now at Ypres, and have been there for the last year and a half, are under the command of a captain or major. They are called independent companies and number about 800 to a company, the three companies comprising in round figures about 2,500 men. There are other cases of this kind where isolated bodies of Canadian troops in France are not in charge of a regimental or battalion commanding officer—in connection with the divisional trains, for instance.

Mr. MURPHY: Would the suggested amendment of my hon. friend be wide enough to cover cases similar to the ones he has cited, though perhaps not exactly analogous?

Mr. ARTHURS: I think so.

Mr. DOHERTY: While I am willing to accept the suggestion, we are dealing here only with oaths to be taken by officers under this Act, not with oaths to be taken by the individual soldier who comes to vote. Most of these captains would probably be able to find some other officer who was empowered to administer the oath. But I am quite willing to accept the suggestion, as it might be useful.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the form of oath to be taken by these different officials included in the Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: No form is provided. The provision is that they shall be sworn to the faithful performance of their duties. It did not appear to be necessary to make a special form.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not so particular about the form. But what record will remain as evidence that the oath was administered and taken? There should be something of that kind among the papers.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think it is necessary for us to specially prescribe here that a record shall be made of the taking of the oath. This whole provision is to form part of the Dominion Elections Act. We are prescribing for those things which are to be done differently from the procedure under the General Elections Act, and what we are providing here to be differently done is as to the persons before whom the oaths may be taken. I am rather under the impression that the form with regard to these oaths under the general law, whatever it is, would apply here, but I will look into the matter and make sure.

Mr. MURPHY: The record of these oaths is usually returned in an envelope with the ballot box.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: Do the deputy scrutineers have to be sworn?

Mr. DOHERTY: They would require to be sworn if they took any part in an open vote, just as scrutineers have to be sworn under our present law, if I remember rightly, when a man has his ballot marked for him. But for the ordinary performance of his duties, the scrutineer is not an official acting on representative public authority in any way, and there is no provision requiring him to take the oath merely because he is a scrutineer.

Mr. GRAHAM: He takes the oath of secrecy?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, in cases where he is called upon to be present when a voter marks his ballot.

Mr. MURPHY: He takes oath at the beginning of the poll, and that applies to the whole day?

Mr. DOHERTY: I will look into it. If the general Act requires it, of course it will be followed.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the general Act apply in this case?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no provision that this part is to be read as forming part of the general Dominion Elections Act. It is really made part 4 of that Act. We make exceptional provisions in this part. As I understand it, the rest would apply where applicable.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not take up paragraphs (c) and (d) of section 4?

Mr. DOHERTY: Before we take them up, I might point out that I was asked to let them stand, because it was suggested that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition would probably desire to say something upon them. As he is not present now, would it not be as well to let these paragraphs stand and take up some of the other sections, because we will probably have to come back to these sections when he is present.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The leader of the Opposition told me he was unable to be present to-night, and he authorized me to state his view to the committee. As the minister seems anxious to get along, I would not like to have these paragraphs delayed, and it is not the desire of the leader of the Opposition that there should be any delay. He stated to me that he regards it as extremely unfair that he should be given the right to name a certain number of the inferior officers, who really have no control whatever over the election, and in regard to the presiding officers, who take the places of the returning officers where the election is held in Canada under the ordinary provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, he should have no voice whatever, and that the Government should have the whole right of appointment, thus making them partisan officials. He thinks there should be in paragraph (d) exactly the same provisions as are contained in paragraph (c). Therefore, in order to make them conform, I move in amendment, seconded by Mr. Lemieux:

That paragraph (d) of subsection (1) of section 4 be amended by inserting the word "even" after the word "sufficient" in line 1 of the paragraph, and by inserting after the word "electors" in line 17 the words "half of the number of such presiding officers shall be nominated by the Prime Minister and the other half by the leader of the Opposition."

If I have the permission of our genial friends who occupy seats behind the treasury benches, I would like to make a few remarks in respect of this amendment.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. gentleman recognizes his masters.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I submit this is an eminently fair and proper amendment, and if it is not accepted it will afford to the people of this country conclusive evidence that this Bill has been so designed as to permit fraud and irregularities in the taking of the soldiers' votes. That is the conclusion which inevitably will be drawn from the course of the Government in respect of the Bill. The Bill provides now that the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition shall have the right to nominate an equal number of special returning officers, also that the leader of the Opposition shall be allowed to nominate three scrutineers to act jointly with the scrutineers nominated by the Prime Minister. The reason for making that provision is because it is recognized that the soldiers' vote is to be taken under most exceptional and extraordinary circumstances. It is recognized that there are a large number of votes to be taken, and that it is desirable there should be some provision made in the way of safeguards to prevent unfairness. In the case of an election being held in Canada under ordinary circumstances, no such provision would be deemed to be necessary, and no such provision has been made. But, admitting it is necessary to create safeguards along those lines, I would ask you if it is fair simply to allow the leader of the Opposition to have a voice in the naming of the inferior officials, of the men who have no real control in connection with the holding of the polls and the taking of the votes, and to decline to give him that right and privilege in respect of the higher officers who have all to do with the taking of the vote, with the holding of the polls, and who should exercise absolute fairness and impartiality in order to assure a fair and honest election.

The greatest possible opportunities are necessarily afforded by this Bill for fraud and irregularities. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) cited instances of gross fraud and irregularities in the taking of the votes of soldiers from British Columbia at the front in respect to a question which was not in any sense of a partisan character. If that were likely to occur in that case, how much more likely is it to occur in this case where there are partisan deputy presiding officers and where there will necessarily be, as there always is in elections, a partisan spirit and a desire on the part of those to whom is entrusted the machinery of the election to win the election for the party with which their sympathies are and the party which has appointed them to discharge this duty. We might avoid that to a very great extent if the presiding officers were appointed jointly upon the nomination of the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition. I can see no reason why the Government should allow this in the case of the inferior officers and refuse it in the case of those who are really the important officers and upon whose impartiality and fairness rests the proper conduct of the election. I am authorized by the leader of the Opposition, upon whom is imposed by clauses (c) and (e) the duty of joining in the choice of the inferior officers, to state that he considers this Bill will fall far short of giving a fair and reasonable opportunity for an honest and impartial election if the same right is not conferred upon him under clause (d) to join in the appointment of the presiding officers.

The Bill gives very wide powers to these presiding officers, particularly to the deputies who are appointed by the presiding officers. They have very great powers. They are allowed to exercise a wide discretion and in many cases, if they see fit to do so, they may take the votes without any notice whatever to the scrutineers and without the candidates of either political party having any opportunity to say a single word in regard to it. I do appeal to the Minister of Justice, if he cannot accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that there should be a non-partisan commission to attend to the whole matter, to accept the suggestion and act upon the request conveyed through me now by the leader of the Opposition, who is not able to be present to-night, that the same provision be inserted in clause (d) with respect to the appointment of the presiding officers, as the minister has inserted in clauses (c) and (e) with respect to the special returning officers and scrutineers.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that the hon. gentleman is moving in amendment that clause (d) should be made to correspond, in so far as the nominations are concerned with clause (c) and that we may take it that (c) is not objected to. I would like to get at it in a regular way so that we could take up the discussion of the amendment to (d) and therefore I would suggest that we dispose of clause (c) first.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would think that the three clauses ought to go together.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not quite see what we gain by allowing clause (c) to stand while we are dealing with (d) and moving to amend it by applying the principle of (c) to (d). Unless it is assumed that the principle that underlies (c) is approved, why should we be seeking to add it to (d)?

Mr. PUGSLEY: While the leader of the Opposition might be fairly called upon to perform the duty of taking part in the nomination of presiding officers, special returning officers and scrutineers, a duty which he is quite willing to perform, I think it an outrage—and I think I can speak for him when I say it is an outrage—that he should be called upon to perform that duty with respect to the minor officers and should be refused the privilege of performing the same duty in respect to the higher officers.

Mr. DOHERTY: Am I to understand that if the amendment to (d) were not carried then clause (c) would be looked upon as an outrage to the leader of the Opposition? As I understand that the reason why we cannot deal with clause (c) by itself is that if we do not amend clause (d) then clause (c) stands as an outrage to the leader of the Opposition? I have heard many observations during the course of this discussion that have surprised me, but I confess that none has surprised me more than the suggestion that it is an outrage to the leader of the Opposition to confer upon him this right which is conferred by clause (c). I can grasp the complaint, although I do not think it is a well founded complaint, that the same authority is not given him in regard to those officials to be appointed under clause (d). But I have a good deal of difficulty in seeing where the outrage presents itself in the fact that we extend the right to the leader of the Opposition to nominate half of the gentlemen who are to do the counting. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) has spoken of the minor and inferior officers and people of no importance at all in the conduct of this election. I respectfully beg to differ from him in that regard. I ask the House what criticism we should have been subjected to if, when we, dealing with a new class of officers—a class of officers that does not exist under the Dominion Election Act, a class of officers for whose services there is no occasion in a general election, a class of officers who are to be responsible for the proper counting and return of the ballots—we had not given the leader of the Opposition the right to have a say in the selection. That strikes me as a very important part of the work of an election. There was a very wise gentleman, who wrote a large number of articles replete with wisdom, and written in a most eloquent brogue, who put it forward as a suggestion for the settlement of the difficulties which eventuated in the Boer war that if he had been allowed to he could have settled the matter perfectly—that he would have been quite satisfied to allow them to give votes to whomsoever they chose provided only that they would allow him to count the ballots. I think that there is no operation of more importance than the counting of the ballots.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is more important to get them in the bag in this case.

Mr. DOHERTY: We will come to that in a moment. To represent it as an operation of no importance, of so slight an importance that it is an outrage on the leader of the Opposition to give him the opportunity of appointing one-half of the people who are going to do that counting and, furthermore, to provide that no counting shall be done without one officer of his nomination being present at it, is a statement that I frankly confess I am incapable——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The member for St. John will probably withdraw the word "outrage" if the minister will tell us he will accept the amendment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Call it an insult.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am asked to agree to an amendment to clause (d) as a condition to my refraining from making any observations about the section that is objected to. I cannot quite grasp what the objection to clause (d) is. It has been offered to withdraw the word "outrage". If that word is withdrawn, then I would understand that the objection made to clause (d) is withdrawn, because that is the only objection I have heard. However, it is for the leader of the Opposition to determine what is the proper course for him to take in regard to clause (c). It was not inserted with any intention of offering offence and it is a matter of surprise to me that it should be suggested that there can be a word used to indicate that there is anything offensive in it. As regards the amendment, I do not know that it would be useful for me to go over what I said this afternoon. When we come to deal with this amendment we are dealing with a class of officers who have existed under the Elections Act so long as we have had elections; and the universal practice has been that the Government should appoint them and be responsible for their appointment, as the Government must be responsible for the carrying on of the election. Now we are asked to abdicate that function simply because it is soldiers whose votes are going to be taken under the direction of each presiding officer; for it is not a question of the deputy presiding officer but of the presiding officer. It is soldiers' votes that are to be taken in France and England and the suggestion is that because that happens it necessarily follows that we ought to call in the Opposition to share with us the duty of appointing these public officers and, naturally, the responsibility for the carrying on of the election. I have not heard any reason advanced that could not be equally applied to the appointment of returning officers in this country. I am not at all prepared to accept the argument that because a man is appointed to a public office to do the business of the state, by the Government, that he is necessarily a partisan, and such a partisan as will abuse his position to give advantage to the party to which the Government which appointed him happens to belong. In all frankness, do we all stand here charging the returning officers in all the constituencies of Canada, ever since there has been a Dominion and we have had elections, with having been that kind of partisan and with having subjected the members of this House to injustice? I think the implication is most unfair and not justified by the facts or by experience. There may be cases where a returning officer, because he was appointed by a certain government, or not so much because he was appointed as because he individually happened to be an unscrupulous partisan, has abused his position. But I have been through two elections and in each case the party to which I was opposed was in power; they appointed the returning officer and he appointed deputy returning officers, and I never had ground to complain against that gentleman; I never saw that he did not perform his duties perfectly fairly and impartially from start to finish, and I am quite satisfied that hon. gentlemen from every other constituency can give the same testimony. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that because a man is appointed to this important public office by the Government, that necessarily means that he is going to be a partisan of the type that will violate his oath and abuse his office for the purpose of favouring the party represented by the Government which appointed him. That is the one reason that is advanced. We have never heard this presiding officer mentioned to-day without the prefix " partisan." The prefix, of course, applies necessarily, if it applies to him, to every returning officer and every deputy returning officer who has acted in any election in this country, and to all of those who will act in the election that is to come; and yet we have not had any suggestion that in this country the Government should abdicate this function and duty of appointing the returning officers. I can see no reason why we should depart, with regard to these precisely similar officers, from the rule which has been the custom for so long and that is still the law in this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In view of the minister's statement that the Government should not at all abdicate its exclusive right to conduct an election, why has he given to the leader of the Opposition the right to name one-half of these special returning officers?

Mr. DOHERTY: If the fault found with me is that I gave that right to the leader of the Opposition, then, of course, it is with some little surprise that I discover that fault is found, but to avoid criticism for having done that I would consent to withdraw the clause giving that power. If consistency is so precious a jewel that, rather than I should lose it, the hon. gentleman would prefer that I should not extend that power to the leader of the Opposition, I will be willing to withdraw that clause. I have said what I have to say on that clause, and I have pointed out that the reason this provision was made is that this is the first time that there has been occasion for the services of officers of this kind. We are dealing now with a very special office, one that has not existed in the past and an office the holders of which are to perform duties, in my opinion, of the very first importance. We are also providing for an operation where there will be very material advantages to result from the fact that the same individual fills the public office and also acts, perfectly frankly and fairly, as the representative of his party to see that things are done right. And that brings me to a moment's consideration of what is proposed here. With regard to counting officers and returning officers, they are to act in couples. This operation will be carried on by the two together; the one and the same operation is participated in and controlled by the representatives of each party. What is in the mind of the hon. gentleman with regard to presiding officers? One-half of them will be named by the leader of the Opposition and one-half will be named by the leader of the Government.

Those two presiding officers do not act together, and the reason put forward for requiring this is that the man named by the Government will necessarily be a partisan of the Government. It is not unfair, then, to conclude on the same reasoning, that the man named by the leader of the Opposition will be a partisan of the Opposition. With a nomination of that kind, we withdraw from the man who holds the position any idea that, whatever the complexion of the government that appointed him he is a representative of the whole state and is charged with the duty of being faithful to the whole people. When you divide them up in this way, and have one of them the nominee of the Opposition, and the other the nominee of the Government, it is notice to them that they are to be representatives of political parties, and what is going to happen?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why did the minister appoint special returning officers, half of whom are to be nominated by the leader of the Opposition, to do the counting and recording? Ordinarily the counting is done by the returning officer.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the purpose of this provision?

Mr. DOHERTY: Ordinarily the counting is done by the returning officer. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman from Halifax how he would suggest that, in the taking of the soldiers' votes, the presiding officer should count the ballots. The hon. member, when he suggests that, must certainly forget that the deputy presiding officer will be taking the votes of a group of soldiers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, that is not the point.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then I would be glad to understand it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I simply asked why in this Bill power is taken to permit the appointment on the recommendation of the leader of the Opposition of one-half of the special returning officers. I do not object to it. I think it should be there, and I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from St. John in that respect. But why give that power to the leader of the Opposition in that case, and not in the other case?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to correct my hon. friend. I said exactly what the hon. gentleman says. I says it is an insult to the leader of the Opposition to have the provision in respect to the inferior officer and refuse it in respect to the important officer.

Mr. DOHERTY: May I take it that the clause is adopted? Here are hon. gentlemen vying with each other to say how perfectly satisfied they are that that should be done with reference to the returning officer. The hon. member for Halifax asks me why I did that. I must express my regret that I have such a marked incapacity for conveying my ideas. Whether the reason be sufficient or not, just a few moments ago I gave the reasons which led me to do that. I will be glad to repeat them if it is necessary.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. minister did it because he thought it was a fair thing to do, and would eliminate suspicion?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not apply the same idea to clause (d)?

Mr. DOHERTY: I did it because I thought it was a fair thing to do, and because we were dealing with an entirely new phase, conferring functions upon this man to be carried out under conditions absolutely different from those under which the counting of ballots is ever done. I did not do it to avoid suspicion, I did it because I believed it to be fair and unobjectionable. If I had done it in the hope of avoiding suspicion, I may say that I would have been grievously disappointed, because all I seem to have earned by it is a grave suspicion with regard to the presiding officer. This assortment and counting of ballots as proposed will very probably have to be done under conditions where there will be a number of acting returning officers and a number of clerks busy assorting ballots from numerous different constituencies and counting those ballots at the same time. If one sought to provide for representation of the party merely by scrutineers or agents, it might present very serious practical inconvenience to provide agents for both parties to watch the operations of these numerous groups of acting returning officers and their clerks and it seemed to me that there was a direct practical advantage in providing that the people doing the work should really fill the dual office of assorters or counters of ballots and of representatives of the party. I had a new function to confer; it was one, in my mind, of very great importance; and I thought that it would be, as the hon. gentleman says, a fair thing. Because I did that I am now asked to abdicate what has been the function of governments even since we have had elections with regard to an officer whose duties are on all fours with those of the ordinary returning officer—in fact not as important, because he has not to do with the official return with regard to the election. I am not prepared to accept the doctrine that this Government is incapable of appointing to a position of that kind any except a partisan, those capable of using the office for the purpose of fraud and of partisanship; men who will see to it that every deputy presiding officer they appoint shall be equally a partisan capable of violating his oath and using his office for the purpose of fraud. I am quite satisfied there is no foundation for the suspicion which I have aroused by my simple desire to guard this new and very peculiar office with what I am prepared to admit is a most extraordinary precaution. While I was not doing it to ward off suspicion, certainly it was one of the last things that I could have imagined would have brought upon me all this suspicion.

As regards the amendment, I certainly cannot, for the reasons I have given, accept the proposal, and I trust that members of the committee will agree with me that it is not a proposal which I can fairly be expected to accept.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hope the minister will reconsider his position in respect to the amendment offered by the hon. member for St. John, and will yet accept it. It is a pity we should take up a whole hour getting nowhere, and having the whole issue befogged, when we might make progress by the minister accepting the amendment. I rise particularly to second his amendment. The conditions surrounding the taking of the military vote in Europe are in no respect similar to the conditions surrounding the polling of votes in ordinary elections. I make the suggestion to him in a friendly spirit that I do not think he gave the committee any reason to justify the position he took a moment ago in refusing to accept the amendment.

He has stated that the Government should not be expected to forego a function usually exercised by a government during election time. Quite true; but the premise is wrong; the conditions are dissimilar. In taking an election in Canada in ordinary times, it does not matter much who the returning officers or the deputy returning officers are. In the constituency of Halifax in the Dominion elections half the deputy returning officers are Conservatives and half Liberals. Although the returning officer in that constituency is a Liberal, he will likely be the returning officer during this election, notwithstanding the fact that the Conservative party is in power.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT He is probably the sheriff.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He is the sheriff. There is no law compelling his appointment as returning officer, but the practice followed has prevailed in that county for a long number of years. It never mattered much to me who the deputy returning officer was in a constituency with which I was familiar, because there were ample means of protecting oneself. There was the clerk; there were the representatives, and there was the fact that every man who appeared to cast his vote in any polling section was well known. In taking the military vote in Europe, the conditions will not be at all like this. The presiding officer will be unknown to the military voters, the military voters will be unknown to the presiding officer or to the deputy presiding officer; and the scrutineers may be absolutely unknown to either. For these and other reasons, the conditions are absolutely dissimilar. I say, therefore, that the Minister of Justice is not justified in arguing that because ordinarily it is the function of the Government to appoint returning officers in elections, they should not forego that function in respect to the taking of a military vote in Europe. The Minister of Justice should not ask the committee to refuse the amendment offered by the member for St. John upon the ground that he has taken.

In the experience of British Columbia we are afforded an illustration of some of the conditions surrounding the taking of the vote in Europe. The facts given to the committee this afternoon by the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) show quite plainly that there are great opportunities for partisanship and manipulation of one kind or another. No matter what the intentions and desires of the Government may be, these things may occur. The Minister of Justice, without being asked by the committee to do so, has agreed that special returning officers shall be appointed upon the nomination of the Prime Minister and of the leader of the Opposition. I asked him why he did that, and he replied, because he wished to evince a spirit of fairness and to do justice to all interested. If that is true in respect to the appointment of special returning officers, is it not applicable also to the appointment of returning officers and deputy returning officers? The counting of the ballots is ordinarily the function of returning officers; why did the Government not retain that function in its entirety? Why did they give away part of that function by enabling the leader of the Opposition to name half of the special returning officers? The minister has not answered that.

As I stated this afternoon, this is a very peculiar piece of legislation. In respect to almost every section we shall have great difficulty in reaching an agreement. We all agree that it is a very difficult statute to draft, and that it is very difficult to please both parties. I am quite sure, however, that we could pass this section in a moment if we agreed to the amendment offered by the member for St. John. Is there anything wrong with that amendment? Upon what grounds does any hon. gentleman object to it? Is it not fair? Would it not meet with acceptance and favour on the part of the military voters overseas? On the ground of expediting public business, should the minister not accept it? I submit that we should have a better reason than has been given for the minister's declining to accept it. I do not know whether it is neccessary that that amendment should have a seconder, but if it is, I desire to second it.

Mr. TAYLOR: I do not know that I could give a better reason than that given by the Minister of Justice why the Government should not abdicate its function to the Opposition with respect to the conduct of this election, but I think I can give a very good reason from the military standpoint why the amendment of the member for St. John should not be accepted. These presiding officers and their deputies are to be military electors. The issue before the men in the camps in England and in France will be whether the Parliament of Canada is to send them assistance or is to leave them there unaided, to be destroyed by the enemy.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is that what they are going to place before the soldiers as the issue? The cat is out of the bag.

Mr. TAYLOR: The member for South Renfrew asks: Is that the issue that they are going to place before the soldiers? I answer him that that is the issue that the Liberal party in this Parliament, or such of them as support this policy of obstruction of a measure of aid to the soldiers are placing before them to-night. Such being the issue, I should not like to be one of those stigmatised before his fellows in the trenches as the nominee of the political leader in Canada, who refuses to send him assistance, to protect the interests of that leader in the voting. It appears to me that there is a very special reason why that kind of politics should not be obtruded upon the soldiers at the front. The provision in this Bill providing for the nomination of counting officers is of a very different type. But to go into every camp and to tell the men in those camps: this officer represents those who would help you; this officer represents those who refuse to help you, would, it seems to me, be a most deplorable condition.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would not be true.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Who would do that?

Mr. TAYLOR: Who would do it? Any person who told the truth would do it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then the returning officers are to be political agents?

Mr. TAYLOR: The hon. member for South Renfrew asks again if the returning officers are to be political agents. I say, God forbid; that is why they should be appointed by the Government of the day and not by one political party or by another political party.

Mr. PUGSLEY: By such a wonderful non-partisan Government.

Mr. TAYLOR: The Government of the day represents the whole of Canada; it speaks for the whole of Canada. As we were told by the member for Halifax just now, the Government of the day—

Mr. DEVLIN: I rise to a point of order. I am here, as a member of this committee, to listen to reasons for or against the acceptance of an amendment to subsection (d) of section 4, and I am not here to listen to abuse of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman will have to be more specific if he wishes to make a point of order on which I can rule.

Mr. DEVLIN: I claim that the remarks of my hon. friend are not relevant to the question under discussion.

Mr. TAYLOR: Speaking to the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: There is no point of order before the Chair.

Mr. TAYLOR: If there is no point of order before the Chair I am quite satisfied, but if there is a point of order I desire to speak to it, and to say that I am not satisfied to sit in this House and have the freedom of debate exercised by critics of this side of the House when we in turn are not expected to reply in kind. There is no one more desirous than I am of keeping strictly to the rules of debate, but if latitude is allowed to any hon. member to depart from the rules, surely any other member who desires to make reply to him should have the same privilege. The events in connection with the voting in the province of British Columbia have no bearing upon any part of this Bill, yet a great part of the time of the House has been taken up to-day by one hon. gentleman after another in relating those occurrences. I wish to say on behalf of the province of British Columbia that that province had very little part in creating the occurrences which have been recited here. As to the recital itself, it is that of a partisan commission representing only one side of the issue before the electors, and representing the political faith of the government appointing it. I have not read their report, and all I have heard of it is what was read to the House to-day by the hon. member for Pictou.

But that had nothing to do with the taking of the soldiers' votes on the political issue as to which, as explained by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) no fault has been found. What occurred was that when they came to the vote on prohibition, the prohibition party abandoned any attempt at scrutineering, and allowed the other party to complete the vote without any surveillance at all. Is it remarkable that frauds should occur under those circumstances?—circumstances which are not at all contemplated by this Act, and circumstances which have a parallel in the province of Quebec, where a vote was taken on the question of prohibition under precisely similar circumstances. I say this in justice to the province of British Columbia, where, with one solitary exception, we have been entirely free from political voting scandals.

Mr. NESBITT: If any further reason could possibly be needed in support of the amendment of my hon. friend from St. John, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has given it. He has given us an excellent illustration of what may happen in the taking of this vote. I had no idea that such a thing might be done when we were discussing this Bill on former occasions, but the hon. gentleman apparently knows what is intended to be done. He is, however, labouring under a difficulty; he expresses sympathy for the officers who will represent the right hon. leader of the Opposition. He need not worry about that, because I can assure him he will not be asked to be one of them. Nor do I think he need worry about the other officers who may be asked, because I have no doubt they will be just as capable of looking after themselves, and of fighting at the front, as my hon. friend. I would point out to the Minister of Justice that probably only a few presiding officers will be appointed under this Bill, and they will have the right to appoint deputies. For that reason, if for no other, I think an equal number could very well be appointed, and they could then consult together as to the appointment of their deputies, and I have not the slightest doubt that they could easily agree upon the appointment of deputies who would be practically non-partisan; and it is only to avoid partisanship that we want this done. The amendments to paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) seem to me to be perfectly all right. As to the minister's point, that the Government always appoints the deputy returning officers in Canada, his comparison is not on all-fours with this case, because in Canada every candidate has a scrutineer to help him not only in the taking of the vote, but at the counting of the vote. The scrutineer generally knows his business, just as the deputy returning officer does, and is right there to represent his candidate. If I may turn to section 8, subsection 3, I would point out that it says: "Where conditions make it reasonably possible the deputy presiding officer shall give public notice," etc. Subsection 5 says: "The deputy presiding officer may take such vote otherwise than at a formally held poll." I think that if the minister would accept this amendment he would remove to a very great extent the faults we find in this Bill. I do not believe there are many, if any, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who do not want to see the Bill go through as rapidly as possible, but at the same time they want to see it made as perfect as possible. Nor do I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite, as a general rule anyway, wish to gain any advantage in the taking of this vote. I know a great many of them would never dream of taking such an advantage over hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. For that reason I urge the minister to accept the amendment of my hon. friend from St. John, which I think will cover not only this particular section, but, to a very great extent, section 8 also. If the amendment were accepted I think we should get along much more rapidly

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is not the minister going to accept the amendment?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have already announced that I could not see why I should accept the amendment, although I have been reproached for giving no reason for not accepting it. I wish to speak with perfect respect for the hon. gentlemen who have advanced what they consider to be conclusive reasons for the amendment. Speaking with that respect, I venture to say that I have heard no reason that carries conviction to me that it should be accepted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the minister consider favourably the suggestion that those presiding officers should be appointed by the Governor in Council on the nomination of the officer commanding the Canadian forces, General Sir Arthur Currie? Those presiding officers are to be military electors. I doubt the wisdom of this. The officer commanding the forces, should be in a very good position to judge as to what military electors he could nominate for this work. The Governor in Council might suggest military electors as returning officers, who might not be able to give sufficient time to the work, because it might interfere with the proper discharge of their usual military duties.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It would hardly be fair to General Currie. He has not the time to do it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: General Currie has a good deal to do.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend from Westminster (Mr. J. D. Taylor) wants this House to believe that the evidence I read this afternoon from the report tabled in the Legislature of British Columbia, and which was acted upon by the legislature, is of no value to us in considering this Bill. As was shown by the comment and the data which I read, it was not merely a report of the conclusions or findings of the gentlemen who composed the commission, but contained the evidence given before them, and showed that there was fraudulent voting, and repeated voting, and all kinds of disregard of the ordinary rules which apply in elections. This is a fact which cannot be controverted. The fact that under those conditions and at that time it was possible that a total disregard of the rules and laws which relate to proper voting should exist, is ample justification of the position taken by hon. gentlemen that under this Bill there should be no possibility of these things arising, and that we should place upon this vote such safeguards that everybody in the country should feel that the boys at the front were given a full and fair opportunity to express their views, and that their vote was honestly recorded. Hon. gentlemen have indulged in heroics on the question of who should have a vote under this Bill, but, if we send to the boys a Bill under which they are to voice their opinion, no matter what it may be, and that voice can be perverted by officials on whom there are not these ordinary checks which should be provided in cases of that kind, and if we are to have returning officers who are to be permitted to do what was done under the British Columbia Act, how are we performing our duty to the boys at the front?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There were no scrutineers there.

Mr. MACDONALD: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. There were scrutineers. I read the report very fully this afternoon, but my hon. friend was not here. It pointed out in one particular case that such a well-known gentleman as Rev. Dr. Pringle was acting as scrutineer, and that gentleman alleged before the commission that he was not notified of a poll being held in the vicinity where he was, and where he could have attended as a scrutineer. The returning officer knew he was a scrutineer—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Then, there was no scrutineer?

Mr. MACDONALD: It was cited as a case of the parties carrying on the election in disregard of the law. They failed to notify a man who had a right to be there.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: So, there were no scrutineers?

Mr. MACDONALD: There were scrutineers. I read a list of places where the scrutineers had a right to be, but they were not notified, and consequently they were not there.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Therefore, there were no scrutineers there?

Mr. MACDONALD: Under this Bill, the same possibilities may arise, and we want to provide against that. We want to see that the parties who are to conduct the election are placed upon the same basis as other officials. I cannot sit down without noticing the remarks of my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. J. D. Taylor) which I think were entirely out of order. At this stage, we are not discussing the Military Service Bill. My hon. friend's idea as to what the issues are in this question are very peculiar. Does my hon. friend mean to intimate that gentlemen on this side of the House are not as anxious as he is to give every possible aid to the boys at the front.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then all I have to say is that this is a specie of Toryism which, I suppose, we are going to have inflicted throughout this country at the coming election. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House may differ with regard to methods, just as hon. gentlemen on the other side differ with regard to methods, but none of us in this House, I care not on which side they are, in my judgment differ, in any respect on the point that we must play our part and do everything we can in order to see that every aid possible is given to Great Britain and the Allies. Speaking for myself and hon. gentlemen associated with me, we resent any such imputation from the gentleman who has made them. Loyalty is not a mere matter of lip-service. Hon. gentlemen may speak as they please upon the subject, but the people of the country, and gentlemen on this side of the House know that in their hearts, and in their deeds and in their acts they are just as loyal to the cause in every way as are any gentlemen who sit opposite.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not know that it will serve any purpose to press the minister very much further in regard to this matter, but I would like to submit to him that the proposal made by the hon. member for St. John is an eminently fair one. It is of the utmost importance that both sides be represented in every poll where an election is going on. The system my hon. friend from Halifax spoke of as prevailing in Nova Scotia is not confined to the county of Halifax, but prevails in other counties in the province—the custom is when the returning officer happens to be of one stripe, the clerk is always of the other stripe. That is fair.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Does my hon. friend pretend that is the custom in Nova Scotia?

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is the practice in certain counties in Nova Scotia. If my hon. friend was acquainted with affairs in Nova Scotia, he would agree with me that it is the case. It has been the custom, and the sheriff in such cases has to take care, that if the deputy returning officer is a Conservative, the clerk must be a Liberal, and vice versa. I cannot see why there should be a large number of presiding officers. As I understand this Bill, the duty of the presiding officer is to appoint deputy presiding officers. One presiding officer who is a man in whom every one would have confidence—like the commanding officer of the forces—could appoint all the deputies required on both sides of the Channel, and if we were sure that a man of that character had control of the appointments, then we should feel assured that the matter would be properly dealt with.

But this Bill provides for the appointment of an indefinite number of presiding officers and these are given power ot appoint any number of deputies. We do not know where we are in connection with this Bill. There is no necessity for more than two presiding officers. A poll will be taken in England, I presume. It may be necessary to have an officer in England to appoint the deputy returning officers to act in the different camps in Great Britain. It will be necessary to have a returning officer in France to appoint the deputies to act in the different camps in France. It will not be necessary to have any more, because one man can perform the duty better than half a dozen can. I appeal to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who is here listening to the debate, and to the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), who is regarded as an eminently fair man, to influence their colleague with regard to the acceptance of this proposal. There is a great deal of discussion in the press and in the country these days about union Government. I understand that many hon. gentlemen opposite favour a Government in which partisanship shall be done away with and in which we shall all pull together in the interest of the great cause that we all profess to have at heart.

Mr. EDWARDS: How do you feel about it?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would like very much to see it brought about. Here is an opportunity for hon. gentlemen opposite to show their sincerity in regard to this great question of a union Government. If they are really sincere they will want to go a little farther than they have gone in regard to meeting us on this Bill. This presents an opportunity, an opening which should not be disregarded by these hon. gentlemen to show to the country that they are actually sincere on the question of getting together in a union Government. If the Minister of Justice refuses out and out to accept any proposal to amend this section, and to make it what we regard as fair, it will be fair to conclude that the proposal for a united Government in this country has not very much meaning. I hope that will not be proven to be the position and consequently I would like the Minister of Justice to still consider either the proposal of my hon. friend from St. John, or that of my hon. friend from Halifax. I want also to be understood as resenting the statement of the hon. member for New Westminster. It comes with very poor grace from an hon. gentleman who took a junketting trip across the Atlantic at the expense of the people of this country, who never went near the front and who took good care to keep himself out of any danger.

Mr. TAYLOR: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I ask that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sinclair) be directed to withdraw the statement he has made, as being against the rules of this House. The hon. gentleman has made the statement that I, as an officer in His Majesty's service, took a junketting trip across the continent and the ocean. I desire to have that statement withdrawn. I took no junketting trip.

An hon. MEMBER: Is it not true?

Mr. TAYLOR: It is not true and I wish it to be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: I suppose the hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) will not have any objection to withdrawing the statement, because it casts an imputation on the honour of an hon. member, and therefore should be withdrawn.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the imputation in saying that an hon. member took a junketting trip across the Atlantic?

Mr. TAYLOR: My complaint is that the statement is untrue and reflects unworthily on me.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman did not say that before.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman will not say that it is untrue that he took a trip across the Atlantic at the expense of the people of the country. If it offends him, I have no objection to striking out the word that he took a "junketting" trip.

Mr. TAYLOR: I appeal to rule 19 of this House.

The CHAIRMAN: Surely the hon. member should withdraw these words. It is an imputation on the conduct of an hon. member who went across the ocean as a soldier, but not at the expense of the people in the sense imputed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have already said, out of respect to you, Mr. Chairman, that I am quite willing to drop the word "junketting." That is the only word that I used that might be taken exception to. The rest I would regard as strictly parliamentary, and I think you will agree with me.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I understood the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) to state that it was the practice in the province of Nova Scotia, under the late Administration, to conduct elections so that where a deputy returning officer was of one political faith the poll clerk was of another political faith. I do not know where, in Nova Scotia, the hon. gentleman ever saw a practice of that kind carried out. But I do know that I have participated in elections in eight different counties in Nova Scotia, and in every single instance I found that probably the strongest party man in the district was appointed deputy returning officer, that the next strongest Liberal partisan was appointed poll clerk, and that even the man who sat at the door and acted as constable to keep order was a conspicuous supporter of the Liberal party. That was in eight different counties in Nova Scotia, and I have yet to find a county where any such fair and just policy as that described by the hon. gentleman has been carried out. My hon. friend referred to the fact that in the discussion of this matter we should have in mind the agitations that are going on at the present time for a union government. I think he made an improper application of his argument. I hope that the Liberal party in this country are loyal and patriotic enough as a class to consent to the generous proposition made by the Prime Minister, and I hope and trust that a union government will be formed, a government which will represent both the Liberal-Conservative party and the Liberal party. If that is so—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What is the objection?

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Union Government has failed to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair.

Mr. DAVIDSON: If hon. gentlemen opposite will express themselves—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair, chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davidson) must have some relation to the clause under discussion.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think my point is very much in order, and that I shall be able to make myself clear even to the somewhat befuddled intellects of hon. gentlemen opposite. When this Act goes into force it will go into force, as I hope, under a union government, under a government of Conservatives and Liberals alike; it will be a union government that will appoint these officers and consequently the officers they will appoint will be people who will be in a position to represent both the Liberal and Conservative parties. I think that is a cogent and a relevant argument.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) used the argument for the emasculation of this Bill that some soldiers in a British Columbia regiment which had gone overseas had voted improperly in connection with a certain referendum held for that province. He quoted from a newspaper report to prove his assertion that because members of regiments who were from points outside of British Columbia had voted in that election who had no right to vote, under another law altogether, that was a reason for emasculating and changing the Bill now before the House. I could not follow him, and I wish to point out to him that if he holds that principle it will be a very dangerous principle and very hard to maintain. Only a few months ago one read in the papers that an election had been conducted in Vancouver in a most disgraceful manner, and that aliens and persons with no residence in this country had been brought in to vote for a certain gentleman named Macdonald who had been Attorney General or afterwards became so in the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: At least I think that you should allow my hon. friend to point his argument, to make the conclusion, which is the conclusive way of showing whether or not an argument is out of order.

Mr. GRAHAM: Make his speech and then be called to order?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: That is what I was going to ask the hon. member, to make his argument, because I did not know where he was going.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I sometimes take a devious road, but I always reach my point. My argument is that the hon. gentleman claims that because certain irregularities took place in that election we should tear up this Bill. I say that because irregularities existed in an election that resulted in the election of Mr. Macdonald in Vancouver, that would be no argument for tearing up the law of British Columbia—and I think he will admit that, because only a few months ago he was in Vancouver and at a banquet tendered to this same Mr. Macdonald he said he was proud of him as a Macdonald.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DAVIDSON: He said more than that,—that he was—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DAVIDSON:—that—he was just the kind of man they wanted in Ottawa and he invited the people of Vancouver to send that man to Ottawa as their member. As a matter of fact, only a few months later it was found necessary because of revelations made to retire Mr. Macdonald from the Government of British Columbia—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I say with all possible emphasis that the mere fact of fraud being committed in a certain vote taken among soldiers is no reason to deprive the soldiers of their franchise, is no reason for emasculating an entirely different Bill. Down in Nova Scotia there are sometimes irregularities in connection with elections. I have known of irregularities in connection with the revision of the voters' lists. I have known members prominent in professional life in Nova Scotia to conduct most disreputable affairs in connection with these elections, but that is no argument for tearing up the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia. I think there is very little in the argument of my hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: Before I put the amendment to the committee, I think it is proper by the rules of the House to dispose of clause (c). Shall clause (c) be adopted?

Mr. GRAHAM: If the committee, by the consent of the minister, leaves a section over, you can pass any other section in the Bill. If the minister insisted that he would not take up (d) until (c) is disposed of, your point of order might be well taken. But, as a matter of fact, any clause may be left over by consent of the committee.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The three subsections are before the committee. Rule 55 says:

> In proceedings in Committee of the Whole House upon Bills the preamble is first postponed and then every clause considered in the proper order.

The proper order is to take (c) before (d), unless (c) stands.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The rule that you are reading does not apply to subdivisions of sections, but only to sections. This is a subclause, a paragraph, which with the consent of the minister, we passed over, and went away down and passed subsections 2, 3 and 4. Now we go back. We are proceeding backwards, and we have a right to take (d) or (c) or the whole thing together. The only possible question is on (d).

The CHAIRMAN: Bourinot goes so far as to say that amendments must be made in the order of the lines of a clause. He goes as far as that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He does not say the lines of a subclause.

The CHAIRMAN: If we should now amend clause (d) we could not amend clause (c) unless the clause stands.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Clause (c) has been standing for some time.

Mr. DOHERTY: Clause (c) may be made to stand. I would point out that, at the special instance of the hon. member for St. John, we came back to (c) and (d) and (e), and he expressly declined to allow us to deal with (c) as a separate thing by itself, insisting that they should both be before the committee together. Therefore it comes that they are both before the committee together, and the rule seems clearly applicable.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is my suggestion not right that the three clauses are not before the committee, and I have moved an amendment to subclause (d) and the vote on the amendment is taken first.

Mr. DOHERTY: I suppose it is better to progress backwards than not to progress at all.

Mr. NESBITT: The question is on the amendment.

Amendment Mr. Pugsley negatived.—Yeas 43, nays 48.

On section 5—Ballots and custody.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who said carried? Just give us a little chance to discuss this section. This Bill forms the object of very important state papers referred to in the correspondence between the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) in that very able campaign correspondence which has been submitted for the information of the country, particularly the letter of the Prime Minister. Therefore, we should not be blamed for taking a little bit of time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Cut out the introduction.

Mr. CROTHERS: Get down to work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the minister would keep quiet we should get on more rapidly. The remarks of the minister encourage the other fellows. The hon. gentleman from Annapolis spoke at great length, and obstructed the passage of this Bill.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. DAVIDSON: I did not take half as much time as my hon. friend from St. John.

Mr. CURRIE: The talk of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) will cost the country a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that the form of ballot paper which is referred to in this section, is not the proper form, in my opinion. It is calculated to convey to the voter the idea that he may select a person for whom he wishes to vote, even although that person may not be regularly nominated. He might have anticipated that that person would be nominated. I think there should be instructions which would show to the voter that if he chooses to vote for an individual, instead of voting for the party —the Government, or Opposition, or independent party—that his ballot will not be counted. Form (a) of the Bill is defective in other respects. It says:

> The voter to make an X within the white space containing the name of the party for which he intends to vote, or if the voter desires to vote for any particular person, the voter shall write the name of such person in the first space.

That should be changed to read "Any particular candidate or candidates," because there are constituencies in Canada where two members are selected—for instance, the city and county of St. John, Ottawa and the city and county of Halifax.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am quite satisfied to make that amendment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is provided by this section that the ballot papers shall be delivered by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the officers in command of any troops in Bermuda. Does that mean that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery must go to Bermuda and deliver the ballots? I should think they could be transmitted to Bermuda by registered letter, without going to the expense of sending to Bermuda.

Mr. DOHERTY: I thought it was so obvious that the ballots would be sent there by registered letter that no explanation was necessary.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would scarcely have thought the language was intended to mean the Clerk of the Crown must go there personally. I think I have examined other parts of the Bill sufficiently to enable me to state that there is no provision for keeping count of the ballots which are printed.

They should be official ballots. As I understand, the officer in England can have as many ballots struck off as he pleases. There is no limitation. I think it is only a reasonable precaution that there should be a certain number of official ballots, and all the ballots which are handed to the presiding officers should be accounted for. There would be a certain number used, so many ballots returned, and so many ballots spoiled. Any of those official ballots which have not been used should be returned to the proper officers at Ottawa. There is no provision in regard to that. This measure only provides for the commanding officer making returns of ballots, but there is no check on the ballot papers which are issued by the officer in London, or by the officer in Ottawa. It seems to me there should be a careful check upon those ballot papers, so that the number of ballots left on hand would be known, and would be a safeguard against duplication of ballots and against ballots being printed by others than those who are officially authorized to print them.

Mr. CURRIE: I think my hon. friend will find that his objection is met in section 13.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Will the Minister of Justice explain what countries are included in the designation: "In any other place without Canada but in North America"?

Mr. DOHERTY: That would cover the entire continent with the exception of Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What are the places included?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are soldiers in Bermuda; some of our boys are serving in the patrol motor boat service, the headquarters of which are at Trinidad, and there are soldiers at St. Lucia. This provision applies only to those places where commanding officers are in charge of troops. Under the last Act we would have been subject to embarrassment because we mentioned Bermuda specifically, and it afterwards happened that some of our soldiers —not a very large number, it is true—were at St. Lucia.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is St. Lucia in North America?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand it to be. It is not on the mainland, of course, but I understand that the term "North America" would include the adjacent islands.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: St. Lucia is not adjacent to the continent.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is in North America to the same extent that Great Britain is in Europe. Any geography would include these islands in North America.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There were only 15 or 20 men in St. Lucia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) said that section 13 would cover the point that I made with reference to the ballots. I have read the section, and I find that my hon. friend is entirely mistaken. It relates to a different matter altogether.

Mr. CURRIE: The section reads:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in Part III, every returning officer appointed and acting under that Part in respect of an electoral district wherein a poll is held, as soon as he has made the final addition of the votes polled pursuant to that Part, shall, without declaring any candidate elected and without making the return required by section two hundred and eleven of that Part, make, sign and seal a certificate stating the number of votes given for each candidate, as determined by such final addition, and the report required by section two hundred and thirteen of Part III, and transmit to the general returning officer the writ of election together with such certificate and report, the stamp furnished him for stamping the ballot papers, and all the ballot papers, including those unused, the original statements of the several deputy returning officers, the lists of voters, the poll books used in the several polling divisions, and all other lists and documents furnished for the election, or which have been transmitted to him by the deputy returning officers.

The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery sends a certain number of ballots to the returning officer, as in an ordinary election, and ultimately gets them back.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend will pardon me; section 13 deals entirely with an election held under part 3, which is a provision of the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. CURRIE: All the Dominion Elections Act applies to this. Where this Act does not apply, the other does.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This section provides, in the form of the schedule, the kind of ballot to be used in this section. The ballot makes provision for the military elector casting a vote for the Government, for the Opposition or for an independent candidate. This is a designation of party upon the ballot which has never existed in any British country in theory or in practice. On that ground I must express regret that the minister has seen fit to adopt that form of ballot. Things may happen before the next election takes place which would make it difficult to determine the exact position of some candidates in the party

10 p.m. sense. The member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) expressed his hope for the organization of a union Government. If that hope should be fulfilled, there would be a temporary obliteration of party lines in this country, at least to some extent. It would not be binding, however, upon the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) or upon any other person. The member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) says that even in that event there would be an Opposition. Well, if a union Government were organized it would take some time for an Opposition to evolve. They might not have sufficient time prior to polling day to become a political organization in the sense in which the Liberal party to-day is an Opposition party. Many other things might happen to make a ballot of this kind impracticable and unfair. My view is that the ballot should contain the name of the candidates; no matter what happens, that is the fair thing. It is fair to everybody. The hon. member for St. Antoine shakes his head. What is his objection?

Sir HERBERT AMES: If you will look through the service roll of any battalion overseas, you will find the battalion is made up of men from probably fifty different points in Canada. If that battalion is at a certain point in France near the front, do you mean to tell me that you can supply the men with a complete set of ballots for every candidate in Canada?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is that the only objection?

Sir HERBERT AMES: That is one which it seems to me is sufficient in itself.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is one that would strike the mind of any one at first, but I do not think it is insuperable. It is one that could be met very easily. There are 234 members to be elected to the next House of Commons; that would mean probably 470 candidates. The Bill provides that there shall be four weeks, or twenty-eight days, between nomination day and polling day. Now a cable of less than three thousand words would transmit to the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the name of every candidate nominated in Canada. The cable might be repeated back in order to insure strict accuracy. The two cables could be sent in less than six thousand words. So the cost would not be an objection. The ballot papers could be in the hands of the proper officer in London, let us say, before nomination day here, and the day following the receipt of the cable advising that officer of the names of all the candidates nominated in Canada and their constituencies, all that information could be printed on the ballot papers, or within forty-eight hours at the most. I do not see any objection whatever against printing the names of the candidates in each constituency upon the ballot papers. I think it is the fairest thing to do.

Mr. EDWARDS: Let us suppose there are three candidates, Smith, Jones and Brown, in a particular constituency. Does the hon. member suggest that we should also print on the ballot paper that Smith was for the Government, Jones for the Opposition, and Brown independent?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not intend any party designation of candidates whatever.

Mr. EDWARDS: Then you would be up against a very serious difficulty, because the soldier would in many cases not know whether Brown or Smith was for or against the Government, and he would have to vote blind.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is true to some extent, but even then it would be a more intelligent vote than where the ballots are simply marked for the Government or for the Opposition, particularly in cases where the man is not able to indicate an electoral district, when the Prime Minister or the leader of the Opposition really names the candidates voted for.

Mr. CURRIE: Let us suppose there are four hundred candidates. Now there might be four or five hundred men in a battalion who would wish to vote in some electoral district. In order to insure there being a sufficient number of ballot papers you would have to put two hundred thousand papers, —four hundred multiplied by at least five hundred—in the hands of each deputy returning officer. I want to see the soldiers vote properly, and if the hon. member can suggest any better method I should be willing to support him.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend has suggested a difficulty, but I do not think the difficulty is insuperable. In many cases you will find several battalions belonging to one province close together, and then there would be very little difficulty such as my hon. friend suggests. Take my own case, for instance, as an illustration of how this proposal might work a hardship. The hon. member for New Westminster said a few moments ago that conscription would be the issue with the military elector. Assume that I am a candidate in the next election, which is possible. In my constituency there will be four candidates. The Prime Minister will be one, in support of the Conscription Bill. I also supported the Bill. Now in that case it would be almost impossible for any military elector from the constituency of Halifax to vote, if the only consideration was the attitude of the Prime Minister and myself upon the Conscription Bill, and that attitude were judged merely by the vote in the House. That one illustration alone raises a very difficult question, and I submit that this form of ballot hardly meets the situation. In the province of New Brunswick they have a form of ballot which perhaps might be used here. The official envelope is provided by the Government, and the ballot is enclosed in it after being marked by the elector. The candidates in a provincial election in New Brunswick prepare their own ballot, having their own names printed on them if they like, or they can supply the voter with a blank piece of paper and he can write on it the name of the candidate for whom he desires to vote. The protection is in the envelope. The procedure in New Brunswick might possibly be useful in considering this matter. I do not like the idea of giving statutory recognition of party in a ballot. We have never done it in this country, nor has it been done in any other part of the British Empire. In theory there is no such thing as party in our constitution. It may be true, as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) suggests, that there will be difficulty in the way of printing the names of the candidates. I admit that it may be difficult to meet some of the objections which could be raised against my own suggestion, but I think upon the whole it will be less objectionable than that proposed in the ballot form in the schedule. I do not think there is any difficulty in having the ballot bearing the names of the candidates nominated in each constituency put before the military electors. By the use of the cable the names of these candidates could be in Great Britain and in Europe 25 or 27 days before polling day; then in all the camps, the hospitals and other places where our forces are assembled, the names of the different candidates in each constituency can be printed in the usual manner, and within a period of two or three weeks the military electors will become acquainted with the name of each candidate. In the British Columbia elections there was a polling held at Halifax. There was an official ballot, but the names of the candidates were not printed upon it. I had something to do with that polling on behalf of the Lib ral candidates in British Columbia. The Government did not even furnish the men with the names of the candidates on either side. Those names were supplied to the voters at Halifax by friends of both parties in British Columbia. I remember in the city of Vancouver there was quite a number of candidates on both sides, and it was found that most of the soldiers voting knew hardly any of them. A good many of the soldiers knew Mr. Bowser's name, because he had been so long before the public of British Columbia, but it was almost the only name upon the ballot that was known to the soldier voters who had to vote in the city of Vancouver. If you have the ballot printed with the name of the candidate upon it, and have the usual notices posted at the camps, gradually the electors will become acquainted with the names of the candidates in the district which they are likely to designate as their electoral district. I submit that this form of ballot should be changed, and that we should endeavour to have the names of the candidates printed on the ballot.

Mr. ARTHURS: I listened with some amusement to the hon. member for Halifax working out in his own mind an absolutely unworkable scheme. There is no question about it that a ballot could not be prepared or used in the manner indicated by my hon. friend, particularly in France. There is with each battalion on an average of about one thousand men. Even presuming that the majority of these men are from one constituency, yet a deputy presiding officer would have to carry anywhere from 200,000 to 400,000 ballots in order to be sure he would have a ballot available for a man from any constituency. Many battalions in Canada went over in the first place from one constituency. These battalions have been broken up and the men scattered around among other battalions from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Men have been wounded, have gone back to England, and when they recovered and were sent back to France again they did not return to their original battalions. Then we have corps like the engineers, raised from the Atlantic to the Pacific. You will find in one small company of engineers, consisting of 700 or 800 men, men from almost every constituency in the country.

Another consideration is this—as has been pointed out by the hon. gentleman himself—the men would be unacquainted with a great many of the candidates. There is also another point. The men at the front do not know, in many cases, what constituency they belong to. We had a revision of the constituencies in this country, and there are men over there now who have no idea as to what constituency they belong to. It is absolutely necessary to get the information from the man himself in some way, perhaps not exactly in the form we have it on the back of this ballot, but the information must be obtained from the man as to the locality from which he comes, so that his vote may be properly allocated to that constituency. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) says they will have 27 days to prepare those papers and the ballots, but he must remember that part of those 27 days will be taken up by the voting. Some of the men must vote before the expiration of the last week. Some of the men must vote before they go to the trenches, and others after they come out.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: The same thing happens here. There are many people who cannot vote here.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is no reason why the soldiers should not vote. We want to make this Act so that the soldier can vote.

Mr. LOGGIE: I would like to draw attention to the fact that there is a great likelihood of spoiled ballots because of writing in the name. In the province of New Brunswick we have a ballot on which either the names are printed or the voter may write in the name of the candidate for whom he wishes to vote. Because of this conflict between the local ballot and the federal ballot, a great many ballots are spoiled.

It is not an unusual occurrence to find a cross put in front of some of the names, thus spoiling the ballot. One danger, I think, would be to allow the voter to write the name of the candidate he wishes to vote for, unless he had something to guide him. He would likely think that was sufficient, whereas, as I understand it, the ballot would be spoiled unless there was a cross after the name.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not in this proposed ballot. If the voter simply writes in the space "I vote for Mr. Loggie" that will be a vote for my hon. friend, without any cross, or anything being added to it.

[Mr. Arthurs.]

Mr. LOGGIE: But, if in addition to that he puts a cross at the end of it, would that spoil the ballot?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. LOGGIE: That covers the difficulty I had in mind on that score. Another question which presented itself to my mind was the question of the independent candidate. I see that is qualified under another section, rather along the lines that there should not be more than three condidates, namely, a Government candidate, an Opposition candidate, and an Independent candidate. I can conceive of cases where there might possibly be two Independent candidates.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think there are five in one Ontario constituency now.

Mr. LOGGIE: There may be an Independent Liberal candidate.

An hon. MEMBER: Impossible!

Mr. LOGGIE: Or there might be an Independent Conservative candidate. I simply draw the attention of the minister to the ballot in New Brunswick, where voting in local elections was entirely different from that in federal elections, and we found a great many ballots spoiled because of that. It is very desirable that it should be made clear to the voters, so that the same thing would not happen in this case.

Mr. DOHERTY: I wish to say a word in reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). In the first place the hon. member observed that such a form of ballot had never been used in any British country. I hold in my hand the form of ballot used in the Australian election that is on all fours with ours.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I know, but I said that no such ballot had been used in ordinary times.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, we are in extraordinary times. It seems to me that the ballot we propose has all the advantages which the hon. gentleman was claiming for the ordinary ballot, and has in addition the advantage of enabling men, of whom there may be many, who do not know the candidates, and who do not connect them either with the Government or the Opposition, to express their opinion whether for the Government or for the Opposition, while at the same time it does not take away from them the privilege of voting for individual candidates if they desire to do so. When we come to the other provisions of the Bill my hon. friend will find that there is a special provision for taking all the steps that we could think of to enable the soldier to become aware of who the candidates are. If we are successful in conveying that information to the soldier, and as a result of that information he wishes to vote for an individual candidate of whom he knows, he can do it with this ballot.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does not that only apply to the case of Bermuda and other places outside of Canada but in North America?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, we have made provision for the sending of information with regard to the nomination of candidates to the other side as well as to Bermuda and other places, and we have also provided that the special officers over there shall take means of spreading this information. While we have tried to take every step possible to get the information to the soldier, we cannot, of course, count that every soldier will get the information, nor even that, if every soldier gets the information that John Jones and Peter Brown are nominated in his constituency, he will know what John Jones and Peter Brown represent. To the extent that we get the information to the man, if he had the ballot in the form which the hon. member for Halifax suggests, he would be in a position to use it. Then we hand him a ballot by which he can do identically the same thing, that is, write in the name of the man for whom he wants to vote. If he should happen not to have that information, then we present him with a ballot which leaves him in a position to vote for his preference for the Government candidate, or the Opposition candidate, or the Independent candidate. By handing out this ballot we do not deprive a man who is in a position to do it by reason of the knowledge which he possesses of the opportunity of voting for the individual candidate. But we make it possible for every man to exercise his franchise to the extent of voting for the Government, or the Opposition, or the Independent candidate. Then, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), if a man who gets a ballot with nothing on it but the names of the candidates, may or may not know what it is that these men stand for, he may or may not know anything about them and he may have no personal preference in regard to them. That man with the ballot advocated by the hon. member for Halifax would be called upon to vote in the dark, whereas with the ballot we offer him, if his reasons are personal, then he may vote for the candidate whom he favours. If his reasons are not personal, and he desires to support the Government, or the Opposition, or an Independent representative, he still has an opportunity of recording his vote in accordance with his own opinion. We take nothing from the man by giving him this ballot instead of giving him the ordinary printed ballot, but we do afford an opportunity to him, should he be in a position where the ordinary ballot would not be useful to him, to still record his vote in the manner we have provided for. What has been stated by hon. gentlemen who speak with practical experience of conditions over on the other side is conclusive as to the feasibility of carrying out the other plan. In the preparation of the Bill we gave serious thought to the question whether four weeks would be long enough to afford an opportunity to gather in the votes, and if we have to lose eight or ten days in getting these distributed to the proper officers, it will take a very long time. On the other hand, as has been pointed out, if the presiding officer has to go out equipped to take the votes in any possible constituency he will have to carry a tremendous number of ballots. Then, if there were not this practical objection, what I said at the outset is a conclusive proof that a man loses no advantage by this system of ballots. If he is in the possession of knowledge that enables him to vote for an individual candidate, he can do it, and if he is not in that position he may still vote by reason of the form of this ballot.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This form ought to have the word "candidate" after the words "Government" and "Opposition." "I vote for the Government" is rather a meaningless phrase. We should put in "I vote for the Government candidate" or "I vote for the Opposition candidate."

Mr. DOHERTY: We might add the word "candidate."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You have at the bottom this form of ballot: "I vote for the Independent candidate."

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, because we could hardly describe the Independent candidate without using the words "Independent candidate." The Australian ballot says "Ministerial" and "Opposition" and the voter records his vote by putting a cross opposite the word "Ministerial" or "Opposition."

Mr. MURPHY: Or writing in the name of any other person.

Mr. DOHERTY: Or writing in the name of any other person. The printing of the additional word "candidate" will involve the use of the word "candidate" or "candidates." I do not see what is gained by that additional printing because we have a provision in the Act for determining to whom the votes that are given for the Government and for the Opposition shall be applied. We get no further by the use of the word "candidate" being printed on the ballot inasmuch as the provision of the Act is that a ballot marked "I vote for the Government" is counted for the Government candidate or candidates and a ballot marked "I vote for the Opposition" is counted for the Opposition candidate or candidates.

Mr. GERMAN: Supposing there are more than two candidates in the field; that in certain constituencies there are four candidates, two to be elected. A man wants to vote for one of those who is a Government candidate and for another who is an Opposition candidate. Can he mark his ballot as voting for the Government and also mark it as voting for the Opposition, or write in the name of any other man? How is he to record his vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: Such a man would know the candidates and would be able to write in the names of those for whom he wished to vote.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In the Australian ballot that is all provided for; the number of candidates is mentioned and there is a space for the two names where there are more than two candidates.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is plenty of space to write in two names on our ballots.

Mr. GERMAN: Suppose a man voting for Halifax marked his ballot "I vote for Maclean," and on the same ballot voted for the Government candidate, would such a ballot be counted or be defective?

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course there may be combinations of circumstances where the man will not be able to record his vote just as he wishes, but I should like to dispose of one thing at a time. I should be disposed to believe that if there was a constituency where a man was entitled to two distinct votes there would be no difficulty in taking his vote.

Mr. GERMAN: I had the city of Halifax in mind and there might be two Government candidates. How would he indicate the Government candidate for whom he wished to vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: He would write in the name of the Government candidate for whom he wished to vote. I cannot conceive of a man having a personal preference for people whose names he does not know.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will these instructions be circulated among the soldiers?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, instructions similar to those for elections generally.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister say definitely whether the ordinary Elections Act applies to the taking of this vote? There are many precautions in reference to the ballot paper itself in the General Elections Act, such as paper of a prescribed weight, which is furnished by the King's Printer, and then the man who prints the vote fyles an affidavit describing the paper and giving the number of ballots supplied, and stating that no other ballot papers have been supplied by him to any one else. These are very important and necessary precautions.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think these provisions apply, and I do not think it would be possible to make them apply. The King's Printer could not furnish the paper on which ballots are to be printed on the other side of the ocean, partly owing to the difficulty of securing transportation, and partly owing to the danger of the ballots being lost in transit. The ballots are to be provided by the acting clerk of the Crown in Chancery in England. The other provisions that have to do with the printing of the ballot in the different constituencies by the returning officers could not be made applicable to the ballots that are to be printed for the use of 400,000 or 500,000 electors overseas.

I think that we can trust the acting Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to take such precautions as may be possible to control the ballots, but under the system provided here it would not be a great evil if some ballots that were not originally printed got into circulation. No ballot will be counted in this election unless it reaches the commissioner's office in France, or the commissioner's office in London, enclosed in a properly sealed up receptacle or box—the word " bag " makes some people nervous, so I would not like to mention it—and marked on the outside as military votes, containing in the interior all the papers used in the election, with the number of envelopes contained in it set forth and signed and certified by the military officer who is, at the same time, the deputy presiding officer, and every one of these ballots in an envelope containing the description of the man that voted. Really I do not think there is any great danger to be apprehended, supposing somebody managed to get hold of the ballots in the form provided here. The precautions that are both possible and desirable, when you are dealing with the printing of ballots which are being printed in the constituencies all over Canada, not under one general control or direction, but by different printers scattered all over the country, may have their reason for existence, and may be useful, and, perhaps, even necessary, but I do not think they are practicable in an election of this kind, and I do not think there is any serious danger to be apprehended by reason of the fact that they are not to be used under this Bill. We have to depart from some things that may be very useful in their way, if we are going to get the soldiers' vote. There is no substantial danger attendant upon the fact that the ballots are not being printed in that way. This question of precautions with regard to ballots was very thoroughly threshed out at the time we passed the Act of 1915, and it was not then found necessary to surround the printing of those ballots with all the formalities that are indicated in that section, and the present section reproduced that law with the distinction that I have pointed out, that as regards the overseas vote, the ballots shall not be sent from here by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, but shall be provided over there by the assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose that by the regulations which are provided for in the Act the officers on the other side will have ballot papers about the same as we have them here?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, by the regulation we will try to make provision for every detail we can properly control to make the ballot paper as effective a thing as it can be made. Those regulations will all be published, and everybody will know what they are.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I think it would be preferable to make a change in the arrangement of the order on the ballot. The great bulk of the voters will vote either for the Government or for the Opposition. The voters will commence at the top, and read down, and I think it would lead to confusion if the first thing they see is a blank for an individual. They would be very likely, if they knew his special candidate, to write his name in there, and then go further down and mark the ballot for the Government or the Opposition. The proper way would be to have first, Government, then Opposition and then Independent candidate, and if a voter does not vote for one of the three, he comes to the foot of the ballot, and writes in the name of the candidate. The number who write in the name will be small, because 95 per cent will vote for Government, Opposition or Independent candidate. I think there would be less likelihood of mistakes, if the ballots were prepared in that way. The Australian ballot reads in this way: first Government, then Opposition, and at the foot there is a line, and if you do not wish to vote for the Ministerial or Opposition candidate, you can write on the line the name of the man you want to vote for.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the Australian ballot is an improvement on the ballot in the draft Bill. The point I wished to make was not that I anticipated any trouble from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in England, but the difficulty to my mind is in regard to the printer. If some London printer prints those ballots, there can be no reason why the same rule should not apply to that printer as applies to the Canadian printer. All he has to do is to make a short affidavit, stating the number of ballots he has printed, and that he has not printed any ballots for any one except the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery or the officer to whom they are to be delivered. That is a proper precaution to be taken, and there is no difficulty in the way of taking it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall look into the question. If that is applicable it will be made to apply, but as I pointed out, it is a provision about the printing of ballots which is being done for returning officers scattered all over the country. There may be necessity for a greater minutial of detailed instructions to those gentlemen, as to what they are to do, than is perhaps necessary when we are dealing with the printing operations which are going to be entrusted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to look after, and if I could really see the substantial danger to be apprehended because the printer did not make the affidavit that he did not give some of these ballots to somebody else, I would be glad to make that provision.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He might print too many.

Mr. DOHERTY: Supposing the awful thing happened, and he printed too many, what harm would be done?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I will tell the hon. gentleman in a minute. It is a great advantage to a man who is intending to be fraudulent in an election to have possession of ballots, because he can distribute them to voters, and can mark them, and when the voter goes into the compartment he has a marked ballot in his pocket; he can change it for the ballot handed him, and all kinds of fraud can be performed by having a supply of printed ballots. The minister does not require me to tell him that, because it is one of the difficulties we meet in conducting an election. This precaution in regard to the printer was taken to avoid anything of that kind. It is a proper precaution, and I think the minister ought to adopt it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Whether it may be better or worse, the hon. gentleman is talking of a system which is not the system under this part of the Act. Under this section of the Act, as was the case under the Soldiers' Vote Act which is now in force, the provision for protection against that sort of thing is that the elector has to mark his ballot, not in a secret compartment, but where the presiding officer can see that the voter is marking the paper he gave him, but not seeing how he is marking it. This section is already the law, and when we come to deal with it, if we have to go over it again, I shall be glad to explain why it is necessary.

If we try to put minute details in an Act of this kind we may defeat our purpose, because under conditions that exist on the other side it may not be possible to meet some of the detail that we have insisted upon. We asked the officer who had been connected with the framing of the Act in Australia for advice as to how to make this Act effective. He made certain suggestions, but the thing that he insisted upon chiefly was that the law be not made rigid. He said: You have to make it as elastic as possible, consistently with the taking of the necessary precautions. If I thought that there was any substantial danger I might be disposed to make provision for the submission of an affidavit in the matter, but that does not strike me as being necessary.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. MORPHY: The Minister of Justice seems to have such a clear grasp of the conditions of this Bill that I rise with a good deal of diffidence even to offer a suggestion. I notice that in this ballot there are columns 1, 2, 3 and 4, and that No. 4 contains the words: "I vote for the independent candidate." But there may be three or four independent candidates. There might be a Socialist candidate, a candidate representing the grain growers, or a candidate representing the labour interests. The Australian ballot has the clause: "I vote for the independent candidate whose name is written below." In some of the large centres—Montreal, Toronto or Hamilton, and other cities—there might be three or four independent candidates. It seems to me that the Bill is incomplete in not providing that the name of the particular candidate may be indicated.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Australian ballot could be utilized only in the way indicated if the voter knew the name of the independent candidate whom he wanted to vote for. Under our ballot, if he knows the name of the candidate for whom he wishes to vote, he has only to write the name in. According to the Australian plan the voter states two things: first, that he wants to vote for the independent candidate, and, second, that he wants to vote for John Smith. Under our legislation, he will simply say: I want to vote for John Smith —and the result will be absolutely the same in either case. There may be difficulty if you have two or three independent candidates and the voter does not know whom to vote for, but when he knows the name, there will be no difficulty under our ballot. I confess that I do not quite know how we can provide the means by which a man can vote, no matter what may be his degree of ignorance in regard to the conditions prevailing. The best we can do is to provide the means for the men to vote under circumstances which may reasonably arise. There may be exceptional instances in which a man, by reason of his lack of knowledge or the lack of completeness of this ballot form, will not be able to find a method of expressing exactly what he wants. I think, however, that we get as near exactitude as we can get—certainly as near as the Australian ballot does get in this particular.

Mr. MACDONALD: This is one of the most important sections of the Bill and I am sure that every hon. gentleman, without party feeling, would like to see it left in the best possible form. Many of the difficulties that have been suggested as to knowledge on the part of the soldier with regard to how he should vote would be done away with by providing that the lists of the candidates, which, it was suggested, should be cabled over, should be printed and posted within the lines of each battalion. In the camps in England each battalion has certain grounds set out for itself, and almost invariably at the adjutant's tent there are billboards upon which various notices of interest to the men are posted. When the names of the candidates are cabled over to the proper official, he could have posted upon the battalion boards a list of the counties of the Dominion. There would be no difficulty in that respect so far as the battalions not actually engaged in fighting are concerned. Those who have been actually engaged in the trenches for a certain period of time, are relieved by their comrades and are allowed to rest within the battalion lines while their fellows are taking their places. Within the battalion lines, then upon these boards containing the orders issued by the officers for the information of the men, these lists could be published within a week after the names were sent from Canada. If that were done, a great difficulty would be done away with. The boys over there are intelligent fellows. Every one who has been within the lines of a battalion knows how continuously the men cluster round these boards to see what the orders are. Every soldier would be interested in the election and he would be enabled to ascertain who were the candidates in his own particular county. The percentage of men who would not be acquainted with local conditions would be very small. If hon. gentlemen will think of the men who have gone from their own constituency they will realize that the percentage of those who would not be able to tell whom they wanted to vote for, even though they saw the names of the candidates on the battalion boards, would be very small indeed. If provision is made to this end, in the first blank space on the ballot the voter should be given an opportunity to vote for the particular candidate. If my hon. friend is going to send the ballot papers to the proper official over there without any identification marks of any kind, there will be left on the public mind the impression that the ballots were not properly identified. My hon. friend said that affidavits and all that sort of thing would accompany the ballots. That may be true. But it would always be possible for either party to stuff the ballot boxes if the papers were not properly identified. Why not have some particular identification stamp on the ballot? I know that in some of the provinces the ballots are identified by a perforated stamp. If the ballots were marked in this way it would remove all possibility of the introduction of a ballot which was not official in every way. I am making these suggestions solely with the idea of getting the Bill perfected. I would ask the minister whether he could not arrange to lay on the Table to-morrow some battalion lists, with the names of the men and officers. I know that the Militia Department issues lists of the names of the men and officers of all the battalions that have left this country, with their whereabouts, and all that sort of thing. I have quite a number of these lists myself, but some hon. gentlemen have not seen them, but I think an inspection of them would facilitate the discussion and be helpful to hon. gentlemen who are not familiar with military conditions. Could not the minister arrange to have placed on the Table to-morrow for the information of the committee two or three of these battalion lists with names?

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to ask the Minister of Militia if he can procure the information suggested. I think there is a great deal of force in what the hon. member has said as regards the order of the spaces, notwithstanding the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Antoine. With all the means that we are taking to circulate the information as to names, I would rather anticipate that the great bulk of these ballots will be marked by name, because if hon. gentlemen will look at the next section they will see that we have inserted a special provision that the names, addresses and descriptions of the several candidates who have been nominated shall be sent by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to every officer in command of Canadian troops in Bermuda, and to every presiding officer appointed to arrange for the holding of polls within Canada, and the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery transmits the information to all presiding officers of whose appointment he has been notified. We have not specified all the details of what these officers will do. It seemed to us that would be a more proper matter for regulations or for the instructions which it is provided are to be sent out.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think every hon. gentleman who knows anything about military matters will agree with me that it will be perfectly feasible and of great advantage to have all this information posted up on the battalion board, and I think we ought to have a provision to that effect in the Bill, rather than leave it to the instructions.

Mr. DOHERTY: When we come to the next section I would have no objection to providing that the presiding officers, when they receive the information, shall post it up in such manner as shall be indicated. I should be glad to meet my hon. friend's suggestion as to identifying the ballot if we could do that without creating too much red tape, but I think a moment's reflection will show that it is no small undertaking to impose on the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the obligation of separating 500,000 distinct ballots, and affixing a stamp on each one of them.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are not that many Canadians on the other side.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are 350,000 then.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not on the other side. My hon. friend has not been following the figures.

Mr. DOHERTY: Will the hon. gentleman object to 250,000?

Mr. MACDONALD: You are doing better.

Mr. DOHERTY: It would be quite an undertaking for the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to sit down and put on the ballots an identification mark that would be of any value. Would it be desirable, if it should happen that two ballots got stuck together, and one went unstamped, and was handed out to a soldier that his ballot should be rejected? While taking all reasonable precautions, I do not want to do anything that would involve the risk of a man losing his vote through non-compliance with a formality of this kind.

Mr. MACDONALD: The votes of the men in camp in England could be taken just as easily as if they were in Canada. You have so many battalions in a camp, and all you have to do is to open your poll, and the vote can be taken just as easily as at home. There will be no trouble whatever at the camps in England, and there ought to be none in France, except in the case of the men in the front line trenches.

Mr. NICKLE: I would like to ask the minister what would be the effect if the name of a candidate were written on a ballot and a cross were marked opposite a square which was inconsistent with the political affiliation of that candidate? For instance, if it so happened that the name of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) was written in square No. 1 of the ballot, and a cross was marked in square No. 3, would that destroy the ballot?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the hon. member for Frontenac might be combined with an independent candidate. I have some evidence of his qualifications in that regard, but I dare say he would not link up with the Opposition. At first glance I should think we would be face to face with a ballot in which a man had voted for both sides, if he had voted for the hon. member for Frontenac, and likewise voted for the Opposition.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would it not mean that he was voting for the hon. member for Frontenac to go into Opposition?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the circumstances I do not see that we could treat it as otherwise than a vote for both sides, and it would not count. At the same time, I should imagine the predominant intention was to vote for the man whose name was indicated.

Mr. NICKLE: That was the point I intended to raise, and that was why I asked the Minister of Justice what his interpretation would be. It seems to me if the name of a candidate is written on the ballot, it clearly shows the intention of the voter to vote for that individual, and I think the vote should be counted for him, regardless as to whether or not there may be any inconsistency in the voter having placed a cross in any of the other squares. The object of the scheme is to secure the registration of the voter's intention, and if he names a man the vote should go to that man, regardless of what the voter may think the political affiliation of the candidate is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the case where there is only one man to be elected for a constituency, I should think that even although the elector voted for a man by name, and then also put his mark in the square for "Government" or "Opposition" if the leader of the Opposition was of the opinion that the man so named was the Opposition candidate the ballot should not be rejected, because there was a clear intention to vote for that man. A greater difficulty might arise in the case of a constituency where there are two members to be elected. Suppose that in such a case the man wanted to vote for two members and put the name of one and then put a cross. Take St. John, for instance. Supposing the man wanted to vote for Mr. Hazen and myself. Suppose he wrote the name of Mr. Hazen and then put a cross in the space for the Opposition. In that case, could the two votes be counted? Suppose he put a cross in both squares, thus marking his ballot three times, would that spoil his ballot?

Mr. DOHERTY: I would not be disposed to think that would spoil his ballot. For instance, a man who says "I vote for the Government" and then marks in "I vote for Mr. Hazen," assuming Mr. Hazen is the Government candidate, I think that man is simply saying the same thing twice, and I do not see any reason why his vote should not be counted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Even if he wanted to vote for me also?

Mr. DOHERTY: If he also says he votes for the Opposition, the difficulty that would arise would be to say which of the two Opposition candidates the vote ought to go to. Supposing the voter says "I vote for Mr. Hazen," and also marks a cross in the Opposition square. The man has a right to register two votes on that ballot, because there are two members to be elected. I should say if he says "I vote for Mr. Hazen" that vote should be counted for Mr. Hazen. If he says "I vote for the Opposition" that ought to be a good vote for the Opposition, because the elector is entitled to two votes. The difficulty that would arise, as was suggested a while ago, is for which of the two Opposition candidates could you count that vote?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think you would have to reject the ballot in that c se.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not see why you should reject the ballot, for the voter had expressed a perfectly clear intention. Supposing he said "I vote for Mr. Pugsley" and he also marked a cross opposite "Government," I would not think it fair that my hon. friend should be deprived of the vote clearly expressed in his favour because of the fact that the other vote is not sufficiently clearly expressed to give it to somebody. That man has exercised one of the two votes in a perfectly unmistakable way. I do not think we should nullify that vote because unfortunately he used his other vote in such a way that we could not ascertain who it should go to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Must it not be clear from the ballot which two candidates he wanted to vote for? Say he wanted to vote for me, in the case you put, and that it was uncertain whether he wanted to vote for Mr. Hazen or for Mr. Hazen's colleague. Under this Bill I think the whole ballot would have to be rejected.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think perhaps we might leave that for the courts to decide. The principle is that we should, so far as the intention is clearly ascertainable on the face of the ballot, but is not so expressed as to involve identification, give effect to that intention, and I think we should count that ballot.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are five constituencies where that very thing may occur.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a special section under which the consideration of these questions may properly arise. I refer to the section covering the method in which the ballots will be dealt with. We will have to consider the whole question when we take up that section. I think we should adopt any method that can be found to give effect to the intention of the voter.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in regard to the case of a voter who has plainly written the name of the candidate in space No. 1. Assuming he wrote the name of the Minister of Justice there.

Mr. DOHERTY: He could not do much better than that.

Mr. MORPHY: Probably so. In some regards, I think the hon. gentleman is quite right. Having done that, there is a specific act on the part of that voter who has perhaps voted for the candidate for non-political reasons, or out of friendship, or through acquaintanceship. Then through confusion of the ballot, or perhaps by inadvertence, he puts a cross in the "Opposition" square. Surely it could not be contended that that would be a spoiled ballot? There can be no plainer act done by the voter than to write the name in full of the candidate for whom he wishes to vote. It ought to be incumbent upon the minister to make that clear. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has a lot of friends, some of them Tories, who vote for him. It would be a pity if such a mistake should be made by the voter. I would ask the minister to say that it would be an injustice to declare that a ballot shall be spoiled where the voter writes the name of the candidate for whom he wishes to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am inclined to think that it would be justifiable to accept the writing of the name as overriding the cross that would be put opposite the printed word "Opposition." I have made a note of it because we could only deal with it by way of an amendment to a section which comes later on and which describes how the ballots are to be counted. That would be the proper place to insert a provision to carry out what seems to me to be a pretty generally accepted view.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose that if we allowed this section to pass it would not be understood that we would be at all committed to the form of ballot but that we could come back to it?

Mr. DOHERTY: I would be open to any suggestion as to the form of ballot. I was quite impressed with the desirability of carrying out the suggestion of the hon. member for Pictou that we should add a space for a labour candidate.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister would agree that we would be enabled to go back to it we might allow it to pass. But, we are not over all the difficulties yet.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will make no difficulty about going back to the ballot if there is any suggestion to be made.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) made a suggestion that might be applicable to this section and I think the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) raised a very important point. If we would consent to this section being passed and then adjourn, the minister has assured us that he will have no objection to our going back or to making any suggestions concerning it. The real pith of the discussion is as to the form of the ballot which we have been discussing. Will that be satisfactory?

Mr. MACDONALD: On the understanding that if we find that we have to move an amendment we will be able to do it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall not make any objection, if we cannot come to any agreement, to another amendment being suggested as long as the language is not too strong.

Section agreed to.

Progress reported.

On mention of Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

[Mr. Morphy.]

Wednesday, August 22, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

NON-COMBATANT POSITIONS.

Mr. MACDONALD:

How many officers and men are permanently employed in positions which are non-combatant, in connection with the Overseas Militia Department in London, England?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: None of the officers and men employed in London, England are permanent except those that have been seconded from the permanent staff and permanent force of the Canadian active militia. All of them, except those that belong to non-combatant units in the military sense, such as Canadian Army Pay Corps and Canadian Ordnance Corps, are combatant.

Mr. MACDONALD: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the fact that the answer he has given is an evasion of the question. I should like my hon. friend at a later date to answer my question by stating how many officers and men have been sent over from the permanent staff and permanent force to perform the duties to which I refer. As to the minister's reference to the fact that those who belong to non-combatant units in the military sense are combatants, I would point out that I was referring to the non-combatant positions, not to the men themselves. My hon. friend's answer, therefore, is not an answer at all, and I should like an assurance that later he will give me the information for which I asked.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There was no intention whatever to evade the question put by the member for Pictou. His question clearly is:

How many officers and men are permanently employed in positions which are non-combatant?

The word "permanently" is understood to mean permanently as opposed to temporarily; the word has the same effect in the camps in England as it has in Canada. Men who are non-combatant in a military sense are men who belong to the Army Pay Corps, the Ordnance Corps and units of that kind. Does my hon. friend refer to those who are occupying positions of a civilian character? If he will be good enough to put his question in some way so that the information sought will be clearly defined, we will try to answer it.

Mr. MACDONALD: The men who are employed in connection with the Overseas Militia Department are certainly non-combatants while they are so employed, no matter what corps they are attached to. In his answer my hon. friend excepted those men with reference to whom information should have been given. I will put the question in another way, and I hope I shall receive the information that I am seeking.

NATIONAL SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. How many men, officers and employees of the National Service Commission are of military age?
2. What are their names and respective salaries?
3. Who, if any, have military badges, and on what grounds in each case have they been granted?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. None.

2 and 3. In view of the above answer these questions do not arise.

BUILDING OF WOODEN SHIPS.

Mr. PARDEE:

1. Are wooden ships being built in the Government Dry Dock in Prince Rupert?
2. Is the plant in operation?
3. If not, what is the reason therefor?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. There is no Government dry dock at Prince Rupert. The dry dock to which presumably reference is made is one owned by the Grand Trunk Pacific Development Company. The Government are informed that no wooden shipbuilding has yet been commenced at this dry dock.

2 and 3. The Government are informed that a considerable amount of ship repair work has been done at this dock. The Government have been in communication with the Imperial Munitions Board and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and earnest efforts have been made to secure the commencement of a shipbuilding programme at Prince Rupert. It is understood that up to the present it has not been possible to arrive at a programme that would ensure such deliveries of material and supply of labour as to justify the letting of contracts.

MONCTON ARMOURY SITE.

Mr. COPP:

1. Did the Board of School Trustees for the city of Moncton ask for the use of the site of the new armoury in the city of Moncton for school garden purposes?
2. If so, was said request granted?
3. Was any part of this lot used by families of soldiers who have gone overseas?
4. If so, what are the names of the soldiers whose families are using same?
5. Was this site, or any part of same, used for any other purposes? If so, for what purpose?
6. Has any rent been paid by any person, or persons, for use of said lot? If so, what amount and to whom paid?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.

2. No, as it has already been decided to set apart this land for the use of soldiers' families for agricultural purposes.

3. Yes.

4. No. 709049, Pte. W. A. Weldon, 5th Canadian Mounted Rifles; No. 709511, Pte. Dale Weldon, 20th Battalion; No. 1030313, Pte. Donald G. Grant, 236th Battalion; No. 507296, Pte. A. J. Grant, Signallers; No. 649181, Sapper Frank Cuthbertson, 6th Canadian Railway Troops; No. 477216, Pte. E. Cuthbertson, Royal Canadian Regiment; No. 355, Pte. B. L. Wadman, Canadian Army Dental Corps. All these soldiers are overseas, with the exception of F. Cuthbertson, whose battalion is yet in Canada; and E. Cuthbertson, who is at the Signal Training Depot, training for service overseas.

5. Yes. Red Cross Society, of Moncton, for patriotic purposes.

6. No.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, communications and documents of all kinds referring to a request for having the mail from Marble Mountain come from Eden Platform instead of West Bay Road.

SIR GEORGE PERLEY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): I see in a press despatch that Sir George Perley is coming back to Canada. I would ask if that is true.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I hope he will return to Canada some of these days, but I have no information that he contemplates a speedy return.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I ask the Minister of Finance if he will be good enough, before we return to the discussion of the Canadian Northern Bill, to get information for the committee as to whether or not the obligations of the Canadian Northern Railway which fell due on June 1, July 1, and August 1 were met, and if they were, were they met by means of advances made to the company by banks in Canada who did so at the instance of the Government, which agreed to recoup them, and if so what are the names of those banks?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will consider the question of my hon. friend. I do not know precisely what he refers to. He mentions the obligations of the Canadian Northern, but he does not state what those obligations were. I will take it up when we are in committee again upon the Bill.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: What amounts have been spent by the Canadian Northern on the Mount Royal tunnel, and the Montreal terminal.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think I can obtain that information for my hon. friend. If I am not able to do so before we are again in committee on the Bill, my hon. friend may raise the question anew.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: When we were discussing the Canadian Northern Bill, I made allusion to the fact that the stock had been pledged to the Bank of Commerce, and the Solicitor General stated the stock had been so pledged. I would be glad if the minister would bring before the House a statement of the amount of advances made by the Bank of Commerce to the Canadian Northern in respect of that stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I might say in answer to my hon. friend that the advances referred to by the Solicitor General are those made to the owners of the stock, not to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. No company can borrow against its own stock. As I understand it the advances were made to Messrs. Mackenzie, Mann and Company upon the stock and other assets, in the usual course of business. I have no information as to the amount, and I do not regard it as relevant to the discussion on the Bill.

Mr. NESBITT: I ask the Minister of Finance if the announcement in the Gazette to-day that the Canadian Northern had raised $10,000,000 on Dominion Government securities, is with respect to the repayment of some maturing loan on an old guarantee that had been put up as collateral for the present financing?

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not had my attention drawn to the article to which the hon. gentleman refers. The Canadian Northern Railway Company has a loan, secured by Government collateral, maturing about September 1, and they have been negotiating to renew that loan, or to make a new loan from the proceeds of which the old loan could be paid off. I have no doubt the announcement refers to that transaction.

Mr. OLIVER: The sense in which I desired the information I asked for was possibly not the sense in which the Minister of Finance understood it. I desired the information for the purpose of taking in some degree, the measure of the value of the stock as evidenced by the transaction between the holders of it and the Bank of Commerce.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I said that, as far as I understood it, no loan had been made specifically against the stock. There is no connection between the amount of the loan made and the value of the stock. My hon. friend, let us say, has an account with his bankers and they have a lien upon his assets, but the lien is upon the entire amount of his assets, including in the amount a particular security. It is not the case that a specific loan is made against a specific security.

COAL SUPPLIES IN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE ON THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he will give us a report with regard to the coal situation. He said yesterday that he would do so to-day.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can give a very general statement in reference to the coal situation, which, if it has not been followed closely by the members of the House may not be within their knowledge. The coal situation in Canada, as it presents itself, is about as follows: The production last year of non-anthracite coals in Canada amounted to 13,800,000 tons. Of that production a little over 6,000,000 tons came from the Maritime Provinces (Nova Scotia almost entirely); 2,800,000 tons was raised in British Columbia, 4,600,000 tons in Alberta, and a small proportion in Saskatchewan, making altogether the amount raised about 13,800,000 tons. That, however, was not sufficient for the needs of Canada, and in addition to that about 13,000,000 tons of bituminous coal had to be imported from the United States. Of the importation of bituminous coal, about 2,500,000 tons went to Quebec, 5,500,000 tons to central Ontario, 5,000,000 tons to the Georgian Bay and lake ports. The importation of 13,000,000 tons and the amount raised in Canada of 13,000,000 tons represent our available supplies for consumption after deducting about 1,800,000 tons, which was exported for bunkerage and other purposes, and some little which was exported to the United States. That is the situation in reference to the bituminous part of the coal business.

As regards anthracite, we are dependent for our supplies under present circumstances on the United States. Last year 4,500,000 tons of anthracite were imported into Canada. About one-quarter of a million tons went to the Maritime Provinces, a little over 1,000,000 tons went to Quebec, a little over 2,000,000 tons to Ontario and a small proportion—half a million tons or so—to Manitoba and the near west provinces. In addition to the bituminous coal amounting to 13,000,000 tons imported therefore, we imported anthracite coal to the amount of 4,500,000 tons, making a total importation of fuel coal for domestic and industrial purposes of 17,500,000 tons.

Anthracite stocks in this country were pretty well lowered last year, or at the end of the last coal year, and probably 1,000,000 tons extra will have to be imported of anthracite in order to make up for the deficiency, which means that we are dependent upon the United States for about 18,000,000 tons of coal.

With reference to our own production of coal, there is not any possibility that I can see that the amount raised this year will be in excess of the amount raised last year. In the West there have been coal strikes, and consequent delays and confusion, which have reduced to that extent the possible output. In Nova Scotia the shortage of labour, owing to enlistments and other causes, has been so great that it has been impossible for them to add to the production this year. On the other hand, the consumption demand in the Maritime Provinces has increased and the situation in that respect is that what is raised in the Maritime Provinces will not be more than sufficient to take care of the needs or demands of the Maritime Provinces. What formerly came to Quebec (quite a large proportion of it from the bituminous output of Nova Scotia) will have now to be supplied by imports from the United States.

That is the situation in so far as Canada is concerned and therefore the situation in the United States becomes of more interest to us. What then, in its brief and broad features, is the situation in the United States? The normal output of anthracite coal in the United States is between 67,000,000 and 68,000,000 tons—last year it was 67,700,000. The output of commercial bituminous coal in the United States, sold on the market, last year was 509,000,000 tons. The beginning of the coal year, the first of April, had found the supplies in stock not very large, but production, despite all difficulties, has increased from April up to the present time and the total amount raised, both anthracite and bituminous, for the period of the present coal year has been considerably in excess of what was raised last year.

The question comes: If there is any amount of coal in the United States and the output has increased as compared with last year, why the high prices and why the consequent fears of shortage? There are several principal reasons for it. In the first place there is a vastly increased demand in the United States for industrial and war purposes. The increase of steel which is computed to be necessary this year and which will be forthcoming, calls for an increase of 40,000,000 tons of coal for that special production alone. The cotton textile factories, the munition factories and other industries, stimulated now by war needs, are calling for increased quantities of coal. The railways have to do the hauling and it is computed that the railways this year will require thirty per cent more coal for haulage purposes than they consumed last year, which works out at about an extra amount of 40,000,000 tons or over. That has to be taken into account and it is not possible or probable that the demand will be decreased. In proportion as industry carries on its work of war preparation coal becomes more and more necessary.

One cannot understand the coal situation in the United States, even comparatively, unless he also takes into account the transportation situation which is so intimately connected with the distribution and even the production of coal, as tardy or speedy distribution forms a most important element in coal mining. There has been a comparative shortage of railway transport for coal purposes. Barges and ships along the Atlantic coast and barges and ships on the lakes have been transferred in large tonnage quantities from the carriage of coal to the carriage of more remunerative freights. Many of these vessels, both on the lakes and on the Atlantic coast, have been diverted into war activities, either by purchase or by charter. Thus there has been and is a shortage of shipping carriage for coal. With reference to the railways, the demands upon them for the carriage of other freight than coal have been very great. They have not in the United States a co-ordinating body such as our Railway Commission, but, in order to cope with the situation, some months ago the railroad presidents of the United States met in Washington and voluntarily submitted themselves to the regulative control of a committee of five or six railway men. The American railroads are now administered so far as transport arrangements go, as if all were under one system and managed by this railroad war committee. As a result of their work, voluntary entirely, they have cut out, up to the present, more than 16,000,000 miles of train services and have thus saved thereby 1,120,000 tons of coal, which motive power, man power, and fuel power can now be diverted to more necessary carriage. They have also taken hold of the car distribution and within the last three months have diverted 106,000 empties from railways where they could be spared to railways and districts where they were more necessary and where they could do better service. That shows the improvement that is taking place.

One point to be taken into consideration is that most of the mines in the United States have not storage facilities. They depend upon the coal being carried away as soon as it is raised; and it is the custom of the men in most of the mines, I am told, not to go under ground unless the cars which are to take the product away are there ready for loading; and if the cars are delayed and are not available for loading, no work, or less work, is done in the mines, and to a corresponding extent there is disorganization and confusion amongst labour itself. A part of the shortage which has occurred is, of course, due to the transferrence of alien labourers by hundreds of thousands to European countries to the colours of those countries.

As to what is being done in Canada, the fuel controller and his aides are busy at work on two lines, first to co-ordinate the activities of the dealers and shippers and the transport facilities in Canada with a view to equal distribution of the coal when it once arrives at the border, and, second, to look after the supplies that are necessary in the various sections, to ascertain what they are and to make arrangements for their being filled. On the other side of the line the work of the fuel controller and his aide is to keep in co-operative touch with the authorities, the coal miners and operators, the transport facilities and so on, as well as with the Government authorities, to work in touch and unison with them, to get their sympathy and their aid so far as possible. These two lines of their endeavour are being carried on with great pertinacity I know, and I think with very considerable success.

From this short survey of the situation two things are patent as to what Canada will be required to do. It is not impossible, with the wide powers that have been conferred upon the President of the United States and with the work that is being done to ascertain and to regulate the prices and the output, and with the wide powers that we possess to regulate prices and tariffs, that, if activities are maintained as they now are, both the United States and Canada will be, to a certain extent, put upon rations with regard to coal, as distinguishing between absolutely necessary services and services which are not so necessary and which may be dispensed with. In Canada we are taking measure to bring about a complete co-ordination between the different railway companies as to the disposition of cars and the direction of traffic with the view to the saving of coal, just as we are saving in foods. I believe myself that this is absolutely necessary, and that we can do a great deal in that way.

I have not given to the House particular figures with regard to particular lines that are being followed; it is, perhaps, not best that I should. With reference to the lakes, hon. members will have observed last night that orders have been issued by the Washington authorities to several of the great railway lines to give preference to coal carriage from the mines up to the ports on the lakes so as to provide for the supplies which are necessaries to go up those lakes during the open navigation season in order to provide for winter necessities.

I have endeavoured to give, as briefly as possible, an idea of the general situation, information which helped me, as I came to understand it, to see the question in its true light, and which may be somewhat helpful to the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) made no reference to the arrangement which he said some two weeks ago was being made by the Government to place some vessels at the disposition of the authorities in Halifax and St. John, with a view to obtaining ship transportation from the anthracite mines of the United States to those ports. Would my right hon. friend say whether those arrangements have been completed, and, if so, whether the vessels have been placed at the service of these authorities and when it is expected the carrying of coal to those ports will commence?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My statement still remains true, with some modifications, which it was hinted at the time would be necessary, as to the facilities for unloading large vessels. The fuel controller and his helpers in Halifax and in St. John, had a conference in Montreal, and went over that situation. I think the view is that the transport situation is loosening up considerably with reference to the employment of the smaller vessels, and that there is possibility of getting service at a more reasonable rate. The offer is still open and can be carried out in reference to the larger vessels, to which I referred, in the carrying of large cargoes. The whole matter is under the close advisement of the fuel controller and his helpers in St. John and Halifax, in co-operation with the Department of Marine. My hon. friend (Mr Hazen) may have some other knowledge about it.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine): Some time ago my department took steps to obtain vessels for the carrying of coal from the mines to Halifax and St. John. Great difficulties have been experienced. First of all, we had released, for the Dominion Coal Company, a large ship which had been commandeered during the war by the British Government. We made representation as to the necessity of having that ship in commission for the coal trade. In addition to that, we succeeded in placing at the disposal of this company vessels which had been commandeered and those vessels have been employed in taking coal to Halifax and St. John, and have relieved the situation, so far as the supply of bituminous coal to these cities is concerned. Some time ago our attention was called to the danger of an anthracite coal famine at St. John, Halifax and other ports, and, on looking into the matter, we found that the dealers at St. John, Halifax and other places in the Maritime Provinces were justified in exacting the very high prices they charged for coal, in consequence of their being called upon to pay enormous freights for the transport of the coal from New York to points in the Maritime Provinces. The Maritime Province dealers did not purchase from the mines, but purchased generally through dealers in New York, and whereas the carriage of coal before the war cost about $1.50 a ton from New York to points like St. John and Halifax, the schooner owners and vessel owners were now charging as high as $6 a ton, or four times the freight charges before the war. In view of this, we notified the fuel controller that the Department of Marine and Fisheries would be prepared, if the dealers obtained the coal for the Maritime ports, to furnish vessels for the purpose of transporting it at what would be regarded, under all circumstances, as a fair and reasonable rate of freight. The vessels that we proposed to place at their disposal were vessels of 3,000 tons. The hard coal which comes to Maritime Province points has not come in large quantities, and it was carried in vessels of 500 or 600 tons or less. The difficulty arose that because the dealers in these places had not facilities for handling great quantities at one time—they had not coal pockets, and storage facilities, for large consignments—it was represented by authorities in St. John and Halifax that, if ships of 3,000 tons were placed at their disposal, it would be impossible for them to handle such large cargoes. The day before yesterday, as stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a conference was held in Montreal, at which were present the fuel controller, Mr. Magrath, representatives of the coal interests in Halifax and St. John, and other places in the Maritime Provinces, and the Deputy Minister of Marine. I believe that the general opinion expressed was that there was practically little, if any, danger of a coal famine at any of these ports. It was the consensus of opinion that the matter was largely a schooner proposition, and that the coal must be carried by schooners, and not by the larger vessels. Under these circumstances I have authorized the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries to say to the Fuel Controller that if we are informed that cargoes will be available I will be prepared to recommend the commandeering of schooners to bring that coal to Maritime Province ports at prices considerably less than the prices now charged. It will be possible to do this, in conjunction with the coal dealers, and if this is done I think it will have the effect of lessening very materially the prices that are being charged at the present time.

Mr. OLIVER: If I might be permitted, I should like to make the suggestion to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in regard to the coal situation in Alberta—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman would be quite out of order.

LOCATION OF EXEMPTION TRIBUNALS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DEVLIN: I desire to ask the Government, through the Minister of Justice, what progress has been made by Mr. Plaxton in establishing localities for units of exemption under the Military Service Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to answer the question fully, but I may say, in a general way, he has gathered very considerable information, and I think the location of the different places where the tribunals are to be established is just about decided.

Mr. DEVLIN: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if, at the time instructions were given to Mr. Plaxton to go on with the location of tribunals of exemption, the Government had obtained the assurance, as under the constitution it was bound to do, of the Governor General's assent to the Military Service Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: These are questions which the hon. member had better place on the Order Paper.

Mr. DEVLIN: The question is one of vital importance.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is one of the reasons why I have suggested that it should be placed on the Order Paper. The hon. member cannot on such a matter expect an off-hand opinion from the Minister of Justice. I must say to the House that I have endeavoured not to be too strict in restricting questions put when the Orders of the Day are called. I think I have erred upon the side of giving too much latitude in this respect. Many questions have been put to which, in view of the times and the conditions we are living under, I have not raised objection, but I fear that some hon. members have abused the privilege and have asked many questions which ought, more properly, to be placed on the Order Paper in regular form. I must ask hon. members to assist me in keeping as closely as possible to the rules.

Mr. DEVLIN: Do I understand that my question is not in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to place his question upon the Order Paper.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE WAR VETERANS' ASSOCIATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the hon. Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) received the resolution of the War Veterans' Association, to which reference was made a few days ago, when he said he would inquire into it; if so, has any action been taken with regard to it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: When my hon. friend from St. John brought this matter to my attention, I had a search made for the resolution, throughout the different branches of the department, and I am unable to find that the resolution has reached the department at all. I have searched in every branch of the department for the resolution, but I am unable to find it.

THE MILITARY VOTERS' ACT, 1917.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

The House again in committee on Bill No. 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917—Hon. Mr. Doherty—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 6—Information as to the candidates.

Mr. MACDONALD: What has the minister to say as to my suggestion last night that we should provide for the posting of lists of candidates upon the notice boards of the various battalions?

Mr. DOHERTY: This provision is to ensure that information as to candidates will reach the different presiding officers at the earliest possible moment. Of course, the purpose of making the provision was that these officers should be in a position to circulate that information so that it might reach the soldiers. I would expect that they would use every means in their power to attain that result. I had it in mind that the details of how they should do that might, perhaps, be dealt with in regulations or instructions under the Act. I did say last evening—and I am willing to adhere to it—that, if hon. gentlemen thought it desirable, we could add to this section a provision that the presiding officer should circulate this information by every means at his disposal—or some general words of that kind. We could hardly name in the statute the particular places where he should put the notices up. In the Dominion Elections Act a returning officer is instructed to put up his posters in four of the most prominent places in the district; he is left that much discretion. Perhaps what I have suggested would cover the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister is always talking about this matter as if mysterious difficulties had to be overcome in order that this information might be conveyed to the soldiers in the camps in England or in France. There is no reason why there should not be a definite statement that publication of these lists shall be made in each of these camps. Under the Dominion Elections Act, a returning officer in Canada must publish notices giving the place of holding the election, the subdivisions of the different ridings where the election is taking place, and the particular places where the polls are to be held.

We have in England 127,000 men, located in the different camps and hospitals. If the minister will look at the military regulations—it is most difficult for hon. gentlemen to get a copy of them—he will see that there are most effectual methods of conveying information to the rank and file. Any one who has ever been through a camp knows that near the adjutant's tent there are a number of bulletin boards on which notices are posted. The soldiers make a point of looking for these notices, and in that way any information the commanding officer desires to communicate is quickly disseminated. These bulletin boards are found in every camp in England and France and at the hospitals, and every soldier overseas, except those who are in the front line trenches for a week at a time, or whatever it may be, could be informed of the names of the candidates in that way. Why should we not definitely provide in the statute that the information shall be posted on these boards? Twenty-four hours after our nominations close, the proper officials in England will know the names of every candidate in every constituency in Canada, and the information could be printed and posted up within a further twenty-four hours.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection to putting in as much detail as it is reasonable to put in a statute, and I have no objection to accepting my hon. friend's suggestion. All I was a little apprehensive of was that if we specified one particular method it might happen that some more effective method of communicating this information to the soldier would be available to the presiding officer, and I had in mind that in the instructions or regulations we should provide that he use every available means of conveying this information. It does seem to me that it would be wiser to adopt that form, rather than to specify one particular method, which, in some instances, perhaps by accident, might not be available.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it would be well to follow as closely as possible the method of conveying information that is followed in an ordinary election. Of course, it is not necessary to post up notice of an election in this country, because the people have evidence of its approach practically every night during an election campaign. But around every polling station placards are posted saying where the poll will be held. As the hon. member for Pictou says, in every camp there are bulletin boards, by means of which the commanding officer can convey to every private in the ranks any information he desires to give, and the news is very quickly disseminated. Could not the minister provide in the statute that the information shall be posted on these boards in the same way that commanding officers furnish other information to the sub-officers and privates, and that where this means is not available some other means shall be adopted? If we leave the door wide open, one presiding officer will use one means of giving the notice and another, another. There would be no uniformity, with the result, possibly, that a large number of those entitled to vote would not see the notice at all. I think it is preferable that the notice in regard to the election should be posted in the same way that other information is posted for information of the soldiers.

Mr. DOHERTY: The section provides that this information shall be transmitted through all presiding officers. Perhaps we might add to the section something like this:

> Presiding officers shall cause placards containing this information to be posted on the bulletin boards in all camps where the same may be possible, and shall use all other available means of bringing this information to the knowledge of the soldier.

I had in mind something of that nature to be inserted in the instructions. With regard to the requirements in this country, I would point out that the places where this information is to be posted are left to the discretion of the returning officer. Section 88 provides that:

The returning officer shall cause such proclamation to be posted up within the electoral district for which the election is to take place, at four of the most prominent and conspicuous places in each city, town and village, or ward of such city, town or village, when it is subdivided into wards, and at four of the most prominent and conspicuous places in each parish, township or division of parish or township.

I think what I am suggesting now is more definite than that, as it requires that the notice shall be posted on the bulletin boards in all camps, where that is possible, and further than that, that every other reasonably available means be used to bring the information to the knowledge of the soldier. I desire to meet the views of hon. members if possible, but with all respect, I do think that this is a matter that might, perhaps, have been left to the instructions to be given to presiding officers.

Mr. MACDONALD: We have had the opinion of the hon. member for New Westminster as to what the officers on the other side shall do, and in view of the statements that were made by him, a Government supporter, I do not think the minister can complain against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The amendment suggested by the minister seems to cover the ground reasonably well, except that it says: "the bulletin boards in all camps." Now, each battalion or corps has a bulletin board, and unless the minister adds something like this: "the bulletin board of each battalion or corps," the notice might be posted on the bulletin board of one battalion in a camp and the men belonging to other battalions might never hear of it at all.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection to inserting that also. I had used the word in the plural, and I thought it would cover all the boards in the camp. In the definition section of the Act, "Camp" is made to cover every place where there is a gathering of soldiers under the command of an officer. It would therefore cover every place where a bulletin board might exist. I have no objection, however, to accepting the suggestion, and I therefore beg to move that section 6 be amended by adding the following words:

Presiding officers shall cause placards containing this information to be posted upon the bulletin boards of each battalion in all camps where the same may be possible, and shall use all other reasonably available means to bring such information to the knowledge of the military elector.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the information?

Mr. DOHERTY: The list of the nominations made in the different electoral districts.

On section 7—Nomination and polling days.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does this mean there shall be no deferred elections in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. The intention is there shall be no deferred elections in Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not even in the county of Chicoutimi?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not even in the county of Chicoutimi. I must make one correction to that. We have found that with regard to the Yukon territory it would be impossible to carry this out without making a very undue delay between the issue of the election writ and nomination day, and, therefore, I desire to move an amendment to the section. I have not under my hand at the moment the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act which make it clear that this undue delay would be caused if we made the nomination day all through Canada await the time when it would be possible to comply with the present requirements of notice, etc., with regard to the Yukon Territory. I therefore beg to move:

That section 7 be amended by inserting in the third line thereof, after the word "districts" the words "except the Yukon Territory."

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the minister sure that the twenty-eighth day might not fall upon a Sunday, or a holiday?

Mr. DOHERTY: It will not fall upon a Sunday unless we fix nomination day upon a Sunday, and I thought perhaps we might be entrusted with having sufficient reverence for the Lord's Day not to fix nomination day on a Sunday. As regards statutory holidays, I also think we might be trusted to so arrange nomination day that the corresponding day in the fourth week thereafter will not be a statutory holiday.

On section 8—Conduct of polls:

Mr. CARVELL: I have not had an opportunity of taking part in the discussion of this Bill, on account of absence; but going over it hurriedly this afternoon, it seems to me that paragraph 5 of section 8 is a very, very serious departure from the recognized principles necessary in holding elections in Canada. I realize that there is some difficulty in applying all the well-recognized principles of holding elections in Canada to elections held in war time, and many of the provisions which are being passed here must be very largely experimental. At the same time it is not right to allow a returning officer—I do not care who he may be or how he is appointed—to carry a polling box or bag around as he wants to, and get the men here and there and allow them to vote without having any person present. I know that appeals to the Minister of Justice as being an unfair provision. I can quite understand there may be cases where there will be a great deal of difficulty in having a really organized poll, but there can be some machinery provided by which some person representing all the interested parties can be notified of the time and place of the voting. We all know that many people are unfair about elections, and there is no use of us shutting our eyes to the fact. Every man in this House knows that even under the most rigid protection which can be afforded by statutes, you will have unfair practices at elections. As the Bill is, if a man wants to be unfair, you simply put the power in his hands. You hand over to an officer who is chosen by the Government—and I notice last night the Minister of Justice held the Government was not to throw away their powers of conducting the elections, and I admire him for his honesty, because he has admitted that they are going to run the show.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what the minister admits. Therefore, if he is going to run the show and is going to appoint political partisans to hold these elections in the army, while I admit that there are a lot of men who would not violate their oaths of office, still we know what is liable to happen. He is liable to get men who will not be as scrupulous as others will be. It is an absolute violation of the principles of decency and honesty to allow a man under any circumstances to go around and take votes under conditions which he might say were all right, but under condition in which there would be no opportunity of having anybody present to watch him. I hope the minister will consider clause 5 very carefully and that he will either eliminate it or throw some protection around it, so that there cannot be any possibility of fraud. Everybody admits that the soldier should have a vote. Yet there should be every precaution taken so that there will not be a feeling in this country that unfair methods are being adopted to secure an advantage for one party as against another.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not desire to contest the proposition that an unscrupulous person could abuse his position. But let us get away from the unscrupulous person for a moment and look at it from the side of the soldier voters. What I had in mind in making that provision was this: Soldiers, at the time that the poll is going to be held, say to-morrow, are ordered into the front line, or into the trenches.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is only in France.

Mr. DOHERTY: It possibly might be a good suggestion to limit it to France. That is the class of soldiers that I had in mind and that is the sort of condition with which a conscientious deputy presiding officer could deal. I have such an abiding faith in human nature that I am loth to believe that our officers over there who will be appointed, although they will be appointed by the Governor in Council, like all officers that ever were appointed in this country, would seek to avail themselves of such a provision in order to fraudulently pass over a vote. I would be quite ready to adopt any wording which will restrict that provision in such a way as to diminish any possibility of fraudulent action in regard to it. I would be sorry to sacrifice the provision as a whole because we all know that these voters that we are trying to enable to vote will, in large numbers, do their voting in the valley of the shadow of death. Under these conditions I think it would be unfortunate, if a soldier goes the day before we had arranged for a formal poll at the place where he is to be, and if he is to face death in the performance of his duty, that he should be absolutely prevented from registering his vote in the event of his never getting back. I would anticipate that there would be agreement perhaps that, if it is a reasonable proceeding to provide an opportunity for him to record his vote, it should be provided. I realize that it does provide a possibility for fraudulent action if you have an unscrupulous voter and an unscrupulous deputy presiding officer. I would really have been glad if I could have conceived of any provision to meet that condition. I would be glad to accept any suggestion with that end in view.

Mr. CARVELL: I can offer my hon. friend a suggestion right off. There is no reason for a provision of this kind in Canada or England. These are two things that might be eliminated.

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to England, these men are being constantly taken in drafts. A regiment cannot go and most of the men do not go as units to France but they go in drafts. The presiding officer has fixed his poll in a camp in England, say, for the day after to-morrow, and to-morrow a hurry-up call comes for fifty men to go. Must we say that they will have to vote at a formal poll, of which the scrutineers have been notified so that they may be there to verify their votes?

Mr. MACDONALD: They could vote in France.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is all very well if they get to France in time.

Mr. MACDONALD: Nobody crosses to France who does not go through a period of preparation before going to the trenches and every man who crosses does not go into the trenches. Thousands of men in other corps that are auxiliary to the fighting forces are not called upon to go to the front at all. The men who go to France stay at a base for a period of preparation.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is one instance and it may be that that the answer is sufficient. But I understand that men are brought back to England, many of them wounded and some perhaps in a dying condition. Men in large numbers, unfortunately, are severely wounded. Many of them, no doubt, are in danger of death. Many of them die day after day. What I would like to get at by this provision is to make it possible for the votes of these men, under these conditions and circumstances, to be taken without the formality of a poll.

Mr. CARVELL: If that is all the minister wants I think we can arrive at something, that is all I want.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would be very glad to get a suggestion from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not the minister of elections, but I know something about elections in Canada. I presume that the gentlemen who have gone overseas have not ceased to be human beings because they happen to have put on the khaki. The minister seems to balk at the expenditure of a little money in order to take this vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. CARVELL: Because I notice that only a very limited number of scrutineers are to have their travelling expenses paid. There is more money being squandered on the Maritime Provinces general staff alone than would provide for a hundred elections in France. They are spending $400,000 on the general staff, and when you add to that separation allowances to their wives and a great army of typewriters, batmen, servants and hangers-on, I am sure you will have $600,000 or $700,000 that is being paid—I will not say squandered—on the little general staff in the Maritime Provinces. Why cannot the minister spend a little of this money in order to secure a fair election in France? Why can he not have it arranged in some way? I am not just giving him the wording, but if he would accept the idea I would very soon give him the words. The situation would be met if he would provide that no vote shall take place except in the presence of the scrutineers for both parties.

There must be a scrutineer for each party, whether there are two or three, and if those men should be officials paid by the Government the cost involved would be only a few dollars at the very outside. There is no occasion for a hurry-up call such as my hon. friend describes. While such a condition of affairs might exist, I think he is magnifying the possibility of it, because men do not leave England on a day's notice, and when they arrive in France they do not go at once to the front, but to a base. The presiding officer should not be allowed to receive a ballot except in the presence of a scrutineer for each party, and then all the ballots taken should be sealed up and signed by the scrutineers in such a manner that they could not be tampered with or broken open until the final counting. This could all be done very simply and at a very slight expense. There is no occasion to permit the presiding officer to go behind the barracks, or wherever he finds a man who has a right to vote to receive a ballot, and put it in a bag and keep the bag open for a month, the ballot not even being sealed in an envelope. If the minister wants an honest vote, I am pointing out a simple method of greatly improving the machinery for taking it. Surely he should adopt every safeguard which will tend to convince the people and the soldiers that they are being given an honest opportunity of voting and that when they have voted their votes will be counted and that everything will be right. I am not going to try to hold up the legislation, but I have not before had an opportunity to express my views. I have suggested concisely what, to my mind, would be the remedy for a great evil. I do not insinuate that all the officers he would appoint would be unfair; in fact I think a very large proportion would be fair, would be on their honour and would respect the honour reposed in them. But still, as it is framed, it leaves the suspicion, it leaves ground for argument all over the country, and if the Bill goes through as it is there will be no weapon in the hands of the opponents of the Government that will be as powerful and as potent as the holding up before an audience the provisions of this Military Votes Bill. I appeal to the minister to take this into consideration and see if we cannot agree on something which will be perfectly fair and will give every soldier an opportunity to cast his vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: As to making it possible to have a sufficient number of scrutineers, the Bill certainly gives every opportunity. The complaint is that we do not pay the scrutineers. But the scrutineers are similar to those who take part in elections in this country. Here is a Bill which enables each political party to create from among the soldiers who are on the spot as many scrutineers—while they are called deputy scrutineers they have all the powers of scrutineers—as they may think suitable or necessary, and the Bill confers upon the deputy scrutineers all the powers of an agent of a candidate under the Dominion Elections Act. Thus it cannot be suggested that, so far as a multitude of scrutineers is concerned, this Bill does not do everything that can be done. Then we are reduced simply to the question of payment of those deputy scrutineers. As I have said, they will, in the very nature of things, be men on the spot, and why should we provide payment for expenses of gentlemen who will not have to travel? Nobody would suggest that we should remunerate or pay the travelling expenses of scrutineers engaged in elections in Canada. The hon. gentleman overlooks the fact that these scrutineers are not to be sent from Canada to carry on the scrutineering operations. I think that, on reflection, he would not suggest that we would send into the camps a lot of civilians to do this duty. I would assume that each of the parties, looking after its legitimate interests, would provide a number of scrutineers at each camp, and especially at each base, where there are soldiers gathered.

Mr. GERMAN: How will it be possible for soldiers to obtain leave of absence from duty to act as scrutineers in a general election, perhaps for two or three days? They have other duties to perform.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, so far as it may be impossible consistently with their military duties, for these men to perform their duties as scrutineers, I have to admit that they will not be able to do so.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is trying to compare the condition of affairs in Canada with those in France. He must know that there is a difference. In Canada, if I am running as an opponent of the Government, I have just as much right at a poll as the Government man. I am on the ground, and I can have my agents, and if I fail to appoint my agents, my friends can appoint them. We know each other. and we know the people, and we have all the machinery for protecting ourselves. But when it comes to the army at the front, it is quite different. It may sound very well to say that they provide scrutineers, but the hon. minister knows that the army is under the control of the Government from the day a man is enlisted until he comes back and is discharged. The Government have every facility in the world in the matter. They have access to all the papers whereas I have not the faintest idea where my electors overseas are located. I suppose I have 1,500 electors from Canada over there. I could not tell to-day where twenty-five of them might happen to be. My opponent has all this information, or he could get it from the Government. He could get the name and number of every one of these soldiers, and he could send them literature and instructions. He could appoint his agents and could be represented by his agents at every camp.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does my hon. friend not think that hon. members on that side of the House, and we on this side could be trusted, under ordinary circumstances, in the affairs of life, and in matters of sport, to do the square thing? Why, then, cast a shadow of suspicion and send it through the country, until the fame of the country fairly stinks in our nostrils? Why can the hon. gentleman not give the Government credit for some common honesty such as you find exhibited, say, in a hockey match?

Mr. CARVELL: I think I can trust my hon. friend to be fairly decent in an election. I do not know whether he would trust me or not. I do not know whether it makes very much difference, but if he thinks he can turn me away from my views on the matter by throwing mud——

Mr. BURNHAM: I would trust the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CARVELL: Thank you. All this talk about reverencing the soldier is claptrap. We are willing to give him every respect and give him an honest opportunity to cast his vote. but, for Heaven's sake, quit talking nonsense. There never is a time that the word "soldier" is mentioned in the House that somebody does not get up and try to do the highfalutin act, as my hon. friend behind me says—I was going to say the nonsensical act. Treat the soldier as a man, and stop trying to wave the flag; get away from all this nonsense and talk business. I say that we, as an opposition, have no opportunity whatever of reaching these people, and getting our agents and our machinery in motion to run an election. There is no use in denying the fact that a soldier is a human being, just the same as he was when he was a civilian in Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: Sober or drunk?

Mr. CARVELL: He is a human being just the same.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend used to characterize him as "drunk." How does he characterize him now?

Mr. CARVELL: It is two years since I answered a question of my hon. friend, or held any communication with him, and I am not going to start it now. There is one man in this House who is beneath contempt.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is the hon. member from Carleton.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not propose to parley with him.

Mr. KYTE: The reports from Fredericton do not go well just now for the other side of the House.

[Mr. Burnham.]

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. gentleman can see the difficulty of being represented by scrutineers at all of these places, unless there is some special provision made for it. I am only asking the minister to provide that, wherever a poll is held, a scrutineer for both parties must be present, and not merely a scrutineer for one party. I ask that, because the hon. gentleman can see the almost impossibility of the Opposition candidate being represented, unless there is some provision made for an official recognition of the scrutineers. My hon. friend talks about the fairness of this, and says it is all done the same as in Canada, but if he will turn to section 8 he will find that this voting does not take place in the presence of the agent. Section 8 says:

(4) The deputy presiding officer shall permit any scrutineer or deputy scrutineer, or, in the absence of both, any one military elector, to be present at any poll, and to act thereat as agent on behalf of any party, with the powers of an agent of a candidate at a poll held under Part III.

If my hon. friend will refer to section 9, as to the manner of voting, he will see that. Subsection (c) provides that the voter shall answer under oath before the deputy presiding officer the questions set forth. Subsection (e) says:

(e) The ballot paper shall be marked in the presence of the deputy presiding officer, but in such manner as not to disclose to him or to any other person any marking thereon.

The presiding officer in all probability will be the colonel of the regiment, and this soldier is taken in, in the presence of the presiding officer, and must mark his vote in his presense, excepting that the presiding officer will turn his back to him.

Mr. DOHERTY: He is holding a poll at which the scrutineers must be present, and have all the rights of representatives of the candidates.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot read that in section 9.

Mr. DOHERTY: It never occurred to my mind that, having said that these gentlemen might be present, and have all the rights of agents of the candidate, that it would be necessary, at each successive step, to say that they should be present. I take it for granted they are to be present at the holding of the poll, and we proceed to say what the presiding officer shall do at the holding of the poll. All this time these scrutineers are present, and if there is the slightest doubt about it, I will be happy to repeat it in every section.

Mr. CARVELL: Subsection 9 does not bear out the hon. minister's statement. Subsection 3 of section 8 reads:

(3) Where conditions make it reasonably possible, the deputy presiding officer shall give public notice of the time and place of an intended poll, and, in cases of polls to be held without Canada, a special notice to any person whose appointment as a scrutineer or deputy scrutineer has been communicated to him, with the request that he so notify.

I should like the minister to tell me how in the world is the Opposition candidate going to be able to notify the deputy returning officer? How would I know who was going to be the deputy returning officer in a poll in France? I have no means of knowing it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does the hon. gentleman understand that it is a matter of appointing scrutineers to represent a particular candidate?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I do not think so. He is to represent the party.

Mr. DOHERTY: All these deputy scrutineers are to be appointed by three scrutineers, who are appointed on the nomination of the leader of the hon. gentleman's party.

Mr. CARVELL: I understand that.

Mr. DOHERTY: They could certainly ascertain the whereabouts of men whom they would be willing to trust as scrutineers. I would suppose that these three scrutineers would familiarize themselves with conditions in England and in France and ascertain where the different groups of men were and where services of deputy scrutineers would be required.

Mr. CARVELL: How can they do that? The voting is to commence the day after nomination.

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision is that the voting may begin the day after nomination, but the obligation is imposed upon every presiding officer who holds a poll to give these notices. Though the period in which voting can legally be done extends from the day after nomination until the polling day, the requirements of the statute with regard to the giving of notice must be complied with. It had not entered into my mind that in a place where the giving of notice was possible, a presiding officer would arrange for the holding of a poll the day after nomination so as to make the giving of notice impossible.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not strike out the words "where conditions make it reasonably possible"?

Mr. DOHERTY: Would hon. gentlemen desire that, if conditions made it impossible to give notice, the soldiers affected should be deprived of their vote?

Mr. NESBITT: I cannot imagine any condition that would make it impossible. They have twenty-eight days within which to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know what our respective powers of imagination may be. These men to whom we desire to give the vote are living under conditions where they may be voters to-day and may have gone over the great divide by to-morrow.

Mr. MACDONALD: That does not apply in Canada or in England.

Mr. DOHERTY: In Canada or in England the conditions will always make the giving of notice reasonably possible.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should the whole of the machinery provided by this section be established on the assumption that we are dealing with men who are voting in France? Why should not the men who are in Canada vote the same as private citizens do? Why should not the same thing apply in England? For each battalion of 1,000 men in England, five polls ought to be provided, at each of which 200 men could vote, under proper conditions and on a day to be fixed. The only place where you need to provide for special conditions is in France. Why word the provision in such a way that any presiding officer anywhere can dispense with notice?

Mr. DOHERTY: Everywhere in England it will be reasonably possible to do these things, and wherever it is reasonably possible all these things will be done.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why make any special rule for England?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have not made any special rule about England; we have made a general rule for everywhere.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend or his agent on the other side must appoint deputy presiding officers. Why should there not be a scrutineer for each deputy presiding officer, that scrutineer to be present wherever the deputy presiding officer and his clerk hold a poll or accept a vote? If the minister makes provision to this effect and pays the scrutineers for their services, then you will have an honest poll. When the polling has been finished, all the documents should be sealed up and signed by the deputy presiding officer, his poll clerk and the two scrutineers. These documents could then be sent on to Paris or London—and there would be no question whatever of unfairness. My hon. friend would not experience any difficulty in having standard scrutineers accompany each presiding officer. I suppose that any one presiding officer will not work more than a day or two, because he will be appointed in respect of a particular place; he will take the vote, and that will be the end of his duties. There is no necessity for subsection 5 of this section. My hon. friend talks about the men being taken away in a hurry; that upon a day set for polling the men might have to be sent off to the trenches; there might be an emergency. My hon. friend is conjuring up something as a justification for the insertion of this clause in the Bill. He knows that these men do not go to the trenches on ten minutes' notice. A regiment goes into the trenches; the men stay there for a certain number of days and then come back for a number of days' rest. There are twenty-eight days within which the vote may be taken. There is no reason why all these votes cannot be taken at the rest camps in the rear in the presence of scrutineers. There will be no occasion for the deputy presiding officer taking one, one hundred or one thousand votes in any other than the ordinary way, in the presence of the proper officials and of the scrutineers of both parties. My hon. friend knows also that the men do not go from England to France on a day's notice; they have at least a week's notice. Surely there can be some co-operation and confidences between the commanding officers and the general office in London as to the movements of the troops. The returning officers could be notified as to the movements of a certain corps or unit during the subsequent eight or ten days and the polling could be arranged accordingly. We are not trying to block my hon. friend's Bill; we are trying to make it workable, fair and reasonable, so that the people of the country as well as the soldiers themselves will realize that a fair and honest method of voting has been worked out for them.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am willing to assume that the statement with which the hon. gentleman concludes is perfectly true. I have not suggested that in any criticism or suggestion that has been made there was anything but the very best intentions. I might suggest that a little reciprocity on the subject would not do any harm.

[Mr. Carvell.]

However that may be, if the absence of that reciprocity is considered useful, I can stand it. Let us see just exactly where it is that we differ about these different details, and we will take first the question of the selection of scrutineers. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that scrutineers for each party will have to be appointed by that party. Now our law provides for that; it empowers each party, through its three chosen representatives, whose expenses we pay, to select scrutineers. They have perfect liberty of selection. If the hon. gentleman goes with me so far, then the difference between us turns exclusively upon the question whether the Government should provide payment for these scrutineers.

Mr. CARVELL: That is one difference.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is one difference. I do not know whether I made myself clear, but as I understand it, the scrutineers will require to be military electors, unless we are to send in to all these different military camps groups of civilians. We thought that so objectionable that with regard to the election officers themselves we have provided that they shall be military electors. That was also done in the previous Act.

Mr. CARVELL: Suppose the Opposition scrutineer should suggest that a certain sergeant should be appointed as scrutineer. Is there anything in this Bill that provides for that sergeant getting leave of absence for the purpose of acting? My hon. friend forgets the fact that he has all the machinery in his hands, and we have none in ours.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to try and answer all the different questions, but it is rather disconcerting when one is answering one question to have another one put. I was trying to get down to the successive things on which we differ, and I said that the first thing on which we differed was the question whether the Government should pay these scrutineers. Now, unless we are going to upset very materially military operations, it must be anticipated that just as election officers themselves are military electors, the scrutineers will also be found among the military voters. During the preparation of this Bill it has been impressed upon me from the other side at the instance of military officers, that we should see to it that the officers appointed in connection with this election should be military men, whether privates or officers. I think in all reason it must be agreed that the scrutineers will have to be found among the same body from which it has been found necessary to provide that the election officers shall be selected. If that is true, and they have to be appointed by these chosen representatives of the respective parties, it seems to me that we have done everything that could be done in the way of providing facilities for naming, whether we pay the scrutineers or not. Now what is the advantage in our paying them, unless it is going to be an encouragement to seeking scrutineers in one place who will have to move away to other places to perform their scrutineer duties? I do not think the hon. gentleman himself would anticipate that the military authorities would be willing to consent to that sort of thing.

Mr. CARVELL: Why not? That is the very question—this is an election.

Mr. DOHERTY: Because, even if this be an election, the proper carrying on of the military operations at the front does seem to me to be more important than this particular election.

Mr. CARVELL: A couple of dozen men cannot upset military operations at the front, where 100,000 men are employed. It is no use talking nonsense of that kind.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member asks me a question, and when I try to answer him he says it is no use talking. What would he like me to do? If I sat down and was silent he would still complain. I am offering what I believe to be perfectly sound reasons. Of course, his judgment and mine may not agree, because I have not the advantage of possessing 5 p.m. the judgment of the hon. gentleman, and I am limited to offering such observations as in my judgment appear to be well founded and sound. It is a matter of intense humiliation to me that my views do not meet with his approval but hardly a disappointment because I did not anticipate very much else. The hon. gentleman quite understands that we shall not reach any helpful results by this sort of commentary on the observations that are made.

I take it that these men must be military men and it does not seem to me to be more reasonable to suggest that a scrutineer shall be provided from a camp, say in England, to go to France to be scrutineer in another camp, than it would be to suggest that here at home I should send to Halifax or Vancouver or some other place to find a scrutineer to help me in Ste. Anne's Division. As long as I am paying the expenses myself, and as long as I am dealing with people who are under no obligation superior to the obligations they may think they are under towards me, I am at perfect liberty to do that if I think proper. But we must always remember that we are carrying on an election among men who have very important duties to perform, and I ask the hon. gentleman himself, is it reasonable to suggest that when in any camp of any importance there are, as there must be, numerous friends and supporters of both parties in this country, we should make a provision in this Bill to make it possible, and even to encourage, one or other of the parties to go looking for scrutineers under conditions which would entail travelling expenses? I really think there is no fair ground for complaint in the fact that conditions are such as to make it necessary for the respective parties to select as their scrutineer people who will be on the ground and who, being on the ground, will of necessity not have to go to any expense in the performance of their duties.

Mr. COPP: How is the candidate going to know where his friends are who will act as scrutineers?

Mr. DOHERTY: I thought we all understood that we had not in contemplation the providing of scrutineers to represent particular candidates. I myself, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman says of the immense opportunities that I have for knowledge of where my electors are, must say that I have never so far been able to find out where particular soldiers were. I have not had occasion to ask for them in connection with an election, but have had occasion to ask for them in connection with other things. Last evening the hon. member for Pictou asked whether we could not lay on the Table samples of lists showing, among other things, the whereabouts of soldiers. I asked the Minister of Militia today whether such lists were available and whether they could be had, and he seemed to be under the belief that there must be some misapprehension with regard to the description of the lists which were referred to. I myself have no knowledge of the existence of such information being available to anybody. But even supposing that the hon. member knew where some of his friends were located, this Bill does not pretend to make a provision whereby it will be possible for him to select a scrutineer for himself, and send him to where his friends are.

Of course he may, if he has that information, communicate with the representatives of his own party who have the nomination of scrutineers, and they will, no doubt, be very glad to meet his suggestion, but the Bill does not undertake to make precise provisions so that every candidate may have scrutineers at the poll. The best we can hope to obtain is adequate provision for representation of the respective parties at the poll.

Mr. GERMAN: This poll is to be kept open continuously from the morning after nomination day until eight o'clock of the day of the election, so that votes may be polled morning, noon or night? There is no intermission at all? They can vote at night as well as they can in the day?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am obliged to my hon. friend for the information; I did not know that.

Mr. GERMAN: I ask the Minister of Justice if it is so?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill contains the information, and the Bill does not provide for polls being open all day and all night for four weeks.

Mr. GERMAN: I simply asked the Minister of Justice for the information.

Mr. DOHERTY: And I am giving the information.

Mr. GERMAN: Under the provisions of the Bill, is it not permissible that the poll could be held at night, just as well as in the day-time?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is permissible, and there might be conditions when night would be the most suitable time for everybody.

Mr. GERMAN: I just wanted the information. I was not at all impertinent to the minister; I suppose we are entitled to the information.

Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly, and the hon. gentleman has the information now. As I understood his question, he wished to know if the Bill provided that the poll should be open morning, noon, and night for twenty-eight days. I have tried to answer him.

Mr. GERMAN: I stated that according to the wording of the Act, as I understand it, the poll could be kept open morning, noon, and night until eight o'clock of the day of the election.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hours at which the poll may be kept open are not prescribed. Within that period they may be kept open at any time that military exigencies permit. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman would suggest that this should not be done. It seems to me we should leave it possible for polls to be held at such hours as may be most convenient under the particular circumstances as they arise.

Mr. DEVLIN: In the case of a man who might be on the point of leaving for France, is provision made under subsection 5 of section 8 to prevent him from voting again in France, or voting at two or three different points?

Mr. DOHERTY: The only possible safeguard we have against that, whether a man votes that way or in some other way, is that every voter is required to swear he has not previously voted in the course of the election; just as in this country the only precaution we have against a man voting more than once, if he can succeed in getting by the officers, is his oath that he has not previously voted.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister has not yet discussed the proposition I put up to him. Perhaps I may be allowed to place it before him again, and in doing so I wish to quote section 11, although we have not yet reached it, as indicating what I have in my mind. Section 11 at least presumes that a deputy presiding officer may hold more than one poll, or rather he may hold a poll, for instance, for the 25th Regiment to-day, for the 26th to-morrow, and for the 27th the day following. He may travel around from place to place. It also provides that when the bag is full he can seal it up, and start with another one. He does the sealing himself; it is not done by the scrutineer. Why could not the scrutineers appointed by the leader of the Opposition receive notice immediately upon the appointment of the deputy presiding officer that such and such an officer has been appointed. Then the scrutineer, or scrutineers, could be named to accompany that deputy presiding officer, and wherever the deputy presiding officer accepts a vote the scrutineer would have the right to be present. He would follow the deputy presiding officer around. There should be some direct provision that any man appointed as a scrutineer, or deputy scrutineer, should have leave of absence for the time necessary to attend to the voting. My hon. friend points out the difficulty of taking men away from their military duties, and I quite understand that difficulty, but at the same time we must remember this is an extraordinary condition we are providing for the soldiers. We must realize it is something that will only happen, I hope, once in our lives, therefore we should make a special law to provide for a special case. I have no idea how many deputy presiding officers there might be, but if they are going to travel around and cover extensive territory, there will not be very many of them. If they only take a poll in their own regiment, the amount of time they will require is not considerable, and their pay would be a mere bagatelle. I would like to see a deputy scrutineer for every presiding officer, and I think no ballot should be deposited in the box except in the presence of that deputy scrutineer. If my hon. friend will accept that principle he will eliminate a great deal of discussion in regard to this Act, and he will get his Bill through, because we can easily work out the details. After the ballots have been taken in any particular place I would suggest that those ballots be sealed up in a package, and signed by the returning officer, the poll clerk and the scrutineers in such a way that the seals could not be broken without detection. If the minister will accept that I am sure in a very short time we can arrange for the wording of the changes and the Bill can go through.

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to closing up the box immediately after the ballots have been taken, as compared with the system under which the box is to be finally closed and sealed only after it is full, or after the officer has taken all the ballots he contemplates taking, or it is possible for him to take, I may say these two systems formed the subject of discussion and consideration when we were engaged in preparing the Bill. When we come to the section dealing with that, I shall be glad to put before the committee the reasons which led us to the conclusion that this was the better way. If in the judgment of this committee the method suggested by my hon. friend is considered the better method, I shall be quite prepared to accept it. For the moment we might let that particular phase of the subject stand. With regard to the principle involved in connection with the scrutineers, as I understood it, my hon. friend suggested that every scrutineer should be notified of the names of the presiding officers?

Mr. CARVELL: What I suggested was that the scrutineers for each party—that is, the three scrutineers appointed by the leader of the Government and the three appointed by the leader of the Opposition—should be notified of the appointment of each deputy presiding officer, then they could arrange for scrutineers to represent each party.

Mr. DOHERTY: I certainly think he ought to have knowledge. When we provided for the appointment of these gentlemen and gave them all the rights of representatives of Canada, it did not suggest itself to my mind that they would not make inquiry. It must be remembered that the presiding officers named will not be very numerous. I would suppose that a dozen would be more than enough to take care of the work in England and France. I would have assumed that if I had been performing the duty of scrutineer on behalf of my party it would have been part of my business to make inquiry in regard to these deputy presiding officers. However, I have not the slightest objection to making it the duty of the presiding officers, as they appoint deputy presiding officers, to notify the representatives of each party. I have no objection to adding that provision to the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: Go a little further and provide that no votes can be polled except in the presence of the scrutineers, and then we will eliminate a whole lot of discussion.

Mr. DOHERTY: I realize that there is force in a great deal of what the hon. gentleman says on the subject, but, on the other hand, I must ask myself: Are we going to create a situation in which the soldier will have to lose his vote because he does not happen to be at a formal poll?

Mr. CARVELL: What is the difference between that man and a man in Canada who is a ratepayer and a good citizen and who loses his vote on account of not complying with the conditions of the law?

Mr. DOHERTY: The man in Canada is his own master and he has his own time. He may have to make a sacrifice to get to the poll, and if he is ill he may not be able to get to the poll. If he is not detained by superior authority, or if he is not ordered to go elsewhere, he will have an opportunity of polling his vote. Then he is not exposed to the dangers to which the soldier is exposed. I do not want to indulge in any highfalutin, but there are some facts in connection with this matter which are not highfalutin.' Surely it is a more serious matter to say to a man who is called to go away to-morrow to face death.

You cannot vote because the poll is not to be held until the day after to-morrow, than it is to say that to the man at home who is pursuing his ordinary avocation, although I quite admit that the man at home may not live until the day after to-morrow.

Mr. CARVELL: He is entitled to his vote just the same.

Mr. DOHERTY: Here we have a condition of affairs where it is permissible to vote at any period within four weeks. Here is a man going out and taking the grave chance that he will not come back or that he will come back severely wounded and in very serious danger that he will not live until the day after to-morrow. That condition may exist and it does exist in a large number of cases. If under these circumstances it is possible to have that man's vote taken without undue risk of its giving rise to abuses we should provide means by which it could be taken otherwise than at a formal poll.

Mr. CARVELL: I entirely agree with that and I think that probably the minister has shown that there is some difference between the citizen and the ordinary soldier because the soldier is under orders.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is that the only difference? Is he not performing a supreme service to the State?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, we admit all that. We admit that the soldier is entitled to vote. We are giving him 28 days to record his vote. The minister states that a man is sent to the front and that he is liable to be killed. Whether he is liable to be killed or not—I do not think there is any argument at all—he is a soldier and therefore entitled to his vote. If the minister would only meet the suggestion he would get rid altogether of the objection. Why not make provision that the presiding officer shall notify the scrutineer because you have got the scrutineers any way?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have pretty well got together so far—

Mr. EDWARDS: We cannot hear as well as hon. gentlemen opposite can. Would the minister let us know how far he and the hon. gentleman have got together?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have got together to this extent that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) agrees with me that, if it be possible that a soldier's vote could be taken otherwise than at the formal poll under conditions which make it necessary without any undue opportunity for abuse, it would be desirable that the vote should be so taken. All that is provided in the Bill is that it should be done otherwise than at the formal poll. I am not seeking to conclude from that that I have met the thing upon which we are agreed because I quite understand the suggestion of the hon. member is that, though it might be taken otherwise than at a formal poll, it ought to be required that a scrutineer would be present.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the point.

Mr. DOHERTY: And to that end we ought to make provision for the appointment of sufficient scrutineers. I am quite prepared to supplement the provision for the appointment of a sufficient number of scrutineers by imposing expressly upon the presiding officer who names the deputies the obligation of giving notice to the general representative of each party so that the latter may be in a position to know who the deputy presiding officers are and so that they will be in a position to provide a scrutineer for each deputy presiding officer.

Mr. CARVELL: One step further; let the deputy presiding officer be required to notify the scrutineer that he is going to accept a vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: Now we have reached the real question as to what is possible. If that is possible, why, of course, it ought to be done. We have already made it the duty of the deputy presiding officer, wherever the conditions make it reasonably possible, to give notice of the poll that he is going to hold. Perhaps, technically, the taking of one vote is the holding of a poll, but I do not suggest that it should be so understood. It seems to me that we have gone as far as we can go when we make it possible for each party to provide that there should be a scrutineer for each deputy presiding officer and have made it the duty of the deputy presiding officer, wherever conditions make it possible, to notify that scrutineer that he is going to take a vote.

Mr. CARVELL: You leave a loophole there.

Mr. DOHERTY: I concede that there is a loophole there through which some fraud may come in; but it seems to me that we have to choose between a loophole through which fraud may come and saying to the soldier that under such circumstances he will of a certainty lose his vote.

Mr. CARVELL: How will he be deprived of his vote by providing that the scrutineer shall be notified before his vote is taken?

Mr. DOHERTY: If the conditions that necessitate taking his vote otherwise than at a formal poll arise, say, this morning and the scrutineer has been called away for the day from the camp—

Mr. CARVELL: He would appoint some one else in his place.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will be satisfied with a provision that wherever it is possible to get the scrutineer—

Mr. CARVELL: It is always possible.

Mr. DOHERTY—I think I have gone about as far as I can go to meet the hon. gentleman.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is asking us to legislate for an impossible case. All our men are collected in camps, and when a presiding officer goes to camp to take the votes in it, his scrutineer will be with him in normal cases, and why should he not have him there?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am trying to make provision for the taking of a vote under conditions that will not occur every day and, with all respect, I do not think it reasonable to suggest that because you have a scrutineer appointed for the deputy presiding officer, that scrutineer will at all times be available. Now it is suggested that somebody else should replace him. I have no objection, in fact the provision for the holding of the poll provides for another military elector acting in the absence of the scrutineer, and I have no objection to make the requirement that wherever that thing could be done it should be done. Hon. gentlemen say there is never going to be a case where that will not be possible. Then I am not asking much for the soldier when I ask that that opportunity should be given to him, if the hon. gentleman should happen to be mistaken and such cases should arise.

Mr. CARVELL: If a scrutineer has been appointed on each side for each deputy returning officer—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the Dominion Elections Act there is a provision that if there is no authorized representative of either one candidate or the other, electors can come forward and claim the right to act at the opening of the poll.

Mr. CARVELL: That same provision is here.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Why could you not provide that if there is no official scrutineer present the deputy returning officer should select two men who should each represent one side and have the votes taken in that way? I should like my hon. friend to bear in mind that, notwithstanding all he has said, these votes are to be polled under conditions that none of us can realize, not even those who have been at the front.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would not be so in England.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am speaking of the men at the front and of what the Minister of Justice has in mind, the polling of votes at the front. I should like to impress this: the holding of an election in France and in Great Britain, particularly in France, involves the necessity of most careful provisions, but we must ensure the fullest possible opportunity for voting and at the same time provide adequate safeguards. That is the object of the Dominion Elections Act. That is the object of these provisions, which take into account the holding of an election in a situation that is very difficult and much more complicated than anything we have in this country. I should like to impress upon the committee that we ought to try to make the provisions of the simplest possible character. They will have to be carried out by men whose minds for the most part—I am speaking of those at the front—are intent upon the sternest duty men could be called on to fulfil and who would not have the opportunity to sit down and study these provisions very attentively. Therefore these provisions should be of the simplest possible character. We should avoid complex provisions if we wish to have the election carried out so that men will have a full opportunity to vote and also that no technical questions will be raised with regard to it. It seems to me that the provision I have suggested, which is very much like that in the Dominion Elections Act, ought to be reasonably satisfactory. It may be that this provision will never be invoked or, on the contrary, it may be invoked very often; one condition or the other will depend on what is going on at the front, on the developments of warfare which will be taking place when this Act is put into operation. Imagine endeavouring to carry out this Bill in the midst of the awful conflict raging during the last four or five days on the outskirts of the town of Lens! I think any one of us, without exercising his imagination to the full, can realize how intently the minds of all engaged in that struggle would be absorbed in the duties immediately before them, and of how little concern they would think the strict fulfilment of technical provisions of this Bill compared with the sterner duties facing them.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite agree with every word the Prime Minister has said, and I do not think that, with twenty-eight days in which to take an election vote, anybody would ever dream of trying to take the ballots of men engaged in a movement such as that around Lens to-day.

If the votes are to be taken at many different points you must have a returning officer and a clerk, who shall visit each point. I presume a vote would not be taken without the clerk, and why, then, should you not have the scrutineers also? My hon. friend says: "If there is nobody there to represent one party, the returning officer or deputy returning officer can appoint scrutineers. But supposing there is only one man present, how can you have scrutineers to represent a party? My hon. friend is too astute a lawyer not to be able to understand the proposition that is presented. These scrutineers are to be appointed by the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition. They are to be notified of the appointment of every deputy presiding officer, and then they have sufficient time in which to nominate a scrutineer for each deputy presiding officer, and the deputy presiding officer shall take votes without notifying the scrutineers. Of course, if he has notified them, and they do not come, it is their fault. That gives the scrutineer the opportunity, if he cannot be present, to appoint a substitute if notice is given. These things will then be worked out, and there will be a feeling that nothing which is unfair or underhand is being done. That is all I ask for. I think we should extend the section to include a private, so that, if necessary, a private could be appointed as a scrutineer. He should have permission to follow the presiding officer wherever he goes, and his travelling expenses should be paid. If you want to appoint a private, then appoint him, and give him leave of absence. No votes should be taken unless the scrutineers on both sides have been notified. They could make their own arrangements. If that is done a lot of the discussion will be obviated.

Mr. DOHERTY: We intend to provide that the presiding officer shall be notified of the appointment of the deputy presiding officer. I suggest, in view of what has been said, that the presence of the scrutineer or some representative of the candidate, should be provided for.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. CARVELL: Or proof given of his having been notified?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have drafted a proposed amendment that may perhaps be satisfactory, although the words may not be absolutely so. My proposed amendment reads:

> But such vote shall be so taken in the presence of the deputy scrutineer, or failing either or both, of a military elector or two military electors, who shall together with the deputy presiding officer sign upon the envelope in which the ballot is inserted a certificate that the vote was taken under this subsection, and the reasons which made it necessary.

Mr. KNOWLES: The whole principle of this Bill was accepted in former legislation. I have not discussed the different clauses, and I do not propose discussing them at any length. The minister seems to think the only purpose is to get the soldiers' vote, and that everything else must be sacrificed to that. He stands on the floor of this Chamber and says: Do I ask too much for the soldier; surely I am not asking too much for the soldier in this case? As I understand it, the minister is not here as a spokesman of the soldier, or to ask anything for the soldier. The duty of the Government to the soldier is to give him a square deal, without any politics, and it is perfectly right for the minister to endeavour to see that the soldier gets his rights. But the thing can be carried to extremes. I am as anxious as any person to see the soldiers get a vote, but, at the same time, the same reason that would make make me careful in regard to the abuse of the voting privileges of the civilian of the Dominion, would make me careful with regard to the voting privileges of the soldier. We have in the Dominion of Canada to-day many people who lose their franchise by some inadvertence, by an oversight or an accident of some kind, by their own fault it may be, but very often by somebody else's fault. A citizen's name is left off the list. He is not robbed of his franchise, but his name not appearing on the list, he is denied his suffrage, and there is no help for it. He has to do without it because the sacredness of our ballot must be protected, first, last, and always. We must remember that we are framing this legislation knowing the campaign is going to be like all campaigns a keen, hard fight. There is no need of shutting our eyes to the facts. The fact that we are at war does not make this election any different from other elections as far as bitter party feeling is concerned. War conditions may indeed intensify that feeling. We must guard against fraud in these elections. The hon. gentleman from Peterborough said: Surely you can have enough confidence in us to let some of these loopholes stand there—although he did not use those words—because you can trust men, and not suspect them of doing anything underhand. I may say that all of our election legislation—I do not care which party placed it on the statute book—has been enacted simply because we do not trust men at election time. We have made provisions to prevent men being tricky in elections. That is why our election courts are invoked, and we are drawing this Act to-day, endeavouring to apply certain principles to the matter of giving the soldiers at the front the right to vote. We are granting them no favour and no privilege; we are extending to them that which is their right. I cannot agree with the argument of my hon. friend from Peterborough about playing the game. If there is a loophole at election time I fear it will be used, and will endeavour to do all that I can to oppose the passing of legislation that will leave such a loophole. Some men do not play the game. I spent over a week in the Macdonald by-election carried on by the present Government and I saw citizens there deprived of their freedom. These men were carried away where a habeas corpus could not reach them, in order that the hon. member who sits for Macdonald might adorn his seat in this House. The members of the present Government with few exceptions were the members of the Government at that time. I am not suggesting that one side is worse than the other in election times. Both sides have done diabolical things in elections in the Dominion of Canada. I say it is our duty to guard against every kind of fraud. The game is not played as the hon. gentleman from Peterborough suggests, and every precaution must be taken against fraud. I am against this section of the Bill, first, last, and always, and I do not think the minister can patch it up with an amendment so that the shot will be worth the powder. There will be so few cases where the legislation will be in the interests of the soldiers that it is not worth while passing it in the loose way we will be compelled to pass it.

The minister provides 28 days within which the men may cast their votes. As I understand it, four days is the ordinary period that the men spend in the trenches; they never stay there longer than eight days. During the period of 28 days the men would go to and come from the trenches three or four times in the ordinary course of events. We do not need this section at all. We must consider our duty to the Canadian people and to those people who are to administer the affairs of this country during the next term of Parliament; we must have that before us just as clearly as our desire to do justice to the soldiers. If among the 130,000 soldiers in France a small number should be unable to vote within the 28 days, we would regret it; but, having regard to all the conditions, I think that the legislation already proposed is sufficiently comprehensive. I say that not in any party sense; I have no fear of the soldiers' vote. But we must so frame this legislation as to guard against any possibility of wrong-doing under the circumstances that must prevail over there—circumstances which make it difficult, indeed, to take the votes of the soldiers, even under the best conditions.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is an obligation upon the Government to provide the necessary machinery to enable the soldiers to record their votes in this election. That, I think, is conceded by all. Beyond question, some soldiers will be unable to poll their votes in what is called the formal polls. Shall we give those soldiers no opportunity to poll their votes, or shall we endeavour to provide machinery whereby they may be enabled to do so? In the case of an election in Canada, the Government provides a man who is called the deputy returning officer, and recognizes the appointment of a man who is called a poll clerk. The duties of the poll clerk may be regarded as clerical, but the very fact that he is in the polling booth with the deputy returning officer is, to some extent, a safeguard in respect of the registering of the votes. Moreover, each party may be represented by a scrutineer. If there are two candidates, each has his scrutineer; if there are three candidates, there will be three scrutineers. It has never been regarded as an obligation upon the Government to provide scrutineers for the parties and to pay for their services, but these scrutineers have always been permitted to have a place in the polling booths; they have been recognized to that extent. If we go that far in this case, what fault can be found? The deputy returning officer will go to France or to some other place to take the votes which cannot be polled in the formal booths. The man who should go with him is the man who would be in the booth with him if the vote was taken in the formal poll—that is, the poll clerk. In sending out those two men to take the vote, the Government is providing the same safeguard that is provided in any election held in Canada. As I understand the Bill, the parties interested may provide scrutineers who may be present when these votes are taken. The member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) says that we should appoint two scrutineers, one to represent the Government and one to represent the Opposition. But does that cover the whole case? So far as this side of the House is concerned, one scrutineer would be sufficient, but would it be fair to appoint only one scrutineer to represent the Opposition? Surely no person would say that. If you represent by accredited scrutineers, paid by the Government, the various elements that constitute the Opposition, you impose upon the Government the necessity of sending with the deputy returning officer a small army of men to see that the vote is properly polled. For instance, there would be one scrutineer to represent the Government side; there would be another scrutineer to represent the Laurier Liberals, another to represent the anti-conscription Liberals and the Bourassa element, and a dozen—

Mr. KYTE: They will be represented by the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: And there are the Patenaude Tories and the Paquet Tories.

Mr. EDWARDS: Hon. gentlemen seem to think that if the Government appointed two scrutineers and paid their travelling expenses, that would meet the case. But in order to represent all the various elements in the Opposition, at least fifteen or twenty scrutineers would be required.

Mr. NESBITT: We are satisfied with one; we are not asking for fifteen.

Mr. GRAHAM: One would be better than none.

Mr. EDWARDS: If you want one, the machinery is provided here the same as it is in an ordinary election. Any party will have the privilege of sending scrutineers to look after its own interests. The Government send the deputy returning officer and his poll clerk; they provide all the machinery that is provided in an ordinary election and all the usual safeguards. I do not think it is reasonable to ask that they should go further than that.

Mr. GRAHAM: In an ordinary election, the polling is done at a stated time and place; in this case provision is made that votes may be taken, not at a stated time and place. That is the difference.

Mr. KYTE: There is another vast difference. If any fraud is committed in connection with an election in Canada, those who commit the frauds can be prosecuted under our criminal law, but I scarcely think our criminal law could reach those who commit frauds in France in connection with the polling of votes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend has called attention to the extraordinary conditions which exist in France. I quite admit that the conditions there are extraordinary, but this Bill provides the same machinery, and is equally defective in its safeguards, in respect to elections which may be taken outside of France as in France. The same provision applies to all elections held outside of Canada, wherever they may be held. I am told that conditions in England, so far as the taking of a vote is concerned, are substantially the same as conditions in Canada, and that there would not be the slightest difficulty in taking the vote there.

Mr. EDWARDS: What about those undergoing medical treatment who are not in bed, but are still not well enough to go to the poll?

Mr. PUGSLEY: A time could be set for taking the vote in the hospitals, the same as in Canada, where many soldiers are being treated in the hospitals. Practically the same condition of affairs exist in Great Britain as in Canada. I quite agree with the hon. member for Carleton that some provision should be made making it compulsory for notice to be given to one of the deputy scrutineers before any vote is taken. The Government, for reasons of its own, has insisted that the important positions—the men who control the elections, and gather in the votes—shall be partisan appointments. Yesterday those of us upon this side of the House urged as strongly as we could that that element of partisanship should be done away with by giving to the leader of the Opposition a voice in the appointments, but that has been refused. Now the very least that can be asked is that the deputy scrutineer shall have the opportunity always open to them—receiving ample notice of it—of accompanying the deputy presiding officers when the votes are being taken. I cannot for the life of me see why that most fair and reasonable proposition should not be acceded to.

At six o'clock the committee too recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the minister not think he ought to make provision for two parts in this Bill, one for the men not in France or not near the firing line, and the other for those who are liable to be called to the trenches at any moment? With conditions as they are in Canada, for instance, I see no reason why the soldiers in Canada could not poll their votes in one day just as the men in a city poll their votes in one day.

Mr. DOHERTY: That provision is in the Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under ordinary conditions, there are a large number of men, and with one deputy returning officer to so many voters the poll should be all taken in one day. I see no reason why the Elections Act as we have it in Canada could not apply to the soldiers' vote being taken in Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are some things that would be different—the method of taking the vote, for instance. We have subjected the actual method of marking the ballot by the soldiers in Canada to the rules that prevail here; but we use this form of military ballot, and the reason for so doing is that in taking votes in camps in Canada you would be face to face with the same situation, that you cannot establish separate polls for the different constituencies without very great inconvenience.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is only in the poll.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is only in the poll. If my memory serves me right, we have, generally speaking, with regard to the provisions for marking the ballot, maintained the requirement that the soldier in Canada shall retire behind a screen to mark his ballot, differing in that from the method provided for overseas voting. As we go along it will be found that there are other material differences. In this Bill we have not made two separate parts, but we have made different provision as to the method of taking the ballots in Canada. Bearing in mind what was said this afternoon, I would be disposed to do what I mentioned to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and that is to impose on the deputy presiding officer, when he takes any vote outside of the formal poll, to insist on taking it in the presence of the scrutineers, or failing that, in presence of a military elector or military electors. I desire to enact any precaution that can possibly be enacted and for that purpose am willing to provide that with regard to a ballot taken in that exceptional way the presiding officer taking it, and the scrutineers or military electors present, should join in signing the certificate to be endorsed upon the envelope, stating the fact that this particular ballot was taken in this exceptional way, and the reasons why that course was followed. I submit to the committee that with those additional safeguards it is not an unreasonable proposition. And I want to be in this respect, as in all respects, frank with the committee; that particular subsection was the subject of a good deal of discussion, and the conclusion I arrived at as the wisest course to follow was to insert the provision as it stood in the Bill, quite expecting that it would give rise to difference of opinion, and that suggestions would be made looking to a greater protection. I have had the advantage of listening to the suggestions made. At the moment, at all events, I do not feel that I can quite meet them all. But, as I indicated this afternoon, I would be prepared to meet them to the extent of making provision that when the presiding officer, appoints his deputy presiding officers, he should notify the scrutineer or scrutineers of each party of the appointment. In the second place, I would be prepared to add the provision that the military authorities shall, subject to non-interference with the performance of military duty, give every military elector the time and opportunity to vote; and also, subject to the same condition, that they should give to every military elector who may be named as deputy scrutineer time and opportunity to perform his duty. I would also be prepared to add the further precautions I have mentioned with regard to the taking of this particular kind of vote. I submit that to the committee as the result of the impression made upon my mind by what has been said, and as being what, at the moment, seems to me as far as it is possible to go without running the risk of depriving soldiers of the opportunity which they should have to vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot see why any difference should exist between the conditions under which the soldier should vote in Canada and the conditions under which an ordinary individual should vote. I think the Elections Act should apply to every case in Canada, and I do not see why it should not apply to the men in England as well. You have a large number of men together—not as large as we have in our cities, yet the cities are divided up into—

Mr. ARTHURS: There are more voters in some camps than there are in some of the cities.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is only a question of having more polling booths, and more returning officers. None of the reasons which can be brought forward for special arrangements which are necessary at the front—and we all recognize conditions must be exceptional there—can be said to exist in the camps in Canada. I would go further and say that in Canada we ought to have the ordinary ballot, because the soldiers here will know the candidates. There is no reason why they should not.

Mr. STEVENS: Every camp probably will contain representatives from twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty different constituencies.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Mr. STEVENS: They are all mixed up. You would have to have ballots for almost all the constituencies in Canada. That is the outstanding difficulty.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a good deal in what my hon. friend says. Perhaps that is a full reply to what I have been saying as to the ballots. It strikes me as a pretty good reason except that if I were in a camp and I came from the riding of South Renfrew I would know where South Renfrew was voting. I think a polling booth for each riding might be provided in the camp.

Mr. BRADBURY: You might have only one or two voters from each riding.

Mr. GRAHAM: No one would have so far to go in a Canadian camp as many electors in South Renfrew have to go on polling day. There is another consideration. Men in Canada are not in the position of the men in France, and I see no reason why the men should not be free on polling day for voting purposes. They should not be marched to the polls by their officers and kept under command, but they should go as free electors, every man as good as an officer on that day as far as his vote is concerned.

Mr. MORPHY: Is he not?

Mr. GRAHAM: We seem to be applying to the men in Canada and in England a set of conditions as if they were on strict military service and subject to this condition and that. Particularly in Canada there is no reason why the Government should not say that military law for that day shall be in a measure relaxed so that members of a company, or a battalion, will not feel that they are being taken to the polls to vote under their officer. Most men do not like to be driven to the polls, they would rather go themselves. Most soldiers will not like to be formed in regular formation and marched to the polls.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is nothing in this Act that requires them to be.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is nothing in this Act, but unless there is some provision that the men shall have that day, not the fifteen minutes or half hour to wait until the officer says: "I am ready and I am going to march you to the polls," that will be the result. Give them election day so that no officer can command them to do this or do that. Make them free so that every man will be at liberty to mark his ballot and so that he will feel that he is not in a military camp and not subject to military discipline on that day. In so far as he is an elector he should be free to go to the polls. The ordinary private in a company who depends on his officer for promotion and everything else, will feel, as long as he is not given freedom to go as a citizen and not a soldier to vote, that he is under some obligation to the commanding officer. The men should be freed entirely from that in Canada. In fact, a good many of the soldiers in Canada, where they are at a camp near home, might be allowed to go home and vote at their own polls. I am only pointing out what is the feeling of some of the soldiers with whom I have discussed this matter. It is like men who are dependent for employment on their employer; he would line them up and drive them to the polls. They do not like that; men like to go themselves without any restrictions or orders from anybody. I am not so sure but that the same thing would apply in England as well. But the principal thing that I wanted to draw attention to was that there are two separate conditions. This Bill ought, I repeat, to be in two parts, one part applying to the conditions existing at the front and the other part to wherever there are men in camps. It is no more trouble to take the vote in a camp than it is to take it in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. DOHERTY: When we come to deal with the special sections that deal with the things to be done under the Act we will then have an opportunity of considering what objection there may be to the provisions made and how far it would be possible to assimilate them more closely to the ordinary system. Subsection 1 of section 8 provides that:

> Polls shall be held in such camps or other places, in Canada or elsewhere, as shall be assigned to the charge of presiding officers for the purposes of this Part.

I do not think that would be open to objection. Then the rest of the subsection applies to polls held without Canada. Subsection 2 is the one which makes it a duty to allow facilities to the deputy presiding officer and time and opportunity for the soldier to vote. It was to that section that I proposed to add a provision placing the obligation on the military authorities, subject to such action being consistent with the proper performance of military duties, to allow any military scrutineer time and opportunity to perform his duty.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before six o'clock I asked one question about section 7. I understand that under that section there will be no deferred election in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: I moved an amendment this afternoon to except the Yukon Territory where it will be impossible to hold the election because the election list has to be prepared after the issue of the writs. A period of forty days is allowed for it, and if we were to try to bring in the Yukon Territory we would find that it would be impracticable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Only in two ridings in Quebec, Chicoutimi and Gaspé, have the elections generally been deferred. There is no need now, with the railway in operation, to defer the election in Gaspé, and the election may be held on the same day. In the old days it was not possible.

Mr. DOHERTY: As we have four weeks between nomination and election day, I do not think there is any need for deferring the election in any place but the Yukon. If it were not for the long delay in preparing the list in the Yukon, that territory would be included also, but we are forced to make an exception of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If it were winter in Gaspé, you would have to take advantage of the section of the Dominion Elections Act which provides that the proclamation shall be wired, because there is no communication in winter, unless it is fair weather, between the mainland and the Magdalen Islands. But, that would be the only exception.

Mr. DOHERTY: We went into the provisions of the Act and it seemed fairly clear that, in view of the long interval between nomination and election, there would be no substantial difficulty anywhere except in the Yukon.

Mr. OLIVER: If the necessary instructions and information can be transmitted by wire, I do not know why the Yukon should be delayed.

Mr. DOHERTY: The principal reason is that in the Yukon the list is prepared after the issue of the writ for the election, and a period of forty days is allowed for the preparation of that list. The four weeks between nomination and election would not be sufficient for the preparation of the list. It seemed to us that the balance of convenience was in favour of deferring the election in the Yukon rather than delaying the elections all through Canada or devising a new system for the holding of elections in the Yukon.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN (St. Mary's, Montreal) (translation): Mr. Chairman, can the hon. minister explain why, under section 7 of the Bill, elections shall be held a month after nomination? What is the reason of that change? Formerly there were only eight intervening days. What are we aiming at?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is to make it possible for the soldiers' votes, specially overseas, to be taken before the polls are closed here in Canada.

It would be undesirable, I understand, that an election should first be held in Canada and the result of that election be given out, and that we should then proceed in Europe to take the votes of the soldiers who, under those circumstances, would vote knowing the result in Canada. If we cannot hold all the elections on the same day the elections at all events will be brought to a close on the same day on this side of the ocean as on the other side.

Mr. MARTIN: The procedure could be reversed. Nomination day on the other side might be fixed three weeks before. It might be better because in large centres, elections will be awfully expensive. I do not know whether it would be possible or not.

Mr. DOHERTY: It would hardly be desirable that nomination day on the other side should occur three weeks before nomination day in Canada, that candidates should be nominated overseas and that three weeks after they should be nominated here.

Mr. OLIVER: Reverting to the Yukon, that territory can be reached by wire as quickly as Edmonton, and the different outlying points in the Yukon are at no greater distance from telegraph offices than many points in the prairie provinces or British Columbia. If it were desired to hold all the elections on one day, with an interval of four weeks between nomination and election, I can see no reason, with my knowledge of the Yukon, why the election should not be held there at the same time as in other constituencies. The lists in Alberta and Saskatchewan are prepared exactly as they are in the Yukon.

Mr. DOHERTY: The machinery for the holding of the election in the Yukon is especially devised for that territory. Provision is made for the appointment of an enumerator in each polling subdivision to make a list of electors, and thirty days is allowed for the making of the list. All of this has to be completed fifteen days before the polling day. As I said, we decided it was more convenient to defer this election than to delay all the elections in Canada or to make new provisions for all of this procedure in the Yukon.

Mr. OLIVER: The condition in regard to the preparation of the lists is, in effect, exactly the same in the Yukon as in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and there is no reason why what is done in Saskatchewan and Alberta in the limit of time permitted by the Act should not be done in the Yukon, the hon. minister rests on the point that it would take a week by mail to reach Dawson. That settles it, but I would think proceedings could be taken on information by wire and, in that case, the work would start at Dawson as quickly as it would at Edmonton. There is no greater area to cover, and no populated points at which it would be necessary to have a polling place at greater distances from railroad communication than in the West Edmonton district. The Vermilion settlement on the Peace river is not less than 250 miles from the nearest rail and telegraph points and there would be no difficulty in meeting the conditions, as far as that point is concerned. I think there would be no difficulty in meeting conditions in the Yukon. I do not wish to press the point, but I have some knowledge of the country and of the conditions the minister speaks of, and I do not wish to have the change he proposes made when I am present without my stating the facts, as I understand them.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not making a change. I am leaving the law as it was in reference to the Yukon. I am making a change in this way, that we are making the dates in all the other constituencies in Canada coincide. Every reason which has been advanced in favour of a deferred election in the Yukon stands good to-day, as I have endeavoured to point out. Things that have to be done after the issue of the writ necessitate a much later date for nomination in that constituency than in other portions of Canada. In all constituencies in Canada, except the Yukon, there must be eight days' notice of poll, but it is not considered unreasonable that in the Yukon two weeks' notice must be given because you have a large unsettled territory through which the news must be published. Before arriving at a conclusion to except the Yukon from the general rule, I made a careful examination of what the result would be, and it has led me to the conclusion I have stated. I might also observe that this section, providing that all the elections shall be held on the same day and excepting the Yukon, has already been passed.

Mr. OLIVER: I thought the hon. gentleman spoke of an amendment providing for postponement in the case of the Yukon.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, this Bill as originally drawn provided for all the elections being held on the same day, and then different matters were pointed out, and the change was made.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman was interrupted when explaining some of the subsections of section 8 and indicating an amendment he proposed to introduce with respect thereto. I would like to add my request to that already made by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) as to the advisability of relaxing military discipline on polling day, with respect to the soldiers who are in camp in Canada. The objection made by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) as to the difficulty of using the ordinary ballot in these camps in Canada has not, in my judgment, such weight as to preclude the adoption of that ballot, inasmuch as twenty-eight days are to elapse between nomination and polling day. There would, first of all, be no difficulty on the score of time. As to the other feature of the matter—that there would be in each camp representatives from thirty to forty constituencies—that is a matter which could be ascertained well in advance of polling day, and suitable arrangements could be made to meet a condition of that kind. Therefore, in my judgment, it would be a decided advantage, first, to relax military discipline on polling day in these camps in Canada, and, second, to provide the soldiers in camps with the ordinary ballot instead of the ballot proposed under this Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to the suggestion that we should abolish military discipline for the day—

Mr. MURPHY: I said "relax."

Mr. DOHERTY: I used the word "abolish" because that was the impression I had in my mind. However, I think everybody would agree with me that it would not be advisable to have a day in which there would be thousands of men—

Mr. MURPHY: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I have in mind the amendment my hon. friend approved of a couple of years ago, when we were both members of the committee to which the Elections Act was referred, and by which we allowed working men certain hours during the day to vote, so that they would have those hours as of right, and not by favour from their employers.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have not specified the number of hours, but we have put upon the military authorities the imperative duty of affording every military elector time and opportunity to vote. Until the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew suggested it, it had not occurred to me that the battalions would be paraded and marched up to vote as battalions. I quite conceive it would not be an impossible thing, but the better convenience would be served by letting each man record his own vote at some reasonable time.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is my idea.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no provision requiring them to be paraded. The provision is to compel the officer to allow them time and opportunity to vote. If we were to take a period of two hours, it might, perhaps, be a serious interference with the routine of the battalions, and would not, at all events, be necessary. There are times when we have had camps as large as 30,000. It would be pretty difficult to have 30,000 men vote in two hours. I do not think we could anticipate as many as that. If we have to make a fixed period of time we will allow a great deal more time than would be considered necessary, rather than run the risk of not allowing quite enough time. If the individual soldier is to be allowed to go by himself and vote, ten or fifteen minutes might be ample. I am not a military man, and I do not know to what extent two hours of enforced idleness for one day in a camp would be undesirable, but I fancy it would be an unnecessary interference with the conduct of the camp operations, and while I would rather see each man go by himself and vote, still, if a battalion was marched up, and the men allowed to go in one after another and mark their ballots, I cannot quite see how the vote would be influenced.

Mr. GRAHAM: I leave it to the hon. gentleman. He and I are of the same nationality. If I were a private in a company, and my officer paraded me to go and vote, I would feel that I was under the officer all the time, as I would be. My idea is that, during the time of voting, the private is just as good a man as the officer. He ought to feel he is polling a vote as a citizen, and not that he is subject to the command "Eyes right," or "Eyes front," or subject to any orders at all.

I think that he would feel a greater degree of freedom if he was allowed to go to the poll as a citizen, not under orders. If the officers decided to allow so much time to each battalion for purposes of voting, then the men should be allowed to vote as individuals, not particularly as soldiers. I object to their being marched up to the poll under orders and asked individually to step out of the ranks to vote and then step back again.

Mr. ARTHURS: Under ordinary circumstances it would not be possible to march a battalion up so that the men might vote. In the first place, in the ordinary poll held in Canada only about 100 or 150 votes could be cast in a day. It would take a considerable length of time to enable all the members of a battalion to vote. Under this Act every soldier has to answer certain questions and to take an oath, the form of which is found on the back of the ballot paper. It would be impossible, therefore, for the officer in command to take that proceeding. The proper proceeding, I should think, would be to allow certain platoons freedom for the afternoon or for a certain portion of the day, during which period they could do their voting. I think we can trust the officers to see that this is done in a reasonable way. In camps in Canada the military duties are usually over quite early in the afternoon. Under this Act the polls will be open until 8 p.m.; that would give a great many men an opportunity of voting. I do not see that there would be such difficulty as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. GRAHAM: Naturally, an officer is a very superior person on account of his position. Suppose that at 8 a.m. the private is under orders to his officer; if when he comes to cast his vote he is not absolutely released from duty, he feels that he is going to the polls by order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Arthurs) agrees with me that that difficulty should be obviated. It ought to be made clear in the statute that it is the duty of the officers to allow the soldiers to be released from duty for a certain length of time in order that they may vote. They should vote not as soldiers but as free citizens.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a distinction between a soldier and a free citizen?

Mr. GRAHAM: I mean, as an elector, not under orders.

Mr. DOHERTY: We can, if we devote our minds to it, regulate every step that is to be taken on election day by the soldiers and by the officers. I do submit, however, that we might leave something to the common sense of the people concerned, both soldiers and officers.

Mr. GRAHAM: But you do not leave it to the soldiers. The soldier has no mind of his own unless he is released from duty during the day or at the time of voting.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not so sure that the soldier would resent being marched to the poll for the purpose of casting his vote. I have seen the soldiers paraded to the paymaster's office. They went in one after the other, and they did not refuse the money because they had been taken there under orders. I would suggest to the member for South Renfrew that perhaps such a proceeding would work out to his own advantage, because the soldiers might be naturally inclined to vote against the authority that subjected them to it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not want that advantage.

Mr. DOHERTY: Seriously, I want to meet as far as I can any suggestion that may be useful. It has been suggested that we have been somewhat fanciful in respect of the possible difficulties of soldiers on the other side of the ocean voting. Possibly it is somewhat fanciful to suggest that it would make any difference to the soldier whether he was paraded to the poll or not. Our experienced military friend (Mr. Arthurs) points out the improbability of this happening. I do not think that we are running very great risk of wrong being done to anybody. Whatever the officers do will be done under the eye, as it were, of the public in Canada; they will be subject to criticism if they do not give every man fair opportunity to vote. I really think that we can safely take that risk. If we cannot take it, we shall have to make such detailed provisions in this Act that it will take us a very long time indeed to have it passed.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I could put it in two lines.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman might deal with this particular suggestion in two lines, but if we adopt the principle it will take a good many lines to meet all the suggestions in respect to detail that have been made.

Mr. GRAHAM: The men who are in the military camps are absolutely under military rule, and unless under this legislation they are relieved from that authority when they come to poll their votes, there is no guarantee that they will be so relieved. My hon. friend does not leave much to the common sense of officials where their duties are prescribed by statute. The privileges that these men will be called upon to exercise on this particular day as citizens of Canada will be more important than the work that the officer might want them to do in the military camps.

Mr. ARTHURS: It would not be possible to relax discipline and allow all the men off for one day in any military camp. That is absolutely out of the question.

Mr. GRAHAM: I defer to my hon. friend's view, but I still hold my own. I have been in these military camps; very many men obtain leave of absence.

Mr. ARTHURS: You suggested that they should all be let off.

Mr. GRAHAM: I submit that it could be done. I was arguing that the duty appertaining to polling day was paramount to the military duty of that day. It is in the interests of the men themselves that they shall be absolutely free from military control on that occasion; that they shall feel that they are marking their ballots as free citizens of Canada. I am not suggesting that the officers would try to control their votes; that is not my argument. These men will be voting not as soldiers, but as citizens of this country, with all the interests of Canada at heart. There ought to be a specific provision that they shall be allowed to vote in that way. The minister says that they will be allowed to do that by the officers; then why not set it out specifically in the statute? I have as much confidence in the common sense of the officers as anybody has, but if I were a private in the ranks I would feel that so far as the voting was concerned I was as good a man as the commanding officer, and if I were paraded here or there or anywhere else to vote I should feel that I was being led to the poll.

Mr. MORPHY: We have considered this section for quite a long time, and the longer we sit on it the farther we get, apparently, from passing it. I do not think that I have seen any one in the House or out of it who can blow hot and cold more successfully than the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham).

Mr. GRAHAM: That is quite an art.

Mr. MORPHY: A moment ago he said that he objected to soldiers being driven by officers to the polls.

Mr. GRAHAM: I said paraded. I never used the word "driven."

Mr. MORPHY: I do not think there is any difference in view of the way the hon. gentleman said it. However, Hansard will decide. Whatever the hon. gentleman said, he intended to impute improper conduct to the officers of the forces against the soldier. He insinuated that the officer had the soldier under his hand when he should not have. That is an insinuation that I think ought to be resented on the floor of this House on behalf of the officers of this country. The hon. gentleman also said that the privates were dependent on 9 p.m. the officers, and under an obligation to them. I think that also ought to be resented and refuted. Personally, I think that if any officer in any camp in Canada attempted to interfere with the right of our Canadian citizen-soldier to exercise his franchise, instead of the soldier being driven to the poll, the officer would be driven out of the camp.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be mutiny.

Mr. MORPHY: I have a higher regard for the Canadian soldier than to imagine he would stand for treatment of that kind. The hon. gentleman is simply conjuring up imaginary difficulties. What authority has he for suggesting that any of these things are likely to happen? There is no foundation for his remarks at all. He is simply supposing that things will happen that never have happened. He is suggesting that the Canadian citizen-soldier is going to be simply a serf under the absolute control of his officers.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know one soldier who was flogged at Borden.

Mr. MORPHY: And that one incident is sufficient basis for my hon. friend to make a wholesale attack upon the officers in our forces.

Mr. GRAHAM: Nonsense. I did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. MORPHY: And he suggests that our soldiers would accept servility, and that they would not have the manhood to resent interference with their freedom. He said the men should be freed from that—freed from something they have never been subjected to. In that connection he argued that employers of labour herded their men —another insult to the labouring men of this country. I know that the labouring men of this country will not be herded by their employers, and I put the soldier on an equal plane with the labouring man.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member says "hear, hear". After saying all these things he says "I have every confidence in the officers". That is what I call blowing hot and cold with a vengeance. I think the Minister of Justice is to be commended for his patience. If ever a man was patient under insidious attacks and puerile attempts to waste the time of the House, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is that man. I think it is time we made a little progress with this Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad that my hon. friend has had the opportunity of making a real political speech, and I suppose he will now have it distributed amongst the gentlemen in his constituency and elsewhere, and perhaps have it published in the Orange Sentinel.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Not a bad paper.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I get it and read it regularly. There is not a man in this House but knows that I said nothing in disparagement of the workingman of Canada. I said that he would resent an employer doing any such thing. Nor did I say anything derogatory of the officers. I made it plain that I did not mean to say the officers would do anything wrong. but that the soldier ought to be free from military control at the time he voted. I submit that that is a fair proposition, which can be discussed without any pyrotechnics. and one which the men in the ranks will agree with; and I know something of their feeling.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know whether the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) was hitting at me or not, and I do not know that I need bother my head much about it anyway. I suppose I am a member of this Parliament, and I am not aware that free speech has been abolished yet. I do not think there has been any undue criticism of this Bill—at least not by me.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is practically the first time I have spoken on the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: There are some features of this Bill that are certainly very objectionable to me, and I believe they are also objectionable to a great many members on both sides of the House. There are three features to which I object. But before taking them up, I think that when hon. gentlemen make suggestions the Government ought to say either "We will meet you and have this thing arranged if possible," or, "We won't." We should then know where we were at. Taking the points to which I object in the order in which they appear in the Bill, subsection 3 of section 3 provides that a man who was a non-resident of Canada at the time of his enlistment can apply his vote to any constituency he may indicate. That is bad in principle. I am going to take the chance of being called a disloyal citizen by my hon. friend from North Perth or some one else—because whenever we talk about soldiers in this House somebody on the other side tells us we are disloyal—and say that I have very grave doubts whether the people of this country feel that a man who is not a resident of Canada should have the right to vote. Let them call that disloyal if they want to; that is what I say. To my certain knowledge in one regiment in this country to-day there are over 1,000 Americans who do not know anything about our laws and the questions upon which they may be called upon to vote. These men are entitled to the very highest respect for having enlisted, but I am not sure that they ought to have the vote. But if Parliament decides that they should have the vote, surely they should not have the right to apply their vote in any constituency they please. They ought not to be allowed to play the game as somebody wants them to play it. I do not know to what extent it could be done, but I do know that if any officer were so disposed, this provision might give rise to very grave abuses. I do not want to mention the name of the regiment, but I repeat that in one regiment in Canada to-day there are a thousand Americans, or a thousand in perhaps two regiments, in the same place in Canada. If these men are to be given the right to vote, some provision should be made as to where they shall vote. They should not be allowed to distribute their votes as they see fit.

The second thing to which I object—and I think I am voicing the sentiments of hon. gentlemen around me—is that provision of section 8, which gives an officer the right to poll a vote without an agent or representative of both sides being present when the vote is being polled. I am putting it in pretty broad language, but that is the substance of my objection. This could easily be avoided. A provision could easily be framed to safeguard the secrecy and honesty of the ballot. I admit that holding an election at the front is not like holding an election in Canada. In connection with that, I do not believe that any officer—I do not care who he may be, whether he is the most upright man in the world—should be allowed to carry around with him a bag of votes open to the inspection of himself and anybody else for weeks before it is sealed and sent to its proper destination.

That bag should be sealed up at the close of the polling every day, and either the bag itself should be sealed up by three or four men representing both parties, only to be opened when those same persons or representatives of the same persons are present, or the ballots for the one day's proceedings should be put into a package, sealed up, marked by the different parties and forwarded to destination. That comes under section 11. The third proposition to which I object is the provision that this Bill shall apply to the voting in Canada. I am speaking now to the Minister of Justice, who was a member of the subcommittee, of which my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy), my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup), my hon. friend from Kent, New Brunswick (Mr.

Robidoux), my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) and myself, were members. We went over this thing thoroughly, and I think we gave it as fair consideration as possible. As a result of our deliberations, we worked out a scheme in 1915, which is found in chapter 11 of the statutes of that year. A voters' list was provided for the soldiers in Canada and returning officers were appointed. They were governed by the election laws of Canada. Elections were held the same day as the other elections in Canada, and there was no trouble whatever. Why the Government wants to import an entirely new condition of affairs into the voting in Canada, and give a month's time for the polling of votes, is something I cannot understand.

Mr. DOHERTY: Will my hon. friend allow me? Under this Bill all the soldiers in Canada are to vote on one day. There will be only one election day. In that respect the present Bill does not differ from the old one. We had some discussion on this question before the hon. gentleman came in, and I pointed out that I thought the greatest substantial difference between the way the votes are taken in Canada with regard to the ordinary individual and the way they will be taken with regard to the soldier in this country consists in the fact that the soldier in this country is to use the form of ballot as provided by this Act. We went over the provisions of the old Act which have been referred to and after careful consideration and giving the best thought we could give as to how it would work out, we decided—of course may have reached a mistaken conclusion—that the endeavour to provide separate ballot boxes for 100, or 200, or 230 different polls, and to take the vote with the ballots appropriate under the ordinary system of holding of polls by constituencies, would entail a great deal of trouble, and would involve a great deal of confusion. It must also be remembered that under the old Act it was contemplated that all of the votes taken in Canada, as well as those taken on the other side. for a constituency should be so collected as to make it possible to send them to the returning officer in the constituency in which the election was being held, and to have them counted. When we abandoned the idea that it was possible to have the overseas votes assorted and sent in that way to the particular constituencies and counted the same evening, it seemed to us that we had to choose between assimilating the soldiers' vote in a certain degree without distinction of places, and endeavouring absolutely to assimilate the vote in Canada to the general system of voting. In my judgment, the practical difference, as I have already said, consists only in this, that the ballot is to be the form of the military ballot and to be deposited in the envelopes, and left to be assorted afterwards. I think it can hardly be disputed that it will add a great deal to the convenience of the taking of the votes, if the votes of the soldiers as they present themselves can be taken without distinction between their constituencies, leaving the assortment to take place afterwards and by officers of the same class as is provided with regard to overseas voting, but under the direction of the general returning officer here. It seems to me we get a simpler and more expeditious way of getting the votes taken in the camp, and one which will give rise to less possible confusion, and be likely to create less interruption in the carrying on of the operations of the camp than would be the result if we have to try to provide separate polling arrangements for every constituency in the Dominion. As regards the method of marking the ballot, the retiring behind the screen and the secrecy of the ballot, we have preserved in Canada the requirements made for the general voting in Canada; and speaking in a general way I do not think there is a material difference between the system of the soldier voting in Canada and the other electors voting, save that the soldier does not vote in a poll set aside for a particular constituency, and does not use the ballot provided for a particular constituency. If my hon. friend had been here this afternoon, he would have heard the discussion that took place with regard to the means provided by this Act in order to enable every soldier elector to know the candidates in his particular constituency. I think those provisions are ample. They have been improved by an amendment added at the suggestion of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), making it quite clear that every soldier shall have ample opportunity of knowing the candidates in his particular constituency, and this Bill affords him perfect opportunity to vote for one or other of those candidates.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister pardon me? I did not read carefully the provisions of section 7. I see now that the voting in Canada shall all take place on the same day. I am rather inclined to agree with the minister that so far as the actual voting is concerned the provisions of this Act should prevail, because we could not have, perhaps, a dozen different ballot boxes in the same regiment. I am only trying to see if we cannot arrive at some means by which we can shorten this discussion and get the Bill through. So far as I am concerned, I do not like Ottawa sufficiently well to remain here until October 7, if I can help it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps this suggestion might help in attaining the result. We have had a pretty thorough discussion of the sections, as far as we have gone—and I do not by any means wish to suppress further suggestions with regard to them—and I think we shall attain a better result if we let this section stand, and take up the next one, with a view to hearing what may be said on it, then, let that section stand, and so far as suggestions are made the Government would be in a position to take them all together.

Mr. CARVELL: I think that is fair.

Mr. DOHERTY: We can then see what suggestions can be met, and what suggestions we are not in a position to accept. In that way we would reach a practical result, which, I appreciate, is the wish of every one.

Mr. GERMAN: I wish to say a word with regard to section 8 before it stands at the suggestion of the minister. Outside of Canada the only three places in which any number of soldiers' votes will be polled will be England, France and Bermuda. I cannot see why the vote taken in England should not be taken exactly in the same way as it is in Canada. The soldiers in England will not be more considerably distributed than in Canada. They will be held in large numbers in the several camps in different sections of England. There is no reason why all the votes in England should not be polled on the same day.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What about all the hospitals in England in which there will be soldiers?

Mr. GERMAN: I do not know why they should not be polled in the hospitals on the same day. I think it would be better to poll them on one day rather than on several days in the hospitals. Surely the hospital officials will not want deputy returning officers coming to the hospitals day after day. In all the training camps in England it would surely be more convenient for the military authorities, and for the soldiers too, that all the votes should be polled on one day under the protection of the scrutineers. In Bermuda, necessarily, the votes will all be polled on one day. There is no necessity of having different days and this great stretch of time for polling. The only place where this question of mystery, with which the Minister of Justice seems to surround the voting, will have any application will be France. There is only one place in France where the votes can be taken. The soldiers will either be on the firing line, in the four weeks between nomination day and election day, or in the reserve line. The Canadian troops, I would suppose, hold twenty-five or thirty miles of trenches.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Twelve miles.

Mr. GERMAN: They hold twelve miles of trenches. During these four weeks the soldiers may be in the trenches, and on the firing line, where no voting can be done, and they can only vote when they return to the rest places or reserves. All these voters in France, or the bulk of them, will be on rest or reserve line extending over a space of about 12 miles. What difficulty is there in having their vote taken on one or two days? Let the returning officer fix the days. Let the scrutineers be present when the ballots are marked and placed in the box, and, when they are placed in the box, let the box be sealed in the same manner as in Canada. I cannot see that there is any difficulty or mystery surrounding this question of the soldiers voting. It looks, from the standpoint of the layman, as if it would be an exceedingly easy matter when it comes down to the mere work of recording the votes. I am inclined to insist that the vote should be polled in France on certain days to be fixed by the deputy presiding officers to suit the convenience of the military authorities; that when these votes are polled they shall be polled in the presence of scrutineers, who are there not as scrutineers for candidates but as scrutineers for parties; that in the presence of the scrutineers the ballots shall be marked and placed in envelopes; that the envelopes, at the end of the day, shall be placed in the ballot box; that the ballot box shall be sealed, and that the deputy returning officer shall not be permitted to carry the ballot box around in his possession for a week half full of ballots. Under the section he can open or close the poll when he likes, early in the morning or at midnight, in short, at any hour of the day or night, or at any time to suit the exigencies of the military authorities. That is bad for the soldiers themselves. The soldiers will have a desire to feel convinced that their ballots have been properly marked, that they will reach the goal for which they are intended, and that the person—Government or Opposition candidate—for whom they have voted will receive the just and true recompense of those votes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend (Mr. German) has given an illustration of how simple it is for us, comfortably seated in this Chamber, to arrange for the expeditious taking of the votes overseas. My hon. friend says that he speaks at a distance. Well, he does speak at a great distance from the reality. I was in England in 1915. I had the intention at that time of visiting every Canadian wounded soldier whom I could find in the British Islands or in France. There was not anything like the number of wounded then that there is now, and they were scattered from one end of the United Kingdom to the other in 143 different hospitals. That was the condition with regard to the wounded. There were then 143 different hospitals at various places at which the votes of Canadian wounded soldiers would be taken under this Bill. Besides that, there is a new condition in regard to certain arms of the service. Forestry battalions have been scattered over different parts of the United Kingdom, sometimes in small groups. You would find them at many different places. I should have said, in regard to the hospitals, that I obtained a list of the hospitals in which Canadian wounded were to be found. I succeeded in going to something over forty of them in the intervals between my work, but I frequently found this condition: I had a list of the men in a particular hospital, but I would find half or two-thirds of these men there and in the meantime the others had been moved to other hospitals or to convalescent homes. Imagine for one moment the project which my hon. friend seriously puts forward, of trying to take the votes of the wounded in one day. You would require something like 150 or 160 returning officers. According to the argument that was put forward, you would require 300 or 320 scrutineers. The suggestion seems to me to indicate the utter unreality of my hon. friend's project for taking these votes. Besides that, what condition have we in France? My hon. friend tells us seriously that all the Canadian forces in France are concentrated within twelve miles. That indicates an absolute lack of appreciation on his part of the conditions.

Mr. GERMAN: I said they were holding that number of miles of trenches.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend forgets that we have forestry battalions and railway construction battalions in France, cavalry units scattered over the country in small groups, fifty or sixty or seventy miles from the trenches held by the Canadians, ready to be brought into action when called for. When I was in France last March we had units of the Canadian forestry battalion carrying on their operations in the Vosges, one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles away from the Canadian trenches, and the Canadian railway construction corps were not near these trenches but far away on the Somme, carrying on operations wherever they would be most useful. If any hon. gentleman imagines that it will be an easy thing, under the simplest possible procedure, to obtain the votes of our forces in France, while he may be perfectly sincere, it is an indication that he has an absolute lack of appreciation of the conditions in France; he does not understand them. Our forces of different arms are scattered over half of France and it will be a tremendous task to enable those men to have a reasonable opportunity of voting, under the best conditions we can devise. It is most difficult to realize those conditions, and I admit that I have but an imperfect appreciation of them in all probability, although I have been twice in France at the Canadian front. To carry out such a suggestion as my hon. friend offers under the actual conditions at the front would be quite impossible. Then, too, our men in England are in more camps than my hon. friend has any idea of.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Last evening I suggested that the Minister of Militia might furnish a statement in fuller form of such information as the Prime Minister has just given, a general statement of the disposition of the Canadian troops in the United Kingdom and in Europe.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will realize at once that it would be absolutely against the public interest that the disposition of the Canadian forces in France should be stated to this committee; it could not be thought of for a moment. So far as Great Britain is concerned, I think there would be no objection to giving details as to the camps, although I should not like to speak positively about that. I omitted to refer to the taking of the votes of the men engaged in patrol service in the North sea, in mine sweeping, and in the Canadian volunteer reserve, scattered among fifteen, twenty or perhaps forty ships, guarding the British Isles and doing patrol service in the North sea. To give these men a reasonable opportunity of exercising their franchise is surrounded with difficulties and perplexities absolutely beyond the imagination of any one who has not known something of the reality. My idea is that while we are bound to surround the taking of the votes with every reasonable safeguard, we ought to make these provisions as simple as possible and to give these men the best opportunity that is available under the law of this country to exercise their franchise. I feel very strongly that the members of the committee will be animated by a desire to do that, and I would like to impress on the committee that it is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for us to realize what that task really is.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If there is any military reason why information of the nature I have suggested should not be given, that is a sufficient answer. But I think that information could be given in a general way which would be of service and would not be objectionable. I quite agree with the Prime Minister that it would be impossible to hold the voting in Great Britain and France on one day. I rose particularly to call the minister's attention to subsection 3 of section 8. The latter part of the section is very indistinct and difficult to undersand. Am I correct in assuming that it requires the deputy returning officer to give notice to every person who is appointed as a scrutineer of the fact of his appointment?

Mr. DOHERTY: No. He is to inform the deputy scrutineer when the information that he receives of the appointment has been accompanied by or followed by a request that he should do so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If that is the case, why not express it plainly?

Mr. DOHERTY: I thought it was expressed plainly, and, with respect, I still think so. I should be glad to make it more plain if any suggestion is made which will help to do so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not say directly that every scrutineer shall have notice of an intended poll? Why require that the deputy presiding officer must have a request that that communication be conveyed to the scrutineer? I was going to suggest that we insert after the word

[Sir Robert Borden.]

"notice," in the fourth last line of that section, the words "special notice shall be given of such polls to any person whose appointment as a scrutineer or deputy scrutineer has been communicated to him," and end there. These words "with the request that he so notify" are hardly good drafting, and certainly are not a good way to express the idea.

Mr. DOHERTY: If you suppress those words, you make it the duty of every presiding officer, of whom there may be an exceedingly large number over in France, to send a notice to the scrutineer in England that he, the deputy presiding officer, is going to hold a poll. You will make him send a notice to every deputy scrutineer of whose existence he knows, even though he is in a gathering which makes it perfectly clear that only one deputy scrutineer will come to his poll. As stated this afternoon, there will be at least double as many scrutineers as deputy presiding officers. Would it be desirable to say that every deputy presiding officer must notify every scrutineer of whose existence he knows? They cannot all come.

Mr. NESBITT: The scrutineer attached to his polling division.

Mr. DOHERTY: The scrutineer who wishes to be assigned his poll—that is the purpose. We ask all the scrutineers—who after all, are the representatives of one or other party—to notify the deputy presiding officers that they are the scrutineers and ask to be notified of the intended poll. It is to bring the two together, so that each deputy presiding officer will know which scrutineers wish to go to him. If the hon. gentleman will give me better English, I shall be delighted to put it in, but I want the substance of the section to remain.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No deputy returning officer would be liable to interpret that section the first day he had it before him, and I am satisfied the minister will try and improve it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I thought it was all right. I would be very much obliged if the hon. gentleman would suggest an improvement.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it intended to mean that the deputy presiding officer shall give the notice to any scrutineer or deputy scrutineer of any intended poll?

Mr. DOHERTY: The subsection reads:

(3) Where conditions make it reasonably possible, the deputy presiding officer shall give public notice of the time and place of an intended poll, and, in cases of polls to be held without Canada, a special notice to any person whose appointment as a scrutineer or deputy scrutineer has been communicated to him, with the request that he so notify.

To me that is perfectly clear, and I do not know how it could be improved. Supposing the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) were the deputy presiding officer, I would say to him: "You shall give notice to any scrutineer whose appointment has been communicated to you, with the request that you so notify."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not say: "If requested, a special notice of any intended poll shall be given to any scrutineer or deputy scrutineer?"—then you have it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would then have it, just exactly as I have it now. I have not the slightest objection to insert those words.

Mr. NESBITT: It would be plainer if you said: "with the request that he be so notified."

Mr. DOHERTY: The request is that he notify—not that the deputy be notified.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The more I listen to this discussion the more I am convinced that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Halifax is a good one, namely, that this Bill be referred to a special committee, to be threshed out and referred back to the House for one or two days' discussion. It seems to me there are so many technical questions that we cannot follow intelligently the trend of discussion in this committee. As my hon. friend makes a collection of all the suggestions, will he allow me to come back to what I think is one of the most objectionable sections in the Bill, subsection 3 of section 3?

Mr. DOHERTY: I made this suggestion a little while ago which seemed to be not unacceptable: We have gone over a certain number of sections and some of them have been allowed to stand. This particular section has been fairly exhaustively discussed, and we also have had some discussion on section 3, which section stands and we will have to go back to it—I think it would really make more intelligible to everybody the particular provisions if we allowed this section to stand, and proceeded with the next one, and after we have discussed it I would be satisfied to let it stand. Such a course might save time later on. We should get a general idea of the whole Bill and the hon. gentlemen will be quite at liberty to come back to section 3 and deal with it further.

Mr. MACDONALD: I quite agree with the suggestion of the minister as to this section. Subsection 3 says:

Where conditions make it reasonably possible, the deputy presiding officer shall give public notice of the time and place of an intended poll—

And so on. That is sufficiently wide to leave it entirely open, so far as Canada is concerned, to the deputy presiding officer as to whether or not notice should be given of the poll. I think that language should be more definite and certain as far as Canada is concerned, that notice should be given of the intended poll in any case. Then at the end of section 2, in reference to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Carleton this afternoon in regard to scrutineers, I suggest it should be amended by adding the following words:

and shall allow every scrutineer time and opportunity to perform his duties.

I think that the Prime Minister, when he was dealing with what he thought to be the difficulty of holding polls in England, was referring to the exceptional cases. It is true that there are men in the hospitals, but the Overseas Militia Department has a list of the various hospitals in which the men are located, and there is no reason why there should not be a presiding officer at each of the hospitals. If provision were made to this end, the vote could be taken in one day. As to the forestry units, not more than 14,000 men altogether in England and France are engaged in forestry work. The officials at headquarters know where the forestry battalions are and there is no reason why a presiding officer should not take the vote of each forestry battalion.

Mr. DOHERTY: I move that subsection 2 of section 8 be amended by inserting in line 31 after the word "his" the word "military" and by adding at the ending of the subsection the following words:

and, subject to the same condition, to every military elector who may be appointed a deputy scrutineer time and opportunity to perform his duties as such.

To meet the suggestion just made, I move to amend subsection 3 of section 8 by inserting at the beginning of the subsection before the word "where" the words "In Canada and," and by inserting after the word "possible" in the first line the words "without Canada." That would make the provision read as follows:

In Canada, and where conditions make it reasonably possible, without Canada, the deputy returning officer shall, etc.

I move, further, to amend subsection 5 by adding to it the following words:

but such vote shall be so taken in the presence of the deputy scrutineers, or failing either or both, of a military elector or two military electors, who shall, together with the deputy presiding officer, sign upon the envelope in which the ballot is inserted a certificate that the vote was taken under this subsection and the reasons which made it necessary.

I think that will be recognized as adding some precaution.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister let that last amendment stand? The section is a rather complicated one, and we should have time to consider the effect of the amendment.

Mr. DOHERTY: My idea was that we should adopt the amendment and let the section as amended stand.

Amendments agreed to.

Section, as amended, stands.

On section 9—Manner of voting within and without Canada:

Mr. CARVELL: I should like to know why such evident precautions are taken to secure the secrecy of the ballot here in Canada, and such evident precautions are taken that there shall be no secrecy in the taking of the ballot elsewhere than in Canada? It is true that paragraph (e) of section 4 provides that six scrutineers shall be appointed, three for each side, and that every scrutineer shall have and may exercise all the rights of a candidate or his representative at any poll. That would mean that they would have a right to be present at the polling booth, or wherever the vote was taken. Paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of section 9 provides that when it comes to the voting the ballot paper shall be marked in the presence of the deputy presiding officer in such a manner as not to disclose to him or to any other person any marking thereon. Now, what does that mean?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection to adding the words: "and the scrutineers," if that be the suggestion.

Mr. CARVELL: I would suggest that the ballot be marked in a compartment, just as is done in Canada. Paragraph (b) of subsection 2 provides that the military voter shall proceed into a compartment so arranged that he may be screened from observation and shall there mark his ballot paper. But when it comes to the voter in France or anywhere else, there is no such provision for secrecy. I think the same precautions should be taken wherever the vote is held. The men could easily go into some compartment. If the vote is taken in the field there will be a tent, or a blanket could be hung up to screen the voter from observation, and behind that he could mark his ballot. I think the minister ought to be willing to make the provision for secrecy uniform, wherever the vote is taken.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would suggest that the form of ballot be changed, and that there be simply three blanks, one to contain the words "Liberal candidate," another "Conservative candidate," and another "Independent candidate." There are only two recognized political parties in Canada, the Conservative party and the Liberal party. All other candidates would be classed as Independents. I think that would simplify matters for the soldiers.

Mr. DOHERTY: At present the ballot papers provide for voters who desire to vote "for the Government," those who desire to vote "for the Opposition," and those who desire to vote for the "Independent candidate." Last evening we had the suggestion—and I think there was some merit in it—that we should add a blank in the event of there being a Labour candidate. I do not see that there would be any great gain in substituting the words Liberal and Conservative for the words Government and Opposition, because it is not an impossible thing that gentlemen who are Liberals may want to vote for the Government, and gentlemen who are Conservatives may want to vote against it. And after all, the real issue is, shall the Government succeed or shall it be defeated—defeat, of course, meaning that the Opposition wins. Then, of course, we should be leaving out the great Liberal-Conservative party, which is not without existence in this country, some of us are happy to believe. I do not think we should gain anything by the suggested change.

10 p.m.

Mr. DEVLIN: The only point is that the ordinary elector is more familiar with the words Liberal and Conservative than with the words Government and Opposition.

Mr. GERMAN: If the hon. gentleman's suggestion is adopted, it will be necessary to have a space on the ballot paper for the Unionist party.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know whether it is as yet born. However that may be, with all respect I do not think we should gain very much by making the change. After all, I think most people have a notion whether they are voting for the government or against it, and perhaps as clear a notion as whether they are voting for a Liberal or a Conservative candidate. I am prepared to consider the suggestion that was made last evening that we should provide a blank in the event of their being a Labour candidate.

Coming to what was said by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) with regard to the provision for secrecy in Canada and the omission of it overseas, the provisions for secrecy in Canada are a reproduction of the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, and the provisions with regard to voting outside of Canada are a reproduction of the provisions of the Act of 1915. There will be places, I have no doubt, where it will be possible to provide for the voter going behind a screen. On the other hand, I certainly think there are places where it will not be convenient to do that.

Mr. CARVELL: They could always hang up a blanket, even if the vote was taken in the open field.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is perfectly simple if you are in a room or in a camp in Canada. But it has been impressed upon us by people who saw the vote in connection with the Australian election—it was impressed upon us by the representative of Australia on the other side, through the Canadian representative over there—that it was of the greatest possible importance to make the formalities as simple as possible. Time is of some consequence in the taking of these votes, and I put it to the hon. gentleman, is there very much greater danger of the violation of secrecy when a man takes his ballot and marks it at a distance from me where I cannot see how he marks it, than when he marks it behind a screen?

Mr. CARVELL: Let us put it as between the officer and the man, and we must not forget that it is the officer who is to hold this election. We know that in the army there must necessarily be a great distinction between the officer and the private. In order to maintain discipline the private must salute the officer, and he is compelled to look upon him as almost a different being altogether. Sometimes I think there is too much of that business. However, the fact remains. Now, under this Bill, when the man comes before the officer to register his vote, the officer, if so disposed, may say, "The law says that you shall mark your ballot in my presence," and he can make him do it. I am not saying that any large proportion of the officers would do that, but if an officer wanted to do it, here is his authority.

It is true, if the voter happened to be a lawyer and had read this Act, he might say "Yes, Mr. Officer, that is all very nice, but I find by section 4 of this Act the scrutineers have a right to be here."

Mr. ARTHURS: Where does the hon. gentleman get his authority for the statement that an officer will be present there? As I understand the Act, the deputy presiding officer may be anybody, and I should think on the average of chances in all probability he would be a private from the ranks.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is not serious in making that statement?

Mr. ARTHURS: Absolutely serious. There are many men among the privates there as well educated as my hon. friend, and just as fit to be deputy presiding officers.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is begging the question. He has been an officer, and has been at the front, and he knows there is about as much chance for a private to be a poll clerk, or a deputy presiding officer, as there is for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle. We are discussing this thing seriously, and we are trying to find a way out, and to save time, and the minister is meeting us.

Mr. ARTHURS: There is no use in making absolutely foolish statements.

Mr. CARVELL: I agree with my hon. friend entirely; there is no use of any man making foolish statements, therefore he had better keep quiet for a little while.

Mr. TAYLOR: At the last military election I voted at a British Columbia camp. The returning officer was a private soldier, and his clerk was another private soldier. I was commanding officer when I went there to vote. The private soldier who was the returning officer swore me.

Mr. CARVELL: This Government was not running that election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL: Now I want to come back to what I was discussing with the minister. My hon. friend beside me suggests that he would like to see the poll book with the name of the officer in it. Of course, we are compelled to take the word of the hon. gentleman, but naturally we would like to see the poll book. However, we will take his word. We do not want to be strictly regular.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is very unnatural.

Mr. TAYLOR: For the information of my hon. friend whose mind is so fine, I will give him the name of the presiding officer. It was Pte. Harold E. Sands. The poll was at Vernon, British Columbia.

Mr. CARVELL: That does not convey very much to us. However, we will look him up. I was pointing out to the minister the fact that clause (e) subsection 1, section 9, provides that the ballot papers shall be marked in the presence of the deputy presiding officer. There is a section in the Bill which provides that the deputy presiding officer shall be a military elector—I think that is correct?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: And, notwithstanding the theories put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite, we know that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, and in fact I might say in one hundred cases out of one hundred, these deputy presiding officers will be officers. I do not think it is right that the private or the non-com. should be compelled to go, possibly, before his own commanding officer, and that there should be a provision in the law by which that commanding officer could say to him: "You have to mark your ballot in my presence; true it is, you can turn your back to me when you are marking it. if you wish to do so, but you must mark it in my presence." Let us look at the thing in the ordinary light of common sense. We are all of age, we have all been through elections and we know exactly how these things are arranged and how simply it is to put into effect the system which would provide for the carrying out of the vote in Canada. Simply have the soldier go behind a screen or somewhere where he would be alone, let him mark his ballot there, and then give it to the officer. I hope the minister will consider this. I would also recommend paragraph (g) to the attention of the minister. In case the voter is incapacitated by blindness or other cause, the returning officer is to mark the ballot for him. That should be done in the presence of the representative of each party, they are called "scrutineers" in the Bill. I think it will be agreed that there should be some provision to that effect.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps I was not correct, but my understanding was that having provided that the scrutineer should be entitled to be present at the poll, and enjoy all the rights of representatives at polls in Canada, it was not necessary to repeat it with regard to each operation, but I have no objection to it. It will put the point beyond all doubt.

Mr. CARVELL: If you change section 8 I agree with the minister that the change suggested in paragraph (g) of section 9 would necessarily follow.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection whatever to inserting it. It was some Frenchman who said that that which went without saying went all the better for saying. I am quite prepared to make that amendment. As to the other amendment, I will consider the suggestions which have been offered. I recollect that at the time of the passing of the Act of 1915 we did pretty thoroughly thresh out the possibility; and I may say I was led to consider it desirable to preserve the present form by the insistent representations that were made to me by officers who were on the other side at the time of the elections that were held over there. What was impressed upon me in a general way was the importance of making the operation of the taking of the ballot as simple as was possible, and making it involve as little time as possible. The Australian authorities made certain suggestions to us, some of which had already been in our minds. They impressed upon us in a general way that we should make the thing so that there should be as few requirements as possible the absence of which might nullify the vote. Looking at it from that point of view, I was led to think that probably there was no substantial danger in connection with the marking of the ballot in this particular way. There may be something in the suggestion that if the presiding officer be a commanding officer over a particular soldier, it may have some effect, but frankly it does not seem to me there is a great deal in the idea that it would necessarily influence the soldier to let the officer see how he is marking the ballot, in the face of a law which expressly prohibits him seeing it, and in face of the fact, which we will now make perfectly clear, that the scrutineers of the respective parties shall be present. Frankly, it was my belief, after I had given it some consideration, that there probably was as great protection for secrecy in this as there would be in the provision that a man should go behind a blanket and mark his ballot, because if you are dealing with a presiding officer who wants to see the ballot, and is willing to exert what pressure his position as an officer gives him over the voter in order to see how the ballot is marked, I am very much afraid that marking the ballot behind a screen will not prevent him from seeing it. I know the evidence in some election cases goes to show that even with the screen conditions have been so managed that how a man voted has been ascertained. However, I shall be glad to consider the point—or rather to reconsider it, because we did give considerable thought to it in connection with the preparation of the Bill. I want to look at the places where we ought to insert the word "scrutineer."

Mr. ARTHURS: I am quite sure that every hon. member in this House is just as anxious as the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) that this voting should be secret. At the same time there are many circumstances under which it will be utterly impossible to have any screened portion, even of a tent, for that purpose. If this vote is taken where a great many of the men are in dug-outs, or in confined quarters, it would not be possible to have an arrangement of that kind. In England there is an average of 25,000 wounded Canadian soldiers, many of whom are unable to get up to mark a ballot, and their votes must be taken by some means in the hospitals. Is it fair to deprive these men of the right to vote, simply because they are in the hospitals? The same thing is true in France. There is a great number of men in the hospitals in France, running into many thousands, and it would be utterly impossible to have any screened apartment, or any private place, where they could mark their ballots.

As far as the deputy presiding officer is concerned, I am quite confident that in many cases there will be no difficulty with regard to the question of authority over the voter. I believe that in many cases the deputy presiding officer would be a non-commissioned officer or man. In our army we find that a majority of our common soldiers are pretty well educated, probably as well educated on the average as the officers are. There is another consideration too. It would be very hard to get an officer to take this responsibility. I am quite sure that no battalion commander or major, would take it. If it were taken by any officer he would be one of junior rank and his authority would be limited to the men with whom he was personally acquainted. Our junior officers, unfortunately, change very quickly, they do not know very many men personally and they do not interfere with any except the members of their several companies. I am quite sure that no officer having any considerable authority over his men would accept that position.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the adjutant be too busy?

Mr. ARTHURS: The adjutant is a very busy man. If it were any officer it would be the quartermaster, or the paymaster. The quartermaster sergeant, or an ordinary sergeant, would be the most likely man.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to suggest that clause (e) of subsection 1 of section 9 might start, in general terms, with the language of the Dominion Elections Act. It would be something like this: "The ballot paper shall be marked wherever reasonably possible"—that is the language of the minister—"so that each voter shall be screened from observation." "Screened from observation" are the words used in section 133 of the Dominion Elections Act. Perhaps that suggestion would help the minister.

Mr. STEELE: In connection with the screening of voters, or asking voters to mark their ballots behind a screen, it does seem to me that it is almost impracticable. There are large numbers of wounded men in France and England. It is due to these men, who are suffering quite sufficiently from their wounds and their work, that the task of voting should be made as easy for them as possible. To ask that these men be removed behind a screen to vote is to ask something that is impossible. When we remember that we shall have numbers of men suffering from pneumonia and rheumatism, and perhaps thousands from fractured limbs, many recovering from serious operations which possibly have snatched them from the brink of death, to ask that these men be not allowed to vote unless they mark their ballots behind a screen, or unless screens are put around their beds, does seem to me to be asking something that is unreasonable and unnecessary. The duty of this House is to make the voting for the men at the front as easy as possible while protecting it from all possibility of impropriety. Our first duty is to make it easy for the men to cast their ballots. I was struck by another suggestion that was made to-night by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) regarding the distribution of troops. The hon. gentleman made the suggestion that the voting should take place on one or two days. Troops that may be in a certain section at one time may be miles away from there shortly after.

Mr. MACDONALD: In England?

Mr. STEELE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all.

Mr. STEELE: The battle of Messines Ridge took place early in the morning, and hundreds of men who had been wounded that morning were being carried in motor ambulances across Charing Cross bridge on their way to hospitals in England that night. Hundreds of men are here to-day and miles away to-morrow. It would be absolutely impossible to consider taking the vote on one or two days in view of the wide distribution of the troops. Every facility should be given to the man who is overseas to poll his vote in this election.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know why it is emphasized that we are trying to prevent some soldier from voting. We have heard that suggestion over and over again since three o'clock this afternoon. I cannot understand the suggestion that any member on this side of the House is trying to prevent any soldier from voting. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be using their utmost ingenuity to conjure up some case in which they can show that a man is prevented from voting. Does any one think that I want to prevent a man in a hospital from voting simply because I make some inquiry?

Mr. STEELE: If we put into this Act a provision that every man who votes must go behind a screen it would prevent thousands of wounded men from voting.

Mr. CARVELL: Nobody ever proposed that at all. I was trying to point out that every military voter in Canada was precisely in that condition. The provision applies to soldiers in the hospitals in Canada, and there are thousands in hospitals. I have seen men carried on stretchers in Canada, and there are hospital trains going through the country from Halifax to Vancouver, fitted up with special beds. There must be hundreds of soldiers in Canada who could not vote if they were compelled to walk behind a screen.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not amend both clauses and say "where possible."

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly. None of us are trying to keep men from voting. Subsection (g) could easily be amended by inserting some such words as "where possible." I am pointing out principles on which the Bill should be drawn and the amendments prepared. Once we agree upon the principles, there will be no difficulty in choosing the exact language. None of us want to prevent the injured man from voting any more than the man on the firing line. We contend that every secrecy should be thrown around the casting of the ballot. All we want is an honest ballot and with that we shall be satisfied.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that from the outset we have been substantially agreed upon those two principles—that we ought to provide, so far as possible, an opportunity for the soldier to vote, and that we ought to go as far in the direction of surrounding that vote with precautions to prevent abuse or fraud or illegality as is consistent with giving a reasonable opportunity to vote.

Mr. CARVELL: That is all we want.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have taken note of the hon. gentlemen's suggestions and shall be glad to consider them. It has been impressed on us that we should make the operation of voting as simple as possible, and should so arrange it as to take up as little time as possible. I shall be very glad to give consideration to the suggestions made on this section. We might deal for the moment with these amendments so as to get them out of the way. I would reserve the suggestion to make provision that where reasonably possible the elector shall be screened off. Of course, when it is provided that the elector is to go behind a screen, then you make possible the substitution of a marked ballot. Under the system proposed there is no provision for the initialing of the ballot by the presiding officer, or for the other checks against substitution employed in this country. We were acting on the advice of those who had had experience, that we shall leave as little to be done in the way of writing as possible because the conditions at the front make it desirable that the voting be got through as promptly as it reasonably can be. In the second place, I do not think it any reflection upon these gentlemen over there to say that it is well to bear in mind that although we shall have deputy returning officers just as intelligent as there are anywhere, a great many of them will be entirely unfamiliar with this routine, and there will not be a very great opportunity for instruction. There will be no time for them to study the Election Act or the instructions which have been transmitted to them, and while I do not want to urge that anything that is necessary should be omitted, I am impressed with the idea that, so far as consistent with the fair protection of the secrecy of the ballot, every incidental procedure that can be done away with should be omitted. If we adopt the screen, I think it necessarily follows that we must adopt the precautions that are provided to be carried out in Canadian camps, with regard to the counterfoil, the numbers on them, and the initials on the back by the officers taking the vote. I think there would be serious reasons to apprehend that in the carrying out of those things, there might be many errors, and we might be troubled with questions as to whether certain ballots should be counted or not. The hon. gentleman has pointed out the reasons why this was open to objection. I hope he will think over matters, as I intend to do; but I think we might as well make the amendments agreed upon now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was not in the House when the amendments were proposed. Have you a provision for the ballot box being under lock and key, in which box the ballots and envelopes are to be placed, and which must not be opened until opened by the special returning officer? A thought occurs to me along the line of the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton, (Mr. Carvell), that while we are all anxious to give every soldier the opportunity to vote, we must not regard the voting a plaything. There is no advantage in the soldier voting unless his vote has, in the result of the election, that influence which the vote of every man ought to have, and it will not do to nullify, or to give the opportunity for partisan presiding officers or others to nullify the influence of the vote of the soldier by putting in fraudulent votes, because the result would be just the same as if the honest soldier had not voted at all.. I want to impress upon the minister as strongly as possible that this Bill gives the greatest opportunity for fraud, and those of us who have had anything to do with elections in Canada know that, without the Government being a party to it the men who are acting for the party machine seem to feel that they are justified in resorting to practices exceedingly improper, and doing things which they would not think for a single moment of doing in private life. Why it is I do not know, but that is the case, and that is why Parliament has tried to throw around elections certain safeguards. That is why I tried to impress upon the minister the desirability of both political parties having a voice in the nomination of the presiding officer. We have appealed to the Government in vain. Under the provisions of this Bill, the presiding officer will know exactly what the voter is doing. Clause (e) subsection 1, section 9, provides that the ballot paper shall be marked in the presence of the deputy presiding officer, but, in such a way that he will not see how it is marked. Those are two contradictory expressions. My hon. friend knows that where a paper is to be signed in the presence of witnesses, it means that the witness is to see the person make the signature.

Mr. DOHERTY: But in this case it must be done in such a manner that where the signature is placed cannot be seen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the voter to turn his back on the presiding officer? The thing is too absurd to consider for a moment. As the section stands, it will mean that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the presiding officer will know how the ballot is marked. Then, the Bill makes no provision as to the special kind of pencil to be used. The Dominion Elections Act provides that a black pencil must be used, and I think it must be indelible. Under this Bill any kind of pencil can be used. After the papers are in the bag, or unlocked box, they are in the control of people who might erase the pencil mark and put in another. There is absolutely no safeguard whatever in these matters, and I submit it should be the duty of the minister to protect the honest voter in the exercise of his franchise and prevent, if possible, his vote being nullified by fraudulent practices, and this Bill gives every invitation to the deputy presiding officers and those acting with them to resort to such practices.

Mr. GERMAN: To my mind, the most objectionable provisions of this section is that which allows the deputy presiding officer to carry in his possession for a whole week the ballot box unlocked and unfastened in any way, into which from nomination day to the day of polling these ballots are being deposited.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not this section that is open to that objection. Some time ago I made a suggestion which I thought everybody accepted. that when we had dealt with a section and such suggestions as we thought desirable had been made, we might let it stand and proceed to another. The hon. gentleman is beginning to make objection or criticism, or probably leading up to suggestions, with regard to a subsequent section. Might I ask that this section stand, and we will come to the section to which his observations apply. In that way we can make a little progress.

Mr. MACDONALD: I assume the minister, having heard the suggestions made by hon. members on this side of the House, will consider them, with a view of redrafting the section and providing the proposed amendments. The hon. member from Perth spoke about the taking of votes, in answer to the hon. member from Carleton. It appears to me that we should in this section make provision for the majority of cases that exist in England, where the voting can be done just as well as in Canada. If we had made such a provision we should have avoided all the discussion we have had about the impossibility of taking the vote of the sick soldier and the vote of the man in the trenches.

A good deal of the extended consideration of the Bill has been occasioned by the fact that many of its provisions deal with exceptional cases rather than with cases where voting could be carried on as simply as it might be carried on in England. I should think that the whole thing might be re-drafted with a view to providing that the men in the camps outside of Canada shall vote as they do in Canada, exceptional provision being made for taking the votes of men in hospitals and in other exceptional circumstances. I suggested last night that my hon. friend make specific mention of a labour candidate; that could be done in clause (d), subsection 1, section 9. In subsection (g) there is no provision for depositing in the ballot box the ballot marked by the presiding officer on behalf of a person incapacitated by blindness or other cause. I would suggest that at the end of subsection (g) the following words be added "and then deposited in the ballot box in the presence of the voter." That would be in accordance with the terms of the Dominion Elections Act. I would suggest also that the minister take into consideration the provision suggested by the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) with a view to designating specifically what is to be used in the marking of the ballots. I know that it is desirable to have a simple Act, but the more definite you make the Act the easier will be its execution by those who have not had experience.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall look up the requirement about the kind of pencil. My impression is that there is no special provision as to what kind of pencil shall be used.

Mr. CARVELL: A black pencil.

Mr. DOHERTY: I leave it to hon. gentlemen whether a ballot should be discarded simply because it is marked with a red pencil.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Is provision made for giving the vote to Canadians who are in the Royal Flying Corps or in other branches of the Imperial service? Will the provisions of this Bill apply to Canadians serving in Salonica, Egypt and Mesopotamia?

Mr. DOHERTY: As at present printed, it covers Canadians serving in the Royal Flying Corps. I announced that I proposed to make it cover every Canadian ordinarily resident in Canada who is a member of any Imperial force. The Bill, however, does not provide for the taking of votes in Salonica, Mesopotamia or Egypt—anywhere outside of Europe.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Salonica is in Europe.

Mr. DOHERTY: I was proceeding to make an explanation with regard to Egypt. I shall try to learn to be more precise.

Mr. CARVELL: There are many Canadians in England and France who are not covered by section 2 of this Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: We mentioned particularly the corps in the Imperial Forces composed of Canadians who were grouped together, because we thought that we could get their votes. It is not clear that we shall be able to get the votes of those who are not grouped together; nevertheless we propose to make the definition of military voter include every British subject ordinarily resident in Canada who is in any Imperial force whatever or who is serving in any of the Allied forces. We shall not be able to send presiding officers into these forces to look for the men, but where they are grouped together we shall send presiding officers, subject, of course, to our being permitted to do so by the authorities in those forces.

I move that clause (d), subsection 1, section 9, be amended by inserting after the word "candidates" in line 16 the words "or labour candidate or candidates," by substituting for the word "person" at the end of the sixteenth line and the words "or persons" at the beginning of the seventeenth line, the words " any candidate or candidates," and by adding at the end of the seventeenth line after the word "elected" the words " designated by name." It was pointed out by the member for St. John, in connection with the ballot form, that the words " any person " might give a voter the idea that he could vote for any person he liked, without regard to whether he had been nominated as a candidate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I assume that paragraph (b) will still be open to consideration?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is intended that the section as so amended will stand. I beg to move that clause (e) subsection 1, section 9, be amended by adding after the words "Presiding Officer" in line 20 the words " and Deputy Scrutineers present or military electors acting in their stead."

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the object of the word "present"?

Mr. DOHERTY: If scrutineers are notified and nobody comes I do not want to make it impossible for the deputy presiding officer to go on and take the vote.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: The same words ought to be inserted in this clause after the word "voter," in line 25. The subsection would then read "who shall then and there in the presence of the voter and deputy scrutineers present or military electors acting in their stead."

Mr. MACDONALD: Would that cover the case of the illiterate man?

Mr. DOHERTY: I was going to make the insertion in the case of the illiterate man when we come to that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Paragraph (f), subsection 1, section 9 provides that the deputy presiding officer may administer to himself the necessary oath. I never heard of such a thing before. It strikes me as anomalous that a man should administer an oath to himself. I think it would be better to have a clerk administer it to him. It would be extraordinary for a man to say to himself "You do swear that you will do so-and-so." How could you indict a man for perjury on that?

Mr. DOHERTY: As far as the proceedings in France are concerned, I do not think we shall be able to indict anybody for perjury anyway. I am not quite certain that it is always essential that some-11 p.m. body should hand out a Bible and say "Do you swear?" I have seen a good deal of swearing where the individual took up the Bible and said "I do solemnly swear." The provision in paragraph (f) is open to the objection that we have no evidence that the man took the oath except his own certificate that he took it, but we are relying upon that same man's certificate for the oaths of all the other electors.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister be rather sorry to see that clause in the Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, I am not sorry to see it there, because after all it is only permissive. I do not know whether this would be considered very grave, but we have not made it imperative that on all occasions there should be a clerk. As this vote is going to be taken, there is no provision for the keeping of a poll book, and though we have provided for a clerk, we have not made his presence essential. The returning officer may be in a position to fill those envelopes himself, and may or may not under given circumstances have a clerk. This was merely to make it possible, if the circumstances arose, that this man should certify to his own oath. Of course, if he has not a clerk, that will end the possibility of the clerk administering the oath.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is only as to his vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: If he has not a clerk, of course that eliminates the possibility of the clerk administering the oath.

Mr. EDWARDS: Inasmuch as the clerk is only permissive, could you not meet the condition by inserting the word "have"?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It strikes me as peculiar. I have seen a great many statutes in reference to oaths, but I have never yet seen a case where Parliament has solemnly declared that man may swear himself.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does not my suggestion get over the difficulty?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. EDWARDS: It must be administered by somebody else, of course. In any event it is only permissive.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would rather see it left out altogether, because it is of no effect.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps we might let it stand.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The poll clerk or the scrutineer could administer the oath.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will consider the point.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You may depend on it, if he has to swear himself he will put his vote in.

Mr. CARVELL: And, he could not be prosecuted for perjury.

Mr. DOHERTY: I move that clause (g), subsection 1, section 9, be amended by inserting after the word "voter" in line 33 the words "and in presence of the deputy scrutineers present or military electors acting as such." I move also that the same subsection be amended by adding at the end thereof "and deposit such envelope in the ballot box."

Mr. MACDONALD: Are the words "blindness or other cause" sufficient to cover the case of an illiterate voter who cannot mark his ballot?

Mr. DOHERTY: I rather think so. I do not know whether there is anything really gained by mentioning blindness.

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to ask a question as to subsection (e), which says "—the voter shall fold the ballot, place it in the envelope, securely close the same, and hand it to the deputy presiding officer." This is practically the same wording as the statute of 1915. Is it the intention that those envelopes will be such as can be sealed? I do not think there is anything in the Bill describing the envelopes. I presume it is the intention that they shall be sealed, but it does not say so.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I am not mistaken there is a provision somewhere in the Bill that the deputy presiding officer shall seal the envelope. It would be somewhat inconvenient to have each of the voters seal his envelope.

Mr. CARVELL: I assume the envelope is to be such as can be sealed, but it does not say so.

Mr. DOHERTY: The intention was that the deputy presiding officer should seal the envelope. I am afraid that has been omitted in the Bill. We will give that point further consideration. In the meantime we might pass on to section 10.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 10—Votes of civilian officials appointed under this Act, Subsection 2—Military elector resident in Canada:

Mr. MACDONALD: There should be some limiting words at the end of this section where provision is made to enter the name upon the poll book. You may have the case of a person who has been across but whose name is already in the voters' list in the district in which he resides. Perhaps the following words might be inserted at the end of the section: "Provided it is not already on the list of voters in the electoral district." There is no necessity of entering his name if it is already on the list.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have a special provision to prevent a man from voting more than once. Part of the affidavit that he is required to take is that he has not voted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, that is not in form D. If his name was on the list in the district in which he formerly resided he might vote as a military elector and then vote again.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill provides that he shall be required to swear that he has not already voted. The purpose is to provide a method by which a returned soldier, a man who is no longer in the service and who has been honourably discharged, has a vote because of that fact, if our definition of "military voter" be finally adopted. We wanted to provide for the district in which he should be entitled to vote, and it seemed desirable that we should locate him in the district in which he was residing as a returned soldier rather than in the district in which he resided before he enlisted. His quality as military voter entitles him to vote at his actual residence at the time of voting. He is entitled to have a vote as a returned soldier even though under the provincial law he would not find himself on the list. If he finds himself on the list it will be possible to vote either as a military voter or as an ordinary voter.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister not think that he could overcome my difficulty by providing in form D that he shall declare that he has not previously voted?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: The ordinary oath in part III would provide for the case if he had polled his vote as a returned soldier and then tried to vote as an ordinary elector.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is in form D that we have to provide for that.

Mr. CARVELL: Will it be necessary for the elector to produce his certificate of discharge?

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision requires it and we thought it was not an unfair provision because this man is getting his vote absolutely on the fact that he once was a soldier and has been honourably discharged. He gets that vote in a place where he has no claim to vote on any other ground. I do not think it is unduly hard on him to ask him to produce his certificate of discharge. He has four weeks in which to get it.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister not think we have done a good day's work?

Mr. DOHERTY: I confess I had an ambition to get over all the sections this evening and pass them. I appreciate the co-operation that we have tried to extend to each other this evening, but I think we should all be in a better position to take the matter up to-morrow if we had gone cursorily over these sections.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We should be in a better humour if we went home to bed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any way by which a candidate, or somebody on his behalf, could get the roll of any battalion that has gone overseas?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am told they are all printed.

Mr. DOHERTY: There seems to be some misapprehension. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) last evening mentioned some lists and I said I would speak to the Minister of Militia about them. The hon. member spoke of a list which, among other things, would give the present whereabouts of a battalion.

Mr. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: Hansard so mentions it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not intend to say that.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Minister of Militia informs me that it is quite impossible to get those lists. I understand that the nominal rolls of the battalions as they left Canada may be procured. If my hon. friend had in mind the nominal rolls of battalions, or sample rolls, it would be quite possible to get them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would be some help. I suppose the rolls are not complete?

Sir HERBERT AMES: Speaking of the nominal rolls, we have them in the Patriotic Fund. They are only printed up to the 150th battalion and there are not more than half of them procurable. The rolls for the later drafts are not procurable.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have in my office rolls of battalions to the number of something like 105 or 110. These rolls were printed as the battalions left Canada and were sent in by the paymaster. These were sent to me, I do not know for what reason. I received them long before the recess.

Sir HERBERT AMES: There are fully one hundred battalions of which the rolls are not printed.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understood last evening that the hon. member for Halifax desired only to have sample lists.

Mr. CARVELL: No, we should like to have the actual rolls.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, it was the lists that we wanted, of each battalion, where they are available.

Mr. CARVELL: We all have soldiers in different battalions, and if we had the rolls of the units in which our soldiers are serving we could easily figure out which of our electors were in different units.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Only last week a list of the nominal rolls that are printed was sent out, so that the Militia Department have that information and could easily furnish it.

On section 11—Forwarding the ballots:

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the minister not think it would be a good idea to carry out the suggestion made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and that at the close of each day the ballot boxes should be safely sealed and despatched to their destinations?

Mr. DOHERTY: We considered that, but I shall be glad to reconsider it. The reason we abandoned the course now suggested, which would in many ways appear to be the preferable course, was that it would necessitate the employment of a great number of boxes, with consequently greater difficulty in transporting them and greater work for the officers who attend to the counting. However, I shall be glad to reconsider the suggestion that it would be better, even at the risk of a multiplication of boxes, to provide that each box should be sealed after being used. I quite recognize the desirability of having a more specific provision defining the nature of the ballot box, and I think we would meet the situation if we put in a provision making it quite clear that section 122, part 3, should apply. I propose that section 122 of the Dominion Elections Act shall apply. That section reads:

> The ballot boxes shall be made of some durable material, with one lock and key, and a slit or narrow opening in the top, and so constructed that the ballot papers may be introduced therein, but cannot be withdrawn therefrom unless the box is unlocked.

I think we cover that by our definition that the word "box" shall include any receptacle. That would meet the criticism. I think the word "box" is used here, but we could amend our interpretation section so that a bag might be used and meet the requirements. In the practical operation of other elections that have been held, it has been found that, for the purpose of the election so held, a bag was a more convenient thing for use under conditions in the field than such a metal box. I do not think any one can attach serious importance to the question whether a bag or box is provided, because a bag or box would meet the requirements of section 122. If provision were made that we should have a receptacle from which the ballots could not be withdrawn once they were dropped in, and which was securely locked and closed, perhaps that would diminish, to some extent at all events, the objections made to the deputy presiding officer carrying the bag, or using the same bag on more than one occasion. However, I am glad to consider the suggestion that he should send this back after each operation. What is present to my mind is that we might make provision such as I have suggested applicable to places where you hold something that is really in the nature of a poll and make some exception in cases where the officer may have to go from one group to another, or one hospital to another for the purpose of collecting the ballots of very small collected groups.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I hope the minister will adhere to the box.

Mr. CURRIE: I think, under the conditions at the front, it would be impossible to have ballot boxes. The transport is taxed to its limit to carry food and ammunition to the front, and it would be looked upon by the military authorities as an outrage, if you asked that the same transport should carry a load of empty boxes, when it should be filled with shells. When the ballot is enclosed in an envelope, nobody can find out how a soldier voted, unless he tampers with that envelope. There is no reason why the ordinary mail bag, which is capable of being well locked at night and kept in a safe place, should not be used as a ballot box. It will not take up any space. There are hundreds of bags going up to the line every day, and hundreds of them coming back empty. There is no reason why the post office should not supply good mail bags for this purpose. I desire to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite and to those who have been taking objections and suggesting that there may be irregularities, that the men at the front are not that kind of breed. As a matter of fact, they do not care very much how elections go. They are risking a great deal now, and I would be quite willing to take their method of carrying on the election, without an Act at all. There is no method of posting the names of the candidates on a board. There are no boards over there. All the information is sent to the front by a small telegraph wire.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is at the front.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, and that is virtually the rule. I do not think the same necessity arises, as in an ordinary election, for ballot boxes. I think Parliament can safely trust the soldiers at the front to see that this vote is fairly taken, and if we cast ourselves on their hands I do not think Parliament will regret it. The crook, the ballot box stuffer and the election thug will not be there. These men are not of that quality. Why all this fuss and all this attempt to establish safeguards? To my mind it is not necessary at all. The point that was raised the other night by the hon. member for Pictou, about the way votes were taken in England, does not apply to this election at all. I think it would be out of the question to send ballot boxes to the front. The proper way would be to put the ballots in a mailbag. That is all you can get over there. They could not understand the necessity for a ballot box. It is absolutely necessary for the transport to handle food and munitions, and every inch of space is required for that service.

Mr. CARVELL: I made a suggestion, which I still think is worth considering. I realize the difficulty of handling boxes. I have never been there, but one's imagination does not have to go very far in order to appreciate the difficulty. I suggest that, at the close of the polling every day, these sealed envelopes should be taken out, in the presence of the scrutineers, and put in a sealed package, and marked by the returning officer, his clerk and the scrutineers. That sealed package would be ready to be forwarded to Paris, or London, and the same bag or box is available for the next day.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what I had in my mind.

Mr. CARVELL: You could preserve the ballot box.

Mr. DOHERTY: One advantage of the ballot box is that once a ballot is dropped in, it stays there until it gets to the returning officer. By the method suggested by the hon. member for Carleton we lose that. On the other hand, you gain in this way, that you send your ballots off at once. But you have to allow some operation to take place of handling the ballots outside of the presence of the voters and scrutineers between the time that the ballot is deposited and the time that the proper officer counts it.

Mr. CARVELL: The safest thing is the bag properly sealed.

Mr. DOHERTY: We might, as I say, make the provision suggested this afternoon —that, at the end of every polling operation, the bag should be sealed up and sent at once; but we might perhaps modify that, so as to make provision for the exceptional case, where one polling operation might be the gathering of four or five votes in a hospital by an officer who would have the time and opportunity to do it, and perhaps he would gather in other groups of the same kind.

Mr. CARVELL: You might make some arrangement like that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should these provisions apply to Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not see any reason why we should not use the ordinary ballot box in Canada. I was suggesting that we make section 122, which defines the form of ballot box, apply. The section of the Dominion Elections Act which tells us about the form of the ballot box merely provides that the material shall be durable, that it shall have one lock and key and a slit so constructed that the ballot papers may be introduced therein, but cannot be withdrawn therefrom unless the box is unlocked. A leather bag, for instance, could be of durable material; it could have one lock and key, and it could meet with the rest of those requirements.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When a box is used it may be locked during all the time that the ballots are being put into it. The ballots cannot be extracted without unlocking the box. You have to keep a bag, however, open all the time, until all the ballots have been put in.

Mr. DOHERTY: What applied to the locked box applies also to the locked bag; you can put your envelope into the bag without unlocking it. Why should the bag be open? If you have a bag which conforms to the requirements of section 122, you can put your envelope in through the slit; it will not be necessary to unlock the bag or keep it unlocked.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is rather inconvenient to have a slit in a bag.

Mr. DOHERTY: A tin box would not be procurable on the fields of Flanders. They used the bag on the other side, and I do not see any reason—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not use a wooden box? That is what we use in New Brunswick.

Mr. DOHERTY: That goes to indicate that the statute does not require any sacramental thing at all.

Mr. CURRIE: The Dominion Government has not any ballot boxes of its own; they always fall back upon the township or municipality for boxes with which to carry on the election. It is time that the Government obtained suitable galvanized boxes, or boxes of some kind, in which the voters could deposit their ballots. In one case where an election was held close to the time when a municipal election was also being held, there was a wild scurry to get half a dozen ballot boxes in which to receive the ballots. They had to go to Toronto and take them from the cellars there. I hope that when the Dominion election comes along, ballot boxes will be provided, with safety locks that cannot be opened and without any false compartments. I do not see any reason why the soldier's ballot should not be deposited in its envelope with the other ballots in the ordinary ballot box. When the returning officer comes to open the box and to count the ballots in the presence of the scrutineers, he can place in a sealed envelope the ballot of each soldier cast for a certain riding and send it to the returning officer for that riding. Or he can count the soldiers' ballots then and there and transmit the count to the returning officers of the respective ridings for which the ballots are cast.

Mr. GRAHAM That might be done in Canada.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes. In France the objection to providing boxes is very great. Metal or wooden boxes would not get within a mile of the trenches. As for wooden boxes, the fellows would use them to start fires with, because wood is valuable out there; the men carry it round in their pockets to make fires with which to boil their tea kettles. If metal boxes were used, complaint would be made that so much useful steel was used for that purpose when it might more appropriately be shot across at Fritz. The best thing to use would be the standard mail bag. When it is pretty well filled, it could be locked in the presence of the scrutineer and handed over to the brigade post office as registered mail. These votes will have to be taken in brigade areas.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would it not be advisable to use a smaller bag than the standard mail bag?

Mr. CURRIE: I would send no bag there at all except a bag that would be used in carrying supplies to the district concerned. When it is being sent back, let it carry the ballots.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And let the deputy presiding officer use his coat pocket in the meantime.

Mr. CURRIE: I would as soon trust the deputy presiding officer's coat pocket in France as I would the ballot box in New Brunswick.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is now midnight; we have worked pretty well to-day. I think that we all have a desire to report this Bill and to put it in proper shape as rapidly as possible. Does the minister not think that we had better adjourn?

Mr. DOHERTY: I accept my hon. friend's suggestion—if hon. gentlemen will promise to be as good to-morrow as they have been this evening.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 12, midnight.

Thursday, August 23, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SALARIES OF CLERKS AND EMPLOYEES, HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the recommendations of the Hon. the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 15th and 20th instant, respectively, relating to increases in salary to certain clerks and employees of the House, under the provisions of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1917, be approved.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

QUESTIONS NOT IN PROPER FORM.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions Nos. 4 and 9, standing in the name of the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot), contain allegations as to fact and innuendoes, which, it seems to me, are not in proper keeping with the spirit in which questions are to be asked. I would, therefore, ask the hon. member to recast his questions in a way to conform to the spirit of the rule with regard to questions.

Questions allowed to stand.

PURCHASE OF THE SCOUT.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Was a steamer or motor boat, called the Scout, purchased by the Government of Canada from any person or persons at Halifax, N.S.?

2. If so, from whom, when was she purchased, and what was the price paid therefor?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. K. Maclean) give an idea as to what department of Government this question relates?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Naval Department, I should think.

Mr. HAZEN: I called the attention of the deputy minister of Naval Affairs to the question this morning, and he said that it could not relate to that department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We will let the question stand, and when I ascertain by what department it was purchased I will write a letter to the head of that department.

Question allowed to stand.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice in the Supplementary Estimates that there is an amount of $3,667,745 in connection with the Quebec and Saguenay Railway and other companies. On two different occasions I asked my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) if he would introduce, as was stated and rumoured, any implementing legislation with regard to the purchase of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway or with regard to construction. He answered in the affirmative. I would like to know from him, or from the Prime Minister, if his answer is in the Supplementary Estimates in the form of a re-vote or does he propose to introduce any implementing legislation?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is in the Supplementary Estimates in the form of a re-vote.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And there will be no implementing legislation?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

CONSIDERATION OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL RESUMED IN COMMITTEE.

Consideration in committee of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company—Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance—resumed from Friday, August 17, Mr. D. Stewart in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Chairman, when this Bill was under consideration in the committee recently, I was asked certain questions relating to the cost of construction of the Mount Royal tunnel and terminal, in regard to the programme of construction work in the province of Saskatchewan and in reference to the shareholders of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. I have obtained that information for the House and I now beg to place it on Hansard. With regard to the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, Limited, I have a statement of the estimated cost of construction, the estimated expenditure to April 30, 1917, and the balance required to complete as at April 30, 1917. The statement is as follows:

Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, Limited.

Statement of Estimated Cost of Construction Expenditure to April 30, 1917, and Balance required to Complete as at April 30, 1917.

Classification.	Total Estimated Cost.	Expenditures to April 30, 1917.	Cost to Complete.
Tunnel	$ 4,631,427.00	$4,566,072.52	$ 65,354.48
Terminal	723,616.00	282,242.12	441,373.88
Mount Royal Station	110,823.00	95,823.38	14,999.62
Electrification	405,127.00	372,236.02	32,890.98
Branch railway (from West Portal to Junction with C.N.O. Ry.)	182,468.00	119,329.14	63,138.86
Engineering and Contingencies	585,177.00	543,370.46	41,806.54
Real Estate and Taxes	2,155,593.50	2,110,593.99	44,999.51
Property damage, etc.	175,000.00	122,220.87	52,779.13
Interest	1,432,129.59	1,420,829.59	11,300.00
	$ 512,254.00	$ 322,254.00	$190,000.00
Less proceeds from sale of stone and equipment	10,401,361.09	9,632,718.09	768,643.00
	$9,889,107.09	$9,310,464.09	$578,643.00

Note.—In addition to the above:
(a) The has been expended on right of way for connection with harbour, 1,316,806.41.
(b) There are deferred payments amounting to $174,828.50 on property acquired for extension of present terminal.

With regard to land damages, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) asked a question and I have here a memorandum prepared by the solicitor of the company to this effect:

Regarding land damages arising out of the construction of the tunnel, the situation is that at the present time outstanding claims for damages to the amount of about $50,000 are in the course of adjustment. All the land which the company has to obtain for the present terminal and the right of way has been acquired and paid for in full. Easements through the mountain have not in many cases yet been adjusted, the company claiming that owing to the distance from the surface practically no damage will be sustained. These claims are standing over by agreement until one year after the operation of the tunnel.

(Sgd.) Gerard Ruel.

A question was asked by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) with reference to the programme of construction in Saskatchewan, as to which I have obtained a letter from an official of the company.

Toronto, August 21st, 1917.

Hon. Sir Thomas White,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:—

With reference to the inquiry of Mr. Knowles regarding programme of construction work (Hansard, page 4818), the information asked for is as follows:—

The amount at credit of Trust Account Treasurer, Province of Saskatchewan, in respect of construction of branch lines is $1,202,825.24. This is held in respect of the extension of branch lines in the province of Saskatchewan, including the lines from Gravelbourg westerly, Vonda north easterly and Bengough westerly. The reason why these lines have not been proceeded with is that it is impossible to obtain rails except in very limited quantity and at unreasonably high prices. For this reason the company decided after the outbreak of the war to defer as far as possible the construction of further branch lines till normal conditions were resumed. There have been several exceptions where the conditions of transportation were specially acute. These included the following lines; Elrose Extension West of Eston, Thunderhill Extension West of Preeceville, St. Paul de Metis Line.

With respect to the two lines specially referred to by Mr. Knowles; the first line, Bengough West, has been deferred; the second line, South from Kindersley (Elrose Extension), is included in the present construction programme.

Yours truly,

A. J. Mitchell,

Assistant to Vice-President.

I was asked to obtain a list of the shareholders of record in the stock register of the Canadian Northern Company. I have here a certified statement under the seal of the company as follows:

The undersigned Assistant Secretary of The Canadian Northern Railway Company hereby certifies that the holders of shares in the capital stock of the said company as of this date, namely: June 30th, 1917, are as follows:—

The minister of Finance and Receiver-General of Canada, in trust, for His Majesty.. ..	$ 40,000,000 00
Sir William Mackenzie..	10,000 00
Sir Donald Mann..	10,000 00

The British Empire Trust Company, Ltd..	324,000 00
John Aird and H. V. F. Jones, in trust..	1,000,000 00
Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited..	58,614,000 00
	$100,000,000 00

R. P. Ormsby,

Assistant Secretary.

This is the record of shareholders as on June 30th. The secretary informs me there have been no changes since, and, indeed, no changes for a year before, except that certain shares were transferred to the names of directors in order to qualify them. I think I should point out that, so far as concerns the Government directors, Mr. W. K. George, Mr. W. J. Christie and the Hon. H. W. Richardson, I understand, have no personal interest in the shares which were transferred to them to qualify them as directors of the company.

It is also fair to say that I have received a letter from Mr. E. R. Wood, referring to a debate here last week, in which he states that, apart from the qualification shares transferred to him, he has no interest, directly or indirectly, in the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

With reference to the holding of Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, of $58,000,000 of par value, I have this letter from the secretary of Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited:

Mackenzie, Mann & Co., Limited,

Toronto, August, 21, 1917.

Hon. Sir Thomas White,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:—

With respect to the $58,614,000 of stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company standing in the name of Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited, $51,000,000 is wholly the property of Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited; $2,000,000 is held in trust for certain officers and employees of long standing in the company; $1,600,000 is deposited with the province of British Columbia; and the balance, namely $4,014,000, is held by Mackenzie, Mann & Co., Limited, pending uncompleted financial arrangements for distribution of same amongst Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited, Lazard Bros., London, England, and British Empire Trust Company, London, England.

Yours truly,

R. A. Macdonald,

Pro Secretary.

Those are the official statements of the holdings of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. So far as I am aware, that is all the information I was asked for by hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with this Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When were the shares held in trust, to the amount of $1,000,000, by Mr. Aird transferred in trust to him? Could we have the transfer book of the company to see that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think they were so transferred. On the face of it they stand in the names of Mr. Aird and Mr. Jones—$1,000,000 of the stock of the company. I asked for the list as of June 30th, and I make the statement, as I was assured by the secretary that no transfers had taken place since. I thought it advisable to get a list of shareholders prior to the date of the discussions in this House.

There is no doubt that the list of shareholders is the correct list, and I am informed further that there had been no changes in the names of shareholders for practically a year previously except for the purpose of qualifying directors.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the Finance Minister prepared to give the House information as to the shareholders of Mackenzie and Mann Limited?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand Mackenzie and Mann are proprietors of Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, but I submit that has no bearing on the question before the House. We are not purchasing the shares of Mackenzie and Mann, Limited. We are about to purchase the shares of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. My own view is that it is not relevant to this discussion to know the names of the shareholders, but on account of the discussion which developed in the House I thought it advisable to place upon the Table the list of shareholders as of record. This transaction, although it is a large one, is a comparatively simple transaction. The Dominion Government is already—and this fact, I am afraid, is lost sight of in this House—the owner of $40,000,000 stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company: that is to say, we are a minority stockholder in that company. There are $60,000,000 par value of shares still outstanding. Instead of continuing assistance to the company, as we have in the past, we say that we will acquire the $60,000,000 of shares outstanding, thus making the Dominion Government the sole shareholder, instead of a minority shareholder of the Canadian Northern. I submit that the question as to who are the shareholders of Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited is not relevant to the section now under discussion by the committee, but I express the view, with some confidence that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann—that is Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann—are the proprietors of Mackenzie and Mann, Limited. But we are not buying their stock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would have thought it was of importance to the country to know who were the shareholders of the Canadian Northern. It would be equally important to know who were the shareholders of Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, who own, from the statement of the minister, $51,000,000 of this stock of the Canadian Northern. The organization of Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, if it is a limited liability, would enable them to hold this stock and transfer it over to different people, and I would assume the pledgees (who are referred to in this Bill) of the stock of the Canadian Northern, are gentlemen of corporations who have received stock from Mackenzie and Mann, Limited in pledge. Therefore, I would think that when, by this Bill, the pledgees are given authority to name one of the arbitrators jointly with Mackenzie and Mann Company, Limited, it would not be unreasonable that the House should be informed as to who those pledgees are, and as to whether or not they received the stock from Mackenzie and Mann Company, Limited.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have given that information. My hon. friend now states that what he desires to know is who are the pledgees of the stock of the Canadian Northern Limited, but he did not ask that. He asked me who were the shareholders in Mackenzie and Mann Company, Limited.

Mr. MACDONALD: I asked who were the pledgees.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Solicitor General informed the House the other night that, as to $51,000,000 of the stock held by Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, that stock is, with other assets of Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, pledged to the Canadian Bank of Commerce by the company. If my hon. friend were carrying on a large business, having contracts, bonds and stocks of companies, amongst others the stock of a railway company, whether the Canadian Northern or Canadian Pacific, and doing business with his bank, he would know that he would give a pledge in respect of all the assets of his firm. It is not the case, as I pointed out to the hon. member for Edmonton, of a specific loan against a specific security. The general balance of account between Mackenzie, Mann and Company and their bankers is, I understand, secured as a general balance of account of any firm is secured, by a pledge to their bankers, including among others, these securities. It has never appeared to me that this question is relevant to the consideration of the section now before the House, because it is for the arbitrators to determine what is a fair value for the shares. If we were buying shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and my hon. friend from St. John was so fortunate as to own $100,000 worth of stock which he pledged with other assets to the bank, it would not occur to me that this House would be desirous of knowing what amount he owed the bank, in respect of that pledge. The real question is, shall the Government buy the stock, and secondly, what is the price that should be paid for it? We propose to have the matter determined by arbitration, and our arbitrator is to be the Chief Justice of Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We want to understand whether the whole $51,000,000 of stock held by Mackenzie, Mann and Company is pledged to the Canadian Bank of Commerce, together with their other assets.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The whole amount is pledged?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not propose to discuss the question as to the importance of it. It seems to me it could be well argued that Parliament should be informed on that subject. My hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) says that we seem to forget that the Government already owns 40 per cent of the common stock of the Canadian Northern. Let me say that neither this House nor the country is likely to forget that, because, simultaneously with the getting of that stock, the country became committed to the enormous liability of $45,000,000. That is a fact that the country is not apt to forget. Neither is the country apt to forget that because the very next year or the second year after that obligation was entered into, the country is called upon to pay $15,000,000 more into the enterprise—and one of the arguments advanced in favour of it is that the country had previously, in 1914, become committed so enormously by guaranteeing the bonds to the extent of $45,000,000, it could not, without affecting the credit of the country, refuse the additional $15,000,000. Therefore, the country is not likely to forget the circumstances under which that common stock was acquired, which common stock, I do not hesitate to say, is intrinsically just worth the value of waste paper.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And my hon. friend recollects that he was in favour of arbitration to determine the value of these shares, fixing for them a maximum of a very large amount?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, I remember, too, that at that time my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, assured Parliament that if $45,000,000 were guaranteed the company would be able—he believed he could inform the House with full confidence—to go on and complete its entire system. He said they had $45,000,000 available for all the purposes of the road, and there was no likelihood of their coming back for further assistance, and the resolution which I had the honour of moving was to the effect—and my hon. friend forgets that, apparently—that the stock issue should be reduced from $77,000,000 to $30,000,000, so that, instead of standing at $100,000,000, as the Government proposed it should stand, it should be reduced to $30,000,000, that all of that stock should be placed in the hands of a trustee, for the benefit and security of the people of Canada, and that it should remain there for five years, so that, in case of default, the Government would have power to act upon it, and speedily take possession of the road, without paying out any money; that, in case it was carried on successfully for five years, paid its interest, and its expenses of operation, and became a successful enterprise, this Parliament would have the right—if it was thought desirable to take over the road and have it operated as a Government work—to take the stock by arbitration.

Does not my hon. friend think that the circumstances under which that suggestion was made are very different from the circumstances with which we are confronted to-day? Does my hon. friend forget that in 1914 he assured Parliament that through the remarkable ability and the wonderful and unprecedented ingenuity of the Solicitor General a plan had been prepared which was embodied in section 24 of the Bill, under which Parliament would have the right to foreclose by Order in Council the equity of redemption in the Canadian Northern Railway Company and in all the subsidiary companies, and if Parliament thought fit to do so it would in that way acquire an absolute title to that property without foreclosure proceedings and without the payment of any more money, but solely in consideration of the enormous sums which had been poured into this railway system in the past, and in consideration of the vital assistance which is being asked for in 1914? Has my hon. friend forgotten all that? Has he forgotten that he said he wanted to take off his hat to the Solicitor General in recognition of the wonderful ability and the great ingenuity which he had displayed in framing this resolution under which Parliament could so speedily act in the interests of the people of this country? He must have forgotten all this, because to-day he is telling Parliament and telling the country that it would be nothing short of an outrage to act under the authority which was then given to the Government at the suggestion of those who are now occupying the treasury benches. He says now it would be an outrage to act upon that wonderful provision which was framed by the Solicitor General, and which was proposed by my hon. friend when he asked Parliament to assent to the Bill. I have been drawn away from the question I proposed asking the minister by reason of his referring to circumstances which I think he would be glad to forget in view of the action which he is now asking Parliament to take. My hon. friend says in the statement that there are in the treasury of the province of Saskatchewan something over $1,000,000, and that that is held in trust and will be available for the purpose of completing certain branch lines in that province. I would ask if that is the case. With reference to all the other current assets mentioned in the statement which has been laid upon the table of the House, each held on account of Dominion Government, $4,471,611.12; province of Manitoba, $239,350.64; province of Alberta, $3,104,966.24; province of Ontario, $407,487.43; province of British Columbia, $6,403,989.06; would all those amounts be amounts that are not payable to the company to-day but would be payable in the event of their completing certain railways in those various provinces? From what the minister says I would assume that to be the case.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: These figures are a year old.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I presume in respect of those amounts there has been little change. We have not been favoured with a printed statement for the last year, therefore we must be pardoned if we refer to the statement the minister laid on the table of the House for our information.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This statement is correct as of June 30, 1916. Those were the moneys held in trust account in respect of securities which had been sold, the proceeds of which would be available for the construction of railway lines.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They appear on the credit side of the balance sheet. Would the minister inform me what items there are on the debit side representing this twenty odd million dollars?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would be included in the temporary loans and the funded debt. If my hon. friend will allow me to explain: Supposing there is an issue of bonds of, say, the Canadian Northern Railway Company or the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan, guaranteed by the Government of Saskatchewan; those bonds are sold, and when they are sold the amount would be shown among the liabilities of the company. If the money was not actually paid out in construction it would appear on the other side of the cash trust account. If my hon. friend is under the impression that they are on one side and not on the other he is entirely in error.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not suggest that for a moment, but I could not see any specific items to correspond with them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no specific item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then I would understand those bonds were so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Or pledged for a note issue.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And, the money lies there? These figures are not represented by any items in construction account.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Except such as would be spent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I see there is due to other companies on construction account $16,666,957.26. Has the minister obtained any information from any outside source with regard to the value of the land grant? I urged very strongly that in view of the enormous liability of some $21,000,000 in land grant bonds outstanding, which are in no way essential to the railway system. whatever else Parliament was asked to do it should not be asked to deal in any way with the stock of the land company, which would create a moral, if not a legal obligation, to make good these land grant bonds. In that connection the minister told me he would ascertain whether the land grants of the province of Quebec and of the province of Ontario were included, or whether those bonds simply covered the lands in the western provinces.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When my hon. friend asked me the question I informed him correctly, although I was not positive of it myself, that the lands in the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec were not pledged under the bond mortgages. The lands which were pledged were those in the West to which my hon. friend has referred. We have no means of knowing the value of those lands. In any event, it would be a matter of estimate. The only means we have of knowing their value would be the sales which have taken place. I laid upon the table of the House and placed upon Hansard a statement showing the sales made, and having regard to the prices obtained from those sales, it would appear that about $15 an acre was the price. I believe that is the price at which their auditors have taken the lands in. I do not say those lands are worth that money. It seems to me that would have to be taken into consideration by the arbitrators appointed, if they regard it as desirable to value the assets of the company. I am not quite able to follow the argument of my hon. friend with respect to those lands, because he seems to suggest that we should leave them out; that we should not take them in at all. That could be done only if we repudiated the liability of the bonds which had been issued, secured by them. I understood my hon. friend the other day to suggest that we should do that, that is, that we might not pay the bonds outstanding which had been issued against those land grants by the company, but I would point out to my hon. friend that that part of the debenture debt, although secured by those lands, is the same as any other part of the debenture debt, because the proceeds went into the construction of the railway.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How does the minister know that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is established by the Government auditors who are working on the books now, and by the company's own auditors. I do not think anything could be more clearly established than that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In that case will the minister tell me the amount of cash realized from the sale of those bonds?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: According to the blue book issued in 1914, 5 per cent land debentures were issued to the amount of $16,274,068.60. The proceeds were $14,092,245.94.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Those figures should be looked into.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They have been gone over a dozen times.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is in the blue book issued in 1914 a statement as to 4 per cent land bonds issued to the amount of $3,196,426. The proceeds are put down as $3,679,125, or in other words, the proceeds are about $500,000 more than the par value of the 4 per cent land grant bonds. I am sure that even the Canadian Pacific never issued any of its land grant bonds so much above par value.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is an explanation about that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps the minister will give me the explanation. I cannot find it. In what year were they issued?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will look at page 7 of the Financial Statements, he will find the information. If my hon. friend is particularly curious with regard to the matter, I can readily get the information he requires.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does the minister think about the matter?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is very probable and I will tell my hon. friend why. There was a four per cent land grant issue that contained the assignment of a contract from the Government, and that issue was adequate to take care of the interest charges. My hon. friend knows that the interest rates towards the beginning of this century were very low. This rate of interest was very favourable, almost as good as that of a Government security. The financial comptroller of railways tells me that that debenture stock produced the amount shown in the blue book of 1914. If my hon. friend thinks the matter is of essential importance we could make further inquiries and see if, by any chance, there is an error in connection with it. I do not believe there is any substantial error; in fact, I do not believe there is any error at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The point I really want to make as strongly as possible in connection with these lands is that I do not believe they are, in any respect, an adequate security for the debentures which are outstanding. $21,000,000 is a very large amount. Those lands are in no way essential to the system; they form no part of the railway system. If the proceeds of those lands went into the railway, if the railway is taken over upon a valuation, what money went into the railway is to be paid or carried by this Government? I do not care whether it was $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 that went into the construction; if it went in this country is going to pay for it. Therefore, why should this country, in addition to paying for property represented by the proceeds of the land grant bonds, which proceeds went into the construction of the road, assume, as it is being asked to do, the obligation in respect of the bonds that have been issued against those lands and that to-day stand against the lands which remain unsold? The Government is asking Parliament to do that without giving us any testimony, either from the Drayton-Acworth Commission or from any land experts or valuators as to the real or probable value of those lands. We know that a few years ago there was quite a boom in lands, and, as I stated the other day, many people bought lands during that boom. In a case in which they had a whole land grant from which to make their selection, they would naturally select the best lands available. I know of one railway company in the West, which, in order to assist in the construction of its road, was obliged to sell practically two-thirds of its land grant at the price of one dollar per acre. That was the highest amount which could be obtained for the land. It was sold to capitalists in London, and the proceeds were used for paying the interest upon the bonds issued for the construction of the railway. It passes my comprehension how these remaining lands and sales agreements—the leavings by those who have spied out the lands and picked out the best—are any kind of security for $21,000,000. The Minister of Finance says that he cannot quite understand how I would get rid of the obligation in respect of these lands. Of course if the Government is going to take over the stock, the country will assume the moral obligation to make good these bonds, because the Government and the people of this country will become debtors to the extent of $21,000,000. The Government will become the Canadian Northern Railway, and the people of this country cannot get rid of the obligation except by repudiating the liability which under this legislation they will assume. But if the provisions of section 24 of the Act of 1914 were acted upon, the Government could foreclose the mortgages upon the property constituting the railway system. It need not have anything to do with the mortgages on the land grants; they could stand just where they stand to-day, and the Canadian Northern Railway Company could remain a company just as it is to-day. But if these provisions of section 24 were acted upon, the Government would become the owner of the equity of redemption in the railway system without having anything whatever to do with the land, and without being in any way liable for the obligations in respect thereof. If the Government were to take the action which they told us in 1914 they would take, which they boasted they were providing for and anticipating when they enacted what they call this splendid legislation which would enable the axe to fall, to use the language of the hon. member for St. Antoine, when default should take place, they could avoid fixing any responsibility upon this country for the payment of this enormous sum of $21,000,000. But

I believe that throughout this country, as the people are beginning to understand what this legislation means, there is growing up a public sentiment against the transaction which this Government cannot afford to ignore. You will find in all the great commercial cities of Canada the feeling that this country ought not to pass legislation which under the provisions of this Bill may involve the people of this country in a liability amounting to at least $60,000,000. It may go even beyond that, because these shrewd financiers, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, these clever men, aided by the clever counsel whom they have in their employ, have not furnished to this Government a scratch of a pen which could be used against them and against their claims when the arbitration proceedings take place. Can the Minister of Finance say when he goes before the arbitrators that this company is in default? He cannot say that. Can he say that they are unable to carry on their business, and unable to meet their liabilities? He cannot say that, because Mackenzie and Mann have never told him so. The minister has informed Parliament that he has received nothing whatever in writing from these gentlemen, either suggesting their inability to carry on their business, or asking for further aid from this Parliament. On the contrary, he has himself submitted a statement which has come from these astute gentlemen, which, if it is reliable, shows that they are amply able to get along without any assistance from this Government, and that their stock is of the value which their statements represent it to be. On the other hand, if this Government waited until default took place, as it must take place unless the Government comes to the assistance of the road, they would be able under the provisions of section 24 to step in and acquire the entire system without involving the country in this enormous liability.

I desire to repeat that this is not the time to pour out these millions of money to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. The Minister of Finance has found the people of Canada so responsive to his demand for taxes that he thinks the people are able and willing to pour their millions freely into the treasury of this country. He forgets that he has made the people of Canada believe that he wanted these enormous sums raised by way of taxation in order to enable Canada to do her part in carrying on this war. The people have never dreamed that these moneys which he has been taking out of their pockets were to be poured into the lap of Mackenzie and Mann—these favourite sons of fortune whose headquarters are in the beloved home of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, the city of Toronto. When the people of this country find that the moneys which they have so freely contributed for the purpose of assisting the country in doing her part in this war are to be given away to these gentlemen, they will entertain a very different opinion. The people of Canada do not understand the iniquitous provisions of this measure at the present time, but the people in the great cities are learning from the newspapers what it means, and before long, if the discussion continues for any length of time, the people throughout the country will know what it means, and a storm of indignation will go up from the Atlantic to the Pacific which I think will astonish even the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall not attempt to make reply to the purely show features of what I may describe as the speech to the press gallery of the hon. member for St. John. There are, however, serious members of the committee who are anxious that no substantial feature of the subject before us shall be in any way obscure. I have heard the warning of the hon. member for St. John, that we are going to have to pay at least sixty million dollars for this stock, on the determination of its value by the arbitrators, and he assures the country that the stock is not worth a dollar. He knows that in the height of his wisdom. He has no confidence that men like Sir William Meredith, and an appointee agreeable to him or to the Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court of Canada, will be anything but mere victims of the chicanery of Mackenzie and Mann. I do not know that the committee has any reason to assume that the Chief Justice of Ontario and the Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court would not be proof, and could not select men who would be proof, against the chicanery of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, just as much as the hon. member for St. John is proof against it. I have no reason to assume that such men would be mere putty and clay in the hands of the Canadian Northern any more than the hon. member for St. John would be putty and clay in the hands of either the Canadian Northern or the Canadian Pacific.

As to these land grant bonds, I do not know what the hon. member for St. John has in the back of his head. I do not know what he is trying to express. I have not been able to get my mind around any complete idea that he is trying to give the committee. What are these land grant bonds? The Canadian Northern Railway Company became the possessors of a large grant of land. It formerly belonged to Mackenzie and Mann, then to Mackenzie-Mann, Limited and, in return for stock, it became the property of the company. The Canadian Northern then were the owners of more than 4,000,000 acres of land in Western Canada. What happened? The Canadian Northern Railway Company issued land grant bonds and secured them on that land grant.

Mr. MURPHY: In the West?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they are all in Western Canada. There was, first, a land grant bond issue of $7,000,000, the proceeds of which were applied to the Canadian Northern Railway, just the same as the proceeds of every other bond issue of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. Then, subsequently, they issued another, but not being able to secure as much money as they desired to get for the purposes of the railway on that land grant, what did they do? They procured Mackenzie and Mann to put in the townsites as additional securities and the townsites were then added to the security of the land grants and the whole was made the basis for another issue the proceeds of which also went into the road. The committee must remember that these bonds were the bonds of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, were the promissory notes of the company which they are obliged to pay and which can be got rid of by one method and one method only and that is repudiation. No other method in the world can get rid of them. No mere construction of words will get rid of them. You may repudiate them, of course, but that is the only way. Other issues of bonds have been made since then. What are those subsequent issues? They are issued guaranteed by the Government, there are mortgages made on the road, and which are made to secure the money that we have advanced. There is the consolidated bond issue. What is the position of the securities? My hon. friend assumes that the land grant is not worth nearly as much as what is against it. I do not think he is at all correct. Even if we could in honour or law repudiate this debt, where would we be? We would, of course, lose the security. What is the fact? My hon. friend says that these lands are just the tail end, the leavings of the original lands. I am afraid he does not understand the way lands are sold by railway companies in the West. It is not as if a farmer comes along, looks at a piece of land and says: "I will take that" and another farmer comes along and says: "I will take that" with the result that after the good land has been picked out you have only the worst land left. That is not the procedure at all. They put values on that land in accordance with the quality and location of the land, the values which they think the land ought to have. There is just as likely to be good land left as good land sold. Then, it comes down to a question of the fairness of the value put upon the land by the company. Instead of the sales of land indicating that it is valueless, they indicate the very opposite. Valuations arrived at by lands actually being sold now show a tremendous equity in these lands, amounting to several millions of dollars. Lands have been sold at the following rates:

Year.	Average Rate Per Acre.
1913	$15 36
1914	15 23
1915	15 53
1916	16 37

This shows an increase in the last two years in the average price per acre of these lands. Any one will inform the committee, who knows anything about western farm lands, that the prices are higher to-day than they have been at any period in our history.

Mr. MURPHY: Is that the case in the three provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would apply to the three provinces. I understand that Canadian Pacific Railway lands are selling better now than they have at any other time.

Mr. MURPHY: Of course a part of their land is irrigated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that there is a part of their land irrigated but I do not think that irrigation has anything to do with the question because it has not been a very pronounced success.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are there many sales being made?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think sales are being made pretty freely.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend include in the term "lands" timber limits?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; these are farm lands.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am informed that they have very large timber limits in the British Columbia section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think those are included in the land grant at all. I do not know anything about the timber limits.

Mr. MURPHY: These are agricultural lands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: These are agricultural lands, as I understand it, entirely. I would point out that the increased rate at which they have been able to sell these lands indicate that the proportion of good land left is about the same as it was at the beginning. I only make that argument as a matter of inference, I do not make it as a matter of personal knowledge but clearly from the record it would appear that the land that is left is likely to be a fair average of the land that has been sold. At all events the land generally is much higher in value now than it was. That is a fair assumption based on recent sales, and consequently if we adopt a scheme which would dishonour the obligations of the Canadian Northern the proceeds of which obligations went into this railway, we would in all likelihood forfeit assets of tremendous value. As to taking the valuation of the land; no doubt that would be part of the duty of the arbitrators. We are getting the land as a part of the property of the railway company and consequently it would be for the arbitrators to ascertain what the land is worth. The Drayton-Acworth commission did not pretend to do that. They did not deem it their duty and I think rightly so but the arbitrators now, no doubt, would find out what these lands are worth. My hon. friend harks back again on the question: Why did you not value the land? We have done it in substance and in effect. We have not valued it specifically. Why? Because to value it specifically would mean for the time being at all events the disintegration of the system. The entity of the company would be destroyed. While the company might exist, it would not own the railway. It was an accepted principle that if we should fix any terms or conditions for ascertaining the value, it would subject us to the application of every rule of law which would tell against the Government and against the people of Canada, as against the plan, the parallel line. which we are following, and which puts us in a much stronger position before the arbitrators especially when we are taking the stock instead of the assets themselves.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why arbitrate at all?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In order to get at the value.

Mr. MACDONALD: But you said that if they defaulted they would lose all claim, and that the property would be the property of the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I say as between Parliament and Mackenzie and Mann; if Parliament deems it fitting and honourable to confiscate these lands, Mackenzie and Mann cannot complain. But that does not say that we must deem it fit or honourable or in the interests of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not think you had anything about honourable in it in 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing about honourable in 1914! I think my hon. friend would do what is in the interest of the country, and I do not think it would be in the interest of the country to confiscate.

Mr. MACDONALD: This is what my hon. friend said:

> The idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all stockholders parties to this contract, and we say to them: We now and here bind you that should the day of default come you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever, but you here and now leave the Parliament of this country free from any such question and untrammelled in every way to deal with the property of the Canadian Northern as it may be advised in the interests of the people of this country.

Could anything be more absolute?

Mr. MEIGHEN: —Nothing more true.

Mr. MACDONALD: Well, you are not doing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what we are doing. The Parliament of Canada is free and untrammelled and can do what it deems fit in the interest of Canada, and I stand, in the name of Canada to say it is not in the interest of Canada, and it is not fitting to confiscate the property of any man. It is not in the interest of Canada and it is not fitting, at the bidding of whomsoever, corporation or otherwise, to confiscate the property of any man.

Mr. MACDONALD: You said in 1914: we make it absolute that neither the company nor any one interested in it can come here in the event of default and say: "You are confiscating our property without compensation," because it is all settled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I said, that is what I say to-day. As between us and them, they could not. But the general interest of Canada does not call for it, and the circumstances of the case do not call for it. If my hon. friend believes that the legislation of that time, as it stood at the third reading—and it stood at the third reading just as it is now—if it provided that upon default there should be confiscation, nothing more or less, why did he support an amendment that, instead of confiscation, there should be a submission of the stock to arbitration? Why did he support that amendment if it was provided that the people of Canada could get the property for nothing? It is because he did not believe it and does not believe it now.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend mean to say that his statement was not a direct intimation to the country that the country was getting an absolute right to the equity of redemption of Mackenzie and Mann in the Canadian Northern Railway?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It got the right to deal with the equity of redemption as it saw fit. Parliament has not the absolute right to confiscate without the complaint of the party interested unless the party agreed to it. But because we then got the right to do it, that does not say that it is to our interest to do it or in the interest of the people of Canada, and it does not say it is honourable to do it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that, now the Parliament of Canada has the right to confiscate and take this equity of redemption without payment to Mackenzie and Mann, notwithstanding that, it is in the interest of Canada that you should pay them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have the power to do it undoubtedly, and I so intimated then and I so pronounce now, but it is not in the interest of Canada that we should do it. It is in the interest of Canada to pay for property that we take what that property is fairly worth.

Mr. MACDONALD: We have paid for it already.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then why did the hon. gentleman vote to arbitrate on it in 1914? We have perhaps the strongest tribunal which the personnel of this country can provide to determine the value of this stock. I know that the people of Ontario have confidence in the Chief Justice of Ontario, and that no agitation which hon. gentlemen may try to engender in this country will ever shake the confidence of that province in the Chief Justice. I believe the people of every other province of Canada have equal confidence that that Chief Justice will not submit the name of a third arbitrator or submit to the name of a third arbitrator who is not strong, true, capable and fair, and if they do not agree on a third arbitrator, then the Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court names the third arbitrator, so the people of this country are secure that there will be strong, capable, able men, who will be able to protect the interests of Canada when this goes to arbitration. What more do the people of Canada ask? We are told that the cities of Canada—the word was very indefinite—are becoming opposed to this legislation. I have heard of some talk in one city, but not in any other.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the city of Montreal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is an important city.

Mr. MEIGHEN: An important city it is true, but I have not heard of any dissatisfaction in any other, and I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to escape from the conscription issue in this country, in Montreal or in any other city, under the cover of this Bill.

Mr. DEVLIN: Never mind conscription; we are discussing the Canadian Northern Railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: When the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) referred to the city of Montreal or to the cities of Canada, he undoubtedly had in mind the deliverance of certain leading men in Montreal. But these are men, as I look at some of the names, who are interested all over Canada; their investments are not confined to the city of Montreal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And they are mostly in favour of conscription too and good Tories, but disgusted at this.

Mr. GRAHAM: As a matter of fact, I know that some of these gentlemen are strong conscriptionists.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They will vote all right then.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend must not get these issues mixed up in condemning these men for what they say on the Canadian Northern. He must not opine that they are against conscription. Some of them are very strong conscriptionists, but apparently they object to the conscription of the country's wealth for any individual person.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Give the names first.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I had better read the article just as it is. It is in the Montreal Gazette which, by the way, of late particularly, has girded up its loins in Toryism, and is writing very strong articles on almost everything, against Liberalism and in favour of its friends.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In favour of conscription, too.

Mr. GRAHAM: Let me read this article, just to be sure that this is not really just a local objection, and ascertain by reading the article the contents and value of the deliverance of these men. I submit that the deliverance is by very important men, and if it be an important deliverance, we have a combination that ought to carry great weight. The article reads:

> The following criticism of the policy of the Government in respect of the Canadian Northern Railway is made:
> The Government Bill to authorize the purchase by it of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway is half way through the House of Commons and will shortly be in the Senate. If it becomes law, it will impose on Canada, at a time when the country is under an unprecedented strain, a burden of unknown magnitude. One certainly greater than any ever before imposed upon this country, with the exception of the war debt.

The purchase of a defined piece of railway property is one thing. The buying of stock in a company with unascertained assets and unknown liabilities is another. Once the Government becomes the principal owner of the common stock, it must provide out of loans or taxes for all the debts of the railway due or to become due and for all future losses in operating. The estimates of expenditure still necessary to be made run into enormous figures. No one knows what the real extent of its obligations are. The railway has bonds outstanding and debts unpaid; so have its subsidiaries. There are guarantees given by it to other companies, unpaid balances on contracts and upon accounts, but to what extent is unknown. What its assets are is equally unknown. It operates and is interested in railway companies, land companies, telegraph companies, tunnel companies, lumber companies and hotel companies, but no one knows how far it owns them, what their assets or liabilities are, nor to what extent the railway company is responsible for their liabilities.

No other railway company nor any other group of business men would consider such an acquisition except after elaborate examination and reports from accountants and appraisers on the assets and liabilities, and then only subject to a solvent guarantee that all supposed assets would be delivered and that no undisclosed debts or obligations would appear. To find out these things, where such examination and guarantee cannot be had, the usual course in the United States has been to place the road in the hands of a receiver, whose staff can ascertain them and place them before those interested an accurate and clear statement. Systems quite as large, notably the Union Pacific, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe and the Rock Island, have in the United States been through this process and have emerged from it with capital written down to correspond to the actual values, in a solvent condition and able to perform their duties as public servants.

The only examination so far had into the affairs of the Canadian Northern has resulted in the opinion of two out of three railway experts that the stock proposed to be purchased was worth nothing. This means that whatever its nominal value may be, the unsecured debts are more than enough to prevent its being sold to any reasonably prudent purchaser. In view of the fact that no money was paid to the company—

That should read "paid by" the company, I think.

—for the stock and that the company has never been able to earn anything upon it, there was and is no reason to expect any other result from examination.

No agreement or obligation to purchase is produced. In fact, nothing has transpired except verbally and then between members of the Government not named and persons whose names are not disclosed. In fact what is to be paid, who is to get paid for it, what the cost and the attendant obligations are, no one knows. The smallest transaction in common life could not be concluded in such a way, and any attempt to do it by trustees responsible to a court would unquestionably be a breach of trust, and this is the largest and most onerous undertaking ever contemplated by any Canadian Government, and the most risky. It is safe to say that no road capitalized above its earning power can ever be a useful public servant, nor can any road bought by a government for more than its worth ever be anything but a continuous drain on the taxpayer.

[Mr. Graham.]

The Canadian Northern Railway was built as a private speculation. Its bonds were sold to financiers at a discount. No money was received into its treasury for its stock. Nothing has been made public which would justify the taxing of other citizens of this country for the purpose of giving fictitious value to these bonds and stocks. The interest and other charges on Canada due to the war increase every day and even now are so great that it is difficult to say from what source they can be paid without an economic strain never hitherto undergone and a cutting down of expenses not yet even begun.

The credit of the country abroad is less than it has ever been. The last loan of $100,000,000 at 6 per cent for two years netted only $96,111,111. In other words, the country is borrowing money at a charge of more than 8 per cent per annum. Note.—According to the Hamilton Times of August 17, Sir Thomas White stated the net proceeds to be $96,250,000, not $96,111,111, and that the commissions and charges were 1¾ per cent. He was speaking of a two-year 5 per cent loan. The cost would be 8 per cent if the 1¾ per cent comes out of the $96,250,000, but not otherwise. Its future credit may depend entirely on the belief of foreign bankers that good money will not be sent after bad, and that speculative enterprises will be allowed to find the financial level called for by their intrinsic merits.

The undersigned, all of whom as investors, have a stake in the prosperity of this country desire to call the attention of their fellow-countrymen to the grave risk they all are running of having their own earnings diverted for the purpose of securing profits to bondholders and stockholders of a concern, the equity in whose enterprise has been declared by the only people at all in a position to form an opinion to be of no value. It is also urged that the strongest possible protests be made before it is too late to all senators and members of Parliament.

Montreal, August 20, 1917.

Meredith, C. S. Campbell, W. R. Miller, George Caverhill, Wm. McMaster, H. W. Blackwell, Andrew J. Dawes, Robert Hampson, George R. Hooper, George W. Sadler, W. W. Hutchison, Wm. C. Finley, F. H. Wilson, G. F. Benson, A. Craddock Simpson, James Morgan.

This is a statement made by very prominent business men of Montreal, and I imagine the majority of them, from what I know, usually look with pleasure on the actions and conduct of this Government. I would not say that they do so at present. I think, perhaps, they are wavering a little now that some matters have been exposed, but, generally speaking, I think the majority of these men are supporters of the Government. They are evidently strongly opposed to the taking over of the Canadian Northern, and particularly to the manner of taking it over. On page 8 of the Gazette appears an editorial headed "The Railway Policy," which I will read to the House.

The CHAIRMAN: This discussion is of such a general character that I think it should have taken place on the second reading of the Bill. It is for the committee to decide whether we will discuss the general principle of the Bill in committee, or whether we will take it up clause by clause.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am discussing clause 1, which is the whole Bill.

The CHAIRMAN: There were many statements in the long article which the hon. gentleman has read from the Gazette which were not relevant.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will submit to any ruling the Chair makes. Clause 1 is the essence of the Bill. It refers to everything that was referred to in the article which I have read. Clause 1 reads:

1. His Majesty may acquire the six hundred thousand shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company (par value sixty million dollars), not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths thereof, and for a price to be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided.

The article I have read was protesting against this clause.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Has the hon. gentleman concluded his statement?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have concluded on the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN: When the Bill was before the committee on a former occasion the hon. gentleman who was acting as chairman did not have time to call the clause before the Finance Minister made his statement, and discussion followed.

Mr. GRAHAM: We must be on clause 1.

The CHAIRMAN: As the hon. gentleman has read clause 1, I presume that clause is before the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then we must be on some clause, to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN: As the hon. member has read the clause now, clause 1 is before the committee.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We are in the "claws" of Mackenzie and Mann, that is all.

Mr. GRAHAM: This editorial refers to the meat of the whole thing. It is fair to say that the Montreal Gazette is opposed to government ownership of public utilities. I will read the editorial:

The Railway Policy.

We print in another column a protest against the purchase of the Canadian Northern Railway signed by many of the leading capitalists of Montreal, and this protest is not lightly to be disregarded. The point at issue is this, is the country to take over a burden that other shoulders should bear? Will the ownership of the Canadian Northern impose upon the people a financial obligation avoidable without danger to national interests? If the Government was divorced from the enterprise, the answer is easy. Like any other business undertaking the property should stew in its own juice, and undergo the course of liquidation through receivership, emerging therefrom in stronger condition in respect of liabilities both of current and of capital account. That appears to be the view of the financiers whose statement we print, and there is, force in the view.

The Canadian Northern must be carried on as an operating road. It serves a great territory and a large community of people whose welfare is dependent upon the operation of this railway, but having exhausted its financial resources the alternative of Government ownership by acquisition of the common stock, or through the medium of a receivership is the only one presented.

To Government ownership we are opposed. A reorganization of the capital liabilities, through the medium of receivership is the other resource. The liability of Canada in either event remains, the Government and the provinces having guaranteed the great sum of $211,000,000 of bonds of the company. It is, however, necessary to learn the extent of the liability taken over by Canada in the Bill now before Parliament. What assets are acquired? What obligations incurred? If there be a margin on the debit side of the account, if Canada is assuming a debt over and above existing guarantees, the public may not unreasonably ask why. The railway is a fine property with excellent prospects, but after all is said, it is a business venture which should be allowed to face the consequences of all business ventures. One thing is certain; the country should not be saddled with any avoidable liability. The debt created by the war is already large, and constantly increasing. New sources of taxation have to be tapped. The outlook is by no means bright in respect of the Dominion finances and before the additional obligation of taking over the Canadian Northern Railway is incurred, it is necessary at the least that we should know precisely what is being purchased in the way of asset, and what is being incurred in the way of liability.

Having read those two articles to place the viewpoint referred to by the Solicitor General and the hon. member for St. John before the committee, I can only say the case might have been fairly met had the Government proceeded under the statute of 1914, as I submit they have not, without introducing this new legislation to provide for the payment of equity which is declared to have no value, and which I cannot but believe the statute of 1914 contemplated would not be of value. If that Act were relied upon to obtain possession of the Canadian Northern we would have been pursuing the course outlined in 1914, a course which I believe every member of Parliament thought would have been pursued in the event of default.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has read two articles from the Montreal Gazette, with reference to this Canadian Northern purchase Bill. In both articles, so far as I have heard them, there was put forward the view that there should be a receivership, and the opinions expressed were against public ownership. That is the gist of the communication addressed to the Gazette—receivership and antagonism to public ownership. I will take the time of the committee to give my views with respect to the whole railway situation with which we are confronted, because it has a direct bearing upon the question which has been raised. The Gazette article states that the Government has no knowledge of the assets and liabilities of this system. That statement is absolutely incorrect in every particular. The Comptroller of the Railway Department has been through the books of the Canadian Northern Railway system time and again. In 1914 we had special audits made of the assets and liabilities of the company. If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look up the statute of 1914 they will find set out there the stock-holdings and the bond-holdings of the Canadian Northern Railway system which were pledged, with all the undertakings and all the assets of every kind whatsoever of the Canadian Northern Railway system, with trustees to secure the $45,000,000 bond issue guaranteed by the Dominion Government. Within the last two months we have had one of the best firms of auditors in the world, Messrs. Marwick, Mitchell, Peat & Co., make a most careful audit of the entire situation of the Canadian Northern Railway, both as to their assets and liabilities.

Mr. DEVLIN: What are their liabilities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will look at the balance sheet which has been laid on the Table, he will find the liabilities, and he will also find a statement of the assets. We have exhausted every effort to ascertain the precise situation. Messrs. Drayton, Acworth and Smith made a painstaking examination of the entire situation; and before we make an agreement the audit will be continued down so as to verify the present figures. We are not going into this with our eyes shut. We know what we are taking over. We know what the Canadian Northern system consists of, and we know what the liabilities are.

Mr. DEVLIN: Without interrupting the minister—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is interrupting. I will answer the questions of my hon. friend later on.

Mr. DEVLIN: Very well.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Supposing the Government of Canada was taking over the Canadian Pacific Railway to-morrow, as has been talked of—it has not been put forward by the Government, but it has been talked of through the country—does my hon. friend suggest we should expropriate the physical undertaking of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or should we buy its shares? The only suggestion which has ever been put forward, so far as I know, is that we should buy those shares at a price, or guarantee a certain dividend upon those shares. Supposing we came to ascertain how much we should guarantee as dividend on the shares, or how much we should pay for the shares, could there be any fairer way devised than to submit the matter to the arbitrament of a board constituted as this board is to be constituted? There must be some way of reaching a conclusion as to a fair price for whatever the Government is purchasing. That is exactly the position so far as the railway situation in Canada is concerned, and there is no use blinking it. Business men outside cannot understand this situation as the Government understands it, because we have been confronted with it for the last six years. It is not a theory; it is a condition. Ever since we have come into power, the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company have been in such a condition that they must have help or they would not be able to go on. There is no question about that. Who is responsible for that?

When it comes down to dealing with what this Government is doing now, let us ask ourselves why we are doing this, and why we are obliged to do it. What is the position of the Government with regard to the railways of the country? The policy of the National Transcontinental, which involved an expenditure of $200,000,000, and the policy with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific, in respect of which we have had to bring down grants for millions every year, and in respect of which there is in the Estimates a grant to-day of $7,500,000 to meet one year's shortage; the situation under which we have had to help the Canadian Northern to complete its construction and to carry on—all that has been the result of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not wish to be understood as criticising them at this time with regard to these matters. I simply desire to say this, that this Government has been confronted with a situation which it has not brought about, which has been brought about by a policy of a Government which was in power before we took the reins of office, and we have had to deal with that situation as best we can. What are the alternatives with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway system? There are just three. The one mentioned in that article in the Gazette, and mentioned by one or two hon. members in this House, is to appoint a receiver. Both Government and Opposition in this House have time and again stated that they are opposed to that course. Hon. gentlemen opposite, through their leader, have expressly stated, time and again, that a receivership is not to be thought of. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has taken that position. So far as I know, those hon. gentlemen opposite who have been connected with the late Government, and their followers, have taken that view, namely, that there is not to be a receivership. I think that is a sound view. Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth thought that was a sound view; they said it would not do to have a receivership of this road. It is idle, at this stage when this Bill is before the committee, to say that we should have a receivership, because both sides of the House, as well as the commission we have appointed, have expressly and distinctly stated that there must be no receivership. Why is that a sound view? It is put forward that in the United States there have been receiverships of railways, but there have been no railways in the United States whose credit have been involved with the credit of the Federal and State Governments in the way in which the credit of this railway is involved. The point is that the credit of the Dominion through its guarantees, and the credit of the provinces, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, through their guarantees, are absolutely involved with the finances of this railway company, and consequently if we throw the system into liquidation, the most calamitous results would ensue so far as concerns the credit of the Dominion and of the provinces. There is no question about that, and that has been the ground upon which both sides in this House—and after all it is the parties in this House that have to determine policy—have determined against a receivership and against liquidation. Hon. gentlemen say to me: Why do you not foreclose? So far as the equity of the situation is concerned, if an ordinary mortgage is foreclosed, the court usually orders a sale in order to determine if there is any value in the equity of redemption. At common law in the old days, they would foreclose. Equity steps in and says: That is not fair; you must offer the property for sale to see if there is an equity of redemption. In other words, it is equitable that an investigation or sale proceedings should be had, in order to determine whether the owner of a property which is mortgaged are entitled to any equity. Even if we put into effect the legislation of 1914—and I believe I can give the committee good reasons why it should not be put into effect—it is stated in that legislation that we may foreclose, subject to such terms and conditions as Parliament may prescribe.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If any.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If any. I say, it would be open to Parliament and it would be equitable for Parliament to hold just such an investigation as we purpose holding in order to find out if there is any equity. It is nonsense to speak about large sums of money by way of award. What is the position of this company? This company is not earning its fixed charges. It is earning $11,000,000 over its operating expenses, and its fixed charges are $15,000,000. It is therefore, idle to speak of an award running into $25,000.000 or $30,000,000. Is it common sense or good sense? What do Messrs. Drayton and Acworth say? Although they found, as they stated, no existing equity, they said that it would be equitable to allow something to the owners, and they suggested an arbitration for the purpose of determining what amount of stock the present proprietors of this road should have in the Dominion Railway Company which they suggested should be incorporated. I pointed out to the House that, in that report of Messrs. Drayton and Acworth, a perfectly admirable report, an excellent report. thought out most carefully in all details, they had by inadvertence, overlooked certain assets of the company. I have here a letter from the financial comptroller of railways. I made the statement to the House upon information which he had given to me. His letter, which is dated August 15, 1917, reads:

Dear Sir:—

Referring to our conversation of this morning in which you asked whether in your remarks in the House of Commons yesterday, as reported in Hansard, pages 4644 to 4648, inclusive, you had correctly conveyed the information which I had previously furnished you, that in the findings of the majority report of the Royal Commission appointed to investigate the railway situation in Canada, that the statement, based on Professor Swain's valuation of the physical property of the Canadian Northern Railway system showing there was no equity, was in error.

I may state that it is quite clear that there is an error in that part of the Commissioners' report; the following assets on the asset side are omitted:

Cash	$25,000,000
Accounts receivable	8,890,000
Operating materials and supplies..	916,000
Earnings, freight in transit..	558,000

Lands Assets.

Lands unsold, 3,245,987 acres.

Deferred payments and accrued interest, $6,662,000.

On the liability side, there is a shortage of some $25,000,000.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) G. A. Bell.

I stated expressly to the House the other day, and I state again now, that the difference between book assets and book liabilities is not a test as to the value of the common stock. It by no means follows that the common stock is at all equal in value to the difference between the assets and liabilities of the company. The best test is earning power, as was pointed out by Professor Swain, and in trying to reach a conclusion as to what arbitrators might fairly adjudge, we must bear in mind that this company, although its future prospects are promising, is not to-day earning its full bond interest. The Government is confronted with a condition and not a theory. If we do not allow this railway system to go into the hands of the receiver, with all the consequences which I have mentioned, there is only one of two destinies for the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and no hon. member here can dissent from this proposition. If the Canadian Northern Railway Company does not go into the hands of a receiver, there are in Canada only two organizations strong enough to hold it: One is the Dominion Government and the other is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. You have three alternatives: receivership and liquidation; ownership by the Government of Canada, or ownership by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Let us look at the matter from another standpoint. Apart altogether from the Canadian Northern Railway Company, we are confronted with the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Companies. There is no use in our closing our eyes to the fact that every year we have had to aid the Grand Trunk Pacific to the extent of millions of dollars. What is going to be its future? Are we going to continue, year after year, aiding this railway?

Let us see what lies ahead of the Dominion of Canada. How many railways are we going to have on our hands? We have already the Intercolonial, which is ours. We have the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg, which line is ours. The Grand Trunk Pacific railway must come in. There is also the Grand Trunk, which has liabilities in connection with that railway. I do not forecast the future with respect to that situation, but I say that the Grand Trunk Pacific in the West and the National Transcontinental need the Canadian Northern railway in the West to supplement them, if we are going to make them a success. Therefore, whether people are in favour of public ownership or not, the matter comes down to this, that if we are going to carry out the railway policy which has been forced upon us by the situation I have described, we need, in addition to the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern railway system in the West.

We need it because the Grand Trunk Pacific has no feeders. Who is responsible for all that? What is the Government to do? Should the Government let the company be wrecked and bought up here and there, bit by bit? No. Looking to the future we know we shall have the Grand Trunk Pacific and we may have other roads. We have the National Transcontinental. And what about the Canadian Northern, which fits into the Grand Trunk Pacific system in the West? Hon. gentlemen opposite have moved resolutions in this House—and the statement I shall make is not going to be a sweeping statement with regard to them, because I believe there are mixed opinions among hon. gentlemen opposite about this matter; indeed, they have so expressed themselves. Some of them, I believe, are in favour of public ownership; some are opposed to it, and some are in favour of a continuation of aid from year to year. But they have united upon a resolution, and let me say that every word in the article read from the Montreal Gazette by my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) was opposed to the resolution for which he voted the other day in this House. He voted the other day for a resolution under which we were to take over the entire Canadian Northern system, lock, stock and barrel, by foreclosure, and in the worst way, not in the best way, as I shall show my hon. friend in a minute. Everything that my hon. friend read from the Montreal Gazette, if he believed it, was a condemnation of his vote the other day, because he voted for taking over the entire system, lock, stock and barrel. But not only that. In 1914 he voted for acquiring the stock in precisely the same way that we are acquiring it now; but he proposed to do it in a more foolish way than we are adopting, because he fixed a maximum price of $30,000,000, which we would never have thought for a moment of fixing. Why was the course he took the other day a foolish course as compared with the course we have adopted? We are now in the fourth year of this war. I listen to honourable gentlemen opposite sometimes, talking about money rates. There are no better fellows that I know than hon. gentlemen opposite, and when I say that they sometimes fail to realize that we are in the midst of a war I do not mean in any way to impeach their interest in this war, because it is just as great as my own. What I mean is this: Do they realize that we are in the fourth year of this war, and that financial conditions in this world are as they are to-day? They do not. I realize it, because I am brought into contact with it every day, and have to face it. It is true we have to pay a higher rate of interest for money. Why? Because the world has been for years at war; that is the reason why I realize, as I think no other man in this House realizes, that to our financial position we should give the most attentive consideration from day to day, and week to week, and month to month. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that we on this side of the House desire to take over a railway system unless it is in the public interest to do so? But what is the alternative? Although we are at war, this railway situation is here and we have to face it. Hon. gentlemen opposite can sidestep it, but we cannot. We have to face it and we lay down this proposition: That so far as the Canadian Northern system is concerned, instead of going on paying out $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 every year to make good the shortage and enable them to carry on, we will take over the system for the people of Canada. Back of a good deal of criticsim of this measure—I do not say back of all the criticsm—is antagonism to the principle of public ownership, rather than criticism of method. The Dominion of Canada has had quite an experience in public ownership. It owns a great system of railways to-day. It owns the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental. Throwing our imagination ahead we can see what lies before us, and the question is, shall we acquire the Canadian Northern system or not? Personally, I believe that in five years' time the Canadian Northern system, in the hands of the Government and financed by the Government, will be a great system, but if we let it go into liquidation we shall lose it to the people of Canada.

5 p.m.

Mr. CARVELL: It depends on how much money you squander in connection with it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We won't squander any money in connection with it. If we do not do that, we should have only a straight line of railway from Moncton to Prince Rupert, with no feeders in the West. The hon. member for Carleton is as level-headed a man as there is in the House, practically speaking, and he knows as well as any man, that a straight line like that is not going to give the results that we should like to see given by a transcontinental system owned by the Government. What did the Drayton-Acworth report say about that? They point out that the Canadian Northern system is vital to the successful operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific in the West, and they also indicate that the Grand Trunk is complementary to the Canadian Northern in the East.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Why don't you foreclose and take the physical properties? Hon. gentlemen who put that forward have not thought the matter out. If we were not at war, if we could readily raise $100,000,000, $200,000,000, or $300,000,000 that we do not require for the purposes of war, it would be feasible, but it is not feasible to-day, and I will tell you why. If we foreclose on the Canadian Northern railway under the mortgage, what do we get? We get the roadbed and the physical properties of the Canadian Northern Railway company. We also get the stocks and bonds of the underlying companies; hon. gentlemen have overlooked that. The stocks and bonds of the underlying companies, which are included in the assets of the system as laid before this House, will still be outstanding. So that the difference would be this: Instead of owning $100,000,000 of stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, which would enable us to control the Canadian Northern railway and all its constituent and subsidiary companies, we should have the physical property of the Candian Northern railway only, and the stocks and bonds which are embraced in the trust mortgage which was taken under the legislation of 1914.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my hon. friend say that that would be the result if section 24 were acted upon?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The mortgage which was taken embraced the undertaking and the physical assets of the Canadian Northern Railway company, and there is pledged in addition to that, the stocks and bonds mentioned there.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In which case the statute says that the whole system would be vested in His Majesty, subject, of course, to the outstanding underlying liabilities.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let us see what position we should be in. Hon. gentlemen talk about our serious financial position due to the war. Now what would be our position if we took over the physical properties? Lt us assume that my hon. friend is right, and that we should take over the physical properties of all the underlying companies, although by the mortgage it is the undertaking of the Canadian Northern railway and the stocks and bonds of the underlying companies that are pledged. But let us assume he is right, although he is not right. If we have the physical properties of the Canadian Northern railway, and the Canadian Northern Quebec, the Canadian Northern Ontario, and of the other constituent companies, what becomes of all the underlying liabilities? They are there and have to be taken care of. How could we get title in fee simple to the properties of the Canadian Northern Railway system, without clearing up the indebtedness? Suppose that under the statute we reorganize; what does that mean? It means creating a new company, and negotiating with the present bondholders of the existing companies, because the new company would be a separate entity.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why has all that to be done? Why would not the new company take it, subject to all that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What about the floating indebtedness?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If you take the stock you have to pay the floating indebtedness.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Supposing we foreclose and wipe out the Canadian Northern and its shareholders? There are outstanding to-day over $100,000,000 of short-date liabilities for which the Canadian Northern is liable. Supposing we foreclose and take all the properties of the Canadian Northern away from them, what is the legal position? The legal position is that the Canadian Northern, without any other assets, is liable for these short-date obligations. Does my hon. friend mean to say that a railway company in that position, and which is only a name, because we take its property away from it, can renew its loans?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not, because these bankers in New York only hold guaranteed securities as collateral, and they would be glad to substitute notes of the new company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend for a minute. We take away all the assets of the railway company and leave only a name. There are outstanding liabilities for notes secured by collateral, guaranteed or not guaranteed, and these loans will be called. What happens to the Canadian Northern? It has to be foreclosed and a receivership is the result. That receivership means default under the trust mortgages upon the property. The principal may become due and payable and you have the whole financial situation about your ears.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Those difficulties are all imaginary.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have you not to take care of the short-date securities now?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, because the Canadian Northern to-day is a running system.

Mr. MACDONALD: That does not make any difference to the amount of the short-term notes which you must renew.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It makes all the difference in the world if you have taken away the properties of the Canadian Northern. Does my hon. friend not realize what the effect will be?

Mr. MACDONALD: Now you are only quibbling.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not quibbling. Then you have the unsecured indebtedness of the Canadian Northern. Suppose you foreclose and take away the assets and properties of the Canadian Northern, what about this unsecured indebtedness?

Mr. MACDONALD: You have to take care of this short-date obligation now.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The obligation can be financed now, but it would become altogether different if you were to foreclose, because if a receivership were appointed all these other things would happen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If a receivership were appointed you have section 24 and you would become the absolute owner of the whole Canadian Northern system. How could a receivership adversely affect the new company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would affect it very seriously. If my hon. friend will look at the trust mortgages securing the bond issues against the Canadian Northern he will find that one event of default is the appointment of a receiver. A receiver of what? Of the present company. If a receivership takes place default occurs under these mortgages and you have this financial situation that I have mentioned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then section 24 is not so good as the minister said it was in 1914?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would be in ordinary times. In ordinary times a complete arrangement could be made to finance the Canadian Northern. The Government could substitute its securities for other securities which run from 20 to 40 years and the situation could be dealt with in that way. It cannot be dealt with to-day at all. It is not possible having regard to the financial condition. Thus, to-day, the proper course to take is the course which preserves the Canadian Northern Railway company as a corporate organization in order that it may continue its financing. There is a loan of $11,500,000 coming due in New York. The Canadian Northern has to renew that loan in New York. If the Canadian Northern were wiped out as an entity that loan would have to be met, and you would have a financial situation of some gravity. As far as the course we are adopting is concerned, it is the best course having regard to finance. It is a course which is greatly preferable to foreclosing if the principle is adopted that the equity of redemption, if there is any value in it, is entitled to be valued. If that principle is adopted, and I submit it would be adopted by Parliament, as it is adopted by the courts, that is the most preferable course and it is the course that hon. gentlemen opposite voted for and is practically the same as that which we favour on this side of the House except that the one that we put forward is better from the standpoint of finance to that which they have put forward.

The statement that we do not know what the assets and liabilities are is not correct. We have made a very full investigation. Over a course of years that investigation has been proceeding. Auditors have gone through the books. The accounts of the company have been verified, and will be verified further, as to the financial condition, before any agreement is entered into. This House has ample information upon which to reach a decision upon a question as large as this. If you were taking over a small concern with assets of a few hundred dollars you would examine into everything to the minutest detail. I suppose that could be done. Of course, the Government would never be taking over anything of that kind. An individual would pursue that course but when you are taking over a great railway system like this, if you get at the liabilities, the bonded indebtedness, the floating indebtedness, the physical properties, the bonds, stocks and other securities it holds, and its earning power, you have substantially all the information necessary upon which to form your judgment because this is such a large transaction that you cannot get down to a matter of the uttermost detail.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister asks: What about the unsecured floating indebtedness? I take it that is the unsecured floating indebtedness which the Government must assume. What is the amount of that? We have had no actual information as to the unsecured floating indebtedness.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The fact of the matter is that my hon. friend has been so busily engaged in connection with the soldiers' votes Bill and other matters that he has not taken the trouble to examine the information which has been placed before Parliament because this is all in the blue-book.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister give it to us, succinctly, in round figures?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will find it in the balance sheet of April 30, certified to by the auditors and which we placed on the Table the other day. This transaction should be considered in the light of the railway situation. It must be considered in that way having regard to the fact that we have four transcontinental railway systems in this country, that the Government has the Intercolonial, the National Transcontinental and that it will probably have the Grand Trunk Pacific. Are we going to lose the Canadian Northern at this time?

Mr. PUGSLEY: We do not need to lose it under section 24.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) set up the criticism, which he made his own, from a newspaper to the effect that public ownership was a mistake and that there should be a receivership. I am addressing myself to that. I say that this transaction must be regarded as a step forward in public ownership. If we lose this Canadian Northern Railway company in the West, we will not have feeders for the Grand Trunk Pacific company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Better build 100 branch lines in the West than take this.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If we eliminate receivership as a possibility, and it has ben opposed by both parties in this House, there are only two possible destinies for this railway, the Canadian Pacific railway or the Dominion of Canada. My own strong view is that the people of Canada will insist that this Canadian Northern railway should belong to them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is my own view of it. We are preserving the organization of that railway in the way we are taking it over, with a plan that is absolutely fair for determining the value of the common stock which we do not hold. In a word, the transaction is this: That the Dominion of Canada owns $40,000,000 of this stock; we are the minority shareholders. Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited, hold the whole balance. Instead of continuing to pay out money, the ultimate benefit of which would go to them, we say: We are going to buy you out so that the ultimate benefit of whatever we pay over will enure to the people of Canada, and to do that we suggest arbitration —and I do not know any fairer way.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The statement of the minister makes the situation worse than I thought it was—decidedly worse. The minister has said that there is in the vicinity of $100,000,000 of unsecured—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, those are the short-date obligations.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister said unsecured floating indebtedness.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I asked the minister to state the amount of the unsecured floating indebtedness. He said I would find it in the blue-book. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) informed me that it was $96,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He is entirely wrong.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is it? The minister should say what the unsecured floating liability which we are assuming under the purchase of this stock by arbitration is, because the moment we become the Canadian Northern Railway company we, ipso facto, become liable for all the obligations of the company, both secured and unsecured. Therefore the country has a right to know that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend looks at the balance sheet of June 30, 1916, he will see:

Temporary loans against deposit as collateral of inter alia Government Guaranteed Securities, the value of which at current prices exceeds the amount borrowed		$55,912,861.80
Due to other companies on Construction Account (Secured)		$16,666,957.26
Current Liabilities—
Payrolls	$ 1,832,708.23
Audited vouchers and other floating liabilities	11,161,443.88
		$12,994,152.11

Thus there is a total of about $13,000,000 current liabilities. I did not say $100,000,000 unsecured, I said $100,000,000 representing short-date securities.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They are securities. I thought the minister used plain language. I understood him to say: What about the unsecured floating indebtedness amounting to $100,000,000? These are the words of the minister, and I was surprised that there was such an enormous unsecured floating indebtedness. Now the minister explains that what he meant was an indebtedness to bankers against which they hold securities guaranteed by the Dominion Government and other good securities. Therefore I must assume for the moment, until the minister makes another statement, that practically there is very little unsecured floating indebtedness or floating unsecured indebtedness.

The minister says that section 24 of the Act of 1914 contained admirable provisions which could be well acted upon if these were not war times. I am unable to follow my hon. friend in the suggestion that that section is not just as good in war times as it would be in any other time. I have read with very great care the remarks which were made by my hon. friend in 1914 when he was seeking to persuade Parliament to authorize the Government to guarantee these bonds to the extent of $45,000,000. I have read his language with regard to the very great advantage it would be to give to the Government the power, or to reserve to Parliament the power, in the form of a statutory agreement—that is what it was an agreement entered into by the Canadian Northern interests—that in case default should be made the Government would be authorized to act and to declare by Order in Council the equity of redemption in all the premises covered by that mortgage to secure the $45,000,000 foreclosed. Now, what are the premises? The premises are the physical system of the Canadian Northern Railway company and the various constituent companies composing the system. What further are the premises which are mortgaged in that mortgage to secure the bonds guaranteed by the Government under the legislaion of 1914? They are all the various stocks in the subsidiary companies and the bonds, if there were any, which were held by the Canadian Northern Railway company. They all pass, under that mortgage, to the trustees appointed to secure these debentures. They are the premises which are covered by the mortgage, and under the provisions of section 24, the moment the Governor in Council passed that order for foreclosure, the equity of redemption would be absolutely wiped out and His Majesty would become the owner of the system. The position would be exactly the same as if, instead of purchasing the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, they, under legislative authority, were authorized to make a transfer of their equity of redemption in the Canadian Northern Railway system and all the constituent companies and in these various stocks, to His Majesty. Let me read again the words of that section, because I think it is very important that the country should understand it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: So do I.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This Parliament, acting in good faith, upon the representations and the assurance of the Government as to the course which they would take in case there was any default, authorized this enormous obligation to be entered into. What are the words:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may, on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What are the mortgaged premises under that statute? Get the definition.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They are, as I remember it, the whole Canadian Northern Railway system.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Look it up.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We will find it in schedule 1 of the Act of 1914.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And schedule 2.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Take them both. Let us read them. These are the stocks.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Exactly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. minister knows what stocks are. This section says:

> The Bay of Quinte Railway Company—

Certain amounts are given here, but I will not read them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Pardon me, the point I make is this: that the mortgaged premises include not only the physical assets of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, but, in addition, the stocks and bonds of the constituent companies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Quite so, and I presume that was all in the mind of my hon. friend the Solicitor General and the Minister of Finance , and when, in 1914, section 24 was passed the Government knew what the mortgaged premises were. Undoubtedly they were the physical system and also these various stocks of the underlying or subsidiary companies, which were owned by the Canadian Northern railway. What difference does it make? Section 24 declares that the moment this legislation is passed the equity of redemption in all the system, all the stocks, and everything that was then owned and capable of being owned by the Canadian Northern, is foreclosed, and the title, subject only to the outstanding securities, becomes vested in His Majesty. It is exactly the same as if the Canadian Northern, under legislative authority, were executing a deed to His Majesty of its equity of redemption in the railway system, and in all these stocks. What did the Canadian Northern agree to do in 1914? My hon. friend talks about confiscation. The Canadian Northern came to the Government and said: "If you are willing to guarantee our bonds for $45,000,000, we will take the risk of carrying on, and we will agree with you that, if we make default, you shall be at liberty, through the Government of this country to pass an Order in Council foreclosing our equity of redemption, without the payment of one single dollar to us." That was the solemn agreement which Mackenzie and Mann and the Canadian Northern entered into with this Government, and it was upon the assurance that hon. gentleman gave to this Parliament and the country that they would have that power that Parliament authorized this great obligation to be entered into. What has been the experience since? Last year the company would have been in default, and it would have been the duty of the Government, if they had kept faith with Parliament, to have asked Parliament for authority to pass that Order in Council. Instead of doing that, the Government lent these gentlemen the further sum of $15,000,000, in order to prevent default, and to prevent the bringing into operation of section 24, which they assured Parliament they would bring into operation. The Finance Minister says to-day, "The company is again in default. We lent them $15,000,000 last year, but it was no good. They cannot carry on; they cannot pay their interest." He tells us to-day that it will take $15,000,000 to meet their fixed charges, and their net revenue is only about $11,000,000; in other words, they are $4,000,000 short, and these poor most worthy gentlemen are in the position that, if we do not lend them more money, they will not be able to pay their interest, or meet their obligations, and, therefore, in order that we may be excused from the duty of enforcing obligation which they voluntarily entered into, acting upon the agreement which they voluntarily made in 1914, which is embodied in the legislation contained in section 24, we want authority to appoint arbitrators to determine how much more money we have to pay in order to enable us to take over all their obligations, and to relieve these gentlemen and this company from the debts and liabilities which they have incurred. I do not think that is a reasonable proposition. There were two parties to the agreement in 1914. On the one side were Mackenzie and Mann, who said, "We want money to finish our road and purchase more rolling stock, and if you will agree to guarantee the bonds of our company, so that we will be able to raise money upon these bonds, we will undertake on our part, that if we do not pay the interest on them, you will be quite at liberty to take the necessary steps to foreclose our equity of redemption in this railway." Is there any injustice in this Government carrying out the agreement which was embodied in the statute? I am unable to see that Mackenzie and Mann would have anything to complain of if the Government simply said, "We are going to live up to the agreement which we made. You then said to us "If you will help us by these obligations, in case we are unable to pay our interest, you may take over the whole system without paying anything more, you may foreclose our equity of redemption, and become the entire owners of the property, subject to outstanding liabilities.'" Since that time, in the generosity of the Government, instead of acting upon the provisions of section 24, they have given them $15,000,000 more to enable them to carry on, which they have not done, and yet the Finance Minister says in effect, "Oh, we meant nothing by the legislation contained in section 24. We never intended to act upon it, we were only making a pretense to Parliament when we made that agreement with Mackenzie and Mann and embodied in the statute. We are going to treat the company as a going concern, perfectly solvent, and perfectly able to pay its obligations. We are quite willing to assume all the underlying indebtedness, take over their equity of redemption, and pay them whatever amount these third arbitrators we propose to have appointed may determine the common stock is worth." By this Act, the Government is asking Parliament, in effect, to declare that the stock has a value. Parliament will declare, when this Bill is passed, that this stock has a value. The sole question for the arbitrators to determine is what that value is. To-day the Minister of Finance states that, if we foreclose the equity of redemption, it would not bring anything, but, in the next breath, he says that if it is held for five years it is going to be a great and valuable railway system. Is he not putting into the mouth of Mackenzie and Mann the very argument which they and their counsel will use before the arbitrators? When they come before the arbitrators they will say "There has been no default on our part. The Government of this country, recognizing the vast importance of this railway system, has helped us out by lending us money, so there can be no default."

By the statement which they have submitted they show that their revenues are greater than their operating expenses. They say their revenues have increased in recent years, until to-day they have reached the very handsome sum of $42,000,000 per year, and they will argue, just as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance argued to-day, that in five years from now this will be a wonderful system and of enormous value. Under this statute the Government do not limit the arbitrators to the market value of the stock to-day. They do not limit the arbitrators to the cost of reproducing this railroad system. They leave it open to the arbitrators to determine its value, not upon existing conditions, but under a statute and a reference under which they will be able, and under which it will be their duty, to take into consideration the prospective earnings of this railway, running over three, four, five, or even ten years, because that is what arbitrators with a broad reference, such as this statute provides for, can always take into consideration, and it is a fact which they are bound to take into consideration. Therefore, the Government is putting the people of this country in the position that in order to prevent the Government having the power to act under the clause which it boasted of in 1914, and foreclose the equity of redemption on this railroad system, as Mackenzie and Mann agreed in 1914 that they would be able to do as a part of the terms of getting the guarantee, instead of doing that the Government assisted them last year, and is to-day taking the position that the matter shall go before the arbitrators without the company being in default at all; leaving the company in the position of receiving at the hands of the arbitrators a very indefinite sum of money which, as I believe, may run into untold millions, and which might amount to the full par value of this stock. Is that just and fair to the people of this country? I say it is not. The agreement made with Mackenzie and Mann in 1914, which was embodied in the statute, when they were asking for this vast assistance should be carried out to the letter. The money which my hon. friends propose giving through those arbitrators to Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, and their associates, is not their own money —it is the hard-earned money of the people of this country. Unless there is some obligation on the part of the country towards Mackenzie and Mann sufficient to justify the departure from that statutory agreement of 1914, is this Government, as trustees of the people of this country, and is this Parliament, as trustees for the people of this country, acting fairly towards the taxpayers of Canada when they put themselves in the position in which this country will be called upon to pay many millions of dollars towards Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited? Let us see if there is any objection to acting upon the authority contained in section 24. My hon. friend says there are a lot of outstanding notes of the Canadian Northern Railway company. These notes are secured by good Government security. If the Canadian Northern Railway company has no property over and above what is pledged to secure those various obligations, then the bankers who have lent the money upon those short-term notes scured by those guarantee obligations have trusted to the security of the obligations, and not to the security of the Canadian Northern Railway company. Suppose the mortgage is foreclosed under section 24, it would have the effect of investing the entire system and all its underlying stocks in His Majesty. What is to prevent His Majesty from at once incorporating a new company, which would have all the powers of the Canadian Northern Railway company, and which would be freed from all the unsecured obligations now existing against the Canadian Northern Railway company?

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend advocate that the Government of Canada should exercise its powers so as to evade or repudiate its liabilities simply because, as he suggests, they may not be properly secured?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, I am not suggesting that. For the moment I am meeting the suggestion of the Finance Minister to the effect that these obligations, being outstanding, would in some way embarrass the Government if it acted under section 24 and became the owner of the system, or was obliged to form a new company. Having become the owner of the system under the authority of section 24, and having formed the new company, what would the Government do? It would at once inquire into the securities which it had taken over under that order. It would find a certain number of valuable securities in the city of New York —securities guaranteed by the Governments of the Dominion and of the different provinces. It would find certain loans had been made against these securities. I ask you, Sir, if the new company, known to be a company acting for His Majesty, would have any more difficulty in securing a renewal of those loans than the Canadian Northern Railway company itself would have? Would not its security be as good as or better than that of the Canadian Northern Railway company? It would own all the property the Canadian Northern Railway company owns today, and the company would be a new one free from all entanglements and obligations of every kind and description, and having at its back the Government of Canada, as representing His Majesty the King. Yet the minister says this new company, organized under those circumstances, would have difficulty in renewing its short-term obligations held by the bankers of New York against absolutely good guaranteed securities. The minister has formed the idea, based upon something I do not understand, that if section 24 were acted upon it would give somebody an opportunity to put some company into the hands of a receiver. As a matter of fact, it would not do anything of the kind. It would simply put His Majesty, or the new company to which His Majesty would transfer the property, subject to these outlying securities, in exactly the same position as if the Canadian Northern Railway company transferred its equity of redemption to the Crown under legislative authority.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What would happen with regard to the floating indebtedness?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have just spoken of it. My hon. friend is now speaking of some secured indebtedness.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am speaking of both. Take the unsecured indebtedness.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I cannot find any unsecured indebtedness, except about one million dollars.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Take the indebtedness which is secured, but not by Government guaranteed security.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Secured by what?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Say, by Canadian Northern debenture stock, or by some other security not guaranteed by the Government —in other words, not high-class collateral.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the idea of the Government when it takes over the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company? It is that the Government will go to the holders of those securities, to the bankers who have lent money, who hold those short-term notes and say to them: We new represent the Canadian Northern Railway company, and we want you to extend those loans. What would hinder the Minister of Finance from doing exactly the same thing if a new company were formed to hold the equity of redemption? Could not his representative, through this new company, go to those bankers in exactly the same way and say: We now own the equity of redemption in these securities that are pledged to you; we want you to extend your loans against them? Would not the bankers do that just as well for the new company with the Government of Canada behind it and owning all the stock of it, as if the Govenment went to them saying: we own the stock of this old company, the Canadian Northern? Where would be the difference? In the one case you have a new company free from all entanglements, free to act as it might in the best interest of the country. In the other, you have an old company with many entanglements, about which we know nothing to-day, but about which we may discover something later on if this legislation goes through.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend take the position that the new company would pay or provide for the payment of all the unsecured as well as the secured loans?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Certainly, just—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What is the use in doing that if the value of the equity of redemption under the legislation of 1914 would have to be considered?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would not have to be considered at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is just the point.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am answering the point that the Minister of Finance made that there would be, in connection with a new company, inconveniences and difficulties which would not exist if His Majesty acquired the stock of the old company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But there would at least have to be a substitution.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A substitution of liabilities, certainly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What then is the advantage?

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no advantage to Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited. There is an advantage to the country, namely, that the country may be saved from the further payment of $60,000,000. The advantage to the people of this country is that they would be saved from paying whatever amount those three arbitrators might determine should be paid, having in view as I have said, not merely the value of the stock to-day, but its prospective value based upon its prospective earnings, which amount there is no obligation legal or moral upon this country to-day to pay if we choose to act under the provisions of section 24 of the statute of 1914. I am endeavouring to meet the objection that the Minister of Finance has so speciously put forward that there are some difficulties in connection with a new company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There would be.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There would not be one iota of difficulty, and no one knows that better than the Minister of Finance. He is only putting that up as an argument in order to try to escape, if he can, from the consequence of his not acting upon the legislation of 1914. He says that, in some way or another, if the equity were foreclosed by Order in Council, somebody could put the property into the hands of a receiver. That could not be done, because His Majesty, as the owner of the system, would meet the liabilities, would meet the interest charges, just as the Crown is bound to meet the interest charges if it becomes the owner of this $60,000,000 worth of stock, and just as any man purchasing the equity of redemption in a property would be obliged to pay the taxes and the interest upon any mortgage which might be upon the property.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was dealing with the case in which the Government would foreclose and not pay the unsecured or floating indebtedness, or the short-term liabilities. I said that, if that were not done, then receivership of the Canadian Northern would follow with the consequences I mentioned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister was assuming that the Government, in case they foreclosed the equity of redemption under section 24 of the statute and formed a new company, might act differently with respect to the outstanding obligations from what they would do if they took over the stock of the Canadian Northen Railway company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought the minister was arguing that if, in some way or another, section 24 were acted upon and the equity of redemption foreclosed by Order in Council, somebody would be able to put this system into liquidation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was discussing the consequences which would follow from not paying those unsecured or short-term liabilities, because I understood hon. gentlemen opposite were putting forward the suggestion that we should foreclose and no more. In confirmation of that, might I point out to my hon. friend that he himself suggested to-day that we should repudiate the liability on the debenture stock which was issued with the land grand as security?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The debenture stock?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. My hon. friend suggested that we should foreclose and not assume that particular indebtedness.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister say that the debenture stock was issued against the land?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was issued with the land as security.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does he mean that there are $46,000,000 of securities out against those lands?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The land grant debenture stock of which my hon. friend was speaking.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I call them land grant bonds.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But they are a liability of the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought the minister had in view the land grant bonds. Surely the minister meant—certainly his language would lead one to believe that he meant that, if section 24 were acted upon and the equity of redemption were foreclosed by Order in Council, there would necessarily arise a condition of affairs under which creditors would be able to put the system into the hands of a receiver. I am glad the minister did not mean that. I did not see how such a result would follow. Of course, I realize, and every one realizes, that, if the Government became the owner of the equity of redemption by virtue of an Order in Council, foreclosing under an agreement entered into in 1914, and if the Government did not pay the interest upon the obligations against that property, there would be a receivership, and there would be a foreclosure of those mortgages. My answer to that is this: that the Government could, in the name of His Majesty, become the owner of the property under an Order in Council barring or foreclosing the equity of redemption, and then be, so far as all those outstanding securities are concerned, in exactly the same position as the Canadian Northern is in to-day. If any of those bonds run for 40 years, they would still run for 40 years; if any of them run for 20 years, they would still run for 20 years. Therefore, there would be no inconvenience whatever, but on the contrary, there would be the advantage of having a new company with a new organization, which would be acting for His Majesty under the provisions of the statute of 1914.

What would we get rid of in that way? We would get rid of the probability of having to pay out an enormous sum of money under this arbitration to the holders of the stock of the Canadian Northern. Is that not something to get rid of? Some honourable gentlemen opposite argue that it would be confiscation to take that course. Surely, it would not be confiscation to carry out an agreement that has been entered into. Suppose a man has a mortgage on my property and the interest upon it amounts to the rental and the taxes and the cost of repairs, and I go to him and say: 'I want to borrow $5,000 more upon the property; I have faith and believe that I can carry the thing through; I agree that if you will lend me $5,000 you can take charge of the property if I make default in the payment of the interest; I will hand you an agreement releasing my equity of redemption in the property; it is yours, without your being obliged to take any proceedings for foreclosure or putting the property up for sale. I act upon the agreement and the mortgagor acts upon it. Could I say afterwards that I was treated most shamefully because my agreement was simply carried out in the letter and in the spirit in which I made it? Is not that exactly the same position as between Mackenzie, Mann and Company and His Majesty, as represented by the Government of the day? After they have received millions and millions of the public moneys Mackenzie, Mann and Company ask for further assistance. They said to this Government "Give us the assistance and if we do not pay the interest upon the money, if we make default in any respect, we agree that Parliament may authorize you, simply by Order in Council, without any legal proceedings whatever, to bar our equity in the property and take over and become the absolute owners of the system." That was the agreement, and all we ask is that it be carried out.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. PUGSLEY Mr. Chairman, just before recess I was speaking of what I thought was the untenable position taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that if this railway system was acquired in any other way than by taking over this stock, it might lead to complications. I thought I largely answered that argument of my hon. friend. Indeed, I understood that he admitted that there would not be any complications arising with respect to a new company, if the Government acted under section 24 of the statutes of 1914 and foreclosed equity of redemption under the statutory agreement, and that if a new company were organized by the Government it would stand in a position just as good as that of the Canadian Northern Railway company. In the one case the Government would own all the stock of the new company and in the other case, by virtue of this Bill, the Government would simply own the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company. I was endeavouring to deal with the question from the standpoint of the Government taking over the system and becoming liable for the underlying obligations. Of course, if the Government were simply to expropriate the property and have it valued by the judge of the Exchequer Court, I have very little doubt, from the evidence which we have as to the actual cost of the road, that the Government would get the system for a great deal less money—for many millions less—than is represented by the existing securities. There are something like $147,000,000 of securities which are not guaranteed by either the Dominion or any of the provinces. I presume these securities are held by strong financial men, by bankers and others who could afford to lose a portion of their securities just as well as the country could afford to pay them money which is not represented by the system. But, if the Government decide that it is better, for reasons connected with maintaining the public credit, to pay this $147,000,000 of obligations which are unsecured by any public authority, a proposition with which I do not at all agree, when it does seem to me that the road ought to be taken under the authority of the statute of 1914 and under the statutory agreement which was then made, instead of taking a step which means in all human possibility—indeed I think, necessarily means—handing out a great many more millions of the money of the people of Canada to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann and their associates.

I am sorry that I did not have an opportunity of hearing the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) this afternoon, as possibly he referred to the remarks which I had made. I was obliged to leave the Chamber to attend a committee meeting. But I shall have an opportunity of seeing his remarks in Hansard, and possibly there may be an occasion later on in the discussion of the Bill when I can give attention to his observations in case they seem to require some reply from me.

The Minister of Finance gives an extraordinary reason for taking over the Canadian Northern Railway system. When he seemed to fail in argument as to the reason for this extraordinary step upon other grounds, he said: "Why, Mr. Chairman, we must look ahead; there is a great transcontinental railway system extending from Moncton to Winnipeg already owned by the Government, and built with Government aid from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean; it is capable of being a great railway system, and the Government must take it over in the near future." That is the effect of what my hon. friend said, but, he added: "That road has no branch lines," or, "that road is lacking in branch lines, and we want the Canadian Northern railway in order to supplement the Grand Trunk Pacific system." Is it to be suggested for one moment that this Government is to be plunged into an obligation of $500,000,000 and upwards in order to secure a system of branch lines for the Grand Trunk Pacific? Did any one ever hear of such an extraordinary suggestion? It will be better to wait until the Government acquires the Grand Trunk Pacific system, and then build all the branch lines necessary to tap the country north and south. You could build all the branch lines you want in the Canadian West, even at present prices of labour and materials, for $20,000 a mile. For $40,000,000 you could build 2,000 miles of branch lines to feed the system of the Grand Trunk Pacific. But, instead of that, my hon. friend suggests, as a reason why we should take over the Canadian Northern Railway system and bind the country to this vast obligation, that we want branches in order to feed the Grand Trunk Pacific system. If that is the best reason my hon. friend can give, I do not think his proposal will give very much satisfaction to the people of this country.

There is another reason why this measure should not be pressed. It is taking a very great departure; it is providing for the government ownership of a great railway system. This question has never been submitted to the people. Speaking for the people of my own province, I am satisfied I represent their opinion when I say that they are not in favour of imposing this vast obligation upon the Canadian public at the present time. I deny the right of this moribund Parliament—this Parliament which died a constitutional death nearly a year ago, and which is in existence to-day, not by the votes of the people, but simply by our own votes, and as the result of a resolution which we passed requesting the Imperial Parliament to extend our parliamentary term—to commit the people of Canada on this question. This moribund Parliament has no mandate from the people to impose upon them an obligation of $500,000,000 and upwards, which is but the beginning of the financial obligations which will be imposed by reason of the acquisition of this system. It has no constitutional or moral right to do it.

I must not detain the committee, because I know there are many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who desire to speak. Hon. gentlemen on the other side who may feel constrained as supporters of the Government to give their adherence to this extraordinary measure will want to explain to the people why they are prepared to take that course. The people will demand from them an explanation on the floor of this House of their reasons for so doing. There are hon. gentlemen on this side who would deem it to be their duty to call the attention of Parliament and of the people to the objectionable proposals which are now under consideration.

I regret very much indeed that a measure so important and so far-reaching in its consequences, involving the people in tremendous obligations at this time when the country requires its full credit in order to raise the moneys which are necessary to carry on the war, should be brought down so late in the session.

It is over seven months since Parliament first met, and this measure might have been presented for consideration long ago. It is impossible to properly consider it before the expiry of the life of this Parliament. It might be well for the minister to have printed for circulation the statements which he presented a few days ago. Time should be given in order that the people of Canada may become acquainted with all that this measure means. They have not had time for that yet and that time cannot be given if this measure is to be put through before the extended life of this Parliament expires. The people are becoming aroused, and as they become more fully acquainted with the measure, I am satisfied that the feeling against it will become stronger and stronger.

Mr. DEVLIN: The ordinary man wants to know the actual value of the road that is being taken over by the Government. I am informed that its value is $383,302,000. Is that correct?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. I would refer my hon. friend to the report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, which contains Professor Swain's physical valuation of the road, and I would refer him to Professor Swain's remarks about the word "value" which he says is one of the most difficult to define. No one could state offhand the value of a railway system such as the Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk railway or Canadian Northern railway. That would be one of the matters which a board of arbitrators might consider. I am unable to give the precise value of the Canadian Northern Railway system, but the book value is shown in the reports placed before Parliament, and the physical valuation of Professor Swain, with the comments thereon of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, appear in their report.

Mr. DEVLIN: Am I properly informed that the general debts of the company amount to $402,000,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The auditors report, which has been presented to the House, shows the funded and floating indebtedness.

Mr. DEVLIN: What provision has been made by the Government to raise the money necessary to pay for this road?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question because it shows, if I may say so without offence, an entire misconception of the transaction. If we expropriated the Canadian Northern Railway system, took over all the physical properties and paid off the indebtedness, then we should have to raise a very large amount to do it, but that is precisely what we are not doing and what it would be very unwise, or I might say impossible, to do at this time. I pointed out on a previous occasion that the Canadian Northern Railway debt is pretty well funded, that is to say the securities have been issued for a long period of years, maturing twenty, thirty or forty years from now. That is the principal part of the debt. One advantage that we get from maintaining the corporate organization of this company is that we do not have to raise money to pay off the indebtedness as shown by these balance sheets. The Dominion Government simply becomes the sole shareholder of the company and the company goes on financing just as in the past.

Another point is that the Dominion Government is not brought into privity with its creditors, legally speaking. It is a mistake to say that the Dominion debt is added to, speaking legally and strictly, because it is not. We are acquiring $60,000,000 of stock in addition to the $40,000,000 we have, so that we shall be the owners of $100,000,000 of fully paid-up stock in the Canadian Northern railway which concern will continue to run as a corporation. Its obligations will be the obligations of the Canadian Northern railway as they are to-day. But the Dominion Government will, of course, help it to run. If the Dominion took over the Canadian Pacific railway to-morrow it would not have to raise money to pay off all the funded indebtedness of the system; it would run it as a corporation, and the earnings of the road would take care of the bonded indebtedness and would pay a substantial dividend upon the shares.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the minister state to what companies the amount of $16,666,957 is due?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not regard it as relevant to the discussion to say that so much is owed to this company or to that institution. That is a domestic matter between the company and its bankers here and in England.

Mr. DEVLIN: We will have to pay this will we not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, the company will pay it. If the company is unable, out of its earnings, to pay all its indebtedness, then the Dominion will have to make advances to it as in the past, but with this essential and vital difference, that the Dominion Government will own the company and that the advances we make will be for the benefit of our own company instead of another.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the Government own the physical assets?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, the stock.

Mr. DEVLIN: How does the minister make the difference? We will own the stock of the company, but we will not own any of the physical assets, and we assume all liabilities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, we do not.

Mr. DEVLIN: Who will own the physical assets?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The company.

Mr. DEVLIN: And who will own the stock in the company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Dominion Government.

Mr. DEVLIN: I must say that I cannot consent, as a member of this House, to the people I represent becoming the purchaser of nothing—according to the Government—for which we will have to pay a very large sum of money. This proposed purchase of 600,000 shares of stock which will involve obligations running into hundreds of millions—advancing money constantly to a company, gradually, as the minister says, not all at once—is a policy I could not conscientiously support. I do not intend to speak often in committee on this subject, but I want to place myself on record as saying that this, to my mind, is about the worst transaction the Government has ever entered into. I say that with all respect to the Government. I mean that it is the worst in the value that the Government is receiving for what it is purchasing. To sum up the whole situation, it seems to me to resolve itself into this. It is apparent that we are getting something, but what that something is the Government do not know and cannot tell us. We are going to pay something for that something; to whom we are going to make payment the Government does not know or will not tell us. We are going to pay a certain amount for that something, how much the Government does not know or will not tell us. We are going to get something apparently of value—or else we would not buy it—what the value is the Government does not know or will not tell us. We are going to assume debts and obligations; to what extent the Government does not know or will not tell us. Apart from the debts we are going to assume, and the values we are going to get—if we get anything of value—we are going to become purchasers of 600,000 shares of stock, but the Government cannot tell what it is worth. The Government is going to arbitrate, and has named its arbitrators. Other arbitrators will be named, and we will pay the amount that arbitration will fix for that stock. We will assume that liability, in addition to the other liabilities and debts of the company. Where we are going to get the money to pay these liabilities, the Government has not told us. It is well known that money is very expensive; rates of interest are extremely high; we are obliged now to impose taxes upon the people of this country in every shape and form; we require every possible resource of this country towards the winning of the war. We have imposed an income tax for that purpose. The Government is asking the people to assume terrific obligations under this measure; to what extent they cannot say; and this at a time when the people are hardly able to bear the obligations imposed upon them by the war. I say emphatically that I want to see this country developed along sound lines. I want to see every resource of this country utilized to the advantage of the people and to the advantage of Great Britain and the Allies; I want to see a proper and sound programme carried on by the Government of this country; and for one, I am not prepared to give my consent, on behalf of the people I represent, to the assumption of liabilities and debts for something which apparently is valueless, or the value of which the Government cannot tell us.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to move that we proceed now to consider section 2. We have considered section 1 for two or three days in committee, and I would like to have some progress made.

Mr. MACDONALD: Before leaving section 1, I should like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that he has not given us the information I asked for when we were in committee before, as to the names of the pledgees of the stock. That is a matter of very great importance, in view of the fact that, under the Act of 1914, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, the contractors, covenanted with the Government to give up all possible claims which they might have for commission and otherwise. It is important to know who the pledgees of the stock are, and when the stock was pledged with them. For, if it was pledged since the Act of 1914, the pledgees of the stock, as a matter of law, would have no better or greater title than the original owners of the stock had; and by reason of the fact that the Act of 1914 was a public statute, they would be bound to know the law, and their rights would be subrogated to the rights of the original holders. They are, therefore, in no better position than the original holders. One of the terms of the agreement ratified by the Act of 1914 reads as follows:

> The contractors covenant that they will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim for contractors' profits, commissions or otherwise against the Canadian Northern or against any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, upon or in respect of any express or implied contract, understanding, agreement, or stipulation of any kind, heretofore or hereafter made, whereby or whereunder they, or any one or more of them, may now or hereafter be entitled to receive from the Canadian Northern, or from any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, any construction profits in respect of work heretofore undertaken, or as consideration for transfers of properties, rights or franchises already transferred, or to be transferred under sub clauses (a) and (b) of this clause, or for commission or remuneration for services in financing, or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released.

The Drayton-Acworth Report says:

> The property investment of the Canadian Northern Railway system is stated in the balance sheet of June 30, 1916, at $494,112,489.34. This figure admittedly has been written up to include $100,000,000 of capital stock. And this stock, as we have already said, was issued without any cash consideration.

I called the attention of the minister, as a matter of law, to the fact that this $100,000,000 of stock, the value of which is to be arbitrated under the proposal of my hon. friend, has been found by the commission appointed by himself to have been issued without any cash consideration, and the suggestion in this report that anything should go to the holders of the stock is based upon the theory merely that they had spent a good deal of time in connection with the matter and were entitled to something by way of honorarium. But whatever right they had on that ground was relinquished under the provisions of the agreement of 1914, and the stock not having been issued for value, as evidenced by the statement in the report of the commission—and also by the statement of my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in 1914 that the whole of the stock of the Canadian Northern was simply watered stock—the result is that the pledgees of the stock have no rights whatever as a matter of law, and the owners of the stock have no rights whatever as a matter of law, they having covenanted not to make any claim on the Government in any way for any services or any conditions such as are shown in the clause I read. The minister should tell us who are the pledgees of this stock; in whose hands the stock is at the present time; for what it was pledged, and when it was pledged—because the first section which he asks the committee to allow to stand is the section that provides for paying money to certain pledgees. I submit, this House has no right to enter at this time into an agreement with some party or parties unknown who are stock pledgees, if the Government know—as they must know—the names of the parties so described, and if, as a matter of fact, those parties have no higher or greater rights than the original holders of the stock in 1914. My hon. friend will recall I asked him for that information, and he ought to give it to us.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The statement has already been made twice. My hon. friend must have been out of the House this afternoon.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister gave the names of the holders of the stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The names of the holders of the stock were in the certified list of the shareholders which I laid upon the Table. I stated, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) stated the other evening, that the assets of Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, including this stock which they held among other securities, were pledged to their bankers in the ordinary course of business and by the usual banker's pledge. I stated their bankers were the Canadian Bank of Commerce. As to the point my hon. friend makes in regard to Mackenzie, Mann and Company having agreed to waive their claims for any consideration in respect of their services before the trust mortgage of 1914 was acted upon and before those securities were issued, Mackenzie, Mann and Company were obliged under seal to execute that agreement as it appears in the statute. The greatest possible care was taken in connection with that transaction. Not only did I give it my personal attention in the summer of 1914, but I took it up in a voluminous correspondence with Mr. James Bicknell, K.C., who acted for the Government. In the history of the Government no work has ever received more careful attention.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Why don't you use it now?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Use what?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The 1914 legislation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have been discussing that. We discussed it on the second reading, and we discussed it here to-day. The reasons have been given why we prefer to buy the $60,000,000 of stock instead of acting under the legislation of 1914. They are reasons which appear to me, and I think to the Government, and I should hope to the House, as being sufficient. The stock was issued by the company to Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited. It may be that the Drayton-Acworth report states there was no cash consideration given for it, but I would point out that this report overlooks the land grants which were the property of Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, and which were transferred to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. They were part of the consideration. I am not here to emphasize what Mackenzie and Mann did for that stock, but the stock was issued, and, we have every reason to believe, validly issued. The statute of 1914 declared the capital stock issued to be $100,000,000, of which the Dominion Government owns $40,000,000 and these other parties $60,000,000. By that statute, as I recollect it, that stock was declared to be paid up. That stock is in the hands of its owners, according to the statement I laid on the Table. The principal owners, Mackenzie, Mann and Company, who carry on a very large business in Canada, pledged that stock with their bankers in the ordinary course of their business. I pointed that out this afternoon, and I am now repeating it.

Mr. MACDONALD: When was it pledged, and for what amount?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know. It was pledged with the other assets in the ordinary course of business. As I already indicated, if we were to take over the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the hon. member for Pictou owned 1,000 shares which he had hypothecated, with his bank together with other bonds and stocks, the amount of the pledge would not be a relevant matter in connection with the valuation of that stock. The pledgees cannot have any interest in the stock except its value.

Mr. MACDONALD: And the amount they put up.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, not at all. I do not agree with that in any sense. Take the case of an unlisted stock which is pledged to a banking institution; that institution cannot have any higher rights than the owner of the stock, in the sense of getting a higher value than the stock is worth under expropriation proceedings. My hon. friend knows better than most gentlemen in this House that they would not be allowed to make evidence as to what was loaned against it. The question is not pertinent and not relevant. I have obtained for this House all the information that is relevant to the consideration of this section. If there is any more information that is relevant which I have not obtained, I want to get it, but I cannot be securing information as to this transaction and that transaction on the part of the stockholders who have acquired the stock, which has no bearing upon the question before the committee.

Mr. MACDONALD: But it has. If my hon. friend had not put it in the Bill that this payment is to go to the owners and pledgees, then it might be a different matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The point is this —and the hon. member from Pictou knows it as well as I do, if not better, because he is a practising lawyer—that this is an ordinary deposit agreement under which stock is to be acquired. The pledgee has a limited interest, because the owner has transferred the stock to him in consideration of a certain advance. Now, in order to get that stock we have to get it under the terms of this agreement. The owners and pledgees should lodge it, and if they do not lodge it the agreement does not become operative. If they lodge it, whether owners or pledgees, then it becomes subject to the terms of the agreement, which are that the value is to be determined by arbitrators, and when so determined is to be paid over to the proper parties. Who are the proper parties? It is so elementary that I hate to trouble the House about it; the hon. member knows there is nothing in it, but he is raising it simply for the purpose of discussion. He knows perfectly well if owners and pledgees bring their stock into the agreement—the stock so bought by the Government at a price to be fixed by arbitration—the pledgees are in a position to transfer that stock into their names and make themselves the legal owners. As a matter of fact, it was not absolutely necessary that the word "pledgees" should be in the Bill at all.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why mention it then?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was not necessary. I am talking to a committee of business men and good lawyers. Everybody here knows that if stock is pledged to an institution it is within the power of that institution to transfer the stock into its name, and obtain legal ownership of it. The man who transferred it to the institution has an equity interest in it, but the legal ownership is in the institution. The word "pledgee" is not necessary, but it does no harm. Take the case of a government expropriating real property, and assume there is a mortgagee, has not the mortgagee a right to come in and be heard?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Not unless he is the registered owner

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But he is the registered owner, because he has registered his mortgage in the registry office. Speaking in a strict sense, I say that gives him, as my hon. friend knows, legal title, because the property has been conveyed to him under the law, say, of Ontario—I know that is the case in that province. If a pledge of stock is given to an individual or an institution, it is open to that individual or institution to transfer that stock into his or its name on the books of the company. That individual or that institution then becomes the legal owner. The fact that pledges are mentioned in this makes no real difference, but there is no real objection to it because there are two parties unquestionably interested in stock: First the man who has pledged the stock, because he may pledge it for only a part of its value, although if he pledges it for its full value, he is liable under the covenant and is interested in his security, but there is no objection to the holder and the pledgee being mentioned in the agreement because the pledgee is entitled to put it in his own name. The matter is so elementary that I do not want to discuss it.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is asking this committee to pass a certain Bill in which he uses these words—

> And the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths thereof.

—referring to the parties with whom the contract is to be made and with whom the Government are authorized to make the contract. The minister gives the committee the names of the owners of the stock; he tells us generally that that stock is pledged to the Canadian Bank of Commerce, but he does not tell us for how much it is pledged, when it was pledged, or any of the conditions of the pledge, all of which are questions relevant to the discussion by virtue of the provision of the statute of 1914. He says the matter is of no importance. I say to him that it is of importance, otherwise he would not put that clause in the Bill. If it is of no importance, let it be stricken out.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not particular.

Mr. MACDONALD: The people are entitled to know with whom the country is going to make this agreement and whether those parties have any right greater or less than those of the owners of the stock—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They cannot have greater rights.

Mr. MACDONALD: —who have covenanted to give it up and who have no claim whatever to it against that of this country. Every dollar, therefore, given out under this arbitration is so much money taken out of the public treasury absolutely without justification and in face of the solemn assurance of this Government, made in 1914, that no more money would be asked for. The minister has not given and will not give us the information for which we are asking. Yesterday, I asked the minister for some information which is necessary in regard to the consideration of every part of this Bill. Certain obligations of this company fell due in June, July and August of this year. It was common report that certain banks in the country advanced to this company money for the purpose of meeting those obligations as they fell due. I asked the minister yesterday to tell us what were the amounts which fell due in those months; what banks made the advances in order to cover them, and whether those banks made the advances as the result of any assurance given to them by the Minister of Finance that they would be protected. The country have a right to receive that information.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Canadian Northern Railway Company required advances for the purpose of preventing it from being forced into liquidation during almost the whole period, I think, in which its affairs, as well as the affairs of other railway companies, were being investigated by the Board of Railway Inquiry which was appointed last year. The Government did express to the bankers of the company the hope and the request that the company would not be allowed to go into liquidation pending that investigation. That action was taken for the reason that it would be perfectly idle to commence and carry on an inquiry into the affairs of this company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and permit them to go into liquidation while the inquiry was pending. The same expression of hope and request was made during the period after the report was made while the matter was under consideration by the Government.

Mr. MACDONALD: I thank the Prime Minister for the information he has given to us. We would be glad if the Minister of Finance would go further and tell us exactly what amounts were paid by those banks in the months to which I referred.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not the information. The assurance given or the request made was by the Prime Minister who dealt with this matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: Could not the minister ascertain it? It is of importance in relation to this question.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think it is of any importance.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is very important to know what advances were made within the last three months. That information does not appear in any returns that have been brought down.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Before this section is left, I should like to be permitted to express a wish that I could say anything to bring to an end within a reasonable time discussions which are becoming, to say the least of it, somewhat prolonged. We are in the eighth month of this session of Parliament, and the matter is becoming serious to some of us who think we could do more for the war by pitching sheaves than by listening to the same thing said so many times over. I rose for the purpose of saying that I listened with the utmost care to what appeared to me to be a very lucid and convincing statement by the Minister of Finance this afternoon on the general question, and I am persuaded in my mind that, when the people of this country read that statement in connection with the statement made the other day by the Solicitor General, they will come to the conclusion that in this legislation the Government is making an honest effort towards a proper solution of a problem of enormous magnitude and seriousness. That is my honest conviction about the object of the Government and about what the people of the country will think about it.

It is usually said that there are three possible solutions of our railway difficulties. I have a fourth which has never been mentioned in the course of these debates, and I do not suppose that my mentioning it will carry much conviction, but it would be a solution if it could be arrived at. My solution of the railway difficulty is to make the railways pay. It would not matter much whether they belonged to the Government or to private companies if they were paying concerns. You can make them pay only by making them do business, and to do business is to trade. If you will allow our railroads to trade freely, they will do more business; they will make more money, and they will pay. Of course, when I put the matter in that way, I think I should carry a great deal of conviction to both sides of the House; but if I reverse the words and speak about free trade, I should at once be looked upon as a kind of mountebank. I am afraid that is too strong meat for either side of the House just yet, and I am, therefore, bound to take the current opinion that there are only three possible solutions of this question. I feel, as a patriotic Canadian, proud of the country of my adoption in which I expect my grand-children and my grand-children's children to be brought up with future generations, that there is no upstanding Canadian who wants to face the question of a receivership. Some hon. members spoke about a receivership being a bogey. I never suffered from bankruptcy, but I should not think that bankruptcy is any bogey. It is a bad thing for an individual, and it will be a very much worse thing for this nation at a time when we are facing problems of magnitude greater than any that have been dreamed of since Confederation, and when we wish to keep the credit of our country as high in the financial world as our soldiers have put it in the military world upon the field of battle.

With regard to the second possible solution of this question, which has not been without support from my own side of the House in the course of this debate, namely, the handing out of more money to the Canadian Northern, I am perfectly sure that the people of this country who give any thought to the subject at all are sick of that process. They do not want to shovel out any more money to private individuals for the running of this road, and the reason is not far to see. It is an interminable process which does not seem to get us any further forward, and in addition to that, it has this cardinal objection, that there is a very sound suspicion in the minds of our people that the money does not all by any means find its way into the railroad. The people are sick of that process.

Then, what is to be done with the situation? We are brought to the third possible solution—the solution which the Government, as I believe, in good faith, are trying to take—and that is the nation must take over this road. I do not know how far the people of this country will be disposed in the course of time to go, but they must take over this road and run it themselves. That is the simple question; that is the general question. I do not think that the masses of our people are much concerned with the legal refinements which have constituted most of what we have heard in this debate. I do not think they are very much concerned about what was the exact legal import of what was in the Bill of three years ago. Why, we departed from that a year ago by giving more money away, and followed on that occasion a course which had support on both sides of the House. I do not mean to say that it was supported by every one on both sides of the House, but there were a number on both sides who last year departed from the supposed settlement of three years ago, and supported the giving of more money. There is no end to that process.

The great value of the settlement under the process that is proposed by the Government is that the road passes into the hands of the people, and whatever money is put into the road from now on will accrue to the benefit of the people of Canada themselves.

With regard to the general question of government ownership, I am perfectly certain that a large number of our people are in favour of a trial of the principle. The war has altered men's thinking on this and on a great many other topics. We have found out, under the extreme pressure and exigencies of this war, that the state can do things that we did not dream of in our early days of absolute individualism. We have found out something of what states can accomplish amidst the hardships and trials of war. That has altered men's thinking, and I venture to think that when our soldiers come back, those of them who do come back, by the experience they have had, will prove to our people that they have learned to think, and think deeply, of these national problems. I have met a number of our returned soldiers, and it is surprising to observe the development they have undergone on the intellectual side, and the deep thought they are putting into the problems that confront this nation. They will have an enormous effect upon the thoughts of our people and upon the course of our people in regard to these problems.

It is a fact that railroads are owned by many other countries, and are owned and run with success, and if we say that they cannot be owned and run with success by governments in Canada we pass a very severe condemnation upon the public morality of our own people. I want to say further that I fear it is broadly true—and here I know I am voicing the sentiment of a large number of our people and the very best of our citizens—that since Confederation down to the present moment the railroads have owned the country by having a very large ownership in the politicians of the country. I value the brave words that fell from the lips of my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) upon that subject the other day, and I want to say that the people of this country know that there was a great deal of truth in his words. It is true that he seemed to concentrate his indignation upon one particular set of railroad operators in the remarks he made upon that subject. I am afraid that those operators are not the only ones who have, to use the word of my hon. friend, debauched young men as that young man on the Pacific coast was debauched. I am afraid all the railroads in Canada are still doing a little debauching, not only of young men, but also of men who are much older and ought to know a great deal better. It is broadly true—and we may as well face the fact—that the railroads have owned Canada since Confederation, through owning our politicians. There are a great many people who think the process should be reversed, and that, by Canada owning her railroads and freeing her public men from the evils to which my hon. friend and neighbour from Calgary referred the other day, our public life will be purified, and a development of public spirit in public affairs will take place. I am perfectly confident there is a strong body of opinion behind the principle of government ownership, and that body of opinion, when it is instructed, when it knows what is being done by this legislation, will be behind the Government in these proposals.

The CHAIRMAN: Sir Thomas White moves that the committee now consider section 2.

Mr. GERMAN: I do not see why there should be a motion to proceed to section 2 so early. Is this the beginning of the closure? It is certainly its necessary concomitant. I hardly think the Government will undertake to shut off discussion in a matter of this importance. I want to ask a few questions on section 1.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We won't use the closure against you now anyway.

Mr. GERMAN: All right. I think my hon. friend will find that the people of this country are not all so gullible as my hon. friend from Red Deer, (Mr. M. Clark) in thinking that this transaction savours of all possible sanctity and righteousness. I don't know whether it is true, but I have been told, that there are some long-standing contracts, aggregating a very large amount of money, for salaries, between the Canadian Northern and some, at any rate, of its employees. Does the minister know anything about that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, but if my hon. friend makes the statement positively that the matter is of some consequence I shall be glad to inquire into it. I do not mean to say that he is not asking his question in good faith, but I do not think the work of the committee should be delayed to investigate statements that are not of consequence.

Mr. GERMAN: To what extent is the Canadian Northern the owner of the rolling stock used in its operations? Is the rolling stock owned by the Canadian Northern, or under some sort of lease with some other company who is the real owner? When the Government acquire the stock of the Canadian Northern, they may find that they are not the owners of any of the rolling stock of that line.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is entirely in error. The Canadian Northern, like most of the other railroad companies, finances, so far as its rolling stock is concerned, by issuing either directly or indirectly securities against the rolling stock. The modus operandi is this: A railway company desires to buy, let us say, $10,000,000 of rolling stock. They pay from twenty to twenty-five per cent in cash, or $2,000,000 to $2,500,000; then they pledge the rolling stock either directly, or, more usually, through a rolling stock company to a trustee.

They issue their securities for $10,000,000 upon these terms. The securities mature at the end of one, two, three, four, five, and so on up to ten or twenty, years. Generally they are not so long as that. In each payment of the debenture there is included a certain amount of principal as well as interest, so that each year an amount of the principal of the rolling stock indebtedness is paid off. When the securities come to an end the rolling stock is all paid for because they have paid not only the interest but the principal. Of course, the rolling stock is in the meantime depreciating. In the accounts of the Canadian Northern Railway Company there is a statement showing the amount they have paid on account of principal and interest for rolling stock. That is the system which obtains with scores of large railway companies. It is the favourite and most advantageous way of financing the purchase of rolling stock by railway companies. Rolling stock securities are usually considered of a high character because, in the event of a receivership, the receiver has the road to run and he will pay the maturities with respect to rolling stock; otherwise he would lose the rolling stock because the trustee would take it off the system.

Mr. GERMAN: I appreciate what the Minister of Finance has said in regard to that matter. I know the modus operandi regarding the purchase of rolling stock and the issue of securities of that kind. But I was informed that the rolling stock held by the Canadian Northern was in an altogether different position. It is well that the country should know what the situation is, because I think the people only desire to know, honestly, frankly and fairly what they are getting and what they are paying for it. So far as I am individually concerned, I am not at all opposed to the people owning the Canadian Northern Railway system—in fact I am rather in favour of it, if it is taken over under a proper method and the people are not paying for it more than it is worth or entering into obligations which will increase the indebtedness of the country to an enormous extent. Our indebtedness is now being increased very rapidly and such an arrangement as is proposed may increase that indebtedness to a greater extent than the credit of the country will stand. It is a question of what we are paying for this property. Then, there is also the question of the system that is to be adopted in operating the property after it is purchased. However, that is a matter that we will have to leave in abeyance until the purchase is made although it too is a question of importance. But, the main question to my mind is: Are we getting a property which is worth the money that we will be obliged to pay for it? The Minister of Finance this afternoon condemned very strongly a proposition to foreclose. He said that the Government is adopting the only system that can be equitably and fairly adopted in taking over this property. I would point out what appears to be a far better way and the way which was suggested, and not only suggested but positively advocated, by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) in 1914 when this Parliament authorized a guarantee of the bonds of this company to the extent of $45,000,000. As reported in Hansard of 1914, volume 4, page 370, the right hon. gentleman said:

The country, however, may be confronted with conditions in the future which will render prompt and vigorous action necessary. We have made provision for immediate and summary action in case default shall be made—

I apprehend that it is in the mind of every hon. member that default has been made. The Canadian Northern, if not in actual failure to pay, have defaulted by reason of the fact that they have been unable to earn their fixed charges and could not have paid if the Government had not lent them the money to enable them to pay their indebtedness to the Government. The Prime Minister said:

We have made provision for immediate and summary action in case default shall be made.

What does that mean?

The definition of default is set forth in the 21st clause of the resolution; and, by the 22nd and subsequent clauses it is, in effect, provided that, if such default takes place—

I assert that such a default has taken place.

—the Governor in Council may, upon such notice as he deems expedient, declare vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or of any of the allied companies, and may appoint a new board or boards, upon which very extraordinary powers are proposed to be conferred. Among such powers are the creation of any additional securities, the making of arrangements with the holders of any outstanding securities, and the transfer, with or without compensation, of the Canadian Northern system, or any part thereof (subject to then existing charges) to any corporation created by the Parliament of Canada for the purpose.

There was one method which the Prime Minister stated might be adopted and which, they were providing, should be adopted.

Making of arrangements with the holders of any outstanding securities, and the transfer, with or without compensation, of the Canadian Northern system, or any part thereof (subject to then existing charges) to any corporation created by the Parliament of Canada for the purpose.

Why is that not being done? If that can be done there will be no possible question of the payment to Mackenzie and Mann of the value of the stock. Further:

It is also provided by clause 24 that, if authorized by the Parliament of Canada—

That is the section which the Minister of Finance adverted to this afternoon.

—the Governor in Council may, in case of default, declare that the interest of Mackenzie and Mann, in the Canadian Northern Railway system is absolutely barred and foreclosed, and that all the properties and assets thereof, subject to any outstanding obligations, shall thereupon vest in the Crown in the right of the people of Canada.

This is the clause to which the Minister of Finance directed the whole of his argument and it is the clause in regard to which he said that we would be violating the equities if we should take the road over by virtue of it. But I say that we are not bound at all to take over this road under that clause. Then further the Prime Minister goes on:

So if, as apprehended in some quarters, the road cannot, with the assistance now afforded, be brought to a successful conclusion, the Government and Parliament of Canada will have the situation in hand better than by any possible method at the present time.

How are those words being verified in this transaction which the Government is endeavouring, at this late stage of the session, to force through this House—and by their action to-night intend to force through under closure rules, because there is no reason why the Minister of Finance should have suggested that this clause should stand over and that we should proceed to another clause unless his intention was, as soon as the clauses had all been gone through in this way, to invoke the power of closure and stop discussion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Oh, no.

Mr. GERMAN: I shall be ready to retract it all if my suspicions are not well founded.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not think we should get so far as that.

Mr. GERMAN: The Prime Minister goes on:

> In effect we propose to provide in the first place that a certain amount shall be available for the early and immediate completion of the road, and, if the road is not carried to completion by means of that aid, then the people of Canada, through their Government and Parliament, are enabled in the most effective and vigorous way to grasp the situation, and carry to completion, for their own benefit, one of the great transcontinental railway systems of Canada.

I ask the Finance Minister and the Government and gentlemen who are supporting them to adopt the words of the Prime Minister uttered in 1914, under the clause in that agreement which gives them power so to do, and, > in the most effective and vigorous way grasp the situation and carry to completion for the benefit of the people of Canada one of the great transcontinental railway systems of Canada.

—and do away, obliterate altogether, this idea of paying Mackenzie and Mann five, six, or ten millions of dollars for a stock which the Drayton-Acworth Commission have already reported is absolutely valueless. There is no question of foreclosure, there is no question of arbitration. I was chided a few days ago by hon. gentlemen for having at that time supported a resolution providing for arbitration, while I am now suggesting that, whatever is to be paid to Mackenzie and Mann should be fixed by the Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court. As I said that night, and as is borne out by the statement of the Prime Minister, the representation was that that money was sufficient to complete the line and if it did not complete it, then there was an expeditious, effective and complete method of taking over the whole system without paying any more money. The Prime Minister further said:

> Some of the features of the agreement should also be called to the attention of the House.

I am bringing this to the attention of the House and of the country because the Finance Minister so particularly emphasized this feature, that there was an equity, a redeemable equity, the value of which should be considered by somebody, he says by arbitration. Now, let us see what the agreement that they entered into at that time provided for. The Prime Minister said:

> Some features of the agreement should also be called to the attention of the House. Prominent amongst these is the release of all claims for contractors' profits, commissions or otherwise, against the Canadian Northern Railway. The provision to which I wish to call attention, and which is, in my opinion, a very important one, will be found on page 19 of the Orders of the Day. That clause reads as follows:
> "That the contractors"—
>
> Which includes Mackenzie and Mann as a corporation and Mackenzie and Mann individually.
> —"will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim for contractors' profits, commissions, or otherwise against the Canadian Northern, or against any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, upon or in respect of any express or implied contract, understanding, agreement, or stipulation of any kind, heretofore or hereafter made, whereby or whereunder they, or any one or more of them, may now or hereafter be entitled to receive from the Canadian Northern, or from any of the constituent or subsidiary companies any construction profits, in respect of work heretofore undertaken, or as consideration for transfers of properties, rights of franchises already transferred, or to be transferred under sub-clauses (a) and (b) of this clause, or for commission or remuneration for services in financing, or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released."

In the face of that statement made by the Prime Minister himself, how in the name of all that is sensible can members of this House, having the interests of the country at heart, representing their constituents as they do, deliberately stand up and vote that, notwithstanding that stipulation by Mackenzie and Mann themselves that they would not at any time thereafter in the event of default make any claim or demand for commissions or for transfers of stock or otherwise under subclauses (a) and (b)—how, I say, can these gentlemen conscientiously stand up and support the proposition submitted to this House? I bring this to the attention of the House because the agreement itself conclusively answers the statements made by the Finance Minister this evening. He says: you should not expropriate, you should not foreclose, without taking into consideration the equities which Mackenzie and Mann have in the property, without taking the valuation of the property, without going into the whole matter, and substance of the physical value, the earning power and otherwise, to arrive definitely at a correct value of this property, and then ascertain whether Mackenzie and Mann are entitled to compensation. I do not wish to deal harshly with Mackenzie and Mann or any other person, nor do I wish this House to do so; I have a great deal of sympathy for them; they have done a great work, and carried on this enterprise for all these years. But they are no different from other men. To use the venacular of the street, they bit off more than they could chew; they had a bigger enterprise than they could carry through, particularly with this monetary stringency, and the road has become a failure. Other men have failed, and the Government has not come to their rescue. Mackenzie and Mann have been interested in railway building for twenty years or more. This enterprise was started twenty years ago. Every one knows what their situation was then, what it has been since, and what it is to-day; that is a matter of public notoriety. No one need make any suggestion as to what their position is financially and otherwise; it is well known throughout the country. I submit, these men are not entitled to any sympathy from this House or from the people of the country. They are entitled to be dealt with fairly, honestly, frankly and justly, and only in that way. In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister three years ago, that there was a speedy, efficacious and complete remedy by taking over this property, and that there was a release by Mackenzie and Mann of all equities in the property, without a shadow of a claim to be paid anything. I say that we are simply doing justice to the people of this country in standing by the agreement which was made at that time and saying to these gentlemen: It is unfortunate for you, we regret we have to do it, but the exigencies of the situation at present make it imperative that we must enforce the obligation imposed in that contract, take that property from you, and put in our own directors; and unfortunately, we will not be able to pay you anything for the difficulties you have encountered and for what you have gone through in those years. I submit that those are views which will meet with the approval of the people. They are my views at any rate, and I submit them to this House, and I have confidence that they will be approved of by the people of the country generally.

[Mr. German.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: I desire to say a few words—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was going to move that the committee rise, and that we take up another Bill. If the hon. gentleman from Guysborough wishes to speak now I will give way.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My purpose in asking leave to say a few words was to reply to the speech of my hon. friend from Red Deer. That hon. gentleman did not deal with the main question before the committee. As I understand it, the question at issue between the two sides of this House is whether we shall pay anything to Mackenzie and Mann for the 600,000 shares of stock we are proposing to acquire. The hon. member for Red Deer did not touch that question. I understand the Government is proposing to pay for that stock at a value to be fixed by arbitration. They do not say how much they are willing to pay, but they are submitting the question to arbitration, which means that they place some value upon the stock. The owners of the stock, I understand, claim that it is worth par, which means that they claim the enormous sum of $60,000,000. It will be for the arbitrators to say whether the people shall pay $60,000,000 for this stock which we, on this side of the House, contend is not worth anything. Our position on this side is quite clear. We say that this stock does not represent any investment; it does not represent a dollar of money advanced by Mackenzie and Mann or any one else; it is nothing else than water; that we own it now, under the default made under the conditions of the Act of 1914, and that we are in a position to-day to assume the ownership of that stock without paying any money for it. My hon. friend from Red Deer did not deal with that position at all. He said there was one thing he knew well, and that was that the people of this country are not in favour of shovelling out any more money to Mackenzie and Mann. I was glad to hear him say that, because that is the exact position we take on this side of the House. If these arbitrators decide that the stock is worth $60,000,000, than the people of Canada must shovel out $60,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann, and the hon. gentleman from Red Deer tells us that the people are not in favour of doing that. I want to place myself on record as opposed to paying anything more to Mackenzie and Mann for this stock. The hon. member referred to the time when the soldiers would come back. He told us they were doing a lot of thinking, and when they came back they would be interested in the financial affairs of Canada. I believe that is true. They not only have to fight for the existence of Canada, but they and their children will have to bear the burden of the public debt. When the soldiers went away there was a public debt of $350,000,000, roughly speaking; when they come back after this legislation goes through, if it does go through, there will be a debt, independent of the war altogether, of some $800,000,000, and the soldiers will want to know the names of the men who imposed that debt upon them, and upon the people of Canada, and I do not want them to read my name among those who will be on record as having done that.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will that $800,000,000 be a net debt, or a gross debt?

Mr SINCLAIR: I regard it as a net debt. The ownership of the road is poor comfort if we have to tax ourselves to pay the interest. If we assume the whole debt of the Canadian Northern, there will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $800,000,000 independent of the war debt, if we pay all the liabilities connected with the taking over of the company, and I assume we are going to do that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We are going to own the road.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I object to paying the amount which it is proposed to settle by this arbitration. There is no question in regard to public ownership, as I understand it, between the two sides of this House. The attitude we take on this side means public ownership just as much as the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite means public ownership, because, if our proposal carries, and the Government takes charge of this stock under the provisions of the Act of 1914, it means that we must assume the existing liabilities of the road, and if we take the stock over by arbitration, it means the same thing. The difference is that in one case we shall have to pay whatever the arbitrators decide for the stock, and that will be an addition to the debt of the people of this country, and that is the part of the debt I particularly object to. It has been said in this House over and over again, that if we take over this property without arbitration it means confiscation.

I want to put myself on record as opposed to that idea. It does not mean confiscation. As I understand it we have a legal right to take this stock now under the Act of 1914. We are not asking for the road. We are not asking for this property. If we had decided to take the property of Mackenzie, Mann and Company and pay them for it, and if we refused to arbitrate and give them its value, that would be confiscation. That, however, is not what is happening. They are pushing the property on us. They say: "We cannot keep it ourselves. We cannot carry on. We cannot pay our interest and carry on the business of the road. You must take it off our hands, and you must pay us for it." I think that is an unreasonable proposition, and I think the Government cannot justify itself in taking that stand in face of the legislation of 1914.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Chairman—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I had an arrangement by which another Bill was to be taken up. I hope my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) will not consider me discourteous if I do not answer him at the moment.

Mr. GERMAN: Not at all, I shall simply feel that there is no answer.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was about to give my reason for not answering my hon. friend, which is that what he has just said now has been said and answered quite a dozen times already. My hon friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) seems to have rather peculiar views as to what net debt means. He attributes as a debt of this country what is owing in respect of this road, but he does not take into account the fact that the country will have an exceedingly valuable asset in the road. Of course, if that is really good logic, the defence and the arguments which have been made on this side of the House in support of the measure could not count for very much, but I venture to think my hon. friend would hardly be inclined to apply that reasoning to his own affairs.

An arrangement was made by which the Military Voters' Bill should be taken up, particularly for the purpose of considering certain amendments which had been prepared by the Minister of Justice relating to questions that were brought up yesterday. I therefore hope my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) will be able to restrain himself for the present and at some future date give us the benefit of the views he was about to inflict upon the committee I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask to sit again.

Progress reported.

THE MILITARY VOTERS' ACT, 1917.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

The House again in committee on Bill No. 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917.—Hon. Mr. Doherty—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it the intention of the minister to consider the proposed amendments now, or is it his idea simply to submit them, allow us time to go over them, and bring them up to-morrow?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It might be worth while to run over the amendments, and the sections of the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: The Prime Minister will understand, it was hoped we would get those amendments earlier in the day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, I quite appreciate that.

Mr. CARVELL: It is difficult to insert a word here, and take out a word there offhand, while we are considering a section. I have a copy of the amendments to be proposed, and I think that as drafted they very correctly represent the discussion we had earlier in the day. But this draft does not seem to contain the amendments which were proposed yesterday. I presume the minister takes it for granted that those amendments are part of the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am under the impression this contains the amendments that were not adopted yesterday.

Mr. CARVELL: I see, for instance, there is very little in this in regard to scrutineers. I think, perhaps, the minister's intention is that the amendments which were proposed yesterday are considered as having been passed.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: And these are additional amendments?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. If the sections stood they stood as amended.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it would be best for the minister to put them on as a notice of motion now, so that hon. members may see what they are.

Mr. DOHERTY: In that event I would suggest that we go on with the sections from where we left off, and when we have passed over all the sections of the Bill we may then take up these amendments and others that may possibly arise.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

On section 12—Custody and count of ballots:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that certain amendments are to be proposed by the Minister of Justice. I would suggest that we begin at the first section which is amended, and take the Bill section by section until it is disposed of. It does not seem right to go through a Bill, consider a section, and then pass on to another without finishing the first. One section should be disposed of before proceeding to another. In that way we shall know how to deal with the others, because they are all related.

Mr. DOHERTY: I certainly understood that the committee reached the understanding last evening that we should go over all the sections first, with a view to receiving suggestions with regard to them, letting them stand as we went along, with a view to passing amendments to meet the suggestions. I had supposed that that understanding would be followed out this evening. Then we should be in a position to go back over the sections that are standing, and, there having in the meantime been opportunity to consider the suggested amendments, we should take up those amendments in their order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not intended to take up the suggested amendments this evening?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not unless we reach them, and unless when we reach them it is possible to deal with them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not like to interfere with any understanding the committee has had, but it strikes me as being very unusual to take up the later sections of the Bill without dealing with and disposing of the former ones, because the determination as to the previous sections of a Bill would influence one in regard to the attitude to be taken as to those later on.

Mr. CARVELL: Under the previous section, it is provided that there is to be no polling after eight o'clock of the day fixed for polling in Canada. Is not thirty-one days a very long time in which to get those boxes to London? It seems to me that is deferring the decision of the election for a long time. Under this arrangement it would be probably six weeks from the time the election is held in Canada until there is any finality about it. I realize there will be some difficulty in getting in those boxes, but I cannot see why that should take thirty-one days.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is room, perhaps, for question as to whether the delay may not be too long. It is provided in this section that boxes that have not been received by the thirty-first day, shall not be counted. Inasmuch as we have to cut them off absolutely at the expiry of the delay, it was thought desirable to make quite certain that the delay should be long enough. As to that precise period, I am disposed to place myself in the hands of the committee. If there is error in the delay, it is on the side of its being too long.

With regard to the different subsections of this section, we speak, in various places, of the Secretary of the High Commissioner and likewise of the Canadian Commissioner to France. There is an error in the designation. The proper designation of the officer described as the Secretary of the High Commissioner is the "Secretary of the High Commissioner's Office." That is his proper title. The gentleman described as the Canadian Commissioner to France should be correctly described as the "Commisssaire Général du Canada en France." It appears, by the Order in Council originally constituting the office, that the name was created only in the French language, so that there is no English name properly to designate him. I have separate amendments for each place. Perhaps I might move, in a general way:

That where the word "Commissioner" appears in the section as applied to the Secretary of the High Commissioner at London, there be substituted for it the words "Commissioner's Office", and that wherever the name "Canadian Commissioner to France" appears, there be substituted for it "Commissaire General du Canada en France".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CARVELL: What appears to be an omission in subsection 3 of this section is provided for by paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of section 4, which says:

Six scrutineers, three to be appointed on the nomination of the Prime Minister, and three on that of the leader of the Opposition. The appointment shall state the respective addresses at which notices given under this part may be served. One of each nomination may be present on each occasion of the opening of ballot boxes, and at the examination, application and counting of ballots, and every scrutineer shall have and may exercise all the rights of a candidate or his representative at any poll.

I think that is sufficient, because subsection 3 of section 12 provides that the ballot shall be opened only in the presence of the returning officers and clerks.

Mr. DOHERTY: I might point out that subsection 1 requires that notice shall be given to the scrutineers before these operations are begun. As I understood it, notice to scrutineers implied their presence, but it might be better to make it clear by inserting it wherever there is occasion for it.

Mr. GERMAN: Why is there so much delay in counting the ballots? They are not to be counted until the thirty-first day after that fixed for polling in Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: The delay is provided in order to make sure there will be time for all the ballot boxes overseas to reach their destination.

Mr. GERMAN: Why not begin to count them as soon as they come in?

Mr. DOHERTY: As the ballots come in the envelopes will be assorted and distributed among the different constituencies to which they apply. The ballot boxes will be counted when all the boxes are in or on the thirty-first day, which is the time when the axe falls.

Mr. GERMAN: How will the officers know when the last ballot box is in? They might not be in within thirty-one days.

Mr. DOHERTY: They should all be in before that. The reason why the ballots are not counted immediately they come in is that you would not have all the ballots belonging to a constituency until all the ballots from everywhere had come in and had been assorted. It may be that thirty-one days' delay is too long, but I would rather err on the side of giving perhaps a little too much time, than risk a number of ballots being left out by making the time too short.

Mr. MURPHY: Apart from the time limit fixed for counting, is any other method provided by which it will be known when the ballot boxes are all in?

Mr. DOHERTY: By law we assume to be all in on the thirty-first day after the polling day.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Might it not be wise to provide that the counting may proceed before the thirty-first day if it is found that all the boxes are in? Some record will be kept of the boxes, and it will be known when they are all in.

Mr. DOHERTY: That might be done. It might be wise to provide for that if there was reason to think this delay was too long. If we do that, we shall have to provide that any counting done earlier 10 p.m. than the thirty-first day shall be be done after notice to the scrutineers. It has been assumed here that as we were fixing a specific date on which the counting would be done there was no need to provide for notice to the scrutineers, who would have already been notified of the preliminary operations and would be assumed to know when the counting was to take place. If we are to make provision for an uncertain date, it will involve very considerable remodelling and the necessity of a new notice being given.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think most of the boxes would be in before the thirty-first day.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is not impossible.

Mr. CARVELL: I think there is a great deal of force in what the minister says as to fixing a precise date on which the counting shall take place. The only thing I do not understand is why it should be necessary to allow thirty-one days from the polling day. It would only be a matter of a few hours, I should think, before the ballots in the British Isles would arrive in London, and the ballots on the continent in Paris. It seems to me unreasonable there should be such a long delay.

Mr. MACDONALD: The thirty-one days does not apply to Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, it relates to the proceedings in France and England. I would suggest that this section might perhaps be carried, and we could give a little thought whether it might not be desirable to modify the length of the delay.

Mr. CARVELL: We could let the section carry, on the understanding that we could go back to it.

Mr. DOHERTY: It would be well that we should specifically state the right of the scrutineers to be present, and therefore I would move:

That the subsection be amended, by inserting in the 27th line thereof, after the word "shall" and before the word "open", the words "in the presence of such scrutineers as may attend".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It might be well, at the end of subsection 4, to require these statements to be made in triplicate.

Mr. CARVELL: One of these should be delivered to each scrutineer.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the practice in Canada. The deputy returning officer gives a signed statement to the scrutineer representing each side before he closes the poll.

It would seem to be only reasonable to carry out the same provision there.

Mr. DOHERTY: If we propose to do that we will have to make it in quadruplicate, because the present provision requires him to hand a duplicate to the secretary of the High Commissioner and to the Commissioner to France. If we want to provide copies for the scrutineer of each side we would have to have four altogether. I suppose he may give copies.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, he may give copies—"and shall deliver copies thereof to each scrutineer present."

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move:

That subsection 4 be amended by inserting at the end thereof: "Copies of such statements shall be delivered to the scrutineers in attendance."

Amendment agreed to, and subsection 4 as amended agreed to.

On section 12, subsection 5—Vote for a party counted as vote for a recognized candidate:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The word "party" there, of course, refers to "political party" in lines 6, 7, 8, and elsewhere?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, I think it is fairly clear from the context in the other provision. In view of the provision of the ballot for "Government," "Opposition" and "Independent candidate," we might insert the words "Labour party." If we insert those words, there is no purpose in stating "other party," because it will not be possible to mark a ballot for any party except the party that figures on the ballot paper. Therefore, I beg to move:

That subsection 5 be amended by striking out, in the 49th line, the word "other" and substituting the word "Labour."

Mr. MACDONALD: It is to be observed that if there is to be a delay until this official recognition is given by the leaders of both parties it will delay the casting of the votes on the other side? The subsection provides that this recognition shall take place within five days after the nomination. You will have to communicate with Great Britain. How are you going to communicate to the soldier the names of the official candidates?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have made special provision for the notification of that recognition. We have taken means to have immediately communicated to the soldiers the names of the candidates proposed. If the soldier does not know the name of the man whom, say, the leader of the Opposition has designated as the candidate of his party, he is quite sure of getting his vote applied to the candidate by simply voting for the Opposition. This is only for the purpose of identifying the man to whom will go the votes that are given to the Opposition. We must give some delay for these gentlemen after nomination to determine their respective candidates, and I do not think that any serious evil results if we do not make special provision for communicating that to the soldiers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Suppose that it should happen that the Prime Minister was unable to state the candidate recognized by him? It would hardly be possible, but it might happen that there would be two candidates nominated, both of whom were supporting him. They might both be Independent Conservative candidates. What would be done with votes cast for the Independent? Of course a voter can protect himself by voting for the individual, but I suppose that many votes would be lost if what I state happened.

Mr. DOHERTY: If a man votes for the Government and the Government has no candidate, there is no means by which we can transfer that vote to any candidate.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there not opportunity for infinite confusion and conflict in this section? It says within five days of the day of nomination the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition and the recognized leader of any Independent party." There may be several parties, and there may not be a recognized leader for each. There may be the parties that our press friends speak of that are being incubated every day at the Chateau Laurier. There may be any number of parties with no ability to recognize a leader. If that continues up to the election, how will the votes be counted?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not see how you could meet such a case.

Mr. KNOWLES: How would it work out in a constituency where a person of independent views runs who is acceptable to the Government because his views on what is recognized as the outstanding issue, namely, conscription, are acceptable to the Government? If there were two candidates, one conscriptionist Liberal and one straight, common Liberal, how would they be distinguished? Would the conscriptionist Liberal be called a Government candidate?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would depend upon what the Prime Minister or the leader of the Opposition would say.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Suppose both claimed him?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: All the happier for the candidate who gets both the Government and the Opposition vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition might trade off one for the other.

Mr. KNOWLES: Let us suppose that there are two men running neither of whom is ideal to the respective leaders, the Prime Minister saying: I am not going to have that man on my list because, for certain reasons, I do not want him, even if he does support conscription,——

Mr. PUGSLEY: He might be a free trader.

Mr. KNOWLES: —would there be no allocation of votes for that man at all?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The votes will be thrown away in that case.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then the candidates are really driven to receive the endorsation of one party or the other.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In this sense, that Opposition votes cannot be counted for any candidate unless he has been recognized by the leader of the Opposition and, similarly, votes cast for the Government cannot be counted for any candidate unless he has been recognized by the leader of the Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: I move to amend the section by inserting in the third line of page 10, after the word "independent" the words " or Labour party."

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand the effect of this section to be that the names of candidates are to be cabled to Great Britain and the list of them will be sent to the different camps and the recognition is to be communicated within five days after the official nomination? What is to be done with that so far as sending it to the other side is concerned?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have no express provision for its being sent to the other side at that time. It does not come to be required until we are allotting the ballots and we assume that would be known to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. CURRIE: What is the objection to placing on the ballot "member of the Conservative party" and "member of the Liberal party" instead of using the words "Government" and "Opposition." We hear so much about other governments that we can never tell whether anybody can support any government; it may not be in vogue about the time the vote is taken. I think that, in the interest of party government, the parties should be named there without any disrespect to anybody in the House, we all see every morning that we are to have a new government. One gentleman has been given the making of governments in this country and he has been busy for about two months. This House has been sitting by waiting for this Government to come through and I do not think there is a single soldier in the trenches who would feel inclined to vote for any government that this gentleman would bring forth. I refer to Sir Clifford Sifton. Sir Clifford Sifton, as we all know, has figured in the courts during the last year. It was shown he was the recipient of about a million francs, which. as a middleman, he squeezed out of the French Government and French people for whom we are sending our soldiers to fight. In the interest of the people of this country let us have the names of the parties there, so that the soldiers will know what party they are voting for. I am a Conservative, and don't make any bones about it, and I think the Conservative party is the party in this war, that party will win the fight that is coming on. and we had better put that name at the top of the column.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Put it in the statute.

Mr. CURRIE: I am a Tory, and the other parties are Liberals, with all due respect to them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If I understand the suggestion, it is that the words "Government" and "Opposition" should be struck out, and a space left for the name of the candidate. I was going to suggest the same thing. I do not think there is any advantage in this great departure of allowing the ballot to be cast for Government, Opposition or Independent candidate. We had better pursue the old practice of having the names of the candidate placed on the ballot. Let the elector write the name of the person for whom he wants to vote. I see no reason to make the change.

Mr. KNOWLES: In this election there will not be the clean-cut cleavage between the parties which formerly existed. Our friends in the trenches simply have the knowledge which they possessed when leaving here, and I think it is a fair presumption that they have not at their fingers ends details of things that have happened during the last few months, and we know that throughout the whole of Canada men who were keen opponents of one party at one time are no longer in that class, and might be altogether out of sympathy, in a want of confidence motion, with their party. What my hon. friend has said with regard to the government to be formed by Sir Clifford Sifton, if there was any injustice done to any person because of that. if the boys at the front would resent it, I suppose another notice could be published of those not under his wing, and I think this list would be the one that would be favoured more by the soldiers. In justice to Sir Clifford Sifton, the sum of money which he made out of the French Government was made in a horse trade, and it was well laid down policy of this Government that the finer rules and principles of life do not prevail with regard to horse trading. This was shown in the Kings county horse deals.

With regard to the money Sir Clifford Sifton made, we must remember that fact, and judge him as we would judge any other man desiring to make money as a horse trader. I very strongly endorse the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John that the names of the candidates be inserted. I was going to further suggest, because there will be a great absence of information in the minds of the electors, that a certain number of geographical maps be printed by the department, and that these be available to the soldiers also. Each province might be divided into electoral districts on the maps. I do not know so much about any part of the country except my own, and I know that the redistribution has transformed the district, for example, so that hundreds of men who used to live in the Moosejaw electoral district have no idea what riding they are in. It is divided into four complete ridings, and parts of other ridings taken in. These men would have no accurate knowledge as to the ridings in which they should vote. Can the Minister of Justice inform us if there are any electoral geographical maps?

Mr. DOHERTY: They are furnished by the clerk of the Crown in Chancery to all the officers who are doing the counting and assorting, and it is precisely on account of that fact that it is important for men to vote for Government, Opposition or Independent candidate, because an elector, such as the one described by the hon. gentleman, one who is not quite certain of the electoral district to which he belongs, might vote for a man of a particular name, but if he has made a mistake in the electoral district to which the vote belongs, and puts in the name of the candidate of whatever party he desires to vote for, his ballot will be lost. Whereas with this ballot, you have an advantage, because the man who is uncertain as to his constituency marks his ballot Government or Opposition, as he sees proper, and care is taken to see that the vote goes to the candidate in the constituency in which that man is entitled to vote. It is a great protection for the voter against the consequence of error, as to constituencies, and, with the best precaution that can be taken, errors will, I fear be very prevalent.

Subsection 6—Vote for person by name accepted if he is a candidate:

Mr. GERMAN: It seems to me that, under this section, there might be some considerable injustice. I think it should be provided that, in the event of a person being a candidate in an electoral district other than that to which, in accordance with the endorsement or marking on the envelope, such ballot had been applied, and if there appeared a bona fide intention of voting for that candidate, such candidate should not be deprived of the vote. Provision should be made to rectify a clear mistake.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not see how we could rectify it. If a man has a vote in one electoral district, and he votes for a man who is a candidate in some other district, he is not a qualified voter in that district. I think it is impossible to meet the case suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CARVELL: I think that if the hon. member for Welland will consider the matter he will see that his suggestion might lead to a great injustice. You might take a constituency that was strong one way or the other, where a man's vote was not needed very badly, he could simply transfer his vote to the next constituency. I am afraid it would open the door to things many of us would not like to see. He must state to the officer under oath where his residence is, and if he is not sure about it, under section 12, subsection 2, they will look over electoral charts and make up their minds where that man resides, and where he should vote.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: You might as well abolish all those provisions, if that suggestion were adopted.

Mr. CARVELL: A man ought to be compelled to vote only for a candidate representing his electoral district.

Mr. DOHERTY: The other evening a question was raised in regard to the mutilation of a ballot. If it should happen that a man wrote on the ballot the name of the candidate for whom he voted—he being a voter in the electoral district for which that man was a candidate but at the same time marks a cross after either "Opposition" or "Government," what would happen to the ballot? I think there was general agreement that if he wrote in the name of the Opposition candidate and also put a cross after "Opposition" he would only have doubly clearly expressed what he wanted, and the ballot should be counted for the Opposition candidate.

Mr. CARVELL: But suppose he did it the other way?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is where the question arose. Supposing a man voted expressly by name for a candidate who was a candidate in the constituency in which he was a voter—say he voted by name for a gentleman who was a Government candidate, and put a cross after "Opposition." I think in the absence of any provision on the subject that ballot would have to be rejected, because the man would have voted for both sides. It was urged with a great deal of force that the expression by which a man had voted for a candidate by name should be taken as clearly indicating his real intention, and that the ballot should not be set aside merely because by some possible mistake he put this cross after the name of the other party. I was very much impressed with that. I think all the presumptions are that that man clearly intended to vote for the individual whose name he put down, but was in error as to what party that individual represented. To meet that view I move to amend subsection 6 by adding the following words:

"Where any ballot paper bears on its face a vote for a person by name and is also marked as a vote for a party other than that of which such named person is a candidate, such ballot shall be counted as a vote for the candidate named thereon."

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think that should be, because there you have the name of the candidate, and you have the man putting a cross in the square opposite the party which that candidate does not represent. As an illustration, he is voting for a man who is a Government candidate, and then he puts the cross in the Opposition square. What right would these returning officers have to say that he intended to vote for the Government candidate any more than he intended to vote for the Opposition, or vice versa? It seems to me in a case of that kind the ballot would have to be rejected. In case a man were to put the name of the candidate and then put a cross in the square of the party the candidate represented—

Mr. DOHERTY: In that case I would make no provision, because none is needed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Surely it would not do in the other instance, because it would be entirely uncertain as to how the man intended to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: It was urged with a good deal of force that we must endeavour to ascertain the intention of the voter, and carry it out. While unless you make a provision in the law about it, the reasoning of the hon. member for St. John would lead to the conclusion that you must reject the ballot. I think, with all respect, that all the presumptions in that case are that where the mistake occurred was not with regard to the individual this man named but with regard to the name of the party to which that individual belonged. It is well to remember that though we talk about parties, and Opposition, and Government, after all in an election in each constituency what is sought to be determined is, what man has the majority of the votes? Here you have the express declaration of the intention to vote for the man, and I would feel —although I am not disposed to insist upon it—that we were quite justified in saying that rather than reject the ballot we would count it for the man for whom, there is such a very strong presumption, the voter intended to vote. I may say there were quite a number of members here the other evening, who are not now present, who entertained that view.

Amendment agreed to, and subsection as amended agreed to.

On subsection 7—Ballot not rejected for uncertainty if intention of voter can be seen on mere inspection:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to ask the minister if I am correct in assuming that no mark is to be placed on the ballot by the officer taking the vote in Europe? Should not there be a direction that when the ballot is handed out it should be marked by the officer in charge, so that it can be identified when it comes back?

Mr. DOHERTY: What we relied upon for getting back the identical ballot that was given out was the fact that the marking was to be done in the presence of the officer. If you insist upon markings, signatures, and so forth, you will indispose the soldier to engage in this thing. We have to simplify it as much as we can.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Duty of every returning officer under part III to send certificate, ballots, etc., to general returning officer:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If a recount were demanded of a poll within Canada, how would those ballot boxes, ballots and other papers be procured? In the meantime, they would have been sent to Ottawa.

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision is that the returning officer does not send forward those papers until the delay for asking for a recount has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM: The delay is for how many days?

Mr. DOHERTY: Four days.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The numbers might be given, but it might take two weeks to get the documents.

Mr. DOHERTY: Once notice of demand for a recount is given, the returning officer should not send them away pending a proceeding. He does not send them away until he has made the final addition of the votes.

On section 14—Declaration of election by general returning officer:

Mr. MACDONALD: I think we should provide for verification of the cable. Otherwise, we might have the returning officer returning a member for a certain constituency who might afterwards be unseated owing to an error in the cable.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I suppose a mistake of that kind could be corrected without any special provision. Of course, a telegram is liable to error, and so is a letter. I remember being told a very interesting incident by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery when I was a very much younger member of this House than I am now. He said that happening to look up some documents, purely by accident, I think, relating to a particular election, after the parliamentary term had expired for which the election took place, he discovered that through a mistake in a return by one of the returning officers the man who had been returned was not actually elected, but was returned and sat for the whole parliamentary term. So accidents are possible under any system. What my hon. friend suggests is that we should have some better means of verification than by a telegram. The only difficulty about that is the delay it would occasion. The delay has already been alluded to by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell).

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it not correct that the cablegram is only for public information? Must not the returning officer await the statements before making the declaration, as provided in subsection 4 of section 12?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes. I was rather misled by the suggestion of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). The telegram is only for public information, and the formal return must be made later.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was going to suggest that we follow the same practice in regard to the verification of the announcement of the results as was provided by an amendment yesterday with regard to the verification of the names of the candidates sent to Great Britain. The names must be cabled back for verification. I am only suggesting that the cable should be verified before the announcement is made.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As the cable is only for public information, perhaps we might leave it to the discretion of the officers.

Mr. DOHERTY: All these things, if I am not mistaken, are officially announced in the Gazette. What I had in mind was that this sort of information will be so generally known that any error in a telegram would correct itself, because people will have the information from other sources. But I have no objection to having the telegram repeated.

Mr. MACDONALD: Suppose the steamer went down with the returns—some ballots nearly went down on the Lusitania—the telegram might be the sole basis on which to make the returns. Is any provision made in case the returns are destroyed?

Mr. DOHERTY: No special provision is made, but the general rule would apply, that where the best evidence is destroyed you could resort to secondary evidence.

Mr. PARDEE: The certificates are to be given to each party.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. They are in duplicate. The High Commissioner keeps one, and sends one over here.

Mr. MACDONALD: This is a new law and abrogates the old in regard to the return of members of Parliament. Suppose that the authentic and official documents on which the returning officer makes his return are lost. My hon. friend says, take the next best evidence, as at common law.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The same thing would apply.

Mr. MACDONALD: You cannot act without a statutory provision.

Mr. DOHERTY: The High Commissioner gets the return in duplicate and sends one over here. If that one gets lost 11 p.m. he has the other one. It is a duplicate, not a mere copy. It is as much the original statement as the one that was lost.

Mr. MACDONALD: I quite understand that, but what is the returning officer in Canada going to do in the meantime without any returns?

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision is that he does not announce the election till he gets the returns. We are providing against the first statement being lost on its way over, by having a duplicate in the High Commissioner's office. I suppose we could provide, if it is really thought necessary, that under those circumstances, the returns can be established by secondary evidence; that is, by producing copies or evidence of another sort.

Mr. MACDONALD: I submit in all seriousness that if this question of the return of members of Parliament was reviewed in the courts it would turn entirely on the construction of the statutes, and if there was no provision for the returning officer making the return upon secondary evidence the return would be set aside on the ground that he had no authority to make it. There is another thing that should be remembered. Suppose there is any postponement or delay in the forwarding of returns. That might mean that the return of all the members to the House of Commons would be delayed, because we are all in the same boat. The returning officer cannot act until he gets the returns, and the returns may be delayed for an indefinite period owing to an accident.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think anything could be done to meet that, unless we were to provide for an indefinite number of originals to be filed with the High Commissioner. The minister has gone so far as to provide duplicates. If one is lost the other is there. You will be in a position either to use that duplicate or to give secondary evidence of it.

Mr. MACDONALD: You would need to say so in the statute. It may be that the return for every hon. member of this House might be delayed indefinitely unless you state in the statute that in the event of the loss of the return the contents of the duplicate may be verified in some way, and the return made.

Mr. DOHERTY: We might perhaps treat that section as we have treated some others. I will think the matter over.

Section agreed to.

On section 15, subsection 1—Final addition and recount in London of votes polled in United Kingdom or Europe:

Mr. DOHERTY: This section gives an answer to the question which was asked in connection with section 13.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are we to understand that the only way in which any one can get a remedy by means of a recount is to have the recount in England and to incur the expense that such a proceeding will involve? Why cannot these ballots be sent to Canada and be recounted here, if necessary? A candidate who desires a recount will have to retain English counsel, and a man who desires to avail himself of that remedy will need to have a bank behind him.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The difficulty is the danger of the ballots being lost under present conditions.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think it would be worth while taking some chance about that. Anybody who knows anything about retaining solicitors and counsel in England knows what an expensive matter it is. This applies to hon. gentlemen on both sides. Surely some remedy could be had in Canada. Any one connected with the legal profession knows what it means. Any hon. gentleman, who is not a lawyer and who wants to have any question brought up, must retain Canadian counsel, the Canadian counsel must communicate with some solicitor in England and then this solicitor must hire counsel to attend these hearings. It is a tremendously onerous proposition. Surely there ought to be some provision for a recount in Canada.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Of course, the election is being conducted under extraordinary conditions, and we cannot have in England or France the same conditions as those which prevail in Canada. It is purely a question of whether you shall have the delay and danger of transmitting these ballots to Canada or whether you shall have a recount in Great Britain. It is a question for the committee.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is not a party question. It is a question in which every member of this House is interested. If there is any mistake. or if there is any question that a candidate for this House wishes to have investigated, he might as well understand that he cannot have a recount in Canada but that he must go to tremendous expense, so much so that he cannot have a recount unless he has a large amount of money.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend's idea of the additional expense is somewhat exaggerated. You would not require counsel. A solicitor in England would do all the work. Solicitors in Great Britain do a good deal of work in the courts under the modern practice there. There is no need to retain counsel unless someone wants to go to that additional expense. All you would require would be some junior solicitor to attend for the purpose of seeing that these ballots, if they had been properly marked, had been counted.

Mr. MACDONALD: Look at the procedure:

> shall be instituted and had at London, England, before a person who may be designated for the purpose by a judge of the High Court of Justice of England. Such proceedings shall be initiated by an application to the High Commissioner or Acting High Commissioner of Canada at London that he secure the appointment of a recounting authority.

There is no compulsion on him to secure it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have to depend, in this respect, upon the comity of nations to a certain extent, upon the expectation that the judges in Great Britain will act in conformity to what after all is only a request. I have no doubt that the judges in England would assist in carrying out the Act. We really have not jurisdiction to tell them to do so. We have every confidence that they will act in the manner suggested and assist us to carry out the Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: If an hon. member of this House finds he is twenty or thirty votes behind he will want a recount. How is he to get it? It says here that such application shall be made within four days after the time fixed in the Canada Gazette and the London Times. Is he to move by affidavit?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MACDONALD: I want to see the procedure.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: After the judge has appointed a person to discharge the duties which the county court judges discharge in this country, the procedure will be the same; either he or some one on his behalf will have to make an affidavit, I suppose.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are some very close decisions in regard to what is sufficient for affidavits for recounts.

Mr. DOHERTY: By section 15 all the provisions of part 3 with regard to recounting are made applicable, with the substitution for the word "judge," of the words "recounting authority." You make application to the High Commissioner, you ask him to get a recounting authority appointed, and when he is appointed you proceed before him just as before a judge here. Power is conferred upon the recounting authority to extend for such reasonable periods as may be necessary the times limited for taking any step in official addition or recounting proceedings affecting any votes polled under this Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Part 3 of our Act gives four days between the opening of the returning officer's court and the commencement of recounting proceedings.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is authority to extend the time.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Governor in Council is empowered to fix a date from which the four days will count.

I wish to move the same amendment that has been made to section 12. I shall move in respect to this group of clauses, that, wherever the words "secretary of the High Commissioner of Canada" appear, there shall be substituted the words "secretary of the High Commissioner's office," and that wherever the words "Canadian Commissioner to France" appear, there be substituted the words "Commissaire Général du Canada en France."

Mr. MACDONALD: Is any attempt being made under this law to forward these ballots to Canada? Under the law of to-day an affidavit must be made of incorrect statement or improper adding, and it must be made positive. It seems to me that part 3 would have to be amended in regard to the deposit. This provision applies to Quebec and Alberta and the Yukon. Do I understand that no deposit is to be required for a recount on the other side?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have provided that all those provisions contained in part 3 shall be applied, and that the recounting authority shall be the equivalent of a judge. I would understand that to mean that when you go before that recounting authority you must satisfy him you are complying with the requirements of the law.

Mr. MACDONALD: With whom are you going to deposit the money? There are special officers referred to in part 3, but no provision with regard to this. Part 3, of the statute refers to the matter.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would think that it would be quite within the power of the recounting authority to say: "If you do not make the necessary deposit, the recount will not go on."

Mr. MACDONALD: Deposit with whom?

Mr. DOHERTY: The recount authority. We have to adapt conditions over there, and I do not think there is very much doubt that we, having transmitted this duty to the recount authority, he could act. We cannot send all these officers over from Canada, but the substantial obligation to make the deposit exists, and I do not think it would be any excess of power of the recounting authority to require that the deposit be made. He could find somebody reliable with whom to make the deposit.

Mr. MACDONALD We make part 3 applicable to conditions in England, but how will the deposit be made? In some provinces in Canada we deposit the money with the Clerk of the Court; in other provinces it is deposited with somebody else. You do not say anything as to who shall hold the deposit in England. If you are going to provide for security for costs, you should provide where the money shall be deposited otherwise the judge in England designated for this purpose would very fairly say: "There is no provision with regard to security for costs here." The statute should be made clear. A party might lose his recount, after going to a lot of expense, if the deposit were not made properly. Applications for recount in Canada are set aside when deposits are not properly made.

Mr. DOHERTY: In order that there may be no difficulty we might add to subsection 2 the following words:

And the recounting authority shall have power to determine with whom the deposit described shall be made.

Mr. MACLEAN: There is apparently no way of a candidate learning the result of the count in England, or in Europe, unless he has an agent at hand, who would communicate that information to him. The result is not telegraphed to Canada until the final counting, which can only be after the recount, if there is one. I cannot suggest a way out of the difficulty, but the candidate in Canada has no means of determining whether or not he should ask for a recount.

Mr. DOHERTY: If we go back to the section that deals with it, the provision is that when the counting is completed the counting officer hands a certificate of the result of that counting to the High Commissioner in England, who telegraphs it at once to the general returning officer, and follows that up by sending over his statement, and the returning officer, upon that statement, is empowered to proclaim the result of the election. There is no provision to send to every candidate in Canada notice of what that counting is. It would seem to me it might be fairly assumed that, when all that information is communicated to the general returning officer here, and is furthermore in the hands of the scrutineers representing the respective parties upon the other side, there would be no real difficulty in a candidate ascertaining it. I have not the slightest doubt that that information will be public property in Canada the day after the telegram comes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What section requires a telegram to be sent to Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: Subsection 9 of section 12, which reads:

(9) Upon receipt of the statement, mentioned in subsection four of this section, of the votes applicable to each candidate in an electoral district, the secretary of the High Commissioner and the Canadian Commissioner to France, respectively, shall communicate the text thereof by telegraph, and such document itself by registered post, to the general returning officer.

Immediately on the statement being sent in, it will be cabled to this country, and followed by sending the statement by mail.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Then, as we amend subsection 4 of section 12, it will require that copies of such statements—that is the statement of the result of the counting—shall be delivered to the scrutineers in attendance.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see how it can be improved, but there is not much chance of a candidate asking a recount in four days.

Mr. DOHERTY: Section 14 makes it the duty of the general returning officer, when he receives the information here, to communicate it to any person who asks for it.

Mr. GRAHAM: That means he will make it public.

Mr. DOHERTY: And a candidate has only to ask for it, and he will get it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the Minister of Justice understand that these provisions with regard to recount do not affect the right to a recount being had in Canada, with respect to the votes being cast in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think it possible that those conditions could deprive the candidate of the right to have a recount of the ballots cast in Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would you put in a saving clause? You have one general returning officer. Your returning officer in each county does not return anybody. There should be some amendment to part 3, in order to make it clear you could serve a returning officer in a certain time. How would a man in British Columbia serve the returning officer in Ottawa?

Mr. DOHERTY: The obligation of the ordinary returning officer at home is to send all his papers to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. We have substituted the obligation to send them to the general returning officer. We have left the rest of the law as it was. The provision stands entirely unaffected, but that operation will be stopped if somebody makes an application to the judge for a recount. All we have done with part 3 is to make its provisions applicable overseas, with the substitution of these different things, but we have not made them inapplicable to the operations here carried on under part 3, and those operations remain subject to the provisions of part 3.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister will assure me that if after looking into this matter I have any suggestions to make it clear I shall have the right to make them—

Mr. DOHERTY: If I should be in error about it, I shall be glad to have it brought to my attention.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Emergency poll:

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a printer's error which I would like to correct. I think the word "be" should be inserted at the beginning of the third line, and I move that the section be amended in that respect.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Governor in Council might be called upon very unexpectedly to grant a poll. I think the section should require notice to the candidates at least. It might happen that you would not have time even to put up notices. I know the British Columbia vote at Halifax was taken on less than twenty-four hours' notice, and a great many did not know it was being held.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Governor in Council is empowered to make provision for the polling of the vote. I think there are not apt to be very many cases in which this will arise, and I believe the Governor in Council may be entrusted to make reasonable provision.

Mr. CARVELL: There is nothing in this section to the effect that the provisions which will be hereinafter enacted regarding the scrutineers being present shall be adhered to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should think the Governor in Council would consider that in making provision for the holding of the vote on a different date. I do not understand that it would alter the matter of holding the poll.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Except that he might not have time to carry it out at all.

Mr. DOHERTY: If there is not time to carry it out at all, I suppose the Governor in Council would not try it. All he is empowered to do is to make provision for the polling of their votes in the manner by this part provided. He cannot change the manner.

Mr. GRAHAM: Read the balance of the section.

Mr. DOHERTY: (Reading):

> On a day prior to their departure, and may modify the provisions of this part relating to time or procedure in so far as may be necessary to render such polling possible.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That means you might telegraph a man at Halifax to take the poll of two thousand soldiers who were to leave next day for overseas.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the question for the committee is whether under those exceptional conditions it is willing to entrust the Governor in Council to provide to meet them. If it is not, of course I do not know how we can very well deal with it. I am willing to insert any words that may be useful.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I only mention it so that the attention of the minister may be drawn to it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will this Act apply to home guards, where there are home regiments?

Mr. DOHERTY: It would apply to the militia on active service. Militia on active service may be away from their homes just the same as the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Offences and penalties:

Mr. MACDONALD: Of course, this section is of no value unless there is some amendment to the Militia Act by which the doing of these things would be a military offence. It could not be enforced outside the country. I suggest to the minister whether we could amend the Militia Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: It strikes me as a somewhat remarkable thing to try to make these duties military duties. While it is quite true that if the offences be committed outside of Canada we will not be able to apply the punishment—at least I take that to be the law—it is also true that those things may be brought about by people who are in Canada, although the operation itself is actually effected outside of Canada. Those parties in Canada would be subject to the punishment. Then we must remember that this statute also has application in Canada for the taking of military votes in Canada. As to the suggestion that we should make this offence a violation of military duty, it would certainly be extreme to apply it to people who are not military officers.

Mr. MACDONALD: It would be of no value to those who were not military officers nor attached to the force. This may be only mere ornamentation and intended to apply only to stray persons in Canada, who may be connected, in some way or another, with the force; but suppose men connected with the taking of the votes in England or France found that some fraud had been committed, there is no way in which any penalty could be imposed on them, unless the minister would amend the Militia Act so that anything made an offence under this measure could be dealt with by the military authorities. The trouble about the whole thing is that military offenders can not be punished unless the Imperial authorities pass some complementary legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: The whole proceeding is distinctly a civilian affair, and it seems to be rather unfair to seek by our law to make a man who happens to be a military officer amenable for an offence for which a civilian doing the same thing would not be amenable. If the hon. gentleman will look over the section he will find that many more of those things can be done in Canada than he conceives. People in Canada, for instance, may seek to prevent the delivering of those messages. This provision is far from being mere ornamentation.

Mr. MACDONALD: It simply means this, that anything in the way of infraction of the law that can be committed may be committed in England and France, and nothing will be done to the party who commits the offence. Will the minister see if he can find some way of carrying out my suggestion?

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to think about that as well as about other matters. At first glance it strikes me as an extraordinary proposition that we should make offences of this kind military offences.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as I am able to understand the suggestion of my hon. friend, I do not think it would advance the matter one whit further.

Mr. MACDONALD: I make the suggestion only as a possible solution. There is no sense in inserting in this Military Voters' Act a quantity of fanciful infractions of the law, and penalties, and things of that kind if they are to be only of as much value as waste paper. Can not something better be devised?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is mistaken. This section has an application in Canada and therefore, it is not purely ornamentation. Outside of Canada, it has at least a certain moral effect; it is there on the statute book. If we should attempt to convert offences of this kind into military offences, we would simply be attempting to evade the plain provisions of the Militia Act and the corresponding Act in the United Kingdom to which, in the final analysis, we have to resort for the enforcement of military law.

Mr. GRAHAM: You might make all these men honourary colonels and bring them under the Militia Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In effect, what my hon. friend would suggest is this, that we should make offences under this measure offences under the statute of the United Kingdom. If we enact that, we would not be a bit further along, because the same objection that might be raised to this could be raised with regard to that.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not think so. I think that under our statute relating to military matters, the King's regulations are made effective in Canada and applicable to the forces. The King's regulations are in force in Canada, because it is so stated in the Militia Act. I simply want to suggest consideration of the question as to whether or not something can be done.

Section agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will soldiers have to vote in their capacity of soldiers? There must be some hundreds of soldiers employed in the city of Ottawa, and the same is true of other cities. They will have a vote in their capacity of civilians as well as in their capacity of soldiers. Will those men have an opportunity of voting in either capacity; that is, can they vote as citizens or vote as soldiers?

Mr. DOHERTY: The soldier may exercise either vote. He cannot, of course, exercise both.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there any provision by which a soldier can go home and vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: We are trying under this measure to make provision so that the soldier away from home will have the poll brought to him. We are, therefore, not making a provision to let him go home to vote. He votes for his own constituency, but he votes, under this system, in his camp or wherever he is. If he happens to be at his home, he may vote there.

Mr. CARVELL: I would suggest that the minister give notice of these amendments and then, between now and to-morrow, we could take them into consideration and try to frame a measure as it will be with these amendments. If all the amendments were comprised in this typewritten document, the matter would not be too bad, but certain amendments have already been adopted. I suppose, if we take Hansard of yesterday and these proposed amendments, we shall find out how the legislation reads.

Mr. DOHERTY: Before we deal with that matter, the ballot form and also forms B and D require amendment.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. member for St. John notified me before leaving that his constituency is not described correctly. It should be "the City and Counties of St. John and Albert."

Mr. DOHERTY: The electoral districts affected are St. John, Ottawa, Halifax, South Cape Breton and Richmond. I beg to move that:

Form A be amended by striking out in line three after the word "particular," the word "person" and substituting the words "candidate or candidates designated by name," and by striking out the word "person" after the word "such" in the fourth line thereof and substituting the words "candidate or candidates." Further, by striking out the words "une personne en particulier" in the seventh line thereof, after the word "pour" and substituting therefor the words "un ou des candidats en particulier designés par leurs noms" and by striking out in the eighth line the words "cette personne" after the word "de," and substituting therefor the words "ce ou ces candidats." By inserting in clear black type, the words "in the electoral dictricts of Ottawa, Halifax, South Cape Breton and Richmond, and the city and counties of St. John and Albert, two candidates may be voted for"—Dans les divisions électorales d'Ottawa, Halifax, Cap-Breton Sud et Richmond, et St. John, on peut voter pour deux candidats." By erasing the straight line in the first space. By making a fifth white space and inserting the words "I vote for the Labour candidate"—"Je vote pour le candidat Ouvrier."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move that Form D be amended by adding to the last word thereof the words, "I have not previously voted at this election."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would suggest to the minister that No. 1 space should be wider. It will be remembered that in four instances two names may have to be written within that space.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps we might have that done.

A FIXED PRICE FOR WHEAT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): A statement has appeared in the press that Canadian wheat, which was formerly subject to a maximum price after the 1st of August, and also subject to prohibition of export to the United States, has now been made subject to a fixed price of $2.40 up to the end of August. There is a difference between a maximum price and a fixed price, and I should like to know at what point this occurs and, generally speaking, the policy of the Government in the matter. The handling of the crop of the Northwest is a very important matter. The Government has seen fit, for what I suppose to be good and sufficient reasons, to assume a measure of control, in fact full control, over the handling of that crop. I wish to say that it is not at all satisfactory to have notice that a certain position—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. OLIVER: —prevails and to-morrow that a different position prevails.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is rather exceeding his rights. He cannot in putting a question proceed to call in question the action of the Government.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not wish to call in question the action of the Government.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The object in view has been from the first, and will continue to be, as large a measure of co-operation as possible between Canada and the United States with reference to such matters. It was expected that before the first of August, powers would have been obtained from Congress by the authorities at Washington, enabling them to deal with the question, but the legislation was delayed. Therefore the Board of Grain Supervisors of Canada in order to regulate matters for the time being and until co-operation could effectively take place between the authorities on both sides, fixed a maximum price on an ascending market, the object of which was, while getting a good price for the Canadian farmer, to prevent an undue inflation of price during the interim, which would have had the effect of advancing prices on a merely speculative basis and driving up the advancing price of wheat the price of flour and consequently of bread, which would have reacted upon the whole population of the country as consumers. As time went by it became apparent that the United States would not get effective control or regulation until probably about the end of August or the first of September. Consequently the period had to be lengthened to take us up to that time. There was a general impression in the United States that the price of wheat would be fixed, and that it would not be fixed at anything like the figure of $2.40 for the crop of 1917. That, of course, caused a great deal of confusion and uncertainty in the market. In the United States it had the effect of practically destroying trade at interior points, because no person would care to buy wheat at interior points unless he had a fair certainty of what he would receive at the terminal points when his wheat arrived there. The impression was that the fixation by the United States would be at a price somewhere about $2, (but without any certain knowledge as to what it would be,) and so the effect I have spoken of was widespread and it resulted practically in confusing and in fact in preventing trade at interior points. The same influence began to be prevalent in the Canadian Northwest. In the same way, in the interior elevators at inland points—and we have 3,500 interior elevators—no person was disposed to buy unless he felt fairly certain of what price he would get at the terminal point. As there was only a maximum price, there was no certainty as to what price he would receive. It was to prevent that state of things on a falling market and to make certain of a flat price at Fort William and Port Arthur in the month of August, that, on this falling market, a flat price was fixed at $2.40. That carries us along through the temporary period. At the present time the idea is that by the first of September complete co-operation will be had between the United States and ourselves, and that then the permanent fixation of prices will take place for the 1918 crop.

Mr. OLIVER: In the same connection I notice that the Winnipeg price of No. 1 Northern wheat on August 23 is $2.40; and the price of No. 2 Northern $2.38. I notice that on the same date the price of No. 1 in Minneapolis is $2.50 to $2.60; of No. 2 Northern, $2.45 to $2.50; that in Duluth on the same date the price of No. 1 is $2.50 and of No. 2 Northern $2.45. I understood the minister to say some time ago that there was a fixed maximum price in the United States.

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, there has never been a fixed maximum in the United States.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood him to say that the price in Minneapolis was lower than the price in Winnipeg at a certain date.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: At that particular date, yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Are the figures I have quoted to-day correct?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The figures are as they are given in the newspapers, and I imagine they are correct. But the whole point seems to be that the variation in price between times—a sort of no man's land, as it might be called—is considerable. Sometimes the United States price is lower and sometimes it is higher than at Winnipeg. On the whole, there has been a very heavy drop in the price in the United States, gradually bringing it down to what it is supposed the price will approximate when the final fixing takes place, and from day to day there are variations for various reasons. I want my hon. friend to understand that the fixation of the prices has made a certainty to the Canadian producer that he would not otherwise have, and it has been, I believe, very beneficial to him. If my hon. friend will read a late editorial in the Grain Growers' Guide, I think he will see what the opinion of people directly interested in the matter is, concerning the operation, as it has proceeded since the 1st of August. My hon. friend says that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction. There may be dissatisfaction.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not say so.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is some dissatisfaction among some, but as a general rule, so far as my information goes,—and I think it is pretty well founded—there is very great satisfaction with the course the Grain Board has taken.

Mr. OLIVER: I ask the minister to have his department compile a statement of the amount that has been lost to the Canadian producer by the prohibition of the export of wheat, since it was made on the 27th of July.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that I would be able to compile such a statement, but if I were able to, and were able to place on the other side a statement of what has been gained by the fixation of that price, I think my hon. friend would find that the balance would be very much against his present contention.

EMBARGO ON EXPORT OF SULPRUR FROM UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I observe in the press that there is an embargo on sulphur being exported from the United States, which means, according to a letter which I received this morning, the closing of several Canadian pulp mills. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce taking any steps with the Washington authorities to prevent such a thing happening?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is an embargo placed by the United States against the export of sulphur from United States territory. The supply in the southern states, particularly Louisiana, is restricted. It is needed for the operations of the United States. Not very much is being imported from other countries at the present time, under present transport conditions. Therefore, sulphur has been placed under embargo, but, although placed under embargo, and although none can be exported except by license, the United States authorities are open to consider representations as to our necessities, which representations are being carefully and thoroughly made.

CORRECTION OF NEWSPAPER REPORT.

STATEMENT BY HON. MR. MEIGHEN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: Certain press reports of my remarks yesterday attribute to me the statement that the city of Montreal was against conscription. I need scarcely say to the House that I made no such statement. What I said is correctly reported in Hansard at page 5132. I need not quote it. The same report said that I favoured confiscation. It is superfluous for me to deny that.

THE MILITARY VOTERS' ACT, 1917.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

The House again in committee on Bill 127, the Military Voters' Bill, 1917.—Hon. Mr. Doherty—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. DOHERTY: When the committee rose last evening we had gone over everything included in the Bill with the exception of Form B. As it is proposed to submit an amendment to section 3 of the Bill, that will necessitate an amendment to Form B to correspond with the change.

On form C—Certificate of vote of a civilian:

Mr. MURPHY: What is that intended to cover?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a provision that if a scrutineer, or other officer connected with the election, should happen to be a civilian, that he is entitled to vote under this Act the same as a soldier, as his duties place him among soldiers, and in that event the fact that he has so voted is being certified to by the officer taking the vote, and this form will appear upon the envelope.

Mr. MURPHY: What cases of that kind might arise?

Mr. DOHERTY: Either of the parties might appoint a civilian as scrutineer, or deputy scrutineer. That man, by reason of his functions, would not be at home to vote, and it was thought fair to extend to him, as well as to any civilian performing duties under this Act, the privilege of voting as though they were soldiers, because that would be the only opportunity he would have to vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why limit the scrutineers? Should you not put in brackets "or the deputy scrutineer or returning officer?"

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will look at the form, he will see in parenthesis the words "or as the case may be."

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is intended to embrace any others?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is broad enough to cover it.

Form C agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are certificates of discharge granted by commanding officers, and is a record of them kept at Ottawa?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not familiar with the details, but I am under the impression that a commanding officer may grant a discharge under certain circumstances. I think, however, that his action has to be approved by higher authorities. A soldier having occasion to obtain a certificate of honourable discharge for the purposes of this Act would be able to procure it from the department here.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are certificates of discharge granted to men who were attested but who subsequently could not pass the medical examination?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are cases where men who passed the examination afterwards broke down as a result of the strain, or for other reasons, and were discharged on medical grounds. A man does not become a soldier, however, until he has passed his first medical examination.

Mr. CARVELL: I know a good many men who offered to enlist but who were turned down for one reason or another. I understand that such men are furnished with badges showing that they have attempted to enlist but have been rejected for some reason. I was wondering whether that class of men would come under the head of "discharged soldier." Personally I would think not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would think not.

Mr. CARVELL: They would be ordinary civilians and would exercise the franchise according to the general law.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is my understanding.

On section 2—Definitions:

Mr. DOHERTY: I move:

That section 2 be amended by prefixing to its clauses respectively the letters (a), (b) and (c).

Amendment agreed to.

I move:

That paragraph (a) of section 2 be amended by striking out the words "for containing ballots" in the second line and substituting therefor the words "made of durable material with one lock and key and a slit or narrow opening in the top and so constructed that ballot papers enclosed in envelopes may be introduced therein but cannot be withdrawn therefrom without unlocking it.

In the proposed amendment we describe the receptacle to be used in precisely the words of section 122 of the Dominions Elections Act, which is a description of the ballot box to be used in the elections in Canada. The only difference, if it be a difference, is that we specify that "ballot box" may include a bag or other receptacle.

Mr. CARVELL: In section 11 there is a provision to the effect that the key of this box or bag remains with the general returning officer either in Paris or in London.

Mr. DOHERTY: The receptacle is locked so that the presiding officer who has it cannot open it during all the time that it is in his possession, unless he mutilates it. It may take a slightly larger aperture to put in a ballot that is in an envelope with a certificate on the back of it, but in every other respect this provision conforms absolutely to the requirements of the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I congratulate the minister upon the sense of reason and justice that has come to him in making the change in this section at the request of members on this side. The same applies to other necessary amendments which have been made to other sections of the Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the amendment providing for some other form of receptacle than the box ordinarily used in Canada based merely on apprehension that the ordinary ballot box would not be suitable, or is it founded on some experience that it is not suitable?

Mr. DOHERTY: Our information is that in the elections that were taken a bag was found more convenient. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) pointed out that tin boxes would be more difficult of transportation. Even in this country there is no provision that the receptacle shall be a tin box.

Mr. CARVELL: Wooden boxes are largely used in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. MURPHY: Were the ballot boxes sent over to England when the ballots were forwarded in the spring of 1915?

Mr. DOHERTY: My impression is that they were not. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in this country the ballot boxes are not furnished by the Dominion Government; they are gathered in the different localities as is found convenient. I think they are usually got from the municipalities.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there any provision for a penalty for the supplying of a bag not of durable material?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No more than there is with regard to ballot boxes in Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no provision with regard to that.

Mr. OLIVER: As a great deal depends upon the character of the receptacle, some person should be held responsible for the receptacle being according to the terms of the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has the supplying of these things, and we put upon him the obligation to supply them of the character prescribed. We do not provide for the imposition of a penalty upon all our officers for not doing all that the law prescribes.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg the minister's pardon. I did not know that provision was contained in the Bill. I am aware that, under ordinary circumstances, ballot boxes are made wherever they are required. I did not know whether or not bags might be supplied in the same way, and in that case my suggestion would be quite in order.

Mr. DOHERTY: They go from the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the presiding officer, and from the presiding officer to the deputy presiding officers.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I said that we would amend the clause so as to include in the term "military elector" persons ordinarily resident in Canada who are on active service in any of the British forces or in any of the forces of our Allies. It will probably be very difficult for us to get at them, but it is thought quite proper that they should be given the right to vote, so that if they find themselves in conditions in which they may exercise it they will have that right. In the first place, there is a little amendment to meet what was pointed out by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. L. A. Lapointe). I beg to move:

That paragraph (c) of section 2 be amended by inserting at the end of the fifth line thereof the words "and placed on."

That is to meet the suggestion that everybody called out under the Military Service Act might have a vote although he never became a soldier. He could not have a vote as a soldier unless he was placed on active service.

Mr. CARVELL: Under the terms of the Military Service Act, the moment the proclamation is made, the men are called out, but if a man were not actually placed upon the list, he would not be a military voter.

Mr. MURPHY: The term "military elector" includes a minor or an Indian. Does the word "Indian" mean a native of India?

Mr. DOHERTY: We do not so understand it. In this country the word "Indian" has a perfectly accepted and known meaning. We do not mean an Indian in the sense of a native of India; we mean an Indian as we know him in this country and as we have him amongst our troops.

Mr. MURPHY: A Canadian Indian. I have some doubt as to the interpretation and application of that word "Indian." Suppose a Hindu, who was a British subject and who may have been living in British Columbia, applied for a vote and claimed the right to vote under that definition, would he be allowed to vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think there is any reason to doubt that, even if we did not have the word "Indian" in the Bill, the Hindu, a British subject and a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, would have a vote. We put that word in only to settle a doubt. Personally, I believe, if we struck that word out, an Indian in our forces would have the right to vote. I always so understood the old Act although we did not mention it. In some quarters there seems to have been a doubt, because in our Dominion Elections Act we exclude Indians.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg further to amend paragraph (c) by adding at the end thereof the following words:

And every person, male or female, being a British subject ordinarily resident in Canada, whether or not a minor or an Indian, is on active service in Europe in any other of the forces or services, military or naval, of His Majesty or of his Allies.

This will cover our man in the British forces, any French reservist, for instance, who was a British subject and went to serve in the French forces, any person ordinarily resident in Canada who is serving in any of the Allied forces.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there a provision for the imposition of a penalty upon a member of the Allied forces, but not a resident of Canada, who offered his vote under pretence of being entitled to it under this provision?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no special provision for such an act upon his part. I think the general provisions of the Dominion Elections Act about impersonation and so forth would apply. We are making this a part of the Dominion Elections Act, and this operation differs from the general operation in so far as is provided here. We would not be able to enforce such penalties because we have not jurisdiction to convict men of offences committed outside of Canada; but to the extent that our jurisdiction goes, the provisions under Part 3 of the Act with regard to offences would no doubt apply to the like offences committed under this Act.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it a fact that there is neither let nor hindrance to the possibility of such an occurrence as I have suggested? That is hardly, I should think, the intent of this measure.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is required that a man should make oath to the facts that entitle him to vote, and, of course, if he makes false oath, the man undoubtedly has committed perjury. But what is inevitable and what we cannot prevent is the fact that our criminal laws do not run in France nor in England, so that we have, with regard to those oaths, to rely upon the moral sense of the voter and upon the precaution of the officer taking the vote to see, as far as possible, that he is not being deceived.

Mr. OLIVER: The officer taking the vote could not by any possibility be held responsible for the acceptance of the oath of a man who was not entitled to make that oath. While it is true that we have no means of protecting ourselves by proceedings under the Criminal Code, I respectfully suggest that we should not leave ourselves entirely unprotected in such a case, and unless already provided for, I would suggest that provision be made that on proof of any such vote having been given, it can be counted out. We surely should not leave ourselves open to the possibility of a number of votes being illegally cast without our being able to protect ourselves against the result.

Mr. DOHERTY: On a scrutiny of votes, the vote of a non-elector under this part would be struck out, just as would the vote of a non-elector under any other part. We do not need any special provision about a scrutiny of votes. If there be a scrutiny, and it is ascertained that a vote has been illegally cast, it could be thrown out under proper proceedings.

Mr. OLIVER: Under some other provision of this Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, I think. Upon a contestation of an election, if the ground of contestation was that the candidate had been returned because of a large number of votes by people who were disqualified, the vote of a person disqualified under this Act would be treated in precisely the same manner as the vote of any other disqualified person. At the moment I am not prepared to define exactly what the procedure is, but whatever it may be, there will be the same protection with regard to this disqualification as with regard to any other.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland, that section 2 be amended by striking out the words "whether or not" immediately before the words "ordinarily resident" in line 22 of page 1. This brings up the question which was discussed a day or two ago, whether or not a man should be allowed to vote who has not been a resident of Canada. I think myself that the mere fact that a resident of the United States or the West Indies or India, China or Japan who happens to be a British citizen enlists in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, should not give him the right to vote at any election for a member of this Parliament. Such a man joins the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the purpose of fighting for the Empire. He may never have been in Canada at all. He may know nothing whatever of the political questions which are dividing the Canadian people. He would not expect the right—and I do not think it is desirable to give him the right—to take part in the civil affairs of this country. Upon what theory shall he be permitted to say who shall govern this country, not merely during the war, but for the next five years? I cannot for the life of me see any reason why the right of franchise should not be limited to those who are ordinarily residents of Canada. I entertain that view very strongly. I think no reason can be urged for keeping these words in the section, which give the man who was not ordinarily resident in Canada before his enlistment the right to vote.

The section becomes more objectionable when we come to consider section 3, because both these sections must be considered together. If the section passes as it is, the result will be that a man who has never been a resident of Canada, who has perhaps never set foot on Canadian soil, will have the right not merely to vote, but to select any one of the two hundred and thirty constituencies in Canada in which to cast his vote. That is giving him a far greater freedom that you are giving to the Canadian boy who is serving at the front. The Canadian boy at the front can only vote in the constituency where he belongs. His right to vote is limited to one candidate in one constituency—the candidate who is running in the constituency where the soldier formerly resided. But the foreigner—I use the term in the sense of a non-Canadian, a non-resident of Canada—the man who may never have set foot in Canada, who has no interest in the civil government of this country, and may know nothing of the questions which divide the Canadian people, is allowed to select his constituency in any part of Canada. Let me appeal to the committee to consider for a moment what the result of that will be. I am told that in the Canadian expeditionary forces there are several thousands of British subjects who have never been residents of Canada, and there may be more before the election. In many constituencies in this Dominion where the vote is very close, where either the Liberals or the Conservatives are in a slight majority, these non-residents of Canada, by making certain combinations, could practically turn the election, and in that way defeat and nullify the votes of the Canadian soldiers. Is that right? Is it a proper thing to do? On what principle can such a course be justified? One needs only to state the case, it seems to me, to show the argument against it. I do not want to take up the time of the House in discussing this matter further, but it does seem to me that the Government ought to consent to the striking out of these words. Every member of his House and every man in this country wants to provide by law that the Canadian man or woman who has gone to the front shall have the right to vote. Every one is desirous that the mere fact of a Canadian citizen being overseas shall not deprive him of his civil right, and surely, when we by law provide for that, we have gone as far as the Canadian soldier would desire us to go. I cannot conceive for a single moment that the resident of Canada, the Canadian boy who has gone to the front, would be desirous that that civil right—that right of expressing an opinion by his vote as to the government of the country during the next five years—shall also be conferred upon people who have never lived in Canada, who may know nothing about Canada, and who have no real interest in the civil government of this country.

Mr. GERMAN: I feel that the section as at present constituted is an outrage on the civil rights of the people of Canada. It is moreover an outrage on the soldier electors, who are fighting the battles of Canada in the trenches. By whom will the designations be made of the constituencies to which these votes shall apply? We are deliberately saying that men who have never lived in Canada, and who have no interest in Canada in any way whatever, and who very likely never will live in Canada and never have any interest in it, shall have the same right to vote, simply because they are fighting for the British Empire and in the cause of the Allies, as our own sons who have gone from home to fight the battles of their native land. Those men have no residence in Canada; they do not know anything about the political situation here. If they are asked to designate for whom they wish to vote, they can say "I vote for the Government" or "I vote for the Opposition." When they are asked "In what constituency in Canada do you want your vote recorded," they will say "I don't know." And as a matter of fact they do not know anything about the constituencies. Who will designate the constituency in which such a vote shall be recorded? Who is the only man likely to designate the constituency? Is it not as certain as it is that the vote is to be polled that the person who will designate the constituency will be the deputy returning officer or the poll clerk in charge of the poll? I submit to the House that this is what will be done. Now, assuming it would be done, to what constituency would that vote be assigned? In the Dominion of Canada we have over 100 constituencies in which the majorities range within less than 100 votes. The difference between the two political parties in this House at the last general election was forty-five members. How easy it will be to find fifty constituencies in the Dominion of Canada in which the majority for one candidate or the other would be much less than 100, and probably less than fifty. The deputy returning officer in charge of that poll will know these constituencies as well as we know them. That being so, to what constituency is he likely to assign those votes, assuming him to be a hard-and-fast partisan who would do such a thing? In passing legislation of this kind we must assume the worst that can occur, and taking into consideration all that could happen, could not the deputy returning officer easily pick out fifty or sixty of those so-called foreign votes or non-resident votes, and assign 50, or 60, or 70, or 80 or 100, to make it certain, to each of the close constituencies, and carry the election by that vote? I submit to any reasonable man in this House that this could be done, and the danger and temptation of its being done is what we wish to avoid. It is our duty in legislating to give our sons and our relatives who are fighting the battles of the British Empire in the trenches of France the protection they demand, and see to it that their votes are not killed by the votes of men who have no earthly interest in Canada, and who very likely will never have any interest in the country. It is a most outrageous thing that this Government should deliberately say that men coming from the United States, or from India, or Australia, or New Zealand, or Japan, or Russia, or any other place on God's green earth, simply because they happen to be British subjects and joined the Canadian forces to fight the battles of the Empire, should have the right to vote, and thereby possibly kill the votes of our own sons who are giving their life's blood in the trenches. I am sure the Minister of Justice will admit that what I say can easily be done. The deputy returning officer, knowing the close constituencies, has in the hollow of his hand 3,000 or 4,000 voters who have no local designation in Canada and who do not know where to assign their votes, and he can assign these votes as he sees fit. It does not make any difference to the men whether their votes are assigned to the county of Welland, or the county of Russell, or the Yukon territory, or British Columbia, or anywhere else. If they believe in this Government they say they want to record a vote for the Government, and that is done. If they disbelieve in the Government, they say they want to record a vote against the Government, and they do so. But they do not know where that vote will be assigned, or what constituency will derive the benefit of it. Who is to tell them? No one but the deputy returning officer in charge of the poll. I think it is the duty of this House to amend the clause by striking out the words "whether or not" so that it would read: "Who being a British subject ordinarily resident in Canada." Residential manhood suffrage is the franchise of Canada, and it is the only franchise, except what we are now giving. We are now granting the franchise to minors and men who would not be entitled to vote were it not for the fact that they are going to the front as brave citizens of Canada and of the Empire to fight our battles. Why extend this franchise to men who have never lived here? It is an outrage on the civil rights of the people of the country, and if the Government insists on this clause going through as it is, I, for one, cannot help but think it is the intention, or the expectation at any rate, that these votes will be used in the very manner in which I say they can be used.

4 p.m.

[Mr. German.]

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I cannot listen to a proposition of the nature put forward by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) without raising my protest. I make the statement that a man who is a British subject and who has left this country and gone, say, to the United States, therefore, has not the same material interest in this country as a man who lives here, but who has sufficient manliness in him, sufficient respect and love for this country, to abandon his ordinary vocation in life and come across to this land and say: I am going to enlist, and, if necessary, sacrifice my life on behalf of the country of my birth—I say that, in some respects, that man is even more entitled to a vote than the man who enlists here in our midst. I know men living on the American side, who, when this war was declared, gave up lucrative positions and came back to this country and enlisted, donned the uniform, took the oath of allegiance, and who are now across the seas, fighting the battles of this country around Lens as valiantly and as much in the interests of this country as any Canadian. Will you tell me that the men fighting around Lens who lived in this country when they enlisted will not take that man by the hand and say: Good old boy, you have done your duty, you are one of us, and as much entitled to a vote.

Mr. EDWARDS: And more, too.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: And I say it is in the interest of the people of this country to give them a vote. I know a man of that kind, a married man, who left his wife and family on the other side, who came back here and enlisted and is overseas now. Is there a man who will say he is not as much entitled to the vote as any man in this House? I go further and say that that man, having taken his life in his hands, is more entitled to the franchise in this country than I am, sitting here as a member of Parliament, because he is willing to make the supreme sacrifice which I myself have not made, or have not offered to make, even if I could. I say it is an insult to this House to introduce a resolution of that kind and say that these men are not entitled to vote. Have not members opposite exactly the same opportunity of getting their votes as members on this side? The whole resolution is based upon the assumption that the men who have charge of these ballot boxes are going to commit acts of fraud, that they are going to endeavour to make these men, these British subjects, who have come from other countries to fight for us cast their ballots in a certain riding, and in a certain way. The whole amendment is based on the imputation that the men who conduct the election over there, who are to have charge of the ballot boxes, the scrutineers, the deputy presiding officer, the presiding officers, will conduct the election on principles of fraud, and not upon principles of honesty, justice and fair play. When a man goes over there and takes his life in his hand he is not thinking of the little picayune, petty, peanut, party politics that some members of this House are thinking of here to-day. He has greater things and larger visions in his mind, and petty things of that kind are foreign to his thoughts.

Mr. ARTHURS: In the earlier stages of the war no doubt quite a number of men from foreign countries who were British subjects came over to enlist and many of them are still with our troops. Another element came into this country at the same time, and while gentlemen opposite are very insistent that the men who came over to fight for Canada and who are fighting for her to-day, whose interests are in many cases as great as those of other electors in Canada, should not be allowed to vote, they do not say anything about the men who came over at the same time from the United States or from foreign countries to take the places in the factories of Canada of the men who went overseas to fight for us, the true Canadians. They have the necessary residence of one year, if they are British subjects. But there is not a word said about their voting, and the fact is that it is upon these men that these gentlemen opposite are relying in the coming election. I hold in my hand an interview given by—

Mr. GERMAN: I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that one year does not give foreigners—

Mr. ARTHURS: I did not say foreigner, I said a British subject from a foreign country.

Mr. GERMAN: He has to be here three years.

Mr. ARTHURS: A British subject coming to Ontario can vote in one year. British subjects coming here under exactly similar circumstances but for the purpose of fighting for Canada, are to be denied the right to vote, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, but these men who were brought here from other countries to take positions in munitions factories, to take the places of the boys who have gone to fight, are to have the right to vote. I have an interview given in Toronto by a prominent Liberal candidate in which he says:

> An entirely different situation will occur in the riding at the coming election. In the first place, the electorate is over one-third French Canadian. Then the political situation has been changed greatly by the coming of foreign element in the 3,000 employees of one factory. I am a straight Liberal, a supporter of Laurier and under other conditions might consider the fight a losing one before I started, but not so now.

That is quite evident, and shows plainly what these men are looking for. They do not want to give votes to the men who have gone overseas to fight for Canada, British subjects coming from a foreign country, but they are quite willing to allow the vote to the man who comes over here to take the British boy's place, and to work for $5 or $6 a day while the other man gets $1.10. That is the size of the whole matter.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not think that some hon. gentlemen opposite are as anxious to give the vote to our Canadian soldiers over at the front, because perhaps they are apprehensive of that vote, as they are to give the vote to some of the foreign element in their own constituencies. I can understand the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) moving a resolution of this kind. It is in keeping with his whole course in this House since the debate started, in fact since the conscription Bill was brought in. He has opposed most consistently any assistance to our boys overseas. He has not done his part as a citizen of Canada, apart altogether from his duty as a representative in this House, in trying to get recruits in this country. Let me ask you, Mr. Chairman, which will have the better right to cast his vote in this election, the man who came from the United States, we will say, into Canada, a British subject, who signed up and went overseas and is now risking his life in the defence of this country, or a young man who, in the fall of 1914, when we none of us knew how long this war was going to last, took out his commission as a lieutenant down in the city of St. John, and when the war showed that things were not going to be ended in a short time and the risk was great, took off his uniform, after drawing some pay, and preferred to run a garage in the city of St. John rather than go overseas and fight.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is his name?

Mr. EDWARDS: The name will be found in the Militia Gazette, that little red book containing the names of persons who took out commissions, and his name is Pugsley. Lieutenant J. A. Pugsley took out his commission as a lieutenant in November, 1914.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to say that the statements made by my hon. friend are absolutely false. I desire to say too, Sir, that it is a cowardly thing to attack a young man behind his back who is not here to speak for himself.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: What about General Gwatkin?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Cowardly—

Mr. EDWARDS: I ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on that statement or remark of the hon. member for St. John, and ask that it be withdrawn. He said that a statement which I made was false.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, I repeat it.

Mr. EDWARDS: I ask that statement be withdrawn, and I ask a ruling from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman from St. John said that the statement was false. I think, under the rules, he could say that the statement was false. It was the statement that he said was false, and nothing else.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, may I also ask you in regard to the word "coward"? Is that also in order?

The CHAIRMAN: As to the other words complained of, the hon. member for St. John used the expression "a cowardly attack." The word "coward" was applied to the attack, and not to the hon. member who was speaking.

Mr. EDWARDS: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that your ruling is that the words are permissible.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: Then, Mr. Chairman, I want to tell you, and to tell this House, that the hon. member for St. John, an old member of this House, stood up in his place in this House and made statements that were absolutely false and were cowardly in the extreme.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: And, Mr. Chairman, I want to tell you, still further, that I am in a different position in making that assertion, from the position of the hon. member for St. John, because I am in a position to prove that his statement was false, and he cannot prove that my statement was false.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to repeat again, Sir, that the statement was absolutely false, and that it is an absolutely cowardly attack—to attack a young man who is not here to defend himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Put that in your pipe and smoke it.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am not smoking just at present. I think the fumes are rising from the hon. gentleman from St. John. He is the one who is smoking, and he is the one who is uncomfortable just at present.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am perfectly comfortable.

The CHAIRMAN: With reference to the words " put that in your pipe and smoke it"—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I beg respectfully to withdraw that remark.

Mr. EDWARDS: I may say that I think the hon. gentleman from St. John will do a kind of smoking other than his pipe, if he does not mend his ways. At page 674 of the militita list, at the top of the page I find—62nd Regiment, St. John, N.B., Lieutenant J. A. Pugsley, 17th November, 1914.

May I ask the hon. member for St. John whether the J. A. Pugsley referred to there is his son or not?

Mr. PUGSLEY: After the statement of the hon. gentleman, Sir, I would decline to have any intercourse with him. I desire to repeat, that the hon. gentleman did not merely confine his statement to the fact that that young man had a commission, his statement went further. He made a statement which I declare to be absolutely false. I repeat it and can prove it any time.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am more than borne out by the attitude of the hon. member for St. John. He puts himself in the position here this afternoon of absolutely disowning his own son. The only statement I made in reference to the hon. gentleman's son was this: It was in the form of a question of whether or not a man, a British subject, who had resided for some years in the United States, came over here to Canada, put on the uniform, kept the uniform on, went over and risked his life in the trenches, was not more entitled to a vote than the man who put it on for a brief space of time, and then took his uniform off, and now runs a garage in St. John, instead of running a machine gun at the front. Why should the hon. gentleman from St. John object to that? It is a simple question. The hon. gentleman is moving an amendment to cut out men who have gone over to risk their lives for Canada. He has said that they should not be allowed to cast a ballot in the election to say who should govern this country for the next five years. I take issue with him, and I say that they should vote, that those men are entitled to every consideration. Let me say further that those men who have gone over there are not the unintelligent men the member for Welland would like us to believe. They have shown that they possess the right spirit, and I venture to say that these men who thought enough of Canada to leave the United States, come here and don the uniform and risk their lives, know what is going on in this country. Exception is taken on one point. These gentlemen opposite ask where will their votes be recorded? I confess if I were one of those men, and if I were aware of what is going on in this House, and aware of the attitude of the hon. member for St. John, or the hon. member for Welland, and had my choice and could say where my ballot could be counted, I would say; " Count it in St. John, and count it against the hon. member for St. John; he has shown he does not want to back us up, and does not want to help the boys in the trenches; let me get a crack at him, as well as at the Huns in Europe; let me get a crack at the Huns in Canada or at some of those playing the Huns game in Canada; those are the men I am after." It would be an act of retributive justice if some of those men had an opportunity to cast their ballots in St. John, in order to leave at home in St. John the member who has disgraced the city of St. John by this attitude in this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are some members of this House that so far forget themselves, and forget those gentlemenly instincts which ought to govern all members of this Parliament, that any man who respects himself would scarcely deem it proper to reply to any observation that these members may make. I should not say some members of this House. I think I should have said " one " member. We have in this House one gentleman who has shown himself, on many and many occasions, unworthy of the respect of any man, either in this House or outside of it. My hon. friend from Frontenac knows—his inner consciousness will tell him—to whom I refer. That hon. gentleman has stated that I have disgraced my position as a representative of the constituency of St. John. He says I have given no support to our boys at the front. I do not know the age of the hon. gentleman who has made that statement. I do not know whether it would have been possible for him to have gone to the front, but I am beyond the years when I could go and fight for my country, and the most those who are beyond the age limit can do is to contribute of their means towards assisting our country in the great struggle in which it is engaged. I have made no boast, Sir, of what I have done, but I am willing that my record as to the assistance which I have given, compared with the means that I have, be placed side by side with that of any other man in this House, or any other man in this country. I say that I have not boasted, from the public platform, or from my seat in this House, of what I have done; but those in my home city who know me know that, in respect of my relatives who have gone to the front and in respect of men who have been in my employ, I have done my part cheerfully and to the best of my ability. I can appeal to my conscience to justify the assertion that I have done everything possible for me to do; everything that the most patriotic citizen would have felt bound to do. That is all I have to say in reply to the remarks of my hon. friend.

Mr. EDWARDS: By making some reference to my remarks, the member for St. John himself answers the question whether they were entitled to any reply from a gentleman who respected himself. We must conclude that he is in the category of those who do not respect themselves; otherwise my remarks must, in his estimation, be worthy of some consideration on his part. I also am above the age limit for military service. I have never been connected with the militia in any shape or form. I have never been a fighting man; I have always been a man of peace; every person who knows me knows that that is true. This is the first time that I have ever made reference to the fact that my only son is to-day flying over the lines in France, risking his life every minute. I stand here as one interested in that boy and in others who are over there. I am confident that those who are to-day risking their lives on the other side would, if they had opportunity of doing so, say that the right to vote should be given to those who, my hon. friend says, should not have that right. There would be no dissenting voice; there would be no difference of opinion; every soldier over there, whether in the infantry, artillery, or flying squadrons, would say: give the ballot to every man who has put on the Canadian uniform and come over here to help us fight in this great cause. I am willing to place my record alongside the record of the member for St. John at any time and at any place before the people of this country—and I think I can make the suggestion with better grace than my hon. friend can. Moreover, I will place the record of my son against the record of his son; we will make it a family record, if my hon. friend is willing, and we shall see which the country will approve.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have not taken part in this discussion; any suggestions that I had to make I made privately to the Minister of Justice. But I take this opportunity of pointing out that in all ages naturalization laws have been overridden by the mere fact that a man dons the uniform and fights in the service of a country. That constitutes citizenship, and the rule should apply in all lands. I am more than delighted that the minister is making it the rule in this case. British subjects coming from overseas and enlisting here and foreign subjects serving with the Canadian forces should have the right to cast their ballots as Canadian citizens, in view of the work that they are doing in this great war. At the beginning of the war it was regarded as out of place to give the soldiers votes. I happened to be in England at the time Sir Richard McBride was trying to get the British Columbia soldiers the right to vote in the provincial elections. One evening I met him at dinner in company with Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Bonar Law and others. The conversation turned to voting, and these gentlemen said that they could not see their way clear to give the British Columbia soldiers the vote. I asked them what they had to do with giving the British Columbia soldiers the right to vote. I took the ground that they had neither right, title nor interest in the matter; that the Government of Canada should say whether or not Canadian soldiers should have the right to vote. I pointed out further that it was unfair that the men at the front should be deprived of the right to vote while the men at home—some who could not go; many who could—would have that right. According to the old Anglo-Saxon English law, the man who becomes a soldier loses no rights of citizenship. The Canadian citizen who dons a uniform, goes to the front and is deprived of his vote has a charge of ingratitude against the country that it would be hard to refute. However, the matter was looked into on the other side and the principle was adopted that the men who don the uniform lose no rights of citizenship. On the morning following the occasion to which I refer, Sir Richard McBride was notified by the British Government that there was no objection whatever to the votes of the British Columbia soldiers being taken. Accordingly, the men were given a chance to vote, although only a few of them could be reached. I repeat that any man of any nationality who joins the ranks of the Canadian soldiers and fights in this war is entitled to cast a ballot in the coming election. I have run a good many elections and I have rarely challenged a vote. I always take it for granted that a fellow who is sixteen or eighteen years of age knows pretty well how to vote and how to conduct himself without any paternalism on the part of returning officers or politicians of any stripe. I remember one polling subdivision where my opponent had seven different officers—scrutineers, poll clerks and all that sort of thing—and I had not any, not even a constable or a scrutineer. When the count was made it was found that every ballot in the box was in my favour. These ballots included those of the poll clerk, the returning officer, the constable and the scrutineer.

An hon. MEMBER: How did you do it?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I let them exercise the conscience that the Lord gave them; that is how I did it. The agent of my opponent questioned these gentlemen. He said: Didn't I appoint you to act as scrutineer? Yes, replied the gentleman in question; I acted as scrutineer, but there was nothing to scrutinize. Then he questioned the polling clerk: Did I not ask you to act as poll clerk on the understanding that you would vote for our candidate? Oh, no; I did not have to vote any particular way; I was to act as poll clerk, and I have performed that duty. They thought that because these fellows got $5 or $10 on that occasion they would hand over their consciences and their votes. That is not the way the boys are trained in the district that I have the honour to represent. I could mention various other instances along the same line.

A good deal has been said about whether those of foreign nationality should vote. In the year 1914 I asked the British Government, through Lord Kitchener, to enrol a dozen brigades of German Britishers and put them in the firing line. It was my privilege to enrol the first body of Boers in South Africa—men who had been fighting against us up to a short time previously, but, who having found that they were in the wrong, expressed themselves as willing to fight in the right cause.

They were splendid fellows, and I had the privilege of meeting some of them in England the year before last. Had the British authorities enrolled a body of Germans who would fight for liberty as against the tyranny of Germany, this war would have been ended long ago, because the spirit would have spread until we would have had the free-born, freedom-loving people of Germany standing shoulder to shoulder with us in this great cause. The German settlements in Canada have done splendid work in this war. I saw the other day that the little town of Zurich had sent 20 men of German extraction to this war, and that a number of them had fallen. Thirty or forty boys of German descent fell on our side at the battle of St. Julien. The intelligence officer of the First Division, one of the finest soldiers in the service, is the son of a German officer, and his mother has several brothers in the German service, but no more true, steadfast soldier exists than that lad. These people are not machine politicians, and my idea is to let those boys go to the polls. They have earned the right by becoming British soldiers, and 999 out of every 1,000 of those boys need no scrutineer, no returning officer, no polling clerk to tell them how to vote. They will vote according to the dictates of their consciences; they will vote for whatever candidate they choose, and no man would tell them to change their vote this way or that way. They will exercise their own judgment.

Mr. OLIVER: When this Bill was first under discussion, I understood the Minister of Justice to agree with my definition of the object to be attained under it, namely, to ensure that no Canadian citizen should be deprived of his vote by reason of his being a soldier. As I take it, the section, as it is drawn, provides that those who are not Canadian citizens shall be entitled to vote because they are soldiers. That contention receives a good deal of support. I do not, however, follow the reasoning that is given in support of it. If it be a fact that, because a man dons the Canadian uniform and fights in the Canadian ranks, therefore, he is entitled to have a share in the control of the domestic affairs of Canada, I do not see why our soldiers, who are fighting in France or in Belgium, or who are in England preparing to fight, should not have just the same right to a share in the control of the domestic affairs of France, Belgium or England. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways, and if citizens of those countries who happen to be in the Canadian forces are entitled to share in the direction of the domestic affairs of Canada, surely the rule should work the same in the other direction, and our soldiers should have a right to interfere in the domestic affairs of France, Belgium, or England. Nobody will contend that this latter suggestion is feasible, or workable, or even right, and I contend that the suggestion, that any person who chooses to join the Canadian army to fight in a cause that is not more Canada's than it is that of France, or Belgium, or England, should have a right to share in the control of the domestic affairs of Canada, is not sound reasoning.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the hon. member aware that a Canadian serving in this war in France under the French Government, wearing the uniform of a French soldier, has a vote in France? I should think he would have a vote, and I believe he has.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know as regards a Canadian serving in the French army, but my contention is, following the contention of hon. gentlemen who have spoken, that inasmuch as Canadians are in France fighting for France, or are in Belgium fighting for Belgium, or are in England preparing to fight for England, they certainly should have the same right to share in the direction of the domestic affairs of France, Belgium, or England, as all those other men, citizens, we shall say, of the United States are to share in the domestic affairs of Canada, because they are fighting, as my hon. friend says, for Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Are not all these men fighting for human liberty?

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They are not fighting for France, England, or Belgium; they are fighting for human liberty.

Mr. OLIVER: They are fighting for France, Belgium, or England, just as much as they are fighting for human liberty.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They are fighting as Canadians.

Mr. OLIVER: They are fighting for human liberty just as our Canadian soldiers are fighting for human liberty. Our Canadian soldiers are in France fighting for France. No one will argue that they are not doing that. It is for France that they are fighting, although, of course, they are fighting for human liberty. We do not, however, insist that those soldiers of ours should have a share in the control of the domestic affairs of France because they fighting for human liberty in France. Then, why should we say that men who have citizenship in the United States or some other country, either concerned in the war or not concerned in the war, should have the right to a share in the direction and control of our domestic affairs, because they are fighting for human liberty in France, or Belgium, or England? The logic of our hon. friends opposite is absolutely at fault.

It is not, however, on that point that I would take exception to the Bill as it stands; it is on this point, that when we include in our citizenship and within our voting rights, those men who have no local habitation in Canada, we thereby place in the hands and in the control of the Government of the day the direction, in large measure, of the votes of those men, naturally, to the very great benefit and advantage of those in whose hands that direction and control for the time being happens to be. I suggest that that accounts, in large measure, for the unbounded enthusiasm with which the proposal is supported by my hon. friends opposite, who have that much of a leverage and advantage over their opponents in any election that may take place. It is not because of the first proposition that I object to this measure, but it is because of the second proposition. I do not so much object to those men voting, because, after all, there is a great deal to be said in favour of the men voting who have identified themselves with our country to the extent of fighting alongside of our soldiers; but when in order to give them what is claimed for them as their right, we thereby place in fact in large measure the direction of this large number of votes in the hands of the Government of the day and its friends for the benefit of themselves and their friends, that is a negation of everything that properly belongs to a free franchise in a free country. It is for that reason I find it necessary to support the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. MORPHY: I listened carefully to many of the hon. members on the other side of the House who have spoken upon this subject and I was struck with the great trepidation and fear that they showed as to the enlargement of the class of voters. I wondered whether or not these hon. gentlemen opposite are afraid of the soldiers' vote.

Mr. OLIVER: We are afraid of the Government count.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: You have control of it by the amendment.

Mr. MORPHY: The remark of the hon. gentleman shows that he does not know what he is frightened of. He has no justification whatever for any such remark. To my mind, one of the cardinal principles that should actuate any civilized people is the extension, rather than the restriction, of the franchise. I notice that some hon. gentlemen on the other side remained silent and did not share in the views propounded by my hon. friend from St. John, who voted against compulsory military service, though he says in this House that he has done everything to help the boys at the front. A man's actions best show what inspires him, and how his remarks should be construed.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend voted for compulsory service. How much has he done to help our boys at the front?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Unfortunately, his son died, the same as yours.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not wish to enter into a discussion of my own personal attitude.

Mr. OLIVER: I mean, how much did the hon. member help the boys at the front by his vote in the House for compulsory service?

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman says he knows what he means, but I do not, and I will leave it to the House to judge what he means. I do not wish to put forward here anything that I have done towards assisting the boys at the front, because I do not think it is anything particular to boast about. All I feel sorry for is that I have not done as much as I think I should have done, although I have done what I reasonably could, in view of the opportunities presented. Some hon. gentlemen opposite, if I may say so without malice, who boast with a good deal of effrontery of what they have done in aid of the boys at the front—and those whom the cap fits can put it on—have blocked and questioned every move that has been made to assist the boys at the front, and engendered suspicion, thereby retarding the efforts of the Government. Some of these gentlemen are frittering away the time of this House in practically obstructive tactics. They say that the Government has mismanaged the war, has made a bungle of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They have.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) the other night, in telling how the Government had mismanaged the war, spoke of the horse scandals. When one remembers that no less than 65,000 horses were bought by this Government at a cost of nearly $9,000,000, and shipped overseas in one year, of which 44,000 were for France and England, and that the scandal amounted to five horses which were surreptitiously passed off at Valcartier, the horse scandal is not worth mentioning in this House. The people are not concerned about that, but they are concerned about the fact that the boys at the front need reinforcements, and need them badly, and are crying for them.

The Government has mismanaged the war, they say. Who is a better judge of that than the soldier? Why should not the soldier vote upon that question? Who knows more about conditions at the front than the soldier in the Canadian expeditionary force, no matter whence he comes? I should think hon. gentlemen opposite would praise the soldier. This Bill does not go as far as the hon. member for Edmonton alleged. It does not presume to give the vote to a foreigner, just because he is in the Canadian expeditionary force, but it is giving the vote to those British subjects, no matter where they came from, who have joined the Canadian forces to fight for Canada and the Empire. Does not the man, no matter where he comes from, who becomes a member of the Canadian expeditionary force, earn his right to citizenship? On what higher plane, I ask the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for St. John could citizenship be put in this great time of stress and trial, when the very foundations of the Empire are being shaken? Do not we welcome the British subject from the United States or any other place who joins the Canadian forces? In what does patriotism consist? It is all right for the hon. member for St. John to boast of his loyalty. No one disputes his loyalty. But I do dispute his patriotism, and there is a great distinction between loyalty and patriotism.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order. I did not boast of my loyalty at all. I do not think any man should do that.

Mr. MORPHY: Then I withdraw the statement that the hon. gentleman ever claimed to be loyal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think it is necessary in this House, or anywhere else in this country, to boast of your loyalty.

Mr. MORPHY: There is a difference between loyalty and patriotism. Loyalty is a sentiment, a feeling of love for one's country. A man may sing "We'll never let the old flag fall" for a thousand years, and be ever so loyal, but he would not be patriotic unless he did something to show his loyalty and to keep the old flag flying. Patriotism is loyalty in action—the doing of something. This Government has certainly been patriotic. Day in and day out they have had but a single purpose in all their war measures, the purpose of solidifying and concentrating the energies of this nation upon the great task before us, and when the boys in the trenches were calling, calling, and calling for more help in tones that could not be forgotten, the hon. member for St. John stood up and voted against the only Bill ever presented in this House to give the boys in the trenches the aid they required. It is by that I judge his patriotism, even if he does not claim to be loyal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I must correct the hon. gentleman. It is too much the habit of hon. gentlemen opposite to try and throw discredit on members on this side of the House. I did not say that I did not claim to be loyal. What I said was that I did not boast of my loyalty.

Mr. MORPHY: I think the hon. gentleman has very good ground for not boasting of it.

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton, there is a great distinction to be drawn in connection with the argument he makes as to soldiers of this country voting to affect the internal policy of France or Belgium. If a Canadian soldier was fighting in the army of France or Belgium they should give him the vote, whether this Government gave him a vote or not. We are asking that men of British blood who happen for the time being to be living outside of this country, who have been moved by their patriotic spirit to enroll with the Canadian forces, get their kits, go into training, and go to the front and die, who under our law can take advantage of the Patriotic Fund, and the separation allowance, if they are married, who are entitled to hospital and Red Cross benefits, who get socks and other comforts for the soldiers from the women of Canada—we are asking that they shall be given the vote. Hon. gentlemen opposite would give these soldiers of ours all these comforts, but for political reasons, being frightened of them, would deny them the vote. Do we realize that a war is on, and that to encourage our soldiers we must give them not only material comforts, but also the abstract right to vote? They have taken their lives in their hands and gone to the front to do or die for us. They have earned their right to citizenship, and surely to God they are entitled to the vote.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I very much hope that my learned and hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) will withdraw his motion. The men with whom this section deals are British subjects, not foreigners, as my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says. It is presumed that they are British subjects. As such they have come from the United States and other countries and have joined our forces, particularly in Western Canada. My hon. friend says they should not be permitted to exercise the franchise. They have no right to exercise the franchise in the United States, not being American citizens, and in this war more than in any other conflict of the ages, the destiny of the British Empire is at stake. The only opportunity these men will ever have of casting a vote as to what shall be the future of this Empire is as units in the Canadian forces, and not otherwise or elsewhere. I therefore submit that as British citizens governed and actuated by a patriotic willingness to offer their lives for the safety of the Empire and of this section of it—because after all their love was the love of empire, they found Canada a convenient place in which to enlist—Canada now offers the only opportunity that ever will be afforded to them to cast their votes for the defence of this Empire and determine whether or not in the midst of this war the conduct of the administration of this country merits the approval or disapproval of the men overseas. These men, British subjects, British citizens, coming here and signing on for three years, giving service to the state in Flanders and in France, offering their lives in the trenches, are asking now at the hands of this Administration an opportunity to cast a vote for the British Empire, for its salvation, for its destiny, and for that particular section of it which is called the Dominion of Canada. That is the first reason why they should have a vote.

The second reason is that these men have a deep and abiding interest in that portion of the Empire called Canada, because they have been receiving pay and separation allowances from our exchequer. They have an interest in the administration of the Dominion, because, in the future, their pensions must come from the Dominion, so that they have a deep and abiding interest in the administration of the financial affairs of Canada. They have been enlisted for one, two or three years, and should have the right to say whether or not the administration of the financial affairs of the country has been such as to merit their approval or their disapproval, because they have been engaged under Canadian administration, because they are under the aegis of Canada, because they have been receiving their pay from Canada, they have a deep and vital interest in the right to cast their votes. I cannot see how it would be possible to get away from these reasons. Let us examine the question a little further. What are the essential qualifications for voting in Canada? Two things only: residence and citizenship, or, to put it the other way, citizenship and residence. Those British citizens come from other countries and enlist here, thereby answering the first qualification. The second is answered by service. I said some days ago, and I wish to repeat it, that service given to the State by willing offer of one's life as a sacrifice upon the altar of patriotism, is the highest, the noblest, and most enduring service this world can ever know. Who would for a moment contend that service such as that for six, eight, or ten months, does not far transcend one year or three years' residence in Canada? It is only necessary to be a resident of Alberta for one year, before a man is entitled to the franchise. I am sure from what I know of my hon. friend from Edmonton he will agree with me, that any man who has done six months' service in France or in Flanders has done more to establish his citizenship and his right to vote than he could do by living in our cities for any length of time. I submit that is the answer upon the question of qualification by residence. In the West, as my hon. friend knows, we have a very large number of Austrian and German reservists. Only a few days ago I received a letter from one of the officers who went with one of my home battalions. He said "one of the prisoners we captured was a German officer whom you knew well in Calgary, but whose name I am not allowed to give you at this time." He was a Canadian citizen, and had he not been able to escape from this country he would have voted in Calgary, in this war for Germany and Austria, yet when a British subject comes along from the United States and enlists to fight the battles of the Empire, you wish to deny him the right to nullify a vote such as that. I saw a letter the other day from a young boy, not yet eighteen years of age, to his mother. He had captured two prisoners. He had been wounded, but had delivered his prisoners to the nearest camp. He said "Mother, imagine my surprise when I found that one of them could talk English and had lived in Lethbridge before the war." So far as I have been able to ascertain, there are very large numbers of those men all through our Western country at the present time A whole settlement of them escaped to the United States, and were able to go across to Austria in some way that we do not know of. It is common for Canadians to capture German soldiers who were Canadian citizens before the war. They were naturalized, and many of those men would have the right to vote at the next election. I ask my hon. friend from St. John if in the light of that knowledge which he possesses, and which any man who reads the papers possesses; if in the light of the knowledge we possess of the recent elections in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and what passed there, he is not now prepared to withdraw his amendment, and afford to those citizens of the Empire the right to vote as Canadians; afford to them the right to express their opinions upon the conduct of the Administration of the country, and upon those measures that must be taken to give them that assistance and help that will enable them to carry forward this conflict to a glorious and victorious end.

Mr. GERMAN: The motion has elicited just the style of speeches I expected it would.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Very good speeches.

Mr. GERMAN: Very good indeed, of the kind, but absolutely far removed from what is really the crucial point in this motion. I have no desire to prevent a British subject from having a vote, and I never had any such desire. I have no fear of the votes of soldiers at the front who come from the county of Welland, or who come from any other county. The point involved in this motion, so far as I am concerned, is this: What right has any man or any number of men to say they will vote in the county of Welland, or in any other county, without any residence or even a legal status in that county?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: This is not to be a county election; it will be a war election.

Mr. GERMAN: It is a county election, just the same as any other election ever was. It is an election which will decide the fate of the Government or the party, or decide who shall govern this country for the next five years—not for the next year or two years until the war is over.

If it was a war election, to decide what Government should be in power until the conclusion of the war, the contentions of hon. gentlemen opposite might be considered in point. But this is not a war election, it is an ordinary election in the Dominion of Canada to decide who shall govern this country for the next five years. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), in his fervid remarks, said that he would be very glad indeed, and that it would be wise, if a lot of these gentlemen who have no legal residence in Canada would record enough of their votes in the county of Welland to defeat me. So far as I am concerned, it makes very little difference to me whether I am defeated or elected. I never was a very ardent politician or a politician who desired particularly to participate in politics for the sake of being in politics. I have represented Welland for twenty-six years. I have been elected by majorities on every occasion running up into the hundreds. If the people choose to defeat me at the election, I am quite satisfied they should do so; they are the ones to choose, but I do not want the voice of the people of Welland to be smothered and killed by the votes of people who have never lived in Welland or in Canada. Supposing, for instance, carrying out the idea of the hon. member for Frontenac, that the people of the county of Welland should choose to elect me as they have in the past by four or five hundred, or three hundred majority.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: By acclamation.

Mr. GERMAN: Very well, by acclamation. They might do it again you know.

Mr. WEBSTER: There is no reciprocity this time.

Mr. GERMAN: Lightning sometimes strikes twice in the same place. But, assuming for the moment, and I will take that county for illustration, the people of Welland chose to elect me by three hundred majority, and thirty days after the election, a report came from London: Oh you are defeated. By what vote, I would ask and the answer would be: by the soldiers' vote from Welland in England? But the soldiers' vote from the county of Welland might be strongly in my favour—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: How do you know?

Mr. GERMAN: I am mighty certain it will be. But I would be told: There are five hundred votes recorded against you of men who never lived in Canada, and never will live in Canada. What will the people of Welland think of that?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Why should my hon. friend be afraid of these five hundred votes?

Mr. GERMAN: I am not saying I am afraid of them. I am not afraid of any vote. I am not afraid of my hon. friend or his friends opposite. I am not afraid of anybody or anything, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It is only reciprocity you are afraid of.

Mr. GERMAN: I am assuming that these men who have no legal designation in Canada do not know where their votes should be recorded. They will vote, say, for the Government. Assuming for the moment that they all vote for the Government, who shall designate the places where those votes shall be counted? It will not be the voter, because he does not know. It will be the deputy returning officer, and the deputy returning officer will designate those votes in the constituency where they will do the most good. This Government may be entitled to be returned to power; perhaps they will be returned to power. I am not now contending or labouring that question. Perhaps this Government could be returned to power by the vote of those men who absolutely have no residence in Canada. I say that, irrespective of all these high falluting suggestions of patriotism, it is not in the best interest of Canada that these outsiders, who do not know where they should vote, should have their votes placed for them by people who are in the employ of the Government. That is the point I take, and the point I make, and I submit that it is a point that should have weight, and that that clause should be amended in accordance with this resolution.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to draw attention to a point that may interest my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett). Assuming that everything he says is correct with regard to the propriety of outsiders, non-residents, voting, he will have to recognize the difficulty that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) has mentioned, the difficulty of distributing the vote. Assuming that the Government intended to be fair in the administration of the Act, would it not have accepted the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) the other day whereby the Opposition would have some measure or share in the direction of the affairs of the voting, relating to this distribution of votes? If they had done that, the Government could fairly claim that they did not want to take an unfair advantage of the fact that they have control of the machinery of elections.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is not the counting to which the hon. gentleman referred in his previous address adequately safeguarded now by the recast Bill?

Mr. OLIVER: I think the arrangements as to the counting are greatly improved and very satisfactory. But in regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Welland that these voters, these men who are constituted voters by this Bill, who have no knowledge of any constituency in Canada, would have the right when they vote to make the selection of the constituency of which they have no knowledge, all the machinery, all the direction is in the hands of my friend's friends. I say that if the Government desired to preserve the appearance of fairness under these peculiar circumstances—everybody will admit that they are very peculiar—the party of the Opposition should have some share in the control in connection with the distribution of this vote, that is, the two parties should have an even break in regard to it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Do you not think that is covered by the provision as to scrutineers?

Mr. OLIVER: I understood not.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Do you not think it is adequate?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The scrutineers have nothing to do with the allocation of the vote.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But they prevent the difficulty my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: If they do their duty, yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, they have no duty in regard to it. The presiding officer is taking the vote. Naturally the non-resident knows nothing of the constituencies in Canada, nothing of the candidates. He will ask advice from the presiding officer—that will be a common thing—as to the different constituencies, and in that way there is an opportunity which ought not to be afforded by this Bill for these presiding officers to really largely control the allocation of the votes of those who have never been residents of Canada. I quite agree with the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) in his suggestion that the Bill, as it is proposed to amend it, will be greatly improved as to those who have once been residents of Canada, because they must specify their last place of residence in the country. But the objection still exists as to those who have never been in Canada, who have never set foot in Canada, who were not born in Canada, and therefore cannot be considered as Canadians. That class of people will still be allowed to vote under this Bill, and, under the provisions of section (c), will be enabled to choose any constituency in Canada which they care to select. Giving the fullest force to everything which the hon. member for Calgary has said, and so well said, in regard to the recognition which the country ought to give to every man who joins the Canadian Expeditionary Force and is prepared to risk his life for the Empire, let me ask him if he does not see a very great injustice to the Canadian boy who is at the front, whose choice is limited to the constituency in which he resides—does he not see the great injustice that is being done to him by giving to a stranger, a non-resident of Canada, the right to pick out a constituency anywhere in Canada in which his vote shall be counted.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: If we concede he should have a vote, obviously the complement of that is that he himself must select where his vote will be placed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not necessarily.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend would not suggest that the returning officer should do the choosing?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He would not suggest that his scrutineers should determine the constituency?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Nor that our scrutineers should?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Therefore, the man himself should?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is what we have done.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difficulty is the man will not select it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have faith in his intelligence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He will say: "I do not know anything about the constituencies in Canada." He will say to the officer taking the vote: "Give me your suggestion as to where the vote should be allocated." But the fact that there is an injustice to a soldier who has been a resident of Canada in allowing a non-resident to have a choice of the whole 230 odd constituencies is a reason why the non-resident should not be given a vote, or that his vote should be allotted to the constituency in which he enlisted. That would limit it. It might be an injustice, perhaps, to have a number of these votes given in the constituency in which the men happened to enlist, but it is very much better to incur that inconvenience, and that very slight injustice, than to allow an injustice to be done in a large number of constituencies. But it all comes back to this, that no man should be allowed to vote unless he is able to make an affidavit as to some constituency in which, at some time or another, he has resided. The only effect of that would be to debar altogether those who have not been born in Canada, who have never lived in Canada, and who can be described absolutely as non-residents of the country.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: That is not the hon. member's amendment. The amendment proposes to give them no vote at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, for this reason; that we have to take this Bill section by section, and when we are considering this amendment we find ourselves confronted by the provisions of section 3, which we are bound to take into consideration, and which expressly provide that the man who has not had a residence in Canada which he can specify, is allowed to pick out, at his own whim, any one of the 230 constituencies in Canada. My hon. friend from Calgary appealed to me to withdraw the amendment. I would be perfectly willing to withdraw it, if I could have the assurance of the Minister of Justice that section 3 will be so amended as that the voter must specify some constituency in Canada in which he has, at some time in his life, resided. I would make it very broad, so that it will apply to those who have been once in Canada, and if my hon. friend the Minister of Justice will say that he will propose an amendment to section 3, which will require that the elector shall specify some constituency in Canada in which he has at some one time in his life had a residence, then I shall be perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment. But I am not willing, as one member of this House, to allow the vote of the Canadian people, more especially the votes of our Canadian boys who have gone to the front, to be submerged by the votes of strangers, of non-residents of Canada, who are to have the privilege, under this Bill, of allotting their votes over the whole Dominion of Canada, to pick out any one of the 230 odd constituencies, and place their votes in constituencies which, in many cases, I am bound to believe, these partisan presiding officers, whose appointment this Government is determined to keep in its own hands, will have the selection of, rather than these non-resident soldiers.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not think I can be accused of obstructing, if I say a word or two, because this is the first time I have spoken in the debate on this Bill. I should like to point out to the Government that I am supporting the amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. John because I consider the Bill, as drawn, does an absolute injustice to the Canadian soldier. A soldier from the constituency of my hon. friend for St. John and Iberville who happens to be a Conservative in politics, and would like to vote for the Government in a constituency where his vote might do some good, is not allowed to do so under this Bill. He must vote in the constituency of St. John and Iberville, where his vote will certainly be lost. But a man from the United States, who never resided in Canada, can place his vote where it will do most good.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is what he will do.

Mr. BOIVIN: I really am in favour of the principle of allowing every British subject, who is fighting in the Canadian army, to vote in this election.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: I think they should vote, and should be represented in this House, I have a suggestion to offer, but I am not prepared to say that it can possibly be done, as I have not looked up the constitutional aspect of the matter. I should like to suggest an amendment, providing that, notwithstanding anything which may be contained in the Redistribution Act of Canada, a county at large be formed, which would be represented in this House by a member elected by all these soldiers fighting in the Canadian army who had not resided in some particular county in Canada before they enlisted. In that way, they would have representation in this House, and people residing in each constituency in Canada would still have the right to elect their own representatives, with the aid of the votes of their own soldiers. I offer this suggestion to the Government in the very best of good faith. I do not think the non-resident soldiers should be allowed to mass their votes, and thereby destroy the chance of a candidate in any particular district. On the other hand, I think they should vote in the election, and that their votes should be counted. They should have representation in this House. I do not see anything incompatible with the British North America Act in creating an extra constituency. The British North America Act provides that Quebec shall have 65 representatives, and that the representation of the other provinces of Canada shall be in the proportion that their population bears to the population of Quebec. If we had 35,000 strangers, or 35,000 British subjects—I do not want to use the word strangers—who have not resided in Canada prior to the war, but are fighting in the Canadian army, or if we have twenty or thirty thousand, we have almost the population of an additional county. It is so much more added to the population of Canada. They should be entitled to representation, and I think a county at large could very well be designated for them, where they could elect their own representative, who could be sent here to represent them in the next Parliament.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Would the hon. gentleman only give them one member, to these 35,000 soldier electors?

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not know how many of these non-resident soldiers there are. If there is a number equal to the number of electors of two counties, I think they are entitled to two members, and I would have no objection to allowing them two. I take it for granted that, of the soldiers who never resided in Canada before, there are probably fifteen or twenty thousand at the front, and that the others resided in Canada before they enlisted, and will vote in their respective constituencies. If the number is so great that they are entitled to two seats, I think they should have them.

Amendment (Mr. Pugsley) negatived on division: nays, 51; yeas, 13.

Mr. GERMAN: I wish to draw attention to the manner in which the word " minor " is used in this section. The section says:

"Military elector" means and includes every person, male or female, who, being a British subject, whether or not ordinarily resident in Canada and whether or not a minor or an Indian, has been, while within or without Canada, appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service as one of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Militia on active service, or the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, or has been, while within Canada, appointed, enlisted or enrolled as one of the British Royal Flying Corps, Royal Naval Aviation Service, or Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol Service, whether as officer, soldier, sailor, dentist, nurse, aviator, mechanician or otherwise.

A minor is any person under the age of 21 years. No minor below the age of 18 years has been enlisted in any of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces. I submit that the word " minor " should not refer to any person under the age of 18. Further, those appointed, enlisted, enrolled, or called out for active service in the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve are not on active service. If they are appointed or enlisted in either of these forces prior to the election they will be in Canada at the time of the election. There will be no intention of sending them overseas for service.

Mr. HAZEN: While they do not go overseas, most of them are engaged in active service. A great many of them are engaged in service of a very dangerous character in connection with the patrol service along the Atlantic coast, searching for submarine bases, and work of that kind. The provisions of this Bill do not cover those engaged on fisheries protection vessels; they relate only to those actually engaged in naval service.

Mr. GERMAN: It would be a very easy matter to enroll a large number of naval cadets prior to the election, who, though under 21 years of age, would have a vote by reason of this legislation. That might very well be done without the knowledge of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or of any member of the Government. I have taken the liberty of preparing an amendment to cover this point. I move that the following words be added to subsection 2:

(a) "Minor" in subsection 2 shall not refer to any person under the age of 18 years and shall only refer to such persons as have been appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service as one of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or had been at the time of the passing of this Act so appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service in one or other of the several forces in said subsection set out.

That would mean that all minors down to the age of 18 who were actually enrolled or called out for service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force would have a vote; that all such persons down to the age of 18 who had been enrolled or appointed in any of the other services at the time of the passing of this Act would have a vote, but that those who enrolled after the passing of this Act and before the election would not have a vote. A large number of minors will no doubt be enrolled in the Canadian Expeditionary Force subsequent to the passing of this Act and prior to the election who should have a vote; no one wishes to deny them that right. But what I point out is that the organization of units of naval cadets or of minors in these other services subsequent to the passing of this Act and prior to the election, giving these minors the right to vote, would have a very serious effect on the election and a very unhealthy effect on the general sentiment of the country.

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to the suggestion that we should limit minors to minors of 18 years, very few would be enlisted under the age of 18 in any event. When a boy of 17 had enlisted and is performing active service, why should we discriminate once we have, in our legislation, gone below the age of 21?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Cadets cannot enrol if they are over 16 years of age.

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to cadets bona fide enrolled after this Bill is passed, it would be rather unfair to discriminate against them and to say that they should not vote, although their comrades have the right to do so.

If that be so—and that seems to me quite clear, there is only one reason that remains why we should do this, and that involves the very grave imputation on all officers charged with enrolment of cadets of this kind, namely, that this Parliament thinks that they will proceed to enrol, as has been said, battalions of minors for the purpose of making votes. I appeal to the committee. Does this committee suspect that? Does this committee think it is necessary to put upon record that that is our view of those officers?

Mr. GERMAN: It is not the officers who are enrolling those men; they can be enrolled throughout the country. As I pointed out the other night, in different polling divisions there might be two or three young men whom they could enrol in the navy, so that they could register their votes.

Mr. DOHERTY: If that can be done, it is news to me. I did not know that there were naval officers sittting at every poll to enrol cadets.

Mr. GERMAN: I am not saying that at all.

Mr. DOHERTY: Those lads can be enrolled and become cadets only if they are enrolled by officers authorized to enrol them, and at the proper place. You do not enrol naval cadets at every street corner.

Mr. GERMAN: Certainly not.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is one reason for this amendment that is advanced, namely, that the officers of our naval forces—and those officers are few in number—are open to the suspicion that they will enrol battalions of minors—that is the expression of the hon. member—for the purpose of making votes. I ask this committee: In all fairness, are they prepared publicly to put that imputation upon those officers? Is it credible that those officers would do such a thing? Those officers are known to the public; they have their responsibilities to the Government and to the public, and can it be supposed that men in those positions of responsibility are going to bring upon themselves the execration and condemnation of the whole population of Canada by abusing their position in the naval forces to proceed to the manufacture of minor votes? I must say, with all respect: This is an amendment for which there is no substantial reason advanced, and I would ask the committee to reject it.

Amendment lost on division.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Voting by military electors:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I call the minister's attention to these words in line 3 of subsection 2:

> Of the year immediately preceding his appointment.

Does that mean the calendar year preceding his appointment, or does it mean within the period of twelve months preceding his appointment? If it read "within one year immediately preceding his appointment," it would be a little clearer. It might be read to mean that it was the calendar year preceding the year in which the enrolment took place.

Mr. DOHERTY: The suggestion is that the wording might imply that it is not the year which immediately precedes, but the year that precedes that year. That was not intended. I would call the attention of the hon. member to the wording. It is to be "at least four months of the year immediately preceding his appointment." I think that makes it quite clear that the four months to which we refer are four months of the year that immediately precedes, his appointment, and I think, therefore, the year referred to is clearly the year immediately preceding his appointment. I have no objection to modify the clause if there is the slightest doubt about it.

Mr. CARVELL: I would suggest, to make the matter absolutely clear, that the clause read:

> During at least four months of the twelve months immediately preceding his appointment.

The word "year" might be construed as a calendar year, or as the preceding twelve months.

Mr. DOHERTY: If no other good comes of this Bill the training I shall have had in accuracy in expression will be invaluable to me. I am not criticising; I am expressing my gratitude. I beg to move:

That subsection 2 be amended by inserting in the blank space in the second line the word "four," and by striking out in the third line the word "year" after the words "of the" and substituting therefor the words "twelve months."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg further to move:

That section 3 be amended by inserting therein as subsection 3 the following:

"If he cannot state or so specify an electoral district or place wherein he has so resided for the time and within the period mentioned in subsection 2, but can state an electoral district or so specify a place within Canada wherein he has at any other time resided, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or made ascertainable and his vote shall be applied thereto.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg further to amend the section as a whole by substituting the figure "4" for the figure "3" at the beginning of the present subsection 3 and the figure "5" for the figure "4" at the beginning of the present subsection 4.

Amendment agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Ballots and custody:

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a very trifling, but necessary amendment that ought to be made to subsections 5 and 6. It is to substitute in those sections the word "forces" for the word "troops," as used with reference to the commanding officer in Bermuda or elsewhere in North America, because there are forces other than military forces and the word "troops" would perhaps hardly properly apply to them. I beg to amend section 5 by substituting for the word "troops" in line 20, the word "forces." There are some naval forces, and we do not wish to call naval forces troops.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 6—Information as to candidates:

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to amend section 6 by substituting in the forty-fourth line of page 4 the word "forces" for "troops."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 8—Conduct of polls:

Mr. CARVELL: I have a suggestion to make which I think it would be advisable, if not almost necessary, for the minister to adopt in view of the amendment which he proposed the other evening. Subsection 2 says:

The Canadian military and naval authorities at every camp or other place where any poll is held shall afford to the attending deputy presiding officer all necessary facilities, and the officer commanding shall allow every military elector, so far as may be consistent with the proper performance of his duties, time and opportunity to vote.

I would suggest that the minister add, after the word "officer" in line 28, the words "and scrutineers."

Mr. DOHERTY: The amendment that we passed the other evening read:

and, subject to the same condition, to every military elector who may be appointed a deputy scrutineer time and opportunity to perform his duties as such.

Mr. CARVELL: Probably that covers it.

Mr. DOHERTY: If it does not completely cover it, we could say "to afford to the attending deputy presiding officer and scrutineer all facilities."

Mr. CARVELL: The amendment which was carried the other evening read:

and, subject to the same condition, to every military elector who may be appointed a deputy scrutineer, time and opportunity to perform his duties as such.

Suppose that a civilian scrutineer were sent. I do not see anything in the Bill, either in the letter or in the spirit to prevent that, and I think it would be necessary to insert the words I suggested in order to give him facilities.

Mr. DOHERTY: Very well.

Mr. WRIGHT: I would suggest that the word "official" would include clerks, scrutineers and any other necessary officers.

Mr. CARVELL: I have some doubt whether a scrutineer is an official.

Mr. DOHERTY: The suggestion is that we should say "officials or scrutineers."

Mr. CARVELL: That would be all right.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move that subsection 2 of section 8 be amended by inserting in the third line of the subsection, after the word "officer" the words "officials and scrutineers."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move that subsection 4 of section 8 be amended by adding thereto the following:

Every scrutineer, deputy scrutineer, and military elector so acting shall on being admitted to the poll take before the deputy presiding officer the oath in form U of schedule 1 of this Act.

That is the same oath as is taken by scrutineers under the general Elections Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Manner of voting without Canada:

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move that clause (f) of subsection (1) of section 9 be amended by striking out the words "administer to himself" in the second line thereof and substituting therefor the word "make," and further, that the clause be amended by inserting the word "himself" between the word "and" and the word "certify" in the third line thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Forwarding the ballots:

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move that section 11 be amended by inserting at the beginning thereof the following:

The ballot boxes for use in the United Kingdom and on the continent of Europe shall be provided by the assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the presiding officer, who shall deliver the same locked to the various deputy presiding officers, retaining the key, and forthwith after delivery of any ballot box despatching the key thereof to the ultimate destination of the ballot box as hereafter in this section indicated whereat any ballots to be obtained in said box are to be counted.

The effect is that the ballot box leaves the presiding officer locked. He keeps the key and sends it to the officers who are to do the counting. The deputy presiding officer, therefore, receives the locked box, with an opening in it through which an envelope can be slipped, but nothing can be taken out of the box without it being opened.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CARVELL: I think that covers everything, except the forms.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is one other suggestion which I think will meet the views of the committee. I believe we were all agreed last evening that thirty-one days after the polling day imposed as a necessary delay before counting the ballots was, perhaps, unnecessarily long, and the suggestion was made that supposing all the boxes were collected sooner there should be some method of counting them sooner.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Doherty.]

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. DOHERTY: We were at section 12 when the committee rose. I beg to move that the following be added to section 12 as subsection 11:

Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (4) of this section, the secretary of the High Commissioner's office and the Commissaire Général du Canada in France, and the general returning officer, respectively, shall in the event of all the ballot boxes issued to deputy presiding officers in the United Kingdom, on the continent of Europe and in North America respectively, being received by them respectively, and the proceedings under subsections 1, 2 and 3 of this section completed before the thirty-first day next after polling day in Canada, fix an earlier day whereof two days' notice shall be given to the scrutineers entitled to attend on the counting of the ballots and on such earlier date the special returning officers shall proceed to the counting of the ballots in the manner in this section provided.

This is to make it possible not to wait for the 31 days if all the boxes come in.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 13—Return of ballots:

Mr. DOHERTY: I wish to move an amendment to make good an omission in the printing of the Bill. I move to amend section 13 by inserting in line 33 after the word "and" and before the word "transmit," the following words: "after the sixth day after he has made such final addition". This provision permits the returning officer to retain the ballots until after the four days during which a recount may be demanded.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On form (b)—Questions to voters:

Mr. DOHERTY: It will be necessary to change form B owing to the amendment made to section 3 in connection with which form it applies. I move to amend form B by inserting therein as question 8 the following:

If you cannot specify as required by question No. 6, or state as required by question No. 7, then state in what electoral district or place within Canada (giving street and number where possible) you have resided at any other time than is referred to in question No. 6.

Questions 6 and 7 are the questions leading up to the electoral district or particular place where a man last resided for four months of the twelve months immediately preceding his appointment. This is to meet the case of a man who cannot give that information, but who has at any time resided in Canada. He shall vote in the place where he resided in Canada.

I move further to strike out the present question 8 and to substitute for it the following as question 9:

If none of your answers to questions Nos. 6, 7 and 8 specify or state as required thereby to what electoral district do you desire your vote to be applied?

This is to ask for an indication, in the case—which now will be, I think, a very exceptional case—where a man cannot state either the district in which he has resided for four months in the last year or a district in which at any time he resided in Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: In the first and second questions a certain form is adopted, and an opposite form is adopted in the third and fourth questions. Is there any particular reason for that?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, except that questions 1 and 2 are what you might call formal questions, and it is shorter to put them in that way—"your name is?..... rather than "What is your name?" There was no intention in doing it, and I cannot see that it makes any difference.

Mr. OLIVER: Would there be any objection to casting each of these paragraphs into the form of a question?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman suggests that we make it read, "What is your name?"

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection.

Mr. CARVELL: I think it is better to put them all in that form.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then it will read, "What is your name?" "What is your rank?" and "What is your number?"

Mr. MURPHY: Does the section to which this form relates provide that the certificate is to be filled in by the elector, or the deputy presiding officer? It is signed by the deputy presiding officer, but it is to be filled in by the person to whom the interrogations are addressed.

Mr. DOHERTY: The intention is that the presiding officer shall put these questions and fill in the answers. He asks the questions, puts in the answers, and certifies that the man has sworn to the answers.

Mr. MURPHY: There would be less likelihood of suggestion to the voter if he were to fill in the answers himself, particularly to No. 8.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is just a question of who will do the writing.

Mr. MURPHY: I appreciate that the question of time enters into it.

Mr. DOHERTY: This very matter of not requiring the soldier to do the writing or signing was pointed out to us as one of the things that was desirable, by gentlemen who have had to do with the elections that have been held. It was pointed out that whatever shortened the procedure was of very great importance. I am not in a position to say why, but I think it is quite resonable that it should be so.

Amendment adopted, and section as amended adopted.

On form A—Ballot:

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. A. A. McLean) calls my attention to the fact that in the enumeration of electoral districts in which two candidates can be elected, we omitted the district of Queen's county, Prince Edward Island. I move to further amend Form A, as already amended, by adding to the enumerated constituencies in which two candidates can be elected, the electoral district of Queen's county, Prince Edward Island.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it understood that the first blank space on the ballot is to be larger than appears on this form?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, the space will be enlarged.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It should be much wider than appears in the form. There is no great distinction between writing the name after the printed matter, and marking an "X." There is quite a space there. It might be possible that neither the Prime Minister nor the leader of the Opposition would be able to designate some of the candidates under section 12, and perhaps it would be wise to allow the candidate to designate his party. Some complications might arise in regard to this provision.

Mr. DOHERTY: Supposing two gentlemen claim to be the Opposition candidate, or two gentlemen claim to be the Government candidate, we shall be in a hopeless situation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no way out of it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have thought the matter over a good deal, and I confess I do not see any way, unless we have some authority which is going to determine the question. Where there is only one man running as a Government or Opposition candidate, no difficulty will arise, and it is just to meet the case where two gentlemen may be running as Opposition candidates, or two gentlemen running as supporters of the Government that this provision is framed. We have to get some authority that will decide between them.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Did the minister give further consideration to my suggestion the other evening that number two should be number one, number three should be number two, and number four should be number three? It should be arranged so that the first option is the Government candidate, the second the Opposition, the third the Independent candidate, and the fourth the individual candidate who might not be covered by any of the three.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is a discouragement to the personal vote, which we should encourage.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I think it would be a wise arrangement, because nine-tenths of the votes will be for the Government or Opposition candidates, and they would naturally like to mark their ballots in the first or second space. If they do not wish to vote for the Government, Opposition, or Independent candidates, they can indicate some other candidate for whom they wish to vote. The present arrangement is going to be puzzling. A voter may desire to vote for a certain candidate, and will write his name in the first space. If that candidate happens to be the Government candidate the voter will put a cross against number two, and thus the ballot will be marked in two places.

Mr. DOHERTY: In that case, if the candidate he names is the Government candidate, the voter has twice indicated his intention. We have provided that if a man inserts a name and then makes a mark, say, against "Government candidate" and it turns out that the man whose name he put down is really the candidate of the Opposition, the vote will be counted for the Opposition candidate. The purpose of asking the voter to vote either for the Government or for the Opposition is that the name of the individual candidate for whom he voted may be ascertained. Wherever the individual does know the candidate's name, you are saved the additional operation, with possible errors, of transmitting to a particular candidate a vote that is marked for the Government or for the Opposition. After all, the election in each constituency is between particular candidates, and the thing to be found out is the name of the individual candidate for whom the voter voted.

I think the question whether more men will vote for a particular candidate than for Government or Opposition, or vice versa, is in the realm of speculation. The hon. gentleman anticipates that more ballots will be marked for Government or for Opposition than for individual names. We have taken pains to provide machinery by which the names of candidates in all constituencies may be brought to the knowledge of the military electors, and I anticipate that the greater number of votes will be for particular candidates. I think that the sense of the committee, when the matter was discussed, seemed to be rather in favour of the first space being that in which the name should be written.

Mr. GERMAN: I think that the very reverse of that suggested by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) would happen. The soldier from Canada who knows the constituency from which he comes and the names of the candidates in that constituency will vote for the candidate of his choice. Undoubtedly a section of voters do not know who the candidates are, what the constituencies are, or who they are voting for—except that they are voting for the Government. That class, I understand, would come within the purview of what the member for St. Antoine has said. The military electors from Canada, however, will vote, I think, more generally for individual candidates than for Government or the Opposition.

Mr. CARVELL: In view of the fact that there is no distinguishing mark on the ballot—that the ballot does not contain the returning officer's initials—some provision should be made that the person who prints these ballots in London or in Paris will make an affidavit similar to that made by the printer of ballots in Canada. Under the Dominion Elections Act the printer has to make a positive affidavit that he has printed so many ballots and no more. It would be a simple matter for a printer employed in London to print ballots and send them out by the thousands, as they are wanted, to any applicant who would pay the price. It is true that the law says that the ballot shall be marked in the presence of the returning officer, but the provision is that it must be marked in such a way that the officer will not know how he votes, and it would be a very simple matter to substitute one ballot for another.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection to accepting that suggestion. The best way would be to lift the section of the Dominion Elections Act right in there. I move that the following provision be inserted as subsection 3 of section 5:

> The printer shall, upon delivering the ballot papers to the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, file in his hands an affidavit setting forth the description of the ballots so printed by him, the number of ballots supplied by him and the fact that no other ballot papers have been supplied by him to any one else.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would it not be wise to state in form A that the cross with which a man marks his ballot shall be marked with a particular kind of pencil or pen?

Mr. DOHERTY: I hardly think we ought to do that, in view of possible conditions. There was an amendment which I thought had been passed the other evening, but I find that it has been overlooked. It was an amendment prescribing that when the presiding officer appoints his deputy presiding officer he shall give due notice to the scrutineers of each party.

I now move to amend paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of section 4 by adding thereto the following:

> Every presiding officer shall notify in writing, by mail or other expeditious means, the scrutineer of each party whose place of address may be nearest to him of the names of all deputy presiding officers appointed by him.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CARVELL: I suppose the minister will have this Bill reprinted before it is read the third time? It is rather confusing, and we would all like to have an opportunity to go over it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the minister look at form A again? Would it not be well to change the first and last sections so that the first shall be last, and the last first?

Mr. DOHERTY: It was agreed that that should be done, but I find that the amendment was not drawn up so as to meet that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any better word than the word "party" there?

Mr. DOHERTY: What would be the suggestion with regard to that word?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is apt to be a confusion as to whether the word "party" means "person" or a particular party as represented by the Government, Opposition or independent candidate. We spoke of that the other day.

Mr. DOHERTY: For the purpose of clearing that up, we substituted for the words "particular person" the words "particular candidate or candidates designated by name," and when we put in contradistinction to each other a party or a particular candidate or candidates designated by name, I would think, under these circumstances, the word "party" could mean nothing other than a political party. Nobody could then confuse it with person, and it is a little difficult to find another word to substitute for "party" for that purpose that would be any clearer unless we had a long description. I move to amend form A by making the instructions as to the method of voting for a particular candidate or candidates precede that as to the method of voting for a party. When this amendment is carried we shall have Form A printed in that way.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the ballot as it appears in the draft Bill been altered? Has there been an addition to provide for voting for a labour candidate?

Mr. DOHERTY: An amendment carried to make that addition and also to widen the spaces. Furthermore, we substituted for the word "person" the words "candidate or candidates designated by name." That was to clear up the distinction between a party and a person.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the Government assume any responsibility in the matter of informing the voters overseas as to the nomination of candidates? That, of course, is not a matter within the scope of the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: Section 6 makes a special provision imposing the duty upon the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to send the information and upon all officers to circulate it in every possible way.

Mr. OLIVER: That is all very well, but unless the information is over there in good time—

Mr. DOHERTY: It will be sent by cable on nomination day.

Bill reported, amendments read the first and second time, and concurred in.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Supplementary Estimates, 1917-18—Immigration—Salaries of agents and employees in Canada, Great Britain and foreign countries—Further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. ROCHE: The House will remember that when my Estimates were up before I was asked if it was the intention to increase the salaries of members of the Outside Service, and I replied that it was my intention to have an item in the Supplementary Estimates to provide for an increase in the Outside Service similar to the increase provided for the Inside Service under the legislation of the Minister of Finance, namely, that in deserving cases those in receipt of less than $1,000 per annum should receive an increase of $100 a year.

Mr. OLIVER: The higher salaried agents receive no increase?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. MURPHY: In how many countries outside of Canada and Great Britain are agents employed?

Mr. ROCHE: Only in the United States, where we have seventeen agents at the present time.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the movement of people from the United States increasing?

Mr. ROCHE: I think possibly there was in increase of 50 per cent this year over last. Immigration from the United States was down to a minimum in 1915, but there was a considerable increase in 1916, and this year again there has been a large increase until very recently. It is possible, however, that conscription in the United States may have the effect of checking immigration.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the increase largely among men looking for homestead lands, or among those desiring to purchase lands?

Mr. ROCHE: Both. This year there is possibly a larger influx of those who are purchasing land. Quite a number are also going into the Peace River country and taking up homesteads. Our information is that those who are coming over consist of agriculturists, agricultural labourers, and those with money of their own who have sold out their properties in the United States with the idea of buying cheaper land in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: Would it be correct to say that the Peace River district is attracting a larger number than other sections of Canada?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, as regards homesteads.

Mr. EDWARDS: Are there any special agents from the province of Quebec working among the French of the United States with a view to getting them back to this country as settlers? If there are any such agents, I should like to know how many there are, how many settlers they brought back to Canada last year, where they were settled, and what money has been spent on these agents for salaries and expenses. There is another point: It has been rumoured that agents from the province of Quebec working among their compatriots in the United States, in the New England states presumably, have taken advantage of their position as immigration agents to transport people, not from the United States but from Ontario and Quebec to the Northwest. If anything of that kind has gone on—I do not say it has, but I have heard rumours to that effect—I do not think it is exactly what was intended by appointing immigration agents. The idea in appointing them was not that they should arrange for the transport of men from one province to another, but to get people from outside to come into this country. I should like to know if this rumour is well founded, and to what extent this thing has been going on in the past, if at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before the minister answers my hon. friend, I should like to say that this is the first time I have ever heard of any such scheme. If there is any truth, or any semblance of truth, in the rumour that agents appointed to promote immigration from the United States to Canada are sending to the Northwest people from the province of Quebec or other provinces, under the pretext that they are immigrants from the United States, I would urge the Minister of the Interior to order at once a very thorough investigation to ascertain the facts.

Mr. ROCHE: From time immemorial agents have been working amongst the French Canadians who migrated from Canada, principally from the province of Quebec, many years ago, to work in the mills of the New England states.

Their children have been growing up, and it has been the desire to secure our fair share of immigrants from the United States, including the repatriation of Canadians who have gone to the New England States. Colonization agents have been employed for that purpose for many years past under this Government and under preceding governments. I understand there are three of those gentlemen working in the New England States, Rev. J. B. H. Giroux, whose headquarters are at Montreal and whose salary is $600 per annum; Rev. J. B. Bourassa, whose headquarters are at Montreal and whose salary is $1,200 per annum, and Rev. O. Corbeil, whose salary is $600. We have no separate statistics as to the number of French Canadians brought into Canada from the United States. They are all classed as immigrants. Roughly speaking, however, I should say about fifteen per cent of those coming back to Canada from the New England States are repatriated Canadians. They are not classified as French Canadians, English Canadians, etc,—they are all repatriated Canadians. The idea is that a propaganda should not be carried on in any one province to get a movement into another province. There were some complaints made to me on that score about two years ago against one particular colonization agent. He was at my office one day, and I told him about these complaints, explaining that the province of Quebec had objected to any propaganda tending to take their people away and locate them in the northern portion of Ontario, or any other province. I told him we were not spending money for that purpose. He said he had not been carrying out any policy of that character except in a few instances where he knew the people were about to move away from Quebec to the United States, and rather than see them leave Canada entirely, he had done his best to get them to settle in other provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. EDWARDS: Can the minister give me any idea as to the numbers, or as to what part of the country they have settled in; also the total amount expended through these three agents? I would also ask why there is a difference in the salaries. I notice two of the agents receive $600, and the other $1,200. Is it accounted for by the difference in the time they spend at the work?

Mr. ROCHE: I believe Rev. Mr. Bourassa receives the larger salary because he devotes more of his time to the work. As a matter of fact, he devotes his entire time to it. He is very much more energetic and he has brought in many more immigrants from the New England States than the other two gentlemen have. I think one of these agents is temporarily taking the place of another gentleman who went to the front. It is impossible to give even an approximate idea as to the number of immigrants who have been brought in by these officials. All I can tell my hon. friend is that about fifteen per cent of the total immigrants from the United States are repatriated Canadians. Some of them are located along the Transcontinental railway, in the northern portions of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, some of them are taken right through to Saskatchewan and Alberta. There is quite a colony in Northern Alberta, and quite a colony at Prince Albert.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the cost?

Mr. ROCHE: There is no cost to the country, over and above the salaries paid to the gentlemen I have named.

Mr. EDWARDS: Are the expenses of those agents paid?

Mr. ROCHE: Their travelling expenses are paid. The expenses do not amount to very much. As a matter of fact, I think they are supplied with passes by the transportation companies. There is no per capita allowance or anything of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From the explanations given by the minister, it would seem to me that the department spends very little in what I consider to be a splendid field for excellent immigration. Of course, it is always good policy to get the best class of immigrants for Canada. I have frequently heard it admitted on the floor of this House that the best immigrants who have settled in the West are those who came from the United States. The best amongst those American immigrants ought to be our own people—the Canadians who have gone across the boundary line years ago to settle in the United States when times were hard in Canada. A Canadian visiting the New England States is amazed to find so many Canadians. One would find hundreds and indeed thousands of Canadians at the Canadian clubs in and around Boston. As a matter of fact they say Boston is only an annex of Nova Scotia. There are thousands of Canadians, and especially French Canadians, around Lowell, Lawrence, Holyoke, Springfield and other cities in the New England States. I am told there are over 30,000 Canadians in Chicago; and there are large numbers of Canadians in Philadelphia, Buffalo and Cleveland. If the department could bring those Canadians back to Canada, certainly it is the best policy to follow, and the country ought to congratulate the Government on the large number of Canadians who have been induced to return. The latest statistics show that there are nearly one million French Canadians in the United States. Some years ago, in company with the then Speaker of the Senate, Hon. Mr. Dandurand, I had the honour to represent the Dominion of Canada at the semi-centennial celebration of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, in the state of Michigan. We addressed a gathering of perhaps five thousand or six thousand people, and we had to speak in French as well as in English, because of the large number of French Canadians present. All those French Canadians are the sons of farmers, and are excellent farmers themselves when they return to the land. It seems to me it is good policy on the part of the department to induce those farmers to return to Canada. If my hon. friend has travelled through the valley of the St. Lawrence in the province of Quebec, he will have noticed that the farms are already occupied, and those long narrow strips are not sufficient to maintain large families, so the sons emigrated, and now when they return to the land it is quite natural they should go to the West, where there are such immense domains for those who have any farming propensities. I am told there are excellent colonies of these French Canadians in the West. Some years ago a gentleman brought from the United States several hundred French Canadians and founded two colonies, and there are some of them settled in the Peace river country. I commend that policy to my hon. friend and I hope he will bring back many more thousands of French Canadians from the United States.

Seed grain to settlers on unpatented lands in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $100,000.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the minister be good enough to explain this item?

Mr. ROCHE: In the early part of August last year there was a very heavy frost in the Peace River country which destroyed much of the crop, and it was represented to the department this spring that many homesteaders there could not seed their lands. The department sent in officers who visited the different points in the Peace River, Grande Prairie and Spirit River country, in co-operation with officers from the Provincial Government of Alberta. The Provincial Government supplied seed to those needy farmers who had their lands patented and the Dominion Government supplied it to homesteaders. Sufficient good seed was found among some of the farmers in that country to supply all needs, so that we avoided the expense of shipping grain in.

Mr. OLIVER: What amount was supplied by the Provincial Government in the Peace River country?

Mr. ROCHE: We have no record of that.

Mr. OLIVER: And what amount of this money?

Mr. ROCHE: We have not it differentiated as to the particular portions of the country. The bulk of it was supplied to the Peace River farmers.

Mr. McKENZIE: Reverting to the item of salaries, how many persons connected with the Immigration Department in North Sydney will participate in the proposed increase, and who are they?

Mr. ROCHE: We have an agent named Dooley at North Sydney who receives $1,100, so that he will not receive the $100 given to those receiving less than $1,000. There is a medical inspector who receives $1,000.

Mr. KYTE: Has there been some difficulty recently with regard to Newfoundlanders wishing to return to their country though the port of North Sydney?

Mr. ROCHE: There was some difficulty because of the Order in Council passed to prevent men of military age leaving Canada. An appeal was made in the case of Newfoundlanders, and I gave instructions to allow them to go to their own homes.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Was the seed supplied in Northern Alberta largely barley, or was it wheat, oats and barley, and what prices were paid?

Mr. ROCHE: Wheat, oats, barley and flax. We supplied 21,712 bushels of wheat at an average cost of $1.76 per bushel; of oats, 42,486 bushels, at an average cost of 67 cents; of barley, 1,696 bushels, at an average cost of $1.03 per bushel; and of flax, 533 bushels, at an average cost of $2.93 per bushel. As a matter of fact, most of the farmers purchased the seed from their neighbours.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I understood that in certain sections the homestead inspectors looked after the distribution of the seed grain, which largely consisted of oats in that locality, in the district west of Edmonton. Very little wheat went into that country. I understood that the average price paid for oats was over 75 cents per bushel.

Mr. ROCHE: I think the hon. gentleman is probably correct in regard to the oats that were purchased. A very trifling quantity of wheat was distributed in that district. I do not know the price paid in that locality, but I was quoting the price paid on all these distributions.

Scientific Institutions—Department of the Interior—Astronomical Surveys—To pay W. Simpson for special services performed at the Dominion Astronomical Observatory from May 1 to October 31, 1916, inclusive, $500.

Mr. ROCHE: This is an item to pay to Mr. W. Simpson, who was the assistant to the late Dr. King. An item was voted every year of $1,000 for payment for these particular duties. After Dr. King's death the duties were performed by Mr. W. Simpson. It is not an additional sum, but the balance of Dr. King's vote.

Mr. OLIVER: Who is discharging the duties performed by the late Dr. King?

Mr. ROCHE: Dr. King had a triple position. He was chief astronomer, chief commissioner of the Geodetic Survey and chief commissioner of the International Boundary Survey. There are very few men qualified technically to occupy the triple position which he occupied. He was a man of superior accomplishments and attainments, and it is most difficult to fill his position. However, in our treaty with the United States there was a provision that, in the event of the death of this officer, the position should be filled forthwith, and Dr. King's position on the International Boundary Survey was filled by Mr. J. J. McArthur, who was second in command, or, really, in command, of the field of the Geodetic Survey. He was appointed to the Boundary Survey, and he is also acting head of the Geodetic Survey. No appointment has been made to the position of chief astronomer as yet.

Mr. OLIVER: Might we express the hope that, under all the circumstances, in the future the expenditures in the Astronomical Survey Department will show a less rate of increase than they have through the past year?

Dominion Lands and Parks—Salaries of the Outside Service—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. ROCHE: This is to increase the salaries of the Dominion Lands Branch, in the outside service, similar to that in the Immigration Service, and with a similar increase to the inside service; that is $100 increase per year to all those receiving a salary of $1,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that increase continued from year to year?

Mr. ROCHE: No, not from year to year, it was an increase for this year.

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose some of them get more than others?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, some receive $65 a month, some $50 and some $55.

Mr. McKENZIE: But the increase would be proportionate to the salary they are receiving.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. Of course increases do not apply to all of them.

Dominion Lands and Parks—Salaries of the commissioners to be appointed under the Soldiers' Settlement Act of 1917 to assist returned soldiers in settling upon the land, $16,000.

Mr. ROCHE: This is to cover the salaries of the three commissioners to be appointed under the Soldiers' Settlement Bill which passed Parliament a few weeks ago, in which it was provided that three commissioners should be appointed for the administration of that Act, the chairman of which was to draw $6,000 per annum, and the other two commissioners $5,000 each.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Have these two commissioners been appointed yet?

Mr. ROCHE: No, the Bill has not yet received the Royal Assent.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Has the minister any idea who they might be?

Mr. ROCHE: Not the slightest. but I can assure my hon. friend they will be excellent men, because it is of great importance they should be.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Under no circumstances would they be partisans?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Union Government would appoint them?

Mr. ROCHE: I will not say too much about it, because perhaps I may not have much to do about the appointment.

Mr. McKENZIE: Six thousand dollars seems a large salary for a position of that kind. You require a person who knows the work well, and who would know the best place to settle these men and give them practical assistance, but it does not follow that the kind of man who usually gets $6,000 salary is the man for that sort of job. A judge of the Supreme Court gets $6,000, but he would be a very poor agent to settle soldiers in the Northwest. He would not have the qualifications for that kind of work. There may be a man who will earn the money, but it seems to me it is not the class of work that calls for such a high salary as $6,000 a year, which I suppose would carry travelling expenses, and other disbursements with it. I would like the minister to think over it, and see if, in view of present conditions, he could not get a man to do that work just as well as it could be done, with a smaller salary than $6,000 a year.

Mr. ROCHE: When the Soldiers' Settlement Bill was under discussion in the House, it was impressed upon me by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House how very essential it would be in order to make a success of this scheme, to have first-class men appointed. It was stated particularly by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) that the success of this scheme largely will depend upon the personnel of the commission. It will be difficult to get a first-class man, without paying a good salary, because it is not a life job, like a judgeship, and it will take whoever we may appoint away from his ordinary avocation in life for the time he has to devote to it. My own idea is that the soldiers should have the nomination of one of these commissioners. They have asked for that privilege, and I think it is a reasonable request. The soldiers should be made jointly responsible for the administration of the Act.

I am satisfied that amongst returned soldiers could be found men who would fill a place on this commission to the satisfaction of the soldiers and of the country as a whole. It is essential that one of the men should be a trained and experienced agriculturist, and that the other should be a financial man who has had considerable experience in the lending business. As the position will not last a lifetime, it is desirable that the salaries of both commissioners shall be commensurate with the duties to be performed.

Mr. McKENZIE: If you engage an educationalist or a man high in some profession to take up work of this kind—to deal with lands and new settlements in the West—it may be a new field of activity for him; he may have a good deal to learn. On the other hand, I would think that in the minister's department there would be men whose experience and training in connection with lands, settlement in the West and immigration would make their services exceedingly useful. I would suggest that he look over the list of men in his department whose experience and training qualify them for these positions.

Mr. OLIVER: Can the minister give the serial number of this particular commission in the list of those which have been appointed since the Government took office?

Mr. ROCHE: This one is not yet appointed.

Advance to soldiers settling upon the land, and cost of administering the Soldiers' Settlement Act, 1917, including clerical assistance, $2,500,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the minister received any application for advances under the Soldiers' Settlement Act?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, a number of applications have been received. We are awaiting the assent of His Excellency to the Bill and the appointment of the commission to administer the Act. We have put this amount in the Estimates with the idea that it will cover advances to those who locate on the land during the first year. We hope that we shall have to ask for more next session, because the larger the number of soldiers locating on the land the better for the country, as well as for the soldiers themselves.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the Government taken up the suggestion that I made on a previous occasion—that of expropriating unoccupied and unused lands contiguous to railways?

Mr. ROCHE: Some consideration was given to that matter; some soldiers' deputations presented that aspect of the case to the Government by way of resolution of returned soldiers' associations. After discussing the matter with representatives of returned soldiers who waited upon myself and other members of the Government, we put this before them: in view of the fact that we do not know how many soldiers may desire to locate upon land, it would not be desirable for the Government at this time to expropriate a large acreage of land and incur the expenditure that would be involved in such a transaction. Under present conditions, if the soldier does not desire to go on free homestead land in the western provinces, he has the opportunity of purchasing lands in any part of the country, and we will assist him financially to purchase or equip the land. We suggested that that would be much better than our buying the land, because if we bought the land some soldiers might be satisfied and others dissatisfied. Some might not care to locate in a particular province or in a particular part of a province. We suggested that, at any rate during the first year, any soldiers who had a little capital of their own and who desired to purchase land near transportation facilities and in a vicinity where population was comparatively dense might avail themselves of the privilege of selecting their own land and of receiving assistance from the Government by way of loan.

Mr. OLIVER: The limit of assistance to be that fixed by the Act?

Mr. ROCHE: That fixed by the Act.

Mr. OLIVER: In the case of the purchase of land, as I said on a previous occasion, the Government would be safe enough in making additional advances within the value of land that would give sufficient security. There would be no danger of loss to the Government if they made some additional advances towards the purchase of the land so long as they kept within the margin of value.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It would be interesting to know the terms upon which the minister proposes to make these advances. What will be the rate of interest and how much will be advanced to any one person?

Mr. ROCHE: That is provided in the Bill. The interest is 5 per cent and the maximum amount to be advanced to one applicant is $2,500.

Mr. ROSS: Was the rate of interest specified in the Bill?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Administration of the Northwest Game Act and the Migratory Birds Act, $10,000.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not familiar with the terms of the Migratory Birds Act, but I am inclined to believe that if this expenditure is intended to be applied to the enforcement of the Northwest Game Act, it is hardly a necessary expenditure, owing to present conditions.

To pay expenses connected with the moving of residences at Frank, Alberta, $5,000.

Mr. OLIVER: Is that matter still under consideration?

Mr. ROCHE: To pay expenses connected with the moving of residences at Frank, Alta. (Revote), $5,000.

The sum of $30,000 was voted in the Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year 1912-13 for this service, but as only a very small amount had been spent in that year, part of that sum was revoted in the fiscal years 1913-14, 1914-15 and 1915-16. No expenditures in this connection were incurred during 1916-17, but the secretary-treasurer of the town of Frank, Mr. T. Wilson, informed the department that the sum of $5,000 will probably be needed during the fiscal year 1917-18, and the same is accordingly asked as a revote. The sum of $20,150.96 has been paid up to this date, so that there is still a balance of $9,849.04 to be expended out of the amount originally voted.

In the spring of 1903 a landslide from Turtle mountain took place entailing the loss of seventy lives of people in the town of Frank, Alberta, together with the destruction of a large amount of property. According to recent observations, the danger of another landslide was found to be still more threatening, and it was decided to move the buildings from their present location to a safer site. A statement of the amounts of the contracts for moving the buildings has been prepared by Mr. Sterling who is looking after the interests of the provincial government, and the total cost will be $69,220, to be borne as follows:

By the Dominion Government	$30,000
By the Provincial Government	20,000
By the owners	19,220

This is the revote of the balance of the amount to be expended by the Dominion Government.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it intended to make a clearance of all the houses in danger, or is it just a matter left to the judgment of the owners of the houses?

Mr. ROCHE: The idea was to have all the houses cleared away from the old site to a safe site.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this a compulsory clearance, or is it a clearance in the discretion of the occupants?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not think there was any compulsion further than persuasion, but I think generally the owners have agreed to the movement. I do not know of any that have remained on the old site to run the risk of another land slide at some future date. We have had no necessity for using compulsion.

Mr. OLIVER: If houses are left in the vicinity of a mine, it is quite likely that people will occupy them, and, of course, the lives of these people will be in danger.

Mr. ROCHE: We have done our utmost to have the houses moved, and we are not financially liable if houses are destroyed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why are we moving the houses at all? Can the minister be induced to do some house moving in any other part of Canada than Alberta? What is the explanation of our paying for the moving of houses?

Mr. ROCHE: Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not take cognizance of the statement of the case that I made. This was an arrangement made between the Provincial Government of Alberta and the Dominion Government that they assume joint responsibility along with the owners for moving the houses away from a site which it was considered was dangerous for residence. Frank is a mining town, and it is absolutely necessary to have these houses moved away, because if they were allowed to remain there further loss of life might occur. The owners were not in a financial position to move their houses, and therefore, at the request of the Provincial Government, the Dominion Government and the Provincial Government assumed joint responsibility, the Dominion Government, the Provincial Government and the owners bearing a fair proportion of the cost of removal.

Mr. McKENZIE: In that part of the country from which I come, if a man starts a farm in a green forest, he has to make a clearing by cutting down the trees and he has to build a house. If he wants seed, he has to buy it. If he has not sufficient money, he has to go to the mines in order to earn enough money to buy seed. I find, however, that, in the West, not only does the Government build houses for the men, but if anything happens to a house, they will move it to another site, and if Providence happens to bring on a landslide, they will fix the landslide. If a man runs short of seed, they will buy it for him and, I suppose, put it into his barn. I am afraid our people in the East will find this out, and there will then be no need for any agent, the people will flock to this land of Canaan presided over by the Minister of the Interior. Has the minister any particular right to take our money and apply it to the removing of houses and the buying of seed without first asking our leave? That is a very nice thing to do, but the people in my district will be looking for the same privilege.

Mr. ROCHE: Parliament has already sanctioned this.

Indians—New Brunswick—to provide amount to repair road through the Edmunston Reserve, $600.

Mr. ROCHE: There was a mile of the municipal road passing through the Indian reserve, and it is being built jointly by the municipality and the department. The municipality builds the road; the department assumes a portion of the cost.

Civil Government—Department of the Interior—to promote the director of the Dominion Astrophysical Observatory to first division, subdivision A; to promote the assistant astronomer of the Dominion Astrophysical Observatory to second division, subdivision A, $5,400.

Mr. ROCHE: The sum is to promote Dr. J. S. Plaskett, D.Sc., F.R.S.C., from Subdivision B to Subdivision A of the First Division. Dr. Plaskett is in receipt of a salary at the rate of $2,800 per annum. He was appointed by an Order in Council dated April 10, 1917, director of the Astrophysical Observatory at Victoria, B.C., and, upon assuming his new duties, it is only fair that his salary be increased in accordance with the importance of the position to which he has been assigned. As the promotion of Dr. Plaskett is to be made above the minimum of Subdivision A of the First Division, it is necessary that the amount be specially provided in the Estimates.

Mr. OLIVER: The astronomical activities of our Government have taken a new phase, and, as usual, the new phase has added to the expenditure. I made a plea a little while ago with the view that changed conditions would tend to reduce expenditures in this particular department, but it appe rs that my hope was vain and we are having the usual increase of expenditures in this connection. We are, of course, all interested in the stars, but when it comes to a point that salaries are continually being boosted until there is no limit but the stars, that is not exactly the proper policy for war times.

Lighthouse and coast service—Amount required as compensation to G. F. S. Townsend for the second-hand compressors sold at auction in 1914 by agency of department in Halifax, which were inadvertently broken in yard before delivery to purchaser, $2,000.

Mr. HAZEN: The facts are these. In September, 1914, the department sold through its agent at Halifax to Mr. Frederick S. Townsend, of Halifax, for the sum of $748, which amount was paid to the department, eleven second-hand compressors, which were reported by the chief engineer's branch of the department to be of no further use in the service. Mr. Townsend claims he succeeded immediately after the purchase, at considerable expense in travelling, etc., in selling one of the compressors for $500, and had the sale of three others well advanced at a profit of about $900. When Mr. Townsend came to obtain delivery of the compressors, he found that employees of the Department of the Naval Service, who required some scrap in an emergency, had dismantled a number of the compressors and made use of parts, not knowing that they had been disposed of and were not the property of the department, and Mr. Townsend declined to accept delivery and requested to be reimbursed the amount of the purchase price, also loss of profit on sales, travelling expenses, interest on outlay and incidental expenses incurred. At that time both the Marine and Fisheries Department and the Naval Service were occupying the Naval Yard at Halifax. After the outbreak of war the yard was required for naval purposes entirely, and the Department of Marine and Fisheries was moved across to the other side of the harbour. The Naval Department, requiring some junk for certain purposes, took these compressors, not knowing that they had been sold to Mr. Townsend. After considerable correspondence, the department, on the 14th of July, 1916, offered Mr. Townsend, without prejudice, $1,500 in settlement of his claim, which offer he declined to accept, claiming that his loss was upward of $3,000, but on discussing the matter recently with the officers of the Department of the Naval Service and the Department of Marine and Fisheries he agreed to accept $2,500 in full settlement.

The purchasing agent considers that Mr. Townsend has a good and valid claim, but that in his opinion $2,000 would fully compensate him for all his loss, and he recommends the payment of this amount to Mr. Townsend. I have a report from the deputy minister concurring in that, and having looked into the matter myself, I think it is a fair and equitable settlement.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Who is Mr. Townsend?

Mr. HAZEN: He is a junk dealer in Halifax. I do not know him personally, but I have met him once, and once only, and that was when I was in Halifax in December last with Mr. Bennett. Mr. Townsend called on me then about the matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much did he pay for the compressors?

Mr. HAZEN:: He paid $748. We offered to settle for $1,500, but he refused that and asked for $2,500. After looking carefully into the matter, the purchasing agent thinks that $2,000 would be a fair settlement. This meets with the approval of the deputy minister, and also has my concurrence.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Did he buy these machines as junk?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He made a pretty good profit on them.

Mr. HAZEN: He made about $1,300. When the compressors were sold, tenders were asked for, and Mr. Townsend's was the highest.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It seems to me somebody has been very careless. In the first place, the goods were sold very much too cheap. If it turns out they are worth $2,000 they should not have been sold for $748. Having been sold, they should not have been taken by the Naval Department, but should have been set aside for the purchaser. Who was responsible for this blunder?

Mr. HAZEN:: I admit there was carelessness about the matter. The goods were sold by Mr. Harvey, who is our agent at Halifax and has been for a good many years past. I am not saying he was to blame. He represented to us that $748 was the best figure that could be got, and it was on his recommendation and report that the goods were sold. The trouble occurred through the two departments using the yard at that time. The compressors were lying in the yards until Townsend should take them, and the naval people, who wanted them for the purposes I have mentioned, thought they were junk and used them. I do not think they should have taken them without the consent of the agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department. There is no doubt in my mind that this is a legitimate claim, and that being the case, there is nothing to do but settle on the best terms possible.

Compassionate allowance to Mrs. Josephine Hilyard, widow of the late Charles Hilyard, formerly keeper of Head Harbour light and fog alarm, N.B., who was drowned on the 3rd

February last when proceeding from the fog alarm to the dwelling connected with the light, while in the performance of his duties, $500.

Mr. HAZEN: The facts are these: On the 3rd of February last the late keeper left his house at 1 a.m. to go to the fog alarm station, and after having performed his duties left the station at 5 a.m., and was drowned on his way back home. There was a gully between his dwelling house and the lighthouse, which at high tide was full of water. Mr. Hilyard used to cross on a ledge of rock, and this time he fell in and was drowned. He was employed in the department for about ten years, and during that time proved a very efficient employee, doing some repairs, etc., to the station which under ordinary circumstances would have required the sending of men from St. John agency to carry on the work, and thus saved hundreds of dollars to the department. The late keeper left a widow and one child seven years old. The widow is in poor health and poor financial circumstances.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think she should have been given more.

Mr. HAZEN: I am disposed to agree with my hon. friend. As we are giving a compassionate allowance I think it ought not to be less than $1,000. I am not quite sure as to the procedure, but if I may, I beg to move that this amount be increased to $1,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Another Estimate should be brought down.

Mr. HAZEN: I can bring down another Estimate.

To pay expenses of suit, etc., in the case of McGillivray vs. Kimber, Sydney Pilotage authority, $2,821.05.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) is familiar with this item. I have discussed the matter with him. The facts are these: In April, 1912, the pilotage authority of Sydney dismissed one of its pilots, John A. McGillivray, for misconduct. In March, 1914, McGillivray brought action against the pilotage authority for wrongful dismissal on the ground that the authority had not proceeded properly. On April 22 following, the action was tried at Sydney before Mr. Justice Drysdale who gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for $1,800 damages. An appeal was taken from that judgment. as the action of the pilotage authority in dismissing the pilot was upheld by the Department of Justice, which accordingly appealed the case to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. The Supreme Court of Nova Scotia unanimously reversed Mr. Justice Drysdale's judgment, and dismissed the action. The plaintiff then appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, and this appeal was allowed and the original judgment of Mr. Justice Drysdale was confirmed. The agent of the Department of Justice who had charge of the case, Mr. T. S. Rogers, K.C., of Halifax, urged an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and permission for such an appeal was actually obtained on condition that the appellants pay all costs, including those of the respondent as between solicitor and client, whether the appeal was successful or not. As the amount of the judgment was only about $1,800, and the costs would have come to nearly four times that amount, it was hardly considered good business to go on with the appeal. so the appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was not proceeded with owing to the very large expense it would entail and to the advice of the Deputy Minister of Justice that, while his own view of the case was unchanged, the success of an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was not free from doubt. The total amount of judgment and costs is $2,821.05, which I am asking Parliament to vote.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The amount to be voted includes the amount of the verdict?

Mr. HAZEN: It includes the amount of the verdict and the costs.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are we responsible for that?

Mr. HAZEN: We considered, after consultation with the Department of Justice, it was only fair and right that we should pay the amount.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I suppose the pilotage authority has no funds?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has it any control over the pilot?

Mr. HAZEN: It is like most of the pilot commissions, it can only pass by-laws and so on, and with the approval of the Governor in Council it puts those by-laws into effect. It conducts examinations of pilots, etc.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has it any funds?

Mr. HAZEN: I am not aware that it has.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am quite familiar with this pilotage commission, and they have no property or assets. The pilots are paid by dues which they get from the ships and which are divided up between them at the end of every month.

Ocean and River Service—Amount required to pay claims of Merryfield & Co., $242.23, and G. J. Frizzell, of Prince Rupert, B.C., $585.03, for provisions supplied to defaulting steward Alex. B. Gordon of the C.G.S. "Estevan," $827.26.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the meaning of that?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend will perhaps remember that at several other sessions we have had small amounts like this. Contracts were entered into with the stewards on board the Government steamers to supply meals to the officers and to the men at so much per meal. The "Estevan" is a buoy steamer belonging to the department, in the service on the Pacific coast. The contract was entered into with the steward, who unfortunately did not pay his bills to the merchants with whom he dealt. The merchants always held that as he wore a government uniform, and was on a government boat, the Government was responsible for his bills. Some years ago the system prevailed by which the department paid for everything; the steward contracted the bills, and the department paid them. It was found that that was a very expensive method, and it was changed to the system of entering into a contract with the steward at so much per meal. This effected a very large saving. When the change was made we put up notices in the different ports where these steamers were likely to be, to the effect that the Government was not responsible for bills contracted by those stewards, but in some cases these notices escaped the attention of the merchants. In some instances we took bonds for the faithful performance by the stewards of their duty. We could not get any guarantee company to accept the responsibility, so we had to take personal bondsmen. Those bondsmen are reported on by the agents of the department in the different places, and as far as possible we endeavour to get bondsmen who are satisfactory. We have proceeded against some of these bondsmen and they paid up. Unfortunately, in this case, the bondsmen met with business reverses and were not able to pay the amount.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why should not the captain do the business?

Mr. HAZEN: The contract is made with the steward, who purchases the supplies. The captain has to look after the management and navigation of the ship.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand that, but, usually in the ship business the captain has control of the whole thing.

Mr. HAZEN: That has not been the practice in the Marine Department for many years.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The old system has been abandoned.

Mr. HAZEN: It was abandoned because it was found to be a most extravagant practice, which led to a great deal of waste. The officials of the department were all against it, and the result of the change has been very satisfactory, and has effected a very considerable economy.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What became of the defaulting steward?

Mr. HAZEN: He cleared off, to the United States, I think .

Mr. SINCLAIR: Was he not prosecuted?

Mr. HAZEN: We placed the matter in the hands of the Department of Justice, asking that the necessary action be taken to recover the amount of these claims from the steward's sureties under the bond. These sureties were Annie Janet Gordon and Mary E. Luxton, respectively wife and sister-in-law of Gordon. Action was brought and judgment registered against the real estate in Victoria belonging to the defendants, but it was discovered that there were mortgages outstanding against the real estate. Perhaps under normal conditions there might have been a surplus after satisfying the mortgages, but there was a depression in the value of real estate all over the country, as my hon. friend knows, and the amount of the mortgage was practically the value of the real estate.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister say how the steward gets the money? Does the captain furnish the steward with money to purchase the supplies?

Mr. HAZEN: The steward is the contractor. His contract is fifty cents a meal for men and seventy-five cents for the officers. He is paid by the department.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is any precaution taken to guard against any recurrence of these troubles?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. One precaution is to publish at the ports where the vessel is likely to call an anouncement that the department will not be responsible for any debts contracted by the steward. We also try to secure a bond in the case of such steward. We tried to have a company do this but could not find one willing to undertake this class of business, so we have had to take individual bonds.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister will see how easy it would be for a steward to defraud merchants in a town. For instance, in my own town if a man in uniform from one of these ships entered a store he could have anything he wanted, as the storekeeper would think that the Government would be responsible.

Mr. HAZEN: We take all the precautions we can.

Arts and Agriculture, purchase of seed grain —Governor General's warrant, $500,000.

Mr. BURRELL: The first warrant was issued on October 7, 1916, before the opening of the session, for $400,000. The second for $800,000 was issued on December 14. It was then found that we were having large demands, not only from the West, but also from Eastern Canada, and that we would likely require more money for oats, so on March 23, during the recess, this Governor General's warrant for $500,000 was issued. We have now advanced $1,400,000 to the commissioner at Regina, the head of the Seed Purchasing Commission, and the total purchases amount to nearly that amount. We have turned into the Receiver General $1,401,299 up to August 21, and really have a surplus on hand. We shall make a considerable profit out of the transaction, although if the market had gone the other way we would have lost, as we sold at the purchasable price plus the cost of bagging, cleaning and handling. We have a surplus of 50,000 bushels of oats and some wheat which we are selling at commercial rates.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why were the Governor General's warrants issued at a time when Parliament was really in session? Parliament met in January, and in the following March $500,000 was drawn by Governor General's warrant. The minister must have known while Parliament was sitting that this money would be required.

Mr. BURRELL: No, it was only after the most thorough investigation by Mr. Clark, the seed commissioner, that we found that the demand would be so strong that we would need the additional warrant.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why did not the money drawn in September by Governor General's warrant appear in the main Estimates?

Mr. BURRELL: As a matter of fact, I find that it appeared in the Supplementary Estimates of the previous year, 1916-17.

Mr. OLIVER: The full explanaion given by the minister will be a sufficient warrant for the questions and the insistence of the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles). It was an important transaction, and it was very desirable that the House should be informed.

Mr. BURRELL: I thoroughly appreciate that.

Mr. McKENZIE: Have all moneys advanced for the purchase of grain been returned?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, and a little in addition. We shall make a profit on the transaction.

Civil Government—Department of Agriculture—To provide for increase in salary of the assistant deputy minister and secretary, and assistant deputy minister of patents to $4,000, $250; to provide for the promotion of M. J. Morison from Third Division, subdivision A to Second Division, subdivision B, $1,250; to provide for three clerkships in First Division, subdivision A, $8,400—$9,900.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it usual to make provision for the increase of civil servants in the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. BURRELL: Mr. Morison's case was not taken into consideration as it should have been in the main Estimates. We thought Sir Thomas White's Bill might have included this officer. He has been in the employment of the Government since 1890, and was placed in subdivision A of the Third Division at $1,100 as a third-class clerk.

He had an exceedingly good record, and, as he obtained his clerkship by Order in Council in 1890, through being specially named in the estimates submitted to Parliament the previous session, he does not come under the provisions of Sir Thomas White's Bill for promotion. It seems to be one of those cases where a man has had an absolutely good record, but is not qualified under the Act, and we simply ask by this increase to put him where he would have been. I think the officer of the department says he is a specially deserving official, and has been in the department a long time. Without this procedure he could not get this increase.

Mr. McKENZIE: I want to bring to the notice of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries a precedent for the suggestion I made a few minutes ago, that we should increase the compassionate allowance of that woman in New Brunswick. I find on page 6 of the Estimates that a man lost his life under similar circumstances in the service of the Government, and his widow is getting $1,500. I suppose a man in New Brunswick is just as good as a man in Prince Edward Island.

Canadian Government Railways — rolling stock, purchase of steamers McKee and Drummond—to provide for building of two wooden ships, $26,620,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: This item is for 100 engines and 600 cars.

Mr. OLIVER: The House is very, very thin to consider such a large item. For my own part, I am just as well prepared to consider these large items now as any time, and accept the minister's explanation, but would it not be possible for the minister to select less important items than this one, and put them through, and not take up these large items, which some might desire to discuss.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think there is not a member in the House who does not want more equipment on the railroad. When the main items were being considered I think these items were all explained. We were asked if we had placed orders for these, and we said we had.

Mr. OLIVER: I quite agree that it is a proper proposal to increase the rolling stock, but very few members who take a deep interest in the matter are present. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is not here.

Mr. COCHRANE: Let it stand.

Welland Ship Canal—construction—revote, $1,020,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: This is a revote of what was left over last year on the Welland ship canal. There are some accounts to straighten up yet, and I do not think we have used it all. The amount was in the Estimates last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the work been stopped?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes. The amount is $1,000,000, but we do not propose to use that.

Railway Subsidy—To the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway, for a subsidy for a branch line from a point on its line as located, situated near the Spirit River settlement, to and through the Grand Prairie Land District, Alberta, for a distance not exceeding sixty miles; on the same terms and conditions as subsidies were granted in aid of the construction of certain railways as embodied in the Act 3-4, Geo. V., Cap. 46, 1913—revote, $258,797.16.

Mr. COCHRANE: This is a subsidy voted for that road that was built to Grande Prairie last year and the contractor had not completed the road in time to get the full subsidy. I do not know whether he has completed it yet or not. We have not had an examination of it lately, but this is really a revote of last year's amount.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much of this has been built?

Mr. COCHRANE: It was all built, but not all ballasted, before the Estimates expired last year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the length of it?

Mr. COCHRANE: About 60 miles.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does it belong to the Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, it belongs to J. A. McArthur.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This is a subsidy?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, voted last year, and this is only a revote of what had not then been earned.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This is the only railway subsidy this year?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: The road is built on provincial government guarantee, but owing to the urgency of the case, in the year 1915 it was decided, I believe, by this Government to give a subsidy to aid in the construction of this branch, in order to rush the branch into the Grande Prairie settlement.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, there was a large number of settlers in there, they had a considerable quantity of grain, and they could not get it out without this road.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some people have left the county of Rouville to settle at Grande Prairie, and I have been told that they consider it one of the most fertile regions of the Northwest.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will this build the road?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes. He had not finished the road, and had not earned the money, but we expect he will finish it this summer.

Mr. OLIVER: The road has been in operation since the spring of 1916 to Grand Prairie City. The rails have been laid for the full length, but, as the minister said, the road is not finally completed, and has not been ballasted, and I suppose, on that account, the contractor is not entitled to the subsidy.

Rideau Canal—towards construction of bridge on the Rideau Canal at Pretoria Avenue, Ottawa—revote, $8,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: This is for a bridge in Ottawa. This money was voted last year, and they did not complete the bridge and could not get the subsidy. The justification for the subsidy is this: there was an old bridge there; we had to employ men to open it to allow steamers to go through. They are building a new high level bridge now, and by voting the subsidy we get rid of the annual expenditure.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the city pay any part of it?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, they pay the larger part of it. We gave $40,000; I think the bridge is to cost something like $160,000.

Compassionate allowance to the widow of the late Andrew Ryan, who was killed while in the performance of his duties as switchman on the Transcontinental Railway, December 22, 1916, $2,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: Ryan was acting as a switchman on December 22 last. It appears that he fell off the car and a train backed over him. He leaves a wife and two children—a boy four years old and a girl nine months old—in very poor circumstances.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen, the House adjourned at 10.34 p.m.

Saturday, August 25, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

A FIXED PRICE FOR WHEAT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to refer to a matter in regard to which I asked the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce a question yesterday. Is the fixed price of wheat until August 31 applicable only to the wheat of last year's crop, or is it applicable to new wheat coming forward?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Old and new.

[Mr. Cochrane.]

Mr. OLIVER: At what date did that proposition take effect? I want to draw the minister's attention to the fact that on the 24th the cash price of No. 1 and No. 2 Northern wheat in Winnipeg was $2.40, No. 3 Northern, $2.38. In Minneapolis, No. 1 Northern, $2.60 to $2.65, and No. 2 Northern $2.55 to $2.60.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The order took effect, as far as the price and inclusion of the new crop is concerned, on the date of the promulgation of the order, somewhere between the 15th and 20th of the month. I forget the exact date.

Mr. OLIVER: It was the date I wanted to get.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will remember that I read the orders and they were placed on Hansard about ten days ago.

RELEASE OF THOMAS KELLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I notice in the Citizen this morning a statement that Thomas Kelly who was sentenced to some two years and a half in the Stoney Mountain penitentiary, on the verdict rendered at the Manitoba Assize Court, has been given ticket-of-leave by the Minister of Justice. Some days ago I asked that hon. gentleman (Mr. Doherty) if any petitions had been received by the Department of Justice, and he answered in the negative. gentleman (Mr. Doherty) if any petitions since, and is there any correspondence in the matter to be laid on the Table of the House? If Kelly has been given a ticket-of-leave on account of his health, I ask that the medical certificates be laid on the Table of the House.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I think the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me, if he apprehended that I had said that there had been no petitions for the release of Kelly. Petitions were received at different times. Since the hon. member referred to the matter on a former occasion, it has been represented to us that Kelly's health was in such a condition that there was actual danger of death. We had previously received representations with regard to his health. Since he has been confined to the penitentiary it has been necessary to hold him under medical treatment all the time, and the penitentiary surgeon, who unfortunately died recently, some time ago expressed the decided opinion that Kelly should be released. I have not the dates of his last report on the subject, but I think it was in June. He had previously reported in April, and I think even before that, expressing his opinion that Kelly should be released. His last report was to the effect that he would not take the responsibility of his being longer detained, and we caused Mr. Kelly to be examined in March or April, I think, by Dr. Lafleur, of Montreal, who, I think, the hon. gentleman knows, is a very eminent gentleman in his profession, and, as a consequence of his report, we did not feel justified in acting upon the report of the jail surgeon. But quite recently it was reported to us, as I have said, that the prisoner was in such a condition that there was danger of his death. Upon that information coming to us, which came through members of his family, who had been gathered at the penitentiary by reason of his critical condition, I caused the prisoner to be examined by Dr. Popham, of Winnipeg, a physician of very high standing, who, I am quite satisfied, is above any suspicion of expressing an opinion other than his genuine professional opinion. He reported that he found Kelly in bed suffering from gastritis, with a very high temperature—I forget exactly what it was—and rapidly losing in strength; also that Kelly had lost weight really to an alarming extent, I cannot mention just now the number of pounds, and there was no prospect of improvement under existing conditions. Under those circumstances I felt that I should entirely fail in my duty if I did not recommend that Kelly should be transferred to a hospital, where he could receive proper treatment. I made that recommendation and a ticket-of-leave for that purpose was issued. Should Mr. Kelly recover, the question, of course, would remain open as to whether he should not be returned to the penitentiary, or whether further action should be taken. But certainly the circumstances left it beyond doubt, I think, that no other course was open to us that to allow this man to have the treatment that, upon high medical professional recommendation, was considered necessary for the preservation of his life

WELLAND CANAL DYNAMITERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Some years ago three men were sentenced—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member wishes to ask further questions with respect to Kelly, I respectfully submit that he should put them upon the Order Paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to ask with respect to Kelly. Some years ago three men were condemned to long terms for attempting to blow up the Welland canal. I understand that they have been released by the Minister of Justice. Will he say when?

Mr. DOHERTY: One of the men was released by a higher Authority than the Minister of Justice—he died in the penitentiary. The second was released, I could not say accurately when, but I think some two or three years ago. The last one was released, I think, about a year ago. I shall be glad to get the exact dates. The two men were released after having served terms very much longer than those served by men in the Mother Country for like offences whose sentences were also commuted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They were sentenced to twenty years?

Mr. DOHERTY: Speaking from memory, I think they were sentenced for life.

PRIVILEGE—MR. SINCLAIR.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I rise to a question of privilege. I do not often refer to anything that I find in the newspapers, but when the newspapers get astray to the extent of $350,000,000, I suppose we ought to pull them up and put them right. I have been represented in the Ottawa Journal as saying that if the Canadian Northern Railway Bill went through it would increase the public debt to the extent of $800,000,000. I never made any such statement. I was replying to the statement of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), that the soldiers were doing a great deal of thinking, inferring that when they came home they would insist on some necessary reforms. I ventured to say in reply that when the soldiers went away the public debt of this country was $350,000,000, roughly speaking; that if we put this Bill through, the public debt when the soldiers returned would be $800,000,000, meaning that there would be an addition of $450,000,000, and not an addition of $800,000,000 as stated by the Journal. The other question was whether that debt was a net debt or a gross debt. That depends largely on how you look at it. At present the road is not paying interest and running expenses, and I inferred that under public ownership it would not do any better, so that if the people of this country have to tax themselves for the interest on the $450,000,000 we might as well at once add that amount to our net debt, as that is what it would mean. All I have to say about the writer in the Journal is that if he read what was said in Hansard he either intentionally misconstrued what I said or else was too wooden-headed to understand plain English.

MUNITIONS CONTRACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am sure that many hon. gentlemen have heard from many portions of the country where munitions work is being carried on that instructions have been sent out to discontinue the manufacture of munitions. In various places in my province this word has been received from the Imperial Munitions Board. As it has been said that the financing of this board has been done by this Government, it is a matter of importance that the country should know why it is that the manufacture of shells has been stopped. Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce would tell us, in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I should prefer that the full answer be given by the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister, but if there be any stoppage of the manufacture of shells in this country or any diminution, as I believe there is to be, it is because the variety of shell the manufacture of which will be diminished or discontinued is not now needed from Canada, as they are able to produce them in sufficient quantities in Great Britain.

Mr. MACDONALD: I should like a fuller statement, because I do not think my right hon. friend's statement is complete.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I said I could not make a full statement.

METHOD OF PRESENTING INQUIRIES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Militia. He is not in his place, but as the question would necessitate his referring to the records in his office, I shall place it on Hansard in order that he may see it. I am in receipt of a letter from a correspondent, a constituent of mine—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman will put his question on the Order Paper the answer will be forthcoming as quickly as if he asked it in the House, inasmuch as, in the absence of the minister, an answer cannot now be given.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is quite in order that I should ask the Government—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has himself admitted that an answer cannot be forthcoming to-day. I would therefore ask that he should proceed in the regular way.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Department of Railways and Canals—Canadian Government Railways, rolling stock, $25,000,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: This vote is to provide for the purchasing of fifty engines from the Montreal Locomotive Works—thirty Mikados at $48,750, ten Santa Fes at $56,000, and ten Pacifics at $47,300. Then there are to be purchased fifty locomotives from the Canadian Locomotive Works, Kingston, at $48,750. There are also 6,000 box cars, as follows:

1,000, 40-ton steel-frame box cars purchased from Canadian Car and Foundry Company at $2,417 each; 1,000, 40-ton steel-frame box cars purchased from Eastern Car Company at $2,417 each; 2,000, 40-ton steel-frame box cars purchased from Canadian Car and Foundry Company at $2,647.50 each; 1,000, 30-ton steel-frame stock cars purchased from Canadian Car and Foundry Company at $2,271 each; 1,000, 40-ton steel-frame box cars purchased from the National Steel Car Company of Hamilton at $2,647.50 each.

Then there are fourteen 10-wheel Chicago Great Western Railway second-hand locomotives amounting to $4,748,700 for further purchase of rolling stock that may be required.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does that rolling stock consist of?

Mr. COCHRANE: Freight cars.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is that for the Canadian Northern or only for the Transcontinental and Intercolonial?

Mr. COCHRANE: What we purpose doing is to use what is necessary on the Government roads and then distribute the rest where necessary.

Mr. MACDONALD: That means on the Canadian Northern?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Have those contracts been already let in anticipation of this vote?

Mr. COCHRANE: Contracts for 6,000 cars have been let.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When are deliveries to take place?

Mr. COCHRANE: They are all to be delivered before 1st February next. The deliveries are to start in October.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have those cars been ordered in Canada?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the price of a box car now, and what was the price before the war?

Mr. COCHRANE: For the same style of car, the price before the war was about $2,200; the price now is $2,647.50.

Mr. OLIVER: Did I understand the minister to say that a part of this rolling stock was intended to supplement the present rolling stock of the Canadian Northern?

Mr. COCHRANE: I said that we would use what was necessary on the Government roads and then distribute the rest where it was most needed on the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. There is a great shortage of equipment on all the railways.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister's present action is in accordance with the position taken by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) some two years ago, that we should order more rolling stock. The minister has put off doing so to a very late date, and I question whether he will be able, in view of the difficulty of getting raw material, to secure delivery of those cars by the first of February. The minister states that he has purchased some second-hand rolling stock in the United States. From whom was that purchased, and what was the price per locomotive and per car?

Mr. COCHRANE: We purchased fourteen second-hand locomotives from the Chicago Great Western railway at $12,300 each, or about one-quarter of what we are paying now.

Mr. COPP: Can the minister give us the dates of the contracts for these locomotives and cars?

Mr. COCHRANE: The first contract was let in May; the last was let about a month or six weeks ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Were any second-hand cars bought in Chicago?

Mr. COCHRANE: Not in Chicago, in Ohio.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What were they?

Mr. COCHRANE: We bought 400 steel cars in Ohio at $450 each. I am sorry to say we have received only 100 of them. and there is a little difficulty in getting the balance.

Mr. MACDONALD: In addition to that, some second-hand passenger cars were purchased?

Mr. COCHRANE: That was last year.

Mr. MACDONALD: No second-hand passenger cars are to be purchased out of this appropriation?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there any provision for the purchase of second-hand passenger cars?

Mr. COCHRANE: Not this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the Government building any rolling stock in Canada? We have most excellent workshops at Moncton; we have workshops at Quebec in connection with the Transcontinental——

Mr. COCHRANE: They are not equipped.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then they ought to be equipped. At Transcona we have very large workshops. Is the Government engaged in building any locomotives or cars at any of those places?

Mr. COCHRANE: We are building some vans at both Moncton and Transcona.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Those would be conductors' vans.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, and we are doing repairs. It is difficult to keep up with the repairs on the system at the present time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What are the Transcona shops being used for now?

Mr. COCHRANE: For repairs, not only for the Government railways, but for the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It was rumoured some two years ago, or perhaps later than that, that a portion of the Transcona shops had been leased to a company for the manufacture of shells. Is that correct?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are shells being manufactured there?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does that interfere with the construction of locomotives and cars?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: About what portion of the Transcona shops are being utilized for building these vans and for repair work for the railway, and what portion for making shells?

Mr. COCHRANE: A very small portion is being used for making shells. I have not the exact floor space.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who are the lessees of that portion of the Transcona shops?

Mr. COCHRANE: A Montreal concern. I do not know who they are.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was the contract made with the Department of Railways?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, it was made with the Grand Trunk Pacific before it was taken over.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who pays the rent and what rent is being paid?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not that information with me, but I will get it for the hon. member.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am rather curious to know who the parties are who have leased those shops and the rent that is being paid.

Mr. COCHRANE: The information was laid on the Table in a return last session.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should be glad if the minister would get it from his officials.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will do it.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the committee should be informed as to how much of this large amount of rolling stock is required by the present Government railways—the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental. I understand from the minister that part of this rolling stock is to be used on the Government railways, and part distributed between the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. That is a very general statement, and may cover the fact that possibly 50 or 75 per cent of this $25,000,000 for rolling stock should properly be added to the liability the country is about to assume in respect to the Canadian Northern. The minister, I am sure, will be able to tell us what the requirements of the Government railways are, so that we may know in fact how much of this amount is being added to the Bill for the Canadian Northern.

Mr. COCHRANE: It has been estimated by my officials that we will need all the cars ourselves on the Government railways, with the exception of possibly two thousand these two thousand together with any others we may have to spare, will be used in helping out not only the Canadian Northern but other railways. The Grand Trunk, as everybody knows, is very short in equipment, as regards both power and cars. An arrangement has been made between the railways of Canada and the coal shippers of the United States whereby cars bringing coal to this country will be returned to the United States empty. The shippers of stone and gravel in different parts of Ontario are in consequence unable to get cars, and they have been here asking us to buy equipment and lease it to the Grand Trunk.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to criticise the minister for buying these cars; quite the contrary, rather I agree with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that it would have been sound policy to buy this rolling stock sooner. Nor do I find fault with the policy of leasing the rolling stock to railways that are not able to provide their own equipment. All I wanted to know was how much of this expenditure should be added to the bill for the Canadian Northern. My hon. friend says that two thousand of these cars will not be required on the Government railways. If the cars cost $2,500 apiece, I may be correct in saying that this expenditure of $5,000,000 should be added to what we are to pay for the purchase of the Canadian Northern. I am not finding fault with the minister for providing this equipment for the different roads, but we should be informed how much it will cost as regards the Canadian Northern and the other roads.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister speaks of the distribution of cars among the different railways. I quite agree that that is desirable. I think it is greatly to be regretted that the Government waited till three years after the war before taking any steps in this direction.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is not a single year in which we have not bought rolling stock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister ought to have bought rolling stock. The Government roads and other railways have been continually short of equipment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), a few days ago, referred to the most admirable arrangement that has been made in the United States, where the railways have joined together and appointed a small executive, which, so far as transportation is concerned, makes all the railways of that country, some eighty-five in number, into one system for all practical purposes. The executive has control of the distribution of the cars, and the minister stated that very satisfactory results had followed from that arrangement. But there was one thing he failed to point out, though I pointed it out myself some few weeks ago, and that is that the railway companies were induced to take that action by the Government of the United States. It was the Government of that country that, immediately on the breaking out of the war, summoned in conference the presidents of all the railway companies of the United States, and it was at the insistent request of the Government that this arrangement was entered into. I am very sorry, and I think it is very much against the transportation interests of the country that the same thing was not done in Canada when the war broke out. The government railways, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific, and any other smaller railways—and there are some in Canada—should all have been parties to an arrangement whereby rolling stock could be placed by a small executive where it was most needed in order to meet the transportation requirements of the country, just as is done in the United States. However, it is never too late to do good, and I am very glad that at last, following the example of the United States, the Government is moving along these lines, even if only a very short way.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am sure my hon. friend has overlooked one fact, namely, that the railways in the United States are solvent. The railways now being operated by Mr. Willard are not railroads in the hands of receivers. If they were in the hands of receivers the conditions to which my hon. friend refers would not obtain. As the Grand Trunk Pacific railway last year earned less money by operation than it required for the hiring of its equipment, and as the Canadian Northern was behind from $5,000,000 to $7,000,000 in net revenue to supply its fixed charges, the difficulty of operating in the manner indicated by my hon. friend must be very apparent and very great, because each company is out now to get all the profit it can, in an endeavour to meet its fixed charges. And the competition that obtains here does not obtain to the same extent and in the same manner in the United States. There the presidents of the different roads got together, and Mr. Willard was appointed chairman of a small executive. Under his direction cars are allocated to certain lines for certain purposes, but not to interfere with the revenues of the different roads. But where you have so much duplication, where two systems are not earning fixed charges, and the other system is earning enough to pay the fixed charges of both, the situation is difficult to deal with, unless the Canadian Pacific is willing to part with some of its money. It is perfectly obvious that you would have to take part of the net revenue of the Canadian Pacific Railway obtained from the carrying of traffic, passenger and freight, at fixed rates common to all roads as determined by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and pay it over to the other two roads to make up their deficit. That is the position; it is very unfortunate, but that is the fact.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think my hon. friend has exaggerated the difficulties. If the executive in the United States takes rolling stock from one road and sends it to carry the traffic of another, there would necessarily be allowed to the company whose cars were taken a reasonable per diem remuneration for the cars so used; and that is how it would work out in Canada.

Mr. COPP: How many of these six thousand cars are being made by the Canada Car Company?

Mr. COCHRANE: Four thousand.

Mr. COPP: Who has the contract for the other two thousand?

Mr. COCHRANE: The National Car Company and the Eastern Car Company are making one thousand each.

Mr. COPP: I understood the minister to say that one part of the contract was let in May and another part about a month ago.

Mr. COCHRANE: One contract was let in May, to the Eastern Car Company, and the other to the Canada Car Company.

Mr. COPP: Are any of the cars under that contract ready for delivery at the present time? Is delivery being made as the cars are built?

Mr. COCHRANE: The first cars will be delivered in October.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to revert to a discussion which I had with the minister some time ago in regard to the lifting of rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Edmonton. We had somewhat warm words then, and the minister very strongly impressed upon the House and the country that the rails of the Transcontinental were of a certain size and boring, which obliged him to take rails from the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Edmonton, although it would have been more in accord with public policy if they had been taken from the Canadian Northern. I understand the Government has taken up the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific and has replaced some of them with Canadian Northern rails, the reason being that although the Canadian Northern rails are of the same weight and quality they are bored somewhat differently and for that reason it was not advisable that they should be sent to England, inasmuch as they would have to be laid under fire, and there was a disadvantage in the possibility that the rails might not match. I think the minister made some remarks which reflected upon my patriotism and interest in the success of our endeavours in Europe, but of this I will not say anything further. I have a letter from a man who is employed in a railway battalion in France, and it may interest the House and the country to know what he has to say on this subject. He says:

> The Huns left Bapaume on the 17th of March, and not only was the town wrecked but the railway was more than wrecked. What rails he left he blew up at the joints, which broke the end of each rail. Where there was a deep fill it was mined and lifted out and the road bed was practically a line of shell holes. Well, we had a train of ammunition in on Easter Sunday and it was moved up in trucks. We had to use all kinds of rails, short and long, large and small. The engines here are not as heavy as the ones at home, so we can use light rails, and the great guns are mounted on thirty wheels and reach over one or more rails and some twelve joints in the car, so they play around the sharp curves as easy as a regular car, and as their heft is distributed over so much rail it allows us to use a light rail or anything we have. I was in the shops rebuilding fishplates to join up the different size rails. We had a lot of rails from England that have a ball on either side and no base. They are set in castings called chairs. We joined up all this sort of steel and got the trains going and pushed the road on towards the front. When the train got in there was no limit to material. Rails poured in from everywhere. Ties and bridge timber piled up like small mountains. There was no lack of such material.

I think under the circumstances, and with that evidence, it will be clear that there was no warrant for the minister's suggestion that it was necessary to exchange the Grand Trunk Pacific rails for Canadian Northern rails or to take the Grand Trunk Pacific rails.

Mr. COCHRANE: All I can say is that we followed the instructions received from the British Government. I think they know what they want. In any event, I am prepared to give them what they ask, as long as we have it.

Mr. MURPHY: The item under discussion is an item of $25,000,000 for the purchase of rolling stock. I think the minister exp'ained that a portion of this is to provide funds for the purchase of some 6,000 freight cars, the price for which is stated to be about $2,600 each, I believe. May I ask if that is the order that was given to Rhodes, Curry & Company?

Mr. COCHRANE: They are the same as the Canada Car Company.

Mr. MURPHY: When is delivery of those cars to be made?

Mr. COCHRANE: From October to 1st February. They are all to be delivered by 1st Februray next.

Mr. MURPHY: My inquiry, as the minister may surmise, is based on the fact that these are war prices. My recollection of previous purchases leads me to think that the prices now being paid are double or more than double what they were.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, that is not the case.

Mr. MURPHY: If those deliveries were to run after the war, the purchase could not be justified as a good business transaction. However, if the whole 6,000 are to be delivered before February next, it is a different matter.

Mr. COCHRANE: The contract is that they shall all be delivered by February next. Of course, there are three different concerns building those cars. The Canada Car Company is only building 4,000, the Eastern Car Company 1,000, and the National Car Company 1,000.

Mr. COPP: I would like to draw the attention of the minister to a question I put before him when his regular estimates were under discussion, with regard to the relaying of the rails to the Sackville and Dorchester wharves. Since the matter was up before I have received a letter from a gentleman in Dorchester who is particularly interested in it. I will not place the letter on Hansard, but I would be glad to send it to the minister for his attention. This gentleman is manager of a large stone company down there which is using the wharf for the transportation of stone. He says "if some such thing as this is not done the Dorchester Stone Works Company will be put out of business." The stone is quarried and cut during the summer, and it is absolutely impossible to ship it until the rails are relaid.

Mr. COCHRANE: Will my hon. friend tell me if they can get boats to bring the stone there now? I understand they cannot.

Mr. COPP: I am not sure. I simply mention this letter to bring the matter to the attention of the minister. There is a sketch attached to the letter showing that the relaying of about 200 yards of rail would be sufficient to obviate the necessity of hauling the stone over some very heavy hills.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the minister any plans in regard to increasing the rolling stock in the refrigerator service for the transportation of fish? This question was brought to the attention of the minister by a committee of this House last year, and it was urged that something should be done. It was pointed out that the Intercolonial railway was not in a position to carry perishable products of that kind by express from the East to Montreal and Toronto. There is a special interest in the transportation of fish at the present time when it is proposed that there should be two meatless days every week. The cities of Ontario have to be supplied with fresh fish, I suppose, either from the Pacific ocean or from the Atlantic. The facilities are certainly not good at the present time. It is a reproach to the Intercolonial railway that, after it has been running for nearly half a century, it is not possible to-day to send a package of fresh fish in a refrigerator car from Eastern Canada to any of the cities in Ontario. If we wish to send a whole carload there are facilities for it either by express or by fast freight; but I am referring now to smaller packages for which there are no facilities in refrigerator cars. I do not know whether the minister is working out any plan to meet that want or not, but when we are embarking upon the expenditure of a large amount for rolling stock, I would like that matter to be kept in view.

Mr. COCHRANE: We have ordered 100 refrigerator cars and I think they are delivered; if not they will be delivered before the end of the month.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does this include the purchase of any private cars?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have seen in the press quite recently that different ministers have been obtaining private cars, and, among them, the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid). He is the latest minister to have a private car. I would ask if that car has been purchased and is being looked after by the Department of Railways and Canals, or whether it was purchased directly by the Department of Customs and is being looked after by the officials of that department?

Mr. COCHRANE: He has no car. He uses a car once in a while the same as any other minister, but the car he uses belongs to the country and is controlled by the Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How many private cars does the Government have at the present time?

Mr. COCHRANE: Six, including the Governor General's car.

Mr. CARROLL: What officials in the service of the department does the minister consider entitled to private cars?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know that any of the officials of the department use private cars except officials on the railway.

Mr. CARROLL: What officials on the railway are entitled to private cars?

Mr. COCHRANE: Certain of them.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the minister think that in times like these, when the people are being urged by the Government to produce and save, it is right that the superintendent of a certain section of the railway should spend $150 or $200 a day of the country's money rolling around in a private car when he could, just as well as the ordinary citizen, be carried in a Pullman. Private cars are attached to the ordinary trains making them much heavier and delaying ordinary passenger traffic. It is time that the department of railways should give this matter attention. It is not fair to the country or the travelling public that an ordinary superintendent of the railway, who is neither a king nor a peer, should be entitled to this kind of entertainment with cooks, servants and everything that a millionaire could get by his money.

4 p.m.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman certainly knows better. He is making statements that are nothing but foolishness. There is not a railway superintendent on any railway in the country who does not have a private car. It is his home, his office, his sleeping apartment, his everything, and it is impossible for a superintendent to do his work without one either on the Intercolonial or any other road in Canada. If the Government is going to be in the railway business it must follow the practice adopted on all railways.

Mr. CARROLL: I may be foolish and know nothing about railways, but I do know that we are told by members of the Government from the Prime Minister down that this is a time when public money should not be spent recklessly. I do not think it is a proper answer to make to an hon. member of this House, however humble he may be, that he is foolish and does not understand what he is talking about. I have travelled over the Intercolonial too much not to know what is going on. I think that the Minister of Railways owes ordinary courtesy to a member of this House who asks a question in good faith.

Mr. KYTE: Have under-secretaries equally the use of private cars with members of the Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the under-secretary of one department has had a car once or twice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Which department?

Mr. COCHRANE: Militia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When the minister said that the Government had six private cars he meant, I presume, that they had six in addition to the cars which are used by officials at headquarters at Moncton?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes; these are official cars.

Mr. PUGSLEY: These six cars are just for the use of those whose headquarters are in Ottawa?

[Mr. Carroll.]

Mr. COCHRANE: Two of them belong to the Governor General.

Mr. KYTE: I do not think the minister quite apprehended my question. I asked him if the under-secretaries had equally the use of private cars with the ministers?

Mr. COCHRANE: I said one under-secretary had had one once.

Mr. KYTE: To say that an under-secretary had one once is not an answer to my question. Assuming that an under-secretary desired the use of a private car, could he have the use of it?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, if there was one available.

Mr. KYTE: When an under-secretary wishes to travel in state and comfort, he has the right to use a private car if a private car is available?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: And the cost which is involved in the transportation of a private car is borne by the Government and not by the under-secretary?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, and it is borne by every railway in the country, too.

Mr. KYTE: Railways have not under-secretaries, as a rule, who travel in private cars.

Mr. COPP: Apparently the minister misunderstood the question asked by my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll). He asked him as to the number of cars which were in use by officials on the Intercolonial. I presume he misunderstood the question, because he answered by saying that the superintendents should have private cars. Inasmuch as we have the information in regard to the number of private cars kept for the use of the Government, it would be well that the committee should know how many private cars are in use by officials of the Intercolonial and what officials are entitled to the use of these cars.

Mr. COCHRANE: The general manager, the general superintendent, and each of the superintendents have private cars. It is good business to give them private cars, too. They do all their work on these cars; they live in them, practically. This is not a new system; it is the system that has been in use for years and years not only on the Intercolonial, but on every road in this country.

Mr. COPP: I am not raising the point as to whether it is good business or not.

How many district superintendents are there?

Mr. COCHRANE: Four.

Mr. COPP: Who have private cars at Moncton? I am not in a position to speak positively, but I understood the general traffic manager also had a private car.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think so.

Mr. COPP: He always used one. Mr. Tiffin had one.

Mr. COCHRANE: In olden times, not now.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the hon. minister said there were six private cars belonging to the Government. How many have we secured since the Government came into power?

Mr. COCHRANE: Two.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it permissible for a minister's private secretary to use a pricate car?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, but the private secretaries have a right to go with the ministers.

Mr. KNOWLES: But are they used by the secretaries when the minister is not present?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know.

Mr. BURNHAM: Are these not office cars?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. BURNHAM: They are not private cars, but office cars. When one of these cars goes through back townships, the people think that the ministers are travelling in luxury. As a matter of fact, they are office cars, and if the hon. members of the Opposition would refer to them as office cars a great deal of the difficulty would be smoothed over.

Mr. KYTE: This would be a good time to obtain further information as to the policy of the department with regard to private cars. Heretofore, we have had a certain number of Cabinet ministers, but the number has been increased from time to time until we have now, I think, sixteen. It is conceded that they have the right to use private cars when they desire to travel that way. A new policy has been adopted of appointing under-secretaries, and I should like to know if, when they desire to travel, they are to have the use of private cars at public expense quite irrespective of whether or not they are travelling on public business. The Minister of Railways stated on one or two occasions that the Under Secretary of the Militia Department travelled in a private car. I should like to know if on any occasion the Under Secretary of the Militia Department desired to make a trip to the Maritime Provinces, would he, as a matter of right, have a private car at his disposal, and have the cost of transportation in that way paid by the Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: I made the statement two or three times that if a private car were available I thought he would have the right to use it.

Mr. KYTE: The minister made the statement. I naturally thought that that implied that if the under secretary desired to use the car on public business he would have the right to it. I infer that the minister goes further, and that he means that the under secretary, no matter whether he is travelling on public, or private business, has the right to travel in a private car—and his family, of course.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister know whether any members of the Railway Commission of Canada ever go so far as to accept the present of a private car from an incorporated railway company while they are on personal trips, such as holidays?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not any information as to that. They have their own car, at any rate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would they have the right to have their own car hauled free on private business, such as a holiday trip?

Mr. COCHRANE: The different railways furnish the Board of Railway Commissioners with passage all the time, and I think they are willing to haul the cars, whether on business or pleasure, but I have not any information on that point.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the hon. gentleman look into it, if he has time?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know why I should.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was going to give the reason for my question. It may be foolish, but I must discharge my duty. I do not think the Board of Railway Commissioners should be under obligation to any railway. They are in a judicial position.

Mr. COCHRANE: Perhaps a member of Parliament should not be under obligation.

Mr. KNOWLES: Two blacks do not make a white.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have the right to travel free by law.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, and that is another matter.

Mr. COCHRANE: The members made the law, not the railways.

Mr. KNOWLES: I may go a long way with the minister, and I might say that the members, might for their own self-respect pay the money to the railway companies for fares, and if the people wanted to reimburse them, let them do so. I hold the view that the Board of Railway Commissioners should not accept any personal favours from any railway. They are adjudicating upon matters in which one of the contestants is the railway company and the other may be a comparatively unknown and obscure citizen. An official whose position calls upon him to discharge duties in an impartial manner should not be under the slightest obligation to either of the litigants. If my view commends itself to the minister and if he finds that the practice is what I have indicated. I think he should look upon it with disfavour. Will the minister look into the matter and give it consideration?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think I will. I do not think it is my business to look into it. I have perfect faith in the Board of Railway Commissioners, and anything they take in the way of transportation from the railways would not have much effect on them.

Mr. KNOWLES: They are human, like every one else. I am not going to attack them. They are not here, but, in defence of the public interest there should be rules laid down so that there would be no suggestion of anything like their receiving favours from the railways, I would go further, and although the reason does not apply so strongly, I would say that judges who are acting, where railways are litigants, should not accept favours. It is the constant duty of the Railway Commission to hold the scales of justice evenly between the railway companies and private citizens.

Mr. COCHRANE: And it is the duty of legislators to legislate for the railways. You take a pass from the railway company, and still you are kicking.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. KNOWLES: No. I never took a pass, that I recollect.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman is the exception.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The point raised by the hon. member for Moosejaw is one that has engaged the attention of legislatures and Congress of the United States. The statutes of most of the western states prohibit any legislator from accepting transportation, and when I was entitled to transportation on some of the roads by reason of my professional engagements, I used to have to sign a statement that I was not a member of any legislature of any state through which the road in question passed. In most of the western states, if not all of them, there are now statutes absolutely prohibiting any member of the legislature from accepting transportation, and rendering liable not only the railway company which gives the transportation but also the recipient as well. In the United States they have the Interstate Commerce Commission, which performs to some extent the functions of our Board of Railway Commissioners, and very drastic and extreme regulations have been passed by that commission. I quite agree with the hon. member for Moosejaw that we should enact legislation. It is not for the Minister of Railways to do it; it is for us here, and for the Railway Committee if they so desire in dealing with the Railway Act, to declare that no transportation shall be issued to judges, if you please, or to others. It would be competent, and probably not improper, for Parliament to declare that no public servant, and no one occupying the position of a judge in the cases mentioned by the hon. member for Moosejaw, should receive favours from railway companies. The same argument could be applied to telegraph companies, and in that case my hon. friend from Moosejaw could not be the recipient of any form of pass that would entitle him to free service on the part of the telegraph company or the railway. That is the point he is making, and if hon. gentlemen will read the volumes and volumes of discussion which took place in the United States until they reached the point they have now attained, I think it will be found that the question is really worthy of consideration by Parliament. Not that I think it has any effect on the minds of the judges themselves; I do not think it has; but it leaves the public in the position of the poor litigant with the idea that he is being unfairly treated, and that men are biased against him by reason of what they receive, which is a bad feeling to have in the country. It will be remembered that before the introduction of the present Railway Act every member had an annual pass, and I believe the late Minister of Railways was right and the Government was right in declaring that every member of Parliament should have free transportation on the railways, in order to remove the possibility of it being said that a favour was being extended to one member by a railway company which was not extended to another, because in some instances, if a man became vigorous in his onslaughts against a railway company, that company claimed the right to withdraw his transportation. That was the evil aimed at by the present legislation, which I think is sound, unless you pass a statute prohibiting railways from issuing transportation to a member of any legislature. If members of Parliament are to receive free transportation, it must be by Act of Parliament; if not, the railway companies must be subjected to heavy fines for issuing transportation to members.

As to private cars, the Canadian Pacific railway supplies each district superintendent with a small car. It is marked on the end "business" or "official." It is usually without a name and has only a number. That is a greater workshop than the room a man has in any terminal of the road. Counting up the hours of the district superintendent—there are three districts centering in Calgary, and I have the facts from district superintendents—he spends more hours in his car in a year than in his office and his home. Then you come to the divisional superintendent, and he has a car. His duty is to control not only one division but several. One division superintendent—they have now changed the name as between districts and divisions—who is now assistant general manager of eastern lines, one year showed me his mileage. He had travelled in a year more than the distance around the world, on his car day and night. He could not do his business without that car. The business of the railway could not be done without these cars. If the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the pursuance of sound business principles, supplies officers with cars, I think that the country must do the same with its officers, or fail in its duty. The higher officials are supposed to use official cars on official business; but in practice, if an official of the Canadian Pacific railway wants to go on his holiday, he takes his car with him. If Mr. Hall of Winnipeg wished to go the coast he would take his car, and if Mr. Tiffin, for instance, wants to go to St. Andrews he, of course, takes a car. It is one of the perquisites they enjoy. The salaries in this country are so insignificant as compared with those paid in other countries, that if you add the whole thing together, it is not a high salary for a railway man.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Intercolonial salaries have become pretty generous.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The salary paid to Mr. Gutelius was $5,000 less than he now enjoys. He is employed on a shorter road. The Delaware and Hudson took him over. There is no reason why I should not tell this story to illustrate the attitude of public men towards these matters. There was once a prime minister of Canada who conceived the idea that he would like to have great business men operating the Intercolonial and he suggested to the greatest living railway man then in Canada the necessity and the desirability of getting these men. He said: You know I would not mind paying $5,000 a year for such a man. That distinguished railway man replied: If you will give me a hundred of them at that price I will take them to-morrow, because you cannot get railway men for $20,000 a year or $25,000 a year. The president of one road in this country, who is now dead, was employed by the Southern Pacific at $55,000 a year, as was made known in certain threatened ligitation. That was under the late Mr. Harriman. It is not uncommon to see the president of a railway receiving $100,000 a year. That is a large salary, but if we are to conduct business in this country—and we are going to have now a very large mileage; we shall probably shortly see operating 15,000 miles of rails—we must supply our officials with the same sort of accommodation as men in similar service on other railways enjoy. And we must pay salaries suitable to men who assume such large responsibilities. We cannot get away from that. It is not pleasant to contemplate, but it must be done. I have thought it unfair for members to go into the back sections of the country and complain of the payment of these salaries. One is no better than the other. If we were in opposition and you were in power we would probably be doing the same thing.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the hon. gentleman should speak for himself.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am glad that I am not able to speak for my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), because I should be sorry to think that I would give expression to some of his ideas. Human nature is human nature, and those in opposition are necessarily making capital against the Government of the day; but it is fair to say that we should educate the people of this country into the belief, even in the country districts, that men discharging large responsibilities for the Government must be paid what they are paid by private enterprise, and that the same facilities that are provided for the conducting of private business must be provided to carry on the public business. To point out that this man has a private car and some one else has some other kind of car, serves no useful purpose. The official car is useful for the proper discharge of the duties of the officials, and I think that the House should agree in that view and let it be understood that, so far as we are able, we propose to put this country behind our servants, because they are our servants, for the purpose of doing the best that is possible for the country. One, of course, expects these discussions. They are always incident to the passing of estimates, but I do not think they serve any useful purpose.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am inclined to think my hon. friend is encouraging the establishment of an era of extravagance in the public service. Take the manager of the Intercolonial. There has been no better manager, no more successful or satisfactory manager, than Mr. Pottinger, and Mr. Pottinger's salary, I think, during the thirty-five or forty years he was connected with the railway, never exceeded $6,000 a year. When the Minister of Railways came to appoint a manager he took Mr. Gutelius, who, I am satisfied, had never received over $10,000, and gave him a salary of $20,000 a year.

Mr. COCHRANE: Another road took him at $25,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That may be. Perhaps there may be reasons. That road desires intimate connections with the Intercolonial. That road has an opportunity to get traffic originating in northern New Brunswick, of getting the traffic between the Intercolonial and New England points.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The Delaware and Hudson does not even touch it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In connection with the Quebec Central?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My hon. friend's geography is as bad as his facts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps I am wrong, but, at all events, we know that Mr. Gutelius never gave the same satisfaction—nothing like the same satisfaction to the public—as Mr. Pottinger gave.

Mr. COCHRANE: He did not do the same business either.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not believe Mr. Gutelius managed the road better than Mr. Pottinger.

Mr. KYTE: Not as well.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And Mr. Pottinger did not have the same wrecks on the Intercolonial either—I say it advisedly—that we have had since Mr. Gutelius became manager. This Government has certainly entered upon an era of extravagance. All their officials are receiving much higher salaries than were paid previously. I think that Sir Collingwood Schreiber never received, during all the years he served under the late Government, upwards of $6,000 a year, although he was one of the best railroad engineers in the country and occupied the position of deputy minister, and chief engineer of the Government system of railways. I do not think that in this country, it is necessary to give these extravagant salaries. I believe good men—the very best men—can be secured to perform the duties of these positions just as satisfactorily as these high-priced men, for salaries not very much higher than those that have been paid during the last fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. KNOWLES: Inasmuch as the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) said that this matter was raised for political purposes, I desire to say that in that respect I plead not guilty. When an estimate like this is under discussion, hon. members are surely justified in asking whether any of the money is to be used for the purchase of private cars or not. The Government must not be too touchy in regard to questions that are asked. We are asking questions in order to get information to which we have a perfect right. The number of private cars this Government is purchasing may be quite justifiable. The question is whether it is a matter of economy for Government officials to have private cars or not. If it is, then they should have them, but the number of private cars may increase so as to become a nuisance. As one of my hon. friends on this side of the House said, these private cars are a great inconvenience to the ordinary traveller on a railway. Not long ago I was travelling on the Canadian Northern to Toronto, and I wanted to make connections through Toronto to Winnipeg. I found three private cars attached to the train. There was no need of those three cars at all; two of them were not occupied by the men who owned them. That, of course, was their business, and not mine, as the railway was not a government-owned line. The private car question, like any other question, is one that is quite justified so far as it is reasonable, but beyond that it becomes an abuse. When we have every parliamentary under-secretary running around the country in a private car, and any man on the railway commission sending out a private car with his wife and children to the seaside, that is a thing that should be stopped; it is vicious at the foundation; it is a loss of economy, and it has a bad influence on those receiving favours who should not accept them. I do not know why the minister said so much about hon. members of this House using passes. I suppose he meant our railway certificates under the Railway Act. I have travelled in that sense on what he calls a pass. What I had in mind was the real pass. The minister surely did not mean to suggest that I had bothered him for passes, because I never did so. I never used any on his railway, either for myself or any one else. If my wife got one, I promise the minister I will send it back.

Mr. COCHRANE: I was not alluding to that.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister spoke as though he meant that I was trying to get passes.

Mr. COCHRANE: I was speaking about the members' certificates; I was not alluding to anything else.

Canadian Government Railways—purchase of steamers "McKee" and "Drummond," $1,020,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. COCHRANE: They are two steamers we bought for the purpose of carrying coal from Sydney to Lévis. One was bought for $515,000, and the other for $505,000. They have been on that work ever since.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Were they purchased in England?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, in this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are they second-hand steamers?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes. One was bought from the Algoma Central Company and the other from the company of which Mr. James Playfair is president—I forget the name of the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the tonnage and the age of each steamer?

Mr. COCHRANE: They were built in 1908. The tonnage is 3,400 tons.

Mr. COPP: They are carrying coal for use on the Intercolonial?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Canadian Government Railways—to provide for building of two wooden ships, $600,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. COCHRANE: We let contracts for two wooden ships to be built at North Vancouver, one contract to Wallace Shipyards, Limited, and the other to Harrison & Lamond, of Vancouver. The price was $230,000 in each case. Those contracts were let some time ago, but both firms cancelled them, refusing to go on with them. They claimed that the price was altogether too low. We have not made any other arrangements for the construction of these ships since then, but we hope to be able to get two boats. The idea was to put on these two boats to run between Vancouver, Halifax and St. John, and also down to Bermuda.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Were tenders called for the vessels?

Mr. COCHRANE: We asked for tenders from the different shipyards, and these firms signed contracts, but they have since cancelled them and refused to build the ships.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If it is decided to go on with the construction of these vessels, I hope the minister will call for tenders in a public way, instead of inviting tenders from the owners of a few shipyards. In that way the East will have an opportunity of tendering as well as the West.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the tonnage to be?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is 2,500 tons each.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What power would they have?

Mr. COCHRANE: Gasoline engines.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the Diesel engine, I suppose?

Mr. COCHRANE: Oil engines. They will use sails as well.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the minister now anticipating that there will be an increase in cost which will bring the total up to $600,000?

Mr. COCHRANE: They won't take them on any other terms except cost plus ten per cent.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there any information as to the standing of these firms? Had they built many ships before taking this contract?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Wallace Shipbuilding Company have had several contracts.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that the firm Mr. Bowser is a director in?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am informed he is. Would they not have to put up a deposit on a contract like this?

Mr. COCHRANE: They refused to put up a deposit.

Mr. KNOWLES: The contract was entered into by the Government without a deposit?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it not unusual for the minister to invite people to enter into a contract and for the contract to be let without any deposit being made?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: May I not get a promise from the minister that if he goes on with the construction of vessels he will call for tenders on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think that is a fair proposition.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I remember correctly, Mr. Bowser at the time of the election was making considerable political capital out of the fact that he had arranged for the carrying on of this industry in British Columbia, and he himself was a director of this company.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have never heard that in any shape or form.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As I understand it, these vessels are intended to ply from Atlantic ports like St. John and Halifax in winter, and Montreal in the summer—

Mr. COCHRANE: Not from Montreal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: From Atlantic ports, we will say, and to pass through the Panama Canal on to the Pacific coast, making regular voyages between Eastern and Western Canada via the canal. So there is no reason why tenders should not be called for on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is true.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the financial standing of this company? How was it they were let off so easily? How much paid-up capital have they?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister mean to say that he entered into a contract without any deposit being made, and without inquiring into the financial standing of the company.

Mr. COCHRANE: We were perfectly safe without a deposit, because we were to pay them on progress estimates, and we would have had a capable man there to report to us from month to month the progress they were making. So it was not necessary to get a deposit.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to respectfully criticise the minister's view. If the public service demands that there should be ships, the public service demands that a contract should be entered into which there is reasonable ground to believe will be carried out. If we need ships, we should not play with the business. In this case, certain men in a certain place had the option of going ahead with a contract or throwing it up. If they saw they could make a profit they could go ahead, and if, after looking into the matter carefully, they thought they could not make a profit, they could throw up the contract. If the minister lays that down as the established policy of the Government, even with the poor financial head that I have I could be a millionaire in a very short time. I could simply pick and choose between the contracts, going on with this one here if I could make a profit, and dropping that one there if I could not make money on it. If the minister never bothered to enforce the contract it would be nice pickings. I think we have here a dangerous precedent, which is not altogether unlike the principle laid down in Winnipeg, where a minister, finding that the contractor had tendered for a little less amount than would see him through, paid the difference.

Mr. COCHRANE: But I have not.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is just the reverse of that. In this case, the man is let off without being called to account. If it happened that the figure was one which subsequent fluctuations of the market with regard to labour and material justified him carrying on, he would have the option of making a very profitable deal with the Government. On the other hand, he could never lose, because if the market fluctuated against him he could throw up the contract. It is altogether to the disadvantage of the Government to do business in that way, and I wish to place myself on record to that effect.

Mr. STEVENS: In justice to the minister and to the firm who failed to carry out their contract, it should be pointed out that just subsequent to the letting of this contract the Munitions Board entered into the business of building wooden ships in British Columbia and other parts of Canada and secured practical control of the material entering into the building of ships. There were only a limited number of mills in British Columbia capable of sawing the timber necessary for certain parts of these ships, and the Munitions Board immediately arranged for the control of the output of these mills, with the result that many shipbuilding firms were unable to get material for their private work or for work in connection with Government contracts.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the Munitions Board deliberately interfered with the securing of supplies by these shipbuilding firms who were going to build for the Government? Or did the board incidentally and accidentally take the material away from them?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman's word "deliberately" implies malicious intent.

Mr. KNOWLES: Let us say, forseeing the results.

Mr. STEVENS: In any event, the results were the same. The Munitions Board found, and it has been found, I think, in the United States in the construction of wooden ships there, that the only satisfactory basis on which to let the contracts is, cost plus a percentage. The fluctuation in the price of materials makes it impossible to gauge the price with any accuracy. The Wallace firm entered into this contract because it already was constructing ships for a private concern—the Brown-Carruthers group, who were building under a British Columbia law which gave them a bonus. By the time the negotiations with the Wallace firm were completed, the Munitions Board had entered the field and materials had risen in value to an enormous degree, and it would have resulted in very serious loss to the Wallace firm if the Government had insisted on the exact terms of the contract. I do not think any member of this House desires to take advantage of a commercial firm because of abnormal conditions. I would point out that, having in mind such a case as this, the British Government clothed itself with statutory power to enable it to allow a contractor to abandon his contract without loss, if he could show that he had to abandon it on account of the peculiar conditions arising out of the war.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not the case here.

Mr. STEVENS: We have not such a law here, but it is a very reasonable precedent to follow.

Mr. KNOWLES: Those are not the circumstances here at all. The minister cancelled the contract without knowing anything about it. He knew nothing about the financial standing of the company.

Mr. STEVENS: He is one of the wisest ministers here, and I think he knows pretty well what he is doing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps he was guided by the wise head of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) who knows the right thing to do from a political standpoint when it is necessary. I would presume that my hon. friend from Vancouver had suggested to these gentlemen: I will see the minister and get him to let you out, and then you can get a contract at cost plus ten per cent.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. STEVENS: It is absolutely without foundation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have ten plus in the estimate all right.

Some hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The original contract was for $460,000 and we find an estimate now for $600,000, so the minister has the ten plus in his mind.

Mr. COCHRANE: I certainly have not. I refused to do it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then the minister was requested to do it by my hon. friend?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, not by my hon. friend; by the people themselves, and by the board of trade out there; and I refused to do it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it is a peculiar condition of affairs that the minister should voluntarily allow a contracting firm which engaged to build two vessels for the Government and which is under legal obligation to carry out its agreement to abandon its contract. It is evidently a very reliable firm, otherwise it would not have contracts with the Imperial Munitions Board. This is such a peculiar condition of affairs that the minister should give some explanation to the House, and I think he should bring down the contracts and the correspondence before he asks the committee to pass this item. Of course, it is all very well for us to show our sympathies, but still a contract is a contract, a bargain is a bargain. This strong financial company undertook to build those vessels, and entered into a binding contract. The minister had so much faith in them that he did not require them to put up a deposit, as he always does and as every minister does in respect of public works, which deposit would be forfeited if the contractor failed to carry out his contract. The minister chose to trust them, and he took their contract. They are bound in law to carry it out. The minister has seen fit to release them from this contract, and he finds now that he will have to pay a very much larger sum in order to get the vessels built, and is providing in his Estimates a very much larger amount than the original contract called for. I think under those circumstances the minister should not ask the committee to pass this item until the contract and the correspondence are before us. I was greatly surprised at the statement of my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) that the Munitions Board has taken charge of the output of the mills. That is not what they do, according to the information given me by the director of the Munitions Board. Such a thing as that was not suggested. It is only that they require to know that the contracting firm will have a reasonably satisfactory opportunity of securing timber; but that the Imperial Munitions Board commandeers the output of any mills or any manufacturers of lumber is something I do not believe.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not make that statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, my hon. friend said they had taken charge of the output of the mills thereby preventing the Wallace Shipbuilding Company from carrying out its contract with the Government. I was greatly surprised to hear that statement because it is entirely contrary to what I understood has been the practice of the Munitions Board. In the city of St. John a contract was given by the Munitions Board for the building of two vessels, and the contractors got their timber where they could or where they pleased. The Munitions Board does not undertake to supply timber. The contractor has to supply it himself, and I am quite satisfied, unless my hon. friend is able to assure the committee to the contrary, that the matter of securing timber is a matter entirely up to the contracting firm. If the Wallace Shipbuilding Company has taken a contract from the Munitions Board at cost plus, under which they are absolutely sure of getting the cost of building and ten per cent, I am quite sure it is they and not the Munitions Board who control the output of those mills and that they have voluntarily taken a more profitable contract and given up the contract they had with this Government, and the Government has voluntarily released them.

Mr. STEVENS: The Wallace shipyards have no contract from the Munitions Board for wooden ships. They had contracts for steel ships, and they have already launched one or two. They had contracts which, I think, are about completed now from a private firm for wooden ships. As to the Munitions Board commandeering the lumber, I never made any such statement. What I said was that when the Munitions Board entered the field, before the construction of those vessels commenced, they arranged for the output of certain mills which were the only mills able to cut certain long timbers required in the construction of those vessels.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do I understand they arranged with the mill- owners?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under contract with the millowners?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know whether it was under contract, or how it was done. They arranged with the millowners so that they controlled the full amount of the output. Those mills are cutting to capacity, not only for British Columbia shipbuilding, but for shipyards in Eastern Canada as well.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will agree to put a copy of the contract and of the correspondence on the Table.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the meantime we should let this stand.

Mr. COCHRANE: What is the use of letting it stand?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Because when we get this information we may take an entirely different view of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stewart) I may say the resolution has already been formally passed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, Mr. Chairman. It has been informally passed.

The CHAIRMAN: Formally passed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The only item which was passed on to-day was $25,000,000 for rolling stock.

The CHAIRMAN: There is only one resolution, and the resolution has been formally passed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Some time ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: To-day?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, Mr. Chairman. The only item under consideration to-day was the item for rolling stock.

Mr. COCHRANE: The boats are under consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The item under consideration was for rolling stock. Then we came to the purchase of the two steamers, McKee and Drummond. Now we have reached the third item. It will not do to take that position, because we have been discussing these items, and we must insist upon our right to discuss them.

The CHAIRMAN: I only take what is before me.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then what you have before you, Sir, is a mistake. The minister knows perfectly well that since we have been here this afternoon we have been discussing rolling stock, and we are now discussing the building of two wooden ships. I remember once a lawyer in New Brunswick continued to argue after the magistrate had adjourned the court. He said: "Am I addressing an adjourned court?" The magistrate said: "You certainly am." If that applies, we have been addressing the committee upon items long after they have been passed. I think you had better reverse your judgment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot. The resolution has already passed, and is marked so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That cannot be.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend had better let it go as passed. He knows he is only doing a lot of very nice and skilful feeling. He has all the information his head can hold, and more than he can digest. He will get the contracts and the correspondence, and then if he wants to raise a row about it he can do so. But, what is the use of holding up such a very large item as this for a little information with reference to a contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The $25,000,000 item has been passed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The resolution can only be passed as a whole, and the Chairman seems to have taken it that it was passed, and so marked it. My hon. friend who is in the Chair now cannot go back on what he finds in the record. My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) will make it easy for the Chairman who was, and for the present Chairman, if he will simply allow the item to pass as the committee understands it has been passed, and he will get the information later.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like very much to oblige my right hon. friend, but at the same time there are certain rules of procedure which we must follow. Take, for instance. the Public Works item; he will find a hundred sub-items under one general heading. The practice is always to take them sub-item by sub-item and each one is passed separately. The mere fact of the passing of one sub-item does not mean that all are passed. If the chairman has got it wrong, we must get him right. My right hon. friend asks us to treat as passed a sub-item that has never been under consideration at all.

Mr. COCHRANE: You have been talking about it for over half an hour.

Mr. PUGSLEY: About the question of ships?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We were, but the chairman has brought us up with a round, short and sharp turn, and he tells us that we are out of order and that all these items have been passed because we considered this one sub-item. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) speaks of this as a small thing. Six hundred thousand dollars a small thing? My right hon. friend has become so accustomed in recent months to thinking in millions, and hundreds of millions, in connection with the Canadian Northern railway and other matters that this item of $600,000 is a mere bagatelle, a fleabite. The difficulty about this matter is that if the Minister of Railways gets all his items through we may not see him again during the session. The session cannot last much longer now.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think I have been here pretty regularly during the session.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, my hon. friend has. but he has been waiting to get his Estimates through and when he gets them through we may not see him again. It is always objectionable to allow an item to go through before important papers and contracts have been brought down. When I was Minister of Public Works the present Minister of Trade and Commerce would not allow me to get a vote through for a public building until I had brought down all the plans. I remember that on one occasion I had to bring down a cartload of plans prepared by the different architects and lay them on the Table. He seems to have changed his ideas as to the proper thing to do. I leave it to him whether it is unreasonable to ask that we should have the contract. This is a most extraordinary situation. I do not believe there is another minister who would assume for a moment that the committee would absolve him from blame in having relieved a substantial firm from a binding contract or would permit him to get the item passed without giving the House the contract and correspondence which, in his opinion, warranted him in taking 5 p.m. such an extraordinary course. I appeal to my right hon. friend—my economical and prudent friend, a man who was supposed to be the watch-dog over the actions of his colleagues, the one man who was supposed to be in the past extraordinarily economical, who watched every penny of public money to see that it was not wasted—to say whether the action of the minister (Mr. Cochrane) is justifiable or not. Here my right hon. friend is face to face with the fact that this Government has thrown away $100,000 of the money of the people and has relieved a perfectly substantial shipbuilding firm from the performance of its contract when the minister knows that he will have to pay $100,000 to have that contract carried out.

Mr. COCHRANE: He has not to do anything of the kind.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He may abandon it altogether. I assume that when the minister asked for the money last year he did so on the understanding that it was in the public interest that these ships would be built.

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not ask for it last year. This is the first time I have asked for it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Or the year before?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, never before.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, last session, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) who was acting for the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) asked for it.

Mr. COCHRANE: He did not ask for anything for shipbuilding.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I very distinctly remember the statement that we were going to acquire two vessels for the purpose of carrying freight between the east and the west of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: That was early this session.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The matter came up this session?

Mr. STEVENS: It came up early in the session in the budget debate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then the position is that the minister entered into a binding contract on behalf of the Government for two ships without any vote from Parliament?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That strikes me as even more reprehensible.

Mr. COCHRANE: All right, but my hon. friend carried on the same practice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, never; that would be an unheard of thing when the late Government was in power. Did the minister, without any vote of Parliament, actually enter into a contract in which he pledged the people to pay $460,000 for two ships? Is that what the minister says? Yet he says that we must pass this item and he refuses to give us any information.

Mr. CROTHERS: Did not the Government of which you were a member enter into a contract for the construction of the Transcontinental railway without the consent of Parliament?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No; that was subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, but you entered into the contract before you submitted it to Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, it was subject to the approval of Parliament. That is often done. The Government of Sir John Macdonald entered into a contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway but it was subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. CROTHERS: This is subject to the approval of Parliament too.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all. Does the minister say that the contract is subject to the approval of Parliament? What does the minister say about that? He says nothing. Under these circumstances I think the contract really had better be brought down before the vote is passed.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am willing to bring the contract down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Bring it down before we pass this vote?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, why should I?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why should you not? We are here acting for the people of this country. We have evidence before us that the minister without any authority from Parliament, entered into a contract which while it was binding on the Crown, was not binding on the Wallace Shipbuilding Company under which they pledged themselves to build two ships for $230,000 each, or $460.000 for both.

Mr. COCHRANE: We will let the item drop if you like.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not like to have you do that.

Mr. COCHRANE: You cannot have every thing your own way.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not have many things my own way; it is not often that I can persuade the minister to do anything like that. Perhaps after all the minister had better drop it. In war times we should not spend money unless it is necessary. It would be a very good idea to drop it. But I do not ask him to do that if he will bring down the contract.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will bring it down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Bring it down before we pass this item.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, the item is passed. I will bring down a copy of the contract on Monday.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before this item passes?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, the item is passed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I must differ from my hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: I have to insist that this item is passed. That is what I find before me. If the minister and the committee are willing that the discussion should go on, I have no objection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This item was not passed. You were not here, Mr. Chairman, but everybody who was here knows that it was not passed.

The CHAIRMAN: These are the resolutions, and a resolution can only be put in this place after it is carried. The items are discussed, the resolution is put before the committee and is carried, and that disposes of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That never was done.

The CHAIRMAN: That is what the record shows.

Mr. KYTE: There is another matter requiring further consideration. That is the standing of the Wallace Shipbuilding Company. I have a recollection that the corporation and the personnel of that company cut some figure in British Columbia politics during the period of the provincial election a year ago. I think it was stated in the press at the time that this company, which had had a corporate entity for some years, had not done any business, but suddenly became revived during the progress of the provincial election campaign and my recollection also is that ex-Premier Bowser appeared as a director of that company, and, inasmuch as that company purported to do business with the provincial government, ex-Premier Bowser had to retire from the directorship. I recollect having obtained that information from a perusal of the press of British Columbia a year ago, and I think it would be well if the minister would give the committee some information as to the financial standing and the responsibility of that company, as well as the names of the directors, with whom the Government purported to do business under the contract referred to.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think there is no doubt this item is not carried. We all understand it. On the succeeding page you will find bracketed together perhaps a dozen items, and the clerk runs them off one at a time. It does not follow that, because the first of those items is passed the last one is passed, nor does it follow in this instance, that because two items are passed, the third item is passed. The committee assented, after a discussion not at all unreasonable, to the $25,000,000 rolling stock, and the item we now have before us is to provide for the building of two wooden ships. There is no minister whose estimates I would more willingly expedite, than those of the Minister of Railways. I like the way he administers his department. I think he administers it, on the whole, pretty fairly, and in a manly way; but in this instance I feel that he has information in his possession that we should have before we consent to this item. In the first place, he entered into a contract before Parliament authorized the expenditure of the money, which, in itself, is an unusual and abnormal way of doing business. The normal way is that the expenditure is first authorized and the money voted by Parliament and then the minister is entrusted with the details of making the necessary contract. In this instance, the minister has taken upon himself to anticipate the approval of Parliament, an unusual position, and, therefore, not one in which we are to be less careful than usual, but more careful, and the minister should be the last to ask us to do anything which might be approaching a loose way of doing business. If I were to undertake the responsibility of acting in an emergency for a principal I should think that was the very case where the fullest disclosure should be made to the principal and I should not say to him: "Here, you ratify that, and when I get ready I will bring down the reasons which compelled me to take the course I took." I think the unreasonableness this afternoon is not on this side of the House in asking that all these things be disclosed to us before we ratify what our agent has done, because the minister, after all, is the agent of Parliament in the expenditure of money. More than that, there are the very exceptional circumstances under which the contract was allowed to lapse; there must surely be some further explanation of that. The explanation given by the hon. member for Vancouver is no explanation at all. Let us suppose that the condition of affairs had been reversed, and that the price, instead of proving non-attractive, had proved very attractive to the contractors, would they have excused, forgiven and released the Government? Are we handling immense sums of the people's money so as to give the person at the other end every favour and consideration? Would the minister do that if it were his own business in Sudbury, Sault Ste. Marie, Toronto, or anywhere else? No, he would not. If he had taken his chances on the rise or fall of the market, on the increase in the supply or demand of an article, and the party at the other end of the contract, with his eyes wide open, had taken his chances, if the developments in that commodity had been in favour of the minister's end, so that he found his bargain a profitable one to him, he would be the last man in the world to release the man at the other end. He would say: "Some day I will get stuck myself; it will be all in a life time. You take your medicine now and I will take mine at some other time." There should be some further explanation than what has been given as to why the Government released this company in such a very easy way. No reason was suggested until the hon. member for Vancouver strolled into the Chamber. He had so plausible good-natured, calm an explanation, like pouring oil on the troubled waters—and yet when you come to examine it, it does not amount to anything. He says that the Munitions Board and the Government wanted something to be built which required long timbers and the demand for long timbers was increased and while nobody controlled the material—the Munitions Board did not commandeer it—yet by some chance those who had the material saw an opportunity of making a better deal with the Munitions Board, and the contract was allowed to lapse. But what is the serious aspect of it all? It is this—that in this great struggle in which we are engaged it was found, that it was necessary that we should have wooden ships, and yet, instead of having them built, the time in which they might have been built has been allowed to slip away.

And the minister gives us no explanation for the great delay that has occurred because the whole contract has lapsed. It is not merely the money consideration, the question of time is even more important. All these weeks and months have slipped away, and we are without that thing we need, namely the wooden ships for our transportation. We must presume it was necessary to have them, and if it was necessary to have them, then time must have been the essence of that very necessity; and I say the minister, instead of asking us to pass this item with our eyes shut, should be the very first to say "There will be the fullest explanation upon it before the people's representatives are asked to pass this item."

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is a very important principle involved for the protection of the committee in the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman that because you find the name of the chairman to this resolution you are going to treat it as adopted. I have the votes and proceedings of yesterday, and the resolution is not in the records as adopted, and it has not been adopted to-day. I have been here, and hon. gentlemen opposite have been here, ever since the House opened at three o'clock. My right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Railways, and other gentlemen on the other side, have been here. The resolution has no date. The chairman has simply signed it, I suppose in anticipation of the fact that it might be adopted. These items have been under discussion to-day, and the only items which have been passed are the two first. one for the purchase of rolling stock, which we discussed for half an hour and more. and the other for the purchase of the steamer McKee and Drummond. We have now reached the third item, and it has not been declared passed. As one member of the committee, I insist that it has not been passed, and we have a right to discuss it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think what has taken place is what might very naturally take place. The chairman read the resolution which covers three items. There was a fair discussion on the principal item, a short discussion on the next, and there was some talk on the third. Several times hon. members would say "carried," "carried." and then some member on one side or the other would rise and follow out the item still further. Although we have said "carried" the chairman waited until——

Mr. PUGSLEY: He never said "carried" as to the third sub-item.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know about that. The Chairman evidently understood it was carried and so marked it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He does not mark it "carried," he simply signs it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There was no effort to crowd the vote through the committee in any way.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): I should be sorry if I had made any mistake, but I have been in the habit of considering each page placed before me as an item. In the resolution on the page before me, which calls for the vote of $26,620,000, there are the three items. That is resolution 437, and that was the resolution before the committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But you were taking it sub-item by sub-item.

The CHAIRMAN: Unfortunately that was not done; I read the three items together, and when I said "carried" I referred to item 437.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But in the Public Works Estimates given on page 11, item 457, there are twenty sub-items. You call each sub-item.

The CHAIRMAN: I would read all the items, and if any hon. member asked for information, for instance about line 4, I would stop and permit him to ask for that information, and I would call "carried" when all the items in the resolution had been discussed in that way.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I appeal to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there is no reason for this discussion. The practice has always been that the resolution is called. It may be composed of several items, absolutely disconnected. Here are three. These are taken one by one. We were on the third, which was being discussed when the Chairman left the Chair and the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. D. Stewart) took the Chair. The Chairman (Mr. Rainville), assuming it would be carried without further discussion, marked it. But the invariable practice is, when you have a resolution of several items, to take up each sub-item, and the resolution is carried when all are agreed to. The minister will agree on that point.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My right hon. friend is correct. This is merely a misunderstanding, and I am sure that, if it is the desire of hon. gentlemen, the Chairman will be willing to consider this item as being allowed to stand.

The CHAIRMAN: If it is the pleasure of the committee, I have no objection.

Mr. LOGGIE: I thought it would interest the minister to know that a telegram came to Ottawa to-day saying that a car of fish supposed to be shipped by the Maritime Fish Corporation could not be shipped owing to lack of equipment on the railway. The car was intended for Toronto.

Mr. COCHRANE: Who received the telegram?

Mr. LOGGIE: Matthews-Blackwell, Limited.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not heard of that before.

Railway subsidy—to provide amount required to be paid for the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway, the Quebec and Saguenay Railway, and the Lotbinière and Megantic Railway, and for the equipment, appurtenances and properties used in connection with such railways, to be acquired under the authority of a statute passed at the last session; and to provide for the cost of completing, equipping and operating the said railways—the operating expenses to be chargeable to revenue—revote, $3,667,745.07.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is a revote from last year. The vote last year was for $4,000,000. The difference between the two votes was spent on construction last year. We are trying to protect the road by putting in stone to prevent the current from washing out the ballast. Formerly, a quantity of timber and other material was put in the sides for that purpose.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This amount is not only for construction purposes, is it?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What portion of the $3,667,745.07 will go towards the construction, what portion towards the payment of the bonds and what portion towards the equipment, appurtenances and properties in connection with these railways?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is estimated it will cost $1,492,194 to finish the construction, of which $492,194 is the amount found for depreciation of the Saguenay railway. That is, it will take $1,000,000 to complete the construction, and $492,194 to take the place of the depreciation that has occurred.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much of the amount will go towards the price of the railways acquired by the Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: Whatever Mr. Justice Cassels finds.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Justice Cassels has found already. Has he not given a judgment in that case? I have in my hand the reasons for judgment, and the matter is still before the courts, because I understand, by a hurried inquiry I made this morning, that an appeal has been lodged by the railway companies against the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is an appeal in connection with the gas property which has nothing to do with this.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is an appeal by the railway companies against the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels. I made inquiry to-day at the Supreme Court. The judgment itself is not complete. The judge, when he gave his reasons spoke of the appeal, and the last portion of his reasons for judgment is as follows:

It will be easy when the case is concluded to arrive at the amount which in my judgment ought to be allowed. There will have to be deducted the allowance for depreciation, which has been settled. There will also have to be deducted the amounts received from the Dominion and provincial subsidies. These sums are not in dispute. There will also have to be deducted these items that I have just been referring to in connection with the Sagueny Railway, and any amounts that should be deducted from the Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway and the Megantic Railway on a proper valuation being proved.

The reasons for the appeal are, I understand based on Sir Walter Cassels' interpretation of the words "actual value." By his interpretation of those words which were inserted in the statute of last year, the judge deducted quite a large sum from the amount voted last year. In order to make myself clear, perhaps it would be well if I gave a little history of the case. I will follow the lines of the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Cassels on 24th January, 1917. The committee will remember that Parliament decided last year to acquire the Lotbinière and Megantic, the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix, and the Quebec and Saguenay railways. The Bill was assented to on 18th May, 1916. This statute provides that the Governor in Council may authorize and empower the Minister of Railways and Canals to acquire, upon such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, the railways described in the schedule, together with such equipment, appurtenances and properties used in connection with such railways, as the Governor in Council may deem necessary for the operation thereof. There are three railways mentioned in the schedule:

(a) The line of railway commonly known as the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway, extending from St. Paul Street in the city of Quebec to St. Joachim, a distance of about 43⅛ miles.

(b) The Quebec and Saguenay Railway extending from its junction with the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway at St. Joachim in the county of Montmorency to Nairn Falls in the county of Charlevoix, a distance of about 62⅘₁₀ miles; and

(c) The Lotbinière and Megantic Railway extending from Lyster in the county of Megantic to St. Jean des Chaillons in the county of Lotbinière, a distance of about 30 miles.

The second section authorizing the Government to purchase the three railways—and it is very important that one should read it carefully, because in it is the gist of the whole trouble—provides:

The consideration to be paid for each of the said railways and for any equipment, appurtenances and properties that may be acquired as aforesaid shall be the value thereof as determined by the Exchequer Court of Canada; said value to be the actual cost of said railways, less subsidies and less depreciation, but not to exceed four million, three hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars, exclusive of outstanding bonded indebtedness which is to be assumed by the Government, but not to exceed in all two million five hundred thousand dollars.

The bonded indebtedness was fixed at $2,500,000, but if in the appreciation of the actual cost of the railways it was found that the bonded indebtedness was less than that amount, the balance was to be applied to the cost of the railways. The case was submitted to the Exchequer Court. The Dominion Government was represented by Messrs. Meredith K.C., and Bernier, K.C. Several witnesses and experts were heard, and after counsel had argued at length on the evidence adduced, Sir Walter Cassels delivered judgment on 24th January, 1917. His judgment reads, in part, as follows:

The agreement—

There was an agreement between the Department of Railways and the railway Companies subsequent to the legislation.

The agreement requires a separate valuation for each of these three lines of railway. By the agreement the Crown assumes bonds of $2,500,000 secured by a trust mortgage. These bonds and the trust mortgages securing the same in addition to being a charge on the Quebec Railway Company, are also a charge on other railways and properties not taken over by the Crown. By the terms of the agreement this bonded charge of $2,500,000, while it is assumed by the Crown, forms part of the purchase money payable by the Crown under the statute. If the value placed by the Court on the Quebec Railway Company, known as the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway, exceeds the $2,500,000 only the excess over the $2,500,000 and the value so found is to be paid by the Crown, the $2,500,000 being treated practically as a payment on account.

Right here I should like to know if in this item is included the $2,500,000 referred to as the bonded indebtedness.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, it is not included.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I may have some comments to make on that later on. To proceed.

If on the other hand the value placed upon the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway is less than $2,500,000 then the difference between the value as ascertained and the $2,500,000 is to be deducted from any sums that may be found due in respect of the other two railways.

Sir Walter Cassels says further:

The agreement refers to it in the following language:

"It is understood and agreed by and between all the parties hereto jointly and severally that in case the Exchequer Court of Canada fixes the value of the line of railway and other property set out in schedule 'C' hereto at a sum less than $2,500,000, the difference between the sum so fixed and the sum of $2,500,000 shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of the purchase price to be paid for the lines of railway and other properties set out in schedules 'B' and 'D' hereto.

"The intention of this agreement being that in no event shall His Majesty be liable to pay for the said three lines of railway and other properties a greater amount than the value thereof as fixed by the Exchequer Court less the sum of $2,500,000, the amount of the bonds to be assumed by His Majesty as aforesaid."

The judge explains that he takes it for granted that the various railway companies had good titles to the properties that were transferred to the Department of Railways. He also explains how he had arranged the proceedings before the Court, as follows:

I came to the conclusion that the only practical way of arriving at a result would be to adopt the method adopted in the arbitration in which I acted as counsel for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in regard to what was known as the Onderdonk sections of the railway in British Columbia.

He says further:

Competent experts were employed by the Crown to make a minute examination of the three lines of railway and to furnish in detail what they considered the proper amount to be deducted for depreciation. A large amount of time was occupied by these gentlemen in making this inquiry. Subsequently the railway companies, by their counsel, accepted as correct the amounts as found by the experts for the Crown. The amount of the depreciation to be offset against the value of the railways has therefore been settled. The figures I will deal with later.

He says further:

Another question of considerable importance is in regard to the offset referred to in the statute as subsidies.

And he explains that he had to deduct from the actual value not only the federal subsidies but the provincial subsidies as well.

Mr. COCHRANE: He also refused to allow interest during construction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He allowed it during actual construction, but the Company claimed it during several years.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The company was claiming interest right along for several years.

Mr. COCHRANE: I know, but we refused to allow it during construction. The witnesses admitted it would require three years to build the road.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Now, as to the account as filed by the railways. As I have said, there are three railways, the Montmorency, the Quebec and Saguenay and the Lotbinière and Megantic. The judge said:

I will deal first with that relating to the Montmorency division. The first item is dated July 1, 1898: road and equipment, real estate, buildings, etc., Montmorency division, $2,038,-149.49. This starting point is assumed by the railways to have been the cost of construction up to that date. At the date in question, namely, the 1st July, 1898, according to Colonel Wurtele, the road had been constructed as far as Ste. Anne's. The mileage of this road was about 21 miles, and it may be that they were running a mile or two beyond. Even if it were granted that 22 miles instead of 21 miles of the railway had been constructed at that date, the cost would be in the neighborhood of $92,500 a mile. Colonel Wurtele puts it about $100,000. It seems a high figure. It is stated by counsel for the railway company that a certain portion of the right of way beyond Ste. Anne's had been procured. This may or may not be so. The proof before me is lacking on this point. Here there is a distinct difference between the views put forward by the counsel for the railway company, and the counsel for the Crown. The counsel for the railway company contend that what the court has to do, is to find the cost as if it were an accounting between the directors of the railway and its shareholders; and that this amount being shown by the books of the company as the amount expended at that date, should therefore be accepted as the cost. Numerous witnesses were called, gentlemen of good standing—accountants from Montreal—who gave evidence as to the custom in regard to the charging up of interest, etc., to capital account.

When I deal with the case of the Saguenay Railway, the absurdity of this contention put forward on the part of the railway company will be apparent. The directors of a company might have to pay fifty per cent commission for obtaining a loan of a million dollars. It would undoubtedly be quite right as between themselves and their shareholders to charge this fifty per cent in their accounts. So also they might delay construction for a period of say 20 years, in the meanwhile paying interest on this bonded indebtedness. As between the directors and their shareholders, as a matter of book-keeping, it may be quite reasonable to charge up every item of expenditure. But the case before me is of a different character. I am not dealing with the accounts as between the shareholders and their directors. What I have to ascertain is the value as between the vendor and the purchaser and that value must be the actual cost of the railways, less subsidies and less depreciation.

He goes on:

Now it is admitted that these two items of $500,000 referred to in schedule "A," and also the item of $794,869.58 floating liabilities, comprise part of this item of $2,038,149.40. Crown counsel in their statement were of opinion that these two items of $500,000 and $794,869.58 should be taken as the cost up to that date, namely July 1st, 1898. I do not agree with that contention. I fail to see how it can be assumed without further proof that the proceeds of these interim bonds, namely $500,000, went into the construction of the railway. They may or may not. That is a question of proof. The bonds were held by the various parties shown on page 15 as Schedule "A." They were held as collateral security by the various parties. What the nature of the debts due to these various parties is I would have thought susceptible of proof—at all events before such an item can be allowed, further inquiry will be necessary, and so with regard to the liabilities.

The judge put aside this first claim of $500,000.

It would be impossible to accept Colonel Wurtele's evidence as proving the fact that these two particular items went into the construction of the railway. Other evidence would be required before I would be willing to accept those two sums of $500,000 and $794,869.58 as having been expended in the construction of this 21 miles of railway.

So here are two items, totalling $1,294,-869.58, which are put aside by the judge for good and valid reasons, and I would strongly object to these two items reappearing in the Estimates and being paid to the company when it was understood last year, by the statute passed by this Parliament, that the judge of the Exchequer Court would fix the amounts due to the railway companies for the actual value of the railways.

Mr. MURPHY: Do these two items reappear in the Estimates?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not know. The hon. gentleman does not say so.

Mr. COCHRANE: We do not propose to pay anything unless the judge gives a verdict for it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have dealt now with the two biggest items which are put aside by the judge of the Exchequer Court in the case of the Montmorency railway. To show the discrepancy between the experts of the company as to the cost of construction, I shall call the attention of the committe to this remark made by the judge:

I may call the attention of counsel to the fact that in the trust deed, Schedule "D," at page 19, there is the estimate of cost of constructing certain extensions. The total is 11 miles—and the total estimate is $149,947, which would be under $14,000 a mile—and while of course the main railway previously built may not have been built at that low figure, the contrast between the two figures, namely, $92,500 a mile, and the $14,000 a mile, is striking.

It shows that there was lots of bookkeeping in the office of the company. Now he comes to the Lotbinière and Megantic Railway, and says:

Dealing with the Megantic Railway the amount involved in connection with this railway is, comparatively speaking, not very large, but I think that further proof of a similar nature to that suggested in regard to the Montmorency Railway should be forthcoming. The only evidence given is that of Mr. Robbins, the manager of the railway, and is mere surmise. He may or may not be correct when he states that it would probably cost about $11,000 a mile.

No direct evidence is adduced as to the actual cost of the construction of the railway. Now he comes to the Saguenay Railway, which is the third white elephant. He says:

Mr. Matthews, the manager of the railway, was called as a witness. He states that the construction of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway was started in April or May, 1911. Previous to that he believes exploration surveys were made. He points out that the main construction on this road stops some time about September, 1912, but that certain small constructions were continued for quite awhile.

As I intend to make some extended remarks on this subject, we might as well call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

On motion of Right Hon. Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Monday, August 27, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

STELLARTON PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has any land been purchased for a public building at Stellarton, N.S.?
2. If so, from whom?
3. What was the price paid?
4. How was price fixed?
5. If by expropriation proceedings, what was the date of the order of said court?

Mr. REID:

1. Yes.
2. From Mrs. Mary Ann McKay and her heirs.
3. $4,000, of which $1,375, amount of appropriation available, has been paid.
4. By agreement.
5. (a) Land was expropriated, as a number of the heirs are widely scattered and the whereabouts of some unknown; a bond to cover payment has been accepted from Catherine A. McKay, executrix, John G. Reid and E. F. Munro. (b) There was no order of the court.

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

*Mr. PROULX:

Referring to page 331 of the printed proceedings of the Special Parliamentary Committee on Returned Soldiers and to the applicants for the charter of the Canadian Association of Returned Soldiers, Ottawa District—enumerated thereon, namely, Kenneth Clarke Macpherson, Joseph Bernard Henshaw, William Pemberton Morling, Joshua Zivian, John Reginald Phillips, Harry Lewis, Alexander Kirkwood, Hugh Spencer Ralph, William Craig, Arthur Lapointe and William Lewis:

1. How many of the said applicants, in addition to Kenneth Clarke Macpherson and Joseph Zivian, are in government employ?
2. What positions do they hold, and what salaries are they paid?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

1. Department of the Interior—three. Department of Militia and Defence—four.

2. Department of the Interior: Joseph Bernard Henshaw, clerk, Accounts Branch, $1,200 per annum; Alexander Kirkwood, clerk, Registration Branch, $900 per annum; Harry Lewis, clerk, Seed Grain Branch, $900 per annum. Department of Militia and Defence: Lt. W. P. Morling, employed in Estates Branch, Militia Department, $4.10 per diem; J. R. Phillips, employed in Casualty Pay Office, Militia Department, $3.35 per diem; Major H. S. Ralph, officer in charge of estates, Militia Department, $7.50 per diem; Wm. Craig, permanent Civil Servant, Inside Civil Service, Militia Department, $1,200 per annum.

MR. N. H. R. KNIGHT.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Is Mr. N. H. R. Knight, secretary of the Great War Veterans Association, in the employ of the Government?
2 If so, in what capacity, and at what salary?
3. What amount has been paid to him to date?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Norman F. R. Knight was employed as Customs Landing Waiter from 21st to 26th March, 1917, when he resigned—the amount paid him being $14.52.

SAMUEL POMMEROY.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Is there at present, or has there been within the last twelve months, one Samuel Pommeroy, in the employ of the district engineer of the Department of Public Works at Winnipeg?
2. If so, when was he appointed, what salary does he receive, and what are his duties?

Mr. REID:

1. Yes.
2. (a) Appointed September 26, 1916, in district Engineer's office, Winnipeg, and transferred as assistant superintendent of shipyard at Selkirk on July 1, 1917, (b) $100 per month, (c) the duties usually performed by such an official.

DAWSON POST OFFICE.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to expend any money for the improvement of the post office at Dawson, Yukon Territory?
2. What amount, if any, is proposed to be spent upon the vault in said post office?
3. Has the Government any report from any of its officials in Dawson asking for such expenditure?
4. If so, will copy of such correspondence be produced?

Mr. REID:

1 and 2. $10,000 placed in the Estimates for that purpose.
3. Yes.
4. Yes.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. How many officers are employed or attached to the Department of Militia overseas, in the various departments and offices?

[Mr. Sevigny.]

2. How many non-commissioned officers and men, respectively, are so employed?
3. What is the total amount paid per month for salaries to such officers and men?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Currie.—For a copy of the report made by Captain Sir Henry Norman, Bart, M.P., Liaison officer of the British Ministry of Munitions to the French Ministry of Inventions, for the Right Hon. David Lloyd George, M.P., concerning the treatment and training of disabled and discharged soldiers in France.

Mr. Chisholm—For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, communications and documents of all kinds referring to a request for having the mail for Marble Mountain come from Eden Platform instead of West Bay Road.

NAVAL SERVICE AT HALIFAX.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond) moved:

For a return giving the names, rank, pay nature and date of employment and previous service of (a) All officers employed in or connected with the Naval Service at Halifax, including patrol service; (b) All civilians appointed since November, 1911. Also giving a list of the number, names and rate of pay of returned soldiers or sailors included in (a).

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I would suggest to the member for Richmond that he let this motion stand, together with the one following, which is the same except that it refers to Sydney. I called the attention of the deputy minister to these two motions this morning, and he informed me that without the employment of a special staff it would be impossible to get the information ready before the next session of Parliament. I fancy that the information my hon. friend wants is really not as extensive as this motion indicates, and I suggest that he discuss the matter with the deputy minister and let him know just what he wants. The matter may then be expedited and there may not be the necessity for such a voluminous return as would be necessary if this motion were adopted.

Motion stands.

PURCHASES IN CANADA BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

STATEMENT AS TO MUNITIONS, AND OTHER SUPPLIES—IMPERIAL EXPENDITURES IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I should like to direct the attention of the Government to the following statement in the press of to-day

Toronto, August 25. The British Food Controller has notified the Canadian packers that no more Canadian bacon or hogs will be bought by the British Government.

Is there any foundation for that statement, and has it any relation to the rumour that the American Government expected the Allies, in view of the large loans that they had obtained in the United States, to buy provisions and munitions in that country?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have no information with regard to the matter alluded to by the hon. gentleman, except that which is contained in the press despatch. There has been no official communication on the subject.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: There is also a statement in the papers to-day that the purchase of munitions in Canada is practically to cease. What foundation is there for that statement? An official representative of the Munitions Board intimated in Toronto on Saturday that orders for munitions would from this time be greatly reduced.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) and my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald), who, I believe, raised the question on Saturday, I desire to read to the House a statement which was handed to the press by the Chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board. It is:

Ottawa, 21st August 1917.

Towards the close of 1916 the capacity for producing munitions in Great Britain had so increased that the Minister of Munitions advised that it was unnecessary to continue the production of munitions in the United States for British account, except for a few special lines. The production in Canada, however, was continued as before.

The minister has now advised that it is unnecessary to continue production in Canada on the present scale. He has directed that certain lines shall be discontinued; that other lines shall be produced in lessened quantities; while some lines are to be continued as at present.

The effect of this will be to stop the production of shells and components at some plants which are now producing sizes no longer required.

In other plants, where shells are made of sizes of which a reduced output only is required, it will mean working during the day only, thus stopping night work. In other plants, however, where sustained production is required, operations will be continued night as well as day.

These changes have been anticipated by several important firms, who have already resumed, or are planning to resume, their prewar activities in their own lines, while others are engaged in the production or preparation for production, of equipment needed for ships now under construction or to be built during 1918.

For the further information of the House, I may say that the Dominion Government has advanced to date to the Imperial Munitions Board, for the purchase of munitions in Canada, the sum of $285,000,000. There has also been advanced to the Imperial Munitions Board by the chartered banks of Canada in the same connection the sum of $100,000,000. The Dominion Government, during many months past, has been advancing to the Imperial Treasury, for the purchase of munitions in Canada, the sum of $25,000,000 per month. During July, we advanced $35,000,000; during August we are advancing $35,000,000, and we have arranged to continue the advances of $25,000,000 a month, during September, October, November and December, so that the Dominion Government will continue to make the advances which we have been making in the past. As I have pointed out, during July and August we increased the amount of our advances by $10,000,000 each month.

I may also say in this connection, as it has a bearing upon the question of the Imperial expenditure in Canada, that the Government arranged in July, in addition to undertaking the programme which I have mentioned, that is to say, of furnishing $35,000,000 in July, $35,000,000 in August and $25,000,000 per month for the balance of the year, to furnish the sum of $50,000,000 for the purchase of cheese, hay, oats and flour in Canada. I have repeatedly pointed out to the House that the British Government can purchase on this side of the Atlantic only to the extent that they can raise money on this side of the Atlantic. In order to provide the farmers of Canada with an export market for their cheese, we arranged to provide $40,000,000, which is the export value at the prices fixed of the cheese production of Canada, that $40,000,000 to be paid out during July, August, September and October. In addition to that sum, $10,000,000 was supplied for the purchase of hay, oats and flour. The House will thus get an idea of the magnitude of our financial transactions in connection with the purchase of these supplies in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are those advances for cheese and hay made to the Imperial authorities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Who makes the purchases and who have charge of the distribution of the money in this country?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Imperial Government, as my right hon. friend may recall, sent out a commissioner, Mr. McGowan, associated with whom are two officials of the Department of Agriculture. They constitute a Cheese Commission, who, after taking up the matter with the various cheese exchanges and, I think, representative farmers and dealers, fixed a price for cheese. The purchases to which I allude have been made by that Cheese Commission?

Mr. MURPHY: In view of the statement just made by the Minister of Finance in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean), may I ask the Minister of Labour if the Government or the Department of Labour have done anything to cope with the dislocation of labour resulting from the curtailment of work in the munition factories?

Mr. CROTHERS: Nothing has as yet been done?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The Minister of Finance says that he is financing for the purchase of Canadian commodities for the use of the British Government. I have also had confirmed the statement that the British Government will now cease to buy our bacon production. If we financed the purchase of that bacon production, would they continue to buy from us?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Th matter has not been drawn to my attention. I have no doubt the British Government could arrange to finance the purchase of our bacon production.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What control, if any, does the Canadian Government exercise over the expenditure of this money? By whom is it expended?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The House is aware that, so far as concerns our expenditure in Great Britain and upon the continent, we borrow money from the Imperial Government. The reason for that is obvious. That expenditure has to be paid in sterling money or in the currency of France or Belgium. We, therefore, borrow from Great Britain all money necessary for our expenditures in Great Britain and on the continent in respect of our overseas forces. As a set-off to that expenditure, the Imperial Government asks us here to furnish them with credit from which they may purchase munitions, cheese, hay, oats, and other products. The Imperial Munitions Board was created by the Imperial Government. It takes its instructions from the Imperial Government and gives orders to Canadian manufacturers according to instructions which it receives from the Imperial Government. As to the details of this administration I am not familiar, because, as I have pointed out, it is an Imperial and not a Dominion Government board. The Imperial Government ask us to place the Imperial Munitions Board in funds from month to month to the amount that I have mentioned. So far as our transactions are concerned, therefore, they are with the Imperial Government which furnish us with money in Great Britain and on the continent, we supplying them with money here with which to pay for their commitments for munitions and other supplies.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister have any objection to ascertaining what particular class of munitions are to continue to be supplied and what are to be stopped, because there are certain sections of the country which are engaged in manufacturing munitions of a certain type, such as 4.5 inch shells, 18-pounders, shrapnel, and so on, and the employees in those factories have been notified that their services have been dispensed with? It is a matter of importance to the public to know whether there is any likelihood of the production of these munitions being resumed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board is out of the city at the present time. If the hon. member urgently desires the information, I should advise him to see the secretary of the board. I will, however, make further inquiries and will probably make a further statement.

THE BABTIE REPORT—DR. BRUCE'S REPLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: On various occasions some hon. gentlemen have expressed their desire that a memorandum made by Colonel Bruce with respect to matters set forth in a report of the commission of which General Sir William Babtie was chairman, shall be laid upon the Table of the House. I have given the matter the best consideration that I could, and I do not think it is a document which ought to be laid on the table of the House by the Government. It is not an official report, as Colonel Bruce was not requested or empowered by any competent authority to make the memorandum in question. That fact is further established by the circumstance that, as I am informed, he sent a copy of it to some hon. members of this House, which certainly he would not have done if he had believed it to be an official report in the ordinary sense.

There is also the further consideration that he has been seconded to the Royal Army Medical Service, and I am informed that the memorandum which he has prepared deals with the administration of that service. It seems, therefore, that the War Office ought to be consulted before any document of that kind put forward by an officer of the British service should be laid on the table of this House by the Government.

I should also like to correct a misapprehension, which, if I understand correctly, has arisen with regard to his opportunity to be heard before the Babtie Commission, of which Sir William Babtie was chairman, and four very eminent Canadian surgeons, whose names I have already given to the House, were members. The proceedings of the Board show that Colonel Bruce was called as a witness on November 27, 1916, recalled on November 28, and again on the 6th of December, on which date he was twice heard, and also on the 16th of December. A memorandum has been placed in my hands containing an extract from the secretary of the board, in the following words:

"The Board directs me to say that neither General Jones nor Colonel Bruce asked to be allowed to be present throughout the inquiry being made by the Board."

Sir SAM HUGHES: Which board—the Bruce or the Babtie board?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Baptie Board. My hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) also made inquiry in this connection as to what changes and improvements had been made in the administration of the Canadian Army Medical Service. I have a telegram dated August 23, 1917 from Sir George Perley in the following words:

Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

Director Medical Services submits following:

Department is receptive to suggestions irrespective of their source. All suggestions, recommendations are carefully considered, and if deemed advisable are put into effect. Following are some improvements effected in this service since January 1, 1917.

(1) Systematic routine inspection of Canadians in hospitals in United Kingdom to select cases requiring further treatment in Canada.

(2) Establishment of a 1,300-bed hospital at Liverpool to assemble patients for Canada and facilitate prompt embarkation. Arrangements made for assembly insane patients for Canada at Mental Hospital near Liverpool for convenient embarkation.

(3) Provision of hospital ship service from Liverpool to Canada for invalids.

(4) Hospital accommodation in England has been expanded by over 5,000 primary beds and sufficient convalescent beds to adequately meet Canadian requirements. Arrangements completed for further expansion that will provide sufficient hospital accommodation for all tuberculose and venereal patients.

(5) Arrangements made by which War Office provides reliefs for Canadian medicals units in Mediterranean, these units returning for duty in England.

(6) Greater economy in use of personnel by deciding number requisite for each medical unit and adhering to such limitation.

(7) Completion of consultant and inspection service on systematic basis. All patients in Canadian hospitals inspected semi-monthly and routine inspections made of Canadians in British hospitals.

(8) Improved system for controlling movement and prompt evacuation of patients from hospitals.

(9) While segregation of Canadians in Canadian hospitals is impracticable and inadvisable, arrangements have been made whereby those sent to British hospitals are distributed to hospitals readily accessible to Canadian inspectors and convenient for movement to Canadian hospitals for final disposition.

(10) Systematic inspection and control of hospital and medical records to ensure completeness and accuracy of same.

(11) System for strict control of laboratory service.

(12) Improved system of controlling hospital food supplies to ensure economy.

(13) Abolition of dual control of Shorncliffe military hospital group by arranging with British authorities to resume their control and administration. The A. D. M. S., Canadians, Folkestone, at request of British authorities, carries out administration of this group and reports direct to British authorities on all matters pertaining thereto.

(14) Abolition of dual administration of Red Cross Hospital by C.A.M.C. taking entire control.

(15) Abolition of purchasing bureau for medical supplies and equipment by turning same over to Quartermaster General's branch.

(16) Establishment of central medical stores where all medical supplies are received and carefully checked for distribution.

(17) Improved control of expenditures of medical stores and supplies by more strict and systematic checking of indents from units.

(18) Decentralization of medical boards and improvement of control through careful routine inspections and uniform standardization.

(19) Improved medical board form for the purpose of meeting provisions of Canadian pension laws.

(20) Standardization of fitness of soldiers according to physical grades, with system of control to provide uniform classification throughout service.

(21) Improved system of dealing with officer and nursing sister casualties by which convalescence is spent in hospital instead of on leave, thus controlling and shortening period of non-effectiveness.

(22) Adoption of complete and systematic measures for prevention and spread of communicable disease.

(23) C.A.M.C. Training School reorganized on proper military basis and staffed with personnel trained at front; an improved syllabus of training adopted based on experience gained in present war.

(24) Fair and definite policy adopted for promotion of officers and other ranks.

(25) Definite policy for giving officers overseas service which recognizes prior rights of those who have served longest in England; provision for return of officers of experience from overseas to serve in England or Canada.

(26) More complete co-ordination with services in France and Canada.

(27) More complete co-ordination, with exchange of all ranks, between Canadian Corps and medical units on lines of communications and at base.

(28) Arrangements for temporary expansion of army medical units at front during time of action by detail of personnel from medical units on lines of communication and at base.

(29) The majority of these improvements have been noted in monthly progress reports.

PERLEY.

OVERSEAS ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF.

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER IN REPLY TO SIR SAM HUGHES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Following an inquiry made in the House by my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) and other honourable members with respect to supposed increases in the administrative staff overseas of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces I despatched a telegram to Sir George Perley on the 14th of August, as follows:

Ottawa, August 14, 1917.

Perley,
London.

General Hughes made following allegations in House on seventh instant. "The statement is made that whereas General Carson administered the whole of Canada's war department in England with less than fifty men, and did it well, there are now twelve hundred to fifteen hundred men, not counting the pay officers, doing the work of the Adjutant General's Office and other offices. In fact, I understand that only about thirty men were employed by General Carson for this work." Please cable full statement for submission to Parliament showing what additions to departmental organization have been made and the reasons therefor. General Hughes also asserted that five or six buildings have been rented for accommodation of additional employees. Please cable statement as to this.

BORDEN.

To that I received the following reply:

[Sir Robert Borden.]

London, August 23rd, 1917.

Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

Referring your cable fourteenth regarding General Hughes' statement. Total number employed in connection with Administrative Headquarters at London, and Brighton on first December 1916 was one hundred thirty-four officers, five hundred sixty-six other ranks and civilians. On first August 1917 numbers were, one hundred thirty-nine officers, four hundred eighty-six other ranks and civilians. Brighton Headquarters having been absorbed in London, the reorganization provided for following branches: General Officer Commanding, General Staff, Adjutant General, Military Secretary, Secretary of Headquarters and Quartermaster General including Director Supply and Transport, Director Ordnance Services, Director Veterinary Services and Remounts, Stationery Department, Messing (?) and Barrack Services, Surplus Baggage Depot, Postal Services and Purchasing Department. Regarding buildings, we gave up the accommodation at Hotel Cecil and Cleveland House, St. James Square, both of which were being paid for from Canadian funds and in lieu thereof obtained from Imperial authorities free quarters which we now occupy. This entails saving of large annual sum and concentrates Medical Services and other departments, including ministry, about Oxford Circus. As result of reorganization eleven training brigades, each with Headquarters Staff, were reduced to six and Cavalry Brigade changed to Cavalry Regiment; fifty-seven reserve battalions were reduced to twenty-four; Crowborough and Brighton Headquarters were abolished and Hastings Command will be shortly.

Perley.

There is one word in this telegram, which has been translated "messing," of which I am not absolutely sure. It was a little difficult to decipher it, and the clerk who deciphered it fixed upon the word "messing" as the one probably intended.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does it say "Brighton on August 1st, 1916"?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It says, "On 1st August, 1917, numbers were one hundred thirty-nine officers, four hundred eighty-six other ranks and civilians. Brighton Headquarters having been absorbed in London, the reorganization provided for following branches," et cetera, as I have already stated.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not understand "Brighton on August 1st, 1917," and then "Brighton August 1st 1917" again. I did not catch that point.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The first date given is December 1st, 1916.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thought it was August 1st.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: On December 1st, 1916, as I understand it, there was a headquarters at Brighton which has since been absorbed in the London Headquarters, so that there is one headquarters doing the work of the two which were in existence on December 1st, 1916.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understood it was August 1st. I was going to remark there was no such thing as headquarters at Brighton on August 1st, 1916.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is December 1st.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It also speaks of the administrative branches, not the Adjutant General's Department alone.

THE $100,000,000 LOAN.

CORRECTION BY FINANCE MINISTER OF STATEMENT IN THE REGINA LEADER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): My attention has been called to an editorial in the Regina Morning Leader with reference to the $100,000,000 loan issue recently made by the Dominion Government in the city of New York, which does a great injustice to the Bank of Montreal. In this editorial the following appears:

> But while the Finance Minister of Canada himself did all the hard work in connection with the flotation of this loan, he allowed the Bank of Montreal a commission of 1¾ per cent. for lending him its assistance. In other words, out of this loan the Bank of Montreal receives the neat little sum of $1,750,000 as a commission. The commission originally arranged was 2 per cent., but the Bank of Montreal remitted one-quarter of one per cent., or $250,000.
> Why, asks the Toronto Star, and the Leader repeats the question, as we believe the people of Canada will repeat it, should the Bank of Montreal receive nearly two million dollars for its assistance to the minister, who himself negotiated the loan? Why should anybody make nearly two million dollars out of a loan negotiated for a patriotic purpose?

I desire to explain to the House, although so far as the House is concerned I believe the explanation is unnecessary, that the Bank of Montreal being our fiscal agents, the general manager, Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, usually negotiates our foreign loans. In this case the underwriting and other commissions to the New York syndicate headed by Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Company, amounted to 2 per cent. The Bank of Montreal was able to obtain for the Government a remission of one-quarter of one per cent upon that commission of 2 per cent, leaving the net commission to the New York syndicate one and three-quarters per cent for underwriting and other commissions and expenses.

Mr. MACDONALD: In connection with this same question, will the minister allow me? It was stated in one of the United States financial papers that the cheque which was made to the Dominion Government was for $96,111,111. The minister stated to the House that the proceeds of the loan were $96,250,000. Was the cheque the Canadian Government received a cheque for $96,111,111?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: And, was the commission paid to the Bank of Montreal, out of the amount the Government received, or was it paid out of the original amount?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think what misled my hon. friend is the fact that the $111,111 was interest upon the amount from the date it was paid until the Bank of Montreal received it in New York for our account. The transaction was this: the issue was at 98; this would mean $98,000,000. Subtract from that $1,750,000, being commission at the rate of one and three-quarters per cent, and the net amount received was $96,250,000, as I told my hon. friend the other day. The $111,111 does not enter into it at all, because it is interest for some ten or eleven days. I am not absolutely accurate as to the number of days—upon the principal sum. I was dealing only with the principal, that is to say $96,250,000. That is the amount which was received for the loan.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the $111,111 was interest, then the amount the Government should have received would be $96,361,111.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The $111,111 was interest paid by Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Company in respect of the money in their hands for the few days they had it before paying it over to the Bank of Montreal. When my hon. friend asks what the proceeds of a loan is, we understand by that term the net amount received, having regard to principal only, because as my hon. friend knows, interest is running upon the loan from the date of its issue. In this case the interest is $111,111, but this amount is not considered in making an answer as to the net amount of the loan.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was it paid by J. P. Morgan and Company to the Bank of Montreal or was it paid to the Dominion Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As the Dominion has its account with the Bank of Montreal it would be paid to the Bank of Montreal as our agent. The commission in connection with the underwriting and other expenses relating to the loan was paid to the syndicate headed by J. P. Morgan and Company, New York.

BOARD OF PENSION COMMISSIONERS.

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) made an inquiry with regard to a resolution on the Order Paper with respect to the Board of Pension Commissioners and the rates of pension. Hon. gentlemen will remember that on March 14, 1916, a committee was appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration the rates of pensions. On the 10th May, 1916, the committee made a unanimous report. The chairman of the committee, on the 18th May, moved that the report should be commended to the consideration of the Government. Parliament prorogued on the same day. There was not an opportunity to bring in legislation at that session. Accordingly, on the 3rd June, 1916, the recommendations of the committee were put into the form of an Order in Council and passed under the War Measures Act. By a resolution now on the Order Paper it was proposed that a similar committee should be appointed this year to take into consideration representations that had been made to the Government from various quarters, and more particularly by several organizations of returned soldiers, as to the desirability of increasing the rates of pensions thus allowed. This was urged for various reasons, several of which have a great deal of force. We have reached the conclusion that it would be impracticable to deal with the matter in a thorough and satisfactory manner at this session and that it is a subject which should be dealt with finally and permanently by the new Parliament which is to be summoned in the early future. There is, however, this consideration which the Government will have to take into account. Owing to the fact that since the committee made this report on May 10 last year the cost of living in Canada has very appreciably increased, it is thought reasonable and desirable that, pending the consideration of this question by Parliament, there should be some increase made, that it should be made on a percentage basis and that it should take effect from the beginning of the present fiscal year, which is the first of April last. Accordingly, as soon as the prorogation of Parliament permits, the Government propose to take the question into consideration in that regard for the purpose of affording temporary relief at this time and with the view of having the whole question exhaustively and finally settled by a new Parliament fresh from the people as soon as that Parliament has been summoned.

Mr. MURPHY: Did I understand my right hon. friend to state that the Government had decided to grant an increase, and if so, what is the rate of increase?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That has not been determined. We thought the increase in the cost of living made it only fair and reasonable, as well as desirable, that there should be an increase, to date from the first of April last, pending consideration by a new Parliament of the whole subject in an exhaustive and final way. It seems undesirable that so important a question should be dealt with finally by this Parliament. Therefore, we propose to give temporary relief by the method which I have mentioned, and the whole matter will then be entirely free for such disposition as the new Parliament may determine to make of it.

Mr. MURPHY: And the rate of that temporary increase will be determined after prorogation?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will make probably a temporary percentage increase to meet the increased cost of living in the meantime, leaving it free to the new Parliament to deal with the whole question when it comes up for their consideration and determination.

Mr. NESBITT: The increase will apply to the pensions that have been granted, as well as to those to be granted in the future?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, all would be dealt with on the same basis.

EXTENSION OF FRANCHISE TO WOMEN.

On the Orders of the day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): I call the attention of the Prime Minister to a question which I asked on Saturday. The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that he would bring the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister and that an answer would be given to-day. It was in reference to the resolution dealing with woman suffrage. My right hon. friend will remember that he moved an amendment to the motion to which I moved in amendment to the amendment declaring that in the opinion of the House the Bill to grant woman suffrage should be passed during the present session. The matter stood over and I quite remember that the minister who was leading the House at that time gave an assurance that there would be an opportunity to discuss the matter and that a day would be set. I would like to know, therefore, if there will be a day set for the discussion during the present session.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: I did not have my attention directed to my hon. friend's question. I will give my hon. friend's suggestion the earliest consideration possible and I shall look up the record to see what was said. Does my hon. friend remember the particular date upon which the promise of further consideration was made?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I cannot say at the moment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Probably it would be about the 16th day of May.

Mr. PUGSLEY: About that time.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: I will give my hon. friend an answer later.

PRIVILEGE.

HON. MR. PUGSLEY CONTRADICTS NEWSPAPER REPORT.

On the Orders of the day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker. I rise to a question of privilege. In the Toronto News of Saturday last there appears this despatch from Ottawa:

C.P.R. Leads Bitter Fight.

Opposition to Public Ownership Being Waged on Floor of House.

Ottawa, Aug. 25.—One of the things which goes to prove that the taking over of the Canadian Northern by the Government is in the direct public interest, is the bitter and unreasoning opposition to the Bill by Hon. William Pugsley and Hon. George P. Graham. During the obstructive tactics which have been adopted in the discussion of the legislation in the House, Mr. Pugsley has constituted himself leader of the private ownership clique against public ownership. It is freely rumoured that in doing so, Mr. Pugsley is merely acting as spokesman and general counsel for the Canadian Pacific Railway. While the voice is the voice of Pugsley, the hand is the hand of Shaughnessy.

I desire, Mr. Speaker to give that statement an unqualified denial. I am not now, nor have I ever been in any way connected with the Canadian Pacific railway as counsel or otherwise. I have had no communication directly or indirectly with the Canadian Pacific railway or with any of its officials on the subject of the Canadian Northern railway.

OVERSEAS ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF.

FURTHER QUESTIONS BY SIR SAM HUGHES.

On the Orders of the day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: Without desiring to bring on any discussion on the Orders of the Day, I wish to ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) if he will be good enough—to relieve my doubt, and that there may be no equivocation—to furnish the following data: What staff was at Brighton in the middle of November, 1916?

Mr. SPEAKER: This information cannot be given now. The proper course to take is to place a question on the Order Paper in the ordinary way and thus obviate the possibility of inaccuracy.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Perhaps I can get some of the information now. I would prefer that the information with regard to the staff should not be limited to the administrative staff.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. gentleman to place his question on the Order Paper. The answer cannot possibly be forthcoming to-day.

Sir SAM HUGHES: But, Mr. Speaker, may I not refer to the answer which has been given by the Prime Minister? The Prime Minister spoke of the administrative staff. My statement refers to the staff and the answer given by him places me in the position before the public of having made a certain misstatement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not competent for the hon. member to discuss at this stage an answer given by the Government. If he wishes an answer to a further question on the subject I must ask him to place his question on the Order Paper.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The statement which has been made to-day by the First Minister quotes me as having made reference to a certain number of clerks being employed in London. The answer of the Prime Minister speaks only of the administrative staff and it places them at over 500, but it does not take into account other staffs. The number employed has not been clearly stated.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not speaking to a question of privilege. He is not calling in question any inaccuracy in the statement. The hon. member has a right to ask a question in respect to a matter of urgency, or in respect to a return or something of that character, but he cannot discuss the matter. If he wishes to ask a further question, the answer to which cannot be forthcoming to-day, I would ask him to put his question on the Order Paper in the ordinary course.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the information; I am following the very same procedure which has been known to exist here for a great many years. But I am entitled on a question of privilege to show that my statement in this House has not been contradicted here to-day by the statement made by the Prime Minister. There are a couple of other points but I shall not press them as a matter of privilege. I shall take an opportunity of putting them in the form of a question. I desire to ask the Prime Minister if he has any statement to make with regard to Col. Wilson.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I wrote my hon. friend a letter on that matter. I will give the House the information if my hon. friend desires.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

CONSIDERATION OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL RESUMED. IN COMMITTEE.

Consideration in committee of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company—Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance—resumed from Thursday, August 23, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.—

On section 1—Acquisition of shares of Canadian Northern railway authorized:

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): When this Bill was last in committee, I made a few remarks on its merits as I understood them, but as the Government appeared to be anxious that the committee should rise and the House preceed to other business.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

I curtailed my remarks and I therefore desire to resume them. As I said then, so far as I am personally concerned, I am in perfect accord with the suggestion of taking over the Canadian Northern and its assets and properties, in the public interest. The two questions which to my mind are of paramount importance in connection with the matter are, first, the cost or price which is to be paid for the property, and, second, the system of management which is to be adopted. So far as the system of management is concerned. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that this railway system, together with the National Transcontinental railway, and the Intercolonial railway, the Prince Edward Island railway, the Hudson Bay railway all the railways owned by the Government, should be put under one Board of Management which should be absolutely free and independent of all political control, and that the combined properties should be operated by such an independent board on a strictly commercial basis in the interests of the public. I believe that by this means, instead of being a gigantic failure, as the Intercolonial has always proved to be, the combined systems could be operated with success and so to redound greatly to the benefit of the people and the best interests of the country.

4 p.m.

The question of operation is not so much to be considered in connection with this Bill, because the Government apparently intend to leave the operation in the hands of the present company, under its own control and supervision. But surely that management cannot last. It can be at the best but a temporary arrangement and a new Parliament will certainly have to deal with this question. I submit that the proper way to deal with it is on the lines I have suggested.

But the question for discussion here is particularly the terms on which this property is to be acquired, and to my mind, if the public ownership of these railways is to be a success, the principal thing to be considered is that we should first, as is said by racing men, get away to a good start; we should start right in order to be sure that we shall end right. The first consideration in starting is the cost of this property, what shall we pay for it? The Government have introduced this Bill in which they set forth that they shall acquire this property at a price to be determined by arbitration. They therefore enact in the Bill that a price shall be paid for the outstanding stock, the 600,000 shares of stock still outstanding, this price to be fixed by arbitration. My contention is that, as there is no value to that stock, there is nothing to refer to a Board of Arbitrators, and there should be no arbitration in regard to the price of these outstanding shares. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) the other day, when addressing himself to this question, dwelt very strongly and somewhat lengthily on the equity of redemption, contending that there was an equity of redemption in the Canadian Northern Railway Company, which had a value, which value should be fixed. He said very emphatically that if there was a foreclosure, or if the property was taken over by expropriation, there would have to be a reference to the courts to determine the value of the property and the value of equity of redemption, and whether there was a value in the equity of redemption, and he contended that the value can be fixed under this Bill by arbitration as well as in any other matter. I submit that there is no equity of redemption, that there is no value to the stock.

Mr. BURNHAM: How could there be a foreclosure if there is no equity of redemption?

Mr. GERMAN: There is a very simple method of foreclosure which is provided for by the statute. This method of foreclosure was pointed out in 1914 by the Government very clearly and emphatically at the time that the Act providing for the guaranteeing of the $40,000,000 of securities was under discussion. At that time I read to the House certain language of the Prime Minister in regard to the method to be adopted in acquiring this property in the event of default. After I had concluded my remarks the Prime Minister stated that the suggestions which I had made had been frequently made on previous occasions, and as frequently answered. But I had never heard the suggestions made; much less had I heard them answered. The Minister of Finance, in his remarks on that question on Thursday last, made a similar statement. He said, however, not that these suggestions had been answered, but that they could be. He said he could very easily explain why proceedings should not be taken under section 24 of the Act of 1914 to acquire possession and control of this property. I should like to hear that explanation from the minister; I have not heard any up to this time either from him or from any other member of the Government. I have read what the Prime Minister said in 1914; let me read what the Minister of Finance said on that occasion when dealing with the subject of what method should be adopted in acquiring this property in the event of default. He said, page 3,943 of Hansard, 1914:

> If I have a mortgage on a company's undertaking I do not care very much for the stock as security except that it is advisable to have the stock in order that I can take possession of the company, put in my own receiver, and operate the company with my own board of directors. That is the only advantage. The stock does not give any higher security, but it makes the realization of the security a little more convenient. What security have we? I have seen a good deal of financing in my time, and I know something of law although my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) does not think so, and I want to say this: I have never seen as effectual a means of entering into possession of a property upon which a mortgage is held as has been devised by the Solicitor General in connection with this transaction.

Then he goes on to say, at page 3,944:

> I was dealing with the question of remedy upon default, and was pointing out that we have a much better control than would be afforded by the security of a majority or all of the stock of the Canadian Northern. What have we? Upon default, the Order in Council at once becomes a rule of court, and is absolutely beyond question so far as its authority is concerned. We can displace the board of directors of any or all of the companies by directors of our own choice, who are given power to carry on the road as provided in the resolutions, and it is open to the Government through Parliament to deal with that road by way of sale or otherwise, as may be expedient and in the public interests. It can be sold in whole or in part to a corporation, or it can be operated in the interests of the public of Canada.

I call upon the Minister of Finance to explain why he does not, under that Act, take over that property and operate it in the interests of the public of Canada. There is nothing to prevent his doing so; in fact, the majority report of the Drayton-Acworth Commission recommends it. At page LXXXIV, the commissioners say:

> In the case of the Canadian Northern Railway Company no proceedings in court are requisite. Under the provisions of section 24 of the Canadian Northern Railway Guarantee Act, 1914, the Governor General in Council has power, when authorized by Parliament, to declare by order, if default is made by the company in payment of interest on the $45,000,000 guaranteed securities (the interest on which is at present being found by the Government) that the equity of redemption of the company is absolutely barred and foreclosed; and thereupon the whole property becomes vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada.

I cannot understand what explanation the minister can make of his present attitude on this question, having regard to these recommendations made by the commissioners.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will turn to page LVIII of the Drayton-Acworth report he will find the recommendation that the trustees acquire this stock, just as we propose to acquire it, and continue the company as a going concern. They say that if the company is not willing to do that it can be forced to do it under the legislation of 1914. They suggest that the Canadian Northern Railway stock should be conveyed to the trustees precisely as we have determined that it shall be conveyed to the Dominion Government.

Mr. GERMAN: Assuming that the minister is right in that, why does he not go further? If it is his desire to carry out the suggestions of the commissioners in one particular, why not carry them out in other particulars? The commissioners say, it is true, that the trustees should acquire the stock, but they say, also, that the stock has absolutely no value; they do not recommend that the trustees pay anything for it. If the Canadian Northern refuses to hand over the stock, which the commissioners say they should do without consideration, the Government can exercise their right under section 24 of the Act of 1914. Let the Government carry out the suggestion of the commissioners. Let them say to the Canadian Northern Railway Company: You must hand over that 600,000 shares of stock; if you do not do so, we will take proceedings under section 24 of the Act of 1914. The commissioners say not only that the shares are of no value, but that the liabilities against the property are many millions more than the property is worth. They do suggest, however, that a sort of honorarium ought to be given to Mackenzie and Mann for their services, their time and trouble; they mention $1,500,000 worth of stock as being the maximum consideration in that regard. There is no suggestion that Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern Railway Company should receive cash. They say that as Mackenzie and Mann have devoted much time and trouble to the building of a good road through a prosperous section of the country, the Government might reasonable consider it fair and equitable to give them some compensation for their years of labour. But what are the Government doing? They are referring to a board of arbitration the question of what value shall be given to these shares at the time of the signing of the agreement between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Government.

The Government is actually suggesting that there is a value or price of some kind to be put on the shares, and no doubt the Canadian Northern will suggest that to their counsel who appear before the arbitrators. They will say to the arbitrators: There is some value in these shares; it is for you to fix what that value is. That value, moreover, is to be fixed as of the time the agreement is signed, and at a time that agreement is signed, those shares will have a very much greater value than they have at the present time. If they have no value at the present time, the mere fact that the Government is taking over the property, assuming all the liabilities, gives a value to those shares which Messrs. Drayton and Acworth say have no value. Why should not the findings of this Royal Commission be accepted by the Government? The Royal Commission was composed of expert railwaymen. Mr. A. H. Smith, president of the New York Central Railroad, is one of the best railway men in America; Mr. W. M. Acworth is one of the leading authorities on railway matters, and Sir Henry Drayton is undoubtedly a man of experience in railway matters. They have gone into this question fully, impartially and with a desire to ascertain definitely and to put before the country clearly the true situation in regard to the whole railway problem in Canada, and to recommend to the Government and to the Canadian people what should be done in that regard in view of existing conditions. What do they find? I have already given the findings in this House and they might be stated again, because at the present time there is not any question of as great importance as this railway question. It is a matter that must be grappled with courageously and dealt with frankly, honestly and squarely in the interest of the people of this country. This is a gigantic undertaking for the people of Canada to assume, and it will require careful and honest management. This Royal Commission ascertained the value of the property from three different aspects. In the first place they valued it as a cash investment, the cash actually put into the property, and they found that to amount to $383,302,451. There is no reason in the world why any one should dispute the accuracy of those figures. The commission had the best men they could get to aid them in their inquiry, and I have not heard of those figures being disputed, even by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. They also say:

> We find then $370,000,000 to be the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern system as at present existing. In other words, as indeed is frankly admitted by Canadian Northern witnesses, the Canadian Northern shares represent no cash investment.

They also ascertained the value on the physical basis, and they say that the actual value of the road on a physical basis in its present condition is $357,409,678, and that the equipment is at the present time worth $45,339,985, making a total of $402,749,663. Then they ascertained the value of the property as a going concern, and on that basis they say that the shares have absolutely no value. In view of all that, if the Government is desirous of dealing with this matter fairly, and honestly in the interest of the people who are to own the road, I cannot understand why the Government should assert that there is a value to those shares.

On Thursday last the Minister of Finance stated that there had been something like $65,000,000 of an error made in the calculations of the Royal Commision; that there was about $25,000,000 of liabilities which had been added which should not have been added, and that there was about $40,000,000 of assets which had not been considered. I understand that is quite incorrect. I understand that those assets and liabilities, so called, were considered by the Royal Commission, and I believe, before the discussion on this Bill is concluded, it will be shown conclusively that those assets and liabilities were taken into consideration and were dealt with along with the other assets and liabilities of the company. But, supposing there had been an error as is suggested, what would the effect be? We find that the actual value of the property as ascertained by the Royal Commission is $370,000,000. What are the liabilities? According to the balance sheet of last year the liabilities of the Canadian Northern, leaving out the stock and a balance of about $39,000,000 which they claim as a profit, we have the actual liabilities of the company as $438,000,000. Assuming for a moment that there is an error of $65,000,000, that will leave $373,000,000 as the liabilities which the people of Canada will assume in taking over this property. The Royal Commissioners say that, under no possible circumstances, could the property have cost more than $370,000,000, so that even supposing there had been an error of $65,000,000, as is contended, there is still a surplus of liabilities, over any money which could have been put into the road, of more than $3,000,000.

That being so, I really cannot understand why the Government is deliberately attempting to give several million dollars more to these men or to their creditors—because that is what it will mean. I have no desire that Mackenzie and Mann should be dealt with harshly, but we must remember that Mackenzie and Mann took the chances of keeping all the stock in their own hands and of financing this great system by government guarantees and bonuses and land grants, without putting one dollar of their own private money into the enterprise, or paying one dollar for the stock. If Mackenzie and Mann had in the beginning associated with themselves some strong financial man who were really interested in railway operation, and if these men had put their money into the system and paid something for the shares, I would feel that they were entitled to get something out of it. But Mackenzie and Mann have financed the road altogether on public money. Not one dollar of their own money has gone into the road, and what is more, Mackenzie and Mann were the contractors who built the road for the company at their own price. Mackenzie and Mann gave the contract for building the road to themselves at their own price; there was no competition whatever, and they then sublet the work to other contractors, undoubtedly at a figure which would yield them a profit on the work. I, for one, do not believe that Mackenzie and Mann during all these years have not made money for themselves out of this gigantic enterprise. It is absolutely unbelievable. I cannot believe it myself, nor do I think any man in this country will believe it. Mackenzie and Mann themselves have never taken the trouble to deny it. It is true that Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Hanna have stated that the books of the company do not show that any money has been paid to Mackenzie and Mann, but every one knows that there are a thousand-and-one ways in which money can be paid out without it appearing in the books of the company as having been paid to any particular person, and until I see their statement under oath, I, for one, cannot and will not believe that Mackenzie and Mann have made no profit out of this enterprise from the beginning up to the present time.

I have given as distinctly as I could the views I hold on this question. As I have said, it is a gigantic undertaking for the people of Canada to assume. We are running up in this country an enormous indebtedness in consequence of this disastrous war, but even before the war, there was an enormous increase in our public debt, and it behooves us who represent the people in this Parliament to take the greatest possible care that the indebtedness of Canada is not unduly and unnecessarily increased. By the taking over of this property we shall be adding enormously to our burdens. We are actually assuming a burden of many million dollars more than the property costs or could be duplicated for to-day, and on top of that, the Government is suggesting that Mackenzie and Mann have an equity of redemption in this property. Notwithstanding what has been said by the Royal Commissioners, the Government suggests that these shares have a value, and that the value should be fixed by arbitration. I deprecate as strongly as I can any such suggestion. I say that the Government should act under section 24 in the manner they told this Parliament they would act. The Government in 1914 took credit for having so carefully safeguarded the interests of the people, and pledged themselves to the people of Canada that if default took place, they would take over the property and operate it, so the Minister of Finance said, "in the interests of the public of Canada." I call on the Government now to carry out in good faith the pledge which they made at that time, and which was embodied in the Act of 1914. It is perhaps well that I should read section 24, in order that the matter may be fully understood:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MORPHY: If the hon. gentleman knew that there was an equity of say, one million dollars, coming to Mackenzie and Mann, would he advocate that the Government rob Mackenzie and Mann of that amount and put it in the treasury?

Mr. GERMAN: If there was an equity of a million dollars coming to Mackenzie and Mann, I would say that they should have a million dollars. I do not want to rob Mackenzie and Mann. But what I cannot understand is why the Government should even suggest that there is an equity in the face of the statement that has been made by men of the highest standing in this country and of long experience in railway matters, that there is no equity. What body of men could be got together who could make a more thorough, a more honest, and a more trustworthy investigation that could be relied on implicitly, than the one made by Messrs. Drayton and Acworth?

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it not true that they overlooked $25,000,000?

Mr. GERMAN: That statement has been made, but I have been told that such is not the case. I think it will be shown before this debate is ended that Messrs. Drayton, Acworth and Smith took those assets and liabilities into consideration. The Finance Minister shakes his head. But even assuming that a mistake was made, if we give them credit for $65,000,000, there is still a burden of liabilities over and above the value of the property, which, on whatever basis you make the calculation, amounts to about $3,000,000.

How can hon. gentlemen even suggest that there is such a value. I read the other day the remarks made by the Prime Minister in 1914. In speaking of the properties and the interests which were foreclosed he said: "It includes Mackenzie and Mann as a corporation and Mackenzie and Mann individually . . . they agreed that they will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim," etc. It is all on Hansard, and there is no use repeating it. Mackenzie and Mann individualy agreed that in the event of default no claim would be made by them for compensation for any equity of redemption. They are estopped now from saying there is any value, seeing that they have agreed themselves out of court. That being so, how is it possible for the Government to justify placing the question as to the value of those shares before a board of arbitrators?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Might I ask the hon. member for Welland a question? Does he not believe that Sir William Meredith as an arbitrator will deal out justice to the people of the Dominion?

Mr. GERMAN: It has been stated by an hon. member of this House, formerly high in the councils of the Government, that any judge who acted on a board for compensation was a grafter, or something of that kind. That was the term he employed towards Mr. Justice Galt.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Does the hon. gentleman insinuate that Mr. Justice Meredith would be a grafter if he were to receive any remuneration from the Government?

Mr. GERMAN: I do not insinuate anything. One of the hon. members of this House high in the councils of the Government made that statement recently. I will not say it is true, but the hon. gentleman endorsed it. Probably my hon. friend was one of the seventy who endorsed Hon. Robert Rogers.

An hon. MEMBER: He does not deny it.

Mr. GERMAN: I say in view of the fact that the Government pledged itself in 1914 to the country and to Parliament that in case of default it would take proceedings under section 24 of the Act and take over this whole property, appointing its own directors, the Government should be censured, and I believe it will be censured by the people of the country for now coming down with a proposition to compensate Mackenzie and Mann for something into which they have not put a dollar of their own money, and for which they have, in my opinion at any rate, been more than liberally compensated. My contention is the Government should do as it agreed to do, and take over this property, as recommended by the Royal Commission and as it pledged itself to do in its statement made in 1914.

Mr. STEVENS: I had not intended participating in this debate, as I was most anxious that we should hasten the closing of this rather protracted session, which is excessively burdensome upon those of us who are compelled to be away from our homes so long. It has, however, been borne in upon my mind during the past week or two that behind the opposition to this measure there is a very potent and subtle influence, which, in my estimation, smacks more of "direct interests" rather than of the political aspect of the question—an influence working behind the scenes, veiled from public scrutiny, a self-seeking power interested in defeating the measure. However, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) a day or two ago threw out a challenge to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to defend this Bill or this policy if we dared so to do. He rather insinuated that because we had remained silent we were afraid to support the policy the Government has brought down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, because of that and of the other reasons I have mentioned, I consider it my duty to state to the House my views on the question and my reasons for supporting the policy of the Government. I do so with a great deal of confidence and satisfaction, because I feel that the measure the Government has presented to the House and to the country is a proposal which, when properly grasped by the people of the country, will meet with general approval. I support the measure because it marks a new era in the railway history of Canada. It is a step forward towards the acquisition of the control and direction and the ownership of the great railway systems of Canada beginning by taking over the second largest system, the Canadian Northern Railway, a system comprising some ten thousand miles of road. The main burden of the criticisms of hon. gentlemen opposite against the Government has been "why does it not act under section 24 of the Bill of 1914?" They suggest that for some sinister reason the Government is seeking to evade the powers given to it by Parliament under that Bill. I would like to call the attention of the committee to the wording of the section referred to:

> If authorized by Parliament the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions, if any, as Parliament may prescribe foreclose the equity of redemption.... etc.

In other words section 24 of the Act of 1914 lays upon this Parliament the responsibility of saying in what manner the terms of the agreement shall be enforced or taken advantage of. That is exactly what the Government is doing. It comes before the House now after three years of war intervening since the passing of that Act, and says to Parliament: "This is what we recommend having in view the circumstances with which we are surrounded and the conditions which have been brought about because of the war since the passing of the Act of 1914." The idea is exactly what hon. gentlemen opposite have been urging upon the Government, namely the securing of control of the road. It is quite true that the method taken is not precisely that suggested in clause 24, but it is useless for hon. gentlemen to split hairs, legally speaking, over the question of foreclosure of the equity of redemption as against the purchase of the stock. Any hon. gentleman knows, who knows the law that if you foreclose a mortgage, the mortgagor has some right to be heard in that foreclosure. That is a principle which runs through all British law, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it very well.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And, section 24 was alleged by the Government to be for the very purpose of avoiding foreclosure before the courts.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not claim to be such a lawyer as my hon. friend but I will make a suggestion, inasmuch as the British North America Act provides that the powers of legislation regarding property and civil rights belong to the provinces, is there not good room for an appeal against that statute under the British North America Act?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman ask me a question?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I am not, because I know if I asked the hon. gentleman a question he would take all afternoon to answer it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That agreement was made, and the Government is bound by the statutory agreement.

Mr. STEVENS: I simply draw attention to a fact, which no amount of argument will dispel. The fact is there and I say there is ground for appeal against that law in that way. However, we will pass this over for a moment.

What do we get from hon. gentlemen opposite to help us out of this dilemma which they say we are in? What are the suggestions? Two or three suggest a receivership. Others suggest that we dispose of the assets of this company; others suggest liquidation, and still others suggest that we give them further loans and see if they will not work out their own salvation. All these suggestions have been made in a cursory manner not with any degree of seriousness and simply with a desire to confuse the issue which is now before Parliament.

Let me call attention to some of the suggestions which have been made. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said very emphatically that we required three transcontinental railways in Canada. The hon. member for Rouville says that:

> The Government has no mandate to commit the country to the immediate completion of that third transcontinental railway.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea), following along that line, said the other day:

> I am bound to say that whoever were responsible for two transcontinental railways being built, east of Port Arthur and some distance west of Edmonton, were very much lacking in judgment.

His own leader says:

> I accept fullest responsibility for the policy —that this country required no less than three lines of railway.

With such a conflict of views as this, with no seriousness in the suggestions or criticisms, I ask what are we to accept as the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with this matter.

I wish to discuss one policy suggested by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) very frequently in the numerous times that he has addressed the committee. He has suggested that a valuation be made of the physical assets of the road, and that they be disposed of and divided among the security-holders.

That is suggested by the hon. member for St. John. I would like to ask him, or the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), how they propose to make this disposition of the assets of the road. Would they sell the track to one person, the rolling stock to another, the telegraph company to some one else and the express company to some one else, or would they sell the road as a going concern? If they are going to dispose of the road as a going concern, to whom would they dispose of it? There is only one company to whom they could dispose of it. I have a great deal of respect for the views of a corporation lawyer on matters appertaining to corporation rights, but I question the judgment of gentlemen who are corporation lawyers, when they are dealing with what is in the interest of the public in conflict with that which is in the interest of corporations. While I have a great deal of respect for the opinion of some of these hon. gentlemen, I question their judgment in a matter of this kind. I ask how they are going to dispose of this road and to whom? If they are going to dispose of the institution as a going concern, there is only one buyer, that is known to the country, and that is the Canadian Pacific railway. Either the Government must take over this system or the Canadian Pacific railway will take it over. The hon. member for St. John could not have been serious when he suggested that the assets be disposed of and divided amongst the security holders. That, of course, is impossible.

Let us look for a moment at the only possible manner of carrying out this suggestion, by disposing of it to the Canadian Pacific railway. Every one knows, and I think the financial interests of this country particularly know, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is exceedingly anxious to acquire this system and that it would pay very handsomely for it. I think I am quite safe in saying that Lord Shaughnessy would not deny that there were negotiations to this end. But, Sir, the question that this House and this committee must ask is: Is it in the interest of Canada that the Canadian Pacific railway should acquire this system? I submit that there are only two alternatives. One is that the Government must take it and the other is that the Canadian Pacific railway should take it. Before an amalgamation can take place between any of the great railway systems in Canada, if I remember aright, the approval of Parliament must be secured, or at least the approval of the Government. The only thing that stands between the amalgamation of the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific railway is the Government. If the Government gave its approval, this amalgamation might take place. I hold that the time has arrived when this Parliament should be thoroughly seized of this fact and should make it utterly impossible, for the time being and in the future, for the Canadian Pacific railway to control the Canadian Northern system. On the other hand, I claim that this is the time to take the first great step towards the nationalization of railways in Canada.

A great deal has been said on this debate as to the gifts and assistance that have been given to the Canadian Northern. It is quite right that we should take all these things into consideration. But it is well that we should ask ourselves the question, when dealing with the Canadian Northern railway, as it is being constantly compared with the Canadian Pacific railway: What placed the Canadian Pacific railway in the strong position which it occupies in Canada to-day. Was it built out of the money of the investors? The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), who has just taken his seat, spent a considerable time attacking the Canadian Northern promoters because they had not put, as he said, one cent of their own money into the system. As a matter of fact, they put in some money, but not anything like the full amount required. Did the promoters of the Canadian Pacific railway put their own money into the system to any great extent? Let us look at some of the figures. I find that the Canadian Pacific railway have received from the Dominion and the provinces:

Cash subsidies	$ 67,000,000
Lands sold	123,800,000
Lands unsold	119,250,000
For surveys by Gov., etc.	37,750,000
	$337,800,000

In all, they have received gifts to the value of $337,000,000. As a matter of fact, I am informed that the figure is greater than that but that figure is quite sufficient for the point I intend to make. The interest on the $67,000,000 of cash subsidies granted to the Canadian Pacific railway at 4½ per cent amounts to in the neighbourhood of $3,000,000 annually. If you take the interest for thirty years you will find that nearly $100,000,000 of interest has been thus placed in the coffers of the Canadian Pacific railway. I include this interest for this reason: The guarantees given to the Canadian Northern, of which I shall say something later on, are interest bearing and they have to pay the interest out of earnings from year to year. The gifts to the Canadian Pacific railway bear no interest. The value of the money is in the road and they have to pay no interest upon it. Then, we have this result, that the Canadian Pacific railway cost $354,000,000 according to the statement in their last balance sheet. That is for the road exclusive of equipment.

In other words, they have received in cash bonuses from this country, as a free gift, outright, from the people of Canada, a sum almost equal to the total cost of their road. Let us look at the corresponding figures for the Canadian Northern railway. They have received total cash subsidies from all sources of $38,800,000 as against $68,000,000 cash subsidies to the Canadian Pacific railway. Then they have realized from the cash sale of lands, and realized by way of debenture bonds, $34,000,000, a total of approximately $73,000,000, which they have received in outright gifts from this country this amount. In addition to that, they have equity in land to the value of $4,000,000 still in hand, or a total of gifts of $78,400,000, as against $337,000,000 given to the Canadian Pacific railway. This should be taken into consideration when we compare these two great systems. To proceed with this comparison in another way, let me point out that in the Canadian Pacific railway annual statement, and also in the Drayton-Acworth report, we find that the Canadian Pacific railway still have 11,500,000 acres of land, including townsites, etc., in their possession. Much of this is in localities close to transportation, close to towns and villages, and in arable districts suitable for cultivation. They also show in the same balance sheet cash on hand of $57,000,000, and in addition to that $23,000,000 as a reserve against contingencies. I therefore ask if it would not be desirable, in this age and time, when there is such a demand for increase of production, that instead of holding these arable lands, the gift of the people of Canada, the Canadian Pacific railway should spend, or invest, its contingency reserve of $23,000,000 in the development of some of these lands close to the towns, cities and villages of Western Canada? That is a suggestion which I think is quite in order, and one that might well be considered by the Canadian Pacific railway. I go further. In 1909 the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who was then in power, and his Government, gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the right to issue an additional block of stock amounting to $30,000,000. This was issued at $125 when the stock was selling on the market at $184, netting to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company $17,700,000. Then, in January, 1912, by the Act of 1911, another $18,000,000 was distributed at $150, when the stock was selling at $236 on the market, making another gift to the Canadian Pacific railway shareholders of $15,000,000. The reason I cite this, and the reason I draw attention to these figures which I have already cited, is that these gifts were given to the Canadian Pacific railway because it was known that, in the earlier periods of construction, they would have difficulty in paying their way without levying exorbitant freight rates. The object in the construction of the railway was to encourage the transportation of goods throughout Canada. The object of the Canadian Northern railway is exactly the same, to encourage the development of the transportation facilities of this country and to keep down freight rates within reasonable bounds. But instead of applying the gifts of the country for the purpose of keeping down freight rates, these gifts have been used by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the sole purpose of swelling the dividends of its shareholders.

The suggestion is made that we should allow the Canadian Northern railway to go into the hands of a receiver. I must say, to give credit to most of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that this has not been received with any very great

5 p.m. favour. But this has been suggested, and my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) said that he was thoroughly in favour of it, although he bowed to the wishes of the majority. I simply wish to point out that if this road were allowed to go into liquidation or into the hands of a receiver, it would have an exceedingly serious effect on the credit of the country. Not only that, it would dissipate or destroy, to a large degree, the value of the organization built up by the Canadian Northern railway system. It is just as impossible successfully to follow out the policy suggested by the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), namely, to dispose of the assets of the road and divide them among the security holders, as it is to let it go into the hands of a receiver.

Our great object at this time is to do two things, first to preserve the transportation facilities that have been developed in Western Canada and, second, to do this with as little loss as is possible. I am quite satisfied with the arbitrator appointed by the Government, that is Sir William Meredith. I do not think a fairer or more just man could be secured. I deprecate very much the reflections cast upon Sir William Meredith by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) a few minutes ago. Sir William is above reproach, one of the ablest men on the bench. This is, however, a question which affects western Canada particularly and one which perhaps a western man would understand better than an eastern man, and if I had had my way a western man would have been appointed as arbitrator; but as the Government have chosen Sir William Meredith, I am content as I think that, so far as character is concerned, no better choice could have been made.

I believe that the time has come when we should take a very broad and very generous and very deep view of this question of transportation in Canada. I believe that the time has come when all the railway systems of Canada should be taken under the control and direction of the Government. When I say all, I include the Canadian Pacific railway, because, in view of these very large grants that have been given to the Canadian Pacific railway, I am led to ask the question, has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company played the game with the country to the extent of these grants that have been given to it? Is the country getting the freight rates to which it is entitled? Let me give the House one brief illustration of the freight rate problems that we are faced with on the Pacific coast. Up to about 1907, the Canadian Pacific railway gave the people of the Pacific coast the privilege of shipping freight 400 miles eastward as against shipments by Montreal merchants 2,600 miles westward; in other words, we paid as much to ship freight to Golden, B.C., as the merchants of Montreal paid to ship to the same point. There is no ground on which that can be justified, and yet that is what we are faced with. To-day we have the splendid privilege of shipping freight as far as Calgary, 600 miles, against the Montreal merchant shipping to Calgary 2,300 or 2,400 miles. I cite this to show that the freight rate question of Canada is one of the most important, and that the time has come when we should ask ourselves the question: Are we getting a square deal from this enormous railway corporation in comparison with the assistance given to it by the people of Canada in these grants of land and of cash? To my mind a Board should be appointed to administer the railway affairs of this country and to pay to the stockholders of the different railways taken over a fair and reasonable dividend. If you examine the reports of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for as many years back as you care to go, you will find that these land subsidies that we gave to them for the purpose of minimizing the freight rates of the company have simply been spent in giving dividends to the shareholders and swelling the price of the stock of the company. I have no objection to the earnings of the Canadian Pacific railway being used up as dividends, but I do object to the proceeds of subsidies given by the people of this country being used in that manner.

We have a further suggestion from the honourable member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) which I wish to consider for a very few moments. He says that the Government should expropriate the railway and the rolling stock of the company, and nothing more; that we should leave the company in existence; leave it its stock and its liabilities. His suggestion is that we should take possession of the physical assets of the road, but that we should let the company keep its organization, its officials, its telegraph and express companies—all the things that make the operation of a railway possible. But how would possession of the railway and its rolling stock be acquired? In order to take over the road and the rolling stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company you would have to float a new government loan. It may be interesting for the committee to note the price paid by the Canadian Northern Railway Company for its money. For instance, the company floated loans amounting to $270,000,000 in Great Britain at a cost of 4·347 per cent. Where could we get money at that rate or anything like that rate to-day? Honourable gentlemen on the other side have criticised the Government because they had to pay six per cent and more for a loan in the New York market. Yet they suggest that we should expropriate the physical assets of this road, purchase them outright, and leave the company in existence. I mention this merely to show how absurd it is to suggest that at this time we expropriate the road and pay off the securities to any considerable extent.

It has been suggested by the member for St. John and others that the $147,000,000 of unsecured bonds of the Canadian Northern Railway Company should not cause the Government any anxiety, that, if there is not sufficient money to pay for them, they should be allowed to go. It is suggested that, as these bonds were sold at a very low rate, no serious loss would be involved if this course was adopted. As a matter of fact, $110,000,000 of the $147,000,000 of unsecured bonds were sold at about 96 on the British market, or at a cost to the company of 4½ per cent—which is a very favourable issue. Moreover, practically the full amount of the issue of these bonds went into the road. Of the land grant bonds, $12,250,000 were sold in Great Britain at 94, the net cost to the company being 4·98 per cent. The proceeds of these, as well as of those that were sold in this country, went into the road. Notwithstanding these facts, hon. gentlemen opposite suggest that the Government should repudiate those bonds. This is what the member for St. John says:

> There are something like $147,000,000 of securities which are not guaranteed by the Dominion or the provinces. I presume these securities are held by strong financial men, by bankers and others, who could afford to lose a portion of their securities.

I submit that it is unworthy of a member of this committee to suggest that simply because these bonds may be held by individuals who can afford to lose them, the country should repudiate its responsibilities and allow the bonds to go by default. My contention is that the full proceeds of the bond and land sales of the Canadian Northern Railway Company have gone into the road. So far as we can gather from a most careful scrutiny of the accounts of the company—I myself have gone over them carefully, and I know that other gentlemen have done so—the proceeds of the sale of securities of this road have gone into its construction, none being diverted to other uses. That being the case, it is fair and reasonable that this country should recognize and accept the full responsibility of those securities. If, as suggested by the member for St. John, the bonds had been sold at 50, there would be some reason for asking for an adjustment. But in view of the fact that they were sold at 96 and 98, there is no reason why we should repudiate any portion of the unsecured bonds of the company.

In 1914 the leader of the Opposition and the member for St. John suggested that in the legislation then being enacted we should insert a provision that the maximum purchase price of the stock should be $30,000,000. I assume that that suggestion was made seriously. It was not thought desirable, however, to accept the suggestion at that time, because practically all the members of the House, especially the western members, expected that the Canadian Northern Railway Company would be able to pull itself out of its financial difficulties. Within a month or so after the House prorogued war broke out, and from that day to this it has been utterly impossible for the Canadian Northern or any other corporation to do its financing in Great Britain or in New York. But although this suggestion was not accepted in 1914, there is no reason why the principle should not be adopted to-day, in view of the changed circumstances. There is, however, this difference: At that time it was suggested that the value of the stock might well be set at $30,000,000. Here we make no limitation. Hon. gentlemen may say: Why do you not fix a maximum price? But if the Government had put in a maximum price of $5,000,000, $10,000,000, or any other amount, hon. gentlemen opposite—the member for St. John, the member for Pictou and others—would have alleged that the Government intended to give Mackenzie and Mann that amount of money. The only sane and proper method is to leave the arbitrators absolutely free and untramelled in coming to a decision in this matter. I suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite who object to this Bill that the measure is a fair one; that it will give the country a railway system second only to the Canadian Pacific Railway system, and that it will be the first step in Canada towards the nationalization of railways.

Not only will it do that, but it will introduce that system in a manner that will enable us to work it out free from party patronage, so far as that is possible. I join with many others who have said previously in this debate that, if it is humanly possible, political and party patronage should be eliminated from the administration of the railways of Canada, and I believe there is a genuine effort to do that, I believe further the people of this country desire it.

We are faced with one issue—shall the Canadian Pacific railway control this country by owning the railway systems of the country, or shall the Government enter upon a project of a Government-owned railway system? That is the clear issue before us, and there is no use in disguising the fact. I am going to read to the committee extracts from an editorial on the front page of the Toronto Star, and I do not think any hon. genlteman will charge the Toronto Star with being a Tory paper, or prejudiced in favour of the Government, or, in any sense, tramelled in its opinions, because if it is one thing, it is radically democratic. I will read a few extracts from this editorial in order to impress upon the committee, much more forcibly than my own arguments would do, the seriousness of the present situation and the necessity of Parliament facing it, in order that the committee may realize that the time has come when we must choose between the continuation of corporate control and direction or government ownership and direction of railways. The editorial says:

> The decision of the Government to take over the Canadian Northern railway and also its express and telegraph systems is, we believe, an absolutely right one, and if the details of the plans put forward need to be improved, Parliament is in session for the very purpose of doing such work in the public behalf.

That, I think, is worthy of consideration. I am willing to join with any hon. gentleman in improving the details of this Bill, but what we should do is to suggest any improvements that we think should be made, and not generally, as has been largely done in the criticism offered, to damn the Bill. The editorial goes on:

> It is necessary that in Parliament, the press and throughout the country, every force favourable to public ownership should now be exerted, because against the Government in this matter is being exerted all the influence possessed by the Canadian Pacific railway and all its allied interests. It is a formidable power that confronts the Government to prevent the nationalization of the Canadian Northern railway and its subsidiary companies. It is a power that does not hesitate to believe that it can pull down governments when it undertakes to do so.

Then it says further on:

The country has long enough been owned by the railways. It is time the railwaps were owned by the country—for the country has pretty well paid for them.

In view of the huge figures that I have given, namely, $337,000,000 as a gift to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the other figures we have heard so often, that clause has particular significance. The editorial goes on:

Every Liberal member of Ottawa who professes to believe in public ownership ought to show it now, and, instead of obstructing Canadian Northern railway purchase because of certain details, should strive to remedy defects and aid the Government in putting through this railway nationalization project.... Aside from party altogether there is before the country a straight public ownership issue. The Government proposes to take over the Canadian Northern railway. Opposition to this action is led by the Canadian Pacific railway and allied interests, and the aim is to prevent public ownership of the railway, express, and telegraph services concerned. People need make no mistake. If the Canadian Northern railwap were allowed to go into liquidation, if it dropped into a receivership, it would bounce from there into the hands of the Canadian Pacific railway.

That is exactly what I have been trying to point out this afternoon, namely, that if we allow this road to go into the hands of the receivers, into liquidation, or if we dispose of it in any other way, there is only one place where it can drop and that, as the Toronto Star says, is into the lap of the Canadian Pacific railway. That is where the influences opposing this Bill so potently and forcibly throughout this country are so anxious to have it drop. They know perfectly well, if the present Bill can be defeated, if it can be delayed or put off, the chances of working up a measure which will bring about such a condition will, so far as the Canadian Pacific railway is concerned, be exceedingly bright.

It is suggested, in connection with the proposed amalgamation with the Canadian Pacific—and I commend this to my hon. friends from Western Canada in particular—that inasmuch as the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific railways cannot handle the freight to-day at the present rates and show a profit, there should be allowed an increase of 10 per cent in freight rates. That is not an unreasonable suggestion, but let us look at it for a moment. If you allow a 10 per cent increase in freight rates to the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific, you will have at the same time to give it to the Canadian Pacific. Such an increase would mean an additional $30,000,000 from the shipping public of Canada. How much of that would go into the coffers of the Canadian Pacific? Exactly $18,000,000. The Canadian Pacific are paying a dividend of 10 per cent; they have $119,000,000 worth of lands unsold yet, and they have, therefore, no need of that increase at all. I suggest that the Government take over the Canadian Northern Railway Company and carry it on at the present freight rates. If there is a loss of, say, $12,000,000 on the operation of the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific let us foot the bill. Instead of the people of Canada paying $18,000,000 into the coffers of the Canadian Pacific, let us by a direct payment from the public treasury make up any deficit in the freight rates of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and Grand Trunk Pacific. That is an infinitely better proposition than increasing the freight rates, because, as the saying is, the people pay the piper, and the $30,000,000 will come out of the pockets of the people, whether you take it directly or indirectly. Therefore, we should take the first step in government ownership and nationalization of our railways by acquiring the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. I have absolute and untramelled confidence in Sir William Meredith as a just, fair and honourable arbitrator on behalf of the people of Canada. How any hon. gentleman can, for one moment, question the fairness of an arbitration carried on under him is beyond me. If there is anything to pay it will, in all fairness, be paid, and we, as members of Parliament, and as representatives of the people of Canada are willing to see that that is done. If there is no value in those snares we may rest assured that Sir William Meredith will be the last men in Canada to declare a value where there is none.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is Sir William Meredith to be the sole arbitrator? Does not the Bill provide for three arbitrators?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Sir William Meredith then will be in a minority?

Mr. STEVENS: The interest of the people of Canada is placed in the hands of Sir William Meredith. Furthermore, my hon. friend knows that there is provision for an appeal to the Supreme Court in the case of a difference of opinion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the Bill provides that an award will be made according to the opinion or judgment of the arbitrators without evidence; how could you appeal to the Supreme Court for judgment without evidence?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is asking perhaps one of the most ticklish legal questions—I was going to say quibbles—that could be raised in connection with this Bill. That was discussed here in detail by the Solicitor General and the Minister of Finance. There is no question in my mind that, should there be a disagreement, there is a perfect right of appeal to the Supreme Court and besides the Bill has been amended to make that clear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my hon. friend know that where a statute expressly gives the arbitrators the power to determine a matter according to their own judgment without evidence, it would be impossible to have an appeal?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend knows that that is absurd. No board of arbitrators would decide on such a question offhand of their own judgment without evidence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is just what the Bill says they may do. I was not aware that the hon. member for Calgary had first brought this point to the attention of the House, but I can well understand that he would do so. It is one of the most extraordinary provisions I ever saw.

Mr. STEVENS: That section has been amended anyway.

Mr. MURPHY: After listening attentively to the address of my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) I think I am within the judgment of the members of this committee when I say that his observations have made it clear to the House and to the country that the Government has decided to adopt as its defence to the criticism offered from this side of the House on the measure before the committee, abuse of the Canadian Pacific railway, or perhaps it would be more correct for me to say, attacks upon the Canadian Pacific railway. If that be the only defence that the Government has to the criticism offered, then nobody on this side of the House, least of all the individual who is now addressing the committee, should object to the adoption of such cuttlefish methods by the Government. It is true that a campaign of this kind may for the moment becloud the issue, but it is still more true that such a campaign will not mislead the public for any length of time.

My hon. friend from Vancouver began his address by saying that there was a subtle influence at work behind the opposition to this Bill; an influence, I think he said, that was based on self-interest. I presume it is unnecessary to disavow any personal interest in my own case, but possibly it is just as well that I should do so, because I desire to make some further reference to this phase of my hon. friend's argument. What he said reminded me that after the speech delivered by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett)—a prominent supporter of the Government, and a very important member of the Conservative party—the Government press throughout the country took sudden alarm. The day following the delivery of that address, there were numerous editorials in the Government press throughout the Dominion sounding a note of warning and urging the Government in the frankest possible terms to pay heed to what had been said by the hon. member for Calgary, and to take every possible means to safeguard the public interest in connection with this legislation. The Ottawa Journal joined in giving that warning to the Government. Within a few days, however, a change was noticed in the editorial opinions of the Government press, and then for the first time it began to be stated publicly that the opposition to this Bill came from the Canadian Pacific railway and from the Bank of Montreal. The Ottawa Journal, I think, in referring to the memorial presented against this measure by some of the prominent citizens of Montreal, men ranking high in the professional and business life of that city, referred to the click of the cash register. My hon. friend from Vancouver this afternoon followed very closely in the wake of that line of argument. I am told that my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) made a refutation of that accusation at the opening of this afternoon's session.

So far as I am concerned, I certainly voice no Canadian Pacific railway interests. I have no more interest in the Canadian Pacific railway that I have in the Canadian Northern, and in opposing this measure I am acting solely upon what I conceive to be my duty as one of the representatives of the people. The Ottawa Citizen on Saturday last dealt very briefly with this argument advanced by the Government press, and in the course of a brief editorial had this to say:

> The attempt of the Government press to create the impression that the taking over of the Canadian Northern railway system by the Government has resolved itself into a struggle between the interests represented by the C.P.R. allied with the Bank of Montreal, and the Administration, is obviously political camouflage of the most amateurish sort.
> The C.P.R. may desire the defeat of the present proposal; so may the Bank of Montreal; so may large moneyed interests in the metropolis and elsewhere. With that the people of the Dominion need not be concerned at this time. What is of the utmost importance is that the terms of the proposed acquisition be not lost sight of in this cloud of political dust. The outstanding fact is that the Administration proposes to arbitrate a matter of sixty million dollars, more or less, and that according to the terms of the bond between the Dominion and the Canadian Northern Company in 1914 the latter, as represented now in its holders of capital stock, is not entitled to one dollar of the money of the Canadian taxpayers.

I will have occasion to refer to the question of value later on, and I need not labour that point now. I desire, however, before proceeding to refer to one or two other matters that were touched upon by the hon. member for Vancouver. May I point out that in recalling the position taken on this side of the House in 1914, my hon. friend did not fully state all the terms of the amendment that was then introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley). I will have occasion to go into that later on in my remarks, and I need not dwell upon it now. I mention it merely to point out that while my hon. friend's argument in that respect was incomplete, it was altogether in accordance with the line of argument which now emanates from the government press and from the supporters of the Government.

The hon. member for Vancouver also took occasion to give quite unnecessary testimonials of character to Sir William Meredith, who has been proposed as the Government arbitrator in this matter. I am not aware that any person on this side of the House has cast any reflection whatever on Sir William Meredith, but there is an observation that might have been made, and not having been made, I propose to make it. There is just the possibility that his political friends may overwork Sir William Meredith. It may have escaped the observation of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that even since the Minister of Finance announced that Sir William Meredith was to be the arbitrator in connection with the valuation of the Canadian Northern railway stock, the Ontario Government has placed Sir William Meredith at the head of another board of arbitration, and, as I say, it is just possible that his political friends may overwork Sir William Meredith in showing their regard for him. It also is a matter of interest, I think, to make inquiry whether Sir William Meredith will be able to discharge the duties which are sought to be cast upon him under this arbitration, since he has accepted, so the newspapers say, the appointment offered to him by the Provincial Government in connection with another matter. So much for the observations of my hon. friend from Vancouver.

In the earlier stages of this discussion hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and I think possibly one or two hon. gentlemen opposite as well, sought to get from the Minister of Finance certain information that had not been brought down. From time to time the minister has laid upon the Table statements and correspondence containing a great deal of data of which the committee had not been previously seized, but I want to take this opportunity to point out that while a considerable amount of information has been furnished, that which has been brought down is not exact, and is by no means complete. In this connection let me remind the committee that when speaking on the 16th of the present month upon some details of this Bill, I pointed out a liability of the Canadian Northern Railway Company with regard to the province of British Columbia, and for the information of the committee as well as that of the Minister of Finance I read an item from the Vancouver Sun of August 11 of the present year, and made inquiry regarding the liability there disclosed. We have not yet received information on that point, which is a question of such importance that I purpose to refer to it again briefly. According to the correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister and the Premier of British Columbia there may exist an exceedingly large liability which this country is assuming in taking over the Canadian Northern Railway Company; what I said will be found on page 4774 of Hansard, and I extract merely the portion containing the item that appeared in the Vancouver Sun of August 11, which is:

Victoria, Aug. 10.—The following telegram sent by Hon. John Oliver, minister of railways, to Sir R. L. Borden to-day:

"British Columbia has guaranteed the principal and interest on forty-seven million nine hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars of Canadian Northern Pacific railway company bonds and has contracts obligating the railway company to expend twenty-two to twenty-five millions to complete. Are the province's interests being protected? Please reply quickly.

The under-mentioned reply from Sir R. L. Borden has been received:

"The Government proposes to acquire all the capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway company which owns all the stock of the Canadian Northern Pacific railway company. Copy of the Bill now before Parliament is forwarded to-day for your consideration. The company's obligations will remain as they were before such acquirement."

The newspaper item proceeds:

By Sir Robert Borden's telegram it will be seen that the Dominion Government assumes all the Canadian Northern railway's obligations in respect to the Canadian Northern Pacific railway, both financial and as to the completion by the latter railway of its existing contracts.

When I first drew this item to the attention of the committee I inquired as to the amount of the liability the Dominion of Canada was assuming in connection with the obligation set out in this correspondence. Up to the present time, so far as I am aware, we have not received an exact statement as to that from the Government. I invite the minister to give us an exact statement in that regard while the Bill is before the committee and before we are asked to proceed to another clause. It will be within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that there was considerable discussion with reference to unpaid claims of contractors. Information was also asked on this subject. I must say information was brought down, but, like most of the information received from this railway company, it is in such general terms that it is impossible to tell what claims it covers. I am led to refer to it again, and to repeat my request for specific information by reason of the fact that since publicity was given to the discussion of those matters in the House, contractors with unpaid claims have turned up within the precincts of the House and have told me, among others, about unpaid claims against the Canadian Northern which they had been pressing for settlement for a long time without success. I submit it is due to this committee that the Minister of Finance should insist upon the Canadian Northern Railway Company furnishing him with the names of the contractors who have unpaid claims, and that he should not be satisfied with a simple bulk statement as to the amount alleged to be still due and unpaid.

Information was also sought with regard to the outstanding liability of the company in connection with compensation for land taken for right of way, terminals, etc., and for damages in connection with the taking of such land. Again the discussion in this House has brought to the attention of people who have unpaid claims the statement made by the company regarding alleged settlements. Since the committee last met I have been told of claims in the vicinity of Ottawa which have been standing for six or seven years, claims which the people who hold them say they are sick and tired of pressing upon the company, and that the company continues to resort to every evasion and subterfuge in order to avoid settling. I have been told of one claim in particular in regard to which there has been an intimation made that now the Government is taking over the Canadian Northern railway of course the company will not have to deal with the claim, but the parties interested will be obliged to look to the Government for payment. This, I may say, is in the vicinity of Ottawa. I am convinced there are others of very much larger amount in and about the city of Montreal. On a previous occasion I referred to the unsettled claims for compensation and damages for land taken in connection with the Montreal Tunnel and Terminal Company. Acting upon the representations I made to the committee on that occasion the Minister of Finance was good enough to make inquiry, and on the 23rd of the present month he submitted to the House a letter written him by one of the solicitors for the Canadian Northern Company bearing upon this subject The writer of the letter is Mr. Gerard Ruel, a capable and honourable gentleman, whose acquaintance I enjoyed while he acted as Law Clerk in the Department of Railways and Canals. I have no doubt that Mr. Ruel has correctly set out in his letter the information given him, but I am just as positive that the information is absolutely incorrect. Mr. Ruel's letter will be found at page 5124 of Hansard and is:

Regarding land damages arising out of the construction of the tunnel, the situation is that at the present time outstanding claims for damages to the amount of about $50,000 are in the course of adjustment. All the land which the company has to obtain for the present terminal and the right of way has been acquired and paid for in full. Easements through the mountain have not in many cases yet been adjusted, the company claiming that owing to the distance from the surface practically no damage will be sustained. These claims are standing over by agreement until one year after the operation of the tunnel.

(Sgd.) Gerard Ruel.

Let us examine the statements made by the company in this letter. In the first place it is said that the situation at the present time is that:

Outstanding claims for damages to the amount of $50,000 are in the course of adjustment.

My observations have reference to the land taken for the purpose of this Tunnel and Terminal Railway Company both behind the mountain, and on the city side of the mountain as well as in connection with the boring of the tunnel. If this letter refers to the land embraced in that stretch of the right-of-way, then, Sir, I have no hesitation in saying, based upon my own personal knowledge, that the statement that all the outstanding claims for damages amount to about $50,000 is an absolute joke. I know of one claim approximating $350,000 that has been made, and in connection with that claim they have offered in settlement, through the Montreal solicitors for the Canadian Northern, an amount in the vicinity of $53,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know that in settlement of a claim made by the Hon. Mr. Rainville, ex-speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, they have paid more than $50,000.

Mr. MURPHY: I am speaking only of those claims of which I have personal knowledge and in that instance alone the company's solicitors proposed a settlement on the basis of $53,000. But since the Minister of Finance gave notice of this legislation that proposal was entirely abandoned and of course they are taking the same position in Montreal that they are taking here—they will pay nothing and the country will have to pay the whole shot no matter what it is. There are two other unsettled claims in connection with the right of way of which I have personal knowledge and the aggregate of these three claims is six or seven times the amount mentioned in that letter. I have not the slightest doubt there are scores of such claims if we could only get at them. The second statement in that letter is that:

All the land which the company has to obtain for the present terminal and the right of way has been acquired and paid for in full.

That statement, in view of what I have just told the committee, is obviously untrue. It has acquired the land it is true, by taking the preliminary steps for expropriation under the Railway Act, but not only has it not paid for a large part of this land in full but for a large part of this land it has not paid anything at all, but is defying the owners by legal proceedings and by appeals after the matter has been submitted to arbitration and awards have been made against the company.

Further this letter states:

Easements through the mountain have not in many cases yet been adjusted, the company claiming that owing to the distance from the surface practically no damage will be sustained. These claims are standing over by agreement until one year after the operation of the tunnel.

Claims with respect to the easements might very easily reach up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. I submit that even though it is correctly stated that by agreement these claims are standing over until one year after the operation of the tunnel the members of this committee have a right to know what these claims are, what they amount to, and by whom they are made in order that we may form some approximate idea and in any event that the country should know what yet remains to be settled for in connection with this class of claim. So much for that letter.

I submit generally in connection with the question of land damages and compensation, that there ought to be filed with this committee a statement in detail giving the names and the amounts of all unsettled claims, and further that until that is done we cannot properly proceed with an intelligent discussion of this Bill for the reason that neither the country nor the committee is in a position to know what the country is assuming by the adoption of this present proposal. A few days ago my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) referred to what he understood to be some long term contracts that had been entered into between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and certain of its permanent officers and officials. He pointed out that these contracts also established a liability that would be taken over by the country under this legislation and he asked for information on that point. If my memory serves me correctly the Minister of Finance promised to make inquiry regarding that. I too would urge upon the minister that if such inquiry has not been made, it should be made at once and that the committee should be furnished with full particulars of any contracts be they long term or short term, entered into between the Canadian Northern and Mr. Z. A. Lash; between the company and Mr. Phippen; between the company and Mr. McLeod; between the company and Mr. Mitchell, and, generally, between the company and all of its chief officials and officers. If that is not done, if this committee proceeds in ignorance of the state of facts in that regard, Parliament and the country may wake up, after this legislation goes through, to find that instead of getting rid of a set of men, whom the country has been led to believe will be got rid of by this legislation, these men have been fastened upon the country for a much longer term of years possibly, than if they had continued in the ordinary course to be in the service of the Canadian Northern. These long term service contracts may involve a very large sum of money but in any event, whether that be the fact or not, the point has been raised, the question has been asked, the Minister of Finance undertook to get the information. I now add my request to that of the hon. member for Welland and I urge that the information be brought down to this committee before we are asked to proceed with another clause of this Bill.

Under this same general head of information I wish to refer the minister to the observations of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) with reference to the income bond securities. As reported at page 4754 of Hansard, the hon. member for Calgary said

> I am going to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the Income Bond Securities, that increased stock of $25,000,000 that is provided. When this country acquires this enterprise and becomes owner of its shares, the $25,000,000 stock will acquire some value, and under the legislation of 1914 it was provided that these shares might be exchanged for income bond securities up to the 1st day of January, 1919. I put this to the House in all seriousness: If we exercise the power under the statute of 1914, we destroy those shares and that right; but if, on the other hand, we buy these shares, we leave that right, and some people with $25,000,000 of income bond certificates, are going to be able to exchange them for Canadian Northern stock for $25,000,000.

The Solicitor General dealt with that point in the address to the hon. member for Calgary, and he challenged the statement that exchange of these securities for stock was likely to be made; in fact I think he said it was so unlikely as to be altogether improbable. I did not understand the hon. member for Calgary to accept that view, and in view of some information that I have found in the Annual Financial Review for 1916, I think it is very desirable that the whole matter should be cleared up. For the information of the Minister of Finance and of the committee, let me read this statement from page 516 of the Annual Review of 1916:

> The Canadian Northern Railway Company.
> 5 per cent. 20-Year Income Charge Convertible Debenture Stock—Secured by a general charge on properties of the Company subject to prior charges. The total amount of this stock at any time outstanding is not to exceed an amount equal to $10,000 per mile of the company's lines of railway. During the years 1916, 1917 and 1918 holders of the stock have the right to exchange their holdings for an equal amount of fully paid ordinary shares in the capital stock of the company. The interest on the stock at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum is payable on 2nd May and November, only out of the net earnings of the company. In and after 1920 the company is entitled to redeem the stock at par.

If this is the same class of security as was referred to by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), then the possibility of exchange for common stock is much more immediate than appeared to be the case when the matter was under discussion between the hon. member for Calgary and the Solicitor General, and in view of this authoritative statement by the company itself, —for I assume that the company furnished this information—that such securities may be exchanged for common stock in the years 1916, 1917, and 1918, I invite the Minister of Finance to make special inquiry with regard to that and to give this committee, at the earliest possible moment, the result.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I had just finished enumerating several matters in respect of which, in my judgment, the committee and the country are entitled to further and fuller information. In respect of each of these matters I again urge the Minister of Finance to procure the information asked for and to bring it down as soon as possible. Upon that head I do not feel that at the present time any further observations are either practical or necessary.

We often hear it said that one of the greatest evils of democratic government, particularly of a modern democracy, is the growth and power of what is popularly referred to as the moneyed interests. In my judgment this House and this country are face to face with an evil of that kind in the legislation now before the committee. In fact, the Bill now in your hands, Sir, is such a dangerous specimen of the evil to which I have alluded, that, with your permission, I desire to trace the genesis of this Canadian Northern railway proposal and in doing so to place certain important facts, as briefly as possible before the committee.

Speaking in this debate on the 16th of the present month, I stated that the present proposal grew out of an alliance that was formed in 1911 between eighteen gentlemen who came together in Toronto and who, in the assertion of what was their political and personal right, signed a letter defining the position which they thought the country should take in defence of the financial interests which they personally and collectively represented. That alliance and that letter form the basis of this present proposal, as I propose showing. Let me recall the names of the gentlemen who signed the letter in question; they will be found at page 4774 of Hansard of this year. They are:

Sir Edmund Walker, John L. Blaikie, W. D. Matthews, W. K. George, Z. A. Lash, W. T. White, George T. Somers, R. S. Gourlay, Sir W. Mortimer Clark, R. J. Christie, Hugh Blain, H. S. Strathy, L. Goldman, G. A. Somerville, Wellington Francis, J. D. Allan, E. R. Wood, John C. Eaton.

That group of gentlemen represented particularly the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and the National Trust Company, of which at that time my respected and honoured friend the Minister of Finance was the general manager. After the election of 1911 these eighteen gentlemen used their influence and were successful in having one of their number appointed Minister of Finance; I refer to the hon. gentleman who now occupies that position. Since 1911 it has been a matter of common knowledge that the three institutions to which I have referred have more than once received favours at the hands of this Government. For the purpose of understanding the present position of affairs with reference to these three business and financial institutions and their connection with the proposal now before the House, it is necessary to run over briefly the interlocking directorates of these companies. Of the original eighteen gentlemen who signed the letter to which I refer and whose names I have just read, Mr. Z. A. Lash, Mr. E. R. Wood and Mr. W. K. George are directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. These three gentlemen, with Mr. W. J. Christie, are also shareholders in the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend is mistaken as to Mr. Christie. The Mr. Christie who signed the letter was Mr. R. J. Christie, of Toronto. Mr. W. J. Christie is of Winnipeg. Their only interest is as qualifying shareholders; they have no interest in the road itself.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not defining their interest at the moment; they are directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. The Mr. Christie who is also a director is not Mr. Christie of Toronto, but Mr. Christie of Winnipeg. With that correction the statement stands. Then, of the original eighteen, Sir Edmund Walker, Mr. Z. A. Lash and Mr. E. R. Wood are directors of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, of which Sir Edmund Walker is president and Mr. Lash vice-president.

The Canadian Bank of Commerce, as hon. members are aware, are pledgees of all Mackenzie and Mann's stock for advances which have been made against it. Mr. Z. A. Lash and Mr. E. R. Wood are both directors and vice-presidents of the National Trust Company. The National Trust Company, of which the Minister of Finance was formerly general manager, has acted as a trustee between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Government with reference to several financial transactions which have taken place during the last six years. So much for the way in which the members of that group of eighteen link up the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and the National Trust Company with the present Government.

That does not by any means exhaust the interlocking combinations that have to be kept in mind in order properly to appreciate the legislation before the committee. In addition to those I have mentioned, there is our old friend Sir Joseph Flavelle, chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, who is a director and the president of the National Trust Company, and who is also a director of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Besides that gentleman we have Sir John Aird, general manager of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, a director of the National Trust Company and a joint shareholder in trust of $1,000,000 worth of stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. In Parliament we have Sir Edward Kemp, who is a director of the National Trust Company, and Senators Nicholls and Richardson, who are shareholders of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, according to a statement submitted by the Minister of Finance the other day. Those three latter gentlemen will soon be called upon to pass their opinion upon this legislation. These interlocking directorates and combinations of financial interests are inimical to the public welfare. On this point, let me read this opinion of the Toronto Saturday Night, which, in its issue of August 18 last, referred at some length to the Government proposal for taking over the Canadian Northern railway:

There is a distinct feeling of uneasiness in Canada over the Canadian Northern nationalization scheme, now before Parliament. Not that the great majority of people are unfavourable to nationalization. Far from it. But there is strong objection to the terms under which this nationalization is to be effected. The question arises as to whether or not the stock of the Canadian Northern railway has a cash value, and whether or not the owners, or more properly speaking, the present holders of this sixty-thousand shares—it being generally understood that the stock long ago passed out of the hands of the promoters into the strong boxes of financial institutions which are holding it as collateral—have sufficient influence to guide the Government into paying more for the stock than it is worth.

Then, after referring, by way of comparison, to same kindred legislation in the United States, the article concludes:

Canadians are in no mood to pull the chestnuts of large financial institutions out of the fire just because they have become tied up with the Canadian Northern railway enterprise. The Federal Government may well be warned that the Canadian people are in no mood to be trifled with in this matter. The Royal Railway Commission in its report stated that the common stock of the Canadian Northern railway was of no value. Now we propose to leave it to another commission to ascertain the value of this stock. There is no disposition to treat the Mackenzie & Mann interests meanly, but as the Hon. George P. Graham suggested the other day in the House, if they are to be paid, let it take the form of a "recognition" of their services in the development of the country and not as a payment for stock which has been pronounced by experts to be of no value.

In harmony with the view expressed by the Toronto Saturday Night, my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) a few days ago read in the House a memorial from a group of leading financiers and professional men of Montreal, all of them I believe, without exception, strong supporters of the present Administration. In connection with that memorial, the hon. member also read an editorial from the Montreal Gazette, one of the most outspoken supporters, in the press of this country, of the present Administration. Both memorial and editorial endorsed the position taken by the Toronto Saturday Night. To these opinions of important newspapers and citizens of Canada, may I be permitted to add that of the Montreal Star, a newspaper which, although claiming to be independent in its politics, yet manages to give an unvarying, I might say almost unbroken support to the Conservative party and which has given that support to the present Administration. The Montreal Star, in its issue of August 21, 1917, says:

Next to the war measures, by far the most important legislation before the Canadian Parliament is the Railway Bill. A wise solution of the railway problem means untold millions to Canada at a critical time in her history.

Owing to the financial embarrassments of the roads the Government was forced either to put into a receiver's hands both the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific, or to advance them more millions. It has made its choice. The Government is to give the Grand Trunk Pacific another lift of $7,500,000, and proposes to acquire the Canadian Northern stock at an arbitrated value. Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann during twenty-five years of railway exploitation, have proven their great ability as lobbyists. They have usually been able to persuade both the Liberals and Conservatives that Bills on their behalf presented to Parliament should become law without anything more than sham criticism. None of the politicians have seriously found fault with them so long as they could procure the adhesion of a majority of both parties in Parliament, and so they have had plain sailing. Every one saw that the crisis was only a question of time.

The Bill now before Parliament intended for the relief of Mackenzie and Mann and their creditors is decidedly weak in some of its provisions and dangerous in the extreme. Under the Bill as introduced there might be a staggering award. Mackenzie and Mann know how to engineer their schemes; they must not be permitted to engineer the country into bankruptcy. It is too big a risk and there is danger that Parliament may be woefully negligent in this case, as it always has been with railway legislation.

So far there is no provision for securing honest surrender of the assets. Some have been left out of the official lists. For one of the largest subsidiary assets of the concern no adequate provision is made, and there are many other assets paid for by Government money that are not included.

If this relief Bill for the extrication of Mackenzie and Mann is to be raised above suspicion there must be provision for all the deliberations of the arbitrators to be open to the public and for the presence before the board of independent counsel representing ordinary taxpayers of Canada as distinguished from those who sit in Parliament to protect the railway interests, and there should also be a sweeping clause in the Bill that will guarantee the country against deception, and a sworn detailed schedule of assets, with a clause entitling the country to all assets omitted.

Once Mackenzie and Mann are settled with and they surrender to the Government the key to the company's secrets there may be a surprise for the country compared with which past disclosures have been mere trivialities and the country may come to realize that it has bought a white elephant that will cost millions every year.

Having regard to the fact that that article is published on the front page of a newspaper enjoying the standing of the Montreal Star, I must assume that the last paragraph in particular has been written with full knowledge of some secrets not disclosed, but which, the article says, when disclosed, will be of a character compared with which past disclosures have been mere trivialities, and the country may realize that it has bought a white elephant that will cost many millions every year.

As one of the representatives of the people I have read that article several times, and I have thought over it long and seriously. Personally, I do not know what is referred to in that last paragraph, but I want to say this, in all candour, in all honesty, and in all friendliness to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance: If he knows what that paragraph refers to, then as an honourable and an honest man—and he is both —I would ask him to disclose that knowledge to this committee and to the House. If he does not know, then I would ask him to call upon the newspaper in which that article appeared to inform him, and through him to inform the country, what is meant by that statement. I would ask him particularly to ascertain whether the writer of that article is hinting at the possibility of the Bank Act having been contravened, and of advances having been made by the Canadian Bank of Commerce which that bank is not authorized to make under the Bank Act; and if so, whether the writer means that this legislation is the method adopted to get that bank out of the difficulty in which such a contravention of the Bank Act would involve it. It has been suggested to me that that is a construction which could be placed upon that paragraph. I do not place such a construction upon it because I do not know enough about it, but I say to my honourable friend that having regard to the standing of the newspaper which published that article, and to the seriousness of the statements which it contains, it is in my judgment incumbent upon him to exhaust every means to ascertain what the writer of that article refers to, and to acquaint this committee, and this House, and through both, this country with the information which seems to be in the possession of the writer of that article in the Montreal Star. If that is not done, then matters that now are wholly within the realm of suspicion will pass out of that realm and statements will be made which in the interests of our country should not be made. The danger, such as it is at the present time, confronting us through these interlocking directorates and the grouping of these financial interests will be small compared with the danger with which we shall be faced if the statements made in that article are not probed to the bottom, and if the fullest possible information is not procured, and communicated to the House and to the country.

Passing from that, let me direct the attention of the committee for a very brief space to the statute of 1914. That statute has been referred to by several speakers who have precided me in this debate. It was referred to by my honourable friend from Vancouver this afternoon. It has been recalled to this committee and to the House that when this statute was passed the statement was made that within its four corners there was provided a method for ending the dealings of Parliament and the country with the Canadian Northern, that if default should occur no further legislation and no further action would be necessary, because everything that would need to be done was provided for within the four corners of that statute. Now, when default has occurred, the Government chooses to ignore that statute. It is true that the Solicitor General proceeded in a general way to argue that, having regard to the present legislation the Government was, practically speaking, proceeding under the statute of 1914, and my hon. friend from Vancouver argued somewhat in the same way this afternoon. But may I recall to the committee that when the Minister of Finance introduced this legislation on the first of the present month, he never made mention of the statute of 1914, nor did he in a single word or syllable that he uttered pretend that the present legislation before this committee was in any way based upon that statute. In the course of his address on the day in question, answering an inquiry of my hon. friend from Rouville, he directed him for the information sought to the schedule of that statute, and that was the only reference made to the statute of 1914 by the Minister of Finance when he was introducing this legislation. So I say that the Minister of Finance, representing the Government—because he is responsible for this legislation, and not the Solicitor General—never pretended for one moment that the legislation before this committee was based on the statute of 1914. In fact, that statute was not mentioned by any hon. gentleman who took part in the discussion until after my hon. friend from South Renfrew had referred to it, and had based an argument in his speech upon it. The Government's action in this regard has excited widespread public interest. It has been referred to at public meetings, and it has been discussed in the press all over Canada. Only this morning the Ottawa Citizen, in a leading editorial, after alluding to an article that had appeared in the Government organ in this city, took up this phase of the matter and said:

The Ottawa organ does not, for example, devote one word to a discussion of section 24 of the statutes, under which the Government guaranteed 45 million dollars' worth of the bonds of the company in 1914. This section is the crux of the whole matter; it is under that clause that the country is entitled to take over the system without the expenditure of an extra dollar of the taxpayers' money. The matter is dismissed with a display of partisan rhetoric. Says our contemporary:

"The opposition arguments in parliament have been quite variegated. Hon. Mr. Pugsley contends that the Government should confiscate the road. He claims that the Government made provision for that when a Government loan to the road was made in 1914. Maybe so; but if the present plan is better, why object to it? And the Liberal parliamentarians in 1914 proclaimed that the present plan is better. They demanded it. They advocated purchase of the company's stock by arbitration, with a limit price of $30,000,000. But now Mr. Pugsley demands confiscation.

The Citizen proceeds:

"If the present plan is better, why object to it?" The present plan, briefly, provides for the arbitration of a matter which is not open to arbitration, and exposes the country to financial damages of very extensive range. We may be compelled to pay any sum the board of arbitrators decides we should pay, between 60 million dollars and one dollar. In any event, we are bound to be mulcted.

Of course the tu quoque argument must be introduced; it has proved such a valuable weapon in all matters wherein the administration have failed to bring forward reasonable arguments in support of their various measures since their advent to power. But our contemporary suppresses the facts.....

And this part of the editorial I would commend to my hon. friend from Vancouver.

But our contemporary suppresses the facts when it merely states that the Liberals advocated arbitration of the Canadian Northern stock several years ago, with a limit price of 30 millions. The Liberal proposition in amendment to the Government's proposal to give the Canadian Northern the amount asked (45 million dollars) in 1914, was that the stock issue of the company should be reduced from 77 millions (instead of being allowed to stand at 100 millions as the administration proposed) to 30 millions, and that all of this stock should be placed in the hands of a trustee, for the benefit and security of the people of Canada, and that it should remain there five years, so that, in the event of default the Government would have power to take possession of the road without the expenditure of a single extra dollar. In the event of the road carrying on its operations and paying its way for five years, the country was to have the right to take over the stock by arbitration, provided it was thought desirable by Parliament that such a step should be taken. This is such an entirely different thing from the meaning intended to be conveyed by the bare statement that the Liberals proposed arbitration with a limit price, in 1914, of 30 million dollars, as to lead to the conclusion that it is made by our contemporary either in ignorance or with a desire to distort the facts.

Instead, however, of accepting that amendment, which was proposed by Hon. Mr. Pugsley, the Government proceeded to draw up the agreement with the railways which is now under discussion. The chief jewel of this agreement was the clause which the administration is now discrediting. The task of protecting the interests of the country on this occasion was entrusted to the solicitor-general, and it was under the skilful direction of this minister that the famous clause was drawn up. Of it, at the time, the Minister of Finance said that he was lost in wonder—wonder that in one mortal could be compressed the wisdom and foresight to evolve a legal safeguard which could be so readily evoked on behalf of the people of the Dominion as that embodied in clause 24. Sir Thomas White said that he wanted to take off his hat to the solicitor-general for his wonderful ability and great ingenuity in this all-important matter. To-day, however, the Minister of Finance is not lost in "wonder, love and praise," as the old hymn has it, but rather he is busy showing that the masterpiece of 1914 is in reality merely a legal frill, of no value in the agreement, and that it can be disregarded without in any way affecting the business in hand, which is to pay out an unknown sum of the money of the taxpayers to certain clever and accomplished railway contractors and promoters who have no legal claim to it.

In an attempt to discredit the Drayton-Acworth Commission and to give a value to the Canadian Northern railway stock which it does not possess, the Government has alleged that this commission, of their own creation, and headed by the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, omitted to take into account certain matters which should have been taken into account. In connection with this statement by the Government there is one very strange and very significant feature. It is a strange and significant thing that the Government has not asked the commission whether it did or did not make the alleged omissions, and if it did make the omissions what explanation it has to offer for having done so. That would be the natural and the courteous thing to do. Instead of doing this, however, the Government simply ignores the commission. The Minister of Finance stated in reply to an inquiry of mine in the House a few weeks ago, that the Government had made no application for information on that point. The Government chooses to ignore the commission and instead of going to the commission for an explanation of this alleged omission it goes to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. What is obtained from the company? The information obtained is set out in a letter of the financial comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals, which was read in this House by the Minister of Finance on the 23rd of the present month, and which will be found on page 5139 of Hansard. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that the financial comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals set out in this letter exactly what the company told him, and the criticism I have to offer regarding the contents of this letter applies altogether to the statement of the railway company and not at all to the financial comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The financial comptroller informs me that that information is from his own audit, and not from the officials of the railway company.

Mr. MURPHY: His audit certainly was an audit of the books of the company, and so was based on the information supplied by the company. With respect to the alleged omissions I find the following:

I may state that it is quite clear that there is an error in that part of the Commissioners' report; the following assets on the asset side are omitted:

Cash	$25,000,000
Accounts receivable	8,890,000
Operating materials and supplies	916,000
Earnings, freight in transit	558,000

Lands Assets.

Lands unsold, 3,245,987 acres.

Deferred payments and accrued interest, $6,662,000.

On the liability side, there is a shortage of some $25,000,000.

If I understand the language of this communication correctly the two items of twenty-five million dollars are off-sets, one balances the other. That being so the $25,000,000 on either side need not be taken into account. But, I may point out in connection with these two items that even if the $25,000,000 cash was there, the commission which considered it its duty to estimate the value of the stock by ascertaining the value of the road could not have taken it into account, because it was not money that had been spent on the road; it was cash which might never go into the road but which might have been applied to something else altogether.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But, the liabilities are on the other side.

Mr. MURPHY: The liabilities are on the other side; so that we really need not go into that. Let me proceed to the next item—the accounts receivable. There is no statement to show what percentage of those accounts was good, and what percentage was bad. There is no statement to show what amount was realized and what percentage of those accounts the company failed to realize. Therefore I submit that that amount cannot be taken into consideration at all, and the Commission very properly did not take it into consideration. As to "operating materials and supplies," and "earnings on freight in transit" here again——

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would my hon. friend pardon me? We find in the statement submitted by the Minister of Finance that "accounts receivable" are only put at $7,044,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What date?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Down to April 30, 1917.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is to a different date.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is the last statement the minister furnished.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Conflict in statement only confirms what I have been trying to impress upon the committee—the necessity of having something which will be accurate and upon which this committee can proceed with some sense of having received the truth. But, with respect to these items, I was about to point out there is nothing to show how they actually worked out in the road's operation and in the conduct of its business. Until that is shown, the amount given as "assets" under these two heads can be regarded as merely approximate.

Then, as to "deferred payments and accrued interest on lands"—anybody who practises law must be familiar with these phrases. This account is exactly the same as payments in regard to which default has been made under agreement for the sale and purchase of land. The legal offices and land offices throughout this country are filled with such agreements and in all probability the deferred payments and accrued interest, although valued at so many millions in this statement, are not worth the paper they are written on. In my judgament, they are not worth any more than any other payments in regard to which default has been made by reason of the conditions brought about by the war. In brief, they are merely relics of the land boom that prevailed before the war and no sensible business man would take over anything like the value which has been set upon them here. This question of value was touched upon in an editorial of the Citizen of the 23rd inst., in which it said:

> The Canadian Northern Railway Proposal.
> The Citizen has taken the position that the 600,000 shares of Canadian Northern Railway stock which the Government proposes to acquire by arbitration are without value. The report of Sir Henry Drayton, giving the finding of the commission of which he was chairman, distinctly states that "the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern." This definite and clear-cut summary of the position of the shareholders the administration seeks to disregard when it proposes to submit the value of this stock to arbitration and, in addition, gives the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. If the shareholders of the company do not receive from the arbitrators what they think they are entitled to, they have the right of appeal. The one argument which seems to carry any weight against the Drayton conclusion is that there were some omissions in valuing certain lands in possession of the company. But it has not been advanced that this would make any material difference in the matter; certainly the difference would not amount to more than one-fifth the sum represented in the face value of the stock which it is proposed to acquire. We are forced to accept the Drayton report as substantially correct; it is the work of experts, of impartial and disinterested investigators.

This very point which I am discussing was referred to in an address delivered before the Canadian Club of Winnipeg in the month of July last by Sir Henry Drayton who was chairman of this commission whose report the Government are now resorting to every means to discredit. Substantially the same speech as Sir Henry Drayton delivered at Winnipeg before the Winnipeg Canadian Club was also delivered by him before the Canadian Club in Toronto. Both speeches were widely read and both excited very general interest.

In this connection, may I digress for a moment to pay a tribute to the public spirit displayed by Sir Henry Drayton? As the committee knows, as everybody who takes an interest in public affairs in this country knows, Sir Henry Drayton is chairman of the Railway Commission. As everybody knows, Sir Henry Drayton, when appointed to do this special railway work, threw himself whole-heartedly into it. As everybody knows, or should know, when the Government sent Sir Henry Drayton a cheque for $15,000 in payment of his services as chairman of this Drayton-Acworth Commission, Sir Henry Drayton, to his lasting credit be it said, returned the cheque, stating that he preferred not to accept any remuneration as it was his desire at this stage of the country's history to give his services free in connection with this railway investigation. Mr. Chairman, we cannot help contrasting the action of the chairman of this commission with the chairman, let us say, of the Imperial Munitions Board, who by another commissioner of the Government was lately shown to have exacted a margin of over $5,000,000 from the consumers of bacon in this country and in the Mother Country.

I desire to go back to this address of Sir Henry Drayton before the Canadian Club of Winnipeg. Speaking on the occasion to which I have alluded, Sir Henry Drayton said:

> I have but one interest in this whole question, and that is that of the people affected by it. The business men, the shippers, and the taxpayers should know just exactly what it means. For it is your business, it is your money, that is involved.

Later, in the same address, Sir Henry said, referring to the two companies whose finances he had under review:

> Much has been said by the companies about confiscation. The report confiscates nothing. On the contrary we proposed an arbitration under which the stockholders would get the potential value, whatever that would be,—value to-day there is none—whatever the book balances may show. The property to day cannot, in my view, be sold for the outstanding obligations against it.

Later on, in his address on the same occasion, Sir Henry, dealing with the question of confiscation, said:

> Similar charges of confiscation, if not robbery, are made in connection with the Canadian Northern. Again, if agreements and statutes amount to anything, the charge is ludicrous. Unless there is some special legal or moral rule under which railway companies, unlike ordinary people, are absolved from their contracts and obligations, the Canadian Northern, living as it is from loans made by the country, cannot well object to the country taking over its system.

In 1914 the company wanted guarantees. It got them to a very large amount. One of the terms under which the company got those guarantees will be found in section 24 of the Canadian Northern Guarantee Act of 1914 (chapter 20). Under that section, the Governor in Council has power when authorized by Parliament to declare by order if default is made by the company in payment of interest on guaranteed securities, that the equity of redemption of the company is absolutely barred and foreclosed, and thereupon the whole property becomes vested in the Dominion.

This default has been made. Not only has the default been made, but the Government has had to put up the money to make the default good. Is there any reason why the contract should not be enforced? Are railways to be treated as outside of and unreached by their solemn contracts?

And, Mr. Chairman, I repeat the question of the respected chairman of the Railway Commission: Is there any reason why the contract should not be enforced? And I say, Sir, let Sir Byron Walker and the Canadian Bank of Commerce answer that question of the chairman of the Railway Commission. The attitude taken by Sir Henry Drayton is plain and easily understood. Sir Henry refuses to accept book balances; he refuses to accept the paper statements of the Canadian Northern Railway Company as the basis of his judgment. Instead he insists upon getting the facts, and, having got them, he declares, both in his report and in his Winnipeg speech, from which I have just quoted, that the Canadian Northern Railway stock has no present value and that the property could not, in his judgment, be sold to-day for the outstanding obligations against it.

In view of this state of affairs, what can be more reasonable than that we should ask the Government to apply the remedy it provided in 1914 and to acquire the road under the provisions of its own statute of that year. Surely, Sir, nothing could be more reasonable than that, and, equally, may I say that there could be nothing more sure than that to a request of that kind the Government has no answer, at least no answer that could be satisfactory to the people of Canada, if it refuses to comply with the request.

Now, Sir, what is the present proposal? What does the legislation now before this committee mean? It means, first, the assuming of all the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the total amount of which nobody in Parliament apparently knows and which apparently may far exceed $500,000,000—in fact I think the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has already shown that they are in excess of $600,000,000. It means, in the second place, the making of a present of millions of dollars to Mackenzie and Mann for stock which the Drayton-Acworth report says is of no value. It means, in the third place, the nominal taking over of the road, leaving the control or operation of it still in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann and Walker and Lash. I submit that the people of this country will not be deceived by any such financial or political thimble-rigging. The people of this country demand an altogether different arrangement. There is one thing in particular which the people of this country demand, and as it was referred to by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) I propose to quote his remarks on that point. Speaking in this House on the 16th of the present month, the hon. member said:

I am sure that this House has been waiting, as I have, for some assurance that the people who are now in control of the property are not going to be continued. If we are going to lend them money, and are to have power to name directors, there is nothing yet to indicate that we are going to exercise that power for the purpose of putting the present people out of business.

Later on he said:

That is the one thing we should like an assurance on, and I doubt not that before the Bill is through the House we shall have some such assurance.

Up to the present time that assurance has not been given, and I desire to say that unless my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, speaking for the Government, will give the committee, and through this committee will give this country, assurance that the gentlemen who have been for the last few years in control of that road; the gentlemen who are members of the interlocking directorates to which I have referred are removed, and an entirely new set of directors are appointed, the country will condemn the Government's action in most severe terms. When allusion was made a short time ago to a prospect of that kind an evasive argument was put up by some hon. gentlemen on the other side pointing out that there were a number of excellent officials in connection with the Canadian Northern whom it was desirable to retain in their present positions. It is not to these gentlemen that I have reference. I have reference to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, Sir Byron Walker, Mr. Z. A. Lash, and the financial backers who are connected with them. This country will never be satisfied with any arrangement which continues these men in control, or in the operation of this road. Let the Government continue as many practical railway men as they please, but let them get rid of the members of the eighteen who got together in 1911 and who have kept together in such significant fashion ever since.

9 p.m.

In conclusion, I submit that the only terms upon which the people of Canada will approve the taking over the Canadian Northern system will be:

1. The payment only of what the Canadian Northern may, upon proper investigation, be proved to be worth.

2. The complete elimination from the management, control and operation of the road of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann and Messrs. Walker and Lash.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman has, among other things, traced, to his own satisfaction at least, the genesis of this transaction, which, by the way, is the first step to be made by the Parliament of Canada in the nationalization of railways. He has traced the genesis back to 1911, when, he says, eighteen Liberals of Toronto signed a manifesto against the Reciprocity agreement, and he finds, to his own satisfaction again, that these Liberals were all connected with the group to which the Canadian Bank of Commerce and the National Trust Company belong. I wish to point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) that he could not find in the city of Toronto more representative men than those who signed that manifesto in 1911. They were not of any one group at all. Let me point out to my hon. friend the names of those who signed that manifesto. There was Mr. John L. Blaikie, one of the most respected citizens of Toronto, president of the Canada Landed and National Investment Company. He was not connected with the group to which my hon. friend referred. Then there was Mr. W. D. Matthews, ex-president of the Toronto Board of Trade and vice-president of the Dominion Bank, of which Sir Edmund Osler is president. Then, Mr. W. K. George, ex-president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and of the Toronto Industrial Exhibition, and vice-president of the Sterling Bank of Canada; Mr. Somers, vice-president of the Board of Trade and president of the Sterling Bank of Canada. Mr. R. S. Gourlay, president of the Toronto Board of Trade, and a piano manufacturer; the late Sir W. Mortimer Clark, LL.D., ex-Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, one of the most respected citizens not only of Toronto and of Ontario, but of the whole Dominion; Mr. R. J. Christie, president of Christie, Brown & Company, and a prominent manufacturer—Mr. Christie is on the board of the Dominion Bank; Hugh Blain, of Eby, Blain & Company, leading wholesale merchant and director not of any bank, but of the Globe, the chief Ontario organ of the Liberal party; Mr. H. S. Strathy, director and for many years general manager of the Traders Bank of Canada; Mr. Goldman, managing director of the North American Life Assurance Company—not in any way connected with the group to which my hon. friends refers—Mr. J. A. Somerville, who held the same position in the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company—both well known insurance men; Wellington Francis, a prominent lawyer and director of the Standard Bank and of several companies in Toronto; Mr. J. D. Allan, ex-President of the Board of Trade; Mr. John C. Eaton, now Sir John Eaton, president of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, said to have 17,000 employees in his service. Sir John Eaton is one of the best known commercial men in Canada; [illegible] though I am not positive—that he is on the board of the Dominion Bank. My hon. friend, therefore, is rather far-fetched in his argument when he traces the genesis, as he says, of this important transaction to the manifesto signed by eighteen citizens of Toronto with respect to reciprocity in 1911.

My hon. friend has said a good deal about the Bank of Commerce. I have before me a list of the directors of the Canadian Bank of Commerce and of its committees throughout Canada. I find that amongst the directors throughout Canada there are eighteen Liberals and nine Conservatives. I find among the leading directors of the Canadian Bank of Commerce Hon. W. C. Edwards, a most intimate friend of the leader of the Opposition. I find that at the time the list was published the late Hon. Sir Lyman Melvin Jones was a member of the Board of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. He was reputed to be the closest intimate friend in Toronto of the leader of the Opposition. I find also the name of Mr. F. P. Jones, general manager of the Canada Cement Company, a strong Liberal; and of Mr. H. C. Cox, son of the late Senator Cox, one of the pillars of Liberalism, and one of the greatest personal friends of the leader of the Opposition. In addition to that, among the members of the Sherbrooke Committee of the bank I find the name of F. N. McCrea, Esq., M.P., our respected colleague in this House. The only reason I bring this forward is to show that my hon. friend is somewhat far-fetched in his argument with regard to the political affiliations of the bank.

He has stated that the National Trust Company has obtained some Government business since 1911. I may point out to my hon. friend that trust companies which hold trust mortgages on railway enterprises to secure bond issues are usually named by the railway company subject to the approval of the Government. The very first trust mortgage that was executed by the Canadian Northern Railway Company to secure Government guaranteed bonds was executed during the regime of the Government of which my hon. friend was a member through the same National Trust Company. There is nothing strange, or unusual, therefore, in the National Trust Company being appointed trustee under the mortgage securing guaranteed bonds.

The hon. gentleman in the House the other night referred to Mackenzie, Mann & Company as the masters of the Administration. I have always understood that Sir Donald Mann was one of the pillars of the Liberal party. When Sir Donald comes to Ottawa, it looks like the scene of a great Liberal convention; most of my friends opposite are at the Chateau or at the club to do him reverence. We had better see things in their true light.

My hon. friend is trying to make out that a group prominently associated with the Conservative party are responsible for this legislation. Let me tell him that if he wants to get back to the real genesis of the railway situation that confronts us to-day and has confronted us for six years, he must go back to the railway policy of the late Administration. We are confronted, as I have pointed out, not with a theory but with a condition. I have pointed out where the responsibility lies for the railway policy which has produced the result that we have been discussing here for the last couple of weeks. The genesis of it was the guarantee of $35,000,000 on the line of the Canadian Northern between Montreal and Port Arthur. The genesis was the policy of connecting the Canadian Northern with the shores of the Pacific, as recited in the preamble to that Act under which $35,000,000 were guaranteed by the late Government in 1911. This Government has had to face and deal with a railway situation. Notwithstanding what my honourable friend may say about groups, the situation is simply this: the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern systems will go into liquidation unless assisted by the Government. It is not a matter of groups at all. This is too large a situation to be dealt with, if I may say so without disrespect, in the petty partisan spirit in which it has been dealt with in this House and in this debate. Honourable gentlemen should not put forward arguments that they have put forward with regard to this situation; it is too large, too important.

My honourable friend has referred to the Drayton-Acworth report; he has said that the Government is seeking to discredit it. On the contrary, I stated that it was an admirable report. Moreover, the Government's railway policy follows the main lines of the Drayton-Acworth report, so far as we can follow it to-day. The Drayton-Acworth report recommended the taking over of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk. We are not going so far as that at this time, but we are taking over the Canadian Northern in precisely the way that Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth recommended, at least so far as taking the stock instead of taking the physical assets of the road is concerned. In their report on this matter Messrs. Drayton and Acworth recommended the creation of a Dominion Railway Board. I quote from their report, page LVIII:

> In order to give the Board of Trustees—

That is, the Dominion Railway Board, which they recommended should be formed.

> —control of the railways mentioned, the following stock should be tranferred to them:
> Canadian Northern.—The $40,000,000 common stock vested in the Canadian Government should be assigned by the Government to the trustees, and also (subject to what we report below as to compensation for existing equities) the $60,000,000 still remaining in the hands of private persons.

The Drayton-Acworth report did not recommend that the Dominion Railway Board should take action under the legislation of 1914, although the Commissioners suggest that if the Canadian Northern would not transfer this stock, subject to certain consideration of their equity, the legislation of 1914 might be used as a club to make them do so. But what they suggested was that the $60,000,000 of stock of the Canadian Northern outstanding in the hands of private persons, should be transferred to the Dominion Railway Board, just as we are providing now that it shall be transferred to the Dominion Government. They do not suggest that we should foreclose under the legislation of 1914. We are following the lines of the report so far as we can consistently with a programme which we are adopting, namely, the taking over first of the Canadian Northern Railway system. Although I do not emphasize the point because it has been referred to over and over again in the course of this debate, there is no doubt that there has been an omission of assets. The financial comptroller of railways has taken the matter up himself in the audit of the books, and he has drawn it to the attention of both Professor Swain and Sir Henry Drayton. There is no doubt that the land grants and the deferred payments on land sales were omitted with the cash and accounts receivable. Professor Swain, on page 43 of his report, points out specifically that cash on hand is a physical asset. He also mentions the working capital, and he says:

> Your attention is called to these two matters for the reason that neither have been included in the present valuation, and it may be desirable for you to inquire as to the cash on hand and to take account of it as well as of a proper allowance for working capital, in whatever use you may wish to make of the results of this valuation.

We are therefore adopting the mode prescribed by the Drayton-Acworth report, namely, of acquiring the stock rather than the physical assets of the system, and without doubt they were right in that mode because, as I have repeatedly pointed out in this House, it lends itself to the financing of the railway company.

My hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) has referred to a number of articles from newspapers of good standing, but I will point out to him that it is not possible for the Government to trace down all statements made in newspapers. We would not make very much headway with legislation in this House if we busied ourselves with taking up all statements made by newspapers, even those of high standing, throughout the Dominion, in relation to such legislation. My hon. friend read an article from the Montreal Star in which it stated that certain assets were omitted. I have no knowledge of such assets being omitted. In order that the House and the country may know that the Government has fairly accurate information with respect to this transaction, I desire to say this: That the following investigations into the affairs of the Canadian Northern Railway Company have been made by this Government:

1. In respect of all lines subsidized, the expenditure has been checked both by the engineers of the Department of Railways and Canals and by the Government auditors.

[Sir Thomas White.]

2. In 1914, the Government appointed three auditors to investigate the finances of the company. A complete survey was made from the inception of the company down to the beginning of 1914. All receipts and expenditures of the company were investigated, and a complete report of the Government auditors has been tabled in the House.

3. The legislation of 1914 called for the filing by the company of a condensed balance sheet of the whole system properly audited. This has been done. Since that date the engineers and the auditing staff of the Department of Railways and Canals have been keeping in touch with the construction going on on the system and investigating the expenditures in connection therewith.

4. The legislation of 1916 provided for the appointment of independent Government auditors. We appointed one of the leading firms of auditors, a firm of international reputation and standing, Messrs. Marwick, Mitchell, Peat and Company, well-known, I have no doubt, to all the members of the House. They have audited all the books of the company for the Government.

5. In addition to that under the legislation of 1916, we appointed a Royal Commission to investigate the affairs of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. This commission made a very complete report which has been under discussion in this House.

In addition to that, the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company appointed a board of New York experts to investigate the affairs of the company. That, I believe, was made public.

We have, therefore, had very full information as to this, and I may say to my hon. friend that, so far as I know, there is no mystery in connection with the affairs of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. We have had their affairs under continuous investigation by the Railway Department, and we are not aware of any assets that have been omitted, nor are we aware of any disclosures which will be made such as my hon. friend has suggested.

I believe that this transaction carried out will result in the Dominion of Canada acquiring a great railway system which will, for the present and in the future, inure to the benefit of the people of Canada. The present position is that we are a shareholder to the extent of 40 per cent. All that we are doing is acquiring the majority interest, and we are acquiring it in a manner that would be considered fair as between man and man. If the stock has no value, the arbitrators will so find; if it has some value, the arbitrators will so find. Why should we assume that the arbitrators will find a value that does not exist? We have given an earnest of our intention in the matter by appointing the Chief Justice of Ontario as one of the arbitrators. Unless the Chief Justice of Ontario agrees to the award as to the value of the stock, there is an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Why should we not have confidence in our own courts? What reason have we to assume that the Supreme Court will deal with this matter otherwise than they deal with other matters, that is to say, fairly, judicially and impartially? What reason have hon. gentlemen opposite to suggest that any but a fair result will come from this arbitration?

My hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy), at the outset of his remarks, asked for a good deal of information, most of which has been laid upon the table of the House. He asked in regard to the Montreal Tunnel and Terminal Company as to damages. I laid upon the table of the House a statement by the solicitor of the company, a gentleman in whom I have every confidence, and I have been assured, since my hon. friend made his remarks respecting claims for damages, that that report deals with all claims of which the railway company has notice, save for this, that in some cases, the matter is to stand for a year. A tunnel is not an unusual thing in railway construction. Take the tunnels in New York. The experience has been that the damages are not very considerable by reason of the construction of those tunnels. My hon. friend has referred to many claims for damages of which he has heard.

Mr. MURPHY: Claims for compensation as well as damages.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Very well. Claims may be well founded or they may be ill founded; there may be fictitious claims and there may be claims that are good. The position is that the railway company has made an accurate statement of such claims as have been brought to their attention.

Mr. MURPHY: They have done nothing of the kind. I refer to claims for land for which nothing has been paid.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Land in connection with what?

Mr. MURPHY: With the right of way.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am speaking of the claims for damages in connection with the Montreal Tunnel and Terminal Company.

Mr. MURPHY: I am speaking of that also, and I have the papers in my pocket.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am informed and believe that the claims they have had to deal with are those set out in that report.

Mr. MURPHY: That is not correct.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With regard to other claims, how far would that matter advance the discussion of this measure? This is a big transaction, a transaction in which we are acquiring the control of a railway system. Any claims for damages in conection with the Montreal Tunnel and Terminal Company will have to be dealt with in the usual way. If they are sound claims, they will be an obligation of the Tunnel and Terminal Company. The situation is not changed in respect to those by what we are doing. My hon. friend would not suggest that, in the taking over of a great railway system, the fact that there were some outstanding claims should stand in the way of a transaction of that magnitude. My hon. friend raised another question this afternoon. He said, are there long standing contracts between the company and its officials?

I am officially informed that there are no such outstanding long-date contracts. I am told there are only two contracts entered into, and those were in connection with operating men, and were cancelled some time ago.

I have given practically all the information that my hon. friend has asked for. He also raised the question in reference to which the Prime Minister replied by telegram to the Prime Minister of British Columbia respecting the Canadian Northern. I have obtained a statement in regard to that. I do not believe it will advance the discussion of this matter very much, but still I have such regard for this House that I try to get all information that is asked for. The statement is as follows:

Canadian Northern Railway System, June 30th, 1917.

The following statement shows the lines of railway and other works of the Canadian Northern Pacific Railway which have been aided by the guarantee of securities by the Province of British Columbia, also the extent of the guarantee in each case:—

1 (a) Main Line.. .. ..500 miles.
(b) Vancouver Island..100 miles. 600 miles.

C.N.P. 4% Securities Guaranteed, $35,000 per mile.
C.N.P. 4½% Securities (on Main Line only) $10,000 per mile.
2. Branch Lines:
(a) Westminster to Vancouver.. 11 miles.
(b) Westminster to Steveston.. 15 miles.
(c) Victoria to Union Bay.. .. 18 miles.
(d) Vancouver Island Extension 150 miles.
(e) Kamloops to Vernon.. .. 145 miles.

339 miles.

C.N.P. 4½% Securities Guaranteed, $35,000 per mile.
3. Terminals: $10,000,000.
Vancouver,
New Westminster,
Port Mann,
Steveston,
Victoria,
Union Bay.
C.N.P. 4½% Securities Guaranteed, $10,000,000.

As to 1, the Main Line has been completed. The first 100 miles on the Island have been fully graded, but not railed on account of the impossibility of obtaining steel. So far as item No. 1 is concerned, there are practically no further obligations to be assumed with the exception of tracklaying on Vancouver Island Line.

As to 2 (a), the construction of the line between New Westminster and Vancouver has been deferred. In the meantime the company has entered into a running rights arrangement with the Vancouver, Victoria & Eastern railway to use their line between these points. This arrangement had the sanction of the local authorities, the line being opened for traffic by them accordingly. In view of the fact that this avoids duplication of lines and will answer the purposes of traffic for many years, it may be expedient to subsequently consider making this arrangement permanent.

As to 2 (b)—New Westminster to Steveston Line graded and track laid. Connection with Main Line at New Westminster end, including bridge over North Arm of the Fraser River yet to be constructed, this portion being deferred pending consideration of utilization of existing lines of another railway.

As to 2 (c), Victoria--Union Bay Line is completed and in operation.

As to 2 (d)—Vancouver Island Extension. Line graded to Alberni. Construction north of this point deferred owing to war.

As to 2 (e)—Kamloops to Vernon. Branch line from main line into city of Kamloops under construction and certain rights-of-way acquired. Construction on balance of line deferred owing to war.

As to 3—Terminals. The company's programme for terminals at Pacific Coast points involved an expenditure of approximately $10,000,000, of which the principal works were in the City of Vancouver. It was intended that these facilities would be provided from time to time to meet the requirements of traffic upon the opening of the various lines. The war having begun prior to the completion of any of the lines, this delayed the company's terminal programme. Contracts, however, were made with various parties for the necessary filling of False Creek and the construction of a station, terminal, freight sheds, etc. This work is in progress at the present time and it is expected will be completed ready for operation early in the New Year. The agreement with the Province of British Columbia does not specify the extent of the obligation of the company in respect to these terminals, it being merely provided that the proceeds of the guaranteed securities above mentioned should be entirely expended for such purposes.

It should be noted that the original contract with the province made under date of 2nd April, 1910, has been modified in certain particulars by special arrangements between the company and the province, and it is specifically provided in the contract that if, owing to unforeseen engineering difficulties or other circumstances beyond the reasonable control of the company, it will be impossible or impracticable to carry out absolutely the terms of the agreement, the Lieutenant-Governor may from time to time authorize amendments therein so long as the spirit of the agreement is not departed from.

With respect to the construction of the balance of the mileage referred to in 2, conditions arising out of the war have rendered it impossible at the present time to proceed with the further construction of branch lines. No change in these conditions can be expected until at least some time after the conclusion of the war, and even then unforeseen circumstances may arise which will require an entire readjustment of the arrangement between the company and the province with respect thereto.

Municipal Obligations.

The Canadian Northern Pacific railway has not entered into any contract with any municipality in British Columbia with the exception of the City of Vancouver, with regard to the False Creek terminals. Considerable progress has been made in the performance of this contract and the work is still under way, provision for this being largely included under the terminal securities guaranteed by the province. Owing to conditions arising out of the war, this work, in common with the work upon the lines of railway, has been more or less delayed, but the contract with the municipality makes provision for extension of time due to delays arising by reason of strikes.

That is the answer to my hon. friend with respect to the British Columbia situation. I think I have covered most of the points he referred to, except what he stated in closing. My own view is that the Canadian Northern Railway Board will have to be constituted by the Government, of men of high standing, who will administer the affairs of that company in an absolutely efficient and non-partisan manner. The present board will have to be changed. The Government will have to constitute the board of the Canadian Northern railway, when it becomes a government organization, in such fashion as to get the best results, not only from an operating standpoint, but also from the standpoint of the public interest. It is manifestly impossible for me to say how the board will be reconstituted, but it must be changed; there is no question in my mind about that.

[Sir Thomas White.]

As far as the operating staff is concerned, it would be a misfortune—I think my hon. friend will agree—if the railway company should lose the services of its skilled operating staff. That question to my mind should not arise. Looking to the future, and adopting, as I have said, the principles of the Drayton-Acworth report, one can see the operating board, appointed by the Dominion Government in some such fashion as has been recommended in the Drayton-Acworth report, administering the Canadian Government Railway system throughout Canada. That is what one would look forward to seeing, and I believe the people of this country will support a policy looking to that end in connection with the acquisition and operation of such railway systems as may come into the hands of the Government of Canada.

I am sorry my hon. friend looking at this great transaction, which, as I stated, is the first step towards railway nationalization in Canada, sees only the secondary and subsidiary features of it. The fundamental issue in the transaction which is now before the House is that the Government of Canada is acquiring a great railway system. It is the beginning of public ownership of Canadian railways; I do not say of all Canadian railways, but it is a great step forward. That is the main and fundamental fact. The question of purchasing the $60,000,000 stock owned by the majority shareholders is really a secondary and subsidiary question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A mere bagatelle.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I do not say a mere bagatelle. My hon. friend must not put such words in my mouth. We must acquire the $60,000,000 par value of the Canadian Northern stock in order to get control of the system; in other words, in order to carry out the provisions of the Drayton-Acworth report in that regard, because they recommended not the taking over of the physical properties of the company, but the acquisition of the stock. This Bill, and the resolution which preceded it, have been under discussion for many days. The discussion which has taken place here today is really discussion pertaining more to the second reading of the Bill than to the first clause. We have made no progress in committee. The transaction is, of course, an important transaction, but unless hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House are going to be here all summer we must make progress with this Bill. I therefore beg to move:

That further consideration of clause 1 be postponed, and that clause 2 be taken up.

The CHAIRMAN: Sir Thomas White moves that section 1 of the Bill be not now further debated, and that the committee proceed to the consideration of section 2.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under what rule is that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a motion; not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN: Under Rule 17 A.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There has been no notice given of this.

The CHAIRMAN: This motion is not debatable. I may read the rule, if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Read the rule.

The CHAIRMAN (Reading):

17 A. Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings except adjournment motions and every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee, or for the previous question, or for the third reading of a Bill, or for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means of the resolution, clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, this motion cannot be made without notice.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: What is the effect of this motion?

The CHAIRMAN: The effect is simply to proceed to section 2.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under what rule? That cannot be done without debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The question is still under consideration, I respectfully submit, until the minister gives notice.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The question is still under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion requires no seconder.

The motion was declared carried on division.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I make an appeal to the House from your ruling, Sir.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This cannot be done without notice.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You cannot stop the House without notice in this way. Of course, we may be overruled—we may be voted down—and closure may be applied contrary to the rules, but I appeal from your ruling. Sir.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Perhaps the Prime Minister would give the House the benefit of his opinion.

Mr. Speaker having resumed the Chair, the chairman reported:

In the Committee of the Whole it was moved by Sir Thomas White that the further consideration of clause 1 be postponed and that the consideration of clause 2 be now taken up. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) raised the point of order that such motion required notice and was debatable. The Chairman ruled that the said motion did not require notice and was not debatable. From this ruling the hon. member for St. John appealed to the House.

The House divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chair be confirmed:

The motion of Sir Thomas White was carried, Yeas 46; Nays 30.

On section 2: Transfer of shares.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think that this section requires a good deal of consideration, particularly when it is taken in connection with section 1. It refers to a certain agreement in section 1, but section 1 has not yet been passed. Still it is an agreement at which we have a right to look although we do not know whether it will ultimately be passed. We have to consider it in connection with the clause now before the committee. This clause provides that upon making of said agreement these 600,000 shares shall be transferred to the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty. The section is based upon the idea that His Majesty will acquire by purchase the 600,000 shares of the stock as referred to in an agreement which is in contemplation and which is provided for in a previous section, the consideration of which the committee has decided to allow to stand. It is certainly extremely inconvenient that we should be called upon now to determine as to the passing of a section which relates to an agreement set out in another section in respect to which the committee has decided not to proceed to a conclusion. In my opinion the committee should not pass a section which authorizes the taking over of shares by Order in Council as it is proposed by this section, which is dependent upon the making of an agreement of purchase. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, has asked the majority of this House to shut off discussion and has thereby, by brute force, prevented a large number of members of this House, who are here representing the people of this country and who are desirous of letting the people of Canada know why they were opposed to this most objectionable measure. The Minister of Finance and the Government may think and the majority of this House may think that by shutting off discussion and making use of the closure to throttle the members of this House, they will appeal to the good judgment of the people of this country. But let me tell them that their course will not appeal to the judgment of the people. The people of Canada want to know more about this deal. They want to hear more on the question and they want to be informed more fully than they have yet been informed as to the reason why this Government has departed from the statutory agreement which was made in 1914, an agreement which was binding upon this House, binding upon this Government, and equally binding upon Mackenzie and Mann and the Canadian Northern Company. They want to know why this Government, having in 1914 pledged the credit of this country to the enormous sum of $45,000,000 upon the faith of a solemn agreement which the Canadian Northern Railway Company entered into and Mackenzie and Mann entered into and which was embodied in the statute of 1914 and under the provisions of which they accepted of that aid, the people want to know why the Government is deliberately letting Mackenzie and Mann free from the obligations of that agreement and is proposing to involve the people of Canada in a liability which may reach the enormous sum of $60,000,000 in addition to $500,000,000 and more of obligations which the country will be called upon to assume in connection with the purchase of this road. Are hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, by the force of majority rule, to be debarred from expressing their views on this great question? Are they to be told that they are mere automatons with no opportunity for discussion, no opportunity of expressing their opinion? I shall endeavour, Sir, to take advantage of the rights which are still left to us; we may not have them long. Under the closure rule, under the rule of the gag, my hon. friend, having first got the committee to order that these various sections stand—contrary to the spirit of the rules; contrary to the spirit that animates every free Parliament—can give notice that at the next sitting of the committee he will ask the committee to vote that there shall be no further consideration of these clauses. He may then have the vote taken and the Bill passed without members of the House having fair opportunity for discussion. It is open for my hon. friend to do that; I judge from what he has done to-night that he will not hesitate to do it. Well, having begun the closure, my hon. friend, I hope, will carry it through to its final conclusion. He has attempted what is outrageous; let him carry his outrageous procedure on to its logical consequences.

10 p.m.

My hon. friend has made the statement that the Drayton-Acworth report recommends the purchase of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company by arbitration. The report does nothing of the kind; my hon. friend is giving an entirely wrong impression to the committee of the effect of the Drayton-Acworth report. The commissioners do say that the control of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company should be vested in trustees, but they proceed to say that the stock has no value; that the Government should pay nothing for it. Let me read from the Drayton-Acworth report, page XLIII, so that we may see whether my hon. friend has correctly stated what the report says:

> We find, then, $370,000,000 to be the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern system as at present existing. In other words, as indeed is frankly admitted by Canadian Northern witnesses, the Canadian Northern shares represent no cash investment.

Then, proceeding to deal with the physical aspects of the case so far as the property is concerned, they say, page XLIV:

> We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern. If, then, the people of Canada have already found, or assumed responsibility for, the bulk of the capital; if they must needs find what further capital is required; and if they must make up for some years to come considerable deficits in net earnings, it seems logically to follow that the people of Canada should assume control of the property. We return later to the Canadian Northern Company in order to set out our recommendations as to its ownership and management in the future and as to the terms to be offered to the existing shareholders.

I draw the attention of the committee to the last words of this paragraph, in which the commissioners say that they will return later to the Canadian Northern Company in order to set out their recommendations as to its ownership and management in the future and as to the terms to be offered to the existing shareholders.

If you turn to page LXXXIV of the report you will see that the commissioners expressly declare that the Government has the power to take over the whole equity of redemption by passing an Order in Council under the provisions of section 24 of the Act of 1914. They say:

> In the case of the Canadian Northern Railway Company no proceedings in court are requisite. Under the provisions of section 24 of the Canadian Northern Railway Guarantee Act, 1914 (4-5 Geo. V, Chap. 20), the Governor General in Council has power, when authorized by Parliament, to declare by order, if default is made by the company in payment of interest on the $45,000,000 guaranteed securities (the interest on which is at present being found by the Government) that the equity of redemption of the company is absolutely barred and foreclosed; and thereupon the whole property becomes vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada.

If words mean anything, that means, according to the declaration of these commissioners, that the total cash put into this property is some $370,000,000; that the outstanding securities and underlying obligations which the Government will be obliged to assume if it takes over the property amount to very much more than that. Without taking into account contingent liabilities, the outstanding securities and underlying obligations would amount to the enormous sum of $428,000,000—and I very much doubt whether that is the total. Bearing in mind the amount of cash that the commissioners declare to have been put into the system, $370,000,000, you can understand that they are justified in declaring that the shareholders have put no money into the property; that the road has been built entirely by subventions of Governments and municipalities and by some unguaranteed securities which have been floated; that there is no value in the equity of redemption. They call the attention of the Government, in connection with that statement, to the fact that under section 24 there is provided a summary mode by which the equity of redemption may be barred and foreclosed by this Parliament without asking permission of the Canadian Northern Railway or of Mackenzie, Mann & Company, without any proceedings in court. One can well understand why Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth recommend that that course should be taken and why they direct the attention of the Government to the fact that provision for the summary foreclosing of the equity of redemption was contained in the Act of 1914.

The commissioners recommend that the property should be transferred to a new company which should be organized and which, they suggest, should be called the Dominion Railway Company. They say that there should be referred to arbitration the matter of what small proportion of stock in the new company—I think they estimated it at one-half of five per cent—shall be handed over to Mackenzie and Mann in consideration of the services which they had performed in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway system. One can see the reasonableness of that. The view of those commissioners was that the obligations of the Canadian Northern more than represented its value. Their opinion was that, dealing with it from every business point of view upon which you could deal with a railway, upon its actual cost, upon the cost of reproduction at pre-war prices, or upon its earning power, there was no money in it for the shareholders, and that, therefore, the shareholders had no value in the equity of redemption. But they say: After you have formed your company to take over the Canadian Northern Railway system, it would be a reasonable thing to set aside one-half of five per cent of the stock of the new company, from which amount of stock Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann might, in case the operations of the road became successful in the future, derive some little income. That would mean, if, as the commissioners thought would be done, the provisions of section 24 of the statute of 1914 were acted upon, the transferring over to the Government of the entire property of the Canadian Northern Railway system, all the stock of the subsidiary companies and all the property covered by the mortgage of 1914. It would not mean the paying out of any money to Messrs. Mackenzie, Mann and Company. It would simply mean the forming of a new company in which, as I have stated, they would have this small amount of stock, namely, one-half of 5 per cent. What is there in that report to warrant the Minister of Finance in stating that, in proposing to acquire the stock by arbitration, he is acting upon the recommendation of the commissioners? I defy him to read this report through from beginning to end and to find in it anything to justify the Government in bringing down the Bill now before us. The recommendations of the commission are entirely opposed to any such idea as that contained in the Bill. The Minister of Finance has also stated that the commissioners have made a large error in their assets. He says that the financial comptroller of railways has called their attention to the error. The minister, however, has not informed the committee as to what is the report of the commissioners. It would have been welcome if he had done so. I am told they say that there is no error in their report. I am told they say that they took all the assets into consideration. I may be wrong in that, but it is most extraordinary that the Minister of Finance, while telling us to-night that Mr. Bell, the comptroller of railways, has called the attention of the commissioners to this alleged error, has not made any statement to the committee as to the reply of the commissioners. So far from there being any error, as far as I am able to judge, all the assets which are properly on the page opposite the liabilities have been taken into consideration. By turning to page 41 of the report, I find this language of the commissioners:

> The property investment of the Canadian Northern Railway system is stated in the balance sheet of June 30, 1916, at $494,112,489.34. This figure admittedly has been written up to include $100,000,000 of capital stock.

It is admitted upon every hand that the $100,000,000 of capital stock, for which this Government proposes to pay through the medium of an arbitration, is all water. It does not, as every one admits, represent a single dollar of money invested in the Canadian Northern enterprise. If, therefore, we take $100,000,000 from the $494,142,489.34 given as the property investment in the company's own balance sheet, we have left only $394,112,489.34. The commissioners go on to say:

> And this stock, as we have already said, was issued without any cash consideration. We have endeavoured to ascertain the actual cost of the system. From the company's official report and special statements supplied to us, we have ascertained that the maximum cash investment that have been made in the property is $383,302,451.33.

Therefore, the obligations which this Government will assume in respect of that property are very much larger than the maximum cash investment, so that the equity of redemption can have no value. The commissioners continue:

> The following tables, which have been accepted by the company as accurate, show:
> 1. The source of money or credit.
> 2. The disposition of money or debit items.
> 3. A list of bonds of constituent companies assumed.

Then they give a full statement of the source of money or credit which was available to the company at different times, and they make the total, according to the company's own statement, $436,173,761.87, and then they show the disposition of money or debit items, and they show that the amount available for road and equipment was only $363,086,705.30. They add to that bonds assumed in part payment of lines purchased, amounting to $20,215,746.03, making a total of only $383,302,451.33. In that statement they have taken into consideration the proceeds of all those land grant bonds, because they show land sales of 16,000,000 odd dollars, and they show the total cash realized from securities sold as being $302,713,872.69. What warrant has the Comptroller of Railways or the Minister of Finance for saying that they have not taken the proceeds of the land grant bonds into consideration? It may be true they have not taken the lands. Why should they? According to the suggestion of my hon. friend, they should put on the credit side of this account the proceeds of the land grant bonds that are issued and outstanding to-day against the lands to the enormous amount of $21,000,000, which the Government purposes asking the people of Canada to assume. Why should they credit the proceeds of land grant bonds and also give a credit for the value of the lands? That would be giving a double credit for the same security. They have not done that, and it would be the most absurd thing in the world to do it. Nevertheless, the Minister of Finance tells us that the error is that they have not put in those 2,000,000 odd acres of lands, lands in Quebec and Ontario for the most part, and some 800,000 acres of raw prairie land. He says that they should be put in. That would be in addition to the proceeds of securities which have been issued against those very lands. The Minister of Finance heard my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) state that, if the Minister of Finance were correct, there might be an error of $65,000,000, and he did not correct him although he knew that, even by Mr. Bell's own statement, $25,000,000 of that on the credit side of the amount was to be wiped off by $25,000,000, which he said was short in the liabilities.

The Minister of Finance heard the hon. member for Welland make that statement, and I assume that he did not know what the figures were, or he would have corrected my hon. friend and prevented the information going out that a possible error had been made by these commissioners. When you take into account the fact that the $25,000,000 that Mr. Bell, the Government comptroller, says should be on the credit side, is counterbalanced by the $25,000,000 of liabilities that he says are there, and when you also take into account the proceeds of the land grant bonds, and the liabilities that exist against the land to a far greater amount, I believe, than their value, you can see that the commissioners have taken into account every dollar which ought to be placed on the credit side of the question, and it is no wonder that the Minister of Finance has not presented to this committee the answer they made to Mr. Bell when this error in their report was pointed out. To my mind, the commissioners have not a shadow of doubt that their statement as to assets and liabilities is absolutely correct.

The Minister of Finance has said that this is a great undertaking. We are entering upon the principle of Government ownership, and the question of what we pay for the road is a secondary consideration, he says. When I suggested that the $60,000,000 that it was proposed to pay was a mere bagatelle, the Minister of Finance repudiated that idea, but yet he says that the $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 or $60,000,000 that we shall pay to the Mackenzie Mann interests, and to their financial associates in the city of Toronto, is a secondary consideration. I do not believe it is. I do not think the people of Canada will believe it is. When the people of this country come to the conclusion that there are liabilities outstanding in the vicinity of $500,000,000—the minister cannot tell us whether it will be $500,000,000 or $600,000,000—when they realize the enormous liability they will be called upon to assume, and that to put the lines in that perfect order which a Government would feel bound to put them in, will mean the further expenditure of a great many more millions, perhaps running up to $100,000,000, when they realize that according to the statement of the Minister of Finance there is to-day, and will be for some years to come, a deficiency, so far as interest charges are concerned, amounting to no one knows how much—it is estimated at from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000, possibly more, but at all events an amount which will represent the interest on at least $100,000,000 more—when the people of this country find that contrary to the statutory agreement made in 1914, contrary to any agreement which exists on the part of this Parliament, they are being involved in the possibility of a further liability which may run up to at least $60,000,000, I do not think that the people of this country will look upon that as a secondary consideration. Speaking for my own province, I know they won't.

Down there we have a large number of railways, the taking over of which this Parliament approved of several years ago, and to the taking over of which, the faith of the Prime Minister and of the Conservative party was pledged several years ago; and yet the Minister of Railways has been telling our people that the Government cannot proceed to acquire those railways because of the war, and there being no money to spend while the war is on. The people of my province—and they are not limited to any one section of the province, but dwell in many different counties in New Brunswick and are deeply interested in this question, as the scores of letters I have received will show—claim that before this Government enters upon new obligations to which the country has in no way been committed, the solemn promise which was made by this Government should be carried out. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has received representations that a road running through a very important section of the province, and serving, as it would if it were in good order, a very excellent farming and lumbering country which is fairly well settled, is likely to be closed down because the Board of Railway Commissioners have ordered repairs to be made to it which the company is not in a financial position to make. They have made strong protests to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and what does he tell them? He tells them that the Government can do nothing while the war is on, but that after the war is over the road will probably be taken over by the Government and operated as a part of the government railway system. That is the story which is being told to the people of my province—to the people in the south, to the people on the north shore, and to the people in the county of Albert, all of whom are interested in seeing that faith is kept by the Government of the day to the people of that province. The story is sent out to those people by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that they can hope for nothing while the war is on, because the Government has no money to enable them to carry out their promises as far as these branch railways are concerned. I do not know how the rest of the people of this country may feel as to assuming this enormous obligation in connection with the Canadian Northern railway, but I know that the people of the province of New Brunswick will feel that if the Government has no money for the small matters connected with the improvement of the railway system of that province, it ought not to assume this enormous obligation in connection with the taking over of this road, the effect of which will be to strain the credit of this country to the utmost.

Let me ask a question which I asked the other day, when I had the opportunity of speaking before the committee on this Bill. Does my hon. friend think that as Minister of Finance of this country he ought to consent to the carrying through of this measure at the present time? Does he think he ought to do so? He knows what it involves. He knows the possibility of the enormous liabilty which may be brought upon the people of this country. He knows that to-day he is paying for the last loan which he obtained for the people of Canada in the vicinity of eight per cent. Think of it, Mr. Chairman. The government of a country so prosperous as Canada, possessing the enormous resources which this country has, is obliged to-day to go into the money markets of the world and pay the enormous sum of eight per cent for the money which it requires to carry on the services of the country. The last loan, which was for the short period of two years, netted, according to the statement of my hon. friend, less than $996,000,000. The information that I have is that it netted less than that. But if you put it at $96,000,000, there is a loss of $4,000,000 which has to be paid at the end of two years, and adding that to the six per cent interest which the bonds bear, we get the enormous rate of almost eight per cent for the money which the Government has borrowed through the arrangement with Morgan and Company, of New York.

Yet in face of that the Government moves merrily on, just as if its credit would never come to an end, and just as if the people of this country would tolerate paying 8 per cent to-day, and possibly 9 per cent or 10 per cent within the next six months—the Government goes merrily on incurring these enormous expenditures, and involving the country in those enormous obligations, and the minister gives the people the soothing consolation that they are entering upon a great movement for government ownership, and what they pay, whether it is $10.000,000 or $600,000,000, is merely a secondary consideration. Well, I congratulate my hon. friend that he is able—if he is able—to think that he will console the people of this country by a consideration of that kind. I think the people will feel they are paying pretty dearly for government ownership, particularly at this time when there is no necessity for it, when the railway company has not asked for it, when the necessities of the country do not require it and when the country needs all its money and all its credit to enable it to discharge its duty towards the Empire in the great world war in which it is engaged.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Section 1, which was described by my hon. friend from St. John as the main section of this Bill has been allowed to stand, and we are now on section 2, which simply provides for the transfer of the shares to the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty upon the making of the agreement referred to in section 1. I have listened to my hon. friend from St. John, who has gone over for the fifth or sixth time the arguments he advanced upon the second reading of the Bill. My hon. friend referred to the closure. I may say to him that it was current information before the Government brought down this measure at all, that no matter what measure we brought down in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway company there would be obstruction so as to force closure, so that I do not feel that my hon. friend's indignation is more than simulated. His thunder was stage thunder, and his heroics were mock heroics. It has been his policy and the policy of many others to compel the Government to resort to closure upon this Bill. That was well known in advance of our bringing down this legislation; and therefore, we need not pretend to ourselves that there is any earnestness on the part of my hon. friend in this matter. I beg to move:

That the further consideration of clause 2 be postponed and that clause 3 be now considered.

Motion carried on same division.

On section 3—After transfer Canadian Northern Railway company may be assisted:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I gave notice of an amendment to this section, and I now beg to move:

That subclause 1 of clause 3 of the Bill be amended by striking out all the words in the said subclause after the word "Fund" in line 4, page 2, and substituting therefor the following: "Provided however that until authorized by Parliament, the total of such advances shall not exceed the sum of $25,000,000; a statement of any such advances showing in detail the purposes for which they were applied shall be presented to Parliament by the Minister of Finance within 20 days after the opening of the next ensuing session thereof."

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask the minister if the terms of this amendment are similar to those of which he gave notice a short time ago?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Precisely.

Mr. MACDONALD: It will be noticed that the effect of the amendment of the Minister of Finance is anticipatory of the expenditure which was found by the commission would be necessary within the next five years, this they estimated at $70,000,000. My hon. friend is evidently taking an instalment of it. I think it is most desirable for the information of the House and of the country that we should know while we are considering this section exactly the indebtedness the country is assuming as a result of this measure. I have prepared a statement, which I think will be found accurate, based upon the financial statements brought before the House. The statement is as follows:

Amount of indebtedness placed on Canada by Government taking over Canadian Northern railway:

Bonded indebtedness	$359,931,635 64
Equipment bonds	14,846,500 00
Income convertible debenture stock	25,000,000 00
Loans and liabilities	112.723,035 00
Equipment expenditures	40,000,000 00
Additions and betterments	$30,000,000 00
Interest on equipment bonds	645,778 75
Arbitrators award	60,000,000 00
Cost of arbitrators	100,000 00
Payment by Government to recoup banks	10,000,000 00
	$653,246,949 39

The loans and liabilities are indicated at page 8 of the financial statement. The $40,000,000 and the $30,000,000 are to be found at page 40 of the Drayton-Acworth report, and represent the necessary expenditure for putting the road in proper shape and maintaining it during the next five years. The item of interest on equipment bonds is not included on page 8 of the financial statement.

Then we come to what would be the estimated amount to be awarded by the arbitrators. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in the various discussions upon this question has made it clear that it is conceded by the Government that not merely the present but the prospective value of the road, to a certain extent, and what it would cost to reproduce it, must be taken into consideration by the arbitrators. The Minister of Finance has, in the course of the discussion, made a case that will give to the gentlemen who act as counsel for the present holders of the stock some very important items for their brief. I have no doubt that as a result of the indications that have been given by the hon. gentleman, and the estimates that have been made as to the amount that the arbitrators may award to the holders as being the market value of their stock, the award will amount to $60,000,000. Then we have the cost of the arbitration which my hon. friends are providing for, is one which may be protracted in its nature, which will involve the employment of counsel of the very highest standing, to whom large fees will be paid, and the employment of experts from all over the country. I venture to suggest that Sir William Meredith will expect to be paid as much as he was in the Meredith-Duff commission and he was paid a very handsome sum for his work in that matter. The Government will have to pay the costs and expenses of this arbitration. Having regard to the amount involved and the extent of the legislation I think we are justified in placing the cost at not less than $100,000. This item, as a consequence of this legislation, is a very serious one indeed. Then we have the payments that have been made by the banks for the June,

July and August interest as it became due. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister the other day told us that the banks have protected the interest payments for this year as they fell due. It is difficult to ascertain what the total amount of these payments is because the Minister of Finance is going to apply the closure to this measure without giving to the House or the committee information of the most necessary character and which the House and the country are entitled to. Notwithstanding the fact that on repeated occasions, by reason of the Minister of Finance having included in section 1 of this Bill, a provision that the pledgees of this stock would be satisfied, the minister has refused to give to the committee a statement as to the amount of money that the stock is pledged for, or where it was pledged, or any of the information which any Government is entitled to give to the committee or the House with reference to a measure of this importance. I have to make an estimate in view of the past payments, of which we have had evidence, and without the information that the minister could give us, and I estimate that these payments amount to $10,000,000. As a result of this computation, I submit to the Finance Minister that, as a result of this legislation, this country becomes saddled immediately we pass this measure with an additional burden of debt of $653,243,949.39. As a result of this legislation, in regard to which, for the first time in the history of Canada when dealing with an important financial problem, the necessary information has been refused to the House to enable it to give full consideration to the measure; in war time when taxation is being applied on every hand for the purpose ostensibly of getting money with which to pay for the war; these hon. gentlemen ruch recklessly into an expenditure which imposes upon the credit of Canada this enormous liability of $653,000,000 and upon which Canada will have to pay interest for all time. What is the result of the action of the Government in regard to the financial position of this country? It is shown by the following statement:

The Debt of Canada.

Gross debt	$1,542,000,000
Capital expenditure—
Main estimates	21,113,550
Supplementary estimates	32,180,542
Canadian Northern obligations	653,243,949
	$2,248,538,041

So that, without taking into consideration a single dollar of the additional liability that is being imposed upon Canada every day as a result of the war measure, the effect of this measure of the Minister of Finance is that the debt of Canada will be, with respect to these matters alone, at the conclusion of this year, the enormous sum of $2,248,538,041. It is all very well to talk about the glorious principles of government ownership and about the asset that Canada has, but when we find that after fifty years of Confederation, the Finance Minister of this country has to go to our neighbours to the south of us to borrow $100,000,000 for two years, when he has to pay the interest which he has to pay and has paid and has to float a loan at the figures at which he has floated it, as disclosed this afternoon, it will be seen by everybody that this hon. gentleman's management of the finances of this country has been anything but satisfactory. When my hon. friend goes again to J. P. Morgan & Company and the financial people of the United States, and when they learn that as a result of his management of the financial affairs of this country the debt of Canada has reached $2,250,000,000, they will hesitate to comply with his request for further assistance and the people will begin to realize where this Government and its policies has led them. I venture to say that if the policy of these gentlemen be maintained for any period of time under existing conditions this country will be obliged to face repudiation of its interest under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite. That may be a fantastic theory that we do not want to discuss, but here at one fell swoop double the debt that Canada has contracted since Confederation is being added by this measure. Hon. gentlemen decline to give us information, refuse to tell us who is to get the money, refuse to tell us how much the stock is pledged for, who are the pledgees, and, in short, they decline all reasonable requests, apply the gag and the closure and place upon Canada a liability of $653,000,000, under these conditions, saddling this country with a liability for all time to come and creating a debt of $2,250,000,000. Hon. gentlemen are welcome to the record. The people will come before very long to realize the financial position in which Canada has been placed by the reckless disregard for the last two years by hon. gentlemen opposite of all those considerations which ought to weigh in regard to maintaining the financial prestige of this country.

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot) (translation): Mr. Chairman, representing a truly rural county whose inhabitants must work hard in order to earn a living and must exert themselves unceasingly to support their families, I deem it my duty to rise in this House and to protest against the transaction now offered by the Government.

Mr. Chairman, we are on section 3 of the Bill which provides that we shall take the remaining five sixths of the stock of the Canadian Northern company, amounting to sixty million dollars.

Let me tell you, Sir, that this sum appears enormous to me and that I consider this a suspicious transaction, because so far we have not been able to ascertain to whom we shall pay these sixty, fifty or twenty five million dollars, nor who are the holders of that stock and why it is so held.

If the information we have got be correct, we are inclined to believe that this amount of Canadian Northern stock is in the hands of friends of the Government among whom is found a gentleman whose position upon a certain question has changed because he has had the promise that he would receive the par value of the stock he holds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before section 3 is passed, it might be advisable to consider a while the situation of the Canadian Northern company, in order to know how that company originated, how it was managed and how it is that the remaining stock, the balance of those hundred millions, divided amongst the friends of the Government and of Mackenzie and Mann, must now be sold to the Government so that the company may come out of their financial tangles.

Originally, the Mackenzie and Mann partnership bought up a company which was called the Canadian Northern. This company has been subsidized by every provincial government—the Quebec government excepted—and by the federal government to the enormous extent of a hundred odd million dollars. They have been granted by the several municipalities in this country—save those in the province of Quebec—as a help, an amount of subsidies exceeding a hundred million dollars. The Canadian Northern company from the date of its organization has been granted enough subsidies to build its whole line from one end to the other, and let me tell you that notwithstanding the subsidies received the line has not yet been completed and the sum required in order to finish the Canadian Northern transcontinental road is accounted at several million dollars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in our present financial conditions is it in the interest of this country to acquire the stock belonging to the Canadian Northern, that is, the sixty million dollars remaining? Are we in such a financial position that we can get hold of so considerable an amount of stock, specially when the royal commission appointed by the present Government has shown that the stock held by the Canadian Northern or Mackenzie and Mann is utterly worthless, and above all after having taken into consideration the Act passed by the present Government in 1914, by which the Government is not only authorized but fully empowered in virtue of a mutual agreement between the Canadian Northern company represented by Mackenzie and Mann and the present Government, to take hold of all the remaining stock in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann without paying a single farthing should the company default.

When a country has to ask its neighbour a loan of money and to pay such a high rate of interest as eight per cent, I say the time has come when the Government which preside over the destinies of that country should ponder over it again before carrying their schemes any further.

In our present condition, in war time, when we are spending a million dollars a day, when we must pay large amounts to the widows and orphans of our soldiers who fell at the front and pensions to the returned soldiers who were wounded on the battle fields, our disbursements are and shall be heavy as long as the war will last.

We must provide, as I have just said, for the pensions and also for the requirements of the country. At this moment we are neglecting all kinds of improvements on account of the war. How many useful schemes have been discussed in this House for several years—for instance, the opening of the Georgian Bay canal which would so greatly benefit the handling of the western grain and the transportation of produce between the east and the west—we are neglecting that undertaking, we cannot even start it and naturally our country is deprived of the benefits which would accrue from the opening of that canal. Once more, we overlook all this on account of the lack of money due to the war, but that does not prevent the Government from caring very little for the interests of the people, and from being ready to take hold of millions of dollars to hand them to people who are not entitled to them, if we refer to section 24 of the Act passed in 1914, chapter 20 of the Statutes of Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is idle to think that the people give their approval to such a transaction. From the Prime Minister down, the hon. members on the other side of the House know very well that the people who pay, who earn their living by the sweat of their brow, blame the transaction now under review, and I am sure that at the proper time the Government will notice that the present transaction is denied by the whole country, but it will be too late.

With your consent, Sir, I shall refer to section 24 I have just mentioned which provides that in case the company should not meet its engagements the Government reserve to themselves the right of securing the remaining stock which did not belong to them. I shall read the controverted section:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary nothwithstanding.

Now, Mr. Chairman, has the Canadian Northern really defaulted? I say yes and our friends on the other side are also of that opinion since they present this Bill in order to seek authority from Parliament to secure the balance of the stock. As to that there is no disagreement between us; the difference of opinion consists in their maintaining that the Government must pay an optional amount for the balance of that stock, while we assert that they are bound and entitled to get hold of it without any outlay, even if it be in the hand of Mackenzie and Mann.

When we passed the agreement of 1914, we thought the Government was in earnest; we allowed it to pass believing that in case the Canadian Northern should default the road would come under section 24 of the Act and the Government would take hold of the balance of the stock which is ours by that very Act and for which Mackenzie and Mann are not entitled to receive a single cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall ask the hon. members of the Government and their supporters whether or not they have pondered over their present attitude; I could also ask them whether or not they really believe they are serving the interests of their constituents by voting for such an iniquitous measure as the one we are now considering, that is, by taking the people's money, which is not theirs any more than it is ours, and handing it over to Mackenzie and Mann. It might not be out of place to recall here the answer given for the Government by the hon. Solicitor General when we were discussing the legislation of 1914. Here is what I find among other things at page 3858 of the Hansard of that year:

> The railway policy of the right hon. leader of the Opposition has another characteristic feature. Under the present Bill we have a summary method of taking over the road, a summary method which in effect gives us as security the other sixty per cent of stock.
> We know we have the ordinary right which any mortgagee has, and the right which any guarantor of a mortgage has, the right by subrogation of getting into the shoes of the lender and in the event of default exercising the rights of a mortgagee and taking possession of the road as a receiver; we know we have that right, but we have the additional summary remedy of proceeding by mere Act of Parliament to take over the road as the property of the people of this country and eliminate once and for all, all other parties interested in that railway. And we have not only so arranged it that the interests of the Canadian Northern and all other persons whatsoever in the Canadian Northern system shall be eliminated, and that in the event of default all shall be the property of the Canadian people, but furthermore, the ten million dollars of stock in the townsite and the ten million dollars bonds are put into hotchpotch, although they are the property of Mackenzie and Mann, and although Mackenzie and Mann alone made investment in them, and in the event of our foreclosing and taking over the enterprise we ourselves get the whole benefit of the townsite. That summary method is given us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here we have the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), one of the most distinguished lawyers of this country, who states clearly and formally that in case of default by the company, the Government have the right of a mortgagee, that they have the right to provide all the necessary safeguards for taking over all the property of Mackenzie and Mann or of the Canadian Northern Railway company, and not only that property, but it says moreover that in spite of all the cautions we have taken in connection with various railway companies, we shall take possession of $10,000,000 worth of property belonging to Mackenzie and Mann, townsites, etc., etc.

To-day by this Bill we are asked to acquire from Mackenzie and Mann the balance of the $100,000,000 of stock and the Government says: "We will appoint a board of arbitration and we will abide by their decision." But, Mr. Chairman, if the arbitrators that are to be chosen decide that the value of the stock is the same as it was in 1914, and if we are compelled to pay on the same basis as when we had to lend $45,000,000 in order to acquire $40,000,000 of the stock of the Canadian Northern railway, in what financial situation shall we find ourselves involved?

Did you ever hear, Mr. Chairman, of a lender giving $5,000,000 more than the value of his security? If you had any money to lend, Mr. Speaker, even on a first mortgage, would you lend a sum in excess of the value of the property, and would you advance even the full value of the property pledged as security? Is there a single lender in the world who would advance money to the extent of the actual value of the property? No not a single one, Sir. Generally, the amount of the loan never exceeds 50 per cent of the estimated value. But in 1914 we advanced to the Canadian Northern Railway company $45,000,000, and all the security we got was $40,000,000 of stock.

Should the arbitrators who are to be appointed by the Government take that loan of 1914 as a basis for the valuation of the stock, we should have to pay from 75 to 80 million dollars to Mackenzie and Mann, for the balance of the stock which they have on hand, and we would find ourselves in a fine mess, besides all the other liabilities we should have to assume later on.

As already stated by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) we shall have to assume liabilities of over $600,000,000. One can fancy the financial straits in which the country will find itself, not only after the war, but immediately after this transaction, when once we have advanced the required amount for the balance of that stock; when once we have been saddled with all the other outstanding liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway company; when we have to spend millions of dollars to complete the system and to meet all the obligations imposed upon us by the war, in which we are taking part. I say, Sir, that the ratepayers of this country will never be able to pay the interest on the public debt. I am speaking only of the present time, but what will be our position after the war, when we shall have to face expenses about which we know nothing as yet, and which we are incurring during the war? What about our expenditure for munitions and the maintenance of our forces in England and in France, which are now being paid by the Imperial Government, but which after the war will have to be settled by this country and will amount to many millions of dollars? What will be our financial situation then?

Mr. Chairman, I wonder what the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the other members of the Government mean by launching the country at a time like this, into such a tremendous undertaking when the country is already saddled with such heavy expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, let me repeat here what the hon. member for South Renfrew stated before this House on the 7th instant, as reported at page 4501 of unrevised Hansard:

> Roughly speaking we are entering upon a scheme of purchase, the value of which we do not know yet, with a liability for completion the figures for which we ought to have in our hands, with a further liability for betterment the amount of which we ought to know, and with a still further necessary liability for rolling stock and motive power. These things we must know before we can tell just how far we are going, or what investment we intend to make in this great project of public ownership.

I am not a believer, Sir, in public ownership. We are already in charge of the Intercolonial and we have enough of it; we are tired and sick of it. If we were to take charge of a new transcontinental railway, administered by the Government, it would spell disaster to the country. It could not be otherwise, because a railway cannot be successfully administered, financially, by a Government, more especially by such a Government as we have to-day.

Before this section 3 is agreed to, I should like to make a few remarks concerning the extraordinary measures resorted to by the Government to put this Bill through the House. The proposal must be an exceedingly bad one, or it must have more than an ordinary interest for the Minister of Finance or some of his friends in this House or outside of it, to induce him to adopt such drastic proceedings in order to secure the passing of the Bill. Once before we had to submit to closure. That was about four years ago and then as to-day it was brought into operation in order to secure the passing of a measure detrimental to the best interests of the people of this country. On that occasion the Government had to apply the closure——

Some hon. MEMBERS: The gag.

Mr. MARCILE: On that occasion the Government had also to gag the representatives of the people in order to impose upon the country a policy repudiated by the large majority of the people. Nevertheless, there is some comfort in the knowledge that to-morrow loud protests will be heard from all parts of the country and that in a few hours, when the Minister of Finance goes home he will spend a sleepless night, racked by pangs of remorse over his doings of to-night and at the thought that to-morrow he will have to finish his unpalatable task; that is to say to apply the closure with all its drastic features, so that the voice of the representatives of the people may be stifled and that this iniquitous legislation may be put through.

Before many days, Mr. Chairman, you will hear loud protests from all parts of the country. They have been heard already. The Minister of Finance knows that the great capitalists of Montreal, joined by those of Toronto, who have no personal interest in this transaction, have strongly protested. But that is only the beginning; mightier protests will follow from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Upon the Government rests the whole responsibility for this policy. We will not have anything to do with it. As far as we have been allowed to discuss the measure, we have tried to open the eyes of the Government to the dangers of the road we are travelling over; since this debate is on, we have endeavoured to convince them that they are taking a wrong step, that they are not protecting the interests of the people and that they are imposing new burdens upon the already overtaxed ratepayers of this country. But, what does the Government care about that, if by so doing they can extend their protection to those who have a finger in the pie? What we are witnessing to-night recalls to my mind a promise made by the Prime Minister after the election of 1911, when he said that hereafter the voice of Toronto would be heard and listened to in the administration of public affairs and the legislation of the country.

In the present case, the voice of Toronto has been heard, but we will soon hear a still mightier voice, the voice of the people. At no distant date, I hope the Prime Minister and his colleagues will invite the electorate to pass sentence upon the policy they are now submitting to the House. When that time comes, the voice of Toronto will not be the only one to be heard, and the people will have a chance to express their opinion at the polls. The electors have been waiting for that occasion since 1911; they will take their revenge on the Government and send back the Prime Minister and his supporters into the cold shades of the opposition from which they should never have emerged, thus putting an end to the iniquities perpetrated since 1911.

Sir THOMAS WHITE and Mr. GAUTHIER having risen to address the Chair:

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) has the floor.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I gave way to two hon. members. I should like to say that I do not like to take any advantage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister is going to stop discussion on the section. He should not do that when the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe has the floor and I will appeal to the Chair. There is a limit beyond which he cannot go.

An hon. MEMBER: He is afraid of it.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I do not want to impose my speech on the Minister of Finance if he does not want to hear me.

Mr. ETHIER: He is afraid of you.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member will not be debarred from speaking if I have the floor, because he can speak on section 4 or he can speak to-morrow. I have given way to two speakers. We are on closure procedure. Who has the floor?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe has the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No Chairman has a right to turn his eyes from a member who has the Floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I want to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No one with any idea of parliamentary rules would have the indecency to do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I appeal to the members here if the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) had not the floor first. I, as one member of the House, protest. You have no right to do it. It is tyranny.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You should be ashamed to do it. You had no right at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I see that the Chairman desires to explain. We will allow him to do so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: Call in the police.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Call in the police as quickly as you like.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Call in Mackenzie and Mann. Call in Sir Clifford Sifton.

The CHAIRMAN: The rule provides—

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notified you, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Gauthier wanted to speak before the minister.

The CHAIRMAN:—the rule says that the first hon. gentleman who catches the eye of the chairman should have the floor. I was noticing both hon. gentlemen because I knew that they wanted to speak. The hon. minister got up first.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No.

The CHAIRMAN: He was the first who caught my eye.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And you were notified that Mr. Gauthier wanted to speak, and you knew it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had no business to take such notification, and I declare that the Finance Minister caught my eye first and he has the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that, under the rule, the chairman should, if possible, see hon. gentlemen on either side of the House alternately. There have been two speches on the other side of the House—

Mr. PUGSLEY: But your intention is to close discussion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I gave way to the last hon. gentleman who spoke and no harm can result from my rising now because the hon. member can speak on section 4, or he can speak to-morrow. I have no desire to close off the addresses of hon. gentlemen, but we must advance the Bill. I beg to move:

That the further consideration of clause 3 and the amendment be postponed and clause 4 be taken up.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: That is just what we were afraid of. That is the trick that was played on us.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is a motion before the Chair now that must be withdrawn before this can be considered. The member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) has a perfect right to speak.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Sir Thomas White that the further consideration of section 3 with the amendment be postponed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it in French.

Motion read in French.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask a question? If the rule which you intend to invoke applies to the consideration of an amendment, then I do not read that in the rule and I would like to know where I shall find it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It applies to the whole section with the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment being moved forms part of the section.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The amendment is not carried yet.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not to be carried now, it is to be postponed. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to speak briefly to a point of order. There is always discussion on a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is perfectly absurd. We might as well go home if we are to have no—

An hon. MEMBER: We had better go home.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I know hon. gentlemen think that, and the hon. gentlemen themselves are non-combatants. They might as well go home; in fact better. They would support whatever the Government proposed. It is difficult to know what they are here for at all. They might better be at home harvesting their crops.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is not a point of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The point of order is this: The ruling is that the motion that the section stand is to be determined without debate. I think that is straining the rule a good deal. Before the committee now is an amendment moved by the Minister of Finance. Surely hon. gentlemen have a right to speak to that amendment. How absurd it would be; what a gross injustice it would be, that you should rule that further consideration of an amendment moved to-night for the first time, upon which only one hon. gentleman has been allowed to speak, should be postponed—an amendment proposed without any notice, without opportunity being given to the committee to discuss it. It seems to me to be clear that the amendment can be discussed. The member for St. Hyacinthe should be permitted to speak to that amendment, if the proceedings are to be carried on with any degree of fair play. There is no desire on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side to prolong the discussion; we have not shown any desire to do that. To-day as much time was taken up by the Minister of Finance and by gentlemen on the other side as by gentlemen on this side. Let us have a fair discussion. The member for St. Hyacinthe surely ought to be permitted to speak to the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): Mr. Chairman, am I to understand that you do not allow me to speak even on this question which is now before the House?

Mr. RAINVILLE: I do not refuse a reply to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, but there is a motion before the House, and I simply desire to read this motion:

"It is proposed by Sir Thomas White, that further consideration of section 3 with the amendments be delayed."

Mr. GAUTHIER: Have I not the right to address the House on this question?

Motion, (Sir Thomas White) declared carried: yeas 38, nays 22.

On section 4—appointment of arbitrators.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Chairman—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to move the amendment that I gave notice of the other day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is before the committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The member for St. Hyacinthe has the floor.

Mr. GAUTHIER: The Finance Minister has just said that I would have an opportunity of addressing the committee on the section as it stands; now he wants to move an amendment. That is the kind of fair play we are getting from the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GAUTHIER (translation): Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss with you, if you please, the question as I understand it. The Government have decided——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I am speaking to the question; if you do not understand, it is not my fault——

(Translation) The point I raise, Mr. Chairman, is a point—as for you, you can understand me, if there are some on the other side of this House who don't. I admit that in your capacity of Chairman, you look at those you please, but you must listen to those who speak, when they have the floor. The Government want to impose closure upon a Bill which has been laid before the House and which every one has taken cognizance of. And now at this sitting of the House, the hon. Minister of Finance, who is personally in charge of his own Bill, proposes, at this very same sitting an amendment which he prevents us from discussing. Is it fair that he should prevent us from discussing his amendment with the clause thus amended, to impose closure upon an amendment which has just been laid before the House? That is the question I raise. In the first place nobody previously heard of it. The Minister of Finance cannot pretend that we have discussed his amendment for too long a while, for he has just laid it before the House. Is there any obstruction as to this amendment? I say not. If there is any obstruction, what would you decide, in your capacity as Chairman, as to the amendment proposed by the Minister who is in charge of the Bill itself? I would like to have your decision on that point. If you absolutely mean to prevent me from speaking, there is still section 4 which we will discuss.

Mr. RAINVILLE (translation): In reply to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, I must say that the two amendments are laid before the House and in the Chairman's hands, and I see that the hon. member knew that, since he spoke of it a few moments ago.

Mr. GAUTHIER (translation): It has just been submitted.

Mr. RAINVILLE (translation): Both have been laid here since Friday last, they were annexed to the Bill.

Mr. MARTIN (St. Mary's) (translation): This ought to be debatable it seems to me.

Mr. RAINVILLE (translation): As to the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, I may tell him that these amendments are before the House since Friday last.

Mr. GAUTHIER (translation): Has he not moved them to-night?

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot) (translation): I should point out that to-night the Bill I now have before me has been sent to me and that it contains no amendments.

Mr. RAINVILLE (translation): They are in Friday's Hansard.

Mr. GAUTHIER (translation): When we ask for a copy of the Bill and the employees of the House bring us the Bill without amendments, what should we think?

The Chairman (Mr. Rainville) read Sir Thomas White's amendment in English.

Several MEMBERS: In French.

Mr. RAINVILLE (translation): It is moved by Sir Thomas White that the consideration of clause 3, with the amendments, be postponed just now.

Mr. GAUTHIER (translation): Mr. Chairman, is there an amendment, yes or no?

Mr. RAINVILLE (translation): Certainly, there is an amendment before me, before the Chairman, since last Friday.

Mr. MARTIN (translation): Be fair, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GAUTHIER (translation): Do you give the precedence to the Minister of Finance or do I have the floor?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who had the floor? What courtesy was shown to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier)?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I just want to move this amendment of which I gave notice.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who had the floor?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe had the floor.

Mr. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I see that we should not give up all hope for your change of heart since you come back at last to the ideas of justice which formerly were in you; but you will agree with me that it is pretty hard to get the right of speaking in this House, specially after the application of the closure rules which have been enacted by the Government since they are in power.

The performance the House is witnessing is exceedingly amusing; some laugh, and it is not because they consider it is funny, but because those surrounding them cannot follow a debate which does not take place in their own vernacular. I solicit the attention of the House, because to-morrow at the latest freedom of speech shall have been strangled by this Government and I should like to avail myself of the few remaining hours so as to discuss this section.

Never would it have occurred to any one of us that the members from Quebec, the only province that has not been caught in the feelers of that octopus which is called the Canadian Northern, would be gagged while attempting to protest on behalf for their constituents against the nefarious Bill now before the House. After all, Mr. Chairman, if the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, as well as the great financiers in the city of Toronto, were caught in the claws of Mackenzie and Mann, while Quebec always stood aside cautiously, is it not fair that the very province of Quebec whose people will be called upon to pay their proper share of the indebtedness which the country is to be saddled with by this iniquitous legislation should be heard? It is fair that only those who lent their credit or their money should raise their voice? Would it be fair to turn a deaf ear to the recriminations of those who shall have to pay their quota of those liabilities and who would not be ensnared by the men who left no stone unturned in order to attempt—and who have succeeded in a measure—to bribe the municipal councils, the provinces and even the Parliament of Canada and who compassed their end where no institution could have done it? I have no grudge against you, Mr. Chairman; you are only discharging the duty that has been imposed upon you, and I might add that had you been annoying, we would not mind. We know your task is an unpleasant one, and naturally having been rewarded beforehand, you are bound to perform your work. However, it seems to me that we, on this side of the House, are entitled to the same measure of justice as our friends on the other side are entitled to. I see the walls of this hall covered with English flags, the emblems of justice and fair play. If we are going to be treated as there seems to be a disposition to treat us, would it not be better to take away those flags, instead of having them hanging over our heads as a mockery?

The Bill before the House is a fit sequel to six years of maladministration, to six years of iniquitous legislation; the end befits the beginning; it tallies with the task and befits also those who have shaped the future of the country since October 1911. We have seen so far every kind of legislation more or less proper, every kind of breach of power and of faulty administration of public affairs; we have witnessed so far the Opposition availing itself of its right to criticise both the legislation and the administration; but the previous governments in power were at least courageous enough to allow free discussion and to refrain from gagging the Opposition. Henceforth, how would the representatives of the people be able to air their grievances with regard to this measure? We consider that this Bill is the most iniquitous piece of legislations which has ever been placed before the House; and yet, they are attempting to thwart freedom of speech and they would not let this section stand. I would like to state to the House the reasons why we oppose this legislation, hoping that at least some newspapers whose correspondents are still in the press gallery would make them known to the country. We are called upon to make sacrifices of all kinds; we have already recruited more than 420,000 men; we have given large sums of money; and hon. ministers tell us the Government are willing to give the last man and the last dollar in order to bring the war to a successful issue.

The Opposition never stood in the way. We have been threatened with bankruptcy. We are willing to accept our share of responsibility, even as to the financial bankruptcy of the country. To win the war, shall I be told that with such a war debt as has been piling up, with such a debt as we have been saddled with in the performance of our duty, as representatives of the whole nation, as members of Parliament; shall I be told that there is the least reason to bring up during the last days of a dying Parliament a measure which will put upon the shoulders of our people an indebtedness the end of which we might never see?

I would not like to weary the House by quoting figures, but I have always been told that the per capita debt of a nation was the surest test to ascertain its prosperity. Without going back into ancient history, I may say that when the Conservative party went out of office in 1896, our per capita debt was $47.50. It was generally considered then, that the time was ripe for a change, because we were on the threshold of bankruptcy. To-day, with the known public debt for civil government and war expenditure, with the additional capital expenditure to be incurred under this Bill, our liabilities will reach, in round numbers, the enormous amount of two billion and one hundred million dollars. If we can rely on statistics, with a population of about seven million, the per capita debt of every man, woman and child in Canada amounts to $300. If in 1896, the country was considered to be on the verge of bankruptcy with a per capita debt of $47.80, I ask you, Sir, where we stand to-day, with a per capita debt of $300. But I shall go further and say that if in order to maintain our participation in the war. we had been told that it was necessary to pile up the enormous debt of two billion one hundred million dollars, we on this side of the House would have willingly voted all the money that the Government might have asked for.

The Liberal party, through their leader and his most trusted lieutenants have pledged their whole support to the Government on all war measures and promised to vote all the money needed for the prosecution of the war to a successful issue, but we never agreed to support this Bill and we cannot do so, because it is a measure clearly intended to help Mackenzie and Mann the Canadian Northern Railway company and the big interests whose influence is felt to be behind this legislation. Sir, in spite of all the ability displayed by the Minister of Finance, in spite of his resourcefulness and his wide experience in handling all kinds of business and financial propositions, this House and the country realize that an occult power is holding the Government by the throat and will stop at nothing to put in our statutes the Bill now under discussion.

I will go further yet. I say that the Government who pretend to be ready to do every thing for the empire and for the war and that the ministers who, one after another, have stated in this House that they were willing to face bankruptcy, and to pull out the last rail and the last tie of our railways in order to win the war, I say that the Government in spite of all these loyal statements, are by this very Bill, draining the resources of the country at such a pace that we will be crippled to the point of being unable not only to recuperate after the war, but even to continue our participation in this struggle. The honourable gentlemen are continually talking about sacrifices, about contributions, about living a life of privation. Who are those who are making sacrifices? Who are those who are giving contributions? Who are those who are living a life of self-denial? It is the common people.

With this legislation, you are going to raise the public debt to two billions one hundred million dollars, the interest on which will be over one hundred million dollars annually; moreover, you will have to pay pensions to soldiers' orphans, widows; in short you are piling up such a debt that the interest alone will absorb the larger part of the revenue of the country, and you will not be in a position to make, on behalf of Canada, the sacrifices that the honourable gentlemen on the other side are always talking about, that we, on this sid , are making, but which the hon. gentlemen opposite seem to ignore.

There are some people who believe that their mission in this world consists in lecturing others, but they do not feel themselves bound to put their preaching in practice. The Government are giving to-day a fine sample of their state of mind. After a summary discussion on the three first sections of the Bill, we are now on section 4 dealing with the appointment of arbitrators. The Government is trying to shift their responsibility in appointing a board of arbitration so that when that tribunal shall determine the value of the stock we are about to acquire, the Government may be committed beforehand to the policy they are bent upon, but on which they wont give us any information.

I agree that the Government commands a majority in this House; they can secure the passing of any Bill they choose to propose, but I deem it to be my duty in the name of the county I represent, in the name of the province I come from, to say once more that the Government is saddling that province with a new burden, without any useful purposes being attained, because we are in no way responsible for the present situation.

I say that the provincial governments, who have subsidized the Mackenzie and Mann concerns, are interested in having the central government redeem Mackenzie and Mann's debentures which they have themselves endorsed.

I say that the Toronto financiers are interested in being reimbursed the advances made to Mackenzie and Mann, and the Toronto financiers are interested as to the province of Quebec, as to Canada, even at the risk of bankruptcy, even at the risk of any future loan depreciation, should pass and endorse this legislation, but I may add that it is not the Toronto financiers who will pay whatever part of it that will be charged to us. I say that we have in no way contributed to the present state of affairs and that we have a right to be heard, closure or no closure, gag or no gag.

Mr. Chairman, I would not make any threat to the members of the Government. I know they are most sensitive and shiverish; but we have therein the germs of popular reclamations which have shaken powers more solidly seated than the present Government, I say that there may be some danger, when the people have been saddled with the burdens you have put upon their shoulders with a war object, with the idea of participation, so that our effort may come in and help England's effort, the effort of the Empire.

I say that it is not without some danger that, upon a people on the road to bankruptcy, the Government of this country may come and impose a debt which will amount to 650 millions of dollars and take over the totality of the shares in a company unable to pay its interests year after year. That company is compelled to make an appeal to the Government. The Government have made advances; the Government have assumed the responsibility; that responsibility, they have the credit for it, but I say that it could have been discussed and that it could have been assumed. However, I do not see any good reason for the Government to do so in these critical times, when the Minister of Finance was forced to go to the New York financial market to negotiate a loan for which Canada has to pay one and three quarter per cent for commission and brokerage charges.

The ratio is enormous from the standpoint of high finance, and it has been brought about as a consequence of obligations assumed by Canada in order to do what the country believed it her duty to do. Such obligations we have assumed, we are ready to endorse the responsibility, we are ready to bear the burden of the interest we shall pay, because the amount borrowed is necessary to the administering of our civil as well as of our military affairs; but what arguments can we give to our constituents if we should allow to pass without any protest, such an Act as this one? What reasons can we allege? Am I, Mr. Chairman, in such a position that I can go and say to the electors of St. Hyacinthe: I have allowed that measure to pass without any protest; it is true that you have in no way contributed to put Mackenzie and Mann in the way of starting their construction and then leave it off unfinished; it is true that, in our county, we have never contributed at all to allow these gentlemen to grow rich, whilst all the companies they have created went into bankruptcy one after another; it is true that, in our province, we have in no way aided these gentlemen to grow rich, since all the companies they have organized went to the wall one after the other; but you must, nevertheless, bear your share of these liabilities. Am I in a position to say to the electors of St. Hyacinthe county that they must face this indebtedness because it is in the public interest? The only argument offered by the hon. Minister of Finance, to show that the Canadian Northern company must not go into the hands of a receiver, is that the financial credit of Canada would be destroyed, if the actual value of this enterprise should be exposed. Are you going to tell me that the credit of Canada will be imperilled by allowing to go into the hands of a receiver enterprises beyond the energy, the capacity, the comprehension and the credit of their promoters? We are told that, during the present crisis we are experiencing, in the midst of the present war, we have not the right to injure in any way our national credit. But what a knock out blow, would not the Government strike at our credit by saddling our people with a debt of $650,000,000 for a railroad that does not pay its running expenses and which cannot do so for some years to come? Would Canada's credit be jeopardized by allowing this company to be absorbed by another company, rather than having us assume the burden ourselves? I say no. The hon. Minister of Finance told us himself, in one of his recent speeches, in this House, that there were only two corporations that could absorb the Canadian Northern; the Canadian Pacific or the Government of Canada; but as the Canadian Pacific might perhaps feel like absorbing it, we should rather absorb it ourselves. What business man would, for a moment, seriously discuss such a proposal? I put aside all the data and all the opinions which are given us from more or less authorized sources, and I only take up the main fact and our situation just as it is. I put the question, what business man in this country who, being in the position of this Government and facing such a desperate condition as that of the Canadian Northern and of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, and who would have the chance of seeing it absorbed by such a powerful corporation as the Canadian Pacific, would not let it go at that, instead of the Government taking up the burden rather than let it pass into the hands of another corporation; and would rather assume the liabilities under the pretence that it is needed as a 'feeder' for the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental?

I have always understood that, so far as good finance goes, a man should never undertake anything beyond his means or his capacities. Is the Government, to-day, in such a condition as to venture into operating this railway?

I deeply regret that I am unable to discuss this question in the language understood by the hon. Minister of Finance and by the hon. Solicitor General, not that I have the pretension of either convincing or converting them; but they might understand, at least, that it is not partisanship that prompts me to raise objections against this measure, but that I am making these remarks merely and only from the standpoint of public interest.

What! Mr. Chairman, such a transaction is proposed when the Government, in order to continue their contributions to the war, to maintain their civil administration, cannot attend to it with their revenue, cannot even do so with the taxation although it be very heavy, almost distressing for a portion of the people, when the Government are unable to meet the exigencies of the conditions without having recourse to foreign aid? The Government of this country have just floated a loan of 100 million dollars, at the exorbitant and usurious rate of 8 per cent, and in the face of such a situation, the Government still venture to come before this Parliament and the country at large and say that, in spite of all the difficulties we run across, in spite of our contribution to the war, the Government, do I say are bold enough to say: We have decided upon putting an extra debt of $650,000,000 upon the people's shoulders, because the advances assented to by the different provinces, by the municipal boards, by the debenture holders, in order to have this railroad completed, are in peril all those interested parties ask us, the Government of Canada, to intervene in order to save the situation.

The Government of Canada have guaranteed some debentures; there is only one thing to do; if the first debtors are unable to pay, the Government will be in the position of an endorser who has endorsed a note bona-fide, expecting the promisor would meet his obligations. If the latter cannot do so, the endorser must pay, because he has accepted the promisor's debt. Every one admits, without however being so sharp in financial affairs as may be the hon. Minister of Finance, that, if the Canadian Northern should pass into the hands of a receiver, it would be taken at its actual value by whatever company absorbs it. Now, will the Canadian Government absorb the Canadian Northern at its actual value?

The Government may say yes, but every one entertains a doubt about it. Should not this doubt be cleared up? Should we not have a formal statement in order to reassure public opinion? I will go further than any other member on this side of the House into the discussion of that transaction—useless to say that I am now speaking in my own name—in the face of the present conditions, when we are asked to purchase 9,500 miles of railroad subsidized by the provincial governments, by the federal government and by the municipal councils, it means to me that the Government should do everything in their power in order to reassure public opinion which has been stirred up.

Do not play with edged tools. In your administration, as well as in your legislation, you should show as much prudence as any business man should use, especially the prudence of a business man, for in a critical period as the one we are now going through, he is obliged on account of the position he holds, to reassure the public opinion which is stirred up.

It is a very easy thing to say to the Montreal financiers, for instance, who are protesting against this deal, it is most easy to tell them as the Solicitor General has answered them: that they are Montreal people, that Montreal is against conscription, that conscription has been voted and that the Canadian Northern Railway Bill will also be adopted.

Well, let us see. Should an honourable gentleman, in the position of the Solicitor General—with all thel responsibility of his position, with the responsibility he has in the Cabinet, being one of the advisers of His Excellency the Governor General, being one of the main springs of the Cabinet who have in their hands the administration of the public weal—should he so express himself? I ask you whether that is an argument to offer to men who, having opinions similar to those held by the minister now on the Treasury benches, consider with awe and apprehension the Bill we are now dealing with. At present, public opinion is overexcited and rightly so; public opinion demands why this Bill in the last days of a Parliament almost dying—which is now in session because one year's extension has been granted it—why bring up such a Bill in the last days of the session? But what is worse than all that, in my opinion, is the fact of the Government, through the Minister of Finance, taking upon themselves the task of imposing this measure upon the House by resorting to the very means by which they can gag the Opposition.

Every one throughout the country, is saying that our press is no longer independent. Everybody says so. When men of high standing have reached the conclusion and say, not in low tones, but very loudly that public opinion has no longer any information from the press of this country, and that the Government, who have in their hands the destinies of Canada, are trying, during the last days of a session, which has lasted some eight months, to pass this Bill under the closure system, do you believe, Mr. Chairman, can the Government believe for one moment, that public opinion will be quieted? It is possible that the transaction may be disputable; it is possible that, from the Government's point of view, the transaction be necessary; it is possible that, with the insight particular to the ministers and especially to the Minister of Finance, it is possible, I say—and I am only a party man—but, after all, I cannot understand why some men assume, without any reason, such a responsibility as that attached to the passing of this measure, without having imposed upon them the imperious necessity of assuming such a responsibility. But, why then, if necessity demands that the Government pass this measure, should the Government be forced to do more than their duty? By imposing the closure, is not the Government doing more than their duty? I answer yes.

The Government come before the House, they explain their Bill, they defend it with General—with all the responsibility of his this measure, who is the Minister of Finance, and all the reasons he has set before us may have their bearing. But we who represent the people after all, we contend that we have not had sufficient explanations. Are you going to satisfy public opinion by preventing us from speaking? Is that a fair way of reassuring those who stand in awe? Is that the way to restore public confidence to say to those who demand further explanations: you are not satisfied with what we have given you, you demand further explanations, we refuse to give you them; more than that, we shall take advantage of the regulations we have ourselves had adopted, and we shall impose that measure upon you, willy-nilly.

I say to the Government—I have no mission to give a guidance to those who administer the country, and I do not pretend to do so either—but I have a duty to perform, I am a member of this Parliament, I sit in the council of the nation, being in contact with a large part of the population, I lay before the Government facts which militate in favour of an extensive discussion and if the Government, after having heard our arguments, find them worthless, they are at liberty to reject them, but there is not a single man in his senses who would not give up before evidence, be he the most inveterate partisan you could find in this country.

If the Government would openly give the Opposition all the information they ask, and thereby prove their good faith—for, any way, I would not pass any rash judgment—but in the face of the Government's insistence, of its manner of proceeding, of the impediments they are putting in the way of the free discussion of this measure, I say that those who believe that there is a snake in the grass are probably not mistaken.

When we see men of the standing of those who have signed the Montreal manifesto, they may say what they please, the great majority of those who signed that document are men who hold the same political tenets as the hon. Minister of Finance.

Would any one for a single moment pretend that men supporting, as they have ever supported in the past, by their votes, by their work, by their influence, by their money contributions the candidates, the policy and the Bills of the present Government; would any one pretend that when they took the stand they have taken in censuring this Bill, they were inspired with the desire of harming the Government? No one can pretend that. Will any one pretend that the signers of this memorandum wish to promote the Opposition interests? Why not at all. What is then their mover in making them condemn this Bill? Their prime mover is that, being friends of the present Government, and seeing that this Government have entered into a dangerous path, they have the courage to sign a document in order to put them on their guard and prevent them from committing the iniquity they are in the way of perpetrating and, in the face of this calm, cool, rational protest of business men, friends of the Government, who assume to put the Government on their guard against an administrative Act and a legislative measure, the consequences of which have such a vast scope as the Bill we are now discussing, I say that the Government should treat their friends more confidently. It may be possible, Mr. Chairman, that from this side of the House, all that we do, all that we say shall be supposed to bear the stamps of partisanship, but at least those who are not in the Opposition, the friends of the Government, who lay before the administrators of Canada the facts and the reasons which have induced them to sign this manifesto, should deserve some consideration.

But there is more than that; it is under the pressure of public opinion that these gentlemen have seen fit to warn the Government, and when warning the Government, the only answer they get from the country's administrators, is the gag and the closure, imposed upon the members of His Majesty's Opposition in this House. I say that the Government's responsibility is heavier than they seem to realize.

After these considerations, Mr. Chairman, I thank you for the attention you have paid to my words and for the freedom of speech you have granted me, and I ask the Government to discuss and allow the discussion of that measure with the widest possible latitude, in order to reassure not only the members of the Opposition, but to reassure commerce, to reassure finance, to reassure the public.

Some may contend that this Bill is very bad. The Government may contend it is very good. It is perhaps not as good as the Government claim it to be and it may perhaps not be so very bad as the Government's adversaries contend it is; but all I do ask, in my own name and on behalf of the electors I here represent, is that the widest possible latitude be granted for its discussion, in order that, from its discussion in the House, public opinion may have some reasons for seeing or for understanding the Government's action which, for the present, is neither excusable nor comprehensible.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to move:

That all the words after "Fund" on line 4, page 2 of the Bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Provided, however, that until authorized by Parliament the total of such advances shall not exceed the sum of twenty-five million dollars. A statement of any such advances showing in detail the purposes for which they were applied shall be presented to Parliament by the Minister of Finance within twenty days after the opening of the next ensuing session thereof.

That the words "and may apply their own judgment in determining such value", appearing on lines 24 and 25, page 2 of the Bill, be struck out.

That the following words be added to subsection 2 of section 4 of the Bill:

In determining the value of the said six hundred thousand shares the arbitrators should they regard it as expedient to take in to consideration the reproduction cost of the Canadian Northern Railway system shall not include therein the increase in value, due to the war, of labour, materials, equipment or of any property.

That all the words after "Fund" on line 38, page 2 of the Bill, be struck out.

Mr. KYTE: It will be a dark chapter in the history of this Parliament that will record the incidents of to-night. Vastly the most important piece of legislation of a civil character that has come before Parliament in many years is attempted to be disposed of in a manner that must impress the people of this country with the fact that the Government which is in control at the present time are seeking to shut off as much as possible discussion of this important measure. During the present session of Parliament we have witnessed a lobby such as was never before known perhaps in the history of the Dominion. We do know that interests friendly to and in the employ of the company that will be the beneficiary of this legislation have appeared by their agents, and have canvassed and imprecated members of this House in support of this legislation. Not only that, but they have endeavoured to becloud the real purpose which they have in view by advocating at the same time a national government. Conscription, national government, and the relief of the Canadian Northern railway, are the three policies of the Government at the present time. The Canadian Northern railway interests think this is a good occasion to come before Parliament, and under the guise of Empire-savers, under the guise of savers of this Government, advocate the entrance into Parliament of Liberals in order that they might have their interests protected by a union government. Lobbies of this kind are not unknown in the United States, and I believe this is the first time that a really concerted effort on the part of big interests has been put forward in this country for the purpose of influencing Parliament. In the Congress of the United States a few years ago, the Southern Pacific railway sought to influence the legislators of the Republic in a manner similar to the demands being made upon the legislators of Canada at the present time, and the following was written of the Southern Pacific lobby:

The most pitiable and at the same time the most disgusting spectacle that now offends the national capital is the Huntingdon lobby. The list of paid lobbyists and attorneys now number twenty-eight, and their brazen attempt to influence Congress to pass the Pacific Railroad Refunding Bill have become the disgrace of the session.

This great political machine was much more efficient than Tammany's or any other machine that ever existed, because it was non-partisan; it dominated the Democratic organization as easily as the Republican. Political manipulation is reduced coldly to the exact principles of science and business. It made politics a matter of scientific corruption and perfect organization, and by this means it secured astonishing results.

The Minister of Finance in the course of his observations this evening referred to Sir Donald Mann as a supporter of the Liberal party, the inference being that Sir William Mackenzie, the other paramount partner in the combination, was a supporter of the Conservative party. So I suppose it is designed that each of these two gentlemen shall influence the political party of which he is a supporter.

The Government has embarked upon a policy of conscription, in connection with which appeals are being made that all party strife shall be set aside for the moment, and the energies of this country, so far as our resources of men are concerned, shall be employed in the great struggle in which we are engaged at the present time. But it is rather extraordinary that while the Government are imploring the people of all classes to set aside party strife and join together for the purpose of promoting the interests of the Allies, they are not unmindful of the obligations which they owe to certain interests in this country. They hope under the cloak of the conscription policy, under the influence that this great question would naturally have on the minds of the people, to be able to smuggle through legislation of this iniquitous character. It reminds one of a German cruiser disguised as a hospital ship coming within range of a passenger vessel and destroying the helpless women and children who had taken passage on the ship. The Government think that by putting forward a conscription law, while the minds of the people are entirely occupied with the issue, they can pass legislation such as this through Parliament without comment and without opposition. While they might reasonably hope to smuggle legislation of this nature through Parliament under ordinary circumstances, how can they attempt to pass it through Parliament by means of the closure, which has been introduced in this House this evening?

The Drayton-Acworth report, referring to the stock which it is proposed this country shall buy, says:

The property investment of the Canadian Northern Railway system is stated in the balance sheet of June 30, 1916, at $494,112,489.34. The figure admittedly has been written up to include $100,000,000 of capital stock. And this stock, as we have already said, was issued without any cash consideration. We have endeavoured to ascertain the actual cost of the system. From the company's official reports and special statements supplied to us, we have ascertained that the maximum cash investment that can have been made in the property is $383,302,451.33.

So that the proposal before Parliament at the present time is to purchase from the Canadian Northern interests certain stock which the Drayton-Acworth report says is without any cash value. Speaking on the subject of the advance to the Canadian Northern railway in 1914 the Minister of Finance made some reference to the disposition of the stock held by the Canadian Northern railway. He said:

The whole argument against watered stock proceeds upon the basis of the public getting the watered stock and paying for it on the stock market of the world claiming to be entitled to receive dividends on their stock. This $68,000,000 or part of it may get into the hands of the public and be worth close to par.

The $68,000,000 of common stock of the constituent and subsidiary companies goes into the treasury of the Canadian Northern Railway Company to stay there.

That was an assurance which members of this House would have reason to accept at its full value but I was somewhat surprised to hear the Minister of Finance read a statement the other evening to the House as to who are the present owners of the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. Those who are not particularly interested as directors of the company who own the stock are the British Empire Trust Company Limited holding $324,000, John Aird and H. V. F. Jones in trust $1,000,000, and Mackenzie Mann and Company Limited $58,614,000. In regard to the stock held by Mackenzie Mann and Company the minister read the following letter from their secretary:

Mackenzie, Mann & Co., Limited,
Toronto, August, 21, 1917.

Hon. Sir Thomas White,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear sir:—

With respect to the $58,614,000 of stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company standing in the name of Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited,, $51,000,000 is wholly the property of Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited; $2,000,000 is held in trust for certain officers and employees of long standing in the company; $1,600,000 is deposited with the province of British Columbia; and the balance, namely $4,014,000, is held by Mackenzie, Mann & Co., Limited, pending uncompleted financial arrangements for distribution of same amongst Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited, Lazard Bross., London, England, and British Empire Trust Company, London, England.

Yours truly,
R. A. Macdonald,
Pro Secretary.

So you will see that the promise made by the Minister of Finance in 1914 that as regards the common stock of the company the door would be shut tight and it would be kept in the treasury of the Canadian Northern railway has not been realized. Now with respect to the legislation before us, I read from the statement of the Minister of Finance delivered on the same occasion. At page 3943 of the session of 1914 he said:

What security have we? I have seen a good deal of financing in my time, and I know something of law although my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) does not think so, and I want to say this: I have never seen as effectual a means of entering into possession of a property upon which a mortgage is held as has been devised by the Solicitor General in connection with this transaction. And further—he will not mind this coming from me—I take off my hat to the Solicitor General for the way he has performed the legal work in connection with this transaction which is one of the most complicated that has ever come before the House.

He was speaking of the clause in the legislation of 1914 which would enable the Government. upon the company making default in the payment of interest, to take possession of the property and dispossess the Canadian Northern Railway Company without any other or formal proceedings by way of foreclosure or otherwise. It is intended to be argued, as it was argued by the Prime Minister a few days ago, that such action on the part of the Government would be drastic and would be in the nature of confiscation. We all remember the very strenuous fight that was put forward by the Solicitor General and the Minister of Finance in 1914 to enable them to get through the House of Commons the legislation which permitted the Government to advance the $45,000,000 to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. We know there was a divided party among the Government supporters. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) both made very strong speeches against the proposal, and it was only after the Minister of Finance had made an express and specific promise that the common stock of the Canadian Northern railway would remain in the treasury of that corporation and that the Government would enter into possession of the property of the company the moment default was made, that support was found in sufficient numbers among the followers of the Government to pass that legislation through the House. But, Sir, those promises made by the Finance Minister and the Solicitor General have been thrown to the winds, and we are now asked not only to take possession of the property of Mackenzie and Mann under the legislation I referred to, but we are asked to pay for it at a price to be ascertained, notwithstanding the fact that the commissioners who were employed to report upon the proposition stated the common stock had no value whatever. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) also spoke in the debate, and he rejoiced over the fact that the Government would be able to enter into possession of this property without any further litigation and without any payment. As appears on page 3733 of Hansard, 1914, he said:

> There is another feature of this matter which, I think, is well worthy of consideration. What is to happen in case of default? We have hitherto been dealing with the situation in case of success; the Government has very carefully looked ahead in regard to what might happen in case of failure. Ordinarily it is a very slow process to foreclose a railroad and for the bondholders gradually to take possession of the physical assets thereof. The Government in this case, however, has supplied a method of quick procedure whereby the axe drops instantly and whereby there can be no coming back for further assistance. It is definitely stipulated in this undertaking what shall constitute any event of default. It is so clearly defined that there can be no possible misunderstanding. Should the Canadian Northern railway fail to pay interest on the securities which are to be issued in connection with the guarantee which we are now authorizing, or should they fail to carry out any of the conditions in the trust deed as accompanying that guarantee, they would commit an event of default. Should the Canadian Northern on any of the previously guaranteed securities or hereafter guaranteed securities fail to pay the interest, they would commit an event of default. If any part of the system goes into the hands of a receiver; if any branch of the whole tree shows signs of decay that is an event of default, and in any of these events the Government can drop the axe without delay. I have heard this agreement described somewhat as a case where the culprit has confessed judgment and has been let out on suspended sentence. Some elements of the agreement certainly can be compared with such a case. The trial is over. The applicants for aid admit that without our help they cannot complete the road. We have undertaken to give them a last chance and it will never be necessary for them to come here nor will it be necessary for Parliament to listen to another discussion such as is taking place this session. They have been tried; I may almost say they have been found guilty and let out on suspended sentence. If there is an event of default; if they fail to perform the obligations that by this new trust deed are placed upon them, the axe drops and that is all there is to it. There is a summary method, therefore, by which the Government steps in and takes possession of the whole enterprise. The Government can replace the directors by Order in Council; the new board of directors will have all the rights that would be given by a board of directors elected by the shareholders and they can deal with the physical property as they see fit. Then the Government can declare the mortgage foreclosed, and can enter into the benefit of the equities, subject, of course, to the consent of Parliament. If the Government, in such event, enters into control, it may become the owner of the system by assuming the responsibilities and powers as provided by this proposed legislation. The Government could then arrange the whole financial system involved so as to protect all concerned. The Government can operate; the Government can lease, or the Government can create a new railway company to manage the road and enter into ownership if so desired.

The Minister of Finance stated this evening that the fundamental principle contained in the Bill now before the House is the principle of government ownership. He says that they are about to secure the possession of this great railway enterprise, and that the aspirations of certain classes in this country will be realized as regards the government ownership of this railway system. But from the speech I have just read, which was delivered by the hon. member for St. Antoine in 1914, and from the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance in 1914, this legislation is not necessary because under the legislation of 1914 they can take possession of the property and either lease it to another corporation, create a new company, or operate it as a government railway. Why is it that the Government have changed their minds? Why is it that the proceeding which appeared to them so plain and simple in 1914 is not feasible now? We know that certain transactions have taken place in regard to the common stock of the Canadian Northern since 1914, and this notwithstanding the statement made by the Minister of Finance that the door would be closed and that the stock would remain in the treasury of the Canadian Northern. An argument has been made that Mackenzie and Mann have equities in the common stock of the Canadian Northern, that there is some value in it to be ascertained. I read from the Drayton-Acworth report a moment ago the statement of these commissioners that the common stock has no value whatever. If so, what in the world is the Government going to arbitrate for? I have the figures which were compiled from that report and I find the following:

Reproduction cost, new..	$397,441,567
Value after deducting depreciation	357,409,678
Cost of reproduction of equipment	56,590,000
Value after deducting depreciation	45,339,985
Valuation of lines and equipment	402,749,662
Outstanding bonds, debentures, notes and other liabilities over	400,000,000
Physical property held by subsidiary companies..	10,000,000

The amount of outstanding liabilities which I have given, totalling over $400,000,000, does not include liabilities to contractors which are still unpaid by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. As against liabilities of $402,749,662 there are only assets amounting to $390,000,000. Is it any wonder that the commissioners appointed to go into this matter have reported that the common stock has no value? Again, I ask, why is it that the Government have come before Parliament to get legislation through to enable them to arbitrate to give value to common stock which their own commissioners state has no value whatever?

There are communities in this country that are lacking railway accommodation owing, it is said, to scarcity of money on account of the war. The excuse that the Government always gives against an expenditure of money, if it is not accompanied by good party results, is that it is not possible for them to provide money to further develop the railway requirements of this country. For many years the subject of the acquisition of branch railways in the Maritime Provinces has been discussed in Parliament. Resolutions adopting the principle of the Government acquiring branch railways and operating them as parts of the Intercolonial system have been passed by Parliament and accepted by the Government. But there is no expenditure of money. From the greatest to the smallest expenditures are not made except with an eye single to party advantage. We all remember that in the session of 1911 the late Government placed in the Estimates $1,000,000 to provide for the construction of a railway from Halifax to the harbour of Musquodoboit, in the county of Halifax. There was also an appropriation of $1,000,000 placed in the Estimates for a railway from Sunny Brae, in Pictou county, to the town of Guysborough, on the southern shore of the province of Nova Scotia. After the advent of the present Government they struck from the Estimates vote for the railway in Guysborough, which is represented by an opponent of this Government, but the appropriation to provide for the construction of a railway in the constituency of the right hon. the Prime Minister was retained in the Estimates, and that road was constructed. There was also a demand for the construction of a railway in the county of Victoria, represented by my hon. friend on my left (Mr. McKenzie). My hon. friend had succeeded in impressing upon the late Government the advantage in the public interest of constructing that branch line, but when this Government came into power, because the hon. member for North Cape Breton is not a supporter of the Government, nothing was done in the way of extending that railway through that part of the country. With respect to the constituency which I have the honour to represent, there was also a railway question, which had been presented to Parliament for some years, and which had been accepted by the late Government. Steps were being taken to acquire the Cape Breton railway, which was being operated between Point Tupper and St. Peters, and to extend the system to Sydney and Louisburg. Since the advent of this Government nothing further has been done. The Minister of Finance is undertaking tremendous financial obligations with respect to the Canadian Northern Bill. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) referred this evening to the enormous interest and commissions paid by the Minister of Finance to obtain the last loan of $100,000,000 which he got in New York. Taking into account the yearly interest, discount and commission, the rate at which he obtained that loan cannot be less than 8 per cent. That is a new record in regard to the financial affairs of the Government. When we take into account the enormous burden which will be added to the taxpayers of Canada in respect to this transaction, and the fact that there is a very widespread feeling that the Government are not actuated solely in the public interest in dealing with the matter in the way they are, it would have been well for the Finance Minister to have gone a little further and once and for all to have settled the whole problem of railway transportation in Canada. They are by this legislation acquiring at least the control of the Canadian Northern railway system which extends from Quebec practically to Vancouver. Further, in Nova Scotia, there are those railway problems that I have just referred to. The construction of a railway from Sunny Brae to Guysborough, the construction of a railway in Victoria and the acquisition of a railway in Richmond and its extension to Sydney and Louisburg, would involve an amount which would be a mere bagatelle compared with the enormous expenditure which the Government are undertaking with respect to the Canadian Northern proposition. If this Government were actuated by a desire to serve the public interest, and not simply by a desire to serve party interest, they would adopt the statesmanlike plan of dealing once and for all with the railway problems of this country and giving the people from Sydney to Vancouver a railway, if not owned, at least controlled by the Government and affording to communities served by branch railways, especially in the Maritime Provinces, the advantages with respect to freight rates that are enjoyed by those who live along the line of the Intercolonial railway.

But I am very much afraid that the Government are not actuated in the interest of the public, are not so much interested in the cause of Allies when they bring forward a policy of conscription as they are anxious to bring in a policy that will excite the minds of the people of this country and, while the minds of the people are excited on the question of conscription, they hope to put over such deals as the Canadian Northern deal, which they are in a fair way of accomplishing. But the Finance Minister and the Prime Minister are deceiving themselves if they think they can get away with these deals under the shadow and under the concealment of a conscription law. The Government, when they appeal to the people, will be dealt with upon their record, and their record is not one to invite strong support in any section of this country. It will not be forgotten by the people of this country that from 1914 to 1917 the Department of Militia and the whole war machinery of this country have been operated almost solely with a view to party advantage and to placing in the hands of the party friends the largest possible percentage of the public moneys voted for war purposes by this Parliament. The whole conduct of the Government with respect to these fiscal and other matters which are vitally interesting to the people of this country will be dealt with when the time comes. They will deal with the question of the Canadian Northern railway and the efforts of the Government to pay to the Canadian Northern railway good money out of the treasury of this country for stock that is not worth one dollar, according to the report of the commissioners appointed by the Government to inquire into it.

I am afraid that by any appeal I may make to the Finance Minister to go a little further with his railway policy, inasmuch as he has adopted a very reckless policy with respect to the Canadian Northern railway will not be heard. I shall not succeed in influencing him to throw his partisanship aside for the moment and deal fairly and equitably with counties represented by liberal members, as well as giving railway accommodation to friends and supporters of the Government in various constituencies in Canada. But, as I said, there is a ray of hope. The 7th of October will soon come, and disillusion will come then; the people of this country will have an opportunity of dealing with this Government upon its merits not only as regards conscription but as regards every other matter of policy in which they have betrayed the interests of this country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to move that further consideration of clause 4, with amendment, be postponed, and that the title of the Bill be now considered.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it intended that an amendment such as this shall be put through as a part of the section?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have included them both in my motion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You are putting it through by closure; the whole thing is done without consideration of the clauses.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it the intention, when the consideration of the section is resumed, that the amendment and the section shall be considered together or will they be considered separately as is usual, and as is absolutely necessary to give reasonable consideration to the question?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The amendment will be voted on and then the section as amended will be voted on.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it understood that the amendment will be considered by itself, that is, will be discussed separately from the section, or will there be a single discussion on the section and the amendment?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A single discussion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: A discussion on the section and the amendment at the same time.

Mr. OLIVER: At the same time? I submit that is not according to the rule of discussion, nor is it possible to have a reasonable discussion under those circumstances. It is a very remarkable divergence from the ordinary rules of debate. I do not find anything in the rules of debate that warrants that course, and certainly we cannot have a proper consideration and discussion of the amendment and of the section unless we consider them separately and vote on them separately.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister keep the axe suspended for one moment, by consent? Of course I have no right to speak except by consent. I wish to call attention to the fact that the arbitration provision is unusual. There is no provision to meet the condition of what might happen if the pledgees and company should decline to appoint an arbitrator. In the meantime, the Government will have taken the stock and begun to spend money on the road. Then there is no provision in case of the death of an arbitrator.

1 a.m.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Arbitration Act.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to certain words uttered by him on the 7th of August when the resolution which preceded this Bill was introduced in the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member——

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It is on page 4386 of Hansard. The Prime Minister allows me to refer to it and you will be kind enough to listen. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had made a suggestion that a committee should be appointed to consider the resolution. The right hon. gentleman replied:

> I would suggest to my right hon. friend that we might go into committee on the resolution and perhaps pass it, and then, before the second reading takes place, we could consider my right hon. friend's suggestion. It is desirable, of course, that all information that is relevant should be afforded, but whatever discussion could take place upon the resolution could also take place in committee after the second reading of the Bill.

Upon those words of my right hon. friend, the resolution was allowed to pass. Now that we are in committee after the second reading of the Bill, is it fair that we should be prevented from carrying on the discussion that the right hon. gentleman said we would have an opportunity for?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that we not only had all the opportunity referred to but a great deal more. We have been at it for a good many days.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I have had no chance to say a word yet.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend has been deprived of the opportunity by others on his own side of the House who have monopolized the time. He will be given great opportunity to-morrow because none of these gentlemen who have been speaking for an hour and one-half at a time can speak for more than twenty minutes to-morrow.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Two o'clock in the morning comes very quickly.

Motion, Sir Thomas White, carried on the same division last recorded.

On the title of the Bill:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to move that the further consideration of the title be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I give notice that at the next sitting of the Committee of the Whole House on this Bill I will move that the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4, the amendments and the title of the Bill shall be the first business of the committee and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: When will there be that ample opportunity for us to speak on the Bill that the right hon. gentleman spoke of?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: To-day.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 1.10 a.m. (Tuesday).

Tuesday, August 28, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Summary Report of the Geological Survey, Department of Mines, for the calendar year, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

CONSIDERATION OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL RESUMED IN COMMITTEE—RULE 17B APPLIED.

Consideration in committee of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company—Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance)—resumed from Monday, August 27, Mr. Dugald Stewart in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to move:

That further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4, the amendments, and the title of Bill No. 125 shall be the first business of the committee and shall not further be postponed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Motion declared carried: Yeas, 52; Nays, 25.

On section 1—acquisition of shares of Canadian Northern railway authorized:

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers) (translation): Mr. Chairman, when this resolution was brought before this House some time ago with a view to considering the opportunity of taking this railway line, we had the assurance from the prime minister that on the occasion of this measure being submitted to the Committee of the Whole we would be allowed all necessary time to discuss it. Assurance was also given that we would have at hand all necessary information, so that we might deal intelligently, with the Bill now before us. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is not one single man here who, realizing the duties he has to discharge as a member of this House, will venture to say that he has performed these duties and has done so in the light of the small amount of information supplied to this House.

I want to ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether I shall have to address people talking between themselves and paying no attention at all, or address myself to a House whose duty it is to give ear when a member has the floor?

As I say, then, we are called to pronounce ourselves on a measure by which this country is to be saddled with an enormous indebtedness, and we are not only asked to assume the liabilities of a bankrupt company, but also to agree that the people may be made liable to pay this corporation or its promoters a sum of $60,000,000 or $100,000,000 for the privilege of laying a further burden of $600,000,000 upon the taxpayers of this country.

The first reason why I object to our taking this measure into consideration, is that we have not enough information as to what we are purchasing. We are told that we are taking over 9,500 miles of railroad, but we have not had before the House any information as to the present condition of this railroad line. By taking over the main line, we are also getting control of many sections and branch lines; we do not know what these sections are, we do not know what their liabilities may be, neither do we know what portion is guaranteed by the parent company. There is one of these branch lines, Mr. Chairman, which I know better than the other ones; it is that of the Quebec and Lake St. John, and I beg leave to state that it is a perfectly useless acquisition, as this section is in competition with the National Transcontinental. I say in competition, but I should not use such an expression. The Quebec and Lake St. John railway, if we consider the recent construction of the National Transcontinental, becomes perfectly useless, I might even say an actual danger; in fact, this line has been badly built from its very inception and its operation is most expensive. During the winter months, if they try to clear away the snow and the men use the least strength in shovelling the snow away the rails go off with the snow and the embankment is taken away. Such is, Mr. Chairman, the line the Government are taking over, when they buy this Quebec and Lake St. John branch-road.

But, when we discuss those matters, the Minister of Finance answers: Why, gentlemen, why are you asking for information as to the value of these lines or as to the condition of these lines? We are not buying the engines, we are not buying the stations, we are not buying the physical property of that system, we are only buying the stock.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what that stock is worth. We are taking over the Canadian Northern Railway company. What is that Canadian Northern Railway company? Is it the interests of which the Minister of Finance is the representative, or is it the railway line which runs over the continent? Is it the stock that constitutes the main interest of the road, or is it the physical property?

Mr. Chairman, there is something besides this road itself, besides the stock used to keep it running, the real estate comprised in its right of way, its stations and the lands given to the company as a subsidy. It is stated that, in the province of Quebec, a certain quantity of land has been given as a kind of subsidy for the building of branch lines. Pertinently, I say that, if an allusion is thus made to the lands given to the Quebec and Lake St. John railway, there is not an acre, not even a square foot of land, now in the possession of the Canadian Northern railway, which is the property of the Canadian Northern.

All the lands, Mr. Chairman, which have been granted, as a subsidy, for the construction of the Canadian Northern railway, have been sold, have been localized or transferred, either to private companies, or to lumber merchants and other commercial men. Consequently, if the lands which are counted upon the assets of the company, and localized in the province of Quebec, are any part of the lands granted to the Quebec and Lake St. John railway, I say that the representation made before the House is a false one, showing fictitious assets, but which have been bargained with and speculated on for several years past.

After all, Mr. Chairman, we are called upon to have our say upon a mere business question. We are asked to accept, as assets, on behalf of the people of Canada, a property the component details of which we absolutely ignore. Is there a business man —and I appeal to the hon. Minister of Finance himself—is there a business man in this House, who would buy any trade whatever, who would buy any kind of business whatever, without having previously inquired as to the value of such trade or business?

And how, Mr. Chairman, could he know anything about it? The only way would be to get a detailed inventory, a full inventory of all the personal property, including the franchise and whatever constitutes the assets of the company. This inventory, once completed, it would then be necessary to have experts accustomed to estimate such values, who would put upon every article set down in the inventory, the value, not only the value of the article therein mentioned, but also the state or condition of such article.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the information given to the House by the hon. Minister of Finance is not sufficient, and that the Minister of Finance is hiding behind the capital stock to tell us that we are not entitled to know what moveable or immovable estate and what lands do now make up the assets of the Canadian Northern company. I say that he does not do justice to the members of this House and that he does not do justice to the country, because we are not in a position to pronounce ourselves.

There is another way, Mr. Chairman, in which some hon. gentlemen try to justify, partly, the stand taken by the Government, and that is by invoking the report of the Drayton-Acworth commission and therein they take whatever suits the Government and they set aside whatever does not suit the gentlemen to whom they intend to make a present of the value, whatever it may be, of the company's stock once it has been estimated by the commissioners who will be appointed.

It is shown, by the report of a commission appointed by the Government, that the stock has never cost one cent, that there has never been one cent spent in payment of that stock, and that, consequently, they have in no way contributed to the construction of the railway. It is watering of stock and nothing but watered stock.

It has been moreover stated by the Solicitor General, in 1914, that these securities or these stock were worthless, because they had cost nothing and because not a single cent had been paid for their exchange.

The Minister of Finance also told us, in 1914, as he has stated and asserted it last night, before this House, that this stock was the property of the Canadian Northern and would remain its property.

Where is the member who could give me information as to the value, the condition and the running expenses of any of the Canadian Northern branch lines? No one can answer as to that, unless he has found some information in returns; that are withheld from us; no one can certainly answer me from the information now before the House and which is at our disposal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why should this House be called upon to-day to ratify a legislation whereby some thing will be estimated, which has been admitted by experts, who have been chosen to form the Smith, Drayton and Acworth Commission, as not having cost a single cent; I refer to the payment of those shares. Why are we asked to appoint a new tribunal whose functions will consist in giving a value to a thing that has none? Is it in virtue of the principle laid down by the Government namely, that when they ask any commission to make a report, if that report meets their expectations, they will accept it; but on the other hand, if the same commission makes a report which does not suit them, they set it aside, they repudiate the commissioners, and appoint a new commission composed of members whose opinion has been ascertained.

We are asked to-day to ratify this transaction which shall be imposed upon us. The Minister of Finance says to us: "We know that the Canadian Northern company finds it impossible to meet 'ts obligations."

Upon what does he rely to advance such a statement, how does he know? Can a single man be found who will believe that this Government has come to such a conclusion without a single line of correspondence having been exchanged between the Canadian Northern authorities and the Government? Does the hon. Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister expect to find a single sensible man who will believe that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann have merely come here and said to the Government: You have endorsed our debt, we find it impossible to meet our obligations, the taxpayers of Canada must take up the burden and this Bill must be approved by the House.

If such are the facts, I say that the Government and their supporters who approves of this Canadian Northern measure, are guilty of criminal thoughtlessness; because in order to give a decision upon such an important legislation, we must have the fullest and most definite information. Let us go back a little and see in what conditions we are to-day.

In 1914, the Canadian Northern people came down here and asked the Canadian people to lend them 45 million dollars and the Government agreed to advance them this amount against $40,000,000 worth of stock.

In those days, the hon. Minister of Finance was loud in his admiration for the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) who had known how to prepare such a contract that the company found itself delivered up to the country tied hand and foot, and that the Government could take it over at their own conditions, should the company fail to meet its obligations. Should the Canadian Northern be in default, the stock of that company would automatically pass into the Government's possession, which means that the Government would become the owner of the road. To-day the situation is changed; they are going to appoint arbitrators to look into the stock and impart some value to it. Which meant that, automatically the Government became the owner of all the Canadian Northern shares, to define and determine the value of which they are to-day asking the appointment of arbitrators.

Mr. Chairman, some one yesterday quoted in this House, the utterances or a report of the Minister of Finance to that effect, showing that the stock of the Canadian Northern is not in the hands of that company. Now, in 1914, one of the reasons for which a large number of the members of this House felt the loan was justified, was that this stock which was to be the consideration for the exchange made between the Canadian Northern and the Government, or rather which was to be the basis on which the control of the railway would return to the Government, was still the property of or had remained in the Canadian Northern treasury, and to-day we see that nothing is left of it, that it has been distributed or given as a pledge, or supposed to be in pledge, to put it out of the Canadian Northern treasury and to allow a profit to the holders, when a value would have been set, not an actual value, upon the stock's own worth, but a value given through the endorsement of Parliament or through the taking over by Parliament of the Canadian Northern system.

That means either one or the other of two facts; either, at the time, the stock was actually in the Canadian Northern treasury, or it was not. If it was not there, the Minister of Finance has deliberately deceived this House when he told us that this stock had remained in the Canadian Northern treasury. If it was in the treasury, the hon. Minister of Finance has not done his duty, since he has the right and the power to appoint a certain number of directors who would be charged with looking after the Government's interests, I say, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Finance should have given instructions to those directors not to allow, until the reimbursement of the 45 millions advanced had been made, a single share of the Canadian Northern to go out of that company's treasury to be given in pledge, for after all, we were losing the control of the stock, from the moment the company lost its control when distributing it into other hands.

I say that if, when the Minister of Finance stated it to this House, this stock was in the Canadian Northern treasury, as a security, in case the Canadian Northern should not meet its interests, so that it might automatically return to the Government, if it was there and is now gone out of it, the Minister of Finance has failed in his duty and he has grossly failed in his duty. And, Mr. Chairman, he has not the right to-day, when we ascertain that failure, upon his own admission, he has not the right to come before this House and say: Gentlemen, trust in me; he has not the right to come before this House and deny us, the information we are asking. We are right in being on our guard and more cautious, because we can see that, from the very beginning, since 1914, there have been either false representations on the part of the Finance Minister, if the stock was not then in the Treasury, or, if the stock was in the Treasury, there has been criminal negligence on his part to allow this stock to leave it.

Last evening, I was amused when I heard the hon. Minister say: Gentlemen, we put the gag on you, for it is rumoured on the street that you intend causing obstruction to this measure, and, consequently, if you mean to make any obstruction, we will gag you.

Mr. Chairman, had we not the right to do some obstruction? What are indeed the street rumours about this affair? The first one I heard was to the effect that the proposal made to this House was the most iniquitous proposal ever head of in the political annals of any country, or even in Russia. The street rumours were that the intention was to haggle this affair, to impose upon the people a burden of over $600,000,000 in order to favour a few friends, in order to use them much at variance, might I say, with public interest.

Such are the rumours we heard on the street.

Now they come here and say that we are attempting to make obstruction when we are trying to obtain information, when we are trying to be enlightened, to have the people of this country enlightened. I say no, Mr. Chairman, they cannot say that, and the Government have no right to impose this measure upon us without giving us some information. The protests we are making to-day, Mr. Chairman, are not due to the fact that we have any objection to the Government taking over this railroad, but the protests we make are that the Government have not the right to impose upon us such a Bill without previously giving us all the details we ask, without having previously informed the people of Canada as to the financial situation and the physical condition of the property we are taking over.

For my part, Mr. Chairman, I protest as forcibly as I can, and I say that this iniquitous measure should never be introduced or imposed upon the House, without previously submitting all the information that have been asked for and refused, without our knowing how it is that this stock which should have been kept in the treasury is now gone; why these moneys will be paid and to whom; why this stock will be handed over and in consideration for what services.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE (Mr. Rainville): I will call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he has spoken twenty minutes.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU: I thought I had begun only at twenty minutes past three .

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE (Mr. Rainville): I am prepared to assert that I was in my seat at a quarter past three; however, if the hon. member wishes to speak two or three minutes longer, I believe I can grant it.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU : I will take advantage of these two or three minutes to record my protest against the Act which it is intended to impose on us and against the methods laid down. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I wish to strongly protest against the Act which they intend to force through by means of a brutal majority, an Act to be forcibly passed under cover of the British flag. When I was a child, I have always been taught that the British flag was the living emblem of liberty and of fair play; never have I been taught that it could be used to cover, to shroud in its folds the misdeeds of a Government, of an unprincipled and moribund Government.

Mr. ETHIER (Two Mountains) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I cannot allow to be placed upon the statute books of Canada an Act so iniquitous in its conception and so disastrous in its consequences, from an economic and financial point of view, without protesting with all the energy in my power against the iniquity which the present Government is trying to perpetrate. Indeed this is one of the worst misdeeds of the Government since 1911, and especially since the beginning of this session. We need only go back to the 18th of May last to see that from that date, since the hon. prime minister has returned from England, its object has been to take away strip by strip, bit after bit, all the liberties that were guaranteed to us by the Constitution, before the present Government, elected under false pretences, came into power in 1911. We have only to refer to the conscription Act, to glance backwards, to examine the Act relating to the soldiers' vote, and we will find that the Canadian Northern Act, which is now before the House is the crowning piece of the present Government's efforts and conduct since May 18 last. I am opposed to the passing of this Act, and I am not the only one who objects to it. I am in pretty good company.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) in the course of the remarks he made upon this Bill's second reading before the committee, has laid before this House the protest of a group of high financiers in Montreal. I do not intend to again insert in Hansard those high financiers' protest in full; however it seems fit to refer to it and to recall to you, Mr. Chairman, in case your memory might fail you in a near future, the names of these distinguished gentlemen, and I ask myself, when the prime minister and his Government see the names of Messrs. F. W. Molson, James Law, H. R. Drummond, Geo. E. Drummond, Armand Chaput, Ferd. Prudhomme, Zeph. Hébert, A. J. Brown, C. S. Garland, H. A. Ekers, Chas. Chaput, A. Guy Ross, Joseph Ainey, C. Meredith, C. S. Campbell, W. R. Miller, George Caverhill, Wm. McMaster, H. W. Blackwell, Andrew J. Dawes, Robert Hampson, George R. Hooper, George W. Sadler, W. W. Hutchinson, Wm. C. Finley, F. H. Wilson, G. F. Benson, A. Craddock Simpson, James Morgan all of them most devoted friends of theirs, with only a few exceptions.

When, I insist upon it, I see the names of those high financiers who put the Government on their guard against the infamous action they are about to commit to the country's detriment, and on account of our present circumstances, I am asking myself whether the Government should not obey at the last minute a good impulse, withdraw this measure, abide by the Act of 1914 and turn over to a receiver this insolvent company which they want to redeem and get out of trouble to the country's detriment and to its shareholders' benefit. And who are they, these shareholders? They are, besides the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, in trust for His Majesty, $40,000,000 in shares: Sir Wm. Mackenzie, $10,000; Sir Donald Mann, $10,000; D. B. Hanna, $10,000; E. R. Wood, $10,000; R. J. McKenzie, $10,000; Z. A. Lash, $2,000; Hon. F. Nichol, $2,000; R. M. Horne-Payne, $2,000; Hon. L. H. W. Richardson $2,000; W. J. Christie, $2,000; W. K. George, $2,000; British Empire Trust Company $324,000; J. Aird and H. E. F. Jones, in trust, $1,000,000; McKenzie and Mann, $58,614,000. Altogether, it makes a total of one hundred millions.

That is probably the reason why they want to acquire the Canadian Northern and to reimburse on the same occasion its shareholders a sum of $100,000,000. Would not the object also be to save from bankruptcy the Canadian Bank of Commerce, which is said to be responsible for all the Canadian Northern's liabilities since its very inception?

I therefore can say I am in good company when I object to the passing of this Bill, and quote the names of these Montreal financiers. But there is not only the province of Quebec, that province which they have taken so much pleasure to cry down in this House since the opening of this session, there is not only these bad Montrealers and these bad Quebecers who protest against the Government's iniquitous conduct. There is also the Toronto Single Tax Association. Does that Toronto businessmen's association support or condemn Sir Thomas White's Bill?

I am anxious to put on record the resolution which the Single Tax Association adopted on August 23 last:

> Whereas the Canadian Northern railway has been almost entirely constructed and supported by public money, under the form of bonuses, allowances and loans, the Federal Government loans included;
>
> Whereas the Federal Government now propose to take over the road and to assume the liabilities amounting to some $350,000,000, and to pay Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann the amount of shares they still hold;
>
> Whereas the Federal Government have already lent this company a sum of $45,000,000, receiving as collateral securities, bonds representing 45 per cent of the capital stock, although these shares represent no capital investment and will be worthless as long as the railway has not become a financial success, what it is not;
> Be it therefore resolved that, we, the undersigned, do strongly protest against the acquisition of an insolvent railway, at the price of a solvent concern, and against any payment for the company's ordinary stock; and we urge that, if the Government, as creditors for several million dollars, see fit to make any new loans in order to protect their claims against the company, they should safeguard the interests of the people whose trustees they are, by taking over the company's assets without any further payment to the promoters who, as the fact is well known, have already realized enormous profits in the organization and the construction of the road, and have been fully remunerated for all the time or money they may have spent.

Well will the Government turn a deaf ear to those justified, scathing and severe protests from two associations, from two groups of men representing the largest capital of the whole Dominion, of Toronto and Montreal, when these protests are made by friends of the Government? When they put them on their guard, will they put aside the idea that these people truly represent public opinion, or will they merely take advantage of and illuse their majority in order to favour the shareholders interested in this insolvent and bankrupt company and at the same time redeem its stock, probably with the object of providing an electoral fund, in view of the coming general elections result of which the Government is evidently afraid of.

Mr. Chairman, I say that this Act was conceived in iniquity, because it is contrary to pledged troth. One would think that, lately, we were living in Russia or rather that we were living in Berlin. We might believe we are being guided, governed by Boche government.

Did not this Government promise through its prime minister, on February 8, 1916, when he proposed the resolution demanding the extension of the Parliamentary term, was it not understood that no other matters would be dealt with save those arising out of the war and the settlement of which was necessary with a view to the successful ending of this war and towards helping on the Allies' cause?

On February 8 1916, I read at page 624 of Hansard:

> Coming back from Great Britain, impressed with that conviction, I sought an opportunity of conferring with my right hon. friend on the other side of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as soon as was possible after an illness from which at that time he was unfortunately suffering. I had a conference with my right hon. friend on the 14th October and, later, on the 2nd November. Certain correspondence took place between us with which, as we agreed, neither he nor I need trouble the House or the country at the present time. Generally speaking, the discussion which took place between my right hon. friend and myself was along these lines; as to the advisability of an extension for one year after peace, or for one year absolutely; the avoidance of any general election during the war; the proposal that by-elections should not be contested in the meantime and that each party should retain the seats it now holds, or had held previously to the vacancy.

Undoubtedly, it must be on account of that promise that the Government hastened to fill, in the Senate, the vacancies created by the demise of some senators.

And he adds:

> The suspension of party warfare during a war which obviously threatens the existence of the Empire; and, lastly, the restriction of legislation to matters arising out of the war, or occasioned thereby, or directly connected therewith, except possibly minor matters or matters of urgent need and unavoidable necessity as to which I would desire to consult with my right hon. friend.

Well, I say that this Act is an outrage to the pledged word, and I ask the Government and all those who support them, whther the passing of this iniquitous law necessarily proceeds from the war, if the purchase of the Canadian Northern is a product of the war and if it is the war which has brought about the insolvency and the bankruptcy of Mackenzie and Mann; I wish to state in pursuance of the agreement made, that the right hon. prime minister should have consulted the right hon. leader of the Opposition. Has he done so? No. However, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann must be assisted, cost what it will, and money is needed for the electoral campaign. Never mind the country's financial conditions; never mind if, to-morrow, after this deal is concluded our debt may be more than two billion dollars; never mind the after-the-war problems, let us forget our present crisis; the question is, before all and above all, to save the situation of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann and of our friends, to the country's detriment.

The province of Quebec, that province which is the nightmare of the English provinces and specially of the province of Ontario, did not allow herself to be caught in Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann's snares; she turned a deaf ear to their proposals. The province of Quebec has not guaranteed any of the Canadian Northern debentures, as stated the other day by the hon. prime minister of the province of Quebec, Mr. Gouin:

> The province of Quebec has not guaranteed the debentures of any railway company in this country (acclamations), whilst in the other province, they were being endorsed for 20, 30 and even 50 million dollars. And now that these railways are built, some of them being in bankruptcy or on the verge of insolvency, the Government, who have no longer the confidence of the country, are going to get us into debt for 700 million dollars of which the province of Quebec will have to pay the largest portion. It is not 25 millions they are saddling us with, it is a sum of over 100 million dollars. I know what I am talking about.

The question is quite settled if we consider in what way the hon. Minister of Finance has floated his last one hundred million loan in Washington. Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that under the administration of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) Canada had access to the European markets and could find the required capital at a rate of interest of 2½ per cent? You may probably tell me that the economic conditions are not the same. Quite true, I grant, but the difference between 2½ per cent and 8 per cent is also very large. The country's credit must be at a very low ebb, if on a hundred million loan we can collect only $96,250,000, and this representing 8 per cent if we add to the interest a commission of 1¾ per cent.

Mr. Chairman, when I say that the Canadian Northern company is insolvent, I speak knowingly. I shall not refer to the company's big lines, but I will point out that this railway crosses, in two places, the county of Two Mountains which I have the honour to represent; it passes at St. Scholastique and it also runs from St. Canut to St. Jérôme for over fourteen years, the Canadian Northern company has not had a single full service on that part of its line. I say not one, for in that district we have only a freight train to which is attached a passenger car and I would be justified in styling it "a cattle car." I have had myself the occasion to come before the Railway Commission to complain of this state of affairs on behalf of the residents of the St. Canut municipality.

On two occasions the Railway Commission ordered the Canadian Northern to build a station at St. Canut and to appoint an agent. They did comply and built some kind of a shed where there are neither stove, bench nor chairs for the public, in any season of the year, and they appointed an agent, a man who kept a hotel close to this shed. Since then, it has been set aside, the Canadian Northern scoffed at the Railway Commission's decision, and that was fourteen years ago; the road has been given up. Four years ago another branch line was built, a section running from St. André, Argenteuil, up to Montreal, passing through the county of Two Mountains, along the Ottawa river, St. Placide, St. Benoit, St Eustache, to allow their connecting, so they said, with the tunnel they bored under Mount Royal. Nevertheless, that section of the road is not yet opened and apparently is abandoned. The Canadian Northern had an interest in bringing that railway line towards Cartierville, St. Laurent and the tunnel. With what money did Mackenzie and Mann buy all the land in what is now called the "model city"? Where did they get the millions in order to speculate upon the Montreal lots around the tunnel they have built? From the Government's money, and to-day they want to resell them after having taken in all the profits. And it is this company, this octopus if I may so call it, which the Government intend to favour by taking over a worthless, dislocated property. Besides, all this has been proven, it is admitted, it is known by the whole people, and the people shall protest, as they know how to protest. The people will protest at the coming elections which, I hope, will soon take place, not only against that iniquitous conscription Act, but also against the measure now before us. And, by the way, I might be allowed to say that I consider the Mackenzie-Mann deal, the White Bill, such as introduced for the purchase of the Canadian Northern, far worse than the conscription Act. From the standpoint of the country's financial interests, this measure is worse than the conscription Act, for, at least, conscription may help, may contribute to aid our allies and our own overseas; but the Canadian Northern purchase will only contribute to assist Mackenzie and Mann and the rotten speculators whom we do not know, but whom we suspect of being at the bottom of this transaction.

Mr. Chairman, I stated at the beginning of my remarks that we were used to see iniquities perpetrated by the present Government; I said it was not the first one and, from what we can see, it will not be the last one either. They so well feel the weakness of the measures submitted that they are forced to use violence, to use the gag, to use the closure in order to overcome the people's representatives and to ignore their own mandate.

I see that to-day Mr. Chairman pays a special attention to the members on his left. He now glances at me, meaning that my time is over. However, last night he had a stiff neck, probably, for he only had his eyes to the other side of the House, never looking this way; but to-day, he is sharp-sighted, we cannot go beyond our twenty minutes. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am through, I bow before the order of the present Government's executioner and I resume my seat.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, this measure is so far-reaching in its consequences that it is a matter for regret that those of us who have not spoken before are by the action of our autocratic Minister of Finance limited to speaking for only twenty minutes. I suppose that quite fifty Liberals have not yet spoken on this Bill, which involves our embarking upon one of the greatest policies Canada has ever entered upon. There has been no unreasonable discussion of the Bill, yet the Minister of Finance takes it upon himself to say that the people's representatives shall be confined to twenty-minute speeches. His only reason must be that he fears open discussion of this measure. If he were anxious to have this measure fully discussed, he would not resolve in his heart that at least fifty of the people's representatives should be refused the opportunity of discussing it, because you cannot discuss a measure like this, involving the far-reaching principle of public ownership, in anything like twenty minutes. I do the Minister of Finance no injustice, but rather pay him a compliment, when I say that he would be more highly thought of in Canada if he had encouraged discussion of this measure instead of endeavouring to apply the gag and forcing it through Parliament, and it comes with especially ill grace from the Minister of Finance, a gentleman for whom many of us have a high regard, for his ability and other qualities. The fact remains, and the minister knows it just as well as we do, that in the public mind he is very closely linked up in personal friendship and financial interest with Sir William Mackenzie. The people know that; they believe that such is the case, and as a friend of the Minister of Finance, I say that it is an unfortunate thing for him that he has chosen to choke off discussion of this measure, which involves the possibility of our paying out huge sums of money to Mackenzie and Mann. I know nothing about the personal affairs of the Minister of Finance, and desire to know nothing about them, I am speaking of public matters, and I say it is a public belief in Canada to-day that the Minister of Finance is where he is because of the Mackenzie and Mann influence and the Z. A. Lash influence. I have been credibly informed that it was on the nomination of Sir William Mackenzie and the late Minister of Militia and Defence that the Finance Minister secured his appointment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is not the slightest foundation in fact for the assertion my hon. friend has just made.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Prime Minister's statement must be accepted, of course. The fact remains, however, that the public mind is convinced that the Minister of Finance is where he is because he is a pet of those interests, and the Minister of Finance would better preserve the name which he has reason in many ways to be proud of, if he were the last person to force through Parliament a measure of which Mackenzie and Mann are going to be the beneficiaries. I make that statement in all friendliness and in all manliness.

I desire to say further, that there is a suspicion throughout Canada that this Government is extremely close to the Mackenzie and Mann people and to the Canadian Northern. That is not a belief of a day's growth, but has been in the public mind for some years. There has been a strong belief in the public mind that in the Minister of Finance the Canadian Northern have a very close friend; I do not say an improper friend. It is also a common belief that in the late Minister of Public Works they have a very close friend; I do not say an improper friend. It is also a common belief that in the late Minister of Militia and Defence, and in the present Minister of Railways and Canals the Canadian Northern have very close friends. In view of the public belief that this is in many ways a Canadian Northern Government, it is unfortunate for the Government that they should force this measure through Parliament without a fair opportunity for discussion being permitted to those who desire to criticise the Bill. I would go further and say that the suspicion in the mind of the people will not, unfortunately for the Government, be at all lessened by the choice that they have made of an arbitrator. It is not for me to discuss Sir William Meredith in any personal way. I am in the habit in a humble way of appearing before judges, and I am not going to take advantage of my position in this House to say anything with regard to a judge that is unfair or in any way ungentlemanly or unmanly. But I will say this: that once a man accepts an appointment like this in connection with a transaction that is generally looked upon in Canada as a shady transaction—and Sir William Meredith knows that—he becomes a fair subject of examination and criticism. In the public interest we must ask ourselves: Is Sir William Meredith an arbitrator of whom we on this side of the House can approve? Speaking for myself, I say without any hesitation that Sir William Meredith is an arbitrator of whom I do not approve absolutely and entirely, for many reasons.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That will be the death of Sir William Meredith.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the minister will allow me, in my humble way, I am going to discharge my duty to the country, notwithstanding his ironical remarks.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Will you permit a question?

Mr. KNOWLES: I have only twenty minutes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I wish to remind my hon. friend that if he goes on in this way his twenty minutes will be up and he will not have approached the question at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend asked me if I would permit a question, and under the belief that he was going to ask one I sat down, but as he evidently has not carried out his intention I will proceed. The reasons why I do not approve of Sir William Meredith are these: We have here a stupendous task for some man—some man who is more or less versed and well informed on the question with which he is going to deal. Sir William Meredith is not versed or well informed on the highly technical matters with which he will be called upon to deal. If Sir William Meredith had been engaged for many years in the study of these questions, as the Minister of Finance or the comptroller of the Railway Department, Mr. Graham Bell, have been it would be a different thing. But Sir William Meredith is no longer young; he has reached an age when it is impossible for him to grasp new things of the magnitude of this railway problem, and do justice to it. We can be sure that the Canadian Northern will have to look after their interests men who are in the prime of life, whose minds are alert and well-versed in these matters. Any of us who have seen contests in the courts knows that it will be impossible for Sir William Meredith to do justice to the people's interests in that tribunal, and I should be failing in the discharge of my duty if I did not say that I believe that a man of the age of Sir William Meredith, who is now not far from four score, will not be equal to the great task before him. I plead even at this date with the Minister of Finance to choose some other man; for he can find some other man who would be more equal, mentally, and by information, training, and learning, to this task. The Minister of Trade and Commerce turns it into a joke, but when it comes to a question of spending $60,000,000 of the people's money, even the smile on the face of the Minister of Finance at this moment will not make me say other than that this is a matter too grave to be dismissed with a smile from the Minister of Finance or an ironical remark from the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

We have Sir Henry Drayton, a man who has studied railway matters closely, and who in his capacity as solicitor for a great corporation in the city of Toronto has no doubt become very well versed in these matters. He is in the very prime of life, and a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite; he would be incomparably superior to Sir William Meredith as an arbitrator. It is a remarkable thing that in all these commissions the Government never think of appointing anybody but friends of their own, and that is another thing I have against Sir William Meredith. It is well known that he is a Tory of the Tories he is the right hand man—the man Friday, so to speak—of the Ontario Government. It is a well known fact that for years they have taken counsel with him in all the great measures they have brought down, and that he helps draft their legislation. That is the belief in the public mind, and instead of doing anything to aggravate the suspicions of the people, the Government should endeavour to inspire them with confidence. That in itself is an unanswerable argument why a man should be appointed who is considered to be entirely dissociated from politics and from all political activity, and people have not that belief about Sir William Meredith. Whether it is true or not I cannot say, but the fact remains that Sir William Meredith is still believed to be very closely associated with the Conservative party. The Government seem to think that they must always appoint friends of their own to these commissions. But that is a source of weakness to the Government. If the Minister of Finance wishes to appoint a judge to this position, why does he not endeavour to restore public confidence by appointing a judge who is not the appointee of the Conservative party? What did the Liberals in Manitoba do in connection with the investigation into the Agricultural College and other buildings? They appointed a man fresh from the Bar. Mr. Justice Galt, the appointee of the late Minister of Public Works. If the Government want a judge they could have appointed Mr. Justice Cassels.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Justice Cassels has had long experience in these matters. Although an appointee of the Liberal party, while at the Bar he was a supporter of the Conservative party. He is in every way far better qualified for this position than Sir William Meredith.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Government would not appoint him after the Quebec and Saguenay case.

Mr. KNOWLES: It makes the public mind more suspicious than ever, and that is the point I am urging for the sake of the Government itself. It ought to allay public suspicion, and restore public confidence by reconsidering the suggestion that Sir William Meredith should be an arbitrator. The matters which have been dealt with in this debate are so long and so deep and so big that I cannot discuss them in the ten minutes I have left. There is, however, one point about which I wish to speak, and that is if there is compensation to be paid, and I have not for a moment said that compensation should not be paid —I have quarrelled only with the system of dealing with compensation—if there is to be compensation paid we should have further knowledge of the particulars. I might say a great deal with regard to the details, but time does not permit. I do contend, however, that we should have more knowledge of the pledgees of this stock. I think it was the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) who stated that we should have nothing to do with the pledgees. I do not entirely agree with that in any sense. We should have more knowledge of these pledgees. The companies of Mackenzie and Mann are so interlocked that it is quite possible that many of the shares of this company were pledged to the bank, together with the shares of some of their subsidiary companies. There is a lumber company known as, I think, the Big River Lumber Company, which is owned by Mackenzie and Mann. Three years ago it had over $1,000,000 credit in the Bank of Commerce. I do not know why the bank would lend a million dollars to that not very well-known lumber company. We should know what that stock is pledged for, and whether it is interlocked with some other stock as collateral, or pledged absolutely and entirely as an isolated pledge identified and ear-marked by itself as collateral or security. When the arbitrators come to ascertain what is the value of this stock, that question will be immediately presented to them. The minister will understand, with regard to the lumber companies, for example,—I forget their names, but there are many of them in British Columbia—that when the arbitrators come to ascertain the value of this $60,000,000 stock, the argument will no doubt be made to them along the line that the stock has an especial value to Mackenzie and Mann, because it gave them control of the railway, and the control of the railway helped the subsidiary lumber companies, and the other companies they owned. I hope the minister catches my point. I do not think he is paying very much attention.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am listening to my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend then is like Cæsar; he can do several things at the same time. I was going to say there is every possibility that Mackenzie and Mann will go before the board of arbitration and say " this stock we are possessed of has an especial and enhanced value to us, because it gives us control of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and the control of that company makes our lumber companies and our saw-mills very, very valuable," and they will want compensation because of the loss caused to them by the taking away of that stock. The minister will agree that it is a well-known principle of arbitration law that the board of arbitration must ascertain the compensation to be paid to the claimant on the basis of the loss to him, but the minister should safeguard it here that it should be absolutely the market value—the earning value—that there should be eliminated from this any special value they might claim because of the fact that the control of the railway would operate for the benefit of the other subsidiary companies or industries of which they were the owners. That should be made clear to the arbitrators, so as to get rid of the evil results of these underlying securities or interests. I have only one word more to say to the minister, and I hope he will listen with an open mind. He is a young man yet, and I wish he would reform his methods with regard to making railways pay. I will tell the minister how to make railways pay.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will listen now.

Mr. KNOWLES: I may be wrong, but I will give it for what it is worth. My idea with regard to a railway is that it has something to sell, that is, transportation. The way to make a railway pay is to get a lot of things for it to transport. Railways are not an end in themselves, they are a means to an end. When you build a railway, you have not reached your goal. Your goal is to carry goods. If a man builds a boot factory, his goal is not only to make boots, but to get the boots sold. The way to make your railway pay is to have your transportation in demand, so that people will buy it. How will you do that in Canada, when you are prohibiting it, and strangling it, as you strangled it in 1911 by discouraging the production of wheat in our western country? The way in which you could make these three railways pay, would be to make an agricultural proposition in Canada for the production of wheat in those great zones of prairie land, and produce wheat in such quantities that the railways would have lots to handle. Yet the Government seem to think it is their duty to adopt and enforce a policy that will prohibit the purchase of transportation, that will prohibit men from raising wheat and grain of all kinds, the carrying on of which would be the source of life to the transportation companies. If the minister will not only listen to this but heed it and put it into practice, he will do a great deal to redeem himself with regard to this proposal. If you could take things as you found them in 1911 and look back at the multiplication table, and see the way in which the wheat production runs you will see that for the ten or fifteen years prior to that under the Laurier policy it had been multiplied by ten. If the minister could have kept that ratio up, instead of choking it off, we would have had plenty during these five or six years to keep those railways as busy as they could be, and make them as rich as they could be. The way to make a success of our transportation problems in Canada is to build the country up so that the railway companies will have so much business that they will be kept busy, and the people of the country will be made rich at the same time. I am tired of this Toronto legislation, and this privileged legislation—and I do not care whether Clifford Sifton is at the back of it or not. It does not need Clifford Sifton to queer it. It is already queered. The people of Canada believe this matter is being run too much for the interests of the privileged classes, and if the minister would develop the Dominion along industrial lines, especially developing the agricultural interests of the country, he would help his railways, and would help the whole of Canada. He would help his friends the manufacturers and the large companies, just as well as he would help the farmers.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): The railway condition we are up against now is no doubt the result of a good many years of great prosperity and development in the West. The fact, however, remains that we are up against a very serious proposition, which has to be dealt with, and to be dealt with in the near future. Under ordinary conditions, and in ordinary times, I should have favoured, and favoured as strongly as I could, that this road should have gone into the hands of a receiver, and be dealt with on that basis, letting the water out of the stock, if there is any water in it, and letting every creditor take his chances in the railway business and in that railway company as the rest of us would have to take in any business transaction into which we went which does not turn out successfully. But we are not under such conditions now, and I do not think such a course would be feasible. We have a tremendous debt facing us at the present time, which is being increased at the rate of almost one million dollars a day. We do not know when it is going to stop. We do not know what the amount of our debt will be when we get through with this war. If by allowing this railroad company to go into the hands of a receiver the result was that we had to pay a higher rate of interest on account of the black eye to Canadian credit and Canadian finance it may be the most expensive way we could possibly deal with the present railway question. On these grounds I am not at the present time in favour of this railway being allowed to go into the hands of a receiver.

There are some features of this Bill that I do not like but at the same time I am free to confess that if any one asks me to propose something better I do not know how to do it. I do not mean that I am in a position to know how to do it as well as many other hon. gentlemen in this House who have given more time and attention to the question and understand these matters a great deal better than I do. But, as far as I can make out, in a general way, it seems to me that the proposition is a fairly reasonable one.

There are two things that I want to bring before the committee that cannot be done in connection with this railway system. One is that this company must not, by any manner of means, be allowed to get into the hands of the Canadian Pacific. There is no doubt that the Canadian Pacific is a well managed business institution and that it is doing good work. I am not here to make any criticism of the Canadian Pacific railway. But those in charge of the Canadian Pacific railway have enough on their hands at the present time. The main point I want to make in this connection is that the Government will have on their hands the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it would be a calamity to Canada, in my judgment, if by any possibility the Canadian Northern, or any single branch line of that system should be eliminated instead of a part of the Government main line from the Atlantic to the Pacific, or that these branches should be put in the position of being feeders to the Canadian Pacific railway main line rather than to the two main lines that the country is going to have on its hands. The people of Canada would not permit the Canadian Northern to become a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway system. There is another thing that the Canadian people will not stand for in my judgment. The Canadian people will not stand for any more millions being poured into the coffers of the Canadian Northern as long as it is in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann.

I am glad to know that in this House there is very little difference on the question of principle. As far as I have been able to discover in this debate, it is generally accepted on both sides of the House that the Government has to take over this road and it is simply a question of terms. There is one point that I want to bring to the attention of the Government and that is that in the interest of the people the Government has to be mighty careful that nothing is allowed to be done which under any circumstances would allow the old Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, either by purchase, lease, or traffic arrangement to come under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I believe that we are going to be forced into the position of taking over all the railways of the country except the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if we have to take that position it is absolutely essential for the West that we shall have the Canadian Northern branch lines to gather freight in the West and that we shall have the Grand Trunk lines to gather freight in the East. If you have that you have something to work upon, you have a chance to put these roads in such a position that they will eventually become paying propositions. If, on the other hand, through any carelessness in dealing with this matter, the old Grand Trunk Railway Company should be allowed to get into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, you would have all the gathering power of the Canadian Pacific Railway at this end and in the West, plus the gathering power of the Grand Trunk in the East, contributing to make one main line pay handsomely, while the other two main lines from the Atlantic to the Pacific would be starved.

Another thing has to be considered—it was pointed out by an hon. member yesterday—and it is that the railway companies are asking for an increase of freight rates. It was stated yesterday that they want an increase of 10 per cent, whereas, my memory is that they have asked for an increase of 15 per cent. If an increase of 15 per cent in the freight rates is necessary to make the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk pay, it is certainly not necessary to grant such an increase to the Canadian Pacific Railway. But, if it is done for one it has to be done for the other. You cannot give an increase of freight rates to the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk without allowing the Canadian Pacific Railway to take advantage of these increased rates. The result would be that we would probably be handing over $18,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Under the circumstances there is no necessity for doing that. Therefore, if this proposition will cost the country something it will not cost it any more than it would if we gave them an increase in freight rates. The biggest objection that has been developed in connection with the debate so far is as to the amount that might possibly be paid to Mackenzie and Mann. Personally, I do not think there is a great deal coming to Mackenzie and Mann. I am also of the opinion that, if there is not much coming to them, under a fair arbitration, there will not be much given to them.

One arbitrator, whose duty it will be to see that not more than a fair value shall be given to Mackenzie and Mann, will be specially appointed by this Government; another will be selected by the railway company, and a third by the first two. These men will surely approach their duties with honest intention and open minds. If it is found that nothing or only a small amount is due to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, it is absurd to talk about $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 being paid out. I have a good deal of faith in the honesty of arbitrators when they come to deal with a question of this kind. I have hope that if nothing is due, nothing will be paid. According to the Drayton-Acworth report, the commissioners are not against arbitration. I quote from page LXII of the report:

> And if in recent years the Canadian Northern shareholders were carried away by a wave of unreasoning optimism, at least it may be said for them that almost the whole population of Canada shared their expectations. We think that, on the whole, the equity of the case would be met if the Canadian Northern shareholders were permitted to retain a moderate portion of the $60,000,000 of shares which they now hold.

On page LXXXVII they say:

> We recommend that the question be considered whether Canadian Northern shareholders shall be permitted to retain a moderate proportion of the $60,000,000 shares which they now hold; that the precise proportion, if any, and the relation of that proportion to their share of any future profits of the Dominion Railway Company be fixed by arbitration.

Messrs. Drayton and Acworth, then, favour arbitration. The only difference that I see between their proposal and that of the Government is this: the commissioners favour arbitration in respect of what proportion of the $60,000,000 of stock Mackenzie and Mann should hold and what they should get in the way of future profits of the road. The Government proposes arbitration in respect of the equity of Mackenzie and Mann in the railway company and how much should be paid for the $60,000,000 of stock. I repeat that I have faith in the honesty of arbitrators appointed in cases of this kind; I feel that they will do justice to the country. If it can be clearly shown that Mackenzie and Mann have equity in the road and should be paid something for it, I do not know that anybody would be very much opposed to their receiving an amount in respect of that equity. Personally, I think it would be money well spent if a few million dollars would get rid of Mackenzie and Mann for good; if it would separate them from Canadian railways and Canadian matters generally. They have been no credit to Canada, except that they have built a big road upon the credit of other people.

The Government is adopting the principle of Government ownership of railways. Once they take over this road, the Government cannot stand still. We shall be taking over the operation of 9,000 miles of railroad in addition to the 1,400 miles of the Intercolonial, to say nothing of the Transcontinental. That means that we have to go further. Without saying anything about the method that the Government is adopting, I believe that the taking over of this road by the Government meets with the approval of the people generally. It is better to take this step than to continue to pour millions of dollars into the Mackenzie and Mann sieve. I have never favoured Government ownership of railways, but I see now that we have to take action; we have to adopt the principle of Government ownership. It is the best way out. The people whom I represent would rather have the road taken over and operated by the Government than allow it to go into receivership or continue to pour millions into it without undertaking Government ownership or control.

Mr. MICHAUD: I object most emphatically to the measure introduced by the

[Mr. Turriff.]

Government in respect to the Canadian Northern Railway. New Brunswick is under no obligation to the Canadian Northern, or to the Government, in connection with this transaction. The people of that province have kept away from this railway corporation, but I am sorry to say that they will have to assume part of the obligation involved in paying a certain amount of money to this company. I have received a resolution passed by the town of Edmundston, in my county, protesting against the purchase of this railroad. I desire to put it on record so that my electors will know that I have taken their request into consideration. The resolution reads:

Whereas the Canadian Northern Railway has been almost entirely built and financed by public money, in the shape of bonuses, grants and loans, including the loans made by the Dominion Government;

And whereas the Dominion Government are now proposing to take over the road, and to assume the liabilities thereof, amounting to some $350,000,000, and to pay Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann for the capital stock still held by them;

And whereas the Dominion Government has already loaned this company $45,000,000, taking as collateral security the assignment of 45 per cent of this stock, although the stock represents no capital investment and will have no value until the railway shall have become a financial success, which it is not.

Resolved that we, the undersigned, most emphatically protest against the purchase of a bankrupt railway at the price of a solvent concern or any payment being made for the common stock of the company; and insist that if the Government, which is now a creditor to the extent of many millions of dollars, finds it necessary to make further advances in order to protect its claims against the company, it shall safeguard the interest of the general public, whose agents, it is, by taking over the assets of the company without further payment to the promoters, who, as is well known, have already made enormous profits out of the promoting and building of the road with public money and have amply recouped themselves for any investment of their own capital and time.

The resolution is certified by Thomas Guerette, town clerk.

It was alleged yesterday by the member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) that members of the Opposition were influenced in some way in their attitude towards this measure. The people of New Brunswick have no influence behind them; they are not interested in this company directly or indirectly, but they will be called upon in the near future, when this measure goes through, to become responsible for a part of the $40,000,000 or the $60,000,000 that will be paid to Mackenzie and Mann. Some provinces are anxious that the Government shall take over this railroad. No doubt those provinces are under obligation to Mackenzie and Mann; capitalists in those provinces have bought the debentures or bonds of the company. But at this moment, when everybody is taxed very highly to meet the expenses of the war, we are called upon to pay Mackenzie and Mann, two railway men in Canada, an enormous sum. In New Brunswick we have lately been called upon to tax our people to the extent of half a million dollars, and the people are called upon to-day to pay still further taxes to finance this proposition. The labour men, who work for small wages, were taxed under the municipal laws to raise this half million dollars. The people of the province of New Brunswick insist that this Bill should not be passed, because we do not want to assume other liabilities. In New Brunswick to-day we are under heavier expenses than any other province of Canada in proportion to our population, and if we are called upon to pay out more money to complete the purchase of this railway I do not know what will become of us. I have heard it alleged that some members in this House are personally interested in this measure, and that others are indirectly interested. If that is the case, I am very sorry to hear it. It reminds me of the fact that in England lately the rich people have met, and I believe have decided to make what they call an economy pudding. There are too many members of this House who have met together and have prepared the economy pudding. I am sorry to hear that, because the people of the country have lost faith in the administration of affairs by this Government.

I am against Government ownership of these railways. I have had experience of it in my own province for the last six years. I have seen railways operated by the Government, namely the Transcontinental in New Brunswick and the Intercolonial railway. It is really a shame to see the way the Transcontinental, especially, has been administered by this Government. I say that no government in my opinion can operate a railway to advantage. When the Transcontinental was built it was a first-class road, but the Government could not operate it with advantage and profit. There is to-day, lying alongside the Transcontinental from Moncton to Lévis, enough freight for export to fill 250 cars a day for a period of three months. The freight is lying alongside the line, and there is no organization to export it. Before the Government took hold of the International Railway, we had a "Daily express and good accommodation"; we knew the time the train would leave one station and arrive at the next, but to-day we have very little satisfaction in the administration of this Government railway. I am glad to say, however, for the benefit of the Minister of Railways, that, within the last month or two, an express has been established on the Interprovincial railway, running three times a week. I say that the public will not endorse the application of closure to such a measure as the one before the House. They do not think we are bound to pass a measure through without giving an opportunity to the members of the Opposition to discuss it thoroughly and intelligently. Many members of this House have protested that 20 minutes is too short a time in which to express their views on such a great measure. In conclusion, I wish to say that Mackenzie and Mann have obtained enough money from this country. The Government should have taken hold of this railway, not by means of the measure before the House, but under the authority of the statute of 1914, which reads as follows:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada.

Under this authority I beg to submit that the Government does not owe one cent to the Canadian Northern. The people of the country cannot afford to pay any more money to this company, and if we have authority to take hold of it, we should do so at once, and stop making payments to them.

Mr. TURGEON: I do not very often occupy the time of the House, except when I think I should express my opinion in the interests of my constituency, and I believe that I could not justify myself before my electors if I did not state my views on this particular question. Coming from a constituency in the Maritime Provinces which is traversed by the Intercolonial, it has been my duty, on more than one occasion, to express my opinion on the operation of railways by companies or by the Government. Many people in the Maritime Provinces are in favour of government ownership. I have always defended the system of government ownership and operation, and more particularly in the Maritime Provinces. It may be that Government ownership does not always mean proper operation, as my hon. friend from from Victoria, N.B., has said, but government ownership is not necessarily bad in itself. Bad government operation may be attributable to the Administration in power for the time being. As I have often expressed my desire to see further government control of railways, I feel that I must express my opinion on this question, so that my attitude may not be misrepresented before my constituents. I have, on many an occasion, claimed that I should like to see government control of railways extended further west, and extended, more particularly, on one transcontinental road from coast to coast. It was with that object in view that I supported the measure of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, when, in 1903, he proposed the construction, under Government control, of the Transcontinental as far as Winnipeg, in the hope that, in a short time, it would be extended practically to the Pacific coast. It has been said, and repeated very often, that the deficits on the Intercolonial have been accumulating for a number of years. We must always take into consideration the fact that, in the operation of a railway in every portion of a large country, we must be prepared to look for a deficit at the beginning of its operation. Those deficits on the Intercolonial were the result of the effort to connect the maritime ports with the producing territory of the West, and it has certainly been to the advantage of the West.

It was predicted by the great Canadian engineer, Sir Sandford Fleming, that, owing to the vast extent of territory which the railway would have to cover, it would not pay for a certain length of time, but the results which would accrue to the Dominion at large would be worth the expenditure by the country, and, if necessary, the assuming of deficits for a number of years. It was so thoroughly understood at the time that the road was a necessity that, when it was known at Confederation that, if its construction were not decided upon, there would be no Confederation. Mr. George Brown said, when the agreement was reached, that the people of Ontario would have built it themselves in order to secure the advantage of Atlantic ports. The first consideration, therefore, in the beginning of a railway is not as to whether or not it will pay; we must take into consideration what the future results will be.

There is no doubt that the Canadian Northern railway is one of the pioneer roads of the West, into many parts of which it has brought civilization and prosperity in its train. It must not be looked upon as a mere sink-hole; it has had a duty to perform. While I have often advocated the extension of Government control or ownership, I have always contended that this should be done with care and prudence, as the development and financial conditions of the country may permit. The Canadian Northern Railway Company have come before this House on many occasions. The Minister of Finance takes pleasure in recalling that it is a legacy which has been given to this Government by a former Administration, and that the difficulties which now confront him are due to what has been done by the preceding Government. One of the chief reasons for the financial difficulties of the Canadian Northern is its extension from Edmonton to the Pacific coast when we had scarcely finished the extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific from that city also through to the Pacific coast. That was the most expensive portion of the road to be constructed, and it practically paralleled the Grand Trunk Pacific. It was represented by the leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that one transcontinental in that portion of the West was sufficient for many years, and had it not been for the grant given by the Minister of Finance at the time the Canadian Northern would not have been in the bad condition in which it is to-day.

It may be claimed that we should at once give the Canadian Northern people everything they want. In 1914 they came, as they stated, for the last time, requesting a guarantee of $45,000,000 in order that they might put themselves in a position to operate their road to the entire satisfaction of the people of Canada and of the financial men behind them. That guarantee was given to them under an agreement, by virtue of which should the Canadian Northern make default in the future, all that the Government had to do was to take over the road. The Canadian Northern put themselves into the hands of the Government and Parliament of Canada in the same way as a mortgagor in any part of the country puts himself into the hands of the mortgagee, when, after having secured from the mortgagee everything that he can possibly get, the amount sometimes exceeding the whole value of his property, he finally comes for another amount and agrees with the mortgagee that, if he cannot pay interest at the end of twelve months, the mortgagee has nothing other to do than to take over the property and administer it as his own. That is the position in which the Solicitor General placed the Canadian Northern Railway Company in 1914, so far as the Parliament and people of Canada were concerned. I need not repeat the clause of the statute, which clause is very clear and which has been alluded to by the commissioners who have reported on the railway situation in this country. The Drayton-Acworth report at page 44 says:

> Conclusion As to Canadian Northern.
> We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern. If, then, the people of Canada have already found, or assumed responsibility for, the bulk of the capital; if they must needs find that further capital is required; and if they must make up for some years to come considerable deficits in net earnings, it seems logically to follow that the people of Canada should assume control of the property.

The royal commissioners appointed to inform the people of Canada of the exact condition of the Canadian Northern railway and other railways of Canada declared that the company having made default, the property is in the hands of the Government of the country, and all that the Government has to do is to take over the road and administer it in the best interests of the country. I cannot, therefore, understand why we should be asked to vote such an amount of money as a board of arbitrators may determine is the value of the Canadian Northern railway stock. That may be a small amount, but the Government themselves have stated that it may reach possibly $60,000,000, thus giving ample scope to the arbitrators in their findings as to what, in their opinion, may be the value of that stock. The royal commission, which was appointed by the present Government and which was composed of gentlemen of the highest experience and reputation, found that that stock is worth nothing. Nevertheless, the Government appoints a board of arbitrators and gives it carte blanche to go as high as $60,000,000, and, therefore, the people of Canada will be bound to pay that amount, if the arbitrators should so determine, and we may take it for granted that if we do not have to pay $60,000,000, we shall have to pay very nearly that amount.

The people of this country are not in a position to make gifts to any company at the present time. I have nothing against Mackenzie and Mann personally. I have never met them, and I do not know them, and I can only judge of them by the knowledge which has been imparted to me by hon. members on the other side of the House, and more particularly by the hon. member for Calgary. If I am to judge of Mackenzie and Mann by what the hon. member for Calgary has told us, I should certainly advise every man in this country not to support the appointment of a commission which might involve us in a grant of another $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann.

I look at this measure from the standpoint of the financial position of the country to-day. We are not in a position to make presents to any one, no matter how great the services they may have rendered to the country. Mackenzie and Mann have no doubt done great things in the operating of railroads, but they have been well repaid for their services. We have to-day the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental under Government control and operation, and there has been a shortage of equipment on these roads for many years. It is easy for the Minister of Railways to assign the war as an excuse, but equipment was badly needed on these roads before the war. When further equipment was purchased a few years ago, it had to be divided between the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental, and neither road is sufficiently equipped to-day. If the Transcontinental had been properly equipped and properly administered since this Government came into power it would have been of great service to the people of this country. But if we are not in a position to properly equip these two roads, how can we expect to take over the Canadian Northern and operate it successfully.

The hon. member for Moosejaw a moment ago said that the economic conditions of the country to-day were chiefly due to the defeat of the reciprocity agreement in 1911. I believe many Canadians are sore in their hearts that that measure was defeated. It has been a blow to the farmers of the West, and to the country generally. Through the defeat of the Liberal Government in 1911 we have not reaped the benefit of the Naval Service Act, which, if it had been put into force, would have given us cruisers and destroyers to help the Empire at this hour. It was a sore day, the 11th day of September 1911.

As I say, our financial position is such that we cannot properly equip the roads we have to-day. At the beginning of this session I asked the Minister of Railways if it was his intention to take over the Caraquet and Gulf Shore Railway, as branch lines for the Intercolonial, and he answered that owing to the war it was very difficult to get the money, and he would have to postpone consideration of that question till some later date. I accepted his statement in good faith. If the reason he gave at that time was good, it is good to-day. He could have taken over this railway for a few hundred thousand dollars, and many other branch lines could also have been acquired at a total cost of less than a million dollars, which would have been of great advantage to the Intercolonial railway. But if financial conditions are such that one million dollars cannot be spared for the taking over of branch lines for the Intercolonial, how can the Government expect the people of this country to support them in taking over the Canadian Northern involving this great expenditure, especially when we have not yet properly equipped the Transcontinental.

According to the Drayton-Acworth report we should have to spend $40,000,000 on the Canadian Northern for equipment, and $30,000,000 for additions and betterments in the next five years. Then there are also the fixed charges, and the amount we shall have to pay for the stock. The Minister of Finance said that the taking over of this road was the beginning of a policy of the nationalization of railways in this country. While I am in favour of the nationalization of railways, I say that Canada is not in a position to take over this road, which will be a drain on the country for many years to come. In the last resort I would rather the Canadian Pacific took over the Canadian Northern Railway than the Government, or that we gave a few million dollars to keep the Canadian Northern going for another six months or a year. This Parliament is a dying Parliament. In forty odd days it will have no life, and in three or four months a new Parliament will have come from the people with a mandate to deal with the railway question. My time is up.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): The question which we have to consider is so large that one approaching it with a time limit of twenty minutes finds himself somewhat in the position of the boy in the old adage who proposed to storm Gibraltar with a pistol. Time seems to be precious to the present Government, and I do not blame them for feeling at this stage of their existence that time is getting to be of the essence of the contract. We are told that there are certain species of spirits and devils that can only be handled and dealt with by prayer and fasting, and I suppose the Government realize that if they are to save their political souls, all worldly affairs should be put on one side as quickly as possible, and prayer and fasting be the order of the day for the few remaining days at their disposal. That is the only excuse which I think I could plead on behalf of hon. gentlemen opposite, for tying the people's representatives in this Parliament down to a time limit of twenty minutes. We have been pressing them hard for the last six months or so, to put the millionaires of this country within some certain limits. We were trying to get them to cut down certain lords and dukes in this country who are paying their way into titles of that character, according to the lore we get from the Imperial Parliament. We were asking that they be put upon a certain limit; but they had the cash, they had the pull, they had the power and the privilege, and they have been permitted to go on; some of them making $5,000,000 of profits out of the poor people of this country within a comparatively short period. While the power of closure was in the hands of the Government, and in the hands of the Minister of Finance, to put a closure on the profiteers of this country, they took mighty good care not to exercise it, because it would interfere with business and profits, and emoluments, and privileges, which they hoped to enjoy under the wing of these characters at a later stage of the game. When it comes down to the representatives of the poor people of this country, men who like myself are here untrammelled and unchained, free to speak for the poor people of this country, the Minister of Finance does not turn a hair in putting the closure on me quickly, confining my whole privilege to twenty minutes or less in dealing with such a great subject as this. The question of time has a peculiar turn in the hands of the Government. When it is a question of five years of Government, why it is but as yesterday in their eyes. It is like a vapour which appears for a little while and then passes away. In their eyes it is as a snowdrop in the river, a moment white and then melts forever. But it is another thing altogether when it comes to deal with time in respect to their friends who are paying the penalty in jail for their rascalities. That is a different thing entirely. Then a day becomes as a thousand years, and the Minister of Justice goes around with tickets-of-leave and a year of Jubilee in his pockets, by which the doors of the jail are opened and those culprits are let loose upon an innocent people. When they find the country may be against the proposal they bring down, and the wrath of the people is about to break forth upon their heads, and when they know that proper and free voice of Parliament in putting the facts before the people is adding to their danger and cutting short the time within which the storm will break upon their heads, they resort to this alternative of cutting our time down to a miserable twenty minutes. Why, Sir, on the question of time, the only act of constructive statesmanship that stands to the credit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for his six years of office is an effort to interfere with time and daylight. So, they are experts on the question of time. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, finding time heavy upon his hands, and finding that the conditions arose under which he and his Government must go and give an account of himself to the people, he tried to strike on a scheme that might add a little to their time, and he started to put back the clock. The clock would yield, of course, but he found that the roosters of this country, who were in the habit of crowing at four o'clock in the morning, refused positively to crow at three. The hon. gentleman who has been accustomed to globe-trotting during the last few years, and knowing the crowing time of the rooster in India, the rooster in England, the rooster in California, the rooster in the New England states, and in New Zealand and in Australia, knew they were crowing at very different times, and he thought it would be well to introduce an Act that would bring about an amalgamation of the crowing of roosters the world over. In this, however, he failed. He found that he had to give it up, for the rooster put down his legs at an angle of forty-five degrees and said: "This far shalt thou go, and no further." The Minister of Trade and Commerce has found after all his efforts that he had to come back to the Minister of Finance and say: "I have failed in commanding the other crowing birds, you are the only bird that crows at will, and you will have to go to it." This was done, and the Minister of Finance crows on every occasion. He crows with his hat on, and he crows with his hat off. The Minister of Finance also crowed over the Secretary of State—and let me congratulate the Secretary of State, now that I have for the first time mentioned his name in that capacity. This is a union government we are having now; a union in the sense of concentrating half a dozen offices in the one man, as they evidently cannot get anybody to step aboard the ship in her present precarious condition. When the Minister of Finance was crowing in praise of the Secretary of State, then and now the Solicitor General, there was no stint in his crowing; and let me give him at least one consolation, that whatever else may be questioned about him he is the boss bully of the crowers of the whole aggregation and federation of the universal combination of the financial roosters. He is the financial crower of the roost. He crows when he has money; he crows when he has no money; he crows when he pays low interest; he crows when he pays high interest; he crows when he is going to get the Canadian Northern on the bargain of 1914, and says that it is absolutely and completely good, and that nothing can be comparable with it in the heavens above, in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. You would think nothing could be more lusty than such crowing, but he comes down in three years, at another time, when there is another bargain made, and the crowing of 1914 is put absolutely in the shade by the crowing in regard to the new bargain. So you do not know when to put any confidence, or trust, or finality, in the crowing of the Minister of Finance. He crows for reciprocity, and he crows against it. He crows for free wheat, and he crows for no free wheat. In all those cases we have at least one consolation to offer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that while he might not be able to control the fantastic notions of time as carried in the breasts of ordinary birds, he has one bird on a string that answers his every pull, and crows for the Government at every hour of the day and at every hour of the night. So much for the question of time.

We have no evidence before us to-day, and we never had any evidence that Mackenzie and Mann wanted this transaction at all. My right hon. friend who leads the Opposition asked that a committee be appointed before whom Mackenzie and Mann or their representatives might appear and be questioned about the transaction, giving us, as one man to another, the condition in which the road stood or in which it stands to-day, so that we might know whether or not it was necessary for the people of this country to burden themselves with the enormous debt they are asked to assume. The Prime Minister said he would take the matter into consideration. This was in the early stages of the Bill. Nothing can be more satisfactory in negotiating a bargain of this kind than to have the parties face to face. Reports are good enough, but reports are prepared for a purpose. Reports are prepared and are put on the table of the House supporting the bargain and putting it in the best light it can possibly be put. There is not a man in this House who is doing business for himself who would be satisfied with information of that kind. For instance, if he were buying a house, or buying land, or buying a railway. he would ask the seller to come before him and lay all his cards on the table face up, and state clearly and definitely what was the nature of the transaction into which he asked the purchaser to enter. That would have been the proper course; that is what the people would have expected. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite along business lines, and I ask them if they are prepared to go back to their people and say: We have been asked to buy a railway which involves you in a debt, an undertaking on account of principal money, of something like $650,000,000 and a yearly expenditure of something like $30,000,000 or $40,000,00 to keep the enterprise going. If they tell their people that story, and if their people are intelligent, as I presume they are, they will ask them: Have you inquired into this matter; what sort of a bargain have you made; are you getting value for the money that you are spending; is the transaction one in the interest of the Canadian people? And these hon. gentlemen will have to say in reply: We know nothing about it except what we have learned from the reports which have been laid on the Table. But nine-tenths of the hon. gentlemen who are voting for this Bill and supporting the Government have never read a line of these reports, or, if they have, they have not read enough to give them any conception of what kind of a bargain this is.

I submit that we have not the knowledge of this business that we should have before entering upon such a huge undertaking. I submit that this Parliament at this stage should not be entering upon this transaction. We were elected in 1911 to serve the people for five years and to look after the affairs of Canada. In 1911 such a question as the public ownership of railways was not before the people. There was not a word about it. I have no mandate to talk here upon any question, or to support legislation, or to impose new responsibilities on the people, with regard to matters that were never discussed when I was elected to this House. Up to the end of our five years' term there had been nothing said about the question of the public ownership of railways. Our terms were up and under ordinary conditions we should have gone back to the people for a new lease of power to ascertain what their will was. The plea upon which an extension of time was given to the Government is well known to the people. It was given for the purpose of looking after war conditions and nothing else except the ordinary routine business of the country. I submit, Sir, that we are here now by virtue of our own vote, by our own authority, and that we have no business to start out upon new and unbeaten paths and strike out upon a policy that never was submitted to the people. When this question came before the Government the business answer to the parties interested would have been: We are here by virtue of our own votes, we are here simply for a year helping along war conditions, and it is not our right to start out upon a new condition of things which was never submitted to, and never approved of, by the country. Instead of that, we are launched upon this new idea, this new experiment.

Hon. members from the province of Ontario have always said that the Intercolonial was a failure, that it was a millstone around the neck of the country, that it was a drain on the federal treasury, and I am sure that I can gather from their speeches that they would all be willing to get rid of that railway proposition. If that has been the experience of hon. members in this House with respect to the Intercolonial—I do not agree with their position at all—why then, without consulting the people, and with the meagre information we have before us, are we launched forth upon a project which means the taking not merely a line of the length of the Intercolonial but of nearly nine times the size and fifty times the obligation upon the treasury of this country which the acquisition of this road implies? That is a reason why we should not be launched upon this new idea and policy until we have had an opportunity of consulting the people about it.

While the government ownership of railways may be all right in itself, I am not at all in favour of it. I believe that the success of any enterprise is more assured in the hands of private individuals than in the hands of the Government. We have the example of the Canadian Pacific Railway itself. It is not a government-owned railway. I cannot talk from experience very much about this railway but a number of speakers in this House have claimed that it is the greatest success among enterprises of its kind to be found anywhere in the world. If that road has been such a great success and such a great agency in the development of this country under private ownership, if it is getting along and paying back everything that it has a right to pay back to the Government, and if it is paying its way splendidly as it goes along under private ownership, what is the matter with another road alongside of it and passing through much the same territory, if kept within proper limits, operated under private conditions and by proper management, making the same success as this great undertaking? The experience in this country is that you do not find enterprising and far-sighted railway men conducting railways under public ownership. Apparently the reason is that personal advancement, as a result of ingenuity and enterprise, is not so rapid or assured on a government-owned railway as it is on a railway which is privately owned. Anybody who has managed a railway will agree with me that if a railway is looking for a first-class live manager it will go to a privately owned road where personality and individuality in the management are encouraged. One of the great drawbacks in connection with the government-owned railway is that men who are hired by the Government simply become a part of the machinery and move along at the slow pace that that machinery demands. Be that as it may, I want to point out that if we were going to take this road over we should have done it under the conditions and arrangements that were made in 1914. Then we had the assurance of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Solicitor General that everything was in readiness to take the road over if default should be made. I want to impress upon these gentlemen who have put their words on record and given us that assurance that the people expect them to carry out their promise. They were acting for the people of this country and they have no right to change the conditions of the agreement of 1914 without consulting the people.

The Secretary of State, who was then in charge of this measure, said that everything that the Canadian Northern owned had been put in the hotchpotch, absolutely under the control of the Government. There it stood; out of that it could not go; if default occurred, we had the whole thing. We hold hon. gentlemen to that bargain; if they make a worse one, they are not keeping faith with the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sorry that my time is up, for I have done nothing more than touch upon this great question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to give the conclusions which I have reached in regard to this important measure. I agree with the last portion of the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) who has just spoken I so voted on the amendment offered upon the second reading of this Bill by the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I thought that the legislation of 1914, particularly section 24, was binding upon me as a representative of a constituency in this Dominion. When the statute of 1914 was placed before the House it was made in very express terms, so express as to take away what might be the ordinary rights of mortgagors before the courts of law and equity of the land. That section provided that in the event of default the Government of Canada might take over the road, foreclosing absolutely all rights of the proprietors of the road, and of other persons if any, notwithstanding any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary. In view of that enactment, I felt it was my duty to vote for the amendment proposed to the motion for the second reading of the Bill. But this House saw fit in its wisdom to defeat that amendment, and I have now to decide, according to the best judgment that I can exercise on the matter, what disposition should in my opinion be made of the Canadian Northern railway, having regard only to the interests of the people.

I believe that the people, had they had an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon the question, would in very large majority support the proposal for government ownership of the Canadian Northern railway at the present time. I know that that is the feeling of the people in that part of Ontario from which I come. The people believe and I believe that the time has come when the Canadian Northern railway should be taken over by the Government, whether in pursuance of a definite policy of government ownership, or merely on account of the financial assistance that we have hitherto given that road. It is true that there are other ways of dealing with the Canadian Northern railway. There is the method of putting the road into the hands of a receiver, who would attempt reorganization of its affairs. I would not hope for any good results from such a proceeding. The first difficulty that the receiver would meet would be the question of additional capital. The infusion of new capital is necessary before reorganization of the road can be attempted, and if the figures submitted to the House are correct —and I believe they are—any new capital taken in would come from one source only —the Government of Canada. I believe that the Government has already a sufficient investment in the securities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. I do not, therefore, favour receivership. Then there is the method of proceeding under the winding-up clauses of the Railway Act. That does not commend itself to my judgment either. True, it is a logical way of proceeding; in ordinary circumstances it would be the proper way of winding up such an enterprise. But the ramifications of the Canadian Northern Railway and the amount of capital involved are such that this method would be too slow, too tedious. Moreover, when the road should be offered for sale under the Exchequer Court judgment, only one corporation in Canada would be in a position to buy it. For these reasons, I do not favour proceeding under the winding-up clauses of the Railway Act. There is no other alternative than that proposed by the Government.

The Government's proposal is not as good as the proposal embodied in the amendment of the member for South Renfrew, but, believing as I do that the Government's proposal means the nationalization of that road, its acquirement and operation by the people, I feel bound to support the Government in this measure—having regard to the fact that the proposal which I myself would have preferred has been voted down by a substantial majority. I have no fear for the result of an arbitration; I believe that questions are, perhaps, more fairly arbitrated than they are judicially decided. I am confident that the arbitrators will arrive at a conclusion fair and adequate as between the parties. If the proprietors of the Canadian Northern Railway still have a real financial interest in this road, I do not believe that any man would seek to deprive them of it. If they have no financial interest in the road—and the Drayton-Acworth report says that they have none—then the arbitrators will so find. I cannot conceive that any injury will be done to the people through submitting to arbitration the question of what interest the proprietors still have in the road. This legislation eventually will vest the road in the people of Canada; it will be part of a Government-owned system. The people whom I represent feel strongly on the question of Government ownership of railways. While I believe that we might well have depended upon our statute of 1894, and the covenant of the proprietors of this road, I am quite satisfied, in view of the fact that that proposal has been rejected by a majority of the House, that the present proposal should become law.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (St. James, Montreal): I feel constrained before the Bill passes to say a few words in explanation of my attitude towards it. The district which I represent should, it seems to me, express its opinion upon this measure through me as its representative. I first desire to take exception to some statements made by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), who on one occasion said when discussing the measure:

> The fundamental issue of the transaction which is now before the House is that the Government of Canada is acquiring a great railway system. It is the beginning of public ownership of Canadian railways—I do not say of all Canadian railways; but it is a great step forward.

I take exception at once to this proposition of the Minister of Finance, because I believe that the nationalization of one railway at a time. and another railway at another time, is wrong, although I would be inclined to the opinion that it would be a good thing, and in the interest of the country at large to nationalize all the railways at the same time. If you begin by the nationalization of one railway or another, it means the competition of public money against private enterprise, so that the money of the people will be spent in operating a railway to compete with another railway which is run by private investment. This idea is condemned, even in a country, like Australia, where everything has been nationalized. They took one great railway man from Montreal, Sir Thomas Tait, to effect the nationalization of the Australian railways, and he has made a great success of the nationalization of the railways in that country. My first objection, therefore, is that I think it is a mistake to attempt to nationalize only one railway. My second objection is to a statement of the Finance Minister when he says:

> The question of purchasing the $60,000,000 stock owned by the majority shareholders is really a secondary and subsidiary question.

A secondary question, a mere bagatelle, a small affair, and the minister does not seem to care. He proceeds to say:

> We must acquire the $60,000,000 par value of the Canadian Northern stock, in order to get control of the system.

I differ from the Minister of Finance. He knows perfectly well that it is not necessary, under the circumstances, to buy $60,000,000 stock of the company in order to get control. He has been connected with many companies where there must have been disagreements among shareholders, and in which somehow or other one party of shareholders got control of the majority of the stock. I think the Finance Minister is wrong in arranging to buy $60,000,000 of stock of the company. Immediately before the words "$60,000,000" in the Bill we find the words "par value" in brackets, par value would mean $100 a share, and this might be taken as a suggestion to the arbitrator that that figure might be fixed at par value. I differ with the hon. minister because I believe that no practical man would make such an arrangement as is set out in this Bill. I would advise the minister, in the circumstances, to expropriate from Mackenzie and Mann, who have in round figures $58,000,000, the amount of such stock which would be sufficient to give the Government control of the railway. The Minister of Finance holds, in trust for His Majesty, $40,000,000 stock in the railway. That represents 400,000 shares. A practical man would say that, as the Government has already 400,000 shares, they would simply acquire sufficient additional stock to give them control of the road. Why should the Bill not read in this way:

> His Majesty will acquire 100,000 shares and one share more.

One hundred thousand shares would mean $10,000,000, and one additional share, $100, would give the Government control. The hon. minister understands that calculation very well, because he knows that one share additional will carry control. The hon. minister proceeds with this Bill and pays no attention to the argument of my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) about the pledgees. Hon. members heard the great opposition that he made to the word "pledgee." What does that mean? Did the hon. member for Calgary know that Mackenzie and Mann held $58,000,000 of the stock, and that the Government required $51,000,000 to get control; that, besides, there was $2,000,000 held in hand for certain officers or employees, that there was $1,600,000 deposited in the province of British Columbia, and $4,014,000 held by Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, pending uncompleted financial arrangements for distribution? What does this $4,014,000 mean? It would not harm Mackenzie and Mann if the Government had said: "We will take this $4,014,000 of stock." It would have left only $7,000,000 to be expropriated. I do not concede there is any value to that stock. But we have never heard that Mackenzie and Mann put any money in that enterprise. The stock came to them in the ordinary way as promoters, I suppose. They first allotted to themselves $10,000 worth of shares each; $10,000 to Mr. D. B. Hanna, and $10,000 to Mr. E. R. Wood. Mr. R. J. Mackenzie has $10,000 worth of stock and Mr. Z. A. Lash, whose name has often been mentioned here, has only $2,000 worth, and several others have also $2,000 each.

You will not, by expropriating 100,001 shares, put these men into bankruptcy. They will hold the balance of their shares just the same, but we may punish Mackenzie and Mann who are both guilty in this affair. We shall take away from them in round figures $10,000,000 worth of stock, and they will not lose one cent by the transaction.

I call attention to these remarkable words of the Minister of Finance in one of his speeches:

> This transaction, although it is a large one, is a comparatively simple transaction.

In the first place he said that it was a large one. Yesterday he said that it was a secondary affair, a mere bagatelle. Yes, a very simple transaction to put on to the shoulders of the taxpayers of this country a burden of millions of dollars when he had this opportunity, as he himself explained in the same speech:

> The Dominion Government is already—and this fact, I am afraid, is lost sight of in this House—the owner of $40,000,000 stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company; that is to say, we are a minority stockholder in that company. There are $60,000,000 par value of shares still outstanding. Instead of continuing assistance to the company, as we have in the past, we say that we will acquire the $60,000,000 of shares outstanding, thus making the Dominion Government the sole shareholder.

The same principle could be invoked by the Minister of Finance to become the owner of the company by securing a majority of the shares. The Government, after having got control of a majority of the shares, could appoint a receiver or some one to administer the affairs of the road, or it might be left in the hands of the Minister of Finance. In that way, we would get rid of paying salaries to a president, vice-presidents, secretaries and so on, who under this legislation may be continued in office, who will yet have something to say in the administration of that railway. In that way we would save the country from the expenditure of a great deal of money, and we would inflict punishment, if there is any possibility of doing so, upon Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, because we would not expropriate out of the $58,000,000 worth of stock any shares but those of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann necessary to secure control. Those men in Montreal who affixed their names to a petition which was sent to this Government, are men who would not attach their signatures to such a document without having first carefully examined the situation. I am not afraid to compare the business men of Montreal with those of Toronto. If my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) were here, I would ask him if he would dare to discredit any one of them. He knows them as well as I do and perhaps a little better than I do because they are more particular friends of his than of mine. I am surprised that the hon. member for St. Antoine has not opened his mouth in regard to this question when he knows that such influential men as these, and papers such as the Montreal Gazette and Montreal Star have been coming out publicly against their own friends in the Government, expressing opinions adverse to the Government in connection with this transaction. In such a case, I would think the hon. member would cast partisanship aside and speak for his constituents.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Wait. I am not through with you hon. gentlemen who call out "time" and "gag." Although you may gag me to-day, there is one thing we are sure of, you will, as a moribund Government, have your turn.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member should address his remarks to the Chairman and not to hon. members.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: When I am addressing the Chairman of the Committee, I am at the same time practically addressing the Government. You, Sir, will call me to time in a few minutes. Remember, Sir, that you will soon have the "gag" yourself. On the 7th of October next the Government will have the gag; they will have to go to the country as they should have done long ago. The audacity of a government to propose such measures on the eve of an election is—well, I leave it to you, Sir, to say. The people will speak at the proper time and will say exactly what they think of such an important transaction being undertaken in the last moments of a moribund Government and a moribund Parliament. I cannot speak to any elector of any constituency in Montreal who does not put this question to me: When is the election coming on? Are this Government going to dare to do anything before they come before the people? Yes, the Government are ready to do anything, because they believe that after themselves there will be the deluge.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska) (translation): Mr. Chairman, my most serious objection against the Bill now before us is similar to the one which I raised against the Conscription Bill passed in the course of this session.

Parliament, as it is now constituted, has certainly no authority to adopt a measure of such an extreme importance. We are now sitting, not in virtue of a mandate from our electors, but by reason of our own act, ratified, it is true, by the Imperial Parliament, but unsanctioned by the popular will. Those who are sitting with me on this side of the House know that, last year, I was far from favourable to the proposal of extending the life of the present Parliament. However, as it appeared to be the desire of the majority of the people in the other provinces of this country that there should be no elections during the war; as such a representation was made to us, we did not want to be alone to oppose what then seemed to be the will of the people or, at least, what was represented to us as being the popular will. As my colleagues,

I voted in favour of that extension, but upon one condition: It was then stated to us and we were promised by the Government, by the Prime Minister himself, that, in this Parliament the life of which was thus prolonged, no contentions measure would be submitted to the House; that we should only take up measures having some connection with the war and of such a nature that they could command the aid and obtain the support of all the members of this House. We have assented to that extension by reason of that promise on the part of the right hon. Prime Minister and in pursuance of a well defined agreement. The present Parliament does certainly not represent the majority of the country. It is not a representative House. There are at least twenty-five vacant seats. Several members are drawing from the Government salaries for military or other functions; twenty seats and over should be, in pursuance of the redistribution Act, passed a few years ago, now occupied by representatives of the people, but they are not, and I think I might well quote these words applied by a French writer to the French chamber of deputies at a certain epoch of its history: "The nation is reflected in this House as in a broken mirror." Under such conditions, is it fair, is it reasonable, is it constitutional, is it even decent to come to the House of Parliament and ask them to adopt a measure whose effect will be to increase our national debt by an amount of $653,246,949.39, according to statistics compiled by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), which were laid before the House yesterday, an increase which will carry this country's total indebtedness to the fabulous total of $2,248,538,000.41.

I contend that this House has neither the mandate nor the authority to pass such a measure.

Now, this action on the part of the Government becomes even more arbitrary when it is accompanied by the rigorous application of the rules of this House which are actually imposed upon us. It is assuredly tyrannical—I believe the word is still within the limits of moderation—to employ the gag in order to have such a measure passed by a Parliament such as we constitute just now.

What did the Prime Minister say on August 7, 1917, when the resolution preceding this Bill was introduced into this House?

The leader of the Opposition asked that a committee be formed in order to consider the very proposal now before us. And the Prime Minister said:

> What I suggest to my right hon. friend is to study and perhaps to adopt the proposed resolution in Committee of the Whole. Then, we could examine his idea before the second reading. It is desirable, of course, that all the necessary information in connection with the matter should be supplied, but the debate which will take place on the proposed resolution may also take place in committee, after the second reading. There is no reason why it should not be done in either case.

Mr. Chairman, it was upon that promise from the Prime Minister that the House assented to the adoption of the resolution in the committee, and, when we did come to that stage in the Parliamentary proceedings, where the Prime Minister said we would have all the required latitude to discuss this Bill, scarcely had three or four members, on this side of the House, criticized the proposal, when the Government imposed the closure on us and prevented any further speech on our part.

When, for the first time in Canadian parliamentary history, this Government had the regulations of this House so revised as to have the right to impose closure and restrain the freedom of speech of which we had always been so proud, in the course of the observations I then made upon such a proposition, in 1913, I spoke as follows:

> The resolution which we are asked to pass will put in the hands of some ministers a dangerous weapon. That weapon will be still more dangerous when such ministers owe their position to lobby wire-pulling, to services of a suspicious character ,to a deep knowledge of intrigue.

Mr. Chairman, I did not believe, or rather, I foresaw even then what might happen after such a tyrannic resolution as the Government forced this House to adopt, and what we are having here to-night is the result of the attitude then taken by the Canadian Parliament. There is an attempt made, Mr. Chairman, to prevent the discussion, on its own merits, of the Government's proposition, by putting up the theory of the nationalization of public utilities and railways. As far as I am concerned, I am not an out and out supporter of State ownership, probably because I have known too much about the Intercolonial administration. I represent a county tributary to the Intercolonial and I have always lived along the Intercolonial, I am conscious of all the drawbacks inherent to that system. Many object to a railway being administered by the Government service. In theory, it may be possible that, under certain conditions, such a system would prove advantageous, but why discuss to-day that phase of the question, when the members on this side of the House have not attacked the principle of State ownership, but have rather assailed this Bill for the manner by which this railway is intended to be taken over.

In 1914, Mr. Chairman, when a loan of $45,000,000 was granted by the Government and Parliament to the Canadian Northern, the Prime Minister and the Government pretended they had protected the country in a most complete way. The Prime Minister, then said that, were Mackenzie and Mann, or the Canadian Northern to be in default, the procedure would be a very summary one; we would only have to take over the railway, everything was ours, and there was no difficulty in the way; we had nothing to pay.

I should like to quote the Prime Minister's words in this connection, but as my time is very limited, owing to the Government's kindness, I do not care to further limit it, by quoting what he said. It can be found at page 3438 of the Hansard of 1914. We were to take over the whole Canadian Northern property without any judicial procedures; everything was to be our own, the moment the promoters were in default.

Wherefore this present change of front? Why refer to arbitration a property which the commissioners appointed by the Government have declared to be utterly worthless?

The Minister of Finance tells us: "The country will run no risk, should the stock be worthless; the arbitrators will say so, and Parliament and the country will lose nothing thereby."

It should not be forgotten, Mr. Chairman, that the very next day following this speech of the Finance Minister, his friend, Sir William Mackenzie, in the course of an interview given to the press of the country, stated that the Canadian Northern stock was worth 100 cents in the dollar.

It is evident that, in this transaction as in that of 1914, we can see the skilful hand of Z. A. Lash, the man who has succeeded in guiding the Canadian Northern and Mackenzie and Mann out of the legal maze they have been going through ever since they started their concern. And the words of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), in 1914, can again to-day be applied to the Bill now before us: "It is the voice of the Government which we hear but it is Zabulon's hand that we feel."

We are told that the country will be protected because of the appointment of a distinguished justice, Sir William Meredith, I have nothing to say against the knowledge, the honour and the integrity of Sir William Meredith, except that it begins to look strange that he should always be appointed by this Government or by the Ontario government, whenever either of these governments has to appoint any commissioner.

As to this appointment, I also wish to point out that the present Government, in this case as in several others, does not treat Parliament as it should be treated; the members, the people's representatives, are most unceremoniously treated by the present Government.

We are informed that Sir William Meredith is appointed arbitrator for the Government, when this Bill is not even up to its second reading. Without knowing whether the members will ratify this Bill, the Government have already appointed their arbitrator.

What the Government is now doing, they also did in connection with the Military Service Bill. That Conscription Act had not yet been passed by the Senate, nor had it been sanctioned by the Governor General when, already, treating the House in a most unceremonious manner, the Government were busy organizing the exemption tribunals and asking the members to meet the Justice Department's emissaries in order to deal with the best means to be adopted for the enforcement of an Act which had not yet gone through all the regular stages. I have just said that all these measures were taken and that the law was not sanctioned by the Governor General, and, on this subject, I may point out to the House that I have just seen in this evening's papers that the compulsory military service Act has received to-day the Governor's sanction, in Toronto. It was, indeed, according to the eternal fitness of things that this iniquitous Bill should be sanctioned in that very city of Toronto.

The Bill now before us can well be compared with the act of the right hon. Prime Minister when, waking up one fine New Year morning, he decided that our forces were to be increased to 500,000 men and that, before such an Act were ratified by the people's representatives. This would not be tolerated in any other constitutional country. There must be a margin between the legislative and the executive power, and that margin is the safeguard of the rights of the people. When a Government assumes the right to govern in such an absolute and arbitrary way, when the people no longer count for anything, as has been the case in this country for two or three years past, the country's fate is certainly in peril and it is fit that the people should wake up and realize where they stand.

Some of my colleagues have referred to the condition in which the province of Quebec finds herself as regards this Bill. It is a sure thing that this Bill does not give justice to our province, because she has always kept aloof from the financial organizations and extravagances of Messrs. MacKenzie and Mann. Manitoba has guaranteed bonds for the sum of $24,059,446; Alberta, for the sum of $35,349,000; Saskatchewan, $18,590,000; Ontario, $7,860,000; British Columbia $47,965,000 and the population of the province of Quebec, whom I represent, together with my colleagues, is called upon to pay also her share of the various amounts which the different provinces of the Dominion have assumed as their own liabilities, while we have always kept aloof from all those undertakings. There is evidently a relationship between this Bill, the Conscription Act and that coalition proposal which is being discussed since several weeks in this country. The magnates who are behind this Canadian Northern proposition, who are interested in it, who are in the coalition, are the very men who cry loudly for the enforcement of conscription? The same may be said of Sir Clifford Sifton, this Knight-errant of finance and politics. We shall then have in Canada what might be called the Canadian Northern scandal, as France had her Panama scandal, and as we already have had the Canadian Pacific scandal. It is the scandal of the Public Treasury dilapidation, and it was our duty to struggle on until the Government imposed the closure thus compelling us to end our speeches.

Still one more remark, Mr. Chairman, for you seem to be most attentively watching the chronometer, and several members opposite have even gone further and have plainly told me my time was over.

I am anxious to mention the fact that the country takes over the Canadian Northern debentures, that is to say that it is being saddled with a debt of $600,000,000, and that however, we leave the physical assets in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann. Here we have men who have built a railway, thanks to the gold of the Federal Government, of the provincial governments and of the Canadian municipalities; who have put their concern on the verge of bankruptcy and who come and tell us: We are no longer able to operate our railway, we are in bankruptcy.

The Government, after supplying part of the funds, and seeing the provinces and municipalities as well, contribute towards the building of the railway, the Government, I say, must purchase the property built up through the spending of these moneys, after Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann have made use of them to build up their scandalous fortune. Nevertheless, we propose leaving Mackenzie and Mann in charge of the undertaking they have led into bankruptcy. They have established a system which has given them a chance to exploit all the country's resources; they have laid their hands upon all that this country could yield and produce; they have bought newspapers when they felt the need of it; they have lent a hand in the formation of Governments; they have selected ministers. Every one knows this to be the truth, it is no idle rumour; every one in here knows it, in the country, their influence has been prodigious, they are multimillionaires and we are going to continue, after making them wealthy, to entrust them with the management of what will have become our own property.

It seems to me most elementary that the Government should have said to Sir William Mackenzie and to Sir Donald Mann; If you have so much confidence in your enterprise, do as Sir Donald Smith, Mr. Stephens and other builders of the C.P.R. have done; invest in your enterprise your own millions, help along the enterprise yourselves and do not come and ask us to save it, when you yourselves who have put it into bankruptcy, after having become millionaires out of it.

Mr. Chairman, I will not impose any longer upon your kindness; I might say, as my hon. friend the member for St. James (Mr. L. A. Lapointe), that, if we are gagged in the Canadian Parliament, there is a thing that can't be stifled, that is public opinion

We are convinced that we represent here the opinion of the country, the opinion of the electorate. We will go back to the people in full confidence and we are sure of their support in the battle we are fighting just now.

Mr. GRAHAM: Before this Bill is finally rammed through committee I want to say two or three words. I expressed my views fairly explicitly, I think, on the second reading of the Bill, but I consider this an opportune time to emphasize very briefly what I have perhaps said before. We have heard a good deal about the nationalization of railways. The Government has harped on that string pretty strongly at times, but I am not sure that, if the acid test were applied, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would prove to be a public ownership man himself. I should not like to crowd him too closely for fear he might fall from grace and express his real views on this question. The nationalization of railways and of all public utilities is a policy that has made rapid advancement, and possibly Ontario is as far advanced in that line as any of the provinces, but I submit that the question of the nationalization of the Canadian Northern Railway plays but a very small part in the considerations which led up to the taking over of this system. The railway situation in Canada is one that demands attention. It has been pointed out by several hon. gentlemen that there are two or three ways in which relief can be afforded or a remedy applied. Speaking for myself, I am not averse to the taking over of this system under certain conditions. If the Canadian Northern were paying its way at the present time, I would urge the postponement of consideration of taking over the system at least till the war was over, and we had some idea what our future responsibilities would be. I am inclined to think, although we have no proof that Mackenzie and Mann themselves have asked for this legislation, that the Government would either have had to give them a grant or make some other disposition of the system.

As outlined in what I had the privilege of stating in this House some days ago, I am rather against the idea of a receivership. I know that a great many of the ablest financial men in Canada take a different view—at least I have been very sharply criticised in correspondence for taking the position I did in regard to a receivership. Still, as the governments, both federal and provincial, have guaranteed many of the securities of the road I cannot get away from the idea that it would not be a good thing for Canada just now to allow a system whose securities we have guaranteed to get the name of having gone into the hands of a receiver.

Now we come to what has been done. I have no hesitation at all in saying that I oppose this measure. and am prepared to oppose it at every stage unless the Government will take some other method of transferring the Canadian Northern system to the people of Canada. It has been argued very strongly by some hon. gentlemen that it would be unfair to take the property of any man without giving him an opportunity at least to state his claim. That in itself sounds fair, but in this case the company has contracted itself out of any claim, and has done so knowingly. It did not make that contract without a price, and the price was the guaranteeing of bonds by the Government to the amount of $45,000,000. This question seems to have got so far into the political arena that hon. members of this House who ordinarily view affairs from a business standpoint decline to consider this question as a business man would. If such an agreement had been made between any two men in this House it would have been carried out without any question of hardship arising; the contract would have been carried out as a matter of course. The argument has been made, and has been dilated upon, that the legislation of 1914 did not contemplate the taking of the equity of redemption without compensation. For the life of me I cannot see how any person can consistently argue that; for every utterance by members of the Government that has been quoted in this House from Hansard points in exactly the opposite direction. Over and over again the fact was impressed upon us in this House that if the legislation of 1914 were allowed to go through, this country, through the Government, could without process of law take possession of the Canadian Northern system should default take place. The Government had that contingency in its mind, because in the Act of 1914 it provided the whole machinery by which the road could be kept running after it had been taken over on default.

If hon. gentlemen will read section 22 they will instantly see that it provides for the operation of the line. So, clearly, there was no question in the minds of the Government as to what would happen if default took place. If the Government's present contention were correct, it would not have provided that machinery, but would have waited until to-day to do so. Let me read what section 22 says:

> Upon the happening of any event of default and at any time or times while the same shall continue, it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council after such notice to the Canadian Northern as the Governor in Council may direct, to declare to be vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern and of any of the constituent or subsidiary companies which may be subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, and to appoint a board or boards of directors in lieu thereof respectively (any former director being eligible for appointment).
> 2. The power of appointment herein conferred upon the Governor in Council shall be a continuous power and shall be exercisable from time to time and so often as any event of default may exist and be continuing.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Government not only provided for the taking over of the road, but provided in detail in the statute all the machinery for taking it over automatically. Nothing can be clearer. It was distinctly understood by the Government and by every member of this Parliament that the Canadian Northern contracted itself out of any equity of redemption in the stock.

But let us look at the marginal note on section 24. The legal officers of this government surely understand what they are doing, and in a marginal note they interpret the section. Let me read the interpretation placed by the Government of Canada, through the officers of the Justice Department, I presume, on section 24. The marginal note is: "Equity of redemption foreclosed on default and vested in His Majesty." As a layman I need not argue any more. I submit the interpretation put upon section 24 by the Government officers themselves is full justification for the statement that in the passage of this Act of 1914 the Government never dreamed of giving any person anything for the equity of redemption in this stock. Let me go a little further. There is in this Act the word "pledgees." It may seem insignificant, but the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) put his finger on the spot the other night. I submit, Sir, that if there were no pledgees of this stock there would be no legislation of this kind this session, but that the statute of 1914 would be carried out as it was to be carried out, and the property of this company would be the property of the people of the Dominion of Canada through the foreclosure provided under section 24 without process of law. The common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway system has been pledged for certain loans, and the enactment we are now discussing is, in my humble judgment, to provide that the security which at the present moment has no value and is held by those pledgees shall be made valuable through this legislation. I submit further—and perhaps I may take issue with some of my friends on this—that the arbitration clause in this Bill is not for the benefit of Mackenzie and Mann, but for the benefit primarily of the pledgees to whom Mackenzie and Mann have pledged this stock. Without this legislation that stock would probably have no value for many years to come. The Drayton-Acworth report provides for Mackenzie and Mann as individuals by suggesting that a certain amount of the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway system may be given to them. This would be common stock to be issued by the company formed under the recommendation of the commission, but it would be common stock of the Canadian Northern. They suggested that to recompense Mackenzie and Mann as individuals for the work they have performed, a certain amount of this stock might be given them, and while this stock was not at present valuable it was their hope and their belief that in the years to come it would be of some value, and it might serve as a recompense to Mackenzie and Mann as individuals. That, however, would not have suited the occasion, and the pledgees would not have an actually valuable security, consequently, Mackenzie and Mann are an excuse, but the pledgees are the real men behind the guns. I am talking very plainly, because I believe what I say to be the truth. If the Government had desired to give Mackenzie and Mann something as the holders of this stock, they should have done it directly, in a moderate way, or made a suggestion to that effect, and allowed them something for the great work they have performed in the building of this road. But that would not have protected the pledgees, and the common stock those pledgees hold now as collateral for a big loan would have been worthless, and it would be the bankers, not Mackenzie and Mann, who would have to lose. I submit again, this legislation is for the protection of the pledgees rather than for the protection of Mackenzie and Mann as individuals. I believe that under the legislation we are now passing the pledgees will be entitled to have a say in the appointment of the arbitrators. Consequently, the men with whom we are dealing for five-sixth of this stock are not Mackenzie and Mann, but are the pledgees of Mackenzie and Mann, and they will have more to say about this arbitration than will the principals in it. I do not know how much this arbitration may award; it may be a large amount, but my hon. friend from Calgary asked the Government the other night if it would not be wise to make a provision in the Bill by which the Government might refuse to accept the award of those arbitrators if it were considered extravagant. If my memory serves me—and I think it does—some member of the Government intimated that this would not be an unwise provision, but so far I do not see anything to show that the Government is going to put it into effect, as I believe it should do. This arbitration may bring in an award of $40,000.000 or $50,000,000. There is nothing in the directions given to the arbitrators to prevent them from coming to such a conclusion. I asked the Minister of Finance about a certain report that had been made by the directors. That report will undoubtedly come before the arbitrators in some way, and if it is of the nature I believe it to be, it might possibly influence the result of the arbitration to a very marked degree. I shall not discuss the personnel of the board. I have been told that Chief Justice Meredith is to be a member of it and that Mr. Lash is to be a member. I do not know whether that is correct or not. I will say, however, that I am entirely against this proposal as it is put forward. I believe the time was opportune and ripe for taking over the Canadian Northern under the contract we made with them and they made with us, which was set forth in the statutes. That is the only way the road should be taken over. As I said before, I am very firmly of opinion that if there had been no one but Mackenzie and Mann in question—if there had been no pledgees —this property would become ours in virtue of section 24, which provides for foreclosure without process of law. My objection is just as strong to the method of taking over the road as it was in the first place, and it will continue to be so until this Bill passes out of the House of Commons. I shall have to sit down very shortly, but before I do so I wish to point out that the Hudson Bay railway now being constructed by the Government will form an integral part of the Canadian Northern Railway system. These two systems will connect at Le Pas Mission by a bridge constructed over the Saskatchewan river, and the Government taking over this system may be in a position to save money in the construction of shops on the Hudson Bay railway; in other words, it may make some difference, if those two systems are connected, if the shops were located to serve both systems. At the present time the Hudson Bay railway is a separate entity, and would probably have those shops and all the machinery and overhead expense by itself, part of which might be saved if it were operated in connection with the Canadian Northern railway. I have no more to say, and I would not be allowed to say it if I had.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words on the proposition now before the committee from the point of view of the ordinary citizen and taxpayer—the man, after all, who is going to pay the shot. There are certain facts and circumstances in connection with this matter which enable one to form a fairly correct conclusion in regard to it. One of these facts is that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, who built this great line of railway, have not put one dollar of their own money into the enterprise. They have built it with money obtained from the people in the form of land grants, guarantees given by the provincial governments and the proceeds of bonds sold in the markets of the world, a large part of these bonds being guaranteed by the Government of Canada. They employed the money raised in these various ways in the building of this road. In the construction of the road Mackenzie and Mann, beingthemselves the contractors and having no competition, made very large fortunes. They are very wealthy men apart altogether from this railway system. They are said to be multi-millionaires, and to have vast sums invested in various enterprises in Canada, the Argentine Republic, Brazil and Mexico. They have money invested in coal mines in Nova Scotia, timber limits in British Columbia, and street railways in various parts of the country. No matter what may happen to the Canadian Northern system, they are wealthy men. No matter what becomes of the common stock, they are rich and the people of Canada who have provided all this money owe these gentlemen nothing. Since this Government came into power the Canadian Northern Railway company has received from the public in one way and another some $76,000,000. I think it was in the session of 1912 that Parliament gave them a grant of $16,000,000, in round figures. Last year they received another gift of $15,000,000, and in the session of 1914 there was a guarantee of bonds to the amount of $45,000,000. That guarantee has been considerably discussed and it is known to every man in this House that at the time that legislation was passed the power was taken by the Government, in the event of default by the owners of the road, to take the road over without any responsibility therefor, or any legal proceedings. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) stated, on his knowledge and on his responsibility as an ex-minister of the Crown and a member of this House, that proceedings would have been taken in the way provided for by the legislation of 1914 to obtain possession of this road if it were not that influential men in this country, who are near to and have close connections with this Government, and who are the pledgees of this common stock, would not stand to benefit largely unless the common stock were given a value.

In June, 1916, the Government appointed a commission to ascertain what this railway system and the common stock were worth. Mackenzie and Mann had issued $100,000,000 of common stock against this railway, $40,000,000 of which the Government holds and $60,000,00 of which is held by Mackenzie and Mann, but is now pledged largely to the Canadian Bank of Commerce. This common stock never cost Mackenzie and Mann or any other person one cent. The commission appointed by this Government to inquire into the value of this road and of this common stock reported that the stock was worth nothing. That was the report of Sir Henry Drayton, the chairman of the Railway Board, and Mr. Acworth, an English gentleman of large railway experience and financial knowledge, the best man that the Government could find for this work. Not only did these gentlemen report that this stock was worth nothing, but they also reported that the known outstanding liabilities of the railway, which the Government are assuming, amount to some $68,000,000 over and above the total value of the railway. That report not being satisfactory to the Government, and probably not being satisfactory to the pledgees of this stock, the Government is proceeding to appoint a commission to give this stock a value. Whatever value is given to it the people will be just that much out of pocket. It is said that the Canadian Bank of Commerce is the holder of $51,000,000 of this stock, and, that being so, the Canadian Bank of Commerce is very materially interested in the value that may be placed upon the stock. It holds it as collateral for advances made to Mackenzie and Mann. Whether the money so raised by Mackenzie and Mann has gone into the construction of this road or not the members of this committee, so far as I know, have no knowledge, and neither the Government nor the Minister of Finance has given that information.

There are large financial concerns in the city of Toronto that are very closely related to each other and closely related to this Government. The Canadian Northern, the National Trust Company and the Canadian Bank of Commerce have interlocking directorates and are all closely associated. The representatives of these interests are the men who will have the appointment of one of the arbitrators. I have said these interests are closely associated with this Government. I have been informed, for instance, that the Canadian Bank of Commerce has gone very far in its efforts to assist the Conservative party and to assist this Government, and has used its influence as a banking institution for this purpose.

I am prepared to believe the information that I have received in this respect. As a matter of fact, I know that the Canadian Bank of Commerce, at least in some instances, has undertaken to say who shall and who shall not be members of this House. They have, in some instances at least, used their influence as a banking institution to hold over citizens of this country engaged in commercial enterprises the threat that if they exercised their political rights as free citizens they would incur the displeasure of that institution and would be seriously injured in their commercial operations. In the session that was held here in August, 1914, just after the outbreak of war, the bankers of Canada obtained very large concessions from the Government on account of the probability of adverse financial conditions coming upon the country. The understanding was—I think it was expressed by the Minister of Finance at that time—that the banks should do their duty in endeavouring to carry on the financial business of the country as it had been conducted during the few preceding years. The Bank of Commerce took advantage of the fact that it was the only bank in certain parts of the country, and of the further fact that shortly after the outbreak of war the Canadian banks came to an arrangement among themselves that they would take on no new accounts and they would endeavour to give to their customers so far as reasonably possible the accommodation that they had previously received. The Bank of Commerce, knowing that they had a monopoly of business in some places and that the business of their customers would not, under the circumstances, be taken over by any other banking institution, made the threat, and exercised the power and the intimidation to which I have referred.

The legislation now proposed is largely to benefit the pledgees of this stock and to give it a value, notwithstanding the fact that a commission appointed by the Government, consisting of experienced men from Canada, Great Britain, and the United States, decided that that stock had no value. Now the Government propose to appoint a commission of arbitrators with a view to giving the stock a value—at the instance, no doubt, of the pledgees, the largest of whom is the Canadian Bank of Commerce, an institution that is using its influence and its enormous financial power in the way that I have indicated. Is there not ample reason for the ordinary member in this House being suspicious of this legislation? We are coming to a condition in this country that will not be far removed from that in which the British people found themselves some centuries ago, when wealthy men and large corporations could nominate and cause to be elected men of their own choice to represent the people in Parliament. If legislation of this kind goes through Parliament; if the financial corporations and interests have it in their power to exercise in this way the enormous advantages which they possess, representative government and the independence of Parliament will not be worth very much in Canada. Under these circumstances it is no wonder that the people are alarmed. Every phase of this legislation is open to suspicion. In order to shut off ordinary discussion of this measure; in order to force this legislation through Parliament, the Government have taken the drastic step of applying the closure. This is a time when the people have great reason to be very careful of what is done in this House and in this Parliament. When, after some months, we know what we have to pay for this stock—which a commission of experts declares to be worth nothing—we shall know better than we can know now the influences that are behind this Government, urging them to force legislation of this kind through Parliament, not for the benefit of the whole people, but for the benefit of certain interests in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I am subject to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has two minutes more.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The taking over of this road by the Government under the legislation of 1914 might be all right, but the passing of this legislation and the taking over of the road under the circumstances that I have pointed out is a very serious matter indeed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have already spoken on one or two occasions, although not at great length, on this question, but I desire to make a few more remarks to the committee. First, as to the weapon used in this discussion, namely, closure, I have only this to say, that in ordinary times, in fact at all times, the closure or gag is nothing but a bludgeon to prevent people from expressing their free and untrammelled opinions, but, under present conditions with a Government represented as it is on the ministerial benches, I am rather pleased to see that they have adopted this procedure which shows their intention to prevent the country from being informed by gentlemen on this side of the House. We know that closure was introduced in England when the Irish Parliamentary Party were obstructing the proceedings of the House of Commons. At that time the Irish party did not complain of the introduction of closure, because, as Mr. Parnell rightly said, "We will make the world listen to our grievances." I stated the other day that the press of this country had been ominously silent, that it looked as if the press had been bought, body and soul, in order to keep the lid on this transaction; and, after the lobby which has been carried on in this Parliament since the beginning of the session, I understand why the Government is anxious to enforce closure, in order to prevent revelations being made. I am glad that the Government has adopted this weapon in order to sandbag its political opponents at the present juncture, thus the country will be made to listen, and to inquire why this extraordinary procedure has been adopted, when there has been no obstruction within the walls of this House. I listened the other day to the remarks of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). He said: I am surprised that we are here, after eight months of a session; we should not be debating in this House, but should be pitching sheaves in the western prairie. He added that he did not understand why all this delay and all this discussion. Let me say, in all sincerity and frankness to my hon. friend, that if there has been delay the responsibility lies with the Government. The measure before the House, the most important piece of legislation which has been introduced in Parliament since the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill was passed, has been placed before us in the dying hours of a dying Parliament, and the Government must bear the responsibility, and not the members of this House who protest strenuously and sincerely against this transaction. I am surprised that a Liberal like my hon. friend from Red Deer—

Mr. GAUVREAU: He is no more a Liberal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —should complain that there is discussion over this transaction. Does he not know that hundreds of millions of dollars are involved in this transaction, and that the Minister of Finance has done us the injustice of not bringing with him, and laying on the table of the House, one bit of correspondence exchanged between the vendors and the purchasers? Who, in the country, will believe that there have not been written documents in the negotiations which took place between the Government and the Canadian Northern Railway company? Do hon. gentlemen believe that the sacred cause of war, of which my hon. friend the member for Red Deer is apt to speak every now and then, is well served by this Government catering to the desires and wants of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann? I say that at all times sentiment is, at best, a sorry substitute for sound finance, and the "win-the-war" cry raised in this connection will not impress people because it is only a sham to cover an act of piracy. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asked the other day: But with whom are you dealing? I thought it was a very naive question—with whom is this Government dealing at the present juncture? They are dealing with a coterie of knights, most of them millionaires, but willing—anxious, indeed—to add to their millions, some of them banded together to deliberately loot and plunder the Canadian treasury. In the days of real chivalry—and it was in the olden days—it was said that the knights were contributing their blood and the common people their money and their prayers. We have reversed the position nowadays, the people are contributing their blood to the cause of war, but the plumed knights are getting the plums and the booty, and some of them are good enough to give us their prayers. The press has been silenced, and the Minister of Finance was rather short in his remarks to this House when he introduced his resolution. He thought, as a matter of course, so deeply has he been dealing in millions and millions since the beginning of the war, that this Parliament was not entitled to know much about this scheme. But more than that, he has even refused an invitation which he received from his home city, Toronto, to discuss publicly at Massey Hall the question now at issue. I have seen in this House men of as high a stature, politically speaking, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Sir Charles Tupper played a part in the history of Canadian confederation. He was largely responsible for the Canadian Pacific contract, and when the terms of that contract were discussed before the House of Commons in the '80's he accepted the challenge of those two great political giants, Sir Richard Cartwright and Edward Blake, and did not think it beneath his dignity to leave Parliament and meet them in Montreal, Toronto and the large centres in Canada, and discuss with his opponents the contract made with the Canadian Pacific railway. And yet the Canadian Pacific had hardly more importance, financially speaking, than the present proposition. More than $600,000,000 is added to the public debt, and yet my hon. friend who is responsible for that measure refuses to discuss in public in his own city the whys and wherefores of this legislation. He received the following letter from Toronto:

August 17, 1917.

Sir Thomas White,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Honourable Sir:—

I have been instructed by Ward 4 Liberal Association, of which I am secretary, to invite you to address a public meeting in Massey Hall on the question of the purchase of the Canadian Northern Railway.

Great alarm has been expressed by the citizens of Toronto as to the proposals of the Government with reference to this purchase, and the interest of the Canadian Bank of Commerce therein is a matter of much speculation.

If you will kindly advise me what day next week would be suitable, we shall arrange for the meeting.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) John Callahan.

What was the answer of the Minister of Finance?

Ottawa, August 20, 1917.

Dear Sir:—

I have yours of the 17th instant in which you kindly invite me to address a public meeting on the question of the acquisition of the Canadian Northern Railway system. It does not appear to me that any discussion is necessary as the question is being fully debated in Parliament. I am not aware that there is any public apprehension such as you mention with reference to the purchase, which means that the entire system will be acquired for the people of Canada and will constitute a most important forward step in the direction of public ownership. For your information, I enclose herewith an extract from Hansard showing the remarks of your leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, upon the subject in 1914, in which he suggested arbitration as a mode of acquiring the common stock of the company. Thanking you for your courtesy.

Yours faithfully,
W. T. White.

He adds to that letter a postscript enclosing the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition in 1914 and seconded by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). But what a flimsy pretext! As it has already been answered during this debate, I will not weary the committee by giving further reasons why it should not have been invoked by a serious gentleman like the Minister of Finance. The minister has refused to face his own city of Toronto because, as he says, it is not in the public interest to discuss that issue. He has ignored the people of Toronto just as he has ignored the financial people of Montreal. The people of Montreal have been taken to task by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). Oh, he says, some Montreal financial men have awakened; a protest has been signed, but it is only Montreal—and, he couples the name of Montreal with the question of conscription in order to becloud the issue. Let me say to my hon friend that not only is Montreal protesting against this piece of legislation, but Toronto is also protesting against it. The great Liberal convention held at Winnipeg has adopted a resolution against this measure; the Single Tax Association of Ontario and the Constitutional Club of Toronto have passed resolutions against it. Let me quote the last paragraph of a resolution adopted by the Constitutional Club of Toronto:

> And whereas, the audacious and resolute efforts now being made by the Government of Canada to commit Parliament to the purchase of Canadian Northern Railway stock resolves itself into an attempt by predatory private interests to loot the treasury of the Dominion, therefore, be it resolved, that the people, in view of the foregoing considerations, demand the impeachment of all members of Government and of public services such as the Imperial Munitions Board, who at present or in the past, have either personally or in the capacity of directors of incorporated companies, been connected with any of the financial institutions involved in the affairs of the Canadian Northern Railway.
> P. F. Cronin, President.
> M. Lacey, Secretary.

The Solicitor General the other day made light of the protest circulated in Montreal by the most influential association in that city. There is in Montreal a lawyer of renown, the son of Sir Alexander Campbell who once was Postmaster General in the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald some time after Confederation. He is the first commercial lawyer of the province of Quebec. He has represented the largest interests before the Privy Council. He has had a long and successful career at the Bar. He has, on many occasions refused from both political parties the highest position on the Bench. I therefore do not hesitate to invoke his opinion as against that of the Solicitor General—not that I minimize the ability of the Solicitor General, but every one in this country knows that Mr. C. S. Campbell, K.C., is at the head of his profession. This is what he says:

> The Canadian Northern Railway has never earned interest on its debts. Great expenditure is needed to put it in efficient shape. Its bonds have always sold at less than face value. Its stock has been declared worthless by two experts named because of special ability to form an opinion.
> This stock it is now proposed to purchase at a price to be fixed by arbitrators, one named by the sellers and one by the friendly buyers. And buyers and sellers have had undisclosed verbal negotiations. No one can doubt the result.
>
> Canada is paying 8 per cent. for money. The two-year 6 per cent. notes netted 96.11.
>
> Money at 8 per cent, cannot be poured with impunity into a system running behind every day.
> The whole proceeds of the new income tax for years to come will not suffice, and this tax we want for war and not to relieve present holders of doubtful securities.

Sir, this letter is signed by one of the friends of the Conservative party, by an honest Tory, who says that this country may be deeply involved; that the income tax, which will weigh so heavily on the taxpayers of this country will be, so to speak, engulfed in order to meet the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway. I ties of the Canadian Northern railway. I tive party to heed that statement made by one of their friends.

As a representative of the province of Quebec, I have one word to say, not from a sectional point of view, but from a business point of view, about the condition which this transaction is going to create as regards the credit of my province. I am proud to say—and I know the Minister of Finance will not deny my statement—that the credit of Quebec is excellent; that the finances of that province have been well administered. As he can see from this morning's Montreal Gazette, of all the provinces of the Dominion, Quebec has a substantial surplus to show this year. He knows that the bonds of the province of Quebec are quoted at par in the markets of the world, and that is higher than the price at which the bonds of the Dominion of Canada are quoted. I am proud to say that on behalf of my province which has of late been so much vilified by so many people. Quebec, I am prouder still to say, has always refused to be encircled by the tentacles of the Canadian Northern railway. Quebec has always refused to guarantee the bonds of the Canadian Northern railway, and she has never given subsidies to its doubtful enterprises, and now Quebec must be punished, forsooth, because she has refused to impair her credit by dealings in questionable policies.

Just one word more, and I am through for the present. Sir Lomer Gouin, the distinguished premier of my province, and Mr. Bourassa, in an admirable article in his newspaper, Le Devoir, only a few days ago, have raised their voices against the raid which is being made on the treasury of the province of Quebec as a result of that transaction. Let me read what Sir Lomer Gouin said the other day:

> The province of Quebec has not guaranteed the bonds of a railway company, but other provinces have guaranteed them to the extent of $20,000,000 and $30,000,000 and even $100,000,000. Now that the railways are built, some of which are bankrupt, or on the eve of becoming bankrupt, the Government of this country which has no longer the confidence of the people is about to run us into debt to the extent of $700,000;000, of which about $100,000,000 will fall upon the province of Quebec.

I regret that I have spoken longer than I should, but may I conclude by quoting the pious message which, in my judgment only adds insult to injury in the present circumstances, which Sir Byron Edmund Walker has just issued for the benefit of this country. I receive the Monthly Commercial Letter issued by the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and I notice in the last issue the following words:

> Public attention is still taken up with the problem of giving effect to the general and earnest desire to apply the moral and physical resources of the nation to the prosecution of the war in a fuller and more effective manner. Compulsory service—

Mark the gradation.

> Compulsory service, a new tax upon incomes, and the proposed acquisition of the entire capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway are among the important measures advocated by the Government.

On the next page he preaches economy and thrift. Sir, I am quite willing to tighten my belt for the soldiers at the front, but not for the looters and plunderers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am through. My hon. friend says—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the name of Canada, of my province, and of my electors, I protest against this iniquitous legislation, and let me add in conclusion that when I see Sir Clifford Sifton directing from the Chateau Laurier with Sir Wm. Mackenzie the affairs of the Government, I say the time has come to cry: "Stop thief! Stop thief!"

Mr. GERMAN: I wish I could give my twenty minutes to my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) because he can do greater justice to this question than I feel I can do. I have a few more words to say on this measure before the official guillotine is applied—and I might say that in my opinion the operation of that guillotine will have more far-reaching effects than simply stopping discussion of this Bill in the House to-night; I believe its effect will be as disastrous to the Government as it is to the discussion of this Bill in Parliament. I regret very much that the Government has seen fit at this early stage of the discussion of so important a Bill, to apply the closure rules. I think that before that was done the Minister of Finance should have explained to the House what he meant when he said: I believe I can give the committee good reasons why the legislation of 1914 should not be put into effect. It will be remembered that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and the Solicitor General prided themselves all through 1914 on the legislation of that year providing security for the $45,000,000 guarantee of bonds. They prided themselves on the easy, expeditious, and effective manner in which in case of default, the Government could take over these properties under section 24 of the Act. In regard to the security and the manner in which it could be realized, they pledged themselves in their speeches when the Act of 1914 was under consideration, that if default was made proceedings would be taken under section 24 to realize on the assets of the Canadian Northern railway. I challenge the Minister of Finance to-night before the debate closes to explain to the people of Canada and to this Parliament why proceedings are not being taken under that section, and what he meant when he said: I believe I can give the committee good reasons why the legislation of 1914 should not be put into effect. The Minister of Finance has made several speeches on this Bill, and has often reiterated that statement, but that is as far as he gets, and unless he explains what he means by the words I have just quoted we must come to the conclusion that there are no reasons why section 24 should not be put into force, and that there are ulterior reasons for taking over the road in the manner provided for by this legislation.

There is another question in connection with this Bill which I have not heard discussed in this committee or in the House, and it is this, and it seems to me that it requires explanation. Section 1 of this Bill provides that:

> His Majesty may acquire the six hundred thousand shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company (par value sixty million dollars), not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners or pledgees.

I ask the Minister of Finance to explain what that agreement is to be. What is the agreement for, and what is it to contain? If the Government takes over the shares of this company the Government will own the company in toto. The company has nothing in regard to which they can make an agreement. I would like the Minister of Finance to tell us, if he will, what that agreement is about. He must enlighten this House. We are giving the Government what might be called a blank cheque. We are giving them authority to make an agreement with the Canadian Northern Railway company, and with the pledgees of the stock of that company, and there is not a man in the whole Dominion of Canada—outside of the Government, and possibly Mackenzie and Mann, and the pledgees—who at this moment knows, or apparently will know, what that agreement is to be about. I say, Sir, that the Government has no right at this time to force through the House an Act of Parliament which gives the Governor in Council the right to make an agreement with the railway, unless Parliament knows what the terms of that agreement are. What is the agreement to be for? Is it in connection with the stock? Why is the agreement with the owners? The Government is to take the stock, the owners will have nothing to do with it. Is it to be with the pledgees? The right of the pledgees can be no higher than the rights of Mackenzie and Mann. If this stock is pledged, as I believe it is, to the Canadian Bank of Commerce, it has been pledged since the Act of 1914. If it was pledged since that Act was passed the pledgees took it with full knowledge of what that Act contained, and the rights of the Government to take that stock in the event of default. In law the rights of the pledgees are no higher, and cannot be any higher, than the rights of the owners. If the Government could take the stock from the owners without compensation, as the Act provides, they could take it from the pledgees without compensation in exactly the same manner. The Minister of Finance does not appear to be particularly interested in what is taking place, knowing that he has an official axe which will chop off discussion at two o'clock, and that this Bill will then go out of committee. But I may tell the minister that he will have an audience to reckon with after this Parliament is dead and gone, and to this audience he will have to pay attention, and he will have to give an accounting, and make an explanation. I may also tell him that before this Bill becomes law we must have an explanation as to what that agreement is to contain. They say that upon the making of the agreement at least five-sixths of the stock is to be handed over. Can it be an agreement for the operation of the railroad. Surely there is no necessity for an agreement of that nature before the handing over of the stock. The Government takes the stock, and if the Canadian Northern Railway company as at present constituted see fit to retain their directorship and go on and manage the road, they will do so. That agreement can be made between the Government and the Canadian Northern railway after the stock is taken over, and it would not be necessary to put in an Act of Parliament such as this is, any conditions regarding an agreement for the operation of the road, because this Act contains nothing in regard to the operation of the road. We must have an explanation as to what that agreement is to be. We are absolutely in the dark on that point. With that provision in the Bill, the Government can make an agreement with Mackenzie and Mann and with the Canadian Northern that the stock they hold is to be taken at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but that stock will be held by the Government and returned to Mackenzie and Mann if in the future Mackenzie and Mann can make financial arrangements to relieve the Government from responsibility. The Minister of Finance shakes his head, but I say, Mr. Chairman, that is so as a matter of law. This Parliament is giving the Governor in Council authority to make an agreement in connection with this property, with the owners and pledgees. It is a blanket agreement.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: For what? For the purchase of the shares.

Mr. GERMAN: That is what we do not know.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It says so.

Mr. GERMAN: Not at all. It does not say so. It says that His Majesty may acquire those shares on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths of the stock. What is the agreement to contain? Not the purchase of the shares, the Minister of Finance surely cannot seriously suggest such a thing as that. It is not an agreement to purchase the shares, so far as this Bill is concerned. It does not say anything about purchasing the shares. In any event why is an agreement necessary to purchase the shares? It does not require an agreement with Mackenzie and Mann to purchase the shares, nor yet does it require an agreement with the pledgees to purchase the shares, because the pledgees have no higher or greater rights than Mackenzie and Mann. If the Canadian Bank of Commerce holds, as it is stated they do, $51,000,000 of that stock in pledge, they took shares with full knowledge of what the Act of 1914 contained, and with full knowledge that the Government had the right, on default to take over the whole property without paying Mackenzie and Mann one penny for it. That being so, why is an agreement necessary for the purchase of the shares? I submit it is no such thing, and the Minister of Finance is deliberately evading the question when he makes that contention. He knows there is no necessity for an agreement for the taking over of those shares. We must have some explanation as to that, either to-night or later on in this session; because I may state to the Minister of Finance that though he can closure this Bill through to-night and force it through the committee without giving an explanation which the committee requires and is entitled to have, and without giving an explanation which the country requires and is entitled to have, we shall have another chance before the Bill becomes law, which chance I apprehend will be taken advantage of, and the Government will have to explain to the House what the minister means when he says that he can give good reason why the Act of 1914 should not be put into operation in taking over this property. Furthermore, we are entitled to have a draft agreement showing what is to be done, the same as we had in 1914 when the Bill providing for the guaranteeing of the $45,000,000 was before us. Why should we not have this agreement now, to know what arrangement the Government intends to make with Mackenzie and Mann and the pledgees of this stock? We are entitled to have it, and we must have it if at all possible before this Bill becomes law.

The Finance Minister stated that the arbitrators could decide that nothing should be paid for this stock. I differ from him because he says in the Bill that the stock is to be acquired for a price to be determined by arbitration. There is to be a price even if there is no value. The royal commissioners stated that there was no value. It is nonsense, in the face of their report, for any one to argue that there is a value. But, notwithstanding that the commission say there is no value, the Governments say that a price is to be paid. They recognize immediately a value because there can be no price paid for a thing unless the thing has a value or unless there is an assumption of value, because price recognizes value. The Government speaks about a price to be hereafter determined. The arbitrators start out with the tacit assumption on the part of the Government that the stock has value. Then they can fix such price as may be determined. But, outside of, and beyond that, I call upon the Minister of Finance to explain to the committee what he means by the statement that he could give good reasons why the Act of 1914 should not be made effective. I want to know what those reasons are. The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen on the other side have discussed this matter from every angle, but this one. Why do they not put into effective operation the Act of 1914 which they said would be so effective, so speedy and so just to the owners of the railway? Then, I say, we are entitled to know what the agreement is to contain, what it is to be and we should have a draft of that agreement placed before Parliament so that, before it is entered into, Parliament may know exactly what it is authorizing the Government to do. I have, Mr. Chairman, finished my remarks in connection with this matter and I trust the Minister of Finance will do us the justice to explain what he meant by that expression.

Mr. TOBIN: Mr. Chairman, I think it my duty to say a few words on this important question. I was somewhat surprised. when my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) finished his speech a few minutes ago, to hear a noise on the Government benches. I thought hon. gentlemen opposite were chloroformed, but they must have wakened up because we had not heard from them for some time. I am surprised, in view of the legislation passed in 1914, that the Government have not taken advantage of the provision contained in that Act to take over the road. If you look at the statutes of 1914, you will see that it contains the following provision:

22. Upon the happening of any event of default and at any time or times while the same shall continue, it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council after such notice to the Canadian Northern as the Governor in Council may direct, to declare to be vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern and of any of the Constituent or Subsidiary Companies which may be subject to the legislation authority of the Parliament of Canada, and to appoint a board or boards of directors in lieu thereof respectively (any former director being eligible for appointment.)

2. The power of appointment herein conferred upon the Governor in Council shall be a continuous power and shall be exercisable from time to time and so often as any event of default may exist and be continuing.

23. The directors so appointed by the Governor in Council shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor in Council, and any such director may be removed and another appointed in his place. Vacancies occurring from time to time may be filled by the Governor in Council. The said boards respectively shall have all the powers of a board of directors elected by the shareholders and acts of the board requiring the authority and approval of the shareholders shall if authorized by the Governor in Council be as valid and effectual as if authorized or approved by the shareholders.

24. If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

That is what the Government could have done. It could have availed itself of the provisions of that statute. This is purely a business proposition between two parties, the Government and Mackenzie and Mann. I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, if you would go into such a deal, where such a large amount of the money of the people of Canada is involved, without the necessary information. I do not think so. I am surprised at the action of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I have been informed that he was the manager of the National Trust Company, but I am sure that, as manager of that company, he would not consider such a proposition without taking the advice of the best experts, investigating it and ascertaining the assets, revenue and liabilities of the company. For my part I cannot understand why, in face of the report made by the commissioners appointed by this Government, the Government would bring in any such legislation as this. If you will look at the Drayton-Acworth report you will find the following statement:

Value of Canadian Northern Undertaking.

Cash Investment.

The property investment of the Canadian Northern Railway system is stated in the balance sheet of June 30, 1916, at $494,112,489.34. This figure admittedly has been written up to include $100,000,000 of capital stock. And this stock, as we have already said, was issued without any cash consideration. We have endeavoured to ascertain the actual cost of the system. From the company's official reports and special statements supplied to us, we have ascertained that the maximum cash investment that can have been made in the property is $383,302,451.33.

The report says further:

But money cost is not all. We decided also to ascertain the approximate value, on the basis of reproduction cost, of the property as it exists to-day, and we rely on Professor Swain's valuation for this purpose. This valuation is, in his opinion, a liberal estimate of the fair cost of reproducing new, at pre-war prices of labour and material, the system at present existing. It includes property belonging to the system at its estimated cost, if it had to be acquired or constructed to-day. And therefore it not only gives the company credit for lands which it in fact owns, even though it obtained them as a grant; but it also credits the company with the increment of land values since the date of the original acquisition. And these two items are quite large.

A little further on we find the following:

We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern. If, then, the people of Canada have already found, or assumed responsibility for, the bulk of the capital; if they must needs find what further capital is required; and if they must make up for some years to come considerable deficits in net earnings, it seems logically to follow that the people of Canada should assume control of the property. We return later to the Canadian Northern Company in order to set out our recommendations as to its ownership and management in the future and as to the terms to be offered to the existing shareholders.

According to this report, the liabilities of the company are greater than its assets. Yet the Government is going blindfolded into an undertaking that will involve an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. Is it reasonable that these millionaires, Mackenzie and Mann, should unload this property on Canada? I submit that it is not reasonable. Speaking in this House on May 18, 1914, page 3943 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance said:

I have dealt with the question of securities, and come now to the question of remedy upon default. Some hon. gentlemen have said: why do you not take security upon the stock? I need not tell the lawyers of this House that a creditor stands in a higher position than a stockholder, and that except for convenience it is not at all necessary to take the stock of any company for security. If I have a mortgage on a company's undertaking I do not care very much for the stock as security except that it is advisable to have the stock in order that I can take possession of the company, put in my own receiver.

I think it is about time that the minister acted upon the principles that he set forth in 1914 and put the Canadian Northern system into the hands of a receiver. The Government should withdraw this Bill; that course would be more satisfactory to the people than the passing of a measure that will involve an expenditure of over $600,000,000.

The hon. gentleman said further:

What security have we? I have seen a good deal of financing in my time, and I know something of law although my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) does not think so, and I want to say this: I have never seen as effectual a means of entering into possession of a property upon which a mortgage is held as has been devised by the Solicitor General in connection with this transaction. And further —he will not mind this coming from me—I take off my hat to the Solicitor General for the way he has performed the legal work in connection with this transaction which is one of the most complicated that has ever come before the House.

I am afraid that the people will not take off their hats to the Solicitor General or to the Minister of Finance for what they have done in connection with this measure. Speaking in the House on May 14, 1914 (page 3733 of Hansard), the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), a good business man, who has some standing in the province of Quebec, said:

There is another feature of this matter which, I think, is well worthy of consideration. What is to happen in case of default? We have hitherto been dealing with the situation in case of success; the Government has very carefully looked ahead in regard to what might happen in case of failure. Ordinarily it is a very slow process to foreclose a railroad and for the bondholders gradually to take possession of the physical assets thereof. The Government in this case, however, has supplied a method of quick procedure whereby the axe drops instantly and whereby there can be no coming back for further assistance. It is definitely stipulated in this undertaking what shall constitute any event of default.

Why does the hon. member for St. Antoine not persuade the Government of which he is a supporter, and with which he has considerable influence to drop the axe and appoint a receiver for this road? That is what the business men of Canada want. Why does the member for St. Antoine not ask the Government to drop the axe and thus save the Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars?

With regard to the amount that this transaction will cost the country, I have before me the figures given last evening by the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). I am surprised that the Government does not seem to consider seriously what will be the tax upon the people in respect of this undertaking. This road will cost Canada $653,246,949.39. That is a considerable tax upon the people of this country. I contend that such a measure as this should not be put before the people—at a time when so much money is being expended for war purposes and for carrying on the ordinary business of the county—simply to give a present to two millionaires of Toronto. These men have obtained money from nearly every province except Quebec—and Quebec will have to be taxed with the other provinces to meet this expenditure. The Prime Minister, in answer to a question put yesterday in regard to pensions, said:

My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) made an inquiry with regard to a resolution on the Order Paper with respect to the Board of Pension Commissioners and the rates of pension. Hon. gentlemen will remember that on March 14, 1916, a committee was appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration the rates of pensions. On the 10th May, 1916, the committee made a unanimous report. The chairman of the committee, on the 18th May, moved that the report should be commended to the consideration of the Government. Parliament prorogued on the same day. There was not an opportunity to bring in legislation at that session. Accordingly, on the 3rd June, 1916, the recommendations of the committee were put into the form of an Order in Council and passed under the War Measures Act. By a resolution on the Order Paper it was proposed that a similar committee should be appointed this year to take into consideration representations that had been made to the Government from various quarters, and more particularly by several organizations of returned soldiers, as to the desirability of increasing the rates of pensions then allowed. This was urged for various reasons, several of which have a great deal of force. We have reached the conclusion that it would be impracticable to deal with the matter in a thorough and satisfactory manner at this session and that it is a subject which should be dealt with finally and permanently by the new Parliament which is to be summoned in the early future.

Apparently the Government have no time to attend to the wants of the widows and orphans of the men who have gone to the front to fight our battles; yet they have time to attend to the millionaires. No, Mackenzie and Mann cannot wait. They say: "You cannot afford to put this company into the hands of a receiver." What about the Farmers' Bank. Where was the Minister of Labour in 1910, when he used to weary the House for hours and hours wanting the Government to recoup the stockholders of the Farmers' Bank? Do we hear anything about that from the Government benches now? Hundreds and hundreds of poor people lost their money by the failure of that bank. Their money was stolen from them. What did the Government do? The poor people can wait, but the millionaires cannot wait. The people of this country can well call this Government a government of millionaires. In an editorial in the Morning Citizen of August 21 I find the following paragraph:

The Citizen thinks that the Government is wrong in referring the all important matter of the valuation of the 600,000 shares to arbitration. The Acworth-Drayton report says that these shares are practically worthless. If they have no equity of any value, why should the country pay for them any amount a board of arbitrators may decide? The matter is not one for arbitration but for action by the Exchequer court. Briefly, the fact that the administration has not taken advantage of its legal recourses against the company in the circumstances should not compel it to the other extreme of generosity with the money of the people. The matter is one of tremendous interest to Canadians. At present it would seem that the Government is in an untenable position. Indeed its proposal, if enacted into law, will do a grave injustice to the tax burdened people of Canada.

Last evening the Minister of Finance, who is generally pretty fair in his remarks, gave this House to understand that Mr. F. N. McCrea, the member for Sherbrooke, was a director of the Bank of Commerce, and the hon. minister's friends on the other side cheered him. I think the members of the House understood the minister to say that Mr. McCrea was a director of the bank. At any rate, he insinuated that he was.

[Mr. Tobin.]

Mr. McCrea is not a director of the Bank of Commerce, and never was. He was a director of the Eastern Townships bank, which was taken over a few years ago by the Bank of Commerce, and I think they pensioned off all the directors of the Eastern Townships Bank, and Mr. McCrea was one of them. I think the Minister of Finance should not play upon words, but tell the House that Mr. McCrea is not a director of the Bank of Commerce.

I have here a statement from the Annual Financial Review-Canadian, May, 1916, which gives a list of the directors of the Bank of Commerce, which reads:

The Canadian Bank of Commerce. Head office Toronto, Canada. Directors: Sir Edmund Walker, C.V.O., LL.D., Toronto, President; Z. A. Lash, K.C., LL.D., Vice-President, Toronto; John Hoskin, K.C., LL.D., D.C.L., Toronto; J. W. Flavelle, LL.D., Toronto.

I presume the last mentioned name is familiar to all members of the committee. The other names are as follows:

A. Kingman, Montreal; Hon. Sir Lyman Melvin Jones, Toronto; Hon. W. C. Edwards, Ottawa; E. R. Wood, Toronto; Sir John M. Gibson, K.C.M.G., K.C., LL.D., Hamilton; Robert Stuart, Chicago, Ill.; G. F. Galt, Winnipeg; Wm. Farwell Sherbrooke, D.C.L.; Hon. Geo. G. Foster, K.C., Montreal; Chas. Colby, M.A., Ph.D., Montreal; A. C. Flummerfelt, Victoria, B.C.; G. W. Allan, K.C., Winnipeg; H. J. Fuller, Montreal; F. P. Jones, Montreal; H. C. Cox, Toronto.

General Manager, John Aird; Assistant General Manager, H. V. F. Jones.

Mr. McCrea's name was never on the list of directors of the Bank of Commerce. It is somewhat surprising that this Government should press this legislation as public opinion is strongly against it. If you go into the city of Montreal and meet any business men, Conservative or Liberal, they will tell you that this is the most damnable legislation that ever came before this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. TOBIN: Some gentlemen express themselves that way. I would not say that the Government would steal, but people say this is a big steal. Here is a resolution passed by the Constitutional Club of Toronto. The hon. Finance Minister comes from that city. The following paragraph appeared in the Toronto Globe on August 25, 1917:

Impeach All Those Connected With C.N.R.—Sweeping Resolution Passed By the Constitutional Club.

A resolution has been passed by the Constitutional Club, demanding the impeachment of all members of the Dominion Government and of public services, such as the Imperial Munitions Board, who at present or in the past have, either personally or in the capacity of directors of incorporated companies, been connected in any of the financial institutions involved in the affairs of the Canadian Northern Railway.

The resolution sets forth that Parliament has prolonged its own existence beyond the limits prescribed by law, and that it does not adequately represent the country. It also quotes the statements of Mr. R. B. Bennett, M.P., to the effect that the public life of the country has been corrupted, and declares that the Government has admitted the existence of interlocked directorates and personal interests among financiers and financial institutions associated with the affairs of the Canadian Northern Railway.

The resolution was moved by Mr. T. A. Scanlan and seconded by Mr. Archibald Draimin.

I am against this legislation, because it is not in the interest of this country, and I am against it being considered in the last days of a dying Government. The life of this Parliament expired in October, 1916, and I have no mandate from my people to vote for such a measure. This Government has taxed this country up to the hilt for the benefit of their friends. Now, this is a large amount of money, something that is going to tax every man, woman and child in this country for years to come, and I vote against the measure because I consider it is not in the interest of this Dominion.

Mr. ROBB: Having listened to the instructive and convincing address of the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Lafortune), I am inclined to think that the members of the Government are now perhaps sorry that the closure has been put on, and that they are therefore unable to give vent to their feelings on this important question. Having in mind the legislation of 1914, the arguments of the ministers in presenting that legislation and the arguments of their followers in supporting it, we on this side have reason to-day to question why at this time the closure has been put on. All the arguments of the ministers in presenting the legislation of 1914 and the arguments of those who supported them were an effort to convince the House and the country that that was the last call; that the legislation of 1914 was so carefully drawn up, so ironclad, if you will, that whenever Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern Railway company defaulted in their interest payments, automatically the Canadian Northern railway with its connections, mines, timber limits, elevators and valuable rights along the harbour fronts of this country, would all lock, stock and barrel, become the property of the Canadian people. And, so we wonder to-night why it is that the Government, having this legislation in charge, have adopted the closure. Is it because they are afraid of their own supporters? Is it because there is rebellion amongst the supporters of the Government who find it hard to swallow this indigestible pill that is being presented to them? The Government supporters may swallow this "high finance" pill, coated with a "win-the-war" covering, but the electors, the taxpayers, the men who will be loaded with this debt, will not swallow the pill so easily. I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite, from following the public press and from the many telegrams and messages which, I can imagine, have been sent to them asking why they allow this legislation to go through without any protest, are not altogether ignorant of the protests that have been made by representative financial interests throughout this country who heretofore have given loyal support to the Conservative party. I am sure the Government must be aware that throughout this country there is great unrest at this time when the Government propose, at one stroke of the pen, to increase the public debt of this country by over $600,000,000. I am sure the people will take the first opportunity of registering their protest against a Government which has so arbitrarily attempted to put through Parliament what a recent speaker has termed a gigantic steal. I, as representing taxpayers of the county of Huntingdon, wish to take exception to the remarks of my good friend the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) who never loses an opportunity to tell us that Montcalm is the best county in the Dominion of Canada. I invite the hon. member for Montcalm, to attend, next week if he will, the exhibitions in the united counties of Chateauguay and Huntingdon, and there he will see what is really the best county in the Dominion of Canada. Not only is that county a representative agricultural and industrial county, but perhaps there is no section in all the Dominion that is so representative of the two great races that make up this country as the united counties of Chateauguay and Huntingdon. It is true that the Canadian Northern railway does not run through those counties, but we have other good railways operated by private interests; the service is all that could be desired, and whatever may be the opinion of electors in other districts in the Dominion of Canada, in the county which I have the honour to represent, we have no great faith in public ownership.

Mr. GLASS: You are behind the times.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps we may be. I know that in the neighbouring province of Ontario the Hydro-Electric legislation has made certain lines of public ownership popular, but I question very much whether the taxpayers of that province are greatly enthused over this project to take over the Canadian Northern railway. A previous speaker has asked, Why all this hurry to put this legislation through in the closing hours of a dying Parliament, and at a time when the Minister of Finance is very loath, to say the least, to give the committee the information they desire? It is quite apparent to every one who has listened to this short debate that the Minister of Finance is either not fully conversant with all the details of this big transaction, or for some reason or other is not willing to take the House, or even his own supporters, into his confidence and tell us who own the bonds. Who is going to be benefited by the immense increase in the value of the bonds held throughout the country? I do not know what the value of the bonds is to-day, but I venture to say that the value will be increased possibly twenty per cent when this legislation comes into force, and I am not sure whether it is the bondholders or the large financial interests—the pledgees —who hold these bonds who are going to benefit by this legislation. I think the Minister of Finance should be prepared to give the House and the country a clear-cut honest statement, so that the taxpayers who are going to incur this liability may know just who are going to benefit by the transaction.

There is no disguising the fact that the public debt of Canada is growing enormously; it is growing by leaps and bounds. And I think every member of this House will agree with me that if ever there was a time in the history of our nation when we should be careful to conserve our finances and maintain our credit, so that we may be able to do our part in this war and finance the soldiers who are fighting our battles at the front and take care of them when they return, that time is now. The Finance Minister himself has recognized this, or at least has attempted to make the country believe so. I believe the Minister of Finance is the greatest apostle of economy in this country—as a preacher. In every newspaper you pick up, in every bank you go into, and on all the billboards, you will find lessons in economy from the Minister of Finance—"Buy a War Certificate and help the Government to finance the soldiers." To-morrow the people of this country will ask themselves after this legislation has been rammed through the House by means of the closure, whether the Minister of Finance wants this money to finance the soldiers or to give greater security to the bondholders of the Canadian Northern railway, and that will be a reasonable question for them to ask. I am ready to acknowledge that railways are useful for the development and progress of our country. We all remember the time when in western Canada there were not sufficient railways and when there was congestion at Fort William. The people of western Canada could not get their grain forward as fast as they wanted to, and the people of the East could not get that grain as fast as they wanted it. We all remember that when legislation was passed authorizing extensions to the Canadian Pacific railway, a bargain was made whereby the railway reduced its rates. I submit to this House that to-day there is no such thing as railway competition in freight rates. There is railway competition in service, but the Railway Commission has done everything possible to prevent competition in freight rates. And so, when hon. gentlemen say that unless the Government take over this road it will go into the hands of the Canadian Pacific or some other big road, after all what difference would it make to the taxpayer or to the man who has freight to ship? He would not get his freight carried any cheaper. The only competition that is offered in freight rates in this country to-day is water competition. And so I say to the Minister of Finance, instead of prejudicing the credit of this country by taking over this road so as to increase the value of the bonds of that railway, it were better to conserve our credit and use the money for the deepening of our waterways from the head of the Great Lakes to the sea, because that is the way to get cheaper rates for the products of the West going East and the products of the East going West.

The Canadian Northern railway taps a splendid country, and I am ready to give credit to Mackenzie and Mann for their pioneer work in railway construction in this country. I think their road goes through as good a part of the Northwest as there is; it is a splendid fertile country, well watered and well timbered, and they are giving a good service.

If the Government were really sincere in their desire to take over this road and nationalize it, the businesslike way would have been to acquire it in the way suggested by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I have heard it said that a receivership would not be a good thing, that it would destroy the credit of Canada. Let us see. Mr. C. E. B. Biggar, who seems to be an authority, in a recent publication tells us that in 1910 there were thirty-nine railways in the United States in the hands of receivers; in 1913, forty-nine, and in 1915, eighty-five. In 1915, 23,834 miles of railway in the United States were in the hands of receivers, but giving excellent service to the people, possibly a better service than some of our Canadian railways are giving to-day. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, were financial conditions in the United States ever better than they are to-day? Was the credit of the United States ever better than to-day? And yet we have eighty-five great railways in the United States in the hands of a receiver. Last night the Minister of Finance, in discussing this question, pictured what would happen when the Government took over the railway. He said that they would have to appoint a non-partisan commission who would operate the road in the interests of the people, and who would be absolutely free from political bias. That's an old story; we have heard it over and over again. The people of Manitoba heard it not very long ago when it was proposed by the Roblin Government, in which the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) was then Minister of Public Works, that the people of Manitoba should take over all the telephones in the province, and run them without any political patronage and absolutely in the interests of the people. What has been the result? Telephone service in the province of Manitoba costs the people more to-day than it did before it was taken over, and it has shown a deficit all the way from $30,000 to $218,000 a year. It is notorious—and I am quoting now from the records of the Free Press—that whenever there was an election the telephone service was used for political purposes. The idea of running a road regardless of political considerations is something we have yet to learn in this country. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) can tell us something about it. He had the experience not long ago of political pressure in the operating of a railway. Experience in connection with operating the Intercolonial railway leaves much to be desired, in the opinion of the Canadian taxpayer, as regards public ownership. Every hon. gentleman will admit that the Intercolonial railway has been a sink-hole for the money of this country. It would be interesting to hear a member from the Maritime Provinces who would say that those provinces would not have been better off if they had a privately-owned and privately-operated railway system—a system that would have developed their country. It is well known that where the Canadian Pacific railway have running rights along the lines of the Intercolonial, they get the business away from the Government-owned railway. If our experience in operating 1,784 miles of railway—and I think that is about the length of the Intercolonial—has not been profitable or satisfactory to the Canadian people, how does the Government think it can improve upon the situation by taking over 9,500 miles additional? For these reasons, I differ even with my friends on this side of the House, who have expressed themselves as in favour of government-owned and government-operated railways. I think government-owned and government-operated railways are a delusion and a snare. If the railways of this country are showing deficits, the Railway Commission should grant them an increase in rates. Everybody knows that the cost of labour has advanced in recent years; everybody knows a railway cannot be operated as cheaply to-day as it could be five years ago. If the railways show a deficit, why not allow them a reasonable increase in rates, because, after all, it is paid by the consumer, and it is just as well that he should pay that increased rate in freight as to take it out of another pocket in taxes. I fear I have already trespassed upon your time, but as representing the county of Huntingdon I wish to place myself on record as being opposed to this measure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, I have not taken any part in the debate upon this Bill, and before it closes to-day I desire to address the committee very briefly on some phases of it. As far as the principle of the acquisition of the shares of the Canadian Northern Railway company is concerned, I find myself in agreement with the vast majority of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. that is, that in the failure of any matured alternative proposition, the acquisition of the shares of the company is about all we can do under the circumstances. I hardly am able to agree with those hon. gentlemen who have suggested liquidation proceedings and the appointment of a receiver.

There are difficulties in the way of that procedure, although I admit it has merits. But, we must remember that we are dealing with a railway system and not with a railroad. Upon this railway system there are quite a number of securities issued and, in fact, some of the securities issued by this company and guaranteed by the Government do not cover the entire system. It would be impossible, even if the road were forced into liquidation, to have a sale of the property as a system. It is possible to work it out, but there would be tremendous difficulties in the way and it would take a long number of years to put ourselves in the position that we will be in by acquiring the shares under this Act.

I rise, however, to direct the attention of the committee particularly to clause 4 of the Bill. This clause enacts that the arbitration to be appointed shall determine the value of the shares to be acquired and the arbitrators shall proceed in a summary way and may apply their own judgment in determining such value. The section proceeds to say that the arbitrators > —may receive . . . such reports and statements authenticated in such way as they may decide and such evidence as they may deem necessary or helpful.

The matter at issue is really one as to the determination of the value that the company is to receive for the shares. That is the important question. If the board is unanimous in its finding there is no appeal and the value is to be determined upon the judgment of the arbitrators. Therefore, the question which will be before the Board of Arbitrators is a very important one and a very serious one for the country and for all interests involved. I think that every hon. gentleman will admit that this is an extremely difficult problem. In the first place, we are not acquiring the road by expropriation or condemnatory proceedings and we are not entering into possession of the property as mortgagees. We are involuntarily acquiring the road. The arbitrators will be confronted with the problem of deciding what principles will be involved, or invoked, in determining the value of the shares. It is important that we shall determine if we can, by statute, what principles shall guide the arbitrators in fixing and determining the value to be paid for these shares. Personally, I do not see much need for the appointment of a Board of Arbitration to determine the value of these shares. I think it might as well have been done by the Government themselves. They might have at least studied the matter, made a recommendation to Parliament and asked Parliament for its approval. I would just as soon take the judgment of some members of the Government as I would that of the Board of Arbitrators to be appointed.

They would, I think, be in a better position than this proposed board would be to determine the value. What is the position of the Government? They have the Drayton-Acworth report. They would have the testimony of their own auditors who have been engaged in the auditing of the accounts of the Canadian Northern Railway system for the past two or three years; they would have the evidence of the engineers of the Railway Department, who must know every mile of that system, because of examinations made prior to the payment of subsidies; they know the cost of the railway; they know the reproduction cost; they know its financial earnings and the cost of operation; they have just as good an idea of the prospective value of the railway as any board that could be appointed. I think, therefore, that it would have been in the interests of the country and acceptable to Parliament if, in presenting the proposal to acquire the shares of the company, the Government had recommended to Parliament what in their judgment was the value of the shares to be acquired. Then we should have been through with this question once for all and Parliament and the country would have known what they were liable for in this connection.

I said that difficulties would be encountered by the board of arbitration in determining the value. The valuation of a railway is quite a modern term; the idea is new. Prior to the days when railways were valued for purposes of fixing of rates, no one ever heard tell of the valuation of a railway upon this continent. I doubt very much whether the physical property of any railway system was ever valued in Canada, or in the United States, except within the past few years, when it became a matter of policy on the part of state and national Governments to fix the rates of freight to be charged by transportation companies. In determining the value of railways for purposes of fixing rates certain principles have been established. The question occurs to me whether the principles that have been fixed by utility boards in Canada and the United States will obtain when you come to fix, not for purposes of rate control the value of a railway which you are acquiring. As I said before, we are hardly expropriating the road; the proceedings will hardly be condemnation proceedings; they are hardly like the proceedings followed when the value is being estimated for the purpose of fixing rates. So that the question arises; what principles will guide the board of arbitrators when they come to fix the value? In some courts of the United States it has been held that in the fixing of railway values for purposes of rate control and in the fixing of railway values for the purposes of condemnation proceedings—or, as we term it in this country, expropriation—different principles should obtain. One reason why I think the Government should have determined, by negotiation or otherwise, absolutely the amount which should be paid, if any, for the acquisition of the equity in the Canadian Northern system is that so many principles will be invoked by the owners and pledgees of shares that no one can say approximately what amount may be awarded by the board. The valuation will be determined by the board according to their own judgment; the judgment of one set of arbitrators might differ vastly from the judgment of another. If they are unanimous in their finding, notwithstanding the fact that the amount fixed may be absurdly high, there is no appeal. I think that the statute should set down some principle for the guidance of the arbitrators. Some hon. gentlemen who are lawyers can easily anticipate claims that will be made to establish the values. For instance, there is the franchise value, the market value, the strategic value, the value of good-will, and the going value. It has always been recognized in this country—at least it has in the United States—that there is such a thing as franchise value. The member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) referred to a judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer of the United States. I forget the name of the particular case to which my hon. friend referred, but I wish to give to the committee an extract from a decision made by this distinguished jurist upon the matter of franchise value:

> When by the taking of the tangible property the owner is actually deprived of the franchise to take tolls, just compensation requires payment not merely of the value of the tangible property itself, but of the franchise of which he is deprived.

There is little doubt that the franchise value will be urged as a basis for estimating the value of the shares in this particular case. I submit, however, that it should not enter into the judgment of the arbitrators. This franchise—at least, most of it—was granted by the Parliament of Canada, and as we propose to acquire the equity in this road, it should be clearly set forth that no allowance shall be made for the franchise value. In most of the provinces of Canada to-day municipalities impose taxes upon public utilities and directly and specifically tax the franchise. It may be that the Canadian Northern system franchise has, in some provinces or in some municipalities, been taxed. If we wish to avoid payment upon a claim of this kind, I submit that we should provide in the statute that no allowance be made by the arbitrators for franchise value.

Then, take the strategic value, which is referred to in the Drayton-Acworth report. The Public Utilities Board of the State of Washington some two or three years ago were engaged in the valuation of all the railway systems in that state for the purposes of rate control. That commission, perhaps not properly, decided that there was such a thing as strategic value in a railway. I think the judgment of the board was regarded by text-book writers and by jurists in the United States as not well founded.

I only refer to it for the purpose of calling the attention of the Government and the committee to the fact that, unless there is a statutory protection for the country in that respect, that the same argument will be invoked by the owners of the shares when they appear before the Board of Arbitration. The Washington State Board considered that where a road is so located that it cannot be paralleled and made to suffer from competition it occupies a strategic position which is to be recognized in the determination of value. There may be many instances where the Canadian Northern Railway system might well invoke that argument. For instance, I understand they pre-empted the only remaining route from Edmonton to the Pacific coast. I believe this is true, at least in so far as a great part of the territory of that mountain section is concerned. Are we prepared to entertain the suggestion that, because they pre-empted the only possible remaining route from the prairie country to the Pacific coast, their system has in this respect some strategic value and that therefore the arbitrators must consider that point in fixing the price which is to be paid by the country for these shares?

Then I want to direct the minister's attention also to two or three other principles which are involved in the fixing of values. I do not think the minister has given enough consideration to clause 4, and that there is not a sufficient limitation to the principles which the arbitrators may invoke in assessing the value. For instance, there is the principle of good-will and the principle of a going concern, or the going value. I believe going value is the term. Good-will and going value are principles well settled by the courts of this country and the courts of the United States. We know what they are. I do not intend to occupy the time of the committee with a statement of the substance of these definitions, as given by the courts from time to time, but I say that we should be careful that the Board of Arbitration may not invoke to too great an extent these standards which will enable them to give the owners of the shares a value which Parliament and the country never anticipated. In many well known instances in Canada and the United States arbitrators have taken the structural value of public undertakings and have arbitrarily added 10, 20 or 30 per cent. They have reached the value in this summary and arbitrary way. I submit that in the acquisition of an undertaking of this size we should be careful by our legislation to make it impossible for arbitrators in a summary and arbitrary way to fix an unreasonable value which cannot be corrected by Parliament or by any other power in this country if the arbitrators are unanimous in their decision. Public Utility Board in the state of New Jersey in a certain case which I have in mind, after having fixed the structural value of a public utility which was being acquired, said there should be added to that an additional valuation of 30 per cent. One may say that this will not be done, and cannot be done, in the case of the acquisition of the shares of this railway, but there is nothing to prevent it. It is true we are acquiring merely the shares, but you may be sure that the owners of the shares will invoke all these principles, when the matter comes before the Board. And, after all, when you come to fix the value, there is no difference between the acquisition of the shares and the acquisition of the physical property of the system. Then, in ascertaining the value of the road, the promoters' interest have frequently been considered. I could give to the committee a statement made by the late James J. Hill, an eminent railway man, well known not only to this country but to the entire world, who stated that in determining the value of a railway it was proper to take into consideration the time and labour of the promoters, and the facts that dividends had been deferred, and that they had received no payment whatever in connection with their promotion, except possibly some salaries. It is true, this statement which I have given to the committee as having come from James J. Hill was merely his own statement, given in evidence, before some body in the United States, but the principle has also been established by many courts in the United States, and particularly in recent years by Public Utility Boards.

I have enumerated to the committee only a few of the arguments and contentions which will be advanced and presented to the board of arbitration in fixing the value of these shares. The statute merely says that the board shall fix, upon their own judgment, the amount which shall be paid to the shareholders. Section 4 of the Bill does not pretend to lay down any principle by which they shall be guided, except in so far as the section is amended by the amendment presented yesterday by the Minister of Finance, to the effect that reproduction cost shall be based upon values of pre-war days.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman is overlooking the fact that an amendment has been proposed, to strike out the clause under which the arbitrators may use their own judgment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have been referring to that. That is in the original Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That amendment stood with the others.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was not aware that the words "apply their own judgment" were struck out, although, on reflection, I remember the Minister of Finance informing the member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) a few days ago that he proposed striking it out. I am not sure there is any great value in striking out these words. I am not impressed with the view that the elimination of such words strengthens the section. I think they are still at liberty to apply their own judgment. I believe that section 4 should eliminate some of the standard principles which are usually invoked in such circumstances in the fixing of the values of public utilities or railway systems. I have mentioned only a very few of these principles. Many others might be mentioned, but I do not purpose detaining the committee at any greater length by enumerating them or by any reference to them whatever.

I repeat what I said at the beginning, namely: that I regret that the Government, in presenting to Parliament their proposal to acquire the shares of the Canadian Northern, did not at the same time present their view as to the value of the equity in those shares. I have as much faith in the judgment of some of the members of Government as I would have in the judgment of the arbitrators who will be appointed—even more, because the Government would have a better appreciation of the public view of this question and would not be so apt to be influenced by the many specious arguments which, I know, will be advanced for the purpose of impressing the Board of Arbitrators as to what is the real value of these shares. I therefore think that even now the Government, with all the evidence they have before them—and they have practically everything that could be presented to the board—should undertake to re-open negotiations with the owners or pledgees of the shares and come to Parliament and state the amount, if any, which, in their judgment, is the value of the equity in those shares, and then let us dispose of the matter at once. But failing that, I say that section 4 of the Bill should be amended in such manner as to indicate, further than has already been done, the principles which should guide and influence the arbitrators in determining the value of the shares to be acquired by the Government of Canada, and specifically to eliminate some of the methods which are ordinarily invoked by the owners of public utilities in endeavouring to establish abnormal values for those utilities when acquired by governmental or municipal bodies.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Although the Canadian Northern railway has many important branches in the East, that road is essentially a western road. It is a western road in its inception, and most of its lines are in the West. I wish to place on record a strong hope and desire that, whoever the arbitrators may be who are appointed to do this work, at least one of them will be selected from Western Canada.

I wish to refer for a moment to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) who certainly was not very familiar with the facts. If I understood the hon. gentleman aright, he said that he never knew additional railways to cause lower freight rates. There is one instance of that, and that is the Canadian Northern. Every one from Western Canada knows that the building of the Canadian Northern in Western Canada had a very great deal to do with the lowering of the freight rates to farmers and others in that part of the country. He also referred to the telephone system of Manitoba. While that question may have nothing to do with the acquisition of the Canadian Northern railway, his facts were not correct in respect to that telephone system as he proved later on in his address. No other province in Canada to-day has a telephone system that is giving greater satisfaction that the telephone system of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman said that he was prepared to advocate increased freight rates for the reason that labour and everything else that enter into the carrying on of railways to-day cost more than they did a few years ago. He said that the telephone rates in Manitoba were higher to-day than they were a few years ago. That may be the case, but the citizens of Manitoba are to-day finding no fault with the bargain made by the Roblin Government in connection with the telephones of that province, and if it costs a little more to conduct the telephone system in that province to-day than it did five or six years ago, the reason is exactly the same as that given by the hon. member for Huntingdon why the freight rates should be increased. namely; that it costs more—and that is a question I need not elaborate—to run either freight trains or telephone systems to-day than it did a few years ago. I simply hope my request will not be overlooked, that one of those arbitrators may be selected from Western Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This debate has lasted a considerable time, and we have not yet heard the last word on this question. I am somewhat surprised that we have heard so little from the opposite side of the House. There is a feeling that there is too much partisanship in Canada, and there is a revolt, I understand, against what is known as machine politics. I should suppose that we have never had a greater exhibition of what I would describe as machine politics than we have had in this House during this discussion. We are proposing by this measure practically to double, or more than double, the public debt of this country, and since three o'clock this afternoon—it is now after one a.m.—hon. gentlemen opposite have not responded at all to the challenges that have been thrown across the floor from this side of the House. They have practically been dumb in the face of the arguments that have been put forward from this side of the House to show why this Bill should not pass. I say that is machine politics with a vengeance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They will speak when no one can answer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Minister of Finance has succeeded in gagging every man who sits behind him, with the exception of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner), who is the only man we have heard on that side of the House since three o'clock this afternoon. I have had the honour of a seat in this House for the last twelve years or more, and I have never until to-night, seen a case in which the Opposition was able absolutely to silence and cow the Government on a question that came up for discussion. If there was any justification at all for the proposal of the Government, do you not think, Sir, that some arguments would have been presented from the Government side? But we have had the the spectacle of hon. gentlemen sitting dumb while argument after argument has been put forward from this side of the House to show why this measure should not pass. Is it any wonder that we are suspicious and think that some sinister influences are at work on the other side of the House to keep them silent? Is it not proof of the statement that has been made by hon. members on this side of the House, that the money-masters of Toronto are influencing the Government in this matter?

We are proposing practically to double the public debt. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that we are getting something by the transaction, that we are getting an asset. The test of an asset, to my mind, is what it will produce. Does any hon gentleman in this House expect that this is a good investment, or that it will produce even running expenses and interest? This railway system is not now producing running expenses and interest in the hands of private owners, who are doing everything that can be done to make money out of the system. Our experience of government ownership is that a government cannot do as well as a private company. It is not to be expected, therefore, that this Government will be able to do anything more than pay the running expenses out of the earnings of this road, and they will do well if they succeed in doing that. If we are adding over $400,000,000 to the public debt—I do not put it at $600,000,000, although I believe it will reach that figure in the end—the people will have to pay interest on that debt. I have the honour to represent a county that has not been fairly treated by this Government, or by former Governments, in railway matters. I am sorry to say that I represent a non-railway county. I represent men who have all their lives been paying the interest on railway subsidies for the benefit of other parts of Canada, and it is a serious matter for the people I represent to know that their burdens in that respect are to be doubled without any expectation of the enormous expense that is being incurred being of any advantage to them, or of very little advantage. This doubling of the public debt is a serious matter, because we are now paying such an enormous interest on the money we have borrowed. When this Administration came into power the Government could borrow money easily at four or four-and-a-half per cent. They are now paying the enormous rate of about six per cent; that was the rate paid for the last loan which was floated.

I want to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that the savings of the people of this country, which are very large, are bringing only three per cent. How is it that the Minister of Finance has not managed to secure some of this enormous sum of money that is packed away as the savings of the Canadian people, for which they are getting only the trifling rate of three per cent, when at the same time the minister is floating bonds among the millionaires of New York, and among our own millionaires at home, at the rate of six per cent? I have a friend in Nova Scotia, a merchant who has now retired from business and is doing some thinking on matters of this kind. In a letter to me recently he asked me to ascertain how much the savings of the people amounted to, which were netting them only three per cent interest. I asked the question in the House a few days ago, and the Minister of Finance answered as follows:

Mr. Sinclair:

1. What was the total amount on deposit in savings banks of all kinds in Canada on June 30, 1917?

2. How much was on deposit in Government savings banks at said date?

Sir Thomas White:

1. Approximately $998,856,922.61.

2. Dominion Government savings banks, $13,167,436.64. Post office savings banks, $41,105,644.92.

So that in the Government savings banks of both kinds there was the sum of $54,273,-081.56. While the savings of the people amounted to $998,000,000—practically a billion dollars—the Minister of Finance was able to secure only $54,000,000 of that money for the use of the country. Would it not be a good thing for the people of Canada, and a good thing for the revenue of this country, if the Minister of Finance, instead of taking trips down to New York and paying New York millionaires six per cent for the money he borrows, were to give a little more interest to the people who have deposited their savings in the banks of this country, or at all events were to secure the savings for the use of the public?

Is it not an amazing thing that we have the enormous amount of about one billion dollars on deposit, nearly all in the commercial banks, and that the Government has not been able to secure more than $54,000,000 of that amount? There must be some reason for it. Is the reason that the Government is endeavouring to favour the banks and leave all this money under their control so that they may borrow it from the people at three per cent, and lend it to the Government at five or six per cent, and charge the people who borrow from them as high as seven per cent or eight per cent? It looks that way. It looks as if the Minister of Finance was standing in with the money-masters of Toronto. The merchant who wrote me made this remark in his letter in regard to the loans which have been made recently in Canada:

> How do matters stand re Government war loans? If I understand the situation the United States Government issued its celebrated Victory Loan at three and a half per cent and paid no commissions. This for 2,000 million dollars was a smaller proportionate issue than was $350,000,000, the amount of the three issues in Canada for the Dominion. We paid from one-half to one-quarter of one per cent in commissions, say $1,250,000, and sold five per cent bonds at 97½. Our $350,000,000 thus netted us $340,000,000, and as we pay five per cent on the face value, we pay 5.15 per cent on the net amount.

He was not speaking of the last loan but of the first three.

> The average duration of these bonds is fifteen years. How do we compare in our financing with our next door neighbor?
> 340 millions at 3½% for 15 years amounts to $178,500,000 interest.
> 340 millions at 5.15% for 15 years amounts to $262,650,000 interest.
> A difference in favour of the United States of $84,150,000.

That is to say, on a loan of $350,000,000 for 15 years, and the Canadian people will have $84,150,000 more to pay for interest than will the people of the United States. The President of the United States called the financial men together and explained to them that he wanted a victory loan—a loan to carry on the war—and the bankers were so generous and so willing to help that they agreed to his proposition, and this enormous loan was floated without one cent of commission having been paid. The Minister of Finance has paid a very large commission to his friends the Canadian bankers. Not only has he done that, but he went to the United States a few weeks ago and paid an enormous commission to the brokers and bankers there—$3,750,000 in commissions, a quarter of a million dollars of which went to one of the Canadian banks, or to a certain gentleman in the city of Montreal. That is the way my hon. friend has financed his loans. It becomes a serious question.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is doing an injustice to the Bank of Montreal. I made a statement yesterday correcting a report which had appeared in connection with that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Do I understand the minister says now that he did not give any commission to the Bank of Montreal?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A rebate of one-quarter of one per cent of the commission was obtained for the Government by the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was the commission paid?

Mr. GRAHAM: One and three-quarters per cent.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does it not mean that the Bank of Montreal receives one-quarter of one per cent on the whole loan?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much does it receive?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My recollection is that on a previous loan it was one-thirty-sixth.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Every member in the House understood it as I did. In any case, I do not care whether the Bank of Montreal got the money or not; I would prefer that the Bank of Montreal should receive it rather than have it go to the New York brokers. The point is, the minister paid altogether too much for his commissions in view of the fact that the president of the United States is able to float an enormous loan of two thousand millions without paying a cent in commissions.

We have to take our choice in regard to this matter. There are two ways of dealing with it. We on this side of the House propose that we should assume control of the Canadian Northern railway system under the legislation of 1914. The proposal of the Government practically admits that there is value in this stock. They do not say how much that value is, but by the proposal they are making to the House and the country they admit there is some value. The owners of the stock claim it is worth $60,000,000, and by passing this legislation we run the risk that the arbitrators may decide that it is worth $60,000,000. If they do, the people of this country will have to pay for it. The legislation of 1914 was carefully explained by ministers and by hon. gentlemen opposite at the time it was going through the House. We were told that if the Canadian Northern Railway company, or Mackenzie and Mann, made default in the future, after having received this large advance of $45,000,000, we had machinery in this statute to take possession of the road without foreclosure and without any legal proceedings. Why not do it? We were asked in 1914 to advance this $45,000,000, and we were told that that was the last time we should be asked to advance money to that railway, that the Canadian Northern people were not to come back to us, and if they did we should be in a position to deal with them. It is now proposed to hand out a large additional sum to these people. The statute of 1914 is clear. No one pretends to dispute the fact that it contains provision for taking over the road. The Prime Minister said so; the Minister of Finance said so, and the Solicitor General, who drew the Act, so explained it. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House made speeches on that occasion which form part of the history of this affair ,and they all told us in the plainest language that if default was made this Act of 1914 would be resorted to, and that it would be effective. The Minister of Finance was satisfied. He used this language:

> I take off my hat to the Solicitor General for the way in which he has performed the legal work in connection with this transaction. I was dealing with the question of remedy upon default—

Well, that is the question we are dealing with.

> —and was pointing out that we have a much better control than would be afforded by the security of a majority or all the stock of the Canadian Northern.
> [Mr. Sinclair.]

That is to say that, under the Act of 1914, we were in a bettter position than we shall be in now by taking over the stock of the company. Will he not admit the principle that it is his duty to do the best he can for the country as the Minister of Finance and as the trustee for the people? He made the positive statement that this Act of 1914 put us in a better position than if we owned all the stock of the railway system. He now proposes to take the stock of the railway system and he refuses to resort to the remedy that he provided in 1914. There is no good reason for it. The Prime Minister put himself on record in the plainest language to the effect that we had under this Act of 1914 a perfect remedy, and that if the circumstances arose which have arisen it would be effective. This is what he said:

> It is also provided by clause 24 that if authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may in case of default declare that the interest of Mackenzie and Mann in the Canadian Northern railway is absolutely barred and foreclosed and that all the property and assets thereof subject to any outstanding obligations shall thereupon vest in the Crown in the right of the people of Canada.

There is no suggestion of arbitration there. He simply says in the plainest and most forcible way that if default is made this property will pass to the Crown for the right of the people of Canada without paying Mackenzie and Mann any additional money therefor. The Prime Minister further said:

> The enterprise must proceed. If the expectation of those who believe the enterprise can be carried to a successful conclusion are disappointed, then a summary method has been provided by which the road can be taken over, the system reorganized and either be transferred to another corporation constituted for the purpose or pass into the ownership of the people.

There is no suggestion of arbitration there and there is no talk of confiscation. Hon. gentlemen have been telling us that it would be confiscation to take this road under the Act that is provided, the Act of 1914. I submit it is not confiscation. We are not taking anything from these people. In the first place they did not put a dollar into this stock. We know how this stock was constituted; we made it here. We did the whole thing ourselves. It is absurd to talk about confiscation; we know that there is not a dollar of money in it. We know that any right they may have had, has been forfeited by the default they have made.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to bring his remarks to a conclusion?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am just through. I regret that I am not permitted to say all that I would like to say on this important question. I want to say, however, that I am decidedly opposed to paying any more money to Mackenzie and Mann. They have already become millionaires at the expense of this country and there is no reason why the country should be mulcted in a large sum of money to take over this stock when under the law of the land, under a law passed by this Parliament, we have the right to assume control and to take it over without the payment of any money.

Mr. R. LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville) (translation): Mr. Chairman, as the representative on one of the finest counties of the province of Quebec, as representative of an agricultural county, and being myself a farmer, I believe I would not be doing my duty if I did not protest, as strongly as I possibly can, against this iniquitous legislation whereby the country shall be mortgaged for the pretty amount of $650,000,000.

I put the question to you, Mr. Chairman, is it decent that a measure of this importance be referred to us, be imposed upon us by a Parliament which, for twelve months, has had no mandate from the people and after the Government have, on several occasions, through the right hon. Prime Minister, pledged themselves, were the Parliament's existence extended, not to introduce into the House any contentious measure? Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann's railroad has received large subsidies both from the federal and from the provincial government, as well as from various Canadian municipalities. With such subsidies reaching so fabulous a total, we should be led to believe that this railway would have been a success, but I think it is rather the contrary that has been the result. According to the Minister of Finance, the railway is in bankruptcy, and I think I am right in believing that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann are actually worth millions.

Since 1911, the Government, who seem to have a great deal of affection and of gratitude for Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann—and I do believe that they actually owe them a debt of gratitude for the 1911 election—have always come to us, at every session, and asked us to assist the Canadian Northern by way of bond securities. Finally, in 1914, the Government made a contract with Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. For my part, I would have thought that the solvent party should have taken 60 millions of the 100 million obligations and that the insolvent party should have held the balance, i.e. 40 millions. But, nevertheless, the railway company took good care to keep the majority of the bonds, in order to be able, later on, to have the Government pay them their 60 millions; so that it is the insolvent party who manages the business, that is to say, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. As many other members who have spoken before me, I am of the opinion that it is not necessary to buy 60 million worth of stock to become the owners of that railway. It seems to me that the purchase of 11 millions of that stock would have been sufficient to become the masters of the situation.

For my part if this railway is in bankrupty, I would rather prefer letting it go into the hands of a receiver, then, at least, we would know the actual amount of the company's liabilities as well as the financial standing of its promoters; we would also find out how many millions those gentlemen have invested in private enterprises in Mexico, in South America and even here, in this country. Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Mackenzie lives in a magnificent palace in Toronto, estimated at two or three million dollars, I believe? If such is the case, how is it that a man obliged to sell the Government an insolvent concern, can nevertheless find the means of living in luxury in a palace and that, meanwhile, the people are taxed to the utmost in order that these gentlemen may live at our expense?

Let us now pass to the financial side of the question. If we add to the National debt those new liabilities we are to take over in consequence of this Act, we reach the incredible sum of $2,500,000,000. Under such circumstances, how can any one pretend that the people of Canada can run the war and the railways besides? For my part, I unhesitatingly declare that it is time, more than ever, to stop both the war and what I would call the railway scheme.

In this railway policy, I see the repetition of the old story: elections are at hand. Indeed, what do we find? Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann spend almost every night with the ministers or with the Prime Minister himself, in order to have the conscription Bill passed. Sir William Mackenzie is here, in Ottawa, since the Premier's return from England; they have worked together, to impose upon the people of this country this nefarious conscription Bill, thinking it would be most popular, that the whole country would welcome it and that it would allow the formation of a coalition government. They wanted the peo- of this country to swallow that pill. It is always those same people, those same individuals we see behind the curtain; Mackenzie and Mann are there, surrounding the politicians, making victims almost every where, among the Conservatives and among the Liberals.

What happened in British Columbia? There, as every where else, Sir William Mackenzie made victims. His ways are well known. In election times, he has a few thousand dollars delivered to one political party and gives ten times more to the other. When he wants to have a politician on the jump, he sends to him one of his creatures with some ten or fifteen thousand dollars, in order to make a slave of him and later on if that fellow does not toe the mark, he does not hesitate to denounce him.

I do protest most forcibly against the manner in which the Government are treating Mackenzie and Mann.

Would the Minister of Finance, who attended that Toronto meeting, during the 1911 campaign, tell us whether it is not the same Mackenzie who, then and there, said to both Conservatives and Liberals who were against reciprocity: Draw on me in order to defeat Laurier. Don't you run away with the idea that he was offering his own money, no, it was the money he had obtained from the Canadian Government.

That is how the people is treated, but woe to those bed-fellows of the Minister.

Indeed, that is the way we are treated in this country, but I hope the day is not far distant when the people will judge those who are always tied to the apron-strings of these gentlemen.

I said, a few minutes ago, that the clause was very plain. Indeed, according to the agreement between the Government and Mackenzie and Mann, if the latter did not meet their obligations, the Government had the right to say: Stop! What is there to prevent the Government from declaring these gentlemen in bankruptcy? It would be desirable to put that railway into receivership; then we could see the situation of the provinces who have incurred liabilities to have railroads in their own territory. British Columbia has guaranteed debentures to the extent of $47,000,000; Ontario, $7,000,000 and over; Saskatchewan, $18,000,000; Alberta, $35,000,000 and Manitoba, $24,000,000.

We, of the province of Quebec, who shall be called upon, as all the others, to pay our share, we have had nothing from Mackenzie and Mann. Fortunately, we happened to have a Prime Minister in Quebec who drove back those gentlemen, he refused to be approached, he never slept over night with Mr. Mackenzie and I congratulate him for it. Nevertheless, we shall be called upon, we of Quebec, to pay our share for these scandals in British Columbia.

What need was there of the Canadian Northern extending their line up to the Pacific ocean? Now, there was no necessity for it, save to serve the purposes of British Columbia politicians, in order to allow these fellows, in election times, to have electoral funds and to put out the party then in power, as was done in British Columbia; but the people, a little later, perfectly enlightened, drove the other party out of power.

I once more protest against this Government who are about to impose such a policy that we, of the province of Quebec, shall be forced to pay our share just like all the others; I protest with all the energy that is in me against such a state of affairs.

I say therefore, as to this railway question, so far as I am concerned, that I do not want the State to administer our railways. I know too well the character of politicians and I know too well that the people may be too often fooled by politicians. Besides, if it is managed by a Government who never think of anything but patronage, how can you imagine it can work out all right?

I sincerely believe that a day shall come, at no very distant date, when the Government of Canada must settle, wholly or partly, this railway business and get rid of these individuals, but I wish that, in return, those same railways, which are existing for the country's benefit, after all, be operated by private companies, such as the Canadian Pacific, for instance.

Do you believe, Mr. Chairman, that if the Canadian Pacific had fallen into the hands of Mackenzie and Mann, it would be as prosperous as it is to-day? No. It is in other hands; it is in the hands of a man, whose name is Lord Shaughnessy, an exceptional manager, who has banished all patronage on that railway and who does not employ three men on one man's job.

We have the Intercolonial which has never paid the country since it has belonged to the Government. I say that we have enough of it; I say that if the other railways must fall into the hands of the Government, the latter should have all these lines operated by a private company for the best interests of the public, generally, and for those of the public Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, I will not detain you any longer, because I am afraid of the gag.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (Maisonneuve) (translation): Mr. Chairman, as representative of such a large city——

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. VERVILLE: Even should I speak any louder I do not believe you would have the advantage of understanding me, but that is no fault of mine, for, as you may know, Mr. Chairman, in this world of ours animals and insects generally speak one language, but not always two.

As representative of such a large city as the metropolis of Canada, I believe it is my duty to give my opinion, for what it is worth, upon the question now before us. Since the beginning of the war, two words have often been used in this House: justice and equity. It is really the proper time to say they are rather empty words and I believe that it would be better to change them. As to the legislation now before the House, I hope the hon. Minister of Finance will not venture to say that there is in it a sum of justice for the people of this country, nor could he say either that there is any sum of equity. I am not opposed to the idea of nationalizing the public services; I have studied some at that school of nationalization which has for principle to manage for the people, by the people, and for the benefit of the people, any enterprise, any commercial industry or even to use a general expression, any public utility whatsoever. The question now before the House is not a matter of public interest, that is to say a profitable one from the people's point of view. If the present Government had really meant to practice what is called nationalization, they would have found out from the very beginning, some means for taking over the Canadian Pacific railway which brings rather high dividends and, by doing so they would have succeeded in making of the Canadian Northern a paying concern. As to the increased burden which they intend saddling upon the people of this country through the purchase of this railroad, I might say it is scandalous, if such a term is a parliamentary one, because in the long run the masses are always those who have to foot the bill.

I am not appealing just now to the high magnates of finance, for to-day these gentlemen have succeeded in piling up colossal fortunes through profiteering at the expense of the people in general, the country over, in towns and villages, are, in consequence, and I might say, for having knowingly robbed the people, made the recipient of favours at the hands of His Majesty.

The people who are called upon to pay, who must always pay anyway, are asking themselves at the present hour, and rightly so, whether the proposal submitted to the House is really in their own interest, when it has been shown by all those who have preceded me in the course of this lengthy debate, that all we have to do is simply to apply the Act of 1914, which you have yourself, Mr. Chairman, so well defended in those days.

The Act of 1914 is either good or bad, but the mighty dollar, that earthly domineering divinity who has it in his power to move even mountains, and finds it an easy task to control a government, and have it decree that this railway is to be taken over by the State, so that Mackenzie and Mann's millions may remain untouched, and that these gentlemen may keep on junketting through out the various countries of the world.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether they are the object of as much consideration in foreign countries as in ours, but, after all I think the idea is to safeguard the interests of these two gentlemen who, as I just said a moment ago, have been the recipients of His Majesty's favours.

Of course, I fully realize, Mr. Chairman, that the poor man who, in a time of stress, of scarcity, would enter a store and steal a loaf of bread to feed his family, would be quickly sent to jail for six months; but the gentlemen who robs a bank or a country, through a railway deal or otherwise, would become the recipient of the favours of His Majesty.

Mr. Chairman, the principle of public ownership, whether by the State or by municipalities excludes all idea of profit from its operation. I understand that this proposal does not allow of any profit making since the company is insolvent. If such be the case why should the Canadian people be called upon to foot the bill? Are the people able to do it? Are the plain people in the towns and rural districts in a position to do it? Why should the Government exact that from them because these two men have grown rich at the people's expense? Now they are intent on safeguarding the millions these men have accumulated for reasons I am not ready to expound but which may be readily suspected.

Mr. Chairman, I heard the other day, or rather I read in Hansard, that the Prime Minister had decided that this session was too far advanced for us to attend to the increasing of the soldiers' pensions. Since the report has been issued the cost of living has increased to such an extent that it is very hard for the soldiers' families to make ends meet. It matters very little, of course that the families of our soldiers at the front be reduced to living on charity, that they be obliged to knock at the door of public charitable institutions; that matter can well await settlement for a year longer, but it is of importance that Mackenzie and Mann should be granted at once $60,000,000 or more.

To those who have increased the national debt, the sufferings, the hardships which the city and country workmen have to undergo are of no consequence; neither is the burden of taxation they have had to bear for several years past. The only important consideration for the moment is to please Mackenzie and Mann.

As to State ownership of railways, under the present conditions—as I have just said it, I do not wish it to be understood that I am against such a scheme. I say that providing a system of State ownership which brings no returns or does not make both ends meet would be a most criminal thing to do.

If, on the other hand, a railway system can be made through any machinery whatever to give good returns or meet its expenses, I say it is the Government's duty to take it over and have the public get the benefit of it.

In France, Belgium, in Switzerland and in England likewise—I might also mention Germany, but I must not do so for fear of offending some touchy people in this House—when it came to instituting State ownership, the matter was taken up by the various governments of those countries along lines quite different from those followed here. I am prepared to say that the great majority of the people of this country are against the system which the Government intend applying to the Canadian Northern. I may say, by the way that I know that the Prime Minister has recently received a stern resolution from the Trades and Labour Council of the city of Toronto, and I know that the city of Montreal, which I represent, has also protested on the same grounds.

Some one mentioned here, to-day, the names of the business men who signed that statement recently published in the press. Among those names was quoted that of my friend, Mr. Ainey, one of the Montreal city controllers, and it may have been inferred from that that he was a business man, or the head of some big concern or of a powerful financial institution. Such is not the case. He was included because he represents a large city; they wanted his name to appear along with those of eminent citizens of this country, so as to show that there was only one class opposed to this legislation, but all classes of people were averse to it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I very much doubt that the Minister of Finance will be able to float in the United States the loan which not only one class opposed to this legislation, but all classes of people were averse to it.

Formerly we heard the cry: Have nothing to do with the United States. It rang loud enough in our ears in 1911. We should not be overanxious, Mr. Chairman, for I believe that, after the war, the considerable amount we shall be owing to our American neighbours across the line, will probably open our eyes and we must not then be so touchy at seeing the stars and stripes waving at various points along the frontier.

There is no reason to fear mentioning certain things which are actually a menace in the minds of our rabid imperialists; they also know of them, but they do not mention them; and should anyone dare refer to them, he is charged with being a disloyal subject of His Majesty.

Mr. Chairman, I have not yet reached my time limit, I believe, but I will not exceed it, although in 1913, when the Government—whose worthy committee chairman you are—applied the rule we are now made to endure; the right hon. Prime Minister then granted me I remember, an extra twenty minutes. I do not intend to go beyond the limit, for the subject has been fully threshed out, but I wish to protest in the name of the city of Montreal, which is not the least in the Dominion, I desire to protest on behalf of all classes of its people. I wish to protest on behalf of the working men who will be called upon to pay their full quota; I want to protest in the name of those who, as the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) has so well put it last night, are now indebted to the amount of $300 per capita.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe protested in the name of the numerous families of his county; have I not the right, also, to think of the numerous families in my own constituency whose rights it is our duty and our right to safeguard? I know that it will not prevent this Bill becoming law and that the people shall just the same be obliged to bear that burden for our big capitalists, for those good nabobs who will go on junketting trips across the seas and who will heartily scoff at those poor Canadian people who are so efficiently contributing towards protecting their millions. We are going through a period when millionaires are numerous; I will give the Government a fair warning: the more the class of millionaires is increasing in any country the more that country's social foundations are shaken, you cannot create a large number of millionaires without impoverishing in a like measure a multitude of individuals. I see in this House the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames); I am quite certain he will not miss this opportunity and that he will rise and strongly protest against this Bill, on behalf of his good friends who have put their signatures to the official protest of the city of Montreal. I do not doubt that he will say to the Government: You are going too far; if State ownership of this railway is in order, you have only to use the power conferred upon you by the enactment of 1914. I will now ask the hon. member for St. Antoine, if the large firm which he is managing were threatened with bankruptcy, would the Government be ready to grant him the same favour they are to-day granting to Messrs Mackenzie and Mann? What is there to prevent another manufacturer from asking the same favour, provided he be as high up as these other gentlemen in the favour of the Government? He may say to the Government: There is only one way to prevent me from losing my millions, for I am on the road to bankruptcy; please be kind enough to take over the industry whose manager I am, and thus allow me to keep the millions I have dishonestly accumulated; in a word, you can well do for me what you have done for a railway system. Would not all the manufacturers have the same right to come and individually ask the nationalization of their undertaking, from a public utility point of view, just as Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann? It is under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, that I will register my protest, in the name of the city of Montreal, in the name of the country workmen, because I say they are the great mass, that they form 80 per cent of the population of the country who shall have to pay the debt which they intend saddling upon the country to-day; and who can assure us that there is not more coming?

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I will not ask you to keep your eye on me, for your official position does not permit you to watch anything but the hand of the clock marking the hours which will take us up to two o'clock that fatal hour of the day which shall follow this one.

I will not ask you to listen to me, because you are impatient, officially, to hear the two strokes of that clock which, like unto the mechanism of a safety vault, will open at two o'clock sharp the doors of the Public Treasury to-morrow morning, and thus allow the smiling Finance Minister to freely enter, the voice of the last keeper of the treasury having then been stifled.

In rising, Mr. Chairman, I have not the least pretension, not even the pretension that any argument I might make would in any way advance our cause. The only pretension I may have is based upon a most mathemathical and mechanical truth, that I will only advance the discussion by twenty minutes and that is all. What proposition is there now before us, Mr. Chairman? A money proposal.

When, in 1913, the closure was imposed upon us, I believed, in my "candeur naïve"—to use the poet's expression—that the Government then in power would only use such a measure under most extraordinary circumstances: when the country's safety would be at stake, when any invasion from any foe whatever, would put the country's security in dire peril. But not at all, Mr. Chairman, for the second time closure is applied, and it is about a money matter. The first time this measure was applied, if my memory serves me right, it was a question of some $35,000,000 which the then government wanted to take from the national chest to make a gift of it to the mother country, England, for a well known, plainly stated object, there was no possible equivocation. The idea was to increase the empire's nava' force, to pay a certain amount to the imperial treasury, for the construction of three dreadnoughts, at an approximative cost of some ten or twelve millions each, if I remember well. We objected to that proposition made by the Government, although the House was perfectly informed as to the nature of this expenditure, of the application of this money, of how it should be employed, and for my part, I never thought, for one moment, that the $35,000,000 which we were to put into the hands of the British Minister of Finance would be wrongfully expended; but we objected to the very principle of the Act, we said—and rightfully so—that if we had $35,000,000 to spend, it were better to spend them for a Canadian navy than to aid the imperial admiralty, and events have justified us.

I will not further refer to that political episode, only to recall what I was saying a moment ago: that it was on a money matter that closure had been imposed upon us.

But to-day, Mr. Chairman, what is the question? To go and take from the public treasury more than $600,000,000, and for what enterprise, for what object, for what people? The enterprise is well known to us; it is the acquisition of the Canadian Northern railway. What are this railway's obligations? What is its financial standing? Nobody knows it. And this assertion of mine although brought in very late in the debate, seems to me to be absolutely justified.

Into whose hands will this money be turned over? If the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) had not denounced these two men as two robbers, two undesirables, two men that should be now put out from the public life in this country, I would not take it upon myself to qualify them as he has done, but I only take up the words as they have fallen from his own lips. Some 40 or 50 millions, at least, shall be paid over to these two gentlemen, if not individually, at least to the company they stand for, Mackenzie and Mann. On this point, the House is perfectly informed and can speak out.

As to the 60 million stock, generally, what information does the hon. Minister of Finance give us? Here is what he told us on August 7, instant, in answer to the question put to him by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). And it is easy to understand that an ordinary member of this House may not be perfectly informed as to the financial standing of this company, but when a Minister of Finance, having the aid of all his colleagues in the cabinet, the aid of a report given by such experts in railway matters as Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth; the aid of the financial experts who have assisted him personally; the aid of his own employees, the officials of his department, and in fine, aided by his long experience which qualifies him, and justly so, as one of the most able financiers whom this country has produced—and I was going to add, not only this country, but any neighbouring country throughout North America—what does he tell us about it? I know nothing at all.

The Hon. Mr. Lemieux, in that sitting of August 7, not three weeks ago, and since then no other information has been given to further enlighten us; thus spoke upon this subject:

[Mr. C. A. Wilson.]

Mr. Lemieux: Might I suggest to the Minister of Finance that it would be well that a list of the shareholders and bondholders be added to the documents which have been printed. I assume the list is not so long that it cannot be easily printed and distributed.

Let us admit that the printing of it would have taken some time, but let us put aside this detail. What was the answer?

Sir Thomas White: I am afraid that would be quite impracticable. The securities of the companies are bonds, debenture stock, which have been issued largely in Great Britain. It would be quite impossible to ascertain the bondholders, because they must be thousands in number as in the case of any corporation in this country. The securities pass from hand to hand, and an owner to-day might not be an owner to-morrow.

What! No list of the shareholders! When it is admitted on the other side of this House that the greatest portion of this capital stock, not to say the totality, is qualified by this well known term in the financial world as being watered stock to which a full value is meant to be given. He goes on:

The Canadian Northern made some short term loans in New York and the same remark would apply to those. I think there is full information in the printed document as to the financial position of the company. The securities outstanding, the amount of the floating loan and other liabilities, are all shown in the statement certified by the auditors of the company.

If there is any other special information that would seem necessary in order that the committee might come to a determination upon the matter, we should, of course, endeavour to obtain it. I do not see what bearing the matter of the owners of the securities has upon the question. The transaction, although one of magnitude, is in reality a very simple one, namely, to acquire the outstanding stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company which controls all the underlying companies. We have pretty full information as to all matters relevant to a consideration of the resolution.

How is it, then, that the statement furnished to my hon. friend seems so plain to him; how is it that he found it impossible to give any further information?

Now, Mr. Chairman, they want to cover this proposal under the expression of "Railway nationalization." I have in my hands a pamphlet, written by Sir Thomas Tait, about railway nationalization and, by following the same argument, it is an easy matter for me to reach the same conclusions he did. He rightfully objects to the Government taking over one railway line alone, for the good reason that the Government will find themselves in the position of making such a strong competition to the other railway companies that competition would become utterly impossible, and the genuine effort of any company absolutely paralyzed. Here is what he says upon the subject, I beg leave to quote only a short extract of that work, dated April, 1917, and entitled, "A solution of the Canadian Railway problem."

I presume the hon. Minister of Finance has read this pamphlet and, if he has done so, he must have found some inspiration in the strong arguments set forth by Sir Thomas Tait in support of his theme.

I am quoting:

> Competition between State owned and operated railways and Company railways is inequitable and unfair to the private investor in the latter. Money for construction and equipment can, generally speaking, be borrowed or obtained by the State on considerable better terms than by companies, and therefore, State railways are not expected or required to earn as large a return on their cost as investors in company railways, especially shareholders look for and should receive. If everything else therefore be equal—an important and improbable proviso—the rates and fares on State railways are liable to be reduced and indeed as a rule are reduced, and train services and other facilities are provided beyond what the traffic and other conditions warrant, and these lower rates and fares and these unjustified facilities must be conceded by competing company railways if they are to obtain their fair share of the traffic.
> In view of the possibility, if not the probability, of the Dominion being compelled to take over the Canadian Northern system and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert with its branch lines, the question arises whether in such event the difficulties and disadvantages of State administration, on the one hand, and the injustice of State competition with private entreprise, on the other hand—both of which will be greatly aggravated and increased should the present State railway system be extended from Winnipeg to the Pacific Coast and throughout our Western Provinces—might not be avoided.

They will perhaps answer me that the Government programme, to-day, is but the completion of the work of a former government who had created the Intercolonial. I do not remember the times when the Intercolonial originated, but, if I rightly remember my history, the construction of that line was one of the conditions of the confederation. The maritime provinces did not want to enter into a confederation with the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and the West, unless their communications were made easier with the central provinces and the Northwest territories. As I have already said, that was one of the fundamental conditions of the confederation compact, and I ask the hon. members of this House—the Minister of Finance, in particular—God knows the miseries of all kinds the Intercolonial has caused to every administration. How can you help applying these words of Sir Thomas Tait, which I have just quoted, to the other railways which the Government want to either take over or buy for their own benefit? The policy inaugurated by the present Government, in pursuance of Bill 125, involves consequences so serious that I might suggest to the Government that this policy is important enough to justify a referendum; just as much as such a consultation would have been justified in the case of conscription. What! We intend taking $600,000,000 from the public treasury; we would have the country to become the administrator of such a big railway system without even consulting it! If the question was the creation of a new line, I would perhaps not denounce this proposal so vigourously; but, in the face of the situation created by the war, I am asking myself whether it is not inexcusable to govern a country without even consulting it upon such an enormous expenditure.

Here is an entirely new policy, and if we have seen fit to consult the people upon a simple question of tariff and of reciprocity, I ask whether, with greater reason, we should not consult them upon a question which increases their budget and their debt by three times what they were at the outbreak of the war.

The people of this country are rightly asking themselves: when will this Government stop, is there no limit to their audacity? The answer is easy, although it is an appalling one. It is that before this Parliament expires the present Government are determined upon absolutely draining the public chest. And now for what ends? Is not the public rumour, which is growing, which is increasing day by day, the exact expression of the actual truth? That is to say, that this measure is merely brought about for electoral purposes, to try and swell the campaign funds and to juggle away a verdict from the people.

Mr. Chairman, a measure of such an importance should, it seems to me, have been introduced at the very beginning of the session, so that it might have been actually sifted and also that its adoption especially might not be imposed by means of the closure.

I see the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) peacefully reading his paper, he who has very simply laid a terrible Bill upon the Table of this House, a Bill to put back the clock one hour a day, and who has seen fit to consult the people in order to know—as the member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has expressed it—at what hour the roosters of the country crowed in the various provinces!

Mr. Chairman, I repeat it, it is an extraordinary measure we are now discussing; but still more extraordinary, on account of the considerable amount of expenditure involved and as to the change of policy which it is intended to inaugurate; for they have but one preoccupation in their minds; to satisfy the appetite of those who, having done a bad business, will retire, not as honest people, free from all liabilities and of all obligations—if the proposal was to send them back home in such a condition, I would in no way object—but with millions in their pockets and with the qualification which was applied to them, in the name of the Government and rightfully too, by the hon. member for Calgary.

Mr. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (translation): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctôt), when speaking this afternoon, stated that he represented the finest county of the province of Quebec. I take exception to this assertion, and I say that the county of Montcalm, which I have the honour to represent, is just as fine as his, if not finer, for it is one of the finest counties of the province of Quebec, and even, one of the finest in the Dominion.

When, in 1913, the question arose for passing this extraordinary Act, not to say worse about it, this gag Act, I have strongly objected to it. At a memorable sitting of the House, I spoke during four hours and a half against it, and it was considered a new record, at the time. I was then told; have no fear, Mr. Member for Montcalm, that gag Act will pass, but we will never apply it, except in cases of extreme urgency, I was afraid of these gentlemen, I had not much confidence in their declarations, and I was not mistaken.

They played a fine trick on us, Mr. Chairman, when they imposed us this gag, for did it not exist to-day I can tell you that we would keep you here long to prevent you from passing this infamous Act, this wretched and miserable Bill which you will adopt presently through your servile majority, who will applaud with both hands your triumph, when the vote is taken. Ah! how proud they will be, how happy they will be to take over a property under such conditions.

The hon. Solicitor General has said: Ah! it's only Montreal that is speaking. Well! let him come to Montreal, the Solicitor General. He will be welcome; he may come to the Monument National and make a big speech in order to explain the Canadian Northern Railway Bill; he may bring along with him the Prime Minister; you will see how well they will be received, for the people down there are most anxious to see both of them. You may try to accompany them, Mr. Chairman, you will be so welcome the three of you, we will give you a splendid night of it, Mr. Chairman; as for us, we will not impose on you the gag. We will let all of you speak, the Prime Minister, the Finance Minister and yourself, as long as you please; you will see how funny it will be.

An hon. MEMBER: Can they speak about conscription?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Yes, they can speak about conscription, if they feel like it, we will give them " carte blanche," a free ride.

When we read the papers, when we hear what is said up hill and down hill and what is going on every where we go; when we listen to the public talk, it is really painful to hear what the people are saying about you, Mr. Chairman; about these gentlemen, I should say, for I do not want to be personal, that will come on later, when the fight has started. For to-day let us remain in the strict limits of legality. When we hear everything that is being said about the present Administration, we can't help wondering if we are living in a civilized country.

Mr. BOULAY: Speak louder.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: If I am not speaking loud enough, draw nearer. I speak loud enough, Mr. Chairman, to perhaps know on what side the gentleman will vote; I do not know, I do not want to blame him now, but I am anxious to see.

When they were told in 1914; do not advance those 45 millions to Mackenzie and Mann, it's money thrown away, then, the hon. gentlemen would say; it's a fine transaction, it's for the country's good, if the Mackenzie and Mann obligations are not paid, are not observed, are not executed, we shall take over the road and that will answer the Government's purpose, it will be to the people's benefit. In vain did we protest against these gentlemen, we did not succeed, the $45,000,000 were advanced, guaranteed, and you can see to-day where we stand, in what a fix we are.

I heard an hon. member sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, a man whom I believed to be sincere and serious, when he stated that Mackenzie and Mann had spent their whole life-time in bribing everybody, in defrauding ever and everywhere. I had thought that this gentleman would vote against the sale of the Canadian Northern, but, after having declared that this was a disgraceful transaction, that these men had spent their life in bribing and defrauding, he has the daring, this hon. member, to rise up and vote in favour of the sale. Well, I believed him to be sincere, I thought he was a business man; I may assure you that he has seriously fallen in my estimation.

When your humble servant now speaking to you, Mr. Chairman, will have said that the owners of this railway have spent their life in corrupting everybody, that they are disgraced, fallen and degraded men, you will not see him rise up to vote for such a transaction; I would have the courage of my opinion, of my convictions and I would not be a party to such a scandal.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Does the hon. member for Montcalm always speak the truth?

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): I might ask if my interlocutor has always spoken the truth.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Would the hon. member read Mgr. Bruchési's letter?

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): I would rather be silent than to gainsay my own bishop, a thing you cannot do; I would rather pass for being in the wrong than to begin a fight against the archbishop of Montreal, and what I have said was relevant, I will let you know that, Sir. And, as to the learned member who has just made such a remark, I would like to know whether he can very well throw me the first stone, for I never did any shuffling, any way.

Mr. Chairman, Mackenzie and Mann are notorious millionaires, and in order to reward them for not having respected their engagements, they were given titles of honour, they were knighted. Isn't that fine! Reward those who don't keep their pledges toward the State and give them the highest titles. Well, the people do not like that. Generally, when men are crowned with such high honours, given titles so lofty as that of Sir, it is on account of honourable conduct, because they have won their bars and received a well-deserved reward, but when I hear the member for Calgary call them thieves, scoundrels, bribers, and declare that these men have passed their lives in bribing everybody, I'd rather not be knighted; under such circumstances, it is an almost worthless and empty honour.

In my province, Mr. Chairman, where I have the honour of practising as Crown Attorney for the twelve past years or so, if a man lies to obtain any thing of even little value, we call that false pretences; such a party is arraigned before the court and, upon conviction, he is sentenced to jail. Here, it is all the reverse. The more values one can get under false pretences, by doing all sorts of criminal acts, the more honours one is sure to receive. What a fine country! What an encouragement for those people who try to be honest!

I was just speaking of millionaires. But, Mr. Chairman, one must make a distinction in this matter. Some men are found who have become millionaires, thanks to their energy, to their labour, their good conduct or their skill in honest transactions. We must admit that there are millionaires of this kind; let us respect those who have made their millions in honest transactions, but not those who accumulate their wealth through fraud and bribery, as stated by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett).

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Will my hon. friend allow me to put him a question?

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): Certainly, most certainly so.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Would my hon. friend kindly tell me when the gentlemen he is alluding to has been knighted?

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): I regret it, but I do not keep an almanac of those things, I wonder why my hon. friend puts me such a question. Is it for curiosity's sake? Informations are generally asked by people who don't know a thing, but such is not the case with my hon. friend, who must know what is going on among his good friends.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Have not these gentlemen been knighted under the late administration?

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): My hon. friend seems to be well informed. The hon. gentlemen who spoke before me have repeatedly reproached the Minister of Finance and his friends with refusing to produce the list of the debenture holders, stating that this had nothing to do with the case. In our province, when a man who is put a question refuses to answer, it is the same as if he pleaded guilty. When men of such a high standing as the Minister of Finance and his colleagues refuse to show the list of the debenture holders, it looks bad, it squints, as we say. When they take the trouble of saying that the total amount is $600,483,280.39; it's the 39 cents that amuses me; thirty-nine cents! How important that is! And we ask them the list of the debenture holders. No, do they answer, that would take too much time, we would have too much trouble in getting it. Well, gentlemen, am I wrong in suspecting there is a snake in the grass? Am I not right in suspecting that we would find in that same list certain names which would compromise some of the Government's friends or of their relatives, such as fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters mothers-in-law, fathers-in-law, brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, uncles, aunts, nephews, nieces or cousins of either sex? Why not give, Mr. Chairman, to the people, represented by the member to your left as by those to your right, the exact list of all those holding such debentures? Because it would be too incriminating to do so. One cannot draw any other conclusion. And if I take the given word of the hon. member for Calgary that these bribers, these bandits have distributed stock right and left, to Peter, Dick and Harry, it is readily conceived that the publication of such a list would perhaps compromise a great number of gentlemen who hold such debentures; but when the people will be called upon to judge the conduct of those who are now in power, there will be no gag. In my county, where we will discuss this question, you will not be there, Mr. Chairman, with your gag. Everyone will speak, and you will not be always watching the clock to call time.

Woe to the members who shall vote this transaction! What says Lord Shaughnessy, not a friend but a political adversary, the most qualified, the most upright, the most honourable and the most competent man on the subject you can find in the whole Dominion? What does the president of the Bank of Montreal tell us, and what do say the managers of all our important industries who have condemned that transaction? Are they not worth as much as the hon. member for Calgary, who is ever ready to cry out against everyone, who has found fault with all our friends and who has just voted to-day in favour of a measure which he had so forcibly denounced?

When I said, in 1913-1914, that that transaction was a disastrous one, I was perfectly right, and when I saw, in those days, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who had the floor after me, speak for two hours, condemn the Government, say all kinds of things against the Government—he spoke two long hours to prevent the $35,000,000 vote—and when I see him, to-day, bestowing praise upon the other side, I say: how much the times have changed, how changing is this gentleman's politics! After having said all he did say against the hon. members to your right, after having supported for so many years the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and then to come back and insult him by calling him the St. John the Baptist's lamb! That man has fallen a great deal in my consideration. Be Conservatives, be Liberals, what you please, but if you do not share my opinion, the opinion of your leader, you have not the right to abuse him, to insult him, as the hon. member for Red Deer has just done.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) has made a remark which I consider too broad. He will allow me to draw attention to what he has said, that gold controls Governments. I do make one exception. Gold has never controlled the late administration, gold has never in any way influenced the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier; gold may perhaps control the present Government, but the late administration came out victorious in all it undertook; it has honorably fallen, and never has any one had occasion to say against Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration that gold or money, favours or honours have ever influenced it.

We have struggled to prevent this grant of $35,000,000, we were unsuccessful. From Monday morn until midnight on Saturday, we slept and ate in the House. That law was voted in the House, after the gag had been imposed upon us; but, fortunately, there was in those days a Liberal Senate, a Senate composed of distinguished and serious men, of whom the majority were Liberals, and the Government could not carry away from the country that sum of $35,000,000. But times have changed; new men have been recently appointed to the Senate where they form the majority. And with these new members, they have succeeded in passing the conscription Act, as they will be successful in having them vote this sale of the Canadian Northern Railway. There is no doubt about it. It is all prepared in advance, the deed is already drawn up, signed and sealed, and if it is not registered, it shall soon be.

Where are these millions to go, where will go the Government millions for that stock which has been declared worthless? We do not know, and the hon. Minister of Finance does not want to tell us.

When something is to be done and there is something to deduct, when people refuse to speak, to play above board, I am afraid of such things, yes, I am afraid of such transactions; I like a man who plays an open hand, I like an administration that has nothing to suppress, that has nothing to conceal, that submits to the House, to the country, all it knows; and the reasons given by the Minister of Finance, in my humble opinion, as the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) who spoke before me, has said, are that the transaction is not genuine, it is not a first-class transaction.

A MEMBER: Time, time.

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): Mr. Chairman, if my time is up, I will immediately take my seat, for I ask favours from no one. Is my time up, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. RAINVILLE (translation): The hon. member has spoken one minute over, but—

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): If my time has expired, I do not want any favour, I withdraw, delighted to bow to you.

Mr. PROULX (Prescott) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss in any way the nationalization policy, neither for or against; such a question is far too important to be intelligently discussed by us during the very limited time allotted us. I will therefore limit my remarks to simply stating that, if the Government must provide, by way of subventions, to the managing and operating expenses of the Canadian Northern company, in the form of security, for instance, it seems to me far more preferable that the Government should take over without any expense, the 60 per cent of the capital stock not now in the hands of the Minister of Finance, by means of the Act of 1914.

To-day the Government propose to buy this 60 per cent of the company's capital stock of a par value of $60,000,000, which, according to the report of the commission appointed last year by the Government—I mean the Smith, Drayton and Acworth commission—is perfectly worthless, and notwithstanding that report made by their own commission, the Government come and ask Parliament the power to submit to arbitration the very value of this capital stock. Have not the members on this side of the House any reason to suspect there is something in the wind and that the Government's object can only be to make a gift to the Canadian Northern company and, more particularly, to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. They are probably expecting from these gentlemen a fat contribution to the electoral funds, seeing the inevitability of a general election. If we look over the history of the Canadian Northern, we can see that almost every year, since 1911, it has been nothing but a case of continuous calls for help, under the shape of gifts, of guarantees or securities, and the editor of Le Devoir was quite right when he said in an editorial —which, be it said by the way, was very ably written—that it was perhaps the greatest robbery perpetuated in Canada during the past few years. For the edification of the House, I will take the liberty of reading an article written by Mr. Henri Bourassa and printed in Le Devoir. I believe this article should be inserted in the official report of the House. The said editorial is dated the 16th instant and it is entitled: "The Canadian Northern Deal."

> In the day of "barbarity," the bandits of high standing and the ordinary highwaymen waited for some moral or physical commotion in the world. Stormy nights favoured the storming of towns and castles. During the days of riot or of revolution, pilfering barons and free-companies made opulent razzias. It was under the cover of storms that the sea pirates and the plunderers of shore wreckage made their richest prizes.
> With the "progress" of our times, the brigands, the real brigands, the high brigands, have remarkably extended their fields of operation. They operate upon entire countries. Thanks to the venality of the press and of parliaments, thanks also to the weakness of the people, they overexcite the popular emotions and take advantage of a moment of general franticness to plunder the nations. And what further proves their immense superiority over the pilferers of old is the fact that, in this game, they only risk other people's hides.
>
> The Canadian Northern deal is really one of the most successful, both by the amplitude of the results and by the fine boldness of the proceedings. After having cleverly heaved up the popular passions through the spectre of conscription, they organize everywhere so-called "win-the-war conventions,' they talk of coalition, of National government, of prolongation and then of immediate dissolution—always, of course, for the safety of the empire, of democracy and of "superior civilization." Then, when Parliament unnerved by the heat and the doubts of the political situation, is no longer in a position to do anything sensibly, they carry the place by storms. The good-natured people, hypnotized by conscription, already entangled in electoral wrangling, is saddled, without uttering a word, with a burden equal to half the war expenditure and double the national debt piled up during a half century before the war.
> Messrs. Drayton and Acworth's report alone is sufficient evidence that, instead of pulling the Canadian Northern managers out of difficulty, the Government should have, long ago, forced them to disgorge and summoned them before the Assize court. This report shows: 1° That the capital stock, shown as being $100,000,000 in the company's books, does not represent one cent in cash; 2° That the profit estimates furnished by the company to Parliament, in 1914, in order to get a $45,000,000 State guarantee, were manifestly false and tampered with; 3° That the estimates subsequently submitted to the inquiry commission, although notably less inflated than those of 1914, were still fallacious and deceptive; 4° That, in one single year, the company has transferred to the capital account of railroad construction more than five millions of interests, thus covering by so much its actual annual deficit.

In ordinary times and performed by ordinary people, on an ordinary scale, such operations are called fraudulent overcapitalization, false statements, embezzlement, extortion or—to speak the barbarous language of our jurisprudence—obtaining money under false pretences. You or I, we would be sent to penitentiary for that. But if accomplished at the State's expense, by a horde of pirates of the higher finance and of still higher politics, they call it national development, pioneering work, etc., etc. It brings in millions and a cart-load of K.C.M.G.'s and other baubles which show the Crown's gratitude towards clever, bold people and profiteers. When, at last, comes the hour for the supreme efforts, for the last millions, everything is set a-going: the Empire, Democracy, "Superior Civilization"—I have already said it a score of times. What can you expect? The vocabulary of those people is not very extensive; it is still one of their powers—and they expropriate the capital of Mackenzie and Mann and of their many associates, a capital the easier to expropriate in that it does not exist!

Of these capital assets, the State already owns forty millions; it is the bundle of dry leaves which Mackenzie and Mann handed over as a gift to the nation, in exchange for the Finance Minister's signature endorsing forty-five millions of their debentures. From this signature, they have already drawn as much as thirty-six millions. The object of the present Bill is to expropriate the balance of the fictitious capital —sixty millions—except what has to be let of it in the hands of some shareholders equally imaginary, in order to preserve to the enterprise the appearance of a "company," instead of making a State department out of it; but the State does nevertheless assume the full responsibility of the company's liabilities, without caring to know whether the property is adequate to the assumed liabilities.

The very fact of admitting the principle of expropriating the capital stock presupposes some value whatever; now, upon this point, the Commission's report is overwhelming. Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, relying upon the company's own figures simply cleared of the grossest frauds, put the enterprise's total cost at $370,000,000. Depending upon Mr. Swain's estimates, they set at $402,000,000 the present value of the property and of the rolling stock. Now, the company's total liabilities—leaving out the capital stock—exceed $400,000,000, of which one hundred millions, at least, are due and payable at short notice. On the other hand, the traffic receipts, in spite of the increased operations for the past two years on account of the war, are not sufficient to cover the running expenses and the interests.

Whatever be the valuation basis adopted—actual cost of construction, present physical value, or productive value—the Canadian Northern, with all its sub-companies, constitute nothing but a gigantic failure; its capital stock, never paid in, is worthless; it is more than doubtful that the company's property is worth the liabilities the State is assuming; it is certain that for a long while hence the receipts will not be adequate to cover the interests.

In any other country, the State, in any other bankruptcy, the principal creditor, would merely proceed with the company's liquidation; and should he be obliged to redeem the property, he could only take it over at its actual value, disencumbered of the liabilities in excess of the realized assets.

If the Government considers that the nation's credit is indirectly engaged by the confidence which its repeated favours may have inspired its other creditors, that care—so little seen when it should keep direct promises—should not go any further than the company's actual liabilities. There is no reason for adding one cent to those excessive liabilities, in order to compensate shareholders who have no right to it, neither moral, legal nor material.

* * * * * * * *

In order to better throw the dogs off the scent, the Minister of Finance has laid before the House a statement of the Canadian Northern's state of affairs on June 30, 1916. This condensed statement can be read a good deal easier than the commission's report which covers almost two hundred pages, bristling with technical details and tables where are spread out myriads of figures. Most members and senators whose vote will decide the question will likely read only this "condensed" statement—and moreover, how many will vote without reading anything, without understanding anything, except the whip's password! Now, this "condensed," very condensed statement very quietly sets out with a false entry of one hundred millions! It places to the account of the concern—"Railway and Equipment at cost to the system"—and without distinction as to the real expenditure, $100,000,000 worth of stock for which Mackenzie and Mann and their multiple associates, apparent or hidden, have never paid one cent! On this point, the declarations of Messrs. Drayton and Acworth are absolutely positive; and Sir Thomas White has not offered the least denial.

The auditing of the capital stock account would be instructive. I remember having seen quite a block of this stock set on the balance-sheet of the estate of a Liberal minister who had been most zealous in helping the multiple enterprises of Mackenzie and Mann. He is dead: may he rest in peace! But there are still enough who are alive, "rouges and bleus," that Parliament will not pry into that, you may be sure of it.

The Minister of Finance, I repeat it, has not dared to oppose the least denial to the formal and oft repeated assertion of the investigating commissioners on that point. He thought it was more clever to discredit the authority of their report and that of Mr. Swain's valuation, by pointing out certain "oversights." Mr. Swain, says he, has not taken into account the value of the company's lands. In the first place, nothing shows that Mr. Swain was called upon to do such work. He even states in his report that the delay granted him did not allow him to accomplish, as he would have liked to, the sole task entrusted to him; the valuation of the railroad and of the company's subsidiary enterprises. In the general settlement of the company's financial situation, the commissioners have not computed, it is true, the value of the company's lands, $19,885,485—according to the administrator's own valuation—but they did take into account the amounts realized upon the mortgages which encumber those same lands: $17,776,514. The margin is not very wide. By estimating that the amount of the mortgages annuls the stated value of the lands, the commissioners may have probably remained on this side of the truth.

Sir Thomas also reproaches the commissioners with having neglected the company's credits, mortgaged upon the lands sold ($7,000,000) and the sums deposited in trust, some proceeding from the land sales ($2,400,000) and the others from State subsidies not yet utilized (about $20,000,000). But as, on the other hand, the commissioners have also neglected to add to the liabilities the $25,000,000 of debentures affecting the catch-penny revenue designed to hide the operation deficits—and the $4,500,000 of unpaid interests, one has only to add up the three debit figures and the two credit figures, to see that the totals cancel one another. The Minister of Finance has merely tried to fool both the House and the public.

When a man of Sir Thomas White's standing has to resort to such juggling processes, the operation must really be indefensible.

I will not delve any further into this maze. One would need the brains and the pen of an expert . I have confined myself to pointing out the main enormities, the most obvious ones for any man of common sense who takes the trouble to study with some attention the report submitted to the Government and to the House. The report itself shows that the ministers have placed their own experts in the impossibility of giving them an exact account of the concern's actual value.

But before leaving off this dry subject—which conceals perhaps the most monstrous of the numerous raids perpetrated to the State's expense since Confederation—I wish to point out a view which more particularly interests the province of Quebec.

Of the company's $439,000,000 actual liabilities which the State is ready to assume, $107,000,000 are presently guaranteed by the province of Ontario and the four Western provinces. British Columbia alone is in it for forty millions. These securities have been given for particular enterprises, of exclusively provincial interest, to-day engulfed in the maelstrom into which the Federal Parliament is preparing to plunge the whole country, for the greatest benefit of the wreckage plunderers who are watching for the wreck. Owing to the company's whole liabilities being assumed by the Federal Government, the province of Quebec, as part of the Confederation, is therefore forced to assume a proportionate share of the $107,000,000 due by the other provinces. That share must be equivalent to twenty or twenty-five millions, at least. It is a repetition, on an enlarged scale to suit the cupidities of the present day, of the iniquitous operation of 1841, when Lower Canada was called upon to pay her portion of the liabilities of Upper Canada, then practically in bankruptcy.

What do Sir Lomer Gouin and his colleagues think of it? However debatable may have been their administration in other respects, their railway policy has been vigilant, even parsimonious. They have protected the provincial treasury against the raids of Mackenzie and Mann and of other bandits of the same stamp. Will they, without any protest, allow the Federal Parliament to make us pay for the extravagances of the other provinces?

The solution which the most elementary equity would impose is that each province remain indebted to the Federal Government for the obligations it has assumed or secured.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to know the name of the paper the hon. gentleman has been reading for the last fifteen minutes.

Mr. PROULX: The paper is Le Devoir of Montreal and the writer is Mr. Henri Bourassa. If the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) understood the article he must admit that the writer must have studied the question very fully.

Some of my colleagues have pointed out that it was a daring injustice towards the province of Quebec to hold her conjointly liable, with the other provinces, for the obligations the latter have assumed towards the Canadian Northern. And this remark is justified, when we find that obligations to the total amount of $107,514,642.27 have been guaranteed by the different provinces, while the province of Quebec did wisely stand aloof.

It has been suggested, the other day, that instead of entrusting an arbitration committee with the estimation of this capital stock, it would be better to submit the matter to the Exchequer court. Last year, when the Government wanted a maximum valuation fixed for the Quebec and Saguenay, the question was laid before the Exchequer court; but, as the latter did not render a decision favourable to the Government and, more particularly, to the member for Montmorency and Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget), the Government did not think it wise to go back to the same sign. Now, they want us to believe that this arbitration will be absolutely fair, for all the interested parties, because Sir William Meredith, the Chief Justice of the province of Ontario, shall be asked to give his decision upon that transaction; when actually, the Government's object is to favour the holders of these 60 per cent of the capital stock, the greatest part of which is in the hands of the promoters of this line. It might perhaps be relevant, at this point, to recall the fact that the latter will also have the choosing of the other commissioner. When the Government have had an important commission to appoint, they have always, like the Ontario Government, resorted to the Chief Justice of the province, Sir William Meredith, may be possessed of a deep legal science, he may thoroughly know the jurisprudence of the country, but when it comes to a railway matter, would not another party, another railroad president, Lord Shaughnessy, for instance be more competent to determine the value of the capital stock of any company whatever, for, in such a case, he must rely upon the present and the future receipts of the company? There are other considerations I would like to offer to this House, but I find myself compelled to omit them, for I am told that my allotted time is up. In the name of my constituents, in the name of the province of Ontario, I strongly protest against this measure, because it is a legal brigandage, because it will cost, from the start the sum of $30,000,000, $40,000,000, even perhaps $50,000,000 and we shall receive capital stock which, according to the Government's commission, represents no value at all.

I was forgetting, Mr. Chairman, that in this House to-night, might overrides right, therefore I will speak no longer on this subject.

Mr. JOSEPH DEMERS (St. John and Iberville) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I will be short. Even if I did not want to be, the House's new regulations would oblige me to, and, moreover, I would be loath to have applied to me the gag which is a repeated violation of one of the fundamental principles of democracy, of freedom of speech.

If I rise now, it is because I feel it is my duty, as a citizen, to protest against one of the most daring acts of the Government, and that means a great deal, when one knows what this Government can dare.

Our finances are in a wretched condition, and we have had an illustration of it in the very high rate of interest for our last loan in the United States. There is nothing surprising about it, when we know that, with a population of 7,000,000 people, Canada has now a debt of $1,600,000,000 which means a $225 per capita debt and, under such conditions, what do the Government propose to us? By this Bill the Government want us to assume an additional indebtedness of $653,000,000, which will raise our public debt to the fabulous amount of $2,250,000. I wonder whether the Government have decided upon putting the country in bankruptcy—just as the Canadian Northern seems to be—unless we have already reached that state and, then, a little more or a little less would not make much difference.

I intend to read the first section, as well as the third section of this Act. I will read them in French, which will probably interest the majority of the members of this House.

The first section deals with the acquisition of stock of the Canadian Northern:

1. His Majesty may acquire the six hundred thousand shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company (par value sixty million dollars), not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths, and for a price to be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided.

The second clause deals with the transfer of stock. The third clause is the one which provides that the Government may pay and settle all the obligations of the Canadian Northern company.

That section reads as follows:

3. (1) So soon as the said five-sixths of the said shares have been transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system, in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, may guarantee payment in whole or in part, and may give the obligations or securities of the Government in connection therewith.

(2) The Canadian Northern Railway Company, and each company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system, shall from time to time do such acts and things, make and issue such agreements, obligations and securities in connection with the payment or settlement or postponement of payment of the said indebtedness as the Minister of Finance may require.

Well now, Mr. Chairman, when we read those sections of the Bill now before us, we can readily come to the conclusion that this Act is, neither more nor less, but a full waiving of the rights which are guaranteed to us by the special Act passed in 1914.

We are asked to acquire shares of a par value of $60,000,000, by arbitration, when, in pursuance of a special Act passed by this Parliament in 1914, we have the right to take them without paying a cent. We are entitled to take over the Canadian Northern Railway company's system, without being obliged to pay a compensation to anybody.

The Act says "acquire by arbitration." We know what may mean an arbitration with Mackenzie and Mann.

We are asked to give our consent to legislation by which we are to expose ourselves to pay millions for stock of an insolvent company. I say insolvent, because that is the construction I put upon the remarks made during this debate, by the Minister of Finance and which I find at page 4394 of Hansard (unrevised edition) sitting of August 7, 1917. This is what the hon. Minister of Finance said:

Sir Thomas White: I hope my hon. friend does not think that the Government is without any intimation from the Canadian Northern that they need aid, and is going out of its way to provide aid, or to take over the system. If the Canadian Northern was able to finance itself this matter would not be before the House; the Canadian Northern would be paying interest upon its underlying securities, would be financing its betterments, paying for its rolling stock, floating all its temporary loans, and not putting in an appearance at Ottawa at all. It is because they find themselves in a position where they cannot go on and where Government aid is imperatively necessary or default must occur, that this measure is before the House.

And it is under such circumstances, when the Minister of Finance is well aware of this Canadian Northern company's financial standing, that the Government now propose a measure by which we bind ourselves or we become liable to pay millions for stock of an insolvent company, in other words for absolutely worthless stock.

It seems to me I am still hearing the argument set forth in this House by certain members opposite who took part in the debate of 1914, when we were discussing the proposal of having the Government guarantee the Canadian Northern company's loan of $45,000,000. They said we were making an advantageous bargain or at least as advantageous as possible under the circumstances. They added that, if the company were unable to meet its obligations, if it made default in paying the principal or interest, then we would take over that railroad. It would become our property; in short, we would summarily take possession of it. That is what we were told in 1914, Mr. Chairman, so as to be convinced of the wisdom of the Government's decision to aid the Canadian Northern company. The hon. gentlemen who spoke most eloquently and most forcibly on the matter, the champion of the Government upon that occasion, was most assuredly the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). Here is what I read on page 3693 of the Hansard of that year:

> Or, if we choose, we can ourselves, by Act of Parliament, legislate that that road is the property of the people of this country and that the interests of all persons whatsoever outside of the people of Canada are eliminated.
> The idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all stockholders parties to this contract, and we say to them: We now and here bind you that should the day of default come, you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever, but you here and now leave the Parliament of this country free from any such question and untrammelled in every way to deal with the property of the Canadian Northern as it may be advised in the interests of the people of this country. That is the summary procedure outlined here for taking over the road.

That was most explicit and, from these remarks of the Solicitor General, who was the Government's chief mouthpiece, when that measure was discussed, we can draw no other conclusion but this one: If the Canadian Northern failed to meet its obligations, we should have the right to take possession of that road without any procedure, and without being obliged to pay an indemnity to any one whomsoever.

We have, therefore, even to-day, the right —which we will eliminate by the present legislation—to take possession of the Canadian Northern without expense, since this railroad, on the Finance Minister's own confession, as shown by the quotation I have just read, is not in a position to meet its obligations. And instead of availing ourselves of the rights given us by the Act of 1914, the Government now propose that we should have an arbitration in order to determine the value of this company's shares and that we should pay the amount fixed by these arbitrators.

I do not pretend, Mr. Chairman, to be a business man, but I cannot however help seeing all the ridicule of this proposition and for nothing in the world, would I have engineered this resolution or even proposed it, for, I emphatically declare it, I would fear that it contained something suspicious or that dishonesty or complicity to plunder the public treasury might be suspected. I am convinced that the impression which will remain in the public mind as to this legislation, must spell disaster to the honour and to the reputation of all those who will have taken a hand in it.

There are three points which make this legislation look suspicious: firstly, its absurdity, the fact of making ourselves liable to pay millions, when we have a bargain by which we have nothing to pay. Secondly, the method resorted to by the Government to have it forcibly adopted, shutting off discussion and applying the rule of the gag, to throttle the members of the House. And, lastly, the fact that such a legislation, the result of which will be to saddle the people with a burden of over a half billion dollars, is to be adopted by a Parliament which is not a representative one, inasmuch as the members now sitting in this House are not the representatives of the people.

For my part, Mr. Chairman, I thought it was my duty to clear my responsibility from this legislation which looks bad. I have felt it my duty to protest on behalf of the people of Canada, being one of the citizens, against this misuse of power by the Government which will evidently result in creating among the public a feeling of distrust towards our parliamentary institutions and of revolt against the autocracy that has reigned here in Ottawa, for the few years past. I have already stated that I would not let myself be gagged and, therefore, I take my seat.

Mr. ARTHUR LACHANCE (Quebec Centre) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I believe it is my duty to strongly protest against the Bill which this House has been discussing for a few days already. In fact, what is there, everything told, in this measure, if not a pure gift of $60,000,000 made to the directly or indirectly interested parties of the Canadian Northern Railway company, the whole of it being to the prejudice of the public treasury? Should there be reasons that can justify such a legislation, they can assuredly not be those which the Borden administration has thus far set forth. As a so-called justification, it brings up two main considerations: one of them, to prevent the receivership or the liquidation of the railroad; the other, to assert the principle of railroad nationalization in Canada.

As a rule, I am in favour of all public service utilities being state-owned or state-operated. Should they be diligently administered, the people would thereby obtain better facilities, and at a more reasonable cost, since they would actually eliminate all profits which would, otherwise, go to either shareholders or promoters.

To support such an assertion we have Canada's own experience with the Intercolonial. All told, that undertaking has given good results; these might have been more convincing to-day, had it not been for that patronage plague which has always absolved a most appreciable portion of the receipts; but there is a remedy to that disadvantage. So that, in spite of such an impediment, we may well assert that this experiment has been most conclusive. That is why I say, speaking in my own name: if the Government's object really were to consecrate the principle of the transportation service, nationalization, it would be well to consider, from that point of view, at least, this Bill with somewhat a better disposition. But the nationalization doctrine, in this case, is simply invoked as a pretense. If the administration really means to attain that end, why not apply the Act of 1914? There you have that nationalization provided for in full terms. The present Government knows it; they have passed the Act of 1914 themselves. It is therein stipulated that, if the Canadian Northern company fails to meet its obligations, the Government shall have, "de plano", the right to take over the whole system without paying a single cent as compensation.

Am I not right, then, when I say that the nationalization now invoked is a subterfuge, that the only object is to find a way to pay those $60,000,000 without being in any way obliged to do it, under the Act of 1914? What will be the effect of this Act upon Canada's financial credit? Upon this point, we have the opinion of business men, notably that of a group of Montreal financiers. In the course of the present debate, a portion of their declarations has already been submitted to the House; resolutions have been read as they had adopted them, the whole bearing upon the Act we are now discussing and to its severe disapproval.

I beg to add a few other statements on their part, none the less to the point, I will quote a newspaper, Le Devoir, of August 16, I believe:

> The manifesto, which was published this morning by a group of financiers, including notable Conservatives such as Messrs. Huntley Drummond, Chaput, Ekers, etc., demonstrates the fact that the uneasiness has reached people the less liable to be carried off. And therein can be found the very reason for the more or less noticeable hostility of the larger English press, to a great extent.
>
> "If it becomes law, it will impose on Canada, at a time when the country is under an unprecedented strain, a burden of unknown magnitude. One certainly greater than any ever before imposed upon this country, with the exception of the war debt."
>
> Mr. Huntley Drummond and his colleagues sum up, in the following formidable sentence, their censure of the Government's attitude: "The smallest transaction in common life could not be concluded in such a way, and any attempt to do it by trustees responsible to a court would unquestionably be a breach of trust, and this is the largest and most onerous undertaking ever contemplated by any Canadian Government, and the most risky."
>
> So much for the criticism of the Canadian Northern transaction, against which Messrs. Drummond, Ekers and their colleagues ask us to protest with our utmost energy. But, there is in this manifesto another fact which should be noticed.
> The signers are not only alarmed by the Canadian Northern deal; they are visibly uneasy on account of the general financial conditions. At the very opening of their letter, they insist that this bold operation is made "at a time when the country is under an unprecedented strain." Further on, to point out the gravity of the moment, they add: "The interest and other charges on Canada due to the war increase every day and even now are so great that it is difficult to say from what source they can be paid without an economic strain never hitherto undergone and a cutting down of expenses not yet even begun." And still a little further: "The credit of the country abroad is at a lower ebb than it has ever been."

Here then do we have, in formal terms, a condemnation of the transaction which the Government intend to put through.

In order to mask their batteries, the Government pretend that, if they thus take over the Canadian Northern, it is to prevent the Canadian Pacific railway from acquiring it and thereby destroying all competition.

If ever there was a puerile argument it is this one, and we find it not only upon the lips of the members to your right, Mr. Chairman, but even upon those of the ministers. But what do they think of the Board of Railway Commissioners? Have they not a jurisdiction and an almost unlimited authority to protect the people against the extortions of public utility companies? Even supposing the case that one railway company should absorb all the others, could not the commissioners safeguard the people against one company as well as against several different ones? Therefore, to resort to such a defence is simply to admit that you have none at all.

Let us now see the second main reason offered by the Government for introducing this measure. They thereby want, so they say, to prevent the Canadian Northern from going into the receiver's hands. I cannot understand why the fact of the railway going into receivership should alarm to such an extent certain members of this House. It is either one of two things, either the receiver might set back the concern running again or he would be forced to sell it. In either case, the interested mortgagees, shareholders, debenture holders, etc., no longer depending solely as in the past upon the Government to retrieve their losses, would do everything possible to remedy the situation. And, moreover, railroad enterprises are like to any other one, those who make unfortunate investments have our sympathies, but in virtue of what principle should the Government be obliged to indemnify them? Do they indemnify those who lose in other lines of business? Did they help, for instance, the depositors of the Jacques-Cartier bank, of the Bank of St. Johns, of the Farmers' Bank? No; however, the interested parties were largely brave workingmen who had, by a daily labour of ten or fifteen hours, saved a few hundred dollars. Did they not deserve, to say the least, as much sympathy as Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, millionaires, multi-millionaires having stock invested in both Americas?

Let us now take up the second alternative, the case where the receiver would be forced to a liquidation. He sells by auction; then, the purchaser would see to it, that the railroad be as efficient as possible so that it may return proportionate profits, not only as compared with the purchase price, but according to the line's earning power. And if there were no purchaser? Then, the Government might conveniently intervene and use their right of action under the Act of 1914. Lastly, should the Government, in that case, as to-day, refuse to avail themselves of their rights, they might buy as any other would-be purchaser, at auction.

But, it is said, the Government would run the risk of losing the $30,000,000 worth of the company's stock which they already held. Perhaps so, but would it not be a lesser disaster than to acquire 60 million more of worthless stock, for which those who are now advocating this measure would not give, I presume, fifty thousand dollars in the ordinary run of business.

Such are the remarks I intended submitting to the House. The situation is hazy; we can readily see, in the background several banks, several corporations, trusts of all denominations, in restless activity, lying in wait for this money.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. LACHANCE (translation): Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Would my hon. friend rather see the Government advancing, this year, a sum of fifteen or twenty million dollars in order to meet the needs of the Canadian Northern?

Would my hon. friend, who does not approve the measure now before the House, be disposed to recommend that the Government grant a sum, let us say of $25,000,000, or would the hon. member be disposed to do what the Government did three years ago? My hon. friend understands the question.

Mr. LACHANCE (translation): I may reply to the hon. minister that the question is a very simple one in our opinion, it is that we have here an Act, and if the Government pretend they want the nationalization——

Several MEMBERS: Order, order! Vote, Vote. Your time is up.

Mr. LACHANCE (translation): I will therefore tell the hon. minister that I have laid down, at the very opening of my remarks, the principle upon which I intended to give my observations. I say that the Government have it now in their power to answer the question he has just put to me, without spending a single cent——

Several MEMBERS: Order, order! Vote, vote. Your time is up.

Mr. RAINVILLE (Chairman): The hon. member having been interrupted by the hon. minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny), it is only proper that the hon. member should have time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. LACHANCE: I was then saying, Mr. Chairman, to conclude my remarks that for me the situation is rather foggy; we do see, in the background, large financial institutions, we do see banks, big capitalists, investment associations and trusts of every denomination, all restlessly active and lying in wait for these millions; but, it is unfortunate that the Government did not want to assist in disentangling the occult ramifications of all this transaction and in letting the public know who will receive this money first, and who will get it later. Nevertheless, there remains an undeniable, self-evident fact: it is that the Government are going to pay $60,000,000, when, under the Act of 1914 they would not have to give one single cent.

Therefore under such circumstances, I believe it is my duty to vote against the proposed Act.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: It is two o'clock. The question is on clause 1. Shall clause 1 be carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Section agreed to on division; yeas 63, nays 36.

On section 2—Transfer of shares:

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 be adopted?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take the vote.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare section 2 carried on the same division.

On section 3—After transfer Canadian Northern Railway Company may be assisted:

The CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment to this section. All the words after "Fund" on line 4 are struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Provided, however, that until authorized by Parliament the total of such advances shall not exceed the sum of $25,000,000. A report of any such advances showing in detail the purposes for which they were applied shall be presented to Parliament by the Minister of Finance within twenty days after the opening of the next ensuing session thereof.

The question is on the amendment. Shall this amendment be adopted?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I rise to a point of order. Was there any notification of the gag in respect to this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: That is not a point of order. The amendment formed part of the clause. I declare the amendment carried, and the section as amended carried, on the same division.

On section 4—Appointment of arbitrators:

The CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment to this section. The words "and may apply to their own judgment in determining such value" in line 24 are struck out, and all the words after the word "Fund" in line 37 are struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In determining the value of the said six hundred thousand shares the arbitrators, should they regard it as expedient to take into consideration the reproduction cost of the Canadian Northern Railway system, shall not include therein the increase in value, due to the war, of labour, materials, equipment or of any property.

I declare the amendment carried and the section as amended carried, on the same division. Shall the title of the Bill be adopted?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried on the same division.

Bill reported and amendments read the first and second time and concurred in.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 2.12 a.m. (Wednesday).

Wednesday, August 29, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

MINISTER OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. FORTIER:

1. Has the Minister of Customs a private car?
2. If so, when did he obtain it?

Mr. REID:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

MANITOBA COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has a proclamation been issued under the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, calling together the County Court Judges of Manitoba to define and establish polling districts in that province?

2. If so, what is the date of such proclamation?

3. On what date do the said judges meet?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. By statute, they are required to meet between the 1st of July and the 15th of August in each year.

DR. ALFRED THOMPSON, M.P.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is Dr. Alfred Thompson, M.P., a member of, or employed by, the Military Hospitals Commission?

2. If so, what is the date of his appointment, and what salary and allowance is paid to him?

3. What is the total amount received by him since the date of his appointment?

4. If not so employed, what position does he hold, when was he appointed, what is his salary and allowance, and what is the total amount of each paid to him to date?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes. Employed by the Military Hospitals Commission.

2. 15th April, 1916. Pay and allowances, $7.50 per diem.

3. $3.547.50 to 31st July, 1917.

4. Answered by No. 1.

THE 122nd BATTALION, C.E.F.

Mr. WEBSTER:

1. Who was the officer commanding the 122nd Battalion, Canadian Expeditionary Force?

2. What amounts were paid to such officers up to date of sailing overseas, for pay and allowance, travelling and other expenses, and separation allowance, respectively?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Lieutenant Colonel D. M. Grant.

2. Pay and allowances, $3,737.25; travelling expenses, etc., $14; separation allowance, $1,140.

FIREARMS IN QUEBEC CITY HARDWARE STORES.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Is the Government aware that on the 23rd instant a press despatch was sent out to the effect that all local hardware dealers in the city of Quebec who keep in stock revolvers, rifles and ammunition, had been ordered by the Federal authorities to immediately report on the number of firearms and the quantities of ammunition in store?

2. Did such despatch correctly describe action that has been taken by, or on behalf of, the Government?

3. If so, have hardware dealers elsewhere than in the city or province of Quebec been asked for a similar report?

4. If they have not been so asked, why the discrimination?

Mr. MEIGHEN:

1 and 2. No.

3 and 4. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.

RELEASE OF THOMAS KELLY.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents addressed to the Minister of Justice concerning the release from penitentiary of Thomas Kelly, contractor of Winnipeg, sentenced by Judge Prendergast to two and a half years in the penitentiary for obtaining money, approximating $1,000,000, in connection with the construction of the Manitoba Parliament Buildings.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): In accordance with a well established practice it will be quite impossible to consent to the production of the papers as they are asked for here. From time immemorial, at all events since the enactment of the Ticket-of-leave Act, it has been the rule to treat documents of this nature as confidential. I shall be very glad to bring down all the documents that are usually brought down in such a case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will leave it to the minister to bring down what documents he thinks can be produced.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. A. K. Maclean.—For a return showing copies of all accounts, memoranda, vouchers, telegrams, letters, etc., in reference to payments to George H. Boyce, of Windsor, N.S., District Foreman of Public Works Department, since his appointment to office.

Mr. J. J. Hughes.—For a return showing the amount paid the James Simmonds Company, Ltd., Halifax, since 1911, by the various departments of the Government.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR BOARD OF SELECTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): It is provided by subsection 3 of section 6 of the Military Service Act that each local tribunal shall consist of two members, one member to be appointed by a Board of Selection to be established by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons, and the other member to be appointed by the authority indicated in the same section. As was stated in the early discussion of that Bill, it is thought desirable that one half the members of the Board of Selection should be named by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The number proposed, as to which I am quite willing to receive suggestions, is: 4 for Ontario, 4 for Quebec, 2 for each of the other seven provinces, and 2 for the Yukon, making a total of 24 members for the Board of Selection. We cannot very well appoint a smaller number than two for any province, or even for the Yukon, because I desire that my right hon. friend should have the opportunity of naming one half of the members of the board. If my right hon. friend would be good enough to give me his recommendations, I should be glad to adopt them.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER having risen to speak, he was interrupted by a message from the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

A message was delivered by Lieut.-Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate:

And having returned,

The Speaker informed the House that the Honourable Lyman Poore Duff, Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, had been pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

An Act for the relief of Rozilla Lamb.

An Act for the relief of John Newton Salter.

An Act to incorporate The North American Accident Insurance Company.

An Act to amend The Fisheries: Act, 1914.

An Act to amend The Saint John and Quebec Railway Act, 1916.

An Act to amend the Interest Act.

An Act for the relief of William Henry Bishop.

An Act to incorporate The Canadian Division of the Aerial League of the British Empire.

An Act respecting a certain Convention between His Majesty and the United States of America for the protection of Migratory Birds in Canada and the United States.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Exchequer Court Act.

Bill 83, An Act relating to The Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research.

Bill E2, An Act to incorporate Canadian Good Roads Association.

An Act respecting The Montreal Central Terminal Company.

An Act to incorporate The English Valley and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

An Act to amend the Boards of Trade Act.

An Act to assist Returned Soldiers in settling upon the Land and to increase Agricultural production.

An Act to incorporate The Cascade Scenic Railway Company.

An Act respecting The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.

An Act to amend The Customs Act.

An Act respecting Military Service.

An Act to amend the Criminal Code (respecting jurors).

An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

RECOMMENDATION FOR BOARD OF SELECTION.

The business of the House, interrupted by the messenger from the Deputy of the Governor General, was resumed.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When I was interrupted by the messenger from the Senate, I was just about asking my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) if he would kindly repeat the numbers from each province on the board which he proposed should be appointed by the House of Commons.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What I had in mind was to appoint a board of 24 members, of whom 4 should be selected from the province of Ontario, 4 from the province of Quebec, 2 from each of the other seven provinces and 2 from the Yukon, making 24 altogether. As to the number, I have an open mind. That is what I would suggest. I desire to have half of them in each province and in the Yukon appointed upon the nomination or recommendation of my right hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The House will not be surprised if I say at once that I find myself in rather a delicate position. It is not in accordance with constitutional usage that a member should assist in any organization in connection with a measure of which he does not approve. The House knows the position I have taken on this Bill. I do not approve of it. At the same time I would say that upon this side of the House, as everybody knows, my opinion is not entertained by all the members of the Opposition. There are members on this
