side of the House who approve of my policy and there are others who do not approve of it. But the Bill is of such importance that I consider that, whether we approve or do not approve of the measure, it having now become law with the sanction of His Excellency the Governor General, it behooves us all as British subjects to see that it is carried out as harmoniously as possible. Under such circumstances I deem it my duty to accept the invitation of my right hon. friend. It will be my duty to consult on this side of the House both those who approve and those who do not approve of the Bill, and I shall communicate the result to my right hon. friend as soon as possible.

HIGH COST OF LIVING—ALLEGED PROFIT ON FLOUR.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: A few days ago my right hon. friend the Prime Minister mentioned that on account of the increased cost of living, it was the intention of the Government immediately after prorogation to take up the question of granting an increased percentage to soldiers as pensions. In this morning's Citizen I observe on the first page an item to this effect:

> Port Arthur, Ont., Aug. 28.—Speaking before the Fort William Board of Trade, N. M. Patterson, prominent grain man and elevator operator, made the statement that the milling companies were getting about five dollars' profit on every barrel of flour.

We hear a good deal these days about the food controller making regulations, delivering speeches, attending public functions—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MURPHY: I purpose asking a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is pursuing a very devious road to arrive at his question.

Mr. MURPHY: I have finished my travels and I am going to ask my question. I desire to know, in view of this circumstance, whether the Government has made any arrangement with the food controller or whether that gentleman himself is going to take action to reduce prices.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The food controller already has taken action along several lines. I have no doubt that his attention will be directed to the item to which my hon. friend refers and that he will take whatever action may be deemed advisable in regard to it.

Mr. MURPHY: He has not done anything that I have heard of to reduce prices.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. KNOWLES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On Saturday last I advocated the principle that members of the Board of Railway Commissioners should not accept personal favours from railway companies. Referring to this, the Toronto Telegram of yesterday has some observations, and I desire to correct the false impression that may be created by them. On page 2 of the editorial column I find the following:

> About the only word of size and usefulness in the many utterances of Mr. Knowles was a well-timed protest against the iniquity of permitting Canada's Railway Commissioners to travel in private cars as the guests of the railways. The chairman of the Dominion Railway Commission travels in a private car.

The impression created by that editorial would be to associate the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners with my remarks. I have never heard that he has accepted any personal favours from railway companies, and I had no reference to him whatever personally. I was referring to the general principle without making any reference to the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners. A perusal of my remarks in Hansard will show them to be quite consistent with the explanation I give now.

COAL SUPPLY IN THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John): Has the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) any further statement to make in regard to arrangements for transportation of anthracite coal from the mines to the ports of St. John and Halifax? The season is rapidly passing, winter will soon be upon us, and I know the matter is one of very great interest to the people of St. John. The prices of coal are very high, indeed, reaching $15 per ton, and if anything is going to be done it should be done right off.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN: I have no further statement to make at the present moment to the House. The matter was taken up for consideration between the fuel controller, the deputy minister of Marine and Fisheries and representatives of the coal interests of the Maritime Provinces at a meeting which was held at the city of Montreal a few days ago, the day previous to my making a statement on the subject in the House. On the day that I made the statement I gave instructions to the deputy minister to the effect that I was prepared, if the coal dealers could get the coal, to authorize the requisitioning of schooners to bring coal to Maritime Province ports, such as St. John, Halifax, Charlottetown and other ports at rates that would be very considerably less than the rates which are now being charged. Six dollars per ton to St. John and $7 per ton to Charlottetown are the rates, I understand, that are being charged by the schooners at the present time. I do not know how much further the people interested in the coal trade and the fuel controller have got with the matter. I have no further statement to make to the House to-day.

PURCHASE OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. B. COPP: In view of the statement made by the hon. the Finance Minister the other day with regard to $50,000,000 being asked by the Government for the purchase of agricultural supplies, including hay, for the Imperial Government, I would like to know if arrangements have been made for the purchase of hay, and if so, where it is to be purchased and how?

Mr. BURRELL: The Imperial Government is not purchasing hay at the present time.

THE MILITARY VOTERS' ACT, 1917.

DEBATE ON MOTION FOR THE THIRD READING ADJOURNED.

On the motion of Mr. Doherty for the Third Reading of Bill 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have already had a good many inquiries from men at the front for copies of this Bill. More than the usual number of copies will undoubtedly be required.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I quite appreciate that. It will be necessary that a very large number should be supplied. It is most important that the people of the country generally, as well as the men at the front, should know its provisions.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the Minister of Justice explain succinctly the amendment relating to soldiers who come from the United States? There is a distinction; some will vote in the constituency of their origin or where they last resided in Canada. If the minister would explain, in two words, the meaning of this amendment it would be an advantage as there are many inquiries about it.

Mr. McKENZIE: In connection with the officers who will be appointed in England for the carrying out of the terms of this Bill, I wish to point out to the minister that, in an election trial in 1914, certain men in Nova Scotia were found guilty of bribery by one of the judges of the Supreme Court. Some of those men, who were disqualified by the judge and whose names will be found in the decision, a copy of which I shall furnish to the minister privately, have since been made officers and are members of the force in Great Britain. It would be most improper that these men should have any connection with the holding of the election, and I would suggest that no man should be appointed to any office in connection with the carrying out of this Bill who has been found guilty of corrupt practices by a judge of the Supreme Court.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that it might be better to postpone this order for to-day? We were not prepared for it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend is perfectly right. I had heard that there was an intimation from the other side of the House that there was an objection to the Bill being taken up to-day. It was taken up under a misapprehension, and I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

CONCURRENCE.

House in concurrence on certain resolutions reported from the Committee of Supply.

Item 99. Railways and Canals—Chargeable to Capital. Hudson Bay Railway—Construction of railway, terminals and elevator, $3,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Here is an item of $3,000,000 for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. Notwithstanding the importance of that road in the development of our western country, I doubt very much whether in these war times it is desirable to continue this very large expenditure. I have read the report of the commissioners who were appointed to inquire into the whole question of the railways of Canada, and I notice that, in reviewing the situation, they report very strongly that the expenditure for the Hudson Bay railway should be reduced to the lowest possible limit. I think the Government should take that recommendation into consideration. The financial situation of Canada is growing worse every day. The Finance Minister has already informed the House that the very last loan which he negotiated cost this country upwards of eight per cent per annum, which, even only a few months ago, was considered a very large rate for a private individual to pay. The Government are to-day confronted with the fact that we cannot go into the money market of either the United States or Canada, and borrow at less than eight per cent. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that this resolution ought not to be concurred in, but that it should be sent back to the Committee of Supply for the purpose of considering whether this very large sum of money for the Hudson Bay railway should be expended. The matter is of very great importance, and this is only one item out of many. The Government is spending very large amounts of money and does not seem to realize the financial condition which confronts Canada to-day. We are spending money in connection with works at various times which might well be permitted to stand over. There is no immediate necessity in these war times for continuing the work so rapidly on the Hudson Bay railway. Before the road can be of any advantage, and before it can carry on the work of shipment of grain and cattle from the Northwest there will have to be an expenditure amounting to probably twenty or twenty-five million dollars in connection with the terminals of the railway; and there will have to be steamship lines, and wharf and other accommodations, all of which can very well wait until the war is over. I ask my hon. friend whether he should ask concurrence of the House in these resolutions, or whether he should not send the matter back to the Committee of Supply and have this item greatly reduced.

Mr. NESBITT: I was not in the House when this item was passed in Supply, and I rise to endorse what the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has said. I think it is a great pity to spend $3,000,000 on the Hudson Bay Railway this year. I am quite sure the Minister of Finance realizes what the country is up against, in the way of expenditure, if nobody else does, as the hon. minister has to find the money for these expenditures. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is quite right in drawing attention to the recent loan Canada has made. The rate of interest is very high. I believe the rate is as good as can be obtained, perhaps, but, at the same time, it makes us realize the condition we are confronting. This expenditure, in my judgment, is absolutely unnecessary, particularly in view of the fact that we are now taking over, practically speaking, a transcontinental road which will be owned by the Government, if not entirely operated under their supervision. This road to Hudson Bay is completed to a certain extent, I suppose. I think it is a great pity the minister did not take the rails from this road, instead of obtaining them from some other roads, and send them to France when rails were required. I appeal to the Government to save this expenditure this year, if possible. We have to make provision for all the absolutely necessary expenditures and should not go into one that is absolutely unnecessary. I do not think any human being can show any reason why it is necessary at the present time, nor, so far as we can see, for the future. If we had the means, and were not at war, there would not be so much said against it. Still, it is always wrong to spend money unnecessarily, and, in my judgment, this expenditure is particularly wrong. I hope, even though this item has been passed in Committee of Supply, that the minister will see his way to referring it back to the committee and striking out as much of it as he possibly can.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is impossible for me to do as the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) wants me to do in this respect. Last fall we made a contract for the building of a very large bridge across the Nelson river, and that bridge is under construction at the present time, and it will take another month, perhaps, to finish, before we will be able to pull out. We do not propose to go on with the works down at Nelson any further, and we will let them stand. But we must have a portion of this money, in order to pay for what we have undertaken.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What portion is required for the bridge this year?

Mr. COCHRANE: About $350,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is only a tenth of the vote.

Mr. COCHRANE: That does not matter. We do not need to spend it, even if we pass it.

Mr. MACDONALD: The answer which is continually given the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, when a reduction of expenditure is suggested, is that the Government do not need to spend the money simply because it is voted. If they do not need to spend the money, they do not need to vote it. That seems to be a very ready answer to that argument. When the Minister of Finance talks to the people of this country about economy in their personal expenditure, one sits aghast when he observes the reckless manner in which the country is rushing into debt and extravagant expenditure, and into taxation which will become of a most serious character day by day, on account of the necessary obligations incurred in the conduct of the war. In view of the manner in which my hon. friend has dealt with these matters, he cannot expect the people to listen to his appeals for the exercise of economy. We are asked by the Government to vote a total estimated expenditure of $254,014,-238.29, of which the statutory expenditure amounts to $74,000,000, in round figures. The item for interest on public debt amounts to $57,720,000. The country has been asked to respond to the special impositions made upon them, on the ground, forsooth, they are necessary for the war. Instead of coming to Parliament and saying: Give us this money; if we do not need to expend it, we do not have to, my hon. friend himself should give the people a lead by practising economy. In his public financing my hon. friend disregards the very first essentials of economy. For instance, take the ridiculous votes for the Quebec and Saguenay for the purpose of carrying out private arrangements with private parties; the unnecessary expenditures for the extension of railways, which hon. gentlemen know cannot possibly be made use of until the war is over; votes for telephone expenditures in British Columbia intended for election purposes. When hon. gentlemen talk about patriotism and economy and at the same time practise the very reverse, they can hardly expect the people of the country to take them seriously. The matter to which the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) referred is an illustration. Even if the Hudson Bay railway were completed to-morrow, it would be absolutely impossible to get a single vessel to go to Hudson bay for years to come. The transportation services of the country have been so impaired that ordinary products cannot be transported across the ocean; in the Maritime Provinces we cannot get coal from Boston: Gentlemen who live in the centre of Canada, who have the advantage of transportation by rail, have no idea of the conditions that prevail in connection with marine and transportation, particularly in the Maritime Provinces. The expenditure referred to by the member for St. John would, therefore, be absolutely nugatory for years to come, even if the Hudson Bay railway were soon completed to Port Nelson.

The people submit willingly to taxation that is necessary for the purpose of maintaining our part in the war, but they object to giving out of their incomes and out of their profits money that is diverted by the Government to unnecessary works that could well be postponed until these larger problems are settled. I pointed out the other day, when dealing with this question, the debt which rests upon Canada—a debt which is the result of the attitude taken by hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to railway and other problems. That debt now amounts to $2,000,000,000, with another quarter of a billion in addition, upon which interest has to be paid. Is there to be no end to this riot of expenditure and extravagance? When the war is over, is our financial condition to be such that no man will venture to come to this land of hope and promise because of the tremendous burden placed upon the country by the reckless mismanagement of this Government during the last five years? If the men who come to Canada must pay an impost greater than that which he would have to pay in almost every other country, greater than which he would have to pay in any other part of North America, what is the use of hon. gentlemen prattling about the flow of immigration to Canada? If present conditions continue, we cannot look forward with any degree of confidence to Canada's re-establishing herself when the war is over. When the Government are asked why they do not implement their promises to the people, they say: Oh, we do not want to spend the money; yet when they are given the right to spend money, they do spend it. The Government should say to the country: we will not ask a single dollar from the people; we will not ask Parliament to vote a single cent, unless the money is absolutely essential for the carrying on of the affairs of the country. The moment they go beyond that, the moment they take upon themselves the power to use money that is not absolutely necessary for the carrying on of the country's affairs, that moment they become extravagant; that moment they become criminally responsible for the financial position which is rapidly coming upon Canada. To-day there is only one financial market in the world to which Canada can go for financial aid. To that country the Finance Minister has gone for money and has been compelled to make a loan at a rate of interest and subject to charges greater than ever before. We are making a daily expenditure of $850,000 on the war, and when the Minister of Finance goes to the United States for another loan the bankers to whom he submits his claim for credit will not be insensible of the financial position of this country and of the record of the Finance Minister in respect of expenditures both ordinary and special. He will not be able to get another loan on the terms upon which he got the last one; he will have to pay more interest, more commission, more deductions than those which obtained in respect of the last one.

Hon. gentlemen are not honest with the people of this country when, after imposing taxation for the purposes of the war, they divert the money to building unnecessary works like the Hudson Bay Railway, or give it to Sir Rodolphe Forget in connection with the Quebec and Saguenay Railway, or spend it on some of these other items in the Estimates which are of a very extravagant and unnecessary character. If the House agrees to the proposal submitted by the Minister of Railways and votes $3,667,745 for the Quebec and Saguenay Railway, will the Minister of Finance deny that every dollar of that amount was taken from the pockets of the people of this country under the guise of taxation which was necessary to carry on the war? What possible right has this or any other government to divert money obtained from the people for war purposes, to an unnecessary work such as the one I have mentioned, or the one to which my hon. friend from St. John referred? Of what use is it to appeal to the patriotism of our people when they see that the money that has been taken from them under the guise of being necessary for war purposes is being absolutely diverted without any justification whatever to these various items involving expenditures which are absolutely unnecessary, and which in a great many cases show a reckless disregard of conditions in this country at the present time. Is there any limit to hypocrisy in this country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: What do my hon. friends mean by saying "hear, hear"?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: You will find out in a few minutes.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister smiles, but I defy him to deny that the money he is giving to Sir Rodolphe Forget was obtained from the people of this country under the guise of war taxation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reason hon. gentlemen on this side of the House said "hear, hear," was because we agreed with the hon. member that there was no limit to hypocrisy.

Mr. MACDONALD: The statement I have just made in connection with the Quebec and Saguenay railway—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The motion before the Chair is that a resolution of Friday, July 13, shall be concurred in. That resolution contains no reference to the Quebec and Saguenay railway, and therefore it is not in order for the hon. member to discuss that matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am sure, Sir, that on reflection you will not say that I have not the right to present reasons why it is not in the interests of this country that this motion should be concurred in, in view of the present financial condition of the country and the demands which have been made upon the treasury in connection with the Quebec and Saguenay railway and other matters.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is, of course, competent for the hon. member to refer to the Quebec and Saguenay railway by way of illustration, but he should not enter into a discussion on it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have not done so. I was simply referring to it in connection with other items in the Estimates, to show that the Government were improperly diverting money that had been obtained under the guise of war taxation, and I said they had no right to do that. That is why I asked, is there a limit to hypocrisy? Hon. gentlemen opposite who talk about winning the war and bearing the burdens of it, raise money from the people of this country ostensibly to carry on the war, and then hand it out to political favourites. Day by day the people of this country are realizing more clearly that the money that was obtained from them for war purposes is being diverted to works which could very well wait until after the war. My hon. friend will tell us that certain works must be carried on during the war. The Minister of Railways says that he has made a contract for building a bridge, and the Minister of Finance and other hon. ministers will have equally specious reasons why the other items should be concurred in. Look, for instance, at the items for the Public Works Department on pages 15 and 16 of the Supplementary Estimates. Does the Minister of Finance mean to say that it will help win the war if those items are voted? Does he mean to say that this Government have any right to divert to these items the money that was obtained for war purposes? My hon. friend knows the financial condition of this country at the present time. He has complained publicly of the burden that has been placed upon him, as Minister of Finance, in dealing with these questions. We all know that his task is a serious one. It may be that my hon. friend does not sit tightly enough upon the treasury of this country. He is perhaps too ready to yield to the solicitations and other methods adopted by his colleagues when they desire expenditures to be made. I think my hon. friend's serious appreciation of the financial condition of this country—and he must have a serious appreciation of it because he knows the facts—is sometimes weakened by the importunities of the hon. gentlemen who are associated with him. But if that is so, it is no excuse or justification whatever for the minister. There should be no expenditures in this country whatever except upon works that are absolutely essential. Not a dollar should be spent on works involving commitments for the future. As my hon. friend beside me has pointed out, the contract for the bridge referred to by the Minister of Railways was let last year, during war time, with a full knowledge of our financial conditions.

What is the condition to-day in this country? The munition workers are being laid off. One of the greatest sources of revenue that the Minister of Finance has, namely, the customs, is being struck off because of the lessened demand for the raw materials and machines necessary in the production of munitions, and on which duty would have to be paid to the treasury. The plain people of this country, who have this source of income stopped, are nevertheless compelled to submit to the various forms of taxation imposed upon them by hon. gentlemen opposite. Does my hon. friend mean to say that under those circumstances the money of the people should be used for any other purpose except to maintain ordinary conditions in this country? My hon. friend must get down to that basis, for that is the only proper basis in these times. To say that, notwithstanding the financial condition of the country, we should vote large sums of money to hon. gentlemen and leave them to decide whether the money shall be spent or not, is absolutely improper. If an item in the Estimates cannot be absolutely justified as being necessary at the moment, it should not be voted by Parliament, but should be struck out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The conduct of the Government, so far as commissions are concerned, reminds me of that famous saying of a great orator during the French Revolution: that the Revolution was not unlike Saturn devouring his own children. The Minister of Finance, the watchdog of the treasury, is improperly diverting the revenues of this country at a tremendous rate. Look at the number of commissions that have been appointed by this Government to investigate almost every subject. The latest important commission to be appointed was the Drayton-Acworth-Smith Commission. And the Government ignores its conclusions. The Government appointed the best men in Canada, the United States and Great Britain, to investigate the railway situation here. I find in the report of this commission—the Drayton-Acworth report—quite an instructive statement in regard to the Hudson Bay railway, which we are now discussing. At page 82 they say:

> We understand that construction work on the Hudson Bay line has been suspended. We think that the work should not in any case be recommenced till more urgent needs have been met and money is more easily procurable. And if work on the line is begun again, we think it should be done in the most economical manner possible, and only up to the standard of a local line, bearing in mind that it cannot be expected for many years to come to be self-supporting. Considering the small advantage in rail mileage from the grain-growing areas, which the Hudson Bay possesses over the existing routes to Port Arthur, and that from many districts it possesses no advantage at all; considering further the short and uncertain period of navigation in the bay, and that grain consigned to Port Nelson will consequently always be liable to be detained there for nine months till navigation is again opened; considering that higher ocean freights may be expected to absorb, if not more than absorb, any possible saving in rail rates, we cannot believe that this route will ever secure any serious share in the export trade. Still less can we think that it will handle an important business. Unless considerable mineral wealth should be discovered in the territory which this line will open up, it must, we fear, continue to be almost indefinitely a burden upon the people of Canada. And everything that can be done should be done to make this burden as small as possible.

At the end of their recommendations, I find the following words:

We recommend that future expenditures on the Hudson Bay Railway be reduced to the lowest possible amount.

I am surprised to find in the Estimates such a large item as $3,000,000 for the railway terminals and elevator at Hudson bay. I know the answer of the Minister of Finance will be that the railway was started under the regime which preceded his, but that is not an answer; it is a poor excuse. We must not forget that we are at war, and that the bulk of the expenditures are voted, or should be voted, for war purposes. When I see such a large item as $3,000,000 for an enterprise which is looked upon by the royal commission appointed by the Government as a burden on which but a minimum should be expended, I consider the Government is reckless and should not be given an opportunity of spending the money in this way, when it is so much needed elsewhere. When war was declared, the right hon. leader of the Opposition uttered some words of wisdom which should have been of benefit to the Government. Speaking in the House of Commons, he said:

I submit with all deference to the judgment of the free people that economy and retrenchment, not more taxation and more expenditure, is the proper policy under present conditions.

One has only to look at the bulky Estimates which have been laid on the table of the House session after session to come to the conclusion that the Government is absolutely money-blind, so far as concerns the question of expenditure. The words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he sat in Opposition, are still ringing in our ears. In those days, when Mr. Fielding, our very able Minister of Finance under the Laurier Government, would come with Supplementary Estimates ranging from $1,000,000 to $3,000,000, there was a storm of protest from the Opposition benches, led by my hon. friend (Sir George Foster). This year, when we have been bled white by all kinds of taxation measures in order to meet the war contingencies, the Government comes first with Estimates far above those which have been heretofore presented to the House, and then, during the last days of the session, they come with Supplementary Estimates of more than $50,000,000. I say it is scandalous conduct on the part of the Minister of Finance; he has no regard for the taxpayers of this country.

I know one thing: if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) had his own will, had his own say, in this matter he would cut out this $3,000,000 for the Hudson Bay railway and this other item of $3,000,000 for the Quebec and Saguenay railway. We know the hon. gentleman. We all admit, Mr. Speaker, that he has given a fair administration of the Intercolonial railway to the people of Canada. He has been able to resist his own friends on the other side of the House in their attempts to raid the treasury. But, Sir, the Minister of Finance has been dabbling in millions and millions. He belongs to the Toronto school, the school of Sir Byron Walker, of Sir Joseph Flavelle, and others. They are accustomed to dabble in millions and millions, and while my hon. friend has transferred his activities to the Dominion, he continues their methods. He is money blind. He does not seem to know the value of money. Hundreds of millions of dollars are to him what a few dollars are to humble mortals like you, Mr. Speaker. and myself. Let us remember the words of his leader, who was then in opposition. In 1911, when the hon. gentleman joined the merry-go-round of the Tory party, his leader, speaking in Toronto, used the following words:

The increase in what is known as ordinary controllable expenditure of from $36,000,000 in 1896 to $79,000,000 in 1910 is proof of extravagance beyond any possible defence and establishes a prima facie case of corruption.

This was published in the manifesto of the leader of the Opposition in 1911. The increase referred to by the then leader of the Opposition was at the rate of $4,000,000 a year. What, then, is there to be said of an increase of from $98,000,000, in 1911-12, to $135,000,000 in 1914-15, or at the rate of over $12,000,000 a year? If there was corruption with an increase in expenditure of $4,000,000 a year, surely there is extra corruption in an expenditure which has increased at the rate of $12,000,000 a year. The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who was very vitriolic in his denunciations of the Liberal Administration, used the following words in 1908. Speaking on the Budget debate of that year, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> The rapid pace which has been set and the recklessness of the expenditures that have been undertaken have uprooted all the old rules and all the old lines in reference to expenditure. Whither are we rushing?

I am surprised that the eloquent voice of my right hon. friend has never been raised even when trade and commerce was seriously on the decline, against the expenditures which for recklessness made the highest mark set by the Liberals look like expenditures of a certain provincial government. The hon. the Minister of Finance has repeated in my presence the statement that this Government was ready to spend the last dollar to win this war. I thought that it was only a figure of rhetoric, but looking at the Main and Supplementary Estimates, considering the huge expenditures and considering the transaction which was put through the committee stage yesterday and which was to come up for third reading to-day as well as the legislation that is yet to come, I am under the impression, indeed I do believe, the hon. gentleman is literally bound to spend the very last dollar there is in Canada. It is the opinion of the people who have some regard for economy, who have some regard for other people's money, that the Minister of Finance is absolutely reckless and that this Government deserves severe condemnation for its unwarranted expenditures.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Chairman, while I am quite ready to agree with a great deal that has been said by my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Lemieux), and other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the House, there are certain facts in connection with this Hudson Bay enterprise that, although they have already been discussed, it is necessary to repeat on this occasion so that there shall not be any misunderstanding with regard to the project. As I pointed out on a previous occasion, this particular Hudson Bay enterprise stands in a somewhat different position from a number of other projects that have been compared to it. There is no relation whatever between the Hudson Bay enterprise and the Quebec and Saguenay purchase. The Hudson Bay railway enterprise was inaugurated as a practical matter, I think, in 1910—that is more that seven years ago—and it has been in process of being carried forward ever since as a matter of Government policy to which both parties were committed. As far as I know, it has not been made the subject of adverse public criticism in its administration or execution up to the present time. That is not the position at all with regard to the Quebec and Saguenay enterprise, which I am not discussing at the moment but which had its inception before the House a year ago. One great difference between these two cases is that the Hudson Bay railway enterprise was started and was well under way before war conditions occurred. The Quebec and Saguenay enterprise was entered upon long after war conditions had occurred. Therefore, the two matters are not at all in the same class. I recall some criticism of the Hudson Bay enterprise, made, I think, by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). One of his criticisms was that owing to the shortage of shipping it would not be possible to make effective use of the Hudson Bay Railway terminal as it was not possible to adequately supply the present ports of Canada with shipping.

There is another feature of this case, however, that I think is worthy of some attention. Canada has practically only two ocean ports. It has three ocean ports, but for the purpose of my argument the two winter ports are as one. It is possible to blockade the ports of Canada as they stand at present with a minimum of difficulty. There is no other country in the world which depends for its ocean outlet on only one port, and that port under such conditions as to line of travel, as Canada in the case of the port of Montreal. The smallest possible naval effort could blockade Canada's trade during the summer months, and only a little greater expenditure of naval effort could blockade Canada's winter trade from the ports of Halifax and St. John. I submit that under those circumstances it is important to this Dominion of Canada, especially in time of war, that we should have another Atlantic port so situated as not to be subject to blockade by the naval forces that could blockade our present Atlantic ports. There is no doubt that the sea route from the Hudson Bay port is so different and is under such different conditions from the ports of Montreal and Halifax that it offers, in some measure, a means of safety for the traffic of Canada in time of war during the period that the route is open. That is well worthy the consideration of the Government of Canada and well worthy of expenditure in order to make the route available for trade.

I have said before, and I am quite willing to agree now, that if, since the outbreak of the war, it had been the policy of Canada to restrict all public works expenditures with a view of concentrating her financial strength in carrying the burden of the war, it would have been quite proper, and I do not think there is a man in Western Canada who would not have agreed that all work on the Hudson Bay railway, although even at that time a very considerable expenditure had been made and considerable progress had occurred, should be abandoned. But that was not the policy of the Government of that day and it was not the policy of Parliament; expenditures on an enormous scale were going on in various parts of the country, and the Hudson Bay railroad was dealt with as were other enterprises, and progress, while it may have been slackened, was not stopped. We must all take some measure of the responsibility for that condition. We can all agree now that it was unfortunate in the interests of the country that that attitude was preserved by the country. But it was preserved and progress has continued on that work as it has on other great works then in hand, with the result that to-day the Hudson Bay road of 425 miles is completed with the exception of 90 miles, and on that 90 miles, I understand, the grading has been done. I submit that under those circumstances it would be a misfortune if, after having completed nearly 350 miles of this railroad, including the two great bridges across the Nelson river which are very costly, and having completed the grading to Hudson bay, and having also spent $5,000,000 in port development, we should now stop work for the sake of the cost of laying the rails on that 90 miles of already graded track. I understand that the rails are already purchased. Therefore there seems to me to be no possible reason why the work should not be continued to completion until the rails reach the bay, at which time the expenditures made on the port will be available for use.

I shall, of course, have to agree that under present conditions and with the shortage of shipping even to meet the needs of the present Atlantic ports, we cannot expect that the completion of the railway to Port Nelson will give us the traffic by way of Hudson bay that we expected when we entered upon the enterprise and what we would have if shipping conditions were normal, as we hope they will be some day in the future. To that extent the arguments of my hon. friends are good. But let me deal with this other phase of the matter. There are 90 miles of track to be laid in order to bring the waters of Hudson bay into close touch with the prairie West. There is no question that there are possibilities of development in Hudson bay, in the matter of fisheries and of mineral development along the shores of the bay, so great that it would be in my mind a crime against Canada if, being within a step of the possibility of realizing on those resources at this particular time, we should fail to take that step which is merely, as I understand it, laying the rails on the 90 miles of graded track. This is a feature of the case of which I think everybody should take cognizance. We could not afford to build 425 miles of railway for the purpose of reaching the resources of the Hudson bay. It would never do to build that road as a local road. But, being within 90 miles of completion, we would be falling very short of our duty if we did not complete it so as to have the advantage of those local resources; the advantage of the road as a local road. But, further than that, not until the rails reach the bay can the practicability, the advantages and the disadvantages of the ocean route be absolutely demonstrated. When we are within a step of being in a position to demonstrate these advantages, I think it would be a great crime not to take that step and secure the completion of the road to the bay.

Mr. MORPHY: Has the hon. gentleman any faith in the practical utility of the road as an outlet for the products of the prairie West, apart altogether from the resources of Hudson Bay?

Mr. OLIVER: That is hardly a practical question before the House at the present time. The Parliament of Canada decided years ago that it was, or would be, a practical outlet for the products of the prairie West. Both sides of the House agreed to that. I maintain that, having agreed to that policy, and having carried construction as far as we have carried it, it is not worth while arguing on that point. We came to a certain conclusion, and acted on it, and being within a short distance of the bay now, it will pay us to complete that small portion of the road as a local developer. It is not really to the point to argue back again on the merits of the original scheme; but, to answer my hon. friend directly, I say that ever since I studied the question—and I may say I studied it very many years ago and always kept in touch with it—I have always had the greatest possible faith in the advantage of the opening of the Hudson Bay route, to bring the products of the West in closer and cheaper touch with the markets of the world. At the present time, as in past years, anywhere from one-third to one-half of the great wheat product of the prairie West finds its outlet to the European market by way of United States routes and ports. That proportion has been increasing rather than decreasing in recent years. Port Nelson is as close to the centre of the wheat fields, and to everything that lies west of that centre as is Port Arthur, and Port Nelson is as close to Liverpool as is Montreal. These being the facts, surely it is the business of every patriotic Canadian to try to secure for our own country the traffic in our own products. If there were no other reason for the development of the Hudson Bay route, a reason would be found in the fact that our present transportation and port facilities in Canada are not able to hold for us the transportation control of our own products. Under present conditions half of the products of the West find their way to the European markets through the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Because of insufficient elevator accommodation at certain places.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not saying what the cause is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Because of lack of Government elevators.

Mr. OLIVER: I agree with the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I will go as far as the hon. gentleman does in accusing the Government of all the crimes in the calendar.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Any more?

Mr. OLIVER: And then some. They have not provided the elevators, which I think they should have provided at the ports of St. John and Quebec, and thus more fully employing the railroads running to these ports. I quite agree with him in that, but I am taking the facts as they are, and those facts are that half our grain goes out via the United States. We are not able, under present conditions, to retain the transportation of our own traffic in our own products. The Hudson Bay route would give us a fair and reasonable opportunity to retain a large proportion of that traffic in our own grain, and for that reason, it seems to me that, under ordinary circumstances, and in normal times, the Dominion of Canada was well warranted in deciding to incur the obligation to construct the Hudson Bay railway.

I have not been arguing upon that question, except as it was raised by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy); I have been arguing on the question in its immediate and present conditions, and it is under those conditions I would be compelled to support the Government in taking such measures as are necessary to get those rails laid to the waters of the Hudson bay—having come within such a short distance, and there being such a comparatively small expenditure to be made to achieve that end. I would have agreed to drop the expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway at the beginning of the war, if that had been the policy of the country, and the Government, but when it was not their policy, I certainly, as a western man, feel like insisting very strongly that the Hudson Bay railway should receive the same consideration as all the other great enterprises upon which the country had entered previous to the war. After having agreed, as we did last night, to an expenditure of upwards of $60,000,000 for the relief of the Bank of Commerce, I think it is not a time when we can quibble or quarrel——

Mr. CURRIE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) insists, I do not wish to convey for a moment the idea that that would be all the expenditure that would be involved, for I have no doubt several hundred millions will be ultimately involved, but last night we specifically agreed to pay out of the depleted treasury of Canada, under war conditions, subject to an award of arbitrators, a sum of $60,000,000 for the relief of the Bank of Commerce, and, under these circumstances, I submit that the subject of the completing of the Hudson Bay railway is not a matter of such comparative magnitude as to entitle the enterprise to be dropped.

Resolution concurred in.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to call attention to the fact that the debate which has taken place is out of order. I only raise the question because I do not desire a precedent to be established. The debate was upon the question of concurrence, and not upon the motion that the report of the committee be received. Under rule 17 (A) the debate is out of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The question raised is one of very great importance as affecting the procedure of the House, and it is one I am sure we would all like to have settled if possible, with a view to having a change made in the rules. I think the Minister of Finance is technically correct, that under Rule 17 (A) we cannot debate concurrence in the form in which it appears on the Order Paper.

It is clear, however, that we can debate the receiving of the report of the Committee of Supply, which is the same thing. But this is where the mistake is made: on the Order Paper the words should be not merely "Receiving report of Committee of Supply," but "Receiving and concurring in report of Committee of Supply." If the order is not entered on the Order Paper in that way, there is no item on the Order Paper for concurrence. Rule 40 requires that two days' notice shall be given for leave to present a Bill, resolution or address. This is a resolution, presented by the Minister of Finance, that the report of the Committee of Supply be concurred in. Except with the unanimous consent of the House, he cannot make that motion without giving two days' notice.

Mr. SPEAKER: This point has been under my consideration since the order was called, but unfortunately I have no precedent to guide me, inasmuch as the point of order has not been raised since the rule was passed in the year 1913. I am compelled, therefore, to give my own interpretation of the rule.

With respect to the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance, Rule 17 A provides that the following motions shall be debatable: (1) Motions heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings (except adjournment motions); (2) and every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day; (3) for concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee; (4) for the previous question; (5) for the third reading of a Bill; (6) for the adjournment of the House under Rule 39 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance; (7) for the adoption in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, of the resolution, clause, section, preamble or title under consideration.

The motion now before the Chair is that the resolution be read the second time and concurred in. It does not come within any one of the motions which are debatable. I am therefore of the opinion that the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance is well taken and that the motion is not properly debatable. I did not feel it advisable to raise the point myself without having given it very mature consideration.

With respect to the point of order raised by the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) under the provisions of Rule 40, I am inclined to think that he is in error, inasmuch as the notice for receiving the report of the Committee of Supply has been on the Order Paper for many weeks. I think that that answers the requirement that notice shall be given.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The notice on the Order Paper is simply that the report of the committee be received. The motion that the report be concurred in is supposed to be moved by the Minister of Finance.

On the order being called:

Receiving the report of resolutions adopted by the Committee of Supply on July 14, 1917.

Mr. PUGSLEY: According to Your Honour's ruling, if we wish to debate any subject connected with these resolutions we must do so on the motion that the report be received. But we cannot tell what the report of the committee is until it is read; therefore I respectfully submit that the report should be read before the motion is put; that it be read the first time and concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: The items of the resolution are within the knowledge of hon. members; they are entered in the Votes and Proceedings. A copy of the resolution itself is available to any hon. gentleman who wishes to discuss the matter. It would not seem to me to be putting matters in their proper sequence to give the contents of the resolution before the motion is put. Does the hon. member desire that I should put the formal motion?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not want to press a technical point, but there are some items of Supply which I wish to discuss. There are a great many different resolutions, and unless I know which one is referred to I cannot very well discuss it upon the motion for receiving the report. Perhaps it would be satisfactory if I got a copy of the resolution; I could find it in the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member has in mind some particular item that he wishes to discuss, I prefer that he should not now press me for a ruling on the point. It is my impression that there is no record since Confederation of a motion having been made in the House for receiving of the report of the Committee of Supply. The subject is one of great importance, and I do not wish to be called upon to making a ruling without being able to give the matter very mature consideration. If the hon. gentleman has in mind any particular item that he wishes to discuss, he can obtain particulars concerning it by examining the items to be concurred in.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We might take the same course, simply for to-day, as was taken in regard to the Hudson Bay item, without establishing any precedent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am entirely agreeable to that proceeding by consent. I raised the question only because I did not desire that the precedent should be established.

Resolutions read the second time and concurred in.

Public works chargeable to income—Dredging.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before this item is concurred in, I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that there are large amounts for dredging. I would like to point out that the dredging work in Courtenay Bay in the harbour of St. John has been entirely stopped for a great many months, and all the expectations that were held out about five years ago by my hon. friend have not been realized. The people in my constituency are very desirous of knowing why the work is not being proceeded with. Without going into detail in the matter, I would like to ask my hon. friend if he would give me the name of the official to whom I could make application for information on this most important matter. I would also like to know what is the amount of deposit the Government has from the contractors. When I was minister I required a deposit of $500,000. I have been told this has been reduced by one-half. I would like to know, as well, whether the contractors have been released from their contract, and whether or not the deposit is still in the hands of the Government. Am I to understand that the Minister of Customs is acting Minister of Public Works?

Mr. REID: The Prime Minister has asked me to act for the Public Works Department in the meantime. In the supplementary Estimates there are a large number of items for the Public Works Department, and my hon. friend will have all the information he requires in connection with this matter when we take up the Public Works Estimates in committee. I would suggest that the item be allowed to pass. The hon. gentleman will have no objection to this, because there is an item covering that work in the Supplementary Estimates.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister say that one of the items is intended for this purpose? If I were assured of that, I would have less hesitation in acceding to the request of my hon. friend. The fact that nothing has been done, and that rumour states the contractors have been allowed to withdraw their deposit of more than half a million dollars and abandon the work.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is that not what the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) was suggesting should be done—stop all works?

Mr. PUGSLEY: And return the deposits?

Mr. REID: My hon. friend is wrong in reference to the deposit. The deposit was not given just offhand. As far as I can remember, the deposit was not returned to the contractor. I do not wish it to be understood that this statement is absolutely correct, because it may be subject to revision when I look into the matter again, but the situation as I remember it was this: There were claims of parties for work, and the deposit was used, or is being used, or will be used, to pay off legitimate claims, after investigation, of parties employed on the work. I do not think the deposit would pay them all. I have not had much to do with it; therefore, I cannot remember whether that statement is really accurate. I may have to change it when I get the whole facts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister will inquire into it and get the facts?

Mr. REID: It is very difficult for me to speak as to the facts, because it is not in my department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a matter of very great importance. I have been told that the deposit has been withdrawn and that a great many claims are left unsettled. That deposit ought to be held as security. If the minister will give me the assurance that he will get that information, I will not detain these Estimates further.

Mr. REID: I will give the assurance that I will get full information on every one of these items.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am very glad to know that the minister is acting as Minister of Public Works, because, on the occasion of the banquet that I refer to, he told the people of St. John that Pugsley's ideas were all too small, and that if they wanted more money for St. John harbour all they had to do was to go to the Minister of Customs.

Mr. REID: That was before the war.

Item concurred in.

Dominion public buildings—rents, $700,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he will not look into the question of the rents which are paid out in the city of Ottawa for public buildings. It does seem to me to be extraordinary that, with all the public buildings which are owned by the Government for the accommodation of its employees, the Dominion should be paying rents running up to in the vicinity of half a million dollars—I am not quite sure whether they exceed that or not—for private buildings in the city of Ottawa.

I am told there are men here who make a business of acquiring land and erecting office buildings on it for the purpose of renting them to the Government, and others who rent buildings and then sublet them to the Government, middlemen who do the renting of the Government. Since this Government came into office the rents have become enormous beyond all reason, and that in spite of the fact that the Government has, within the last three or four years, expropriated all that property facing upon Vittoria and Wellington streets, running for half a mile, and containing upwards of one hundred splendid buildings, where many officials could be accommodated. Still the Government are paying out in the vicinity of a half million dollars a year for rent. I brought this matter up on Supply, but received little satisfaction. I would ask the minister to go into the question very carefully, as there is no reason why these enormous rents should be paid in Ottawa.

Mr. REID: I went into the question of the use of the Wellington street buildings very thoroughly when acting for the late Minister of Public Works a year or two ago, and asked the deputy minister to make a report of all buildings in that district that could be used for Government offices.

Mr. PUGSLEY: About one hundred of them, are there not?

Mr. REID: A good many, probably one hundred. I gave instructions to the deputy, which were concurred in by the minister on his return, to see that these buildings were, so far as possible, used for office purposes as required by different departments. I believed that this would effect a great saving. The deputy minister agreed with me and at once had the buildings put in repair, so that they would be suitable for office use. He informs me that practically all the buildings suitable for offices are now occupied by the departments. He prepared a statement showing the total feet capacity of the buildings and the total now occupied by the Government, and that information, together with all information about the St. John works, I shall have when we are again on the Public Works Estimates. The hon. member will then find that we are carrying out the policy which he advocates.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the total rental, about one-half million?

Mr. REID: Yes, it is a very large amount. That will all be shown in the statement. Since the war the number of officials in some departments has so increased that much more space is required.

Item concurred in.

Resolution agreed to.

Special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, $2,500.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) asked a question when this item was before the committee, and the Prime Minister promised to give some information. The item has reference to a reduction by one-half of the allowance formerly made to the Chief Justice for travelling expenses.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Deputy Governor General.

Mr. MURPHY: The question was whether the amount had been cut in two, and the information was to be given to the committee before the item was finally adopted. Has the hon. gentleman obtained the information?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I have no information about it. The hon. gentleman might raise the question when the supplementary estimates are under consideration.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) raised the question, and the Prime Minister said he would obtain an answer.

Item concurred in.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Department of Customs—to provide for the promotion of ten clerks, from third division, subdivision A, to second division, subdivision B, and for the appointment of three additional clerks in second division, subdivision B, as follows:—9 at $1,200, 1 at $1,150, 3 at $1,000, in lieu of ten clerks in third division, subdivision A, already voted in the main estimates—further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. REID: Under the provisions of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1917, there are ten clerks who become eligible for promotion from the third division, subdivision A, to the second division, subdivision B, of the Inside Service. It is proposed to promote these clerks to the second division, subdivision B, from April 1, 1917. In order to do this it is necessary that these clerkships be provided for in the Estimates in the higher division. It is also proposed to provide three additional clerkships in the second division, subdivision B, at the minimum salary. These extra clerks have been employed temporarily and continued since April, 1916, owing to the increase in the work of the department. The names of the clerks to be promoted are as follows: nine at $1,200—F. M. Bradley, Miss F. M. Burt, R. L. Byron, Colquhoun Fergusson, J. F. Lessard, B. A. Neville, H. A. O'Doherty, A. O. Rocque, Miss B. F. Sixsmith; one at $1,150—Miss K. M. Cherry.

Mr. McKENZIE: This item is to provide for the promotion of ten clerks from the third division, subdivision A, to the second division, subdivision B. That, I suppose, is done under the Civil Service Act. Should not the lump sum of money voted in the general Estimates or the main Estimates for the Inside Civil Service provide for this? Before the main Estimates are prepared each department should know what moneys it will require in respect of promotions during the year. Is there not sufficient machinery in the Civil Service Act to provide for these promotions without my hon. friend's coming here year after year, sometimes twice a year, for special votes for special promotions?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. REID: We voted a total amount for the Inside Service. The Civil Service Act gives the permanent employees in the Inside Service an annual increase of $50 per annum until they attain the maximum of their class.

Mr. McKENZIE: All that we are dealing with now is the Inside Service.

Mr. REID: Yes. The increase that the officials are entitled to under the Civil Service Act is added to their salaries, and in that way we arrive at the amount we require for the Inside Service during the year.

Mr. McKENZIE: But this is a special vote.

Mr. REID: This vote is on account of the Civil Service Amendment Act of June, 1917. Section 3 of that Act says:

Sections twenty-nine and thirty and subsection one of section thirty-two of the said Act are repealed, and the following are substituted therefor:

29. In the second division the minimum and maximum salaries shall be as follows:
In subdivision A, $1,600 to $2,100;
In subdivision B, $1,000 to $1,600.

30. In the third division the minimum and maximum salaries shall be as follows:
In subdivision A, $1,000 to $1,300;
In subdivision B, $600 to $1,000.

We have, therefore, by legislation this session increased the maximum and minimum salaries of these different divisions, and we have to provide for that. Subsection 3 of section 2 of the Civil Service Amendment Act provides:

Any person in the Civil Service who was placed in the third division under the provisions of this Act and who had theretofore passed the qualifying examination or had been appointed under the authority of sections thirty-seven or forty of the Civil Service Act, chapter sixteen of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, may be promoted from the third division to the second division by the Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the head of the department, based upon the report in writing of the deputy head.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this amount of $3,000 required to carry out the provisions of the amendment this session to the Civil Service Act?

Mr. REID: Yes, that is the object.

Mr. McKENZIE: It will not be necessary in future to come here for a special vote for these salaries?

Mr. REID: No. The officials, for instance, whose names I have just read will get their increase next year without my having to ask for a special vote.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there anything in this vote for the temporary help the minister spoke of?

Mr. REID: We are appointing permanently, when this vote is passed, three officers who have been assisting us temporarily.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are they being appointed in conformity with the Act? Have they passed the examination?

Mr. REID: Oh, yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Does every one who has reached the maximum in his class and has passed the qualifying examination get his promotion?

Mr. REID: Yes, every one of them.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act—further amount required, $300,000.

Mr. REID: I have received very many complaints from the officials of the Outside Service in regard to the salaries they are receiving. Owing to the high cost of living the salaries in many cases are much lower than I think they should be, but I cannot grant increases without a vote, and I have asked the Finance Minister to place this amount in the Estimates to provide for an increase for these officials. This vote provides for the salaries of approximately 3,000 officers, many of whom are receiving less than $1,000 yearly salary. In view of the increased cost of living, owing to the war, it is desired to grant a general increase to these officers. It is estimated that this further amount of $300,000 will be required as the present appropriation is insufficient for this purpose. The commissioner and I went into this matter, and we felt that the least we could give was an increase of $100, which accounts for the item of $300,000.

Salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of ports and of other officers on inspection and preventive service, including salaries and expenses in connection with the Board of Customs—Further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. REID: This vote provides for the salaries of approximately 230 officers, many of whom are receiving small salaries. In view of the increased cost of living owing to the war, it is desired to grant a general increase to these officers. It is estimated that this amount of $50,000 will be required, as the present appropriation is insufficient for this purpose. The high cost of living is affecting very many of the officials very seriously. The commissioner and I have provided for increases to those getting the smallest salaries, to the full amount of the vote last year. We can do no more until a further vote is passed, and I can assure the House that if this vote is passed we will see that it goes as far as possible towards assisting those drawing the smaller salaries.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite agree that a good many men in the outside offices are getting very low salaries, which they have difficulty in living on at the present time. How much of an increase would the minister give to a man drawing, say, from $850 to $1,200? Will these salary increases be distributed regardless of party politics? Complaint is heard sometimes that the older officers who have been in the service for some time do not get their increase the same as the others.

Mr. REID: In the Outside Service there is no stated statutory annual increase, but a maximum is fixed. The policy that was followed by my predecessor and by myself is this: The commissioner and the officials of the department make a list of what they think all of the officials in every office in the Dominion are entitled to, and then submit it to the minister for approval, and it is only in an exceptional case that the minister interferes. As far as I am concerned, I do not think that the hon. member could cite many cases of political interference. I think you will find that in cases where such interference is alleged, there is some reason why the increase was not granted.

Mr. NESBITT: I did not accuse the minister of that, but I said I understood that complaint had been made.

Mr. REID: There are many cases like this: A man may be appointed as a landing waiter in the city where my hon. friend lives, at a salary of $850 or $900, and another man working alongside of him may be getting the same salary Often you will see a man has been increased probably $50, and the man beside him has not had any increase, but you will find in every case that the man who has not received an increase is getting $300 or $400 a year extra.

Mr. NESBITT: What does the minister mean by "extra?"

Mr. REID: Overtime. The regular hours of the customs office in my hon. friend's city are from nine to four, for which the officers are paid probably $900 a year each.

If the landing waiter, for instance, is doing work at a railway station, he may have to go out at any hour. If there are several of them they take it in turns, one starting at seven o'clock in the morning and remaining on duty until four o'clock in the afternoon. From seven o'clock until nine o'clock in the morning he counts as overtime, and the same thing applies from four o'clock in the afternoon until six. Take the case of a man on duty at a river port, such as my own town, or Brockville; the officers there are on duty until twelve o'clock at night, on account of the ferries. They get thirty cents an hour overtime.

Mr. ROSS: The minister must have figured out the increase to be granted to each office. He speaks of an average of $100 for each office. What is the largest increase given under this arrangement, and what is the smallest?

Mr. REID: I have to depend a great deal on the officials to decide as to the increases. One hundred dollars is the average. There will be very few who will get more than that, because it is our desire to give increases to as many as possible. In some cases where the men were getting $750 we gave them an increase of $150. We want to give a little more to the men who are getting the smaller salaries.

Mr. ROSS: There is a customs officer at Glencoe, one at Strathroy, and one at Park Hill, in the county of Middlesex. Can the minister tell me what salaries these men will get under this arrangement?

Mr. REID: I could not say offhand. What I am doing in this case is what I did before; the commissioner, the assistant commissioner, and the inspectors at Ottawa take up the whole list, and when they reach Glencoe, for instance, they will see what the staff there is getting, and will decide as to what increases should be granted, taking into consideration present salary, length of service, and so on.

Mr. ROSS: My reason for asking is that the minister said the increases were being granted on account of the high cost of living. I hope he will recognize the fact that it is costing more to live in the county of Middlesex than it has in the past, and that consequently all these men should get something. Can the minister tell me the largest increase that will be given to any officer? Who is going to get the plum?

Mr. REID: The smallest increase is $50, and there are no great plums.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. ROSS: What is the largest increase?

Mr. REID: I should say $200.

Mr. ROSS: Who will get that, or where will it be?

Mr. REID: I do not know where it will be. Of course, an increase of $100 a year in Glencoe would probably be of a great deal more benefit than the same amount in a large city. I think $200 would be the outside limit of any increase, and there would be only very few instances in which this amount will be given.

Mr. ROSS: What is the salary of the present custom house officer in Park Hill, and what was the salary of his predecessor?

Mr. REID: I could not say offhand. If my hon. friend wishes, I will send him a statement of it to-morrow. The officer at Park Hill was appointed within the last six or eight months, I believe. If I remember rightly, this officer filled two positions, postmaster and sub-collector of customs. We separated the two offices because we found that the official filling two positions could not do satisfactory work in either.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister might well anticipate questions on an item of this character. I have no intention of spreading my inquiry very widely, but I would like to ask about the towns in my vicinity, which may be, perhaps, a fair sample of what is taking place in other towns and cities. Can the minister tell me the number of officers in the customs house in the city of Sydney; the salary each is receiving; if their salaries are to be increased; and how much they will get under this arrangement?

Mr. REID: I am sorry, I could not give my hon. friend that information to-night. I have asked the commissioner to prepare a full statement showing the proposed increases, and to be fair to every person from one end of the Dominion to the other. That statement has not been submitted to me yet. If my hon. friend would like me to give him further information along the lines he has suggested, or to show him how we are dividing up this vote, I have not the slightest objection to do so

Of course, when increases are granted, we shall have complaints from some who say that they have not received the advance they expected or from others who have not received any increase at all. If, in dividing up this amount, there are cases that we have overlooked, we will take them up and where any mistake has been made we will correct it. If the hon. gentleman would like further information I have no objection to allowing the item to stand. I think that on the whole the way in which the amount has been divided up has been pretty satisfactory.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister is going to allow the item to stand, perhaps I might state the information I want. I would like the names of all officers either directly or indirectly connected with the customs house staff in Sydney, the salary that each is receiving now and the increase that he will receive. I want the same kind of information with respect to North Sydney, Sydney Mines, Baddeck, Glace Bay and Louisburg, so that I may be enabled to see if they have all been treated fairly.

Mr. KYTE: Are these increases to be shared in by all officials of the department in the Outside Service in all the provinces?

Mr. REID: I do not think that I could say that every officer will get an increase. There are many places where men are getting pretty fair salaries.

Mr. KYTE: Will it be shared in by those who are getting salaries under $1,000?

Mr. REID: I think it would practically cover all of these men. In every province increases are granted. But there are men with salaries of, say, $850 or $900 and making $300 or $400 of overtime, while others in smaller towns have salaries of $800 or $900 with no overtime. Three hundred thousand dollars will not allow of a very large increase to any person and there may be some cases where an increase cannot be granted to men who are getting $1,200 or $1,300. But I am willing to go into the case of any locality with any member of this House and show him what the commissioner and his staff have recommended with regard to the officials there. If there is any one who has not been treated fairly, or if I cannot explain any case to the member satisfactorily, I will be willing to revise the recommendation made to me by the commissioner and the staff. I do not think that there has been any case in which I have interfered with the recommendations made to me with regard to increases.

Mr. McKENZIE: I can readily understand that the minister would not have the time or the knowledge to go into details about every officer of his department. I should be wasting time in asking him to give information now about any stated office. But if he will give me the information I am asking for I will be able to judge for myself as to how he has dealt with persons within my own knowledge.

Mr. REID: I will get the information.

Mr. KYTE: I naturally had in my mind more particularly the officials in the counties of Richmond and South Cape Breton. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has asked for information with regard to South Cape Breton and that will suffice. But with regard to the county of Richmond, there are not many officers, but there is the collector at Arichat and the collector at St. Peter's. The collector at Arichat has a salary of $800, and I do not think he gets any overtime. The collector at St. Peter's has a trifling salary of $500. He has to maintain a house and devote all his time to the duties of his office. I certainly think that his case is one which should be taken into consideration in the increase of salaries. The number of officials in Richmond is very small, and I think I am not asking too much when I request the minister, when his Estimates are again before the committee, to have a list of the salaries of these officers and the increases he proposes.

Mr. REID: I think we might let the item stand, and the next time we go into Committee of Supply I will have a list of all the officers, with the salaries they are getting at the present time, and a statement showing how it is proposed to divide up this amount, so that every hon. member may know what is to be done in his constituency.

Mr. KYTE: I think that will be very satisfactory.

Mr. COPP: Does the minister intend to bring this into force as soon as it passes this House or is it to be made retroactive?

Mr. REID: If this item passes and is concurred in, I would think that we might start on the 1st of September.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Would the minister bring down a list of those officials of his department who have enlisted for overseas service and are getting the difference between their military pay and their Civil Service pay?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: The last time we were dealing with the minister's Estimates we had a talk about some vacancy in the county of Annapolis, or perhaps in the town of Annapolis. I forget exactly what it was, but the appointment was not made permanent at that time. Somebody was acting temporarily, and there was some talk as to whether a returned soldier would be appointed if a returned soldier were found in Annapolis county. I have since then received a letter from a gentleman in the county of Annapolis—I am sorry that the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) is not here—stating that there were at least two returned soldiers in the county of Annapolis, well educated men, either of whom would be eligible and qualified to fill the office that is now temporarily filled. I would suggest to the minister that he might inquire from the hon. member for Annapolis, or from some private source, if there is a returned soldier in the county who would be a suitable man to fill the office.

Mr. REID: I will have that information at the same time.

Mr. BUREAU: Will this vote be applied to new appointments?

Mr. REID: Appointments will be made out of the general vote and this vote too. It is all added together.

Mr. BUREAU: Is this to be used for increases, or to pay the salaries of new employees?

Mr. REID: We are going to use it for increases.

Mr. BUREAU: The pay for overtime of officials is included in the ordinary estimates?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister said that three thousand civil servants received less than $1,000 a year. What provision in the Civil Service Act does he desire to overcome by inserting the words "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act?"

Mr. REID: You cannot pay a man more than a certain salary under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MARCILE: The minister promised last winter to rectify an injustice done to Mr. Hamel, of Montreal.

Mr. REID: I think that since the discussion in the House I gave an increase to this gentleman. If I did not I will this time.

Mr. BUREAU: How many of the civil servants who are to receive increases out of this vote have reached the maximum of their class?

Mr. REID: I could not say offhand.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the overtime received by officials be reckoned as salary in deciding on the apportionment of the $300,000?

Mr. REID: You have to take each case into consideration and do what you think is fair and right to those in each port. If in a port one man receives $900 per annum and no overtime and another receives $900 per annum and $350 overtime, or $1,250 altogether, if I had only a limited amount to divide, I would increase the man with the $900 and try to help him out in these strenuous times.

Mr. SINCLAIR: A very obliging preventive officer, Mr. McCutcheon, was dismissed at a small port on the coast of my constituency, Sonora, and a friend of the minister's party was appointed in his place. I asked why the change was made and the minister replied that it was done in the public interest. I was not satisfied with this reply, because it was not done in the public interest but in the interest of the Conservative party in that district, which is a different thing altogether from the public interest. It would be more frank and honest for the minister to tell the exact truth and say that the man was dismissed in order to give a position to a friend of the party supporting my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: I think a return was asked for in that case. I shall bring it down. I do not see that I could have given any other answer than that it was done in the public interest, because it must have been in the public interest or it would not have been done.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Would the minister bring down the names of any preventive officers in Inverness county? I ask this because there was a preventive officer there until 1911. The position was then promised to six or seven men. None of those men knows whether the other fellow is appointed or not, and I cannot tell them. I should like to be able to settle the minds of these men on this point.

Mr. REID: I promised a minute ago that I would bring down a list of all the customs officials on the Outside Service. I will have the names of those in the province of Nova Scotia, and will be able to give the information when the item is before us again.

Mr. MICHAUD: The hon. minister said that the minimum increase would be $50. A man with a salary of $500 ought to get the maximum increase. Has he any chance?

Mr. REID: It depends upon circumstances. We have men getting $200, $300, or, perhaps, $500 a year. They are customs officers at small places where it would hardly pay to keep a permanent officer to do the work, and they do not give their entire time to the work. These men are not as likely to get the increase as those who depend entirely on these salaries for a living.

Mr. McCRANEY: I would like to say a word to the minister with reference to the duty on pure alcohol, which is used in public hospitals.

Mr. REID: If the hon. gentleman is referring to a change in the tariff, that relates to the Finance Department, and not to my department. The Finance Minister makes the tariff.

Mr. McCRANEY: Does the minister in his department not deal with the question of free alcohol, as well as the Inland Revenue Department?

Mr. REID: We only deal with it as stated in the tariff. We do not change the tariff. The hon. gentleman can see the item, and that item has been passed by Parliament

Mr. McCRANEY: I want to discuss a memorandum which I have received from the superintendent of the Saskatoon Hospital, if I may do so. I have a resolution on the Order Paper calling for correspondence, but I shall not be able to get on with that, and perhaps the minister will permit me to place this memorandum on Hansard, and he may give me some answer when the item comes up again. It appears the duty on proof alcohol is $2.42 per proof gallon to wholesale liquor houses, and charitable institutions pay $3 per proof gallon.

9 p.m

Mr. REID: That is imported alcohol.

Mr. McCRANEY: The letter does not say whether it is inland revenue or customs.

Mr. REID: I think the hon. gentleman is referring to the Inland Revenue Department.

Mr. McCRANEY: That may be so.

Mr. REID: But it is all right; the hon. gentleman can make his statement.

Mr. McCRANEY: The chairman of the Board of Governors of the Saskatoon Municipal Hospital sends me this memorandum giving reasons for remitting duties on alcohol:

(1) All hospitals throughout Canada are finding it a great hardship in paying the prices demanded for pure alcohol, one of the most necessary drugs used in the preparation of patients for surgical operations, in the treatment of wounds, and for bathing purposes.

(2) The reason given for the exorbitant price demanded is the excessive excise duty imposed on same by the Dominion Government.

(3) Hospitals are losing huge sums every year in the treatment of the sick. In our own small hospital (100 beds), we have an annual loss of from $15,000 to $20,000.

(4) Statistics show that the average cost per patient per day to hospitals throughout the Dominion runs from $2.15 to $2.50. The Dominion Government have only paid $1.50 per day for soldiers, their wards. They have not allowed extras for operating-room fees, or expensive drugs.

(5) Where alcohol is used in any quantity, or any other expensive drug, hospitals are compelled to charge the patient for same, therefore it increases the cost to patients, and thereby puts a penalty on sickness.

(6) Thirty to forty per cent of patients treated in public hospitals are unable to pay anything, and in consequence the hospitals have to bear the entire burden.

(7) Is it necessary to obtain revenue from the sick and afflicted, particularly when our universities are allowed the privilege of imparting anything they require for experimental and teaching purposes? Public hospitals, we consider, should have the same privileges extended them as our universities are receiving.

(8) The United States Government allows all hospitals alcohol tax free, ...

(9) From the good work our public hospitals are doing, more especially as they are losing thousands of dollars annually, we consider the Dominion Government should allow, not only alcohol, but all hospital supplies to be imported free of duty.

That is signed on behalf of the board of governors by John A. Valens, M.D., chairman, and John Ryan, secretary. At Saskatoon we have the University of Saskatchewan, which imports alcohol for experimental purposes in its laboratory. The hospital authorities have sent me a copy of an invoice of a barrel of alcohol. It reads:

Purity Distilling Co.
Division of
U.S. Industrial Alcohol Co.,
915-955 Cambridge St., East Cambridge, Mass.

1 barrel ethyl alcohol, serial No. 138343—proof 190—48.10 gallons at .80	$ 38.48
Duty paid in Saskatoon, 62 O.P. gallons at $3	186.00
7½ per cent war tax on $38.48	2.85
Freight from Boston	5.57
Delivery charges	.50
	$233.40

Price laid down in hospital,
48.10 wine gallons	$ 4.85
38.48 imperial gallons	6.07
Best price we could obtain from Winnipeg, imperial gallon	6.75
Price to University of Saskatchewan is:
48.10 gallons at 80c	$ 38.48
Freight	5.57
	$44.55

The charge to the hospital is $6.07 per gallon, and the charge to the University $1.16, or an excessive charge of $4.91. The hospital doctors point out to me that, while the Dominion Government sells to hospitals methylated spirits at 50 cents, yet the hospitals do not care to use them, they say that the injurious effect on the sight should be sufficient to debar their use in any hospital. I wish the minister would ascertain if it is possible to devise means by which the public hospital of Saskatoon, which is carried on at a very considerable loss each year—particularly during the war when a good many soldiers have to be treated, the allowance for soldiers, being very small—could get some relief. Could arrangements be made under which public hospitals might import alcohol duty free, for their own purposes?

Mr. REID: I will take this matter up with the Minister of Inland Revenue, and see if anything can be done.

Mr. BUREAU: As the minister proposes to let this item stand for further information, could he ascertain how many inspectors there are in the Customs Department, and how many other officers are employed on inspection?

Mr. REID: I will give the hon. gentleman that information when the item is before us again, because I shall have a detailed list before me of all the officers in each port and of the different inspectors for each province.

Mr. BUREAU: "Different" inspectors for each province?

Mr. REID: Yes. In the province of Quebec they have three inspectors and three assistants. I will have a full list of these officers, and will be able to give the information.

Mr. BUREAU: I should like to know more particularly as to the other officers of inspection. Who are the officers who go on inspection other than the regular inspectors, and their assistants?

Mr. REID: I will have the information for the hon. gentleman.

Item stands.

[Mr. McCraney.]

Department of Public Works—to provide for an increase in the salary of the assistant chief architect to $4,000, $700.

Mr. REID: According to the Civil Service Act the present salary for this position is $3,300. This vote is to attach to the position a salary of $4,000. There is not any Assistant Chief Architect at the present time. I have no idea who is to fill the position; that will be dealt with by the future Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BUREAU: Why is the increase asked for?

Mr. REID: These Estimates were prepared by the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), who intended filling the position. I do not know why he has not filled it; perhaps he could not get a good man.

Mr. BUREAU: How long has the position been vacant?

Mr. REID: About two years and a half.

Mr. BUREAU: In view of the fact that we have to pay $700,000,000 to the Canadian Northern, to say nothing of our war expenditure; and in view of the fact that the department has got along during the last couple of years without an Assistant Chief Architect, I think we could well dispense with this item of $700. Having regard to the strenuous times through which we are passing, I do not see how the acting minister can justify this vote for increasing the salary attaching to a position which has not been filled during the last two and a half years. Public works are not now being carried on very rapidly; the Government is tightening every string and advising the people to tighten their belts to help carry on the war. I repeat that this item might well be struck out.

Mr. REID: I promise the hon. gentleman that I will not fill it while I am Acting Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MURPHY: Who was the last Assistant Chief Architect?

Mr. REID: Mr. R. C. Wright, a good man. If I were filling the position, I would give it to him.

Mr. MURPHY: Why is he not there now?

Mr. REID: He resigned.

Mr. MURPHY: I would not have made any observations about this item were it not for the explanation, given by the hon. minister in reply to the inquiry of the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), that this item was prepared by the late Minister of Public Works. Anything that is not quite regular and that is attributed to the late Minister of Public Works will, I think, bear some looking into. Here is a position that has been vacant for over two years, as the member for Three Rivers has pointed out, the work of the Department of Public Works has been curtailed since the war; and there is certainly no immediate prospect of the work of that department being suddenly enlarged. In the face of these facts, it is proposed not only to continue a position which has not been filled for over two years, but to provide for an increase of $700 in the salary attached to that position. I do not think the hon. gentleman can justify that before this committee. I entirely concur with the suggestion of the member for Three Rivers that this amount should be struck out.

Mr. REID: I have obtained information from the deputy minister that will, perhaps, explain this matter a little more fully. Mr. Wright was filling this position at the time the former Minister of Public Works took charge of the department. As I have said, he was a good man, and the minister appreciated his services. Mr. Wright severed his connection with the Public Works Department of his own free will to take a position with a firm in Montreal. Subsequently he came back to the department and asked for a position, and the late minister so valued his services that he gave him an appointment as superintendent of Postal Station A in Toronto. When he left the department Mr. Wright was receiving $3,900; if he had remained in the position he would now be receiving $4,000, the maximum of his class. The late minister was anxious to get Mr. Wright back to Ottawa again, and the only way he could do it was by paying him the salary to which he was entitled and which he would be getting if he had not left the position. The $700 was put in in order that Mr. Wright might be brought back to Ottawa where his services are required. There is nothing to hide in the matter. Mr. Wright was an appointee of the late Government, but he attended to his work and his services were valued. If we struck out this item Mr. Wright could not be brought back to Ottawa to take up the duties of this position.

Mr. MURPHY: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that it is his intention to bring Mr. Wright back and to reappoint him at this salary?

Mr. REID: I said that that was the intention of the late Minister of Public Works. That is what the vote is there for.

Mr. MURPHY: I am asking if it is the hon. gentleman's intention to do that.

Mr. REID: As far as I am concerned, I am not filling any positions in the Public Works Department unless they simply have to be filled. Mr. Wright will have to remain where he is until a new Minister of Public Works is appointed, who will deal with this matter as he sees fit.

Mr. MURPHY: If that is the case, you do not need this vote?

Mr. REID: If Mr. Wright should be brought back it is only fair that this item should be passed, so that the new Minister of Public Works, whoever he may be, can deal with the matter.

Mr. MURPHY: He may never have heard of Mr. Wright, or may have no intention of appointing him. If, as the minister alleges, this item is in the Estimates because it was the intention of the late Minister of Public Works to re-appoint Mr. Wright, I want to know if the minister is going to re-appoint him. What salary is he receiving?

Mr. REID: Three thousand six hundred dollars.

Mr. BUREAU: If the minister says that this amount is intended for Mr. Wright, and that Mr. Wright will get it—we are all satisfied that he is a good man, and that $4,000 would hardly be paying him enough—I have no objection, but I want an assurance from the minister that this money will be paid to a good man like Mr. Wright.

Mr. REID: I have given all the assurance I can.

Mr. BUREAU: No assurances at all.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman must recognize that he has given the committee no assurances at all, but rather thrown out a suggestion as to what may be done—which he has made plain he has no intention of doing. If the minister wants to be fair, if it is really his intention to give this salary to Mr. Wright, let him say so, and the item can go through. If not, the item will be passed under false pretences.

Mr. REID: I do not think I can say anything more. The late Minister of Public Works put the item in, so that he could bring back Mr. Wright from Toronto to this position in Ottawa. Mr. Wright is a very valuable official, but if the hon. member thinks that Mr. Wright may be deprived of this money, if he will move that the item be struck out, I will not object.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not putting the case fairly. This position has been vacant for two and a half years, and the minister says that so long as he is Acting Minister of Public Works—which, for this country's sake, I hope will not be long—he will not fill this position. It looks to me as if the minister was quibbling. If he is going to appoint Mr. Wright let him do so and pay him $4,000. Mr. Wright deserves that amount, and the country will be the gainer by it. But if the minister tries to get the additional vote for $700 through the House by saying that he does not know who the new Minister of Public Works will be, I object to the item passing in that way. For the good of the Public Works Department, Mr. Wright ought to be appointed to this position. The minister should not be taking any risk in saying that he will see Mr. Wright gets this money if the vote is passed. The only conclusion we can come to, from his not giving us that assurance, is that he has no intention of appointing Mr. Wright.

Mr. REID: The item was put in the Estimates by the late Minister of Public Works, with the intention of bringing Mr. Wright back to Ottawa. I am merely acting temporarily until some new minister is appointed. That new minister may say that he prefers leaving Mr. Wright where he is.

Mr. GRAHAM: Have you any idea who the new minister will be? We might then be able to judge whether he would appoint Mr. Wright.

Mr. REID: I am sure it will not be the hon. member, because he is on the wrong side of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not necessarily, judging by the events of the past few weeks.

Mr. REID: I think those events show that the hon. member will be on that side for some time to come. If he feels there is any danger of Mr. Wright not getting this money I have no objection to having the item struck out, if he will move accordingly.

Mr. NESBITT: If the minister is going to be Acting Minister of Public Works for only a short time, it seems to me only reasonable that this matter should be left to the incoming minister, who will no doubt take into consideration what was intended by the outgoing minister. I do not know whether Mr. Wright will be appointed or not, but if this salary is required to get a proper man to fill the position, I would pass the item.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister knows what the intention of the former minister was. There must be some correspondence between the department and Mr. Wright. The minister can easily find out from his deputy whether any negotiations have been going on, how far they have gone, and whether or not Mr. Wright has agreed to accept. Has Mr. Wright agreed to come back if this $4,000 is voted?

Mr. REID: The late Minister of Public Works valued Mr. Wright's services and found him, as I have always found him, willing to go any place or to do anything in connection with the work of the department that the minister wished him to do.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not answering my question.

Mr. REID: This item was put in the Estimates by the late Minister of Public Works for the purpose of bringing Mr. Wright back to Ottawa, Mr. Wright being agreeable to coming if the minister desired. My hon. friend must see that the new minister might decide not to fill this position until the war is over, and in the meantime leave Mr. Wright where he is. On the other hand he may decide to bring Mr. Wright back to Ottawa, and then we should require this vote. Or he might desire the services of Mr. Wright at some other point at a larger salary. I cannot commit the new minister any further than that. I am not going to fill the position, but am leaving it to the new minister. I think under the circumstances this item should go through.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there any necessity for filling a position in the Public Works Department which has been vacant for the last two and a half years? We are told by the Government that they are not putting up any new public buildings this year. Consequently, no new architectural work will be required. If the Government really desire to economize here is an excellent opportunity.

Mr. REID: The deputy minister tells me that Mr. Wright has been recommended to the Civil Service Commission for this appointment. The matter has also been before the Treasury Board, so that Mr. Wright could be appointed. But I repeat I do not want to waste any time on it, and if there is any objection to it I will strike it out.

Public works—chargeable to capital. Public buildings—Ottawa eastern departmental block—new fireproof roof, etc., revote, $125,000.

Mr. REID: This money is to be applied towards the fireproofing of the old portion of the East Block and re-arrangement of the offices on the top floor, including a new elevator at the stair-well entrance to the south wing. The estimated cost of the new fireproof roof, etc., is as follows:

Secretary of State Department, new roof and office layout	$ 69,000.00
Elevator	6,000.00
Remainder of roof	163,000.00
Total	$238,000.00
Deduct:—
Revote applied for in Supplementary Estimates, 1917-18	$125,000.00
Additional amount required	113,000.00
Appropriation for 1916-17—addition	$ 17,000.00
Appropriation for 1916-17—new fireproof roof, etc.	240,000.00
Total	$257,000.00
Deduct:—
Expenditure re pay lists, materials, etc., for alterations to drainage, plumbing, renewing galvanized roof over boiler room, etc.	$ 11,025.00
Amount lapsed 1st April, 1917	120,975.00
	$132,000.00
Revote required for use in 1917-18	$125,000.00

The fireproofing and alterations to part of the southeast corner of the top floor, including a new elevator at the stair-well entrance to south wing, were recommended by the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin).

Mr. MURPHY: Have tenders been called and has the work been started?

Mr. REID: No, it is not proceeding, and no tenders have yet been called for.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think this item might well be allowed to stand over. The only recommendation for it is the recommendation of the Postmaster General, and he is not now an occupant of the East Block. The Finance Department does not recommend it; the Minister of Justice has not applied for it; the Privy Council have not applied for it. There are a great many officials there, and it seems extraordinary that the work should be done now on the recommendation of the Postmaster General. It is not urgently required, and I do not think the item should pass.

Mr. REID: It is a fact that the work was not proceeded with last year, and it may not be proceeded with this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it would be better to strike it out.

Mr. REID: I do not feel it would be well to do so. It will be necessary to go ahead with this work some time. The East Block is really a fire-trap. Within the past two or three weeks there was an alarm of fire there. If any accident happened, we would not have the slightest hope of saving the place. It is absolutely necessary to do this work, as soon as we can reach it, and I do not think there should be any objection to passing the item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If anything happens the Government would not hesitate for a single moment to obtain a Governor General's warrant. This Government never hesitates to do that on the slightest provocation. Does it not seem absurd that this work, which is not urgently required, should be asked for at this time, when the Minister of Finance really looks weary as a result of the tremendous burdens imposed upon him in looking around for money? Is it fair to throw further burdens upon him? Nothing has been done in connection with this work for a couple of years, and latterly we have gone to very large expense in the East Block, fitting up splendid vaults and making great improvements for the Finance Department. The offices of my hon. and gallant friend (Mr. Blondin) are not in the East Block; they are in the Langevin Block. The other ministers do not seem to require an additional elevator. Two elevators are apparently sufficient for them. As was stated to-day so forcibly by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), now is the time when even in small matters the Government should show some economy.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Economy in everything except in connection with dredging in Courtenay bay.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We do not get very far with the dredging.

Mr. REID: I would not like to take the responsibility of striking out this item. The money is being voted to make the building fire-proof. This question was brought up during the time my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) was Secretary of State.

Mr. MURPHY: That is so.

Mr. GERMAN: Will that amount of money be sufficient to make the building fireproof? My opinion is it will not cover more than one-quarter of the cost.

Mr. REID: Those are the figures supplied by the architects, and I have full confidence in them.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the building any less fireproof this year than it has been for the last fifty years?

Mr. REID: No, it is not, but there have been times when it was in danger of fire. I was going to say to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that I would like the committee to let this item pass, so that I might move that the committee rise and report progress. I want to go on with another Bill which is on the Order Paper, in regard to which we have been waiting for the hon. member from St. John.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Which Bill is that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Canadian Northern Railway Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understood it was to stand over until to-morrow.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. We have been waiting for my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: If the hon. gentleman wishes to let it stand, I am willing to let it stand. Is there any objection to letting it go through to-night?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has made no case for the passing of the item. He is asking us to take this money which has been raised by taxation, divert it from the war and use it to make some repairs upon a building which has been in existence for many years, on the ground that the Postmaster General would like to see those repairs made.

Mr. REID: That was not the reason at all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blondin) was Secretary of State at the time, and he recommended that this work should be done. I am quite satisfied the work is necessary, and my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy), who at one time occupied the office of Secretary of State, knows the danger of those buildings. I have no doubt he fully appreciates the necessity of making them fireproof. My hon. friends know that since the beginning of this war the East Block has been used more than ever for holding the most valuable securities.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But, those valuable securities are in a new part of the East Block, which is absolutely fireporof.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL—THIRD READING.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved the third reading of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Mr. PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I am going to invite the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and the House to an amendment which I desire to have made to this Bill. Before proceeding with what I may have to say, I move:

> That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions that they have power to amend the same by inserting between the words "may" and "acquire" in line 1 of section 1 the words "subject to the approval by Parliament of the award hereafter provided for."

It seems to me that every one who is disposed to take a fair view of the rights of the people of this country, no matter what view he may entertain as to the undesirability of proceeding in this way, will agree that if it is determined to acquire the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and to submit the question to arbitration, as proposed, before Parliament is finally committed to any payment the award of the arbitrators should be submitted to Parliament and should be approved of.

Before I proceed to present the few arguments which I intend to present to the House in favour of the amendment, I desire to say that I regret that the matter is coming up this evening, because, before recess, I rather supposed that it was to stand over until to-morrow. I know that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was desirous of being present and an intimation to that effect was conveyed to the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). I was informed by my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) that the matter would stand until to-morrow if there was any assurance that the debate would be likely to be finished to-morrow. I can assure my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that there is no disposition on this side of the House to prolong the discussion beyond what is absolutely necessary in order to get our views fairly before the country. There was some misapprehension on the part of the Government as to the intention of the Opposition in connection with the discussion while the Bill was in committee. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that there was no desire and no intention to obstruct the Bill. I will tell you why. This is, from the financial standpoint, the most important measure that this or any previous Parliament has ever had to deal with. Taking the amount which may have to be paid under the arbitration and adding it to the liabilities which this country will assume if it takes the stock, this measure involves a sum in the vicinity of $650,000,000, an enormous burden for the people of Canada. It involves the adoption of a principle which has never been submitted to the people, and this Parliament, whose life has been prolonged by our own votes and at our own request with a view of enabling the Government to do the most effective work possible in carrying on the war, has no mandate, no authority, to commit the people to that principle. The people never dreamed that during its extended life Parliament would undertake to deal with a matter of such vast importance.

I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the committee first began to consider this Bill on the 16th August and that it went out of the committee yesterday or only thirteen days from the time that it was first referred to the committee. If you bear in mind that during that time the Soldiers' Voting Bill was also considered and passed, and that a considerable portion of the Estimates was also passed, I think you will agree with me that there was no undue amount of time taken up with the consideration of this Bill. When you consider further that there were some sixty members upon this side of the House who had not had an opportunity of speaking upon the Bill, I think you will see that the view I present that there was no undue prolongation of the discussion is amply warranted. True, the closure was applied by the Minister of Finance and some bitterness was created which I think came largely from the undue desire to press the matter without having proper consideration for the rights of the minority. I think the Government would get along very much better and could greatly facilitate the carrying on of the business if they had a greater regard for the rights of the minority than they have shown in this case.

This Parliament has been in session since January last, upwards of eight months. Before the recess there was ample time to introduce this Bill and there was a great deal of time after recess to introduce it before it was actually introduced. During the three months that some members of the Government were in England, the members of the Government and of Parliament who were at home might very well have had their time occupied in the consideration of this and other important measures. But it all comes down to this, that only thirteen days elapsed from the time the Bill was put into the committee until it was reported out of the committee. However, I have no doubt whatever that, as mentioned to the Minister of Finance before recess, in one day the discussion upon the third reading would be entirely completed. I do not know if the minister wants to bring the third reading on to-night with a view to giving notice of the closure. He may decide to do so, but I think he is hardly well advised to give the country the impression that by means of the power that is vested in the majority—by the votes of the majority—they intend to force through this Bill without an opportunity for discussion. I think hon. gentlemen opposite would be very badly advised if they took that course.

Now, with regard to the amendment, I contend it is not fair to the people of this country to impose on them the obligation of paying to Mackenzie and Mann and the interests allied with them, who are the pledgees or holders of this $60,000,000 of stock, this vast sum of money without the matter again being presented to Parliament after it has been investigated by these arbitrators and without having their report, because their award would be in the nature of a report. This position is enormously strengthened by the fact that in 1914 there was a statutory agreement made between Mackenzie and Mann, the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Government, by which statutory agreement it was provided that if Parliament would authorize the Government to grant further assistance to the extent of $45,000,000 Parliament would have the right, if it chose to do so, to authorize the Governor in Council by order, to foreclose the equity of redemption in this property.

Since that time, although the default which is provided for by that statute has occurred, this Government has given further assistance to the Canadian Northern Railway to the extent of $15,000,000. To-day, instead of the country being placed in the fairly advantageous position in which it would be placed if the provisions of the Act of 1914 were carried out, under this legislation the question is to be submitted to arbitrators, not from the standpoint of the Canadian Northern Railway Company being in default, not from the standpoint that they are obliged to sell, not from the standpoint that the country has lent them vast sums of money and aided them by guarantees and they are in default; but, I think any gentleman acquainted with the principles which govern arbitration will say it is to be presented to these arbitrators from the most advantageous standpoint possible, so far as Mackenzie and Mann are concerned. When it comes before the arbitrators it will be presented simply from this standpoint, what is this stock worth as between the Government, which wants to buy it, and Mackenzie, Mann and Company and their associates, who are willing to sell but are not compelled to sell? That is the ordinary basis for valuation unless there are exceptional and peculiar circumstances which govern it. The true basis upon which arbitrators act is this: What is the value of the property which we are called upon to consider from the standpoint of a purchaser who is desirous of buying and from a seller who is willing to sell but is not compelled to sell? That is not putting the people of Canada in the position in which they have a right to be placed. Still, a majority in this House has decided that that is the way it should be presented to the arbitrators. It is quite possible that these arbitrators may say—I do not say they will but there will be evidence before them upon which they will be able to say—that this stock is worth par. In the data which the minister has presented to this House as reliable, and in respect of which he is the mouthpiece of this Government and is acting for the people of this country, he shows that the financial statement of this company represents a surplus of $35,000,000 or $37,000,000, after providing for all its liabilities and after providing for all its common stock to the extent of $100,000,000 of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and $5,000,000 of the stock of one or two constituent companies. That is the statement which they will present to the arbitrators; that is the argument which they will submit; and they will say, as any member of this House, if he were interested in the Canadian Northern Railway Company would say to the arbitrators: The Government wants to buy our stock; they think it is desirable in the interests of Canada that the country should own our great transcontinental system; they have provided in the Act that the country shall pay the value of that stock; and its value, Sir, is to be not what it was on the first day of January, 1917, not what it was when this Bill was presented to Parliament, not what it will be when this Bill receives the Governor's assent and becomes law, but what it will be on the day that the agreement is entered into. What will the Canadian Bank of Commerce, what will the other shrewd pledgees of this stock, what will the shrewd counsel who are advising Mackenzie and Mann, say? They will say: You must go upon the commercial value of this stock. The stock will have an increased value by reason of this very legislation. After the Act passes everybody will know that the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company is to be acquired by the Government. Everybody will know that, whatever its market value is, that value will have to be given by the arbitrators. It will be with the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company as it was with the stock of the Quebec and Saguenay railways; when the legislation of this Parliament passed, the stock rose in the stock markets all the way from 25 per cent to 50 per cent. Every gentleman in Quebec knows that. And this stock will have a greater value at the date when the agreement is signed by reason of this legislation which makes it certain that this country has determined to take over this road and operate it as a part of a government-owned system.

As I have said, we know what the liabilities are, we know what the country is bound to assume. These liabilities will run to between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000, and if we take over that stock we become liable for all these obligations. As I have said, this arbitration may place a valuation up to $60,000,000 on the stock. We do not know what its finding will be, it is entirely uncertain. This Parliament cannot know, this Government cannot know, and the people of this country cannot know; and I submit that, in view of that fact, it is only fair to the people of this country that before they are compelled to take over the road and pay the award of the arbitrators, the matter should be submitted to Parliament and Parliament should have the right to say whether or not the transaction should be completed. Evidence I presume, will be taken by these arbitrators which will be very important, and which will give valuable information to Parliament. We shall probably know just what the outstanding liabilities are. I have a telegram from a gentleman standing very high in the province of British Columbia, a gentleman who knows absolutely what he is speaking of, and he says that the Canadian Northern Railway Company have made commitments in the province of British Columbia to the amount of $25,000,000. I would give the name of that gentleman, I would show the telegram privately to the Minister of Finance. There is no restriction upon my using it because it is not marked confidential, and yet I am not expressly authorized to read this telegram to the House. My correspondent is a man who has intimate inside knowledge of the facts of which he is speaking, and that is the information he gives me. There is a direct and absolute liability upon the part of the Canadian Northern Railway to go ahead with expenditures amounting to the enormous sum of $25,000,000 in the one province of British Columbia; and when this Government becomes the Canadian Northern Railway Company, as it will when it becomes the owner of this stock and appoints this Board of Directors, it cannot escape from the carrying out of the obligations which the present management of the Canadian Northern Railway Company have entered into.

What do we know about the obligations in the other provinces? What are the obligations in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario? We do not know. If there are obligations to that extent, of which Parliament has not been informed, in British Columbia, we do not know what they may be in other places. Speaking of the arbitrators, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance said: Oh, we have Sir William Meredith representing the Government, and the people can rely on him being absolutely fair, and not allowing more than the stock is worth. But there are two other arbitrators to be appointed. How are they to be appointed? Mackenzie and Mann and the pledgees, particularly the Canadian Bank of Commerce as the principle pledgee, are to name one arbitrator. They will not consult Sir William Meredith as to whom they will nominate; he will have no voice in the choice which they will make. Then Sir William Meredith and the arbitrator who has been appointed by the Mackenzie and Mann interest are to name a third arbitrator. Sir William may be a most excellent judge, and a very able lawyer, but I do not think he would have any more ability in selecting the man who will act as a third arbitrator than any ordinary business man in this country, and I would not suppose that his judgment would be any more reliable than the judgment of the gentleman whom Mackenzie and Mann and the Canadian Bank of Commerce will appoint. I would infer—although I have no warrant for saying so—that it is pretty well cut-and-dried as to who is to be the arbitrator to be appointed by Mackenzie and Mann, and as to who is to be the third arbitrator. In this Bill you will find no provision as to what will happen if Mackenzie and Mann and the pledgees fail to agree upon an arbitrator. We find it provided that this Government may enter into an agreement to take over the stock at once, but no provision for what shall be done in case they fail to appoint that arbitrator. The Minister of Finance the other night, when I suggested that the Bill was very indefinite in this respect, said that the Arbitration Act provided for it. There is no Arbitration Act bearing upon it at all. This Bill contains within its four corners every provision so far as the arbitration is concerned, which can apply to the proceedings in this case. There is, of course, in the province of Ontario, an Arbitration Act, but that will not apply to this Bill, and my hon. friend is entirely wrong in saying that the Arbitration Act could be invoked in order to make up for the deficiency in this Bill. I do not think it should be necessary to argue at any great length that it is absolutely fair that Parliament should have the opportunity to say whether, in view of what may be the award in this case, it would feel like committing the people of this country to whatever award may be made. I am told that if, in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, a property is taken for any public work within any of the cities or towns arbitrators are appointed, and, after an award is made, the question of whether or not the council of the municipal corporation shall be permitted to take over the property at the amount of the award has to be submitted to the electors, and if they do not approve reasonable and just arrangements are made for the payment of the expenses in connection with the arbitration. That is a fair and just principle. The hon. Minister of Finance might say: " Oh, well, it might be a hardship upon Mackenzie and Mann if an arbitration were to take place and the Government and Parliament were permitted to refuse to accept the award." If there is any danger of a hardship, that could be easily got over. It could be provided in the Bill by the committee, in case the Bill is referred back by this House, that an agreement could be made by which this 600,000 share of stock could be conveyed to trustees, to be held in trust under an arrangement provided for by the agreement, and if it were necessary for the Government to make advances, as provided by section 2 of this Bill, it might make the advances. The arbitration then goes on, and it could be provided that, unless, at the session of Parliament succeeding the award, Parliament did not approve of it, and did not authorize the Government to take the property over under the award, then all the stock would be returned to the parties entitled to it and any money which the Government might advance with interest would form a statutory lien upon the property of the Canadian Northern railway. The Government could provide that the cost to which Mackenzie and Mann and their associates had been put in connection with the matter might be paid by the Government. If it is decided to send it back to the committee for the purpose of making the change as specified in my amendment, it could be worked out so as to do no injustice to the Canadian Northern interest, but it should also leave Parliament and the people of this country free to act upon the award and free, if deemed in the public interest, to acquire the property in that way. I submit this amendment with all confidence, believing that it will commend itself to every one who is desirous of seeing the Canadian Northern taken over and made a government-owned system, and at the same time of doing what is fair towards the people of this country. We ought not to forget that it is not our money that is to be paid for this property. We are sitting here merely as trustees for the people of Canada, and we ought to give the people every reasonable opportunity of knowing what they will be called upon to pay for the property which, it is alleged, it is in the interests of the country to purchase. That opportunity will be afforded to the people if the amendment which I propose is carried into effect, and there will be no delay that will be injurious. The Government can assist the road, if it wants to, in the meantime, just in the same way as if they had taken the property over; and after the valuation placed upon the property by the arbitrator is known, if the people, with their eyes open, and Parliament acting for the people with its eyes open, decide it is not in the interest of the country to pay the award, then no one can complain But to-day, if the Bill passes unamended, without a provision such as I have asked the House to adopt, the country without being consulted, without the question having been submitted to them, without the electors at large having had an opportunity to pass judgment at all, will be committed to a transaction which, as has been stated already, will run into an enormous sum of money. I think that will be most unjust and most unfair to the public. By adopting this amendment which I suggest, no injustice will be done to anybody; the course taken will be fair to the people of Canada, who will have to foot the bill and upon whom great responsibility in connection with the purchase of this system will rest.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) labours under a great many misapprehensions about the measure now under consideration. Among other things, he is suffering from a very serious misapprehension as to the length of time during which the Bill has been before Parliament. On the first day of August, just four weeks ago to-day, notice was given of the resolution upon which this Bill was founded, and considerable discussion took place. The Bill has on many occasions since that time been under consideration, and my hon. friend will admit that whatever may be said about other members of the House, there has not been any lack of opportunity on his part to discuss the Bill very thoroughly and on all occasions. He very suavely informs us that there was never any intention on the part of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to obstruct the measure. I think he is in a position to speak in that respect for a good many hon. members on the other side, but not for himself. My hon. friend seems to be under another extraordinary misapprehension. He observes that this Bill ought to have been introduced before the recess which began early in February and continued, I think, until April 19. Does the hon. gentleman know that during that period the Commission which had been appointed to investigate the whole railway situation was continuing its deliberations, and that the report of that Commission was not presented to the Government, until sometime in April? The astonishing suggestion of my hon. friend is that, while a number of eminent gentlemen who had been appointed by the Government to make this investigation were still continuing their inquiries, the Government should have come before Parliament and introduced this Bill.

My hon. friend makes reference to various supposed occurrences of an unfortunate character, in his estimation, which will take place if an arbitration is proceeded with. May I call his attention to the fact that he evidently overlooked those possibilities when he himself, in 1914 and again in 1916, strongly urged on this House that the property should be acquired through the acquisition of the stock and that the value of the stock should be determined by arbitration?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I dislike to interrupt my right hon. friend, but he is entirely in error when he says that I strongly urged upon the House the desirability of taking over the property by arbitration. What I did say in 1914 was this: I urged that as a condition of guaranteeing the $45,000,000, the stock should be reduced to $30,000,000 and placed in trust for a period of five years so that if there was default the Government could at once take control of the property. If, on the other hand, the company pulled through for five years, then Parliament would have the right, if it chose to do so, to take the property at a valuation not exceeding $30,000,000. That is a very different thing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is only another of the remarkable misapprehensions under which my hon. friend is labouring in regard to this Bill. I am really at a loss to account for them. On the second day of June, 1914, as I have already pointed out to this House, my hon. friend seconded this resolution and spoke strongly in favour of it:

> That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that under existing circumstances no assistance should be given to the Canadian Northern Railway company unless at the same time it is provided that the Government have power, within a reasonable time to acquire the ownership of the entire stock of the company at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed thirty million dollars.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my right hon. friend will pardon my interrupting him again, may I ask him if he has read the resolution that I myself moved a short time before that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am reading the resolution which the hon. gentleman seconded and in support of which he spoke very strongly. I have not the slightest objection to any interruption that my hon. friend may see fit to make; in fact, the more he interrupts me, the better I am pleased. There is his proposal; it was moved by his leader and supported by him in a strong speech. I reminded him on the 14th day of August of what he had said in support of that resolution, but I will venture to trespass upon the time of the House by reading his remarks again, not so much for the benefit of the House—as, I imagine, every other hon. gentleman remembers it—as for the benefit of my hon. friend himself, who seems to have forgotten it. Here is what he said:

> My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moves as an amendment that as a condition of granting this aid the Government shall be allowed to take control of this stock and control of the enterprise until it is completed, and that the country shall have leave to take over the entire stock of the Canadian Northern railway within a reasonable time at a price to be fixed by arbitration but not to exceed the sum of $30,000,000. Is not that a reasonable proposition? Is not that a proposition which is fair to the people of this country who are called upon to assume this enormous liability? Is it not fair to Mackenzie, Mann and Company who are asking this country, for the fourth time, to help to complete this enterprise? It is fair to Mackenzie, Mann & Company, and it is a fair and reasonable proposition on behalf of the people of this country.

My hon. friend has forgotten to-day what he said in 1914, but when we came to Parliament with a proposal on this subject in 1916, my hon. friend had a most vivid memory of what he had proposed in 1914, referred to it in terms of appreciation and commendation, and said that he was prepared to stand for the same thing at that time. He will agree that under the circumstances the extraordinary misunderstandings under which he seems to labour with regard to the proposal now before the House must detract from the authority which his words on ordinary occasions command in this House.

I shall take up in a moment the real point of my hon. friend's amendment. But first I should like to observe in that connection that if it is so obvious a proposition as he has described it, it is a remarkable thing that it never occurred to him either in 1914 or in 1916. But it is a still more astonishing thing that during all the time this proposal has been before Parliament during the present session it never occurred to him until the moment when he arose to address the House half an hour ago.

What is our proposal? Our proposal is that we should appoint a Board of Arbitrators precisely in accordance with the method which he himself proposed in 1914 in the motion which I have read—according to the mode which in 1916 he declared to be eminently in the public interest. But he now proposes that after appointing a Board of Arbitrators to make an award which shall be subject to an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, and after the Board of Arbitrators and the Supreme Court of Canada have spent months in determining a question of very considerable complexity, we in this Parliament, by some means which he has not defined, shall sit in further appeal, not only from the arbitrators, but from the Supreme Court of Canada itself. I do not know quite what he means in that regard. Does he mean that there is to be a real adjudication by this Parliament sitting as a judicial tribunal? If he means that seriously, how does he propose to work it out? Does he propose, after this matter has been gone into before the arbitrators upon evidence and with counsel, that we shall take their award here in Parliament, appoint a committee of Parliament, and traverse the exact ground that has been traversed by the tribunal which this Parliament has created for that purpose? Does he mean to say that any committee of this House would deal with this matter in the same businesslike and effective way that a Board of Arbitrators would deal with it? If he means a mere mock inquiry by Parliament into these matters, that is one thing. His proposition dismisses itself in the statement I have made, if that is his proposal. If on the other hand, he means that there is to be a committee of this House to do the work which the Board of Arbitration and the Supreme Court of Canada will already have performed under this Bill, then I venture to say that the work need not be done twice. His proposal in that case should be that a committee of Parliament ought to deal with the matter in the first instance, and that we should have no reference to arbitrators or to the Supreme Court of Canada, but have a committee selected from both sides of this House sit for months and hear evidence and the testimony of expert witnesses—go into all the intricacies of this question and arrive at a conclusion. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House who believes that such work and the determination which it involves could be done as effectively by a committee of this Parliament as by a board of arbitrators? I venture to say there is not a single one—not even excepting the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) himself—who believes for one moment that such would be the case.

Let us have either the one or the other. If we are to have an inquiry by arbitrators, let us get arbitrators appointed whose award will be respected. If there is any doubt about the award, let us, as this Bill proposes, have the award inquired into by the Supreme Court of Canada. Let us not embark upon the absolute foolishness, in my judgment, of having that done by the Board of Arbitrators in the first instance, by the Supreme Court of Canada in the second instance. and then set up a tribunal in this Parliament and do it for many weary months in the third instance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the award was unanimous it would not go to the Supreme Court.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Very good, I am willing to meet my hon. friend on that ground. I say that after a board of arbitrators—the arbitrator for the company, the arbitrator for the Government, and the third arbitrator—have made a thorough and exhaustive inquiry into the questions which arise in this matter, my hon. friend would hardly be prepared to stand in his place and say that we ought to embark on the same inquiry before a committee of this House. Upon what ground does he base any such proposal? He has given no reason in favour of it.

We might have left the proposal he has submitted to-night to the judgment of the House without any answer to his address on the subject, because he has not advanced one substantial argument from first to last; and if there is anything that could be called a vestige of argument in what he has proposed in support of his amendment, I am prepared to show that on repeated occasions in the past he has thought no such proposal worthy of consideration for a moment.

There is this further to be said about his proposal, that it would render the Bill absolutely unworkable, as I understand it. Section 1 as amended by my hon. friend would leave everything in the air; it would practically declare that the stock was not to be immediately acquired in an absolute way. But section 2 declares that it may be so immediately acquired. His proposal conflicts also with section 3. He saw that, and in the course of his remarks he proposed some elaborate and complex amendments by which the people of this country were to provide money for aiding this road in the event of Parliament eventually determining that the road ought not to be taken over at the price fixed. What would that amount to? Simply this: The Government of Canada would ask Parliament to vote $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 out of the public exchequer for the purpose of keeping this concern alive—for, if Parliament should not approve of the award, my hon. friend says the stock is to be handed back. Now what is the net result of that? In the first place, it leaves the whole problem absolutely unsolved. We want to get this matter closed up and to have some policy determined upon in the interest of the people by which these applications for aid shall not come to Parliament any more. We practically said that to Parliament a year ago; I am inclined to think we said it in 1914. But whether we said it in 1914 or in 1916, we say it now. We say that the time has come when money ought not to be provided out of the public exchequer for the purpose of keeping this concern alive. And therefore, on that ground I reject the proposal of my hon. friend, because it simply means, as I have already said, that the public treasury of this country would be drawn upon to the extent of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 for an undertaking three-fifths of the stock of which, amounting to $60,000,000, would still be vested in private ownership.

There is another thing I should like to call to the attention of the House in connection with my hon. friend's proposal. I cannot understand his proposal as anything other than an attack upon state ownership. He has already said that he does not believe the country ought to acquire this road until after a general election and until after the people of Canada have passed upon the proposal. I might observe in passing that my hon. friend was not troubled with any scruple of this kind in 1914, or in 1916, when he supported and advocated proposals looking to the immediate acquisition of this road through the acquisition of the stock. The Minister of Finance has already pointed out with great force that there are only three alternatives so far as this road is concerned. One is liquidation, of which I will speak a little later,—for the present, I need only say that the proposal of liquidation has been rejected by every prominent member on both sides of the House who has spoken on this subject; and although my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) read some public statement the other day advocating the placing of the road in liquidation, I observed that he was careful not to commit himself to any defence of that proposition. The other two alternatives are ownership by the State and ownership by some other greet railway corporation in Canada. There is only one other railway corporation in Canada that would be capable of dealing with so large an undertaking as that which is now under consideration by this House. It, therefore, practically comes down to this: shall the Canadian Northern railway pass into the ownership of the people of Canada, or shall it pass into the ownership of the Canadian Pacific Railway company? I am not here to attack the Canadian Pacific Railway company; I fully acknowledge and appreciate the great service which it has rendered, the great service which it is now rendering, and the greater service which it may render in the future to the people of this country; but I have no hesitation whatever in saying that in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of the people of Canada, between those two alternatives, the road ought to pass into the ownership of the people of Canada, and not into the ownership of the Canadian Pacific Railway corporation.

If the road is to pass into the ownership of the people of Canada, as the only one of the three alternatives which is in the public interest, what is to be the method of its acquisition? We have made a very plain and simple proposal to this House. This proposal has been attacked as to method, rather than as to principle. The chief attack which has been made upon it is that the Government ought to acquire the ownership of the physical assets of the road, and ought not to acquire the balance of the common stock. It is said we should do that by utilizing the legislation of 1914. I have pointed out, and it has been repeatedly pointed out by hon. members on this side of the House, that if the Government utilized the legislation of 1914, it would be absolutely impossible, unless we desired to wreck the credit of this country, to proceed on any other principle than that which is embodied in this Bill. That is to say, if the persons who own the equity of redemption in the Canadian Northern railway and its subsidiary companies claim with any show of reason at all that there is some value in that equity of redemption, it would be impossible for this Parliament, for this Government, or for any other Parliament or any other government having due regard for the public interest, to deny to the persons raising that claim the right to be heard as to the merits of their claim before some properly constituted tribunal. If you depart from that principle, you might just as well bring into Parliament a Bill which would authorize expropriation of the property of any citizen, or firm, or company in this country, without compensation, or with one-half or one-tenth of the compensation that might be found by any court as the value of such property taken by the Crown for public purposes. It is impossible to do it. It is absolutely impossible to deny the right to be heard to any man whose property is taken and who makes a reasonable claim that it has some value. Therefore, I say, under the Act of 1914, if the owners of the equity of redemption were able to show—as I think they have shown—that there is some reasonable claim for some value in the property over and above the encumbrances, we ought not to deny them the right to be heard. It is an elementary principle of common justice embodied in all the provisions of the British Constitution that no man shall have his property taken from him, his rights taken away, or his liberty interfered with, unless he shall have had the opportunity of being heard before a competent tribunal in respect of his claim. Therefore, the principle upon which this Bill is founded is precisely the same as the principle upon which any government would have been obliged to proceed in acquiring this property under the Act of 1914. We prefer this method, for a very good reason which has been explained over and over again—for the reason that by acquiring the stock, although acting upon the same principle which we would have been obliged to follow if we had acquired the physical assets themselves, we do not disturb the corporate entity; we do not interfere with the organization of the road; we do not interfere with its efficiency: we do not interfere with the service which the railway is at present rendering to the people of Canada. And, more than that, instead of bringing the road under the direct administration of a department of the Government, we have its administration carried on by the same corporate machinery which has been employed for the purpose for many years past. I cannot see any fault or any fallacy in that reasoning. We are acquiring absolute control of the road and absolute ownership of the road to as full an extent as if we had acquired the physical assets. We are doing that by the acquisition of the stock, so as to prevent any interruption of the service of the road, or any impairment of its efficiency, and to keep its staff and its organization together, to prevent it from being brought under the direct administration of the Government, and to enable the system of administration which has carried on its work in the past to carry it on in the same way in the future.

There has been some criticism as to the method of arbitration. It is said we should have referred the question to the Judge of the Exchequer Court. No one has a higher respect than I have for the Judge of the Exchequer Court; but I would like to point out the authority upon which we based our action and the reasons which led us to the conclusion embodied in this Bill. The method of arbitration has the authority of the Drayton-Acworth report which it pleased some of my hon. friends on the other side of the House to commend most highly, and which I do not pretend for a moment to criticise. Let it be remembered, that report made two recommendations, first, that the country should acquire the Canadian Northern railway, not by the acquisition of its physical properties, but by the acquisition of its stock. The report said something more than that. It declared that the compensation, if any, to the holders of the stock should be determined by arbitration. That is the proposal which the Government has embodied in this Bill and which is now before this House for decision. The only difference between what we propose here and what Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth propose is this: Under the Drayton-Acworth report the holders of the stock were to be compensated by an allowance in stock. The amount of the allowance was to be determined by arbitration. One of the arbitrators was to be appointed by the trustees representing the Government, one by the Canadian Northern railway shareholders, and the third by the two arbitrators so appointed, or, failing an agreement, the third arbitrator was to be appointed by the senior judge of the Exchequer Court. One significant sentence was added which I will give to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) for his consideration. The Drayton-Acworth report recommended that an arbitration tribunal should be established for the purpose of making an award between the Government of Canada and the shareholders of the Canadian Northern, but it did not propose any reservation of the right of this Parliament to determine whether or not the award made by that tribunal should be accepted. No, the Drayton-Acworth report adds this significant sentence to its recommendation: "The decision of the board should be final." We say here, for the same reason, and practically under the very same conditions, that the decision of the board appointed under this Bill should also be final, subject to an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada if the award should not be unanimous. If the decision was to be final with respect to the compensation in common stock, what reason can be urged for the argument that it should not be final if it is to be paid in money? We do diverge from the Drayton-Acworth report in one respect. We say that the whole of the stock should be owned by the people of Canada, and if there is any value whatever in the stock owned by Mackenzie and Mann, that value should be paid in money and not by an allowance in stock. We think that the people of Canada should be the sole shareholders of this concern, and that the question as to any value in the stock should be determined by an award of arbitrators and that award should be final.

But if the hon. member for St. John is not satisfied with the authority of the Drayton-Acworth report, he may be satisfied with an authority which I am sure he will regard as equally high and that is the resolution which he seconded and to which I have just alluded. I will not trouble the House to read that resolution again. But let me point out just what that resolution did advocate. First, the Government was to acquire, not the physical property, but the stock. That was my hon. friend's resolution in 1914. That was his declaration in 1916. Second, the resolution declared that the stock was to be acquired at a price to be fixed by arbitration. Third, the price so fixed by arbitration was not to be subject to the approval of Parliament. He declares now that the price fixed by arbitration must be subject to the approval of Parliament. Why is it that the approval of Parliament is in the estimation of my hon. friend, necessary now, whereas it was not necessary, according to the view that he took in 1914 and again in 1916? Why was it reasonable and proper in 1914 to propose to acquire the stock, to fix the price by arbitration and to make the determination of the rbitrators final, if to-day the acquisition of the stock is an improper course, if to-day a reference to arbitration is undesirable, and if to-day the determination of the arbitrators is not to be final? My hon. friend answered himself by anticipation in 1914 and again in 1916. His attention having been directed to his own opinion, frequently expressed, in approval of the course which the Government now proposes to pursue, it might reasonably be supposed that the hon. gentleman would at least have thought it worth while when he was addressing this House to indicate some reason, if any exists, why his views to-day differ so materially from those which he entertained in 1914 and again only a year ago.

I think I have pretty fully answered what my hon. friend has said in the way of argument in support of his amendment. But there are just one or two other matters upon which I may say a word to the House. Questions have been raised as to the information in the possession of the Government. A public statement was read by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) a day or two ago, and although an answer has been given by the Minister of Finance, I think it worth while to make the members of this House and the people of this country generally understand what the real situation is in that regard. In the first place, even if the charge that the Government had not sufficient information to enable it to fix the price were true, it would have little relevancy, for the whole matter is to be threshed out before the arbitrators. The Government is not fixing the value of this stock. If we were fixing the value, and if information were lacking, the Government would be open to charge and worthy of censure. But the Government is not proposing to do anything of the kind, the Government is proposing to leave this question to be determined by a fair, capable and impartial board of arbitration; and if any information were lacking to the Government as to assets or liabilities, all that information can be supplied, and must be supplied, in the presence of the board of arbitrators. Thus, the argument is meaningless, is it not?

But, I have to say that the Government is in possession of full, complete and absolute information as to the assets and liabilities of this road, and I will endeavour to impress that upon the House and the country as earnestly and as forcibly as I can. In the first place, there has been an examination and audit of expenditure during the construction of the road by Government engineers and that information, available in their reports, is at the command of the Government and has been analysed. In the second place, when we came to Parliament in 1914 with our proposal for enabling the road to be completed, we selected the three best men we could find in the public service for the purpose — Mr. Graham A. Bell, Financial Comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals; Mr. Saunders, an exceedingly capable officer in the Department of Finance; and Mr. Shannon, Comptroller of the Intercolonial railway—and sent them to make a complete examination into the affairs of this road. They made it and they submitted a report in writing. That report was submitted to the Government and, if I remember correctly, it was laid on the Table of the House at that time. In the next place, pursuing the policy which was laid down in 1914, we had the most capable man at our command for the purpose, Mr. Graham A. Bell, maintain a continuous audit of this road from 1914 to 1916. He is thoroughly familiar with all the affairs of the road, with its assets, with its liabilities, with every detail of its operation. In the next place, in 1916, when the very great burden of duties imposed upon Mr. Graham A. Bell rendered it impossible for him to continue that work, we took one of the most capable firm of auditors we could find in Canada, the firm of Marwick, Mitchell, Peat & Company, and directed them to continue the work which Mr. Bell had carried out from 1914 to 1916, and so from 1916, when that firm undertook the work, up to the present time, there has been a continuous audit of the affairs of the Canadian Northern Railway company by that firm and continuous reports from month to month by them to Mr. Bell. But that is not all. We then had the elaborate investigation made by the commission of which Mr. Smith of New York was chairman—the commission which was composed of Mr. Smith, Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth. Hon. gentlemen in this House know the vast amount of information with regard to this road contained in that report. We know that it embraced among other things, a physical valuation of the road made by one of the greatest experts in the world, probably the greatest expert for the purpose known on this continent; and then, in addition to that, there is available to the Government, if it should desire to use it, the elaborate investigation by New York experts, occupying months I believe, made by Mr. Loomis and Mr. Platten. Mr. Loomis is president of the Lehigh Valley Railway company, and Mr. Platten is president of one of the greatest trust companies in New York. So, taking all this together, is it reasonable or fair to say that the Government has not very full and complete information, not only as to the assets and liabilities of the company, but as to the most minute details of all its affairs?

A suggestion has been made outside of this House that the proper method of dealing with this road would be to put it into liquidation. There has not been any serious argument raised on either side of the House that would lead us to believe that that is a wise or reasonable course.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Hon. gentlemen will remember that in 1916 we found this situation: There was the parent company, the Canadian Northern Railway company, and there were five subsidiary companies. There is also a subsidiary road in Nova Scotia. We brought them together, under the Act of 1914, with a view to making this one complete system and rendering its service more efficient than it otherwise would be. The portions of the physical property of the Canadian Northern Railway system which are owned by these different companies are situated in different provinces. These different roads have been separately financed; there are different mortgages, there are different trust deeds. Suppose this road should go into liquidation, what would be the situation? The result would be that we should undo all the work we accomplished in 1914, when we brought all these roads into one effective system. If these roads should go into liquidation, what kind of situation would arise? Some of these different concerns might be in liquidation, others might not. Assuming that you got them all into liquidation, what would be the result? You would have seven receiverships in the seven different provinces. You would have seven courts at work. You would have seven sets of lawyers. You would have conflicts as to earnings. You would have the road broken up into fragments. You would have it rendering an inefficient and practically useless service at a time when its service ought to be most effective and most efficient. You would have a paralysis of the service when it should be in its most vigorous operation. Conflicts as to the apportionment of earnings would arise. The rolling stock of the whole system is almost wholly owned by the parent company, whose road extends to only three of the provinces. The parent company owns property in only three provinces. If you finally succeeded in getting all these companies into liquidation, you might have two or three separate receivers in one province. What would it all amount to? What would be the result in the end? Could there be any good result? If the Government of Canada proposed, as I think we all do propose, to protect the securities of which it is guarantor, then, after all that confusion, after all that paralysis of the service, you would practically have to come back to the same proposal we have before Parliament to-day. That would be the net result.

But there is another difficulty that might arise. Suppose you succeeded in getting all these roads into liquidation, what would be the further result? I believe that the securities outstanding on the road at the present time are about $380,000,000. Whatever else may be said of the Canadian Northern railway, I do not think any one disputes that they did their financing in a very thorough and skilful way. They placed their securities at from three to four per cent. If you succeeded in getting all these companies into liquidation, I am informed that under most of the trust deeds the principal would become due. Suppose you had $380,000,000 of principal coming due, or say that only part of it would become due—suppose you had $250,000,000 of principal coming due under these trust deeds. Does not every hon. gentleman see that it would be to the direct interest of every one holding those securities that the principal should become due? For what reason? Their securities are worth to-day from 80 per cent to 90 per cent.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The three and one-half per cents are from 75 up.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They would immediately go to one hundred cents on the dollar, and, further than that, when we went back the next day to borrow that sum of money for the purpose of keeping the concern going, we should pay between six per cent and seven per cent instead of between three per cent and four per cent.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Their last loan cost them seven per cent.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is any one going seriously to propose that we shall put this property into liquidation for the purpose of creating the confusion, dislocation, and paralysis to which I have alluded, with no good result in the end? You would have to come back to some proposal like that embodied in this Bill if you intend to protect the guarantee of this country. If, as I have pointed out, liquidation will increase the annual fixed charges to about $22,000,000, instead of $15,000,000, as they are at present, I would not suppose that so absurd a proposal would be seriously put forward by any person who had given consideration to the real problem that is before the country and the Government at this time.

It really seems to me that my hon. friend's amendment has an air of unreality about it. It is inconsistent with all practice and precedent. It is essentially inconsistent with the Drayton-Acworth report. I contend that, except as to the question of operation, to which I will come in a moment, we are substantially, in this Bill, following the principle laid down in the Drayton-Acworth report. We are following it in three respects: first we are acquiring the stock; second, we are fixing its value, if any, by arbitration; third, we are providing that the arbitration shall be final. Those are the essential features of the Drayton-Acworth report.

There is something to be said on the question of operation. I do not propose to go into that fully to-night; I said something about it on a previous occasion, when the Bill was first introduced. There is absolutely no question that in this country we have a serious situation upon our hands in the railway problem that lies before us. I do not want to dwell too insistently on the origin of those problems, but I think my hon. friends on the other side of the House will not be prepared to dispute—indeed they have not disputed—what I said the other day in that regard, when I pointed out that they had given both these railways, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, the status which they now occupy, before we came into power. The only question that lay before this Government, after we came into power, was to decide whether we should sustain the situation which had been created, or whether we should inflict upon the country, particularly at a time of business depression, a dangerous blow by permitting the roads while in process of construction to go into liquidation, and by thus announcing to the world that Canada had embarked upon a policy of railway extension, in view of her great resources, which, in the end, she found she was not able to carry out. Rightly or wrongly, we decided to sustain this road, and we are dealing with the matter as best we can. But the situation that was created by my hon. friends on the other side of the House, and for which they were responsible in the first instance, has brought us to the question of how we are to provide for state-operated or 11 p.m. state-owned railways in this country in the most effective way. No one is more conscious than I am of the immense difficulties and tremendous importance of that question. It is for the people of Canada and the Parliament of Canada in the immediate future, to make or mar the future of state-ownership in Canada, and so far as I am concerned, I shall bend my best energies, so far as they may be called into service, to make the operation of this road as efficient in every respect as it can possibly be. I want to emphasize once more my belief that it would be absolutely absurd, and wholly impossible, for any department of the Government to undertake the administration of a great railway system such as we are now acquiring. That proposal is not feasible at all. I admit that at once, and it will be for the Parliament that is to be summoned in the early future to solve that problem by the best methods that the wisdom of Parliament can devise. In speaking of the problem I have said—and I desire to repeat it to-night—that I am convinced it will be necessary for the railway companies and the Government to get together in the immediate future, and establish a system of co-operative managment of all the railways in Canada. We have well up to 40,000 miles of railway in this country. I do not pretend that we have too many miles of railway, but I claim that perhaps they are not properly distributed. Less transcontinental lines and more branches in some of the provinces would, I believe, give better service to the people than is afforded by the policy which has been pursued. Without some system of co-operative management, we are simply going to continue the system that has been carried out in the past. That means that there will be unnecessary and even absurd duplication of lines. The importance of that consideration was very fully borne in upon me when I was studying the problem which has resulted in the Bill now before Parliament. I venture to repeat what I said before, that it came to my knowledge that the acquisition of the Canadian Northern railway by the Canadian Pacific railway would result in a saving to the Canadian Pacific railway of nearly $100,000,000 in new construction. What does that mean? It simply means that there are facilities which could be used by the Canadian Pacific railway, but, because those facilities are in the ownership of another company, they cannot be fully used for the purpose for which in the interest of the people of this country, they were constructed and might well be employed. A great railway corporation, because it can not use the Canadian Northern railway lines under some reasonable arrangement, is obliged to expend $100,000,000 in new construction. How is the interest on that $100,000,000 to be paid, and by whom is it to be paid? It is to be paid out of rates, and by the people of this country. There is absolutely no answer to that. If the Canadian Pacific railway, by acquiring the Canadian Northern railway, can save itself $100,000,000 in construction, that, to my mind, clearly indicates that there are facilities upon the lines of the Canadian Northern which are not fully employed, and which might be employed, and used by the Canadian Pacific railway, under some system of co-operative management, so as to save that expenditure to the people of this country.

I am perfectly conscious of the fact that railway men, perhaps not so insistently now as heretofore, tell you that it is quite impossible to carry out any such system of co-operative management, because the road that has control of the operation will not give the other road fair play.

I have gone into that question, as far as my limited knowledge would permit, with some of the heads of great railway systems in Canada, and I think they are coming to the conclusion that some such system of co-operative management as I have mentioned might well be carried out. It may also indicate the best method by which this road in the ownership of the people of Canada can be operated in an effective and reasonable way without party or political interference. That is what we must aim at; that is what we must attain, if state ownership is to continue in Canada; if the beginning now made is to be carried out to a larger future. Hon. gentlemen who are interested in the welfare of this country and who realize, as we all do, how greatly the future of Canada depends upon the reasonable and wise solution of this question, will, I am sure, give their minds to the consideration which I have put forward. I put it forward, of course, without any expert knowledge as to railway operation; but what has been accomplished in Great Britain during the past year or two may well give us a lead. There has been effective and efficient co-operative management of railways in England; we can surely carry out something of the same kind in this country. If that co-operative management could be carried out by the best railway organization this country is capable of producing—a railway organization which will give fair play to all interests—two important results would follow. One result would be that we should save enormous sums in capital expenditure in the next ten years—hundreds of millions of dollars, no doubt. But there is something more than that. The Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific are unable to meet their fixed charges. For that reason we are assisting the Grand Trunk Pacific at this session; for that reason we are acquiring the balance of the stock of the Canadian Northern. Does any hon. gentlemen, even though he be no more acquainted than I am with railway operation, doubt that by the system of co-operative management to which I have alluded we can save millions of dollars annually in operating expenses in the future? There is absolutely no doubt about it; it seems plain to me that such must be the case. I asked these railway experts about it, and every one of them has assured me that if it should be practicable to carry out some system of that kind, we would save not only enormous sums in capital expenditure, but enormous sums every year, perhaps $15,000,000 or $20,000,000, in the operation of these roads. I believe it would also give more efficient operation. That is one of the great problems of Canada in the immediate future. It is one of the problems to which every member of the House ought to direct his attention; it is one of the problems which must engage the attention of the Parliament that is to be summoned in the near future. I believe that notwithstanding the enormous difficulties which they present to us, the railway problems of Canada may be effectively solved by some such means. I hope, indeed, that when the question does come in Parliament, hon. gentlemen on both sides, will co-operate to the end that I have indicated, and that we shall in that way be able to deal, without serious detriment to the public interest, with the tremendous problems of transportation which will lie at the very threshold of our duty when the next Parliament is summoned.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, the hour is late, and as we sat rather late this morning discussing this Bill, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to give notice that at the next sitting of the House I will move that the debate on the third reading of Bill No. 125 shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend think it is fair to give notice of that kind, in view of the address just made by the Prime Minister? Does he think that the address of the Prime Minister is one which the House ought not to consider?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This Bill has now been under debate for two weeks. Friday night is not a convenient night to take the vote, because so many members go home. If the leader of the Opposition desires to speak, as far as this side of the House is concerned, he will not be confined to twenty minutes. But I do not see how we can be assured that this debate will be brought to an end to-morrow night unless this notice is given and the necessary motion moved to-morrow. Having regard to the convenience of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, I think that this vote should be taken to-morrow night, not Friday night.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is not paying his leader a very great compliment when he asks the House to dispense with consideration of that right hon. gentleman's address.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend need not worry about my views in regard to that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose these are the last terms imposed by Sir Clifford Sifton.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no desire to be unfair to my hon. friend. If we get any assurance that the debate will conclude to-morrow we are prepared to go on in the ordinary way. As we cannot get any such assurance we have to give this notice. With the consent of the House, the remarks of the hon. gentleman might be continued; I should not for a moment dream of raising objection if consent of the House was given.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Minister of Finance has said that the debate upon this Bill has lasted two weeks. I do not know that it should have lasted any shorter time than that. The question is one of the most important that we have ever had before us; it is full of complications; it is full of figures. We were given information from time to time as the debate went on. Even if the debate should require one day more, I think the Government might very well be satisfied. I know that Friday is not a very convenient day to take up such business as this, but there is other business before the House. The Government cannot complain that we have in any way delayed their business. Perhaps my hon. friend will reconsider the matter, and decide not to press this motion to-morrow.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Thursday, August 30, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

ADMINISTRATOR YUKON TERRITORY.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Who is the Administrator of Yukon Territory?
2. When was he appointed, what is his salary, and what amount is paid for living allowance?
3. How much has he received for each since the date of his appointment?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. G. N. Williams.
2. First appointed 9th October, 1915, acting until 9th June, 1916. Re-appointed 13th October, 1916, and is still acting. Salary, $500 per month. He does not receive any living allowance.
3. From 9th October, 1915, to 9th June, 1916, $4,020.97. From 13th October, 1916, to 31st July, 1917, $4,806.45. Total, $8,827.42.

ENLISTMENT OF VOLUNTEERS AT MOOSEJAW.

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Is there any arrangement by which volunteers may enlist in Moosejaw, Saskatchewan?
2. If so, before whom may they be attested?
3. How long has the present arrangement been in effect in Moosejaw?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.
2. Before a justice of the peace.
3. Always; but, in addition thereto, there were recruiting officers at this point so long as the results warranted it.

THE JAMES SIMMONDS CO.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES:

1. Has the James Simmonds Co., Ltd., Halifax, any contract with the Militia Department for the supply of any goods?
2. If so, what is the date of the contract?
3. What is the amount involved?
4. What character of goods have been supplied?
5. Who were the president, general manager and secretary-treasurer of this company, respectively?
6. Have any goods been purchased from this company other than under special contract?
7. If so, when, and for what amount?
8. Is Lieut.-Col. R. B. Simmonds of the 66th Princess Louise Fusiliers interested in this company?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

5. The department is not informed.

6. Yes. Hardware for engineer services.

7. Since April 1st, aggregating two thousand five hundred and fifty dollars for engineer services, one hundred and ten dollars for ordnance services, twenty-two dollars and fifty cents for barrack services.

8. The department is not informed.

MARCONI STATION AT LOUISBURG.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Has Marconi wireless station at Louisburg, N.S., been closed, and, if so, at what date?
2. Are the censors who were stationed there employed anywhere else, and if not, do they still receive their salary as censors?
3. Is it the intention of the Department of Militia to keep at that wireless station the soldiers who were there?
4. What is the number of officers and soldiers at that station?
5. Is, or has, W. W. McVicar been one of the censors employed at that station? What is his salary and the date of his appointment?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. On 4th August, 1917, the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company was ordered to cease to transmit traffic.

2. The services of the present censorship staff will be dispensed with on the 1st September, when the office will be abolished. The censors will receive pay during this time (4th August to 1st September), as their services are necessary in winding up the business.

3. Under consideration.

4. The necessary guards as recommended by the General Officer Commanding for the protection of the station.

5. W. K. McVicar was appointed decoding clerk on 25th June, 1917. He received $2.50 per diem and 75 cents per diem living allowance. His employment terminates with the closing of the station.

IMMIGRATION OFFICIALS AT QUEBEC AND MONTREAL.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Is it not a fact that the great majority of the immigrants arriving at the ports of Quebec and Montreal speak only the English language?
2. How many immigration officials are employed at the said ports, and how many of said officials are able to converse freely in the English language?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes.

2. Twenty-seven officials at Montreal. All converse freely in English.

2. Thirty-two officials at Quebec. All but eight converse freely in English, and of these eight four are sufficiently competent to understand all questions addressed to them in English.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many additional buildings and offices have been rented by the various departments of the Government in the city of Ottawa during the calendar years 1914, 1915, 1916 and 1917?
2. What are the names of the lessors, the length of the lease and the respective rentals of said buildings?
3. What department in each case is occupying said premises?

Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many officers and men are attached to the Dental Corps in the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick military districts?
2. What are their names and rank?
3. What are the salaries and allowances of each of them per month?

Mr. TOBIN:

1. What are the names and rank of the different chaplains in the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick military districts?
2. What are the salaries and allowances paid to each of them per month?

PAY OF VOLUNTEERS OPERATING TRAINS IN FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John, N.B.): I would like to take advantage of the presence of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) and also of my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane), to call attention to what I think is a very important matter, and to base a question upon it. I have before me a letter, part of which is as follows:

On January 17th, 1917, the St. John and other Canadian papers published with big headlines Mr. Gutelius' circular to employees of the Canadian Government Railway, asking for volunteers to operate trains in France, taking supplies and munitions to trenches. Among other conditions it stated: "And with the further understanding that they will receive wages made up of military pay supplemented by railway pay equal to their present pay", etc. The required number were quickly secured, briefly drilled, sailed for England March 1st, and after delay of about a fortnight went to France, and of course are there now.

My information is that instead of the promise made by Mr. Gutelius in his circular being carried out, these men are only receiving $34 per month, instead of in many cases $90 per month, which would be the amount of their railway pay. I think the ministers will agree with me that there is nothing more important than to keep faith with those who go to the front, and nothing so calculated to interfere with recruiting as a failure to keep such a promise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I now ask a question, and, if I am out of order, the Speaker will call my attention to the fact. I would like to know whether those statements are true, and whether or not the promise made by Mr. Gutelius has been carried out.

Mr. COCHRANE: So far as I am aware, the railway has carried out every promise it made. If my hon. friend will put his question on the Order Paper, and will give the facts, I will take it up.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL—THIRD READING.

MOTION TO APPLY RULE 17B CARRIED ON DIVISION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Under Rule 17B I beg to move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Hazen:

That the debate on the Third Reading of Bill No. 125, An Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company shall not be further adjourned.

The motion was carried on the following division:

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Thomas White for the third reading of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, continued from August 29, 1917.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the rule, each hon. member who speaks on this motion is limited to twenty minutes. I have thought it advisable to knock with the gavel when an hon. member has spoken for nineteen minutes, so that he may bring his remarks to a conclusion within the time allowed under the rule. On the expiry of the twenty minutes I shall knock twice with the gavel.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I fear that under the baneful influence of the Government in office our institutions are becoming gradually Americanized, the use of the gavel in this House being a somewhat novel proceeding with us, but one which is common with our neighbours to the south of us. Whether the result will be a good thing for Canadian institutions or not I do not know, but certainly the introduction of this novel method of stopping debate accords well with the nefarious measure it is being applied to. We are here, Sir, dealing with the most serious question, as far as the financial interests of Canada are concerned, that has been before this Parliament for a long period of years. At an earlier period we heard a great deal about the tremendous obligations imposed upon this country by the Canadian Pacific Railway proposition. Although that proposition was a very great one, it is not comparable in the slightest degree, from the standpoint of the amount of the obligation which is being imposed upon the country, with this one which is being forced and crushed through this House without the slightest regard for the consequences. It is undoubted that the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) is induced to take this course because he has some facts to conceal, and because he is unwilling, or unable, to give to the Canadian people the information which they are entitled to receive before a measure having such tremendous consequences to the country passes through this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) accuses a minister of deliberately concealing facts and availing himself of the rules of the House for the purpose of so doing, he is going beyond the rules of debate.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have a right to say that, as an explanation of the reason why this closure is being applied, the Minister of Finance is unwilling to give the House the information that the House has a right to have.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Under our rules, the hon. member must take his seat. The second statement of the hon. member is not quite so objectionable as the former one, but still I think that both of his statements exceed the proper decorum of debate.

Mr. MACDONALD: My second statement was an exact repetition of the first one. I have no desire to transgress the ordinary rules of debate but I have a right to say to the House and the country what I deem to be the correct explanation of why this measure is being forced through—

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes; so long as the language of an hon. member is parliamentary.

Mr. MACDONALD: I submit that my language is quite parliamentary in every particular. I was not suggesting motives. I was stating the reason why the Minister of Finance was using this novel method of forcing through this measure, and I have a right to do that.

We are discussing to-day the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) which declares that before this country is finally and positively saddled with this enormous liability of $650,000,000, together with whatever amount the arbitrators may choose to award for the stock which the Canadian people are supposed to get under this agreement, they should come back and submit to Parliament the question of whether or not that money should be paid. In view of the enormous liability, in view of the consequences which it will have for all time in the future upon this country from the financial point of view, such a reasonable proposition as that of my hon. friend from St. John ought to be accepted by this or any other government. When that proposition was made, what was the answer given by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) last night? He told us that we should not think in this country of confiscating any person's property. Why did he not say so in 1914? When in 1914 he brought down the legislation by which he proposed to give the Canadian Northern Railway Company $45,000,000, he and his Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) said to the House and the country: Pass this legislation and we will have the right to confiscate. If it is wrong to-day it was wrong in 1914. The Solicitor General on that day, dealing with that measure, deliberately and solemnly announced to Parliament that the effect of it was that:

> We now here bind you that should the day of default come you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever.

After that notice was given to Parliament in 1914 and the legislation was passed upon that understanding, what right has the Prime Minister to come to us to-day and tell us that we should hesitate about confiscation.

I have seen properties in which men have invested deliberately taken away, legislation passed in this House which was confiscation beyond all question, and when the Government pledged itself three years ago that it had the right to confiscate and could use that right and it would not cost the Canadian people five cents to get all the equity in this road, why should we have all these paltry excuses put forward to-day as reasons why they cannot confiscate when they have a right to? Then we hear that the Government had all the information necessary, that it had Mr. Bell's audit of the Canadian Northern accounts, that it had reports by Auditor Bell and reports of the Drayton-Acworth Commission and the report of Mr. Loomis. Why did not the members of this House have that information? Of what use is it to this Parliament, or to the people, if the Government have information which they decline to give out so that we may form a judgment? Let me give one or two illustrations of information so far withheld and without which this House is saddling this country with this enormous liability. The Finance Minister has not told Parliament, and apparently is not going to, the amount for which this stock is pledged with the pledgees, and this is information which the House has a right to receive. In addition to that, let me remind the Finance Minister that there are $25,000,000 of income convertible stock outstanding, and that at the time that stock was issued and sold in Great Britain, as we are told it was, $25,000,000 of the common stock of the company was deposited with the National Trust Company as security, so that if the holders of the income stock desired common stock they could obtain it at any time up to the year 1919. That stock is in the hands of the National Trust Company. Has the minister told the House if any arrangement or understanding has been made with the holders of the income convertible stock in existence as to whether they will, before 1919, exercise their right to take that stock, which is now in the hands of the trustees?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That stock is not covered by this agreement at all.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, will you take notice of any interruptions?

Mr. SPEAKER: I will give the hon. gentleman full advantage of any interruptions.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then we are told with great gusto by hon. gentlemen opposite that they are getting absolute title to all the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway and of the subsidiary companies. And yet the Finance Minister, as you will find from Hansard of August 17, brought down a return in regard to certain subsidiary companies which showed that this Government and the Canadian people will not, as a result of this Bill, get all the stock of the subsidiary companies. There is outstanding $5,947,100 of that stock held by people outside, that being made up of $2,405,400 stock of the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company; $2,000 stock of the Central Ontario Railway Company; $2,940,000 of the Duluth, Winnipeg and Pacific Railway Company; $75,000 of the Halifax and Southwestern Railway Company; $500 of the Irondale, Bancroft and Ottawa Railway Company; $521,200 of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company; and $3,000 of the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company. That stock will not become the property of the Canadian people. But what will be the result? It will be that unpaid dividends on stock guaranteed by the Canadian Northern in connection with the issue of debentures of these companies must be met. This stock is held by outside holders, and the result will be that some people, whose names are not known, whose names the Minister of Finance will not give to the House, will come into possession of stock which will be rendered valuable and be able to earn dividends, and in the case of debentures, receive their back dividends which have not been paid by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. Should we not know something about that amount. Is six million dollars approximately, so inordinately small a sum that nobody needs care about it? Surely in this time, when people are being taxed in every possible way, $6,000,000 cannot be disregarded. Yet hon. gentlemen are asking us to go it absolutely blind in regard to that matter, to pay no attention whatever to it, and they give no information. Not only that, but all over this country there are coal companies, there are lumber companies, the stock of which has been held by the holders of the Canadian Northern railway stock. I venture to say that if you had a correct statement of the stock pledged with the Canadian Bank of Commerce, it would be found that a large number of companies in which these gentlemen are personally interested have had their stock pledged by the holders with the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and that the argument will be made to the arbitrators by the pledgees, whose indebtedness we do not know, that the value of the common stock of the Canadian Northern railway in the hands of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann was very much greater by reason of the fact that it made valuable the stock in these coal and lumber companies all over the country, and on that account additional value should be given to the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway, and it should be assessed at a higher rate. But we have no information with regard to it, the House and the country are told to go it blind, to shoulder this liability, to assume all these charges. For what purpose? Not because of any proposition of Government ownership. The Prime Minister last night talked fantastically about some system of co-operative management of railways, with glittering generalities, absolutely evading any statement of principle as to what the intention was, and the House is asked to accept that beautiful reason as a justification of the assumption of this enormous liability, imperilling the financial position of this country. I venture to predict that the Finance Minister, inside of six months, will be unable to sell the securities of Canada except at a figure so disgracefully low that every Canadian will hang his head in shame, and the cause of the depreciation of our securities will be this infamous bargain which is being forced through the House to-day by the hon. gentleman. The Prime Minister tells us of all the information that the Government has yet, he is carefully concealing it from the House. I have indicated one or two items in regard to which we should have had information. I cannot, in the short time within which I am compelled to limit my remarks, deal with every one of these questions, but I have indicated some of them.

Then he told us what a terrible thing it would be for Canada if this enterprise was compelled to go into the hands of a receiver. Why, said the Prime Minister last night; you would have to appoint seven receivers; you would have to have seven courts at work and seven sets of lawyers; you would have conflicts as to earnings; you would have the road broken up into fragments, and seven different receiverships. I was astounded at the Prime Minister venturing to make that statement in the House. He is too good a lawyer, as I know from my association with him at the bar of my province, not to be aware that if he was speaking from a legal standpoint and not from a political standpoint he would not have made that statement. Does he not know that, under the Exchequer Court Act of this country, it is open for this Government or for any creditor of the Canadian Northern Railway, in respect of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and each and every one of these companies which were mentioned in the schedule of the Act of 1914 as being railways declared to be for the general advantage of Canada—to go to the Exchequer Court and have one receiver appointed covering the control over every one of these railways. I make that statement and the right hon. gentleman cannot dispute it. I have the words of the Exchequer Court Act under my hand and I can quote them to the House to show that the judge of the Exchequer Court has power to appoint receivers whose power to deal with this question will be adequate and ample to cover the control of all of these railways.

The legislation of 1914 expressly declared that the subsidiary companies which up to that time had not been declared to be railways for the general advantage of Canada, should come under federal authority, and they were so placed, and they still are there. Therefore, why does the Prime Minister talk about seven receiverships, seven courts of law, and seven sets of lawyers, in the face of that fact when, so far as the interests of this country are concerned, through the judge of the Exchequer Court one receiver could be appointed, with all the ample powers which attach to a receiver, who could deal with this whole problem, and during the time of stress and financial difficulty and uncertainty could keep that railway in operation and in such condition that we would be able to deal with it later on, when proper investigation was had. But this is the reason, forsooth, why we cannot do anything except what the Government asks. Then my right hon. friend the Prime Minister told us they were following the Drayton-Acworth report in three particulars. My right hon. friend should have told the House wherein he was not following the Drayton-Acworth report, and if he had done so, he would have found a good many instances other than the scanty three which he had to conjure up as some justification for his statement. There is not a line in the Drayton-Acworth report that recommends giving a cent of money to Mackenzie and Mann. On the contrary they say it is not "for value received," because there was no value in it. There might be a disposition made of a certain quantity of stock which should remain here, but no money was to be paid, and yet my right hon friend (Sir Robert Borden) made an attempt to lead the country to believe that the Drayton-Acworth report recommended that Parliament should recognize the right of Mackenzie and Mann to be paid in cash. There is not a line of that report that warrants that statement, and it cannot be justified. Why my right hon. friend should have made that statement I am at a loss to understand, in view of the fact that the Drayton-Acworth report told us this stock was not worth a dollar, and not a dollar should be paid for it, yet Parliament is seriously asked to provide for an arbitration, and if the arbitrators are unanimous there is no appeal, and whether the arbitrators are unanimous or not we cannot in this Parliament exercise our discretion or our judgment in regard to it no matter what the state of Canada may be financially six months from now. In other words, we, or our successors in this Parliament, will be tied hand and foot from this moment, and will be unable to do anything to relieve this country from the enormous liability that is being imposed on it. And, forsooth, the Finance Minister tells us about this professional arbitrator at Toronto, this wonderful gentlemen, Sir William Meredith, about whom no person could make any remark, who will be sure to give a verdict in favour of the Government. That was the position the Finance Minister took. Sir William Meredith either is earning his money as Chief Justice of Ontario, or he is not earning it. I am glad to notice that a Conservative senator has introduced a measure which I am told has been passed in the Senate, which provides that in the case of judges like Sir William Meredith, who receive very big fees, the amount of these fees shall be deducted from the salary which the country is expected to pay them. Either Chief Justice Meredith is performing his duty as Chief Justice of Ontario, or he is not. If he is performing his duty to the full he has no business going into matters of this kind; and, in view of the fact that he is the professional arbitrator of the Conservative Government of Ontario and of this Government, he is not an appointee to whom the country can give carte blanche and say: Take this question into consideration, and Parliament will never have the right to control it in any way. What the Prime Minister was attempting to talk about in regard to the co-operative management of these roads, I was unable to conceive last night, and after reading Hansard this morning I was unable to understand it. Was he telling us that hereafter the country was going to finance the whole three railways of the country? If that is the proposition we ought to know it, but the whole thing is in such a position of blissful uncertainty, with no information, that the country is being told to take it blind. Just one word, Mr. Speaker, before I close—as you are compelling me to close—in regard to this allegation that this House has had an opportunity to consider this matter. Let me give the dates. On August 2nd, the Minister of Finance made a statement about the railways. Then he said nothing for five days. On August 7th, he moved a resolution in regard to this matter, and the House went into committee on the 7th and 8th August. On the 9th August the first reading was given to the Bill pro forma. My hon. friend then sat down and said nothing. My time is up, but let me complete this sentence.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given the hon. gentleman two extra minutes.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was interrupted twice. I want to finish—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman was interrupted once—

Mr. MACDONALD: And once by yourself, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was compelled to call the hon. member to order; that was not my fault.

Mr. MACDONALD: It should not count against me.

Mr. SPEAKER: And there was one interruption by the hon. Minister of Finance for the fraction of a minute. I have given the hon. gentleman two extra minutes, and I cannot allow any more.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to complete my statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD: However, if the Speaker rules I cannot complete the sentenc , then I cannot.

Mr. SPEAKER: I gave the hon. gentleman two full minutes over the allotted time. Whether it is acceptable to hon. members or not, it is my idea to allow each hon. member one minute extra in which to conclude his remarks, but at the end of that time I must ask hon. members to conclude.

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, it so happens that, on account of the circumstances in which the House is not interested, I could not be present during the greater part of the debate on this question, and this is the first opportunity I have had to intervene in it. As my time is limited, I cannot do more than touch on two or three of the points which are in issue. It is true that last evening my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) was kind enough to say that, so far as I was concerned, I might exceed the rules and take all the time I wanted. I am sorry to say to the Minister of Finance that I cannot even thank him for this courtesy. It is recorded in the Great Book that King David and his companions were in the desert, suffering from thirst, and when some water was offered, the King, seeing that there was not enough for himself and his companions, would not touch it. I am in the same position today. There is not enough to go around the members of the Opposition, and I shall share with them the short ration of time allowed to each of us.

Therefore, I cannot do more than touch two or three points which were involved in this discussion, and the first to which I shall direct my attention will be to a statement made and repeated again and again from that side of the House by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), the first time he spoke, and repeated by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) on more than one occasion—almost every time he was on his feet, and he was on his feet several times—and by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) who declined to accept an invitation tendered him to go to the city of Toronto to discuss this question. The statement was made and repeated, that all the members on this side of the House, including myself and the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) had agreed at one time to pay $30,000,000 for the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway.

Sir, let me tell the whole story, because the story as presented by hon. gentlemen opposite has been only partly told. In 1914, I need not remind the House, the Canadian Northern was practically insolvent; at all events, it could not meet its liabilities or pay its fixed charges, and under such conditions, it was, by law, insolvent. It came to this House for assistance, and the question arose how Parliament should deal with it. Three courses were open to us then as now. The company might go into liquidation, it might be temporarily assisted, or the Government might take it over. We did not then, any more than we do now, favour this company going into liquidation, and in this respect our policy is different from that of the United States where many companies that have been in difficulties similar to those of the Canadian Northern have been allowed to go into liquidation. If I had more time at my disposal I should like to speak for a few moments on the difference in policy between the United States and ourselves in that regard, but I pass on. The Government decided at that time that we should assist the company. It was represented to us that if we advanced the sum of $45,000,000, that amount would enable the company to settle all their claims, meet all their liabilities, and complete the enterprise and make it a going and prosperous concern. The Government took every possible mortgage they could upon the assets of the company, and it is well in this connection for me to recite the Act to show the extent of the mortgage that was taken by the Government at that time securing the advance of $45,000,000, and the methods provided for the collection of it. First of all, let me say that the stock was increased from $77,000,000 to $100,000,000, by a stroke of the legislative pen, to use the graphic phrase of my hon. friend from Calgary the other day. The Government took $40,000,000 of the stock, and a mortgage upon the balance, and the company bound itself to grant " a first, fixed and specific mortgage or charge upon the shares " of the company. It also undertook to

(b) grant a specific mortgage or charge upon the mortgage securities and shares of stock now or from time to time hereafter deposited with and specifically mortgaged under the Trust Deed of the 30th day of June, 1903.

(c) grant fixed, specific and floating mortgages or charges upon the undertaking of the Canadian Northern and its properties, assets, rents and revenues, and its rights, powers and franchises present and future.

Nothing was omitted. Everything that the company had in the way of property was covered by the mortgage. Then it was stipulated, and to this the company agreed, that in the event of default the mortgage would be foreclosed and everything would be lost by the company, even their equity of redemption. So far we made no opposition to the proposition made at that time by the Government. We agreed that we should take a complete mortgage upon everything that the company had, and that in the event of default the company should lose everything it had mortgaged. That was the covenant; it is there in the law. Nothing could be more ample or more efficient than the mortgage we then took. But that proposition of the government provided one remedy, and one remedy only. It provided for the Government recouping itself for the assistance it had given to the company, in the event of default taking place. But we were not content with that on this side of the House, because no provision was made whereby the Government could take over the road in the event of it proving a going and prosperous concern. The Government provided for our taking over the road in the event of default, in which case the company would lose everything it had, but the Government made no provision whatever for acquiring the property if the company was able to meet its liabilities and become a going and prosperous concern. That was the difference between the policy of the Government, and our policy.

My hon. friend from St. John moved an amendment that in the event of the company becoming prosperous we should make provision to acquire, not from an insolvent but from a solvent company, the property of the road for the benefit of the 4 p.m.

Canadian people. His amendment contained four different provisions. The provisions were that the stock should not be $100,000,000, but should be reduced to $30,000,000; that this stock should be placed in the hands of the Receiver General to be held by him in trust for His Majesty for the period of five years; that if during that period of five years the company discharged its liabilities to the Government, made all the interest payments on the money advanced, and carried out all the obligations it undertook under that agreement, then at the end of the five years the stock should be returned to the previous owners, Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited. Then came the other provisions to which I now call the attention of the House:

To provide that the Governor in Council shall have the option at any time within such period of five years—

That is, during the time the company was meeting its liabilities, doing a good business, and becoming a prosperous concern.

To provide that the Governor in Council shall have the option at any time within such period of five years to acquire the absolute ownership of the said stock and of the said Canadian Northern Railway system, and of all the constituent and subsidiary companies mentioned in the said resolution or proposed agreement, subject to existing encumbrances and to said arrangements regarding the conversion of said income charge convertible debenture stock, for a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed the sum of $30,000,000, being the par value of such stock so to be reduced as above provided.

This amendment was voted down. On the third reading of the Bill I moved this amendment embodying the same ideas:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that under existing circumstances no assistance should be given to the Canadian Northern Railway Company unless at the same time it is provided that the Government have power, within a reasonable time, to acquire the ownership of the entire stock of the company at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed thirty million dollars.

Those were the two policies—the policy of the Government, and the policy of the Opposition. The policy of the Government provided for one contingency only—for the contingency of default by the company, in which event the provisions for our taking over the road were ample. But we asked the Government to go further and provide for another contingency, namely, that in the event of the company becoming a solvent and prosperous concern we should have power to purchase the property.

The policy of the Government was this: that if the company became insolvent, unable to meet its liabilities, then the Government would take charge of the company and do the best they could with it; but, refusing our proposition, they made a provision that, if the company was solvent, prosperous, doing good business, if it should continue to prosper, the Government would not have the right to acquire it. Our policy on the other hand was this: that we proposed to buy at a sum, not exceeding $30,000,000, to be fixed by arbitration, the property of a living, growing, prosperous company. Does my hon. friend consider that the position to-day is parallel to that which existed in 1914? Hon. gentlemen opposite say to us: Oh, but you are going back on your own record; you said that you would be prepared to pay $30,000,000 for that property, and now you object because we are doing what you proposed in 1914. Nothing of the kind. You propose to buy the stock of a bankrupt company. We proposed to buy the stock of a living, growing and prosperous company. Are the two things the same. No; there is all the difference in the world. The position of affairs is not as has been presented by the Minister of Finance, or the Solicitor General, or the Prime Minister. Those hon. gentlemen have never stated in any of their utterances that it was not the stock of a bankrupt company that we proposed to buy, but the stock of a living, growing, prosperous company. I think I have shown to the satisfaction of every man who is not biassed in this matter, that those hon. gentlemen are doing the Opposition an injustice in presenting the case as they have done.

Having disposed of this point, I have this to say further upon the whole policy of the Government at this time. The event foreseen in the statute of 1914 has arisen. The company is in default; it is insolvent, and we have again to-day to face the same problem. Again the company comes before Parliament asking for further assistance. If the company is in the position that in 1917 it has gone into default, as was foreseen in 1914, what is the policy that ought to be followed? The policy which ought to be followed is the policy which was written in the statute-book. The section of the statute has been read several times already, but we cannot read it too often, and once more I will read it so that the people may know that in 1917 the Government are going completely back upon the law which they themselves enacted in 1914. Section 24 of the statute of 1914 says:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

Could language be more explicit, more certain, more accurate than the language there laid down? In the event of default, the mortgage shall be foreclosed, and everything that is foreclosed, the stock, the physical property, shall at once be vested in His Majesty. Why is that not done to-day? Why is not the mortgage foreclosed as it was not only contemplated but enacted that it should be? What reason has been advanced against foreclosing? I have heard it stated by an hon. member—if I mistake not, it was by the Solicitor General—that the Bill of to-day is in perfect accord with the statute of 1914, because he stated that, under the law of 1914, Parliament can impose conditions as to foreclosure. That is true, but what are those conditions? I do not know what they are. It is for the Government, who are the framers of the Act, to tell us what those conditions are, and they have not done so. I am sure, however, of one thing, namely, that whatever the conditions may be those conditions were to be imposed at the time of foreclosure, but no conditions could be made which would change the nature of the law and substitute for foreclosure an Act of purchase. To-day, however, we are not asked to foreclose; we are asked simply to pass an Act whereby the Government may purchase the stock of the company. The Government have to-day, under the statute passed in 1914, the power to foreclose that mortgage, and to put their hands upon that stock, but they now ask us not to do that to which the company agreed if they made default; they now ask us to purchase the stock of the company. Am I stating the case too strongly when I say that we are asked to purchase stock of a company which to-day is in default, which stock we have a right to take possession of in behalf of the Canadian people? Oh, we are told, but that would be confiscation. As was asked a moment ago by my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald): Why did not the Government think of that in 1914 when they passed that legislation? What do we confiscate? The other day the Solicitor General made this appeal to me: Are you going to sanction an injustice of this kind; are you going to confiscate the property of any man; you never did that while you were in office. No, I never did that while I was in office, and I do not want to do it to-day. According to the report of the commissioners, we are taking away property which is valued at $370,000,000, the existing liabilities on which amount to $400,000,000. That is to say, we are going to pay $30,000,000 more than the value of the property which we take. Is that confiscation?

In regard to this stock, let us come down to first principles. Companies are authorized to sell stock in order that they may have capital with which to carry on their enterprises. This company has been authorized to issue $100,000,000 worth of stock. It has never sold one dollar's worth of that stock; it has never received one dollar for it, and therefore, to say to us that when we take that stock, we are taking anything from the company, does not bear argument and should not be considered seriously by serious people.

We are taking nothing from the company. We are giving them more than they are entitled to, and the answer I make to my hon. friend the Solicitor General is that I do not believe any more than he does in confiscation, but in this case, acting as we do and opposing this law as we do, and asking that the Act which is before us should not become law, we are doing no injustice to anybody. I would not think of doing an injustice to Mackenzie and Mann. On the contrary, I know they deserve every consideration. If I thought I was taking one dollar's worth of property from them I would not do it, but as it is I can vote against this Bill with a free and clear conscience.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): So far as I am personally concerned, I have no feeling against Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, in fact I have nothing but admiration for the courage and ability they have shown in building this road. They have not only shown courage and ability, but I think they have, perhaps, built the road as cheaply as any person else could have built it under the circumstances. No doubt they were limited to a great extent as they went along by lack of capital, and we all know what that means to any one who embarks upon an undertaking of this kind. The Secretary of State told us the other evening, and several other hon. gentlemen have told us—I think the Prime Minister also made the statement—that if we took this road over under the scheme put forward by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), it would mean confiscation. My right hon. leader has just spoken very clearly on that point, and has set forth my views exactly. This cannot possibly be conjured up as a case of confiscation. My hon. friend the present Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) said most explicitly and definitely, in 1914, that under no consideration were the owners of this road to come back for further assistance, and in the event of default they were not to raise the claim that we were confiscating their property. According to the Drayton-Acworth report, and according to Professor Swain's report, and taking over the liabilities of the road we are actually paying more than the road cost. Therefore, nobody can imagine we are confiscating the property. Altogether apart from that, the owners of the road made a bargain with us in 1914. They were notified then most clearly and definitely by the Solicitor General that if they failed in their enterprise and we took it over by foreclosure they must not, under any consideration, set up a claim that we were confiscating the road. Where two parties make an agreement, and one is not able to carry out his undertaking, if the other takes over the property under the agreement there is not, and there cannot be, any question of confiscation. If a man mortgages his property and fails to redeem it, if the mortgagee takes it over nobody ever dreams of confiscation. I have nothing to say against the pledgees of this stock for doing the very best they can to get the highest price possible for the stock, and I have nothing to say against Mackenzie and Mann for doing the best they can to get the highest price possible for this stock. It is their right and their privilege as independent citizens to get all they can. At the same time, it is equally our right, as representatives of the people, to see that the interests of the country are guarded. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister waxed very indignant last night in regard to the resolution seconded by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in 1914, the effects of which resolution have just been stated by my right hon. leader, and stated that we were opposed to arbitration. I have not heard any one on this side of the House express opposition to the principle of arbitration. What we claim is that in this case there is nothing to arbitrate. That is the position we have taken right along. The other day in committee the Government saw fit to vote through the proposition that the value of this stock shall be left to arbitration. That being so, it is our duty to see that the interests of the country are fully guarded by this arbitration. Both sides of the House have an equal responsibility in this. My hon. friend the member for St. John moved a very simple resolution, and one which will absolutely guard the interests of the people. It is to the effect that the finding of this arbitration board must be subject to the approval of the award by Parliament. Nothing can be more simple than that, and in my judgment nothing can more completely safeguard the interests of the people. My right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) said last night that the reason they were taking over the stock instead of taking over the road itself was because they were leaving the operation of the road under its present management, or leaving the corporate entity absolutely as it was. We have been told by the Premier and also by the Minister of Finance that they were going to put this road in such a position that it would not be under the Governor in Council, and therefore would not be subject to party influence. They have not as yet given us any indication as to how the board of management will be organized, or how it will be appointed. If it is appointed by the Governor in Council it certainly must be under the control of the Governor in Council, and must be under party influence. There is only one way to avoid that and that is to appoint them in the same way as judges are appointed so that they are responsible to Parliament only. The people will never be satisfied with a commission to manage this road, or the roads of this country, unless it is in an independent commission and is composed of capable men. As to the personnel of the board of arbitration, I have nothing to say against Sir William Meredith personally but I would have been very much more satisfied had some hard-headed, capable business man been appointed by the Government as their arbitrator. This is a business proposition after all. If we are going to arbitrate as to the value of this stock, the arbitration should be before hard-headed, capable, business men who have had experience and not before some judge who has been taken away from his business connections for a number of years. He may be absolutely fair in his mind and he may be capable but his business for years has had to do with proceedings in court. I have always been opposed to the appointment of judges on arbitration boards. Judges as a rule have been removed for years from intercourse with the business of the country. I have never been able to find out why judges are constantly appointed to arbitration boards because previous to their appointment the judges were probably only very ordinary solicitors. There is no divine right by which they become more important after they have got upon the bench than they were previously to going on the bench. For that reason I am opposed to that type of arbitrator.

I notice that the Minister of Finance has moved to strike out certain words and to omit certain clauses at the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) which I think improves the Bill in some ways. But, why he should strike out the words "on their own judgment" is something that I have not been able to realize. I do not know whose judgment the commission will go by when they fix the amount of the award unless it is their own. They will hear evidence and all that sort of thing but why strike out the words "on their own judgment"? I do not know whose judgment they are going to leave it to, unless it is the judgment of the Governor in Council, or the Government, in that case, we should fix the amount now if there is going to be any amount. The proper way would have been to have fixed the amount in this House if there was going to be any amount given.

I cannot understand why the Government, and especially the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State, should continually harp on the question of our confiscating this property. It is absurd to talk about confiscating a property when we are really paying more than the property is worth by assuming the liabilities and at the time carrying out the agreement which was entered into only three years ago.

Last night the Prime Minister discussed something that he has discussed here once or twice before, and that is a co-operative management of the railways. That would mean the taking over of all the railways. While I have not given it serious enough, or long enough, thought to enable me to conclude whether I am in favour of government ownership of railways entirely or not, that would be the only way in my judgment by which individual, or co-operative, control could be brought about.

The right hon. gentleman referred to the operation of railways in England. That may or may not be successful from the financial standpoint. The railways in England are in a very peculiar position. They have certainly operated the railways in England from the war standpoint excellently since the war commenced, but they had the advantage of the advice of all the best managers of railways in England, who joined together for the purpose of operating them during the war. That could only be done in this country, in my judgment, by the Government assuming control of all the railways and appointing one managing commission. If we are successful in the attempt to operate this railway, something of the kind may be brought about in the future.

But, in the meantime, we are not supposed to be discussing that; the only question is whether it is wise to adopt this simple amendment of my hon. friend from St. John which absolutely protects the interests of the people. The Prime Minister said last night: What do you think of a proposal to appoint arbitrators with a right of appeal to the Supreme Court and then an appeal to Parliament? I have always thought that Parliament was supreme, was the high court of this country. Therefore, I do not see any danger, or any farce, in forcing the arbitration board, or even the Supreme Court of this country, to submit their finding to the Parliament of Canada. Not the slightest injustice could be done to any person by Parliament. Otherwise, we are not fit for our positions. I do not see anything in the suggestion of my right hon. friend that it would be absurd to allow an appeal from the arbitration board, and from the Supreme Court, to this Parliament. These are only ordinary individuals that we have appointed to these positions ourselves, or who have been appointed by the Government which represents the country. I have no doubt that my time has expired. I will urge in sitting down that the Finance Minister and the Government reconsider the position they have assumed on this matter. It is a very simple question. All we want is the absolute protection of the interests of the people, and that is all this amendment asks. Why the Government should not accept it without any hesitation is something that I cannot comprehend.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would have risen immediately my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) sat down but I was not able to collect the references in time. I wish, with much respect, to say a few words in reply to his remarks, and also in reply to the remarks of my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt).

It is some time since I have heard the right hon. gentleman endeavour to reconcile the various positions he takes on any question. That was a custom of his in earlier days, but lately he has given it up. I freely acknowledge that when he does so undertake no one can excel him at the task. He delivered this afternoon a very skilful, and indeed very able, effort in endeavouring to show that the position to which he commits his party to-day is not exactly the opposite of that to which he committed the same party three years ago. The line he takes is this, he says: Three years ago you introduced legislation providing for the event of default; a bankrupt company approached Parliament and said: We cannot proceed without the assistance of this House; Parliament acquiesced in the request, and provided for only one event, provided for the event of default in later days on the part of the company, and provided that should such default take place, then we could foreclose the equity of redemption and it should become our property. He then went on to argue that we did not provide for the event of success, and that the purpose of his amendment to the third reading of the Bill at that time was to take care of that contingency and to see to it that, should the road succeed as a result of the assistance given, Parliament should have the right to take the property as the property of the people and to go in for Government ownership of a successful road. I wish first to aver that both his positions are incorrect. His statement is not a correct statement of what Parliament provided in the event of default, and his statement that the policy of the Opposition was to cover the contingency of success is likewise incorrect. We did provide for the event of default, and the provision for the event of default was not that, should default come, the equity of redemption should be, without conditions, foreclosed. Why did the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) leave out the whole terms of section 24? We provided that if default should come Parliament should fix the terms and conditions, if any, upon which the equity of redemption should be valued. Now what is the meaning of "fix terms and conditions" if, under no circumstances, terms and conditions were to be fixed? The leader of the Opposition said they were satisfied with that clause. Now will you tell me what was the meaning of Parliament saying that terms and conditions would be fixed if, under no circumstances, terms and conditions should be fixed? He was satisfied with the clause, virtually assuming that there could be circumstances following default under which it would be proper to fix terms and conditions. Now, I ask, under what circumstances could it be proper to fix terms and conditions following default, if not under the very circumstances of to-day? We have been through three years of war. The difficulties the company is in to-day are difficulties that arose very largely from the war. I do not suppose their earnings have diminished by reason of the war, except that it has been impossible for them to complete their line owing to financial difficulties, and they have so not been able to get their full earnings. They have not been able to link up with Montreal or to get money out of securities which we have guaranteed. They have fallen short by many millions of dollars. Abnormal conditions have arisen so that the position to-day is surely exactly the condition upon which terms and conditions should be fixed and under which drastic measures should not be adopted, if there could be conditions in which drastic measures should be adopted. It is true there might be conditions under which we should fix those conditions. Those were referred to by the Prime Minister in one of his earlier addresses, namely where it was admitted that there was no equity of redemption to be valued, and, in the latter part of my right hon. friend's address, he himself admitted that if there was a real, substantial equity of redemption there, he himself would not confiscate it even now. Therefore it becomes a question: is there a real equity of redemption or is there not?

I said a moment ago that the leader of the Opposition was wrong as well when he intimated to Parliament that the purpose of his amendment to the Third Reading of the legislation of 1914 was to provide for the contingency of the road succeeding, to enable Parliament and the country to take over and operate a road that was successful in the hands of a private company. The right hon. leader of the Opposition was careful. It took him some days to think this reconciliation out. He was careful to read his amendment, and he was careful to read clause 24, but he was not so careful to read his own speech of that date. If he will read his speech he will find that the purpose of his amendment was not to provide for the road succeeding at all, but to provide another method of government ownership should the road fail. He laid down in his speech in the most explicit terms that for a successful road he would have nothing to do with government ownership. He was against it if a private company could succeed with the road. He wanted government ownership only if they had to keep coming back to Parliament for further assistance. At page 4634 of the Hansard of 1914 the right hon. gentleman said:

But I have nothing to disclaim of what I said on that occasion.

That is on some previous occasion when he opposed government ownership.

Or upon any other occasion—that I never was favourable to the operation of railways by the Government. I do not say that there are not some countries more settled than we are in which this might not be a good policy. I did not say that this was a policy which might not be a good one in a country that is much more settled than ours; but in a new country such as this I thought that operation by company was preferable to operation by Government. Such was my view. I expressed it with perfect frankness and honesty to Parliament and the country at that time. With reference to the Transcontinental railway, in a country such as this, as between government operation and company operation, I favoured operation by a company.

Then later on he said:

I am not enamoured any more of government ownership than before, but if we have to make a choice to-day, and if the choice we have to make is between pouring more money into the coffers of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Government getting control of the road, I would rather get control of the road for the benefit and profit of the people of Canada. That is the view that I have to present to the House on the present occasion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So that he was not providing at all for the contingency of success, he was providing for the contingency of failure, and he said: If we have to keep on pouring more money into the road, let us not do it, but if a private company can succeed with it I am in favour of a private company keeping it, and not the Government of Canada. He was even more explicit on a previous day when he said:

If we could have had some assurance that this is the last call, and that they will not come back knocking at our doors again, there might be some reason to treat them as they request.

That is the way the Bill was.

But we cannot have any such assurance. On the contrary, I think it is a matter of absolute certainty that, in view of the figures placed before us, in view of the undertaking which they have to carry out and of the conditions, they cannot complete that enterprise with the assistance of the $45,000,000 that is to be voted by this Parliament.

A matter of absolute certainty; he foresaw the failure of the road, and its coming back to Parliament again.

Therefore, he says, some new position has to be taken, and he proceeds to argue what the position should be. He refers to the previous amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John and he said that amendment had two features; first to reduce the stock, and second to provide for taking over the road. He said the first was of no importance, and he put it aside, and he dealt with the provision for taking over the road, because, as he said, with the $45,000,000 assistance, in his judgment it was an absolute certainty the company would come back again. How is it then that he can argue to-day that in 1914 he had in mind the successful operation of the road, and that such was the contingency he was providing for by his amendment. It was the very opposite he was providing for, as expressed by his own words. He says again: I never, while I was in power, as Premier of Canada, confiscated the property of any man. I would not do so to-day. But he tells us that we are taking the property which has liabilities to the extent of $30,000,000 greater than its assets. Upon what can this Parliament assume, on any principle of equity or honour, that that road which we are taking over has $30,000,000 of liabilities more than its assets. Did he ever while he was Prime Minister of Canada take the ex parte report of a commission, before whom the other party was never heard to determine the valuation of property this country expropriated? He never did. He provided for the Trancontinental railway. He expropriated property all the way between coast and coast; he expropriated the property of Mackenzie and Mann, on the flats of the city of Winnipeg, amounting to almost $1,000,000, He did not provide in that case that, if Parliament was not satisfied with the determination of the courts of the land, the Supreme Court, being the final arbiter, Parliament should review and override, and act as a court of appeal over the Supreme Court. He never expropriated the property of any one while he was Prime Minister, unless on the report of a judicial tribunal, before whom the interested parties could be heard. Why does he now suggest doing the contrary? Why does he assume that, because the Drayton-Acworth report came to a conclusion without hearing the other party at all—a purely ex parte report—there was not surplus of assets over liabilities, and consequently that Parliament should assume there was not. If there is no surplus of assets over liabilities, we will have nothing to pay. All we ask Parliament to declare is that a properly constituted tribunal shall try the case, and if we are taking the property with $30,- 000,000 more liabilities than assets, that tribunal will so find. We are only asking Parliament to establish a tribunal before whom the parties can be heard, and the tribunal will determine whether or not the stock which we are taking, which represents the equity of redemption, has or has not a real substantial value. If it has no value they will so find, and if it has a value they will fix it. The ultimate tribunal under the Bill is the same as the ultimate tribunal under the Expropriation Act; it is the Supreme Court of Canada.

We have confidence in the tribunal to which we are going to appeal, and we will be bound by the decision of that tribunal. Referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt): It is true that the Parliament of Canada is the high court of the nation,but the functions of the Parliament of Canada are not judicial functions, they are legislative. When judicial functions are to be exercised, we establish tribunals and delegate to them judicial functions. We do so by this Bill, and we utilize the Supreme Court of this country, which is the ultimate tribunal in judicial dispute. If any wrong principle has been adopted, if anything is cited as a fact which is against the weight of evidence, it all comes before the Supreme Court of Canada, and they exercise their judgment in appeal over the tribunal of just such men as the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) thinks are best qualified to establish values. Now, then, where is the reason in this case to establish Parliament as a court of appeal over the Supreme Court, that did not exist in every other case of expropriation that we have ever heard of? If we are to make Parliament a court of appeal over the Supreme Court in this case, why do we not do it in proceedings under the Expropriation Act? Why not do it under every Act under which we expropriate? Why discriminate in this case? Is there any more reason to distrust the arbitrators and the Supreme Court of Canada, which reviews their findings, in the present case than in any other case? Why should they be deemed incompetent? Why should they be corrupt here, if they are not corrupt in other cases? Why should Parliament presume to assume judicial functions here, when they do not presume to assume such functions in any other case that has ever come before them.

Mr. PARDEE: It appears to me that the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen), who has just finished replying to the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), has taken the most extraordinary ground. We have seen a good many political somersaults turned in one way or another, but surely the Secretary of State does not think he can cover up his own somersault, in the case of the Canadian Northern Bill now before the House and the Canadian Northern legislation of 1914, by simply saying in an offhand way that he has seen the leader of the Opposition try to justify himself many times, but never so unsuccessfully as to-day. Let me quote his own words. He said: It is some time since the hon. leader of the Opposition attempted to justify his various positions.

Well, surely, even from the Secretary of State's own argument, the leader of the Opposition has not taken any more positions on the Canadian Northern railway question than have the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). And may I add here, in parenthesis, the last part of the argument of the Secretary of State implies that he has practically no faith in the commission appointed to make the Drayton-Acworth report. He asks: Is it right, or would anybody think of taking the obiter dictum of two or three men who are appointed, without having the right to go to some higher place, to have it confirmed or otherwise?

If the Secretary of State says that to-day I ask him: did he at the time, or did the Government at the time they appointed that commission, have faith that the Government would act on the report of the Drayton-Acworth Commission? If they did, why not take that course? If they did not, why does the Government not tell us candidly that the Drayton-Acworth-Smith Commission started out on a fishing expedition, to see what they could find, and that the Government was going to consider their attitude after the commission reported. The Secretary of State makes a strong argument in his own mind, and refers to section 24 of the Act of 1914, which says:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada the Governor in Council may, on such terms and conditions as Parliament may prescribe,—

And then he goes on to argue that the terms and conditions to-day are extraordinary in regard to the taking over of this road by the Government. I think the House and the country will agree with me that the terms and conditions of the taking over of this road at the present time are most extraordinary—extraordinary in view of the legislation of 1914, which expressly provided in section 24 that, if further default were made, the Government would have the right to take over that equity of redemption by foreclosure, and close the whole transaction, and thus the people of the country would become the owners of that road.

The Secretary of State and the Minister of Finance tell us that it would not be right for the Government to take over the road without paying the company for the equity of redemption. How in Heaven's name they can say that, when their own commissioners have told them that the liabilities against the road are greater than its assets, I do not know. Where is the equity of redemption? There is nothing there to arbitrate about, absolutely nothing.

The whole trend of section 24 leads us to one conclusion, and one conclusion only, and that is that the understanding in 1914 between Mackenzie and Mann and the Government was this: Mackenzie and Mann said: "Give us $45,000,000. Throw around the advance whatever safeguards you like, we don't care how drastic they may be. This $45,000,000 will tide us over and put us on our feet. We shall never have to come back to Parliament for assistance again, and consequently we will enter into this hard and fast bargain; that if we do come back to Parliament for assistance you may, willy nilly, take over the road under section 24." That was the understanding when the legislation was passed in 1914. The Finance Minister said in his heart at that time: "Here we are at the end of this long Canadian Northern haul. We will make no two bites at a cherry, but will give them $45,000,000 now, and if they ever come back again we will off with their heads without a word." The Finance Minister gave credit for the framing of that Act to the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) who was its father. The Finance Minister, speaking of that Act, said:

> What security have we? I have seen a good deal of financing in my time, and I know something of law although my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) does not think so, and I want to say this: I have never seen as effectual a means of entering into possession of a property upon which a mortgage is held as has been devised by the Solicitor General in connection with this transaction.

The Act was the Solicitor General's baby, and he was proud of it then.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He repudiates his child to-day.

Mr. PARDEE: To-day he wishes it had another parent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: You are not going to "take off my hat."

Mr. PARDEE: No, that paragraph has been quoted so often that the minister will be completely bald if his hat is taken off any more. You can't get away from the fact that that statement of the Minister of Finance was to be read into section 24, and he thereby said: "The Government through its able Solicitor General has so surrounded this agreement with safeguards that in case of default the people of this country, if they desire, can take over the road without the payment of another single copper." Again, in 1914, the Minister of Finance said:

> I was dealing with the question of remedy upon default, and was pointing out that we have a much better control than would be afforded by the security of a majority or all the stock of the Canadian Northern.

He was again referring to section 24, the section upon which the Government was going to act. If at no other time, the minister, in those very words, which appear in Hansard, notified Mackenzie and Mann then and there that that was the intention of the Government. I submit that when a contract has been entered into in good faith betwen two parties and when neither party will be prejudiced by the carrying out of the contract, after full notice has been given and under conditions which make chicanery absolutely impossible, there is only one thing to do—more especially in this case where the contract is not between private individuals, for the Government are acting for the people of the whole Dominion of Canada and have no right to change the terms of the contract entered into between the people and Mackenzie and Mann—and that is to carry out the contract.

To my mind there is no justification whatever for this Bill. I am always willing to do the fair thing. I am always willing to see money paid by a private individual or by a government for money's worth. But when somebody tells me that in this case we are confiscating property in which Mackenzie and Mann have an equity of redemption, in view of the fact that the Government's commissioners have said that the liabilities against the road are greater than its assets, I want somebody to tell me where this mythical equity of redemption is and why the people of Canada should pay a single dollar for it.

Besides all that, I believe the people of this country think that Mackenzie and Mann have done moderately well out of the Dominion of Canada and its component parts. Gather into one big pail what Mackenzie and Mann have milked from our different municipalities, counties, and provinces, and from the Dominion as a whole, and I do not think there is a man in this House who would not say that Mackenzie and Mann have received from the people of Canada everything to which they are entitled. They have not been able to make the road a success. That is unfortunate for them, but it is not our fault; and they have no right, simply because interested persons desire this Government to do certain things in regard to the stock, to ask this Parliament to pay for stock that is absolutely worthless.

In conclusion, I wish to say a few words as to the Government passing this measure by applying the closure. Outside of the war this is perhaps the biggest question which the people of Canada have ever had to consider. A question involving the assuming of liabilities to the amount of $600,000,000 will surely stand all the light of day and all the consideration hon. members of this House can give it. This measure, until closure was applied, had been under discussion for about eight days only, and I say eight days is none too much for this House to consider a transaction involving an increase in our national debt to an amount never dreamed of by any person in this country. The Secretary of State, discussing the amendment of the hon. member for St. John, asks whether the right hon. leader of the Opposition had ever asked Parliament to ratify the purchase of a property involving an expenditure of $1,000,000 in Winnipeg, or some other amount somewhere else. I ask you, Sir, whether this transaction involving hundreds of millions of dollars is on an equal footing with million-dollar transactions that took place under the right hon. leader of the Opposition? It is a horse of entirely different colour. You cannot treat the two things alike.

Perhaps the principle is the same, but the principle is absolutely swallowed up in the enormous sum of money for which the people of Canada will become liable in this case. Therefore, I say that, so far as foreclosure is concerned, the Government seem to be in an extraordinarily great hurry to rush the measure through this House without having given all the information which we on this side desire, and to put it upon the statute book before the light of day has been properly turned upon it.

[Mr. Pardee.]

Mr. PACAUD (Megantic): I want to avail myself of this last opportunity in order to protest strenuously against this unfair measure which a moribund Government are endeavouring to force upon the people of this country.

I will say further that their attitude is not based upon any fair or reasonable ground, and had we not been used for six years to this regime always prone to offend common sense, we would have much more cause to wonder now.

The discussion raised by the Bill submitted by the Government has thrown a new light upon certain clear, plain and concrete facts, which have served as a justification for the strenuous opposition of hon. members, from this side of the House and have enabled us to understand the resentment of the people in presence of the sad exhibition the Government are making of themselves. In fact, it is hardly conceivable that such a measure as we are now debating could have been laid before this Parliament.

This measure is invidious and iniquitous. Indeed what does the Government proposal amount to? It is intended to acquire the stock of the Canadian Northern now in the hands of holders so that the country may own this stock and in order to have those shares valued, to make out the amount the Canadian people shall be called upon to pay to Mackenzie and Mann and their confederates, it is intended to appoint arbitrators who shall determine without appeal the amount we shall have to put up in this transaction. Upon their award, without any interference from this Parliament, the present Government shall pay unscrupulously, unhesitatingly out of the public treasury to a few favourites of this regime a sum amounting to $60,000,000 in their estimation.

The members on this side of the House recriminated. They shall protest to the last. They say to the Government: You have the unquestionable right to get hold of this stock, to lay your hands upon that railway and the holders cannot claim a cent. Consequently, it is useless to appoint arbitrators for making the valuation of the stock, and when we consider that in this transaction we are assuming an indebtedness of $400,000,000, evidently the contention of the Government that, in so doing, they would unjustly confiscate private property, is an absurd contention which is not worth considering.

Mr. Speaker, our proposal is unassailable. We are confronted by a contract which clearly provides under section 24 that should the Canadian Northern make default in paying the interest on the sums then granted by this Government—and nobody would deny that that contingency has materialized long ago and that the company has actually defaulted—the Government would be ipso facto entitled to get hold of that stock and to lay their hands upon that railway, without any special process of law and without being bound to pay a cent to anybody for this stock.

Section 22 of that Act throws still more vivid light upon the intentions of the Government and shows that they intended to provide against that default on the part of the company, by pointing out the means the Government should resort to in order to operate the railway in case the contingencies anticipated by article 24 came to pass.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, the anticipations of the Government in 1914 have materialized. The Canadian Northern company have defaulted and relying upon that statute, we say to the Government: do not thus throw away $60,000,000 of the people's money; do not be so generous with the funds of others so as to favour a few millionaires from Toronto.

We are not alone to take that position. The opposition to this measure is not confined to the opponents of the Government.

We have seen influential financiers of the city of Montreal most strongly protesting against this Government proposal. We have had the opportunity of reading their protest which has been published by several newpapers of this country. These gentlemen are friends of the Government. But before being partisans, they are enlightened and well informed citizens who before all wish to save the country from the hands of those who seem intent, cost what it will, to push it into ruin and bankruptcy. These gentlemen have read this Act of 1914, and to add to this rather conclusive evidence, they remembered the Drayton-Acworth report which states that the Canadian Northern stock has no actual value. Nevertheless, and in spite of all that, the Government who preach economy to the people without ever practising it themselves, dare throw this 1914 Act to the wastebasket and, in order to again favour Messrs. Mann et al who have by their millions put the hon. gentlemen into power, conceive the odious design of saddling once more the people—and that, without any necessity—with a new burden of $60,000,000. Mr. Speaker, in times of peace such a policy would have been a blunder, but in war times, it is a crime.

Do we realize, Mr. Speaker, what that transaction is going to cost to the country? The member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has given us fabulous figures, almost incredible figures. This railroad acquisition will cost us $650,000,000, and our national debt, with this amount added to it, now reaches a total of $2,250,000,000. The meaning and the scope of these figures may be better understood, when we recall the fact that this war is costing us presently almost $1,000,000 per day.

Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this country are now sufficiently taxed by the ever-increasing expenses of the war without adding to them this new burden? Why not follow the system adopted by the United States and put the Canadian Northern in the hands of a receiver? That policy has been a success in the United States, why should it not succeed in Canada? Whatever be the case, let us consider the fact that, for the past three years, this Government has stated before this House and before the country, that our only preoccupation should be to win the war. The people have not recriminated; they have borne the tax without a murmur, even though the indirect tax is being increased and the direct tax imposed. The Government are preaching economy to the people, should they not set the example, should they not practise what they preach unto others? Do they pretend that, by taking $650,000,000 to buy a railroad they will thereby make our participation to the war more effective? Our national credit, Mr. Speaker, is affected by this legislation.

Quite recently we borrowed in the United States the sum of $100,000,000 and we had to pay over 8 per cent interest on that amount. Our credit, therefore, is not what it used to be. If we mean to take an active and really efficient participation in this war, we must above all keep our credit in good shape. Please tell me, Mr. Speaker, when this proposal shall be known abroad, in all its details, when our bankers shall have weighed and analyzed what the Government are doing and intend to do, will they be very anxious to lend more money to this Government, and if they do so, what kind of a rate will they demand?

The members of this House are asked to endorse and approve, on behalf of the people, a measure without knowing the exact amount of the liabilities we are to assume without any precise knowledge of the actual assets we will have in hand, without any idea of the sum we are to pay nor the party to whom we shall pay it.

Not only, Mr. Speaker, do these gentlemen of the Government refuse us the information we are entitled to, but through a more arbitrary, more autocratic proceeding, a real Tory process as it were, they prefer to impose upon us, and for a second time their gag rule. We were debarred from expressing our views in 1913, when we wanted to save $35,000,000 for the people. We are again throttled in 1917, when we want to save the people a trifle of $60,000,000. That procedure is the Government's favourite weapon. Unable to give us any answer, they take away from us even the right to freely discuss a measure of so great an importance to the people.

That method now adopted by the Government may solve the difficulties which appear to them insuperable. It will certainly not satisfy the people. It will not alleviate the uneasiness and the doubt which this measure will have sown in the public mind. I moreover maintain that this Government has no authority to pass such a measure. This Parliament does no longer represent public opinion. Last year we have extended the existence of this Parliament, but we did so, upon the formal promise given by the Prime Minister that no contentious measure should be submitted to our consideration by the Government. It is true that the Premier has already broken that pledge, when he has imposed upon both Parliament and the country the compulsory Military Service Act.

I did protest then and do protest again to-day, on those very grounds stated by myself in this House for opposing this measure which is just as unpopular and just as nefarious as the one under discussion at that time.

Mr. Speaker, we did not extend the term of this Parliament in order to facilitate the squandering of public money. Why should the amendment introduced by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) not be accepted? If we have to put up with arbitration, in the name of what principle do you mean to deprive the representatives of the people of this country in this Parliament of their right to revise the report of these arbitrators to discuss their findings and to weigh the grounds on which they base their findings? Those gentlemen sitting on the board of arbitration may be actuated by the best intentions, but they are lacking the proper authority when it comes to the expenditure of public money, and they also lack an essential qualification as they do not represent the people. The people's representatives are here; they sit in this Parliament. They have to decide in the last resort. It is their business to say whether any amount should be paid out or not and, in the affirmative, what amount should be so paid. This is a fair position but the Government will not take it. When we rise in this House to remind them of all those deficiencies in the Act and ask them to make more definite statements and give us the information they have or should have the only answer they give, relying upon their majority, is to resort to the closure rule.

We are the minority in this House we yield to might and numbers. However, we are in hopes of better days, knowing that the country is with us; and we know the people will not fail to avenge our cause.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton, South): There are a few observations I wish to make upon the legislation now before the House. I shall be as brief as possible. The Canadian Northern Railway Company has been a source of discussion in this House for the past eight or ten years, and since my advent to Parliament I have found that on several occasions the Canadian Northern people have come to the Government for financial assistance. In the session of 1914 the Government practically gave $45,000,000 to the company to help them out of their then financial straits. If the Government did not actually hand over the money to the company, it recommended their bonds to the public, and endorsed and guaranteed those bonds. Under that legislation the Governor in Council through action taken by this Parliament was entitled to foreclose the mortgage in the event of default. At another session since 1914, the same Canadian Northern railway came to this Government and got over $15,000,000 of the money of the people of Canada, notwithstanding the fact that they had defaulted their mortgage and the Government was entitled to foreclose that mortgage under the statutory agreement of 1914. The handing over of this $15,000,000 did not look to me as good business, in view of the fact that the Canadian Northern railway were then in default as regards their agreement of 1914. Matters are a good deal worse to-day. It was not good business for us to give $15,000,000 since 1914 to the Canadian Northern, in view of the statute of 1914, and it is still worse business for this Government to place now before arbitrators the question as to whether or not Mackenzie and Mann have any equity in this road. If any hon. gentleman in this Chamber held a mortgage of $10,000 on property which is worth, say, $50,000, and set a limit within which the money must be paid over with interest, if the terms of the mortgage are not met, it is his right as a business man to foreclose the mortgage and put the property up for sale, and if there is any equity left—if the property sells for more than the amount of the mortgage plus interest and expenses, the difference is handed over to the mortgagor. That is the way business is conducted in this country, and that is a sound business method.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? If 9,000 miles of a railway system like the Canadian Northern were put up for sale at the present time, where would my hon. friend get his purchaser?

Mr. CARROLL: It does not make any difference whether this year is a year of stress, or whether last year was a year of stress, or whether the year in which the Canadian Northern railway made default under the statute of 1914 was a year of stress. We have not any law prohibiting us from foreclosing mortgages.

Mr. MORPHY: But where would the hon. gentleman get a purchaser?

Mr. CARROLL: Let the Government purchase under the statute. I daresay there would be competition in the purchasing of the road. There are railway institutions in this country which would run the road up to at least the value of its construction and equipment at the time of the sale. However, that is not the question. When the Canadian Northern railway came to this Parliament in 1914 for assistance they agreed to the terms of the statute of 1914, and it would be good business for this Government to foreclose that mortgage on default. Instead of doing that, the Government handed out $15,000,000 more of the people's money, and now they are placing the matter in the hands of arbitrators to say whether or not there is any equity. That is not the way business is carried on in this country in regard to mortgages, and my contention is that the Government should follow the course followed by ordinary business men in dealing with mortgages or securities. What are the arbitrators going to arbitrate? Last year this Government appointed a commission known as the Drayton-Acworth Commission to report on the general standing of our Canadian railways. This commission made a report, and made certain recommendations. The Prime Minister told us last night that the Government was following the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report in many instances. There is, however, one particular instance in which that report is not being followed. I think I am correct in saying that the Drayton-Acworth Commission found that the $60,000,000 of stock held by Mackenzie, Mann and Company, and pledged with certain financial institutions, was absolutely worthless. The Government is not following the finding of the Drayton-Acworth Commission in this respect, and there is no reason given as to why it is not being followed. The commission reported that the stock was worthless, yet we are now to appoint arbitrators, who will cost this country a considerable amount of money, and the question which is to be put to those arbitrators is, how much is this $60,000,000 of stock worth, and have Mackenzie, Mann and Company any equity in the road? I do not see why the Government is willing to follow the Drayton-Acworth report in one or two or three instances, and not follow it right through. If they follow it in some instances, but not in others, I think the amendment which was moved last evening by the hon. member for St. John should have received more consideration than it did from the Government. The chairman of the arbitrating committee is a gentleman of whom I know nothing, except that he is Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario. I have not a word to say against him, but I do not think he is a gentleman who would be likely to know very much about the finances of railways, the cost of railway construction, or the various other questions that will arise in this arbitration. I consider if we wanted to give Mackenzie, Mann and Company a fair deal—and that is the proposition put forth by the Government—a committee of this House, consisting of men who have been interested in railways, railway finances and railway construction for a number of years, would be the best arbitrators to deal with the matter. If I were called upon to appoint a board of arbitrators, I would name the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) as chairman of the board. He has been interested for many years in railway legislation and railway finances, and to a large extent in railway construction. I am not saying this with the idea of paying a compliment to the hon. gentleman, but I say in all sincerity that this is a question to be dealt with by the people of Canada, through their representatives, and it should not be turned over to a tribunal in regard to which they have nothing to say, and which is in no way responsible to the people.

Much has been said as to public ownership. There are hon. members on both sides of the House who are opposed to the Government ownership of public utilities. I take the ground that if this country is going to acquire the ownership of railways and operate them as public utilities it should take over every line of railway and operate it. I do not believe that the Government should compete in railway operation with private concerns. We know instances in which the public ownership of utilities has worked out very well. In the western states almost all the public utilities are owned and controlled by civic government. In Saskatoon, in Edmonton, and I am not sure about Calgary, the street railways are owned, controlled and operated by the civic corporations. They do not allow private concerns to compete with them. The same is true in the East as regards waterworks, lighting utilities and all that. In most of our eastern cities and towns they are owned and controlled by the civic authorities. But, the authorities in each town have complete control of utilities in that town. Our civic authorities are making a success of public ownership. There is no competition. There are no companies operating gas works, waterworks and street railways in these towns and cities. The principle underlying government ownership is that if a civic, provincial or federal government undertakes to own, control and operate public utilities, it should own, operate and control every bit of those public utilities within its jurisdiction. I think that is a sound principle and that is the principle underlying the Government ownership of public utilities.

There is another reason why I oppose the passage of this Bill. On the 7th October, 1916, the term of Parliament was extended by unanimous consent for one year. While nothing was said as to the kind of legislation that should be introduced, after the extension was granted, the principal reason why the extension was given was that this country could more readily carry on the big undertaking that was in everybody's mind at that time—the war. It was well understood, although it was not expressed and did not form a part of the Bill, that there should be no contentious legislation introduced while the term of this Parliament was extended. I am not urging that this Parliament has not the right to pass any legislation coming within its federal jurisdiction. It has power to pass this legislation just the same as it would have had in 1912 or 1913. But, in view of the fact that the extension was given wholly and solely for the purpose of enabling the people to concentrate their minds and energies on the winning of the war, the question of public ownership, which is really involved in this legislation, should not be brought before this House, contentious as it is, and should certainly not be put through by means of the closure.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: What is the nature of the legislation which the hon. gentleman would propose in place of the legislation that is now before the House?

Mr. CARROLL: I have already outlined that fairly well. I said in the first place that if anything were needed to be done in a hurry we have the method provided by our statute of 1914. But there is not so much hurry with regard to this matter but that it could wait and be made an issue in the election which will no doubt come within a very short time. I do not think there is such need for haste at the present time as to make it necessary to put it through a Parliament that was extended only for the purpose of winning the war. But, I was going to deal with the question of putting this Bill through Parliament by the closure. There is no doubt in the world as to the power of the Government to do so. But the Government are doing a thing which will rebound as a stone rebounds and hurt them for the remainder of their lives.

Mr. GRAHAM: Their lives will be short.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend says that their lives will be short. I hope he means their political lives because I have no reason to hope that any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House will not live to the good old age of a hundred. The conscription measure was brought down some time ago. I took a certain stand on that measure. The Government were in a hurry to pass the law. I would not have minded the Government putting into effect this gag, or closure, on the question of conscription having regard to what they said on that occasion, that they were in a hurry to get the Bill through, if the reason to get it through in a hurry was that our soldiers at the front were in dire need of reserves. But in this case there is no reason why this question could not have remained in abeyance until after the election so that the question would be squarely put to the people as to whether or not the forthcoming government should introduce what I conceive to be the government ownership of our railways. I do not think the people will look upon this as a business proposition. I cannot conceive how they can. I know the Minister of Finance is a business man, everybody recognizes that fact, but I do not understand how he can justify himself before the people in extending not only relief to the Canadian Northern railway to the extent of $45,000,000 under the statute of 1914, then further aid to the extent of $15,000,000 and now in giving them an opportunity perhaps of getting $50,000,000 for stock which, according to the report of the Drayton-Acworth commission is not worth one dollar. Talk about confiscation! Hon. gentlemen say that if they foreclosed the mortgage, or brought into effect the statute of 1914, it would be confiscation. Is it any more confiscation than it would be if a man foreclosed a mortgage for $10,000 on a property worth $40,000? Do you not think that Mackenzie and Mann, or the Bank of Commerce, or the other financial interests who are behind this company, would get ample justice if they were to go to the Canadian Pacific Railway and get the Canadian Pacific Railway to place a fair price on this road either through a sheriff's sale or the foreclosure of a mortgage.

It is done every day. Every business man in this country who loans money on property forecloses mortgages. The people know he has a right to do so; it is a business custom of this country; and no man will say that he is confiscating his neighbour's property because he forecloses under his mortgage. That neighbour goes into business, he takes his $10,000, and he knows when he signs the mortgage that if he does not pay under its terms it will likely be foreclosed. He knows also that he has a chance of redeeming that mortgage, that some friend may buy the property, and if there is anything over the $10,000 he hopes to get it.

I was going to say something with regard to the present operation of railways in England, but I shall not have time. There is one safeguard which I think should be placed in this legislation, and that is to have a definite provision that it is the value of this railway when Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann put their money into it or when it was completed that is to be determined. There is no doubt that the present legislation will have in some degree enhanced the value of the stock held by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, which has been declared valueless, and some provision should be placed in this Bill to guard against that. I think also that Mackenzie and Mann will attempt to prove to these arbitrators that if they put $10,000,000 into this road in 1914, the present value of that investment, owing to the enhanced cost of everything in the railway, will be at present $20,000,000; and that if they put in $60,000,000 it will be worth $120,000,000. I think there should be some safeguard in that respect.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I believe in government ownership, and I am in favour of this Government taking over the Canadian Northern railway. I voted for limitation of this discussion because I believe the country has heard all it wants to hear of this matter. I believe the people are convinced that Mackenzie and Mann have got all they deserve from the people of Canada, and very much more than they deserve, and if this House discusses this question for the next two or three months, you will not make any difference in the opinion of the people of Canada—they will still be convinced that Mackenzie and Mann have got all they deserve, and a great deal more than they deserve. Therefore, I will merely say I am in favour of the amendment under discussion and I shall vote for it.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARTHUR B. COPP (Westmorland): In a short statement made to the House just prior to recess, my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson) gave as a reason for supporting this measure that he was in favour of government ownership and operation of public utilities. He also gave as a reason for voting for the closure, as he did this afternoon, that the reputation of the Canadian Northern railway, or Mackenzie and Mann, was so nefarious that he thought it was a shame for the people to hear any more about it. I am opposed to this measure principally on the ground that I am opposed to government ownership. I am in a somewhat different position from many members of the House on this question, because it has not been my privilege, or good fortune or whatever it may be termed, to have anything to do with the Canadian Northern legislation until this present occasion. I realize, as every honourable gentleman must realize, that this is one of the most serious and most important questions ever brought before Parliament, at least during my short period, and I believe I am not exaggerating when I say one of the most important in the fifty years of Confederation. I do not feel that I should be doing justice to myself and my constituency having listened to the arguments on either side, if I did not express my views. Realizing the importance of this question, I have taken occasion to read Hansard and the different statutes regarding this company passed by this Parliament, in order to work out in my own mind what my duty was and what the duty of Parliament was to the people in this matter. We must realize that we are face to face with a most unfortunate financial position in the Dominion of Canada. In spite of that fact, the Government brings before this House a measure which, judging from the figures given by hon. gentlemen who have addressed this House—the correctness of which figures I have no reason to doubt—will place an added burden on the people of Canada of upwards of $650,000,000. They proceed with this Bill, in spite of the fact that during the past three years we have been face to face with a great crisis in this country, and have been obliged to go to practically all the money markets of the world to which we can go to borrow money for the carrying on of the war.

It is, therefore, a serious step for Parliament to place this further burden upon the shoulders of the people. It has been said that we should not for one moment think of the suggestion that this railway system should go into the hands of a receiver, because it would ruin the credit of Canada. I do not assume to speak as an expert in matters of this kind, but I have taken occasion to read carefully a very informative address delivered in this Parliament before I had the pleasure of a seat in this Chamber, in 1914, by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), who laid before this House and this country a statement of facts which, if true—and I have no reason to doubt the truth of the statement made at that time—must cause us all to consider seriously what is the duty of Parliament at the present time. That address was followed by another address, by the hon. member from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who also took a very strong ground against the operation of this railway by the Government, declaring that it was absolutely unbusinesslike in every way for this Parliament to assume further responsibility in regard to the financing of this corporation. I may be asked what I think of the proposal to operate this railway under government control, and those who ask the question may well point to remarks I have made in this House and elsewhere in regard to the operation of the Intercolonial as a government railway. I claim that there is no fair comparison between the operation of the Intercolonial by the Government and the operation of this road, which has five or six times the mileage of the Intercolonial. At the time of Confederation, the building and operation of the Interclonial became a moral contract on the shoulders of any government managing the affairs of the Dominion. But I am not blind to the fact that there are very many strong arguments to be used against government operation, and I am aware that the Intercolonial itself is cited as a warning against that policy. I cannot but believe that the operation of the Canadian Northern Railway system, if undertaken by the Government, will impose a very great burden and a direct liability upon the people, first in the necessary assumption by the country of responsibility for the financing the system and second in the operation of the railway. Unless a very great improvement is made in regard to the influences that politicians may have in the operation, it will be very difficult, indeed, for the Government to conduct the business of that railway in such a way as to realize the glowing picture painted by the Prime Minister in his address last evening of what some people hope for as a result of this legislation. I have tried to obtain information by listening to the questions which have been asked of the Government, and I am bound to say that I have been unable to see any willingness on the part of the Government to give even very necessary information in regard to this very important measure.

Question after question has been put to the Minister of Finance to find out who is demanding this legislation, and who is to benefit by it, but he has given no good and sufficient reason why this measure should be crystallized into law at this session of Parliament. My hon. friend from Calgary made it quite clear in 1914 that the $100,000,000 of Canadian Northern stock in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann was absolutely without value, which statement was also corroborated by the hon. member for Kingston; it was nothing but water, he said. Unless some adequate explanation is given by the Government, I say that the people of this country will view with deep-rooted suspicion the appointment of a Board of Arbitrators to determine the value of this stock. They will suspect that the Government have been urged to act by some interests behind Mackenzie and Mann, who have money invested in this great enterprise.

Why should the minister feel it necessary to introduce the closure at this early stage of the discussion, to press this measure through Parliament? My experience in this House has not been long enough for me to say just how long discussion should proceed on a measure of this magnitude before closure can properly be applied, if indeed, it is proper to apply it at any time. It has been applied only once before in this House, and that was on the Naval Bill introduced by the present Government. I have taken occasion during the last few minutes to look through Hansard, and I can see that this Canadian Northern railway measure was discussed in the House on eight separate days before closure was applied. The resolution was introduced on August 7, when it was discussed for three and a half hours. On the 8th of August the resolution was again under consideration for four and a half hours. Then the first reading was given to the Bill, and on the 14th of August the second reading was moved, and five hours was spent in discussion that day. On the 15th the discussion lasted six and a half hours; on the 16th, when the Bill was given its second reading, two and a half hours. On the 17th the House went into committee on the Bill for two hours, on the 23rd for four hours, and on the 27th for seven hours, when notice was given that closure would be applied.

So that this measure, which the people of this country are vitally interested in, and on which they are anxious for information, was under discussion for only thirty-five hours before closure was applied and public discussion throttled, fully one-half of which time was occupied by Government speakers. Taking seven hours a day, only five days were allowed to hon. gentlemen to discuss this very important measure. Then closure was applied, and it was impossible for the people of this country to get the information they were seeking with regard to this transaction.

In his memorable speech in 1914, the hon. member for Calgary not only gave us a great deal of information, but prophesied what would happen in the future, and many of his prophecies are coming true. For one thing, he said it would not be very long before this company would be back again asking Parliament for aid. Let me read what he said in this connection:

> I appeal to every man in this House and say that if he will take the time to read the history of the operations of Mackenzie and Mann from that time till now, he will find nothing but a long trail of parliamentary corruption, of lobbying, of degradation of parliamentary institutions, of the lowering of the morale of public life, and the degrading of those standards by which public life should be truly measured. Both sides of the House have been to blame. Look to the statute books for the aid that has been given to this company.

Mark what follows:

> Just a few days before a general election, one party proposes and the other acquiesces. They are bound to ask a few questions in order that the contribution to party funds may be large enough.

The hon. member for Calgary says that just a few days before a general election, when each party thought the contributions to party funds were large enough, it was the custom to press railway legislation through Parliament. My hon. friend accused the Opposition of that day of making a feint at opposition and then letting the legislation slip through. What does he think to-day, when he sees the gag being applied because the Opposition are determined to expose this nefarious proposition to the people?

My time is nearly up, and I must conclude. I maintain that the legislation of 1914 gave Parliament ample authority to take over the Canadian Northern in case of default, without paying Mackenzie and Mann or any interests behind them a single dollar, and I say that if the Government want to take over this road they should do so by means of the provisions of the law of 1914. What did the Minister of Finance say at that time, when he not only took off his hat to the Solicitor General, but turned round and looked behind him and said: "Wonder of wonders! Oh, Lord, where did I find him?"

He told the people then that the Government were carefully safeguarding their interests. If his words meant anything, they meant that if the Canadian Northern Railway Company or any of its subsidiary companies defaulted the Government would take over the road. It is, therefore, only fair and right that the Government, as the trustees of the people of the country, should, when they are confronted with a proposition such as faces us at the present time, look after the interests of the people and take over this road, irrespective of what Mackenzie and Mann may say, irrespective of what the Bank of Commerce may say, irrespective of what Sir Edmund Walker may say, irrespective of what any other gentlemen who are financially interested in the Canadian Northern Railway Company may say.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I made a few remarks on this question on the second reading, and since then I have taken no part in the discussion. I would not speak to-night were it not that some of my hon. friends opposite are apparently able to treat this matter with such extreme levity. When, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp), an exceedingly short time has been taken up in the discussion of this, the most important matter, excepting, of course, the war, that has come up before Parliament in my experience. I feel that the Government are showing undue haste and great solicitude to get this measure through when they are applying the closure under the circumstances. The rules of the House are there, however, the Government have the right to invoke their aid if they see fit and we have nothing to do but submit.

I cannot do much more to-night than restate some of the opinions which I hold on this matter. After having listened to the discussion which has been going on now for some days, I am afraid that my views are not shared, in their entirety, by very many hon. members on either side of the House, although I am happy to say that some hon. members are seeing the light as I see it. What is better than that is that very much of the public thought in Canada, as expressed in the newspapers is in line with my views. If this amendment is carried, perhaps there may be some means of getting away from the unfortunate position into which we are drifting by the enacting of this legislation. We were told in 1914, as has been referred to in this House many times, that the advance of $45,000,000 would be the last contribution which we should have to make to the Canadian Northern. We were told that that would pay the bills and put that company on its feet financially, and that it would then take its place as one of the great transportation companies of Canada. We were told also that if they defaulted we had the power by this legislation, and that it would be the duty and pleasure of the Government, simply to foreclose the mortgage and take over the property. We would then own it, and that would be the end of the matter so far as the stockholders were concerned. But in 1916 they came back again, and we gave them another $15,000,000. They are now again in financial troubles. I for one do not feel that, under present financial conditions, with the enormous amount of money which we are compelled to borrow, with the importance of keeping the financial reputation of the country at as high a mark as possible, we can afford to allow these bonds to go by default. Perhaps very few people, outside of members of Parliament and other men who are giving this matter considerable attention, realize the difficult position in which we are placed. We are the guarantors of $104,000,000 and our mortgages are not the first but the second and, in some cases, the third or the fourth mortgage. Ahead of our mortgages come $107,000,000 of provincial guarantees which, in some cases, are first mortgages and, in some cases, second mortgages. Then again, ahead of all those mortgages and coterminous with the provincial guarantees, come something like $150,000,000 of mortgage bonds. There is no doubt in the world that, if any of those default, and if we want to protect our $104,000,000 of guarantees, we must pay the default of those mortgages that come ahead of ours. It is, therefore, a reasonable proposition that we cannot allow the Canadian Northern to default. We are compelled to see them through in some way, and the question naturally arises, what is the best way in which to see them through? About two or three weeks ago, I stated that my way of seeing them through would be by putting up the smallest possible amount absolutely necessary to pay the present bills and then seeing if they could not carry the matter on until after the war, when we should know exactly where we stood financially and be able to decide upon the best course to pursue. I am sorry to say that I have not heard many hon. members who have agreed with me; in fact, I do not know that any person has agreed with me. I know, however, that is a good financial proposition. I am satisfied that the present owners or operators of this road can carry this matter along much more cheaply than the Government can. I would not hand over to Mackenzie and Mann or to the Canadian Northern railway the money I propose to advance—it might be $18,000,000 or $20,000,000—but I would allow the Department of Finance to handle the money, and I would see that the concern were compelled to finance matters as carefully and prudently as they possibly could and that no more betterments than were absolutely needed should be provided. Many of us know—at least I know—what I can accomplish along that line when I am driven to retrench.

Mr. GRAHAM: Congratulations.

Mr. CARVELL: I have some friends who have managed to get along during that important period in their lives. But the Government are unwilling to carry out that proposition, although they admit that they are compelled to pay out the money just the same. Whether the sum be $20,000,000 or $22,000,000 or $25,000,000 that the Canadian Northern require, the Government agree that we must pay it. What is the difference between our advancing the money and taking over sufficient stock to give us control of the road, and advancing the same amount of money and taking over all the stock and becoming the owners of the road? If we could stop by paying the same amount of money, the matter would not be so bad, but when we become the owners of the road we are confronted with the curse of public ownership. I use a very strong term, but I use it intentionally and advisedly. While the Canadian Northern can get along for another year by paying, say, $20,000,000 of actual debts, the Government of this country, if they become the owners of the stock of the company, cannot get along with paying less than $40,000,000 or $50,000,000; I make the prophecy to-night that if this Bill goes through and the Government take over the Canadian Northern, we shall spend that amount of money during next year. We know we shall have to pay the debts in any case, and there will come enormous demands for improvements here and improvements there, more rolling stock and all sorts of things. This afternoon I was reading a return brought down regarding a small matter of public telephones in British Columbia. The first expenditure was the small amount of $4,000 or $5,000. That soon mounted up to $70,000 or $80,000, and we have in the Supplementary Estimates an appropriation for $50,000 or $75,000 more. The matter could not be otherwise. The very moment people in this country acquire a right to draw upon the public treasury for these public services they never know when to stop. My hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) referring to the great speech delivered by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) three years ago, has pointed out exactly what will happen. Just before every election there is a great demand and money is paid out. The people may say: Well, you are painting a very dark picture; you are taking the ground that the Government of this country is not composed of responsible business men. I am not taking any such ground at all. I would trust the members of the present Government, or I would trust the members of any Government that might be formed, to look after these matters in a proper manner, if they were handling them as their own private business affairs. But when the public demand is pressed upon them, and there is a need for votes, and they are asked for money which is not their own money, they say: "Oh, well, this means so many votes, and it may carry a constituency; of course we have to surrender our ideas of business economy, and grant the money." We had an illustration one night last week: I watched this House vote, in less than an hour, $25,000,000 on capital account for the Intercolonial. It went through just as if it was in the ordinary course of business, and so it was. There has not been a session of Parliament since I have been here that we have not been voting from five million to seven or eight million dollars to carry on the Intercolonial. We are piling up million after million on the Intercolonial, and it is not much better to-day than it was ten years ago.

An hon. MEMBER: It is worse.

Mr. CARVELL: It is true, this year we have a surplus in the operation of the Intercolonial, but it is only a matter of accounts. They have been carrying on a system whereby one department charges up to another, and the result is a surplus—a book-keeping surplus. When the extraordinary business which has developed as a result of this war passes away, we shall come back again to our deficits. The idea of paying a dividend on the capital investment of the Intercolonial never dawned upon the mind of any one in Canada. It will be the same thing with the Canadian Northern. You will not only pay the interest, but you will pay the deficits. You will put in millions and tens of millions of dollars on capital account, and you will not get any better accommodation out of the road than you are getting at the present time; the people of Canada will not get any revenue out of it, and they will have to pay those enormous amounts of interest.

I do not know what actuated the minister in the beginning in taking the extraordinary course he has taken. There will be an arbitration as to the equity there may be in the stock. But we all know there is no equity in the stock as it stands to-day. I do not say there would not be a prospective equity. Somehow or other I am rather inclined to think there might be in the future. I am rather inclined to think that if the road were allowed to remain in the hands of the men who built it, and if they were allowed to manage it as a business proposition, there might be an equity in it. At the same time, we cannot take it and pay them for something which has not been earned, because, remember, the moment the Government of Canada gets hold of it there is no equity in it, and there never can be anything in it except debt, and debt, and more debt, capital and still more capital. Many of my friends from Ontario and the West have been captivated by this public operation fad. I want to point out to them that it is the greatest farce and fallacy that ever was brought forward in any country. It is useless to talk about the Government operating railways, or telephones, or electric light systems, or anything else as cheaply and economically as they can be operated by private enterprise. Such a thing is not reasonable. Some of my friends from the West believe that if they can get this road operated by the Government, in some magic way they will get better service and better results. Possibly they think they may get a reduction of rates. No greater fallacy was ever held out to anybody. They cannot beat the roads down below what is a reasonable business basis. Remember, you have another railway there, and you cannot cut the rates down below what is fair. No government in Canada can operate a railway system in the West and make it pay with any lower rates than are being charged by the Canadian Pacific to-day. If the Government carried on the road for the next ten years at the same rates as the Canadian Pacific are charging to-day, instead of paying a ten per cent dividend as the Canadian Pacific is paying, it would go behind fifteen per cent or twenty per cent every year. No man knows this better than my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who has had the longest experience in this House, with one exception, and who has lived in the Maritime Provinces. He has seen all the bungling and all the mismanagement, he knows exactly the condition of affairs, and he knows that every word I say is the truth. I am rather surprised that he has sat here as long as he has without raising his voice in opposition to the scheme. Of course, he may have been overmastered and overpowered by his colleagues. I know enough about governments to know that when the majority come to a decision they compel the minority to follow their lead. I can only conclude by appealing to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to give his friends and colleagues the benefit of his experience, and try to prevent Canada from being drawn into a maelstrom of debt and mismanagement, as it inevitably must be by attempting to operate a great railway system under the control of the Government. I have only a minute more—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has five minutes more.

Mr. CARVELL: Arbitration has been spoken of. I would like to know what on earth you are going to arbitrate. You are appointing three gentlemen to arbitrate the equity of this stock. How are they going to get their information? I do not want to say anything personal, but I do feel that we are starting out under very, very unfavourable circumstances when we have Sir William Meredith representing the Government. I had six weeks' experience with that gentleman, and while I do not want to refer to him, I can only say he is the last man in Canada I would choose to represent me in an arbitration between the Canadian Northern railway and the country. In any event, what is he going to do? Where will he get his evidence? How much better evidence and how much different evidence can he get than was obtained by the commission which spent nearly a year in investigating the cost of the great railway systems of this country. I have before me the report made by these three gentlemen, Sir Henry Drayton, Mr. Acworth, and Mr. Smith. I know Sir Henry Drayton personally, and I have the utmost confidence in him. While these gentlemen divided in their opinion as to what should be done in the future, they were unanimous in their conclusion as to the value of the Canadian Northern. They took it up from three points of view. First, they considered the cash investment. They reached the belief that there could not possibly have been as much cash invested in the road as the debt represented. Secondly, they regarded the matter from the standpoint of the physical basis, and they said it could be replaced for less money than the debt. Then they took it up from the point of view of a going concern, and said that no purchaser would offer a sum amounting to the total of the liabilities of the road. At page 44 they say:

> We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity, either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern.

We know they had a staff of 40 or 50 engineers on the work. I know two of these gentlemen from the province of New Brunswick who were on it for nearly a year. They made a physical examination of every mile of the system. They examined the ties, the rails, the roadbed, the ballast, the stations, the drainage, and everything in connection with the line. Then they collaborated their notes and made this report, which says that the value is not there. How in the world is an arbitration board which we may appoint going to get evidence which these expert gentlemen failed to find? It seems to me that the whole thing is so absolutely nonsensical that it is not worth considering for a moment. They cannot do it. Those gentlemen spent a great deal of time collecting the information they required, and they found the value was not there. I do not want to impute motives, but I would feel very much freer upon this matter if the Minister of Finance would tell us how much money the Canadian Bank of Commerce has lent to Mackenzie and Mann on this stock.

I have tried to find out; we have all tried to find out but we have failed. We believe that Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, were the owners of $52,000,000 of the common stock and that it has been pledged to the Canadian Bank of Commerce as security for certain advances—how much we do not know, but the conclusion is borne in upon the mind of any man who thinks that unless this stock is given some value the Canadian Bank of Commerce may have trouble in getting repayment of their loan. I am not making a charge but I am saying that that is the inevitable conclusion that is forced upon my mind. If I thought it were only a matter of a few hundred thousand dollars I would feel differently about it. But I am afraid it is a matter of a few millions of dollars and my suspicions are increased a hundred fold. My time has expired under this beautiful gag law and I suppose we cannot go further. I shall vote for the amendment and if it carries we will at least have an opportunity of having this award back in Parliament and Parliament will have a chance of dealing with it again. I hope it will carry. I hope something will be done to save this country not only from the expenditude of an enormous amount of money at the present time but from being plunged into a system of public ownership the end of which no man in Canada can possibly foresee.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, the principle of the acquisition of this property by the Crown has been acceded to by hon. gentlemen opposite and therefore I presume it is not necessary to further discuss that feature of the question. When I was speaking the other afternoon I pointed out that the amendment then proposed, as the amendment now proposed, was based upon the principle that the country is to acquire this property. There are certain questions that have been settled during the progress of this debate. It has been said that we are acquiring shares and not assets. In support of that proposition, reference is had to certain documents which have been filed here. It is hardly necessary to say that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself refuted that argument when he stated that the reason why the Government had not taken over the shares without an arbitration was that the Drayton-Acworth report had overlooked the value of some lands which belonged to the company. As they are assets, it follows that the value of the shares is to be determined by the arbitrators on the basis of the value of the assets and not otherwise. Therefore, that argument is exploded. There is one other matter that has been settled and it is that the acquisition of this property by the Dominion Government on the basis now proposed releases the provinces from their entire responsibility as guarantors. It takes the burden that has been placed upon some of the provinces and distributes it upon them all. That argument has been controverted but it does not appear to have been very successfully controverted for this simple reason, that at the present moment the Canadian Northern Railway Company is the primary debtor and the provinces are the guarantors. It follows that, if there is default with respect to any of the obligations, the right as against the primary debtor must be exhausted and the primary debtor will be the Canadian Northern Railway Company owned by the people of Canada or the Crown in the right of all. It also follows that rather than permit the exhaustion of the right against the primary debtor the Crown must inevitably assume the liability and release the provinces. That, I take it, is settled.

Another point that may be taken to be settled is that the effect of the acquisition of the shares of this company in the manner indicated is to make the people of Canada, as holders of all the shares, the owners of all the assets and responsible for all the liabilities of the company. It therefore becomes of primary importance that this House and the country should know the value of the assets and the extent of the liabilities. For the purpose of enabling that to be finally and definitely settled, we have provided machinery to which I shall presently refer. The assets consist of railways, of terminals, and various other properties and equipment. The liabilities consist of three things. First, there are outstanding loans which at the present moment amount to $100,000,000, payable in London, New York and Canada, and which are not represented by funded securities. But they are debts payable, some of which are due now, some in a few months, some next month and some next year. These debts, aggregating $98,000,000, may be said to be current liabilities. The second class of liabilities are those that arise under contracts for service. The hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has made it perfectly clear that this country incurs no responsibility with respect to such contracts. The third class of liabilities is that liability which arises by reason of construction and other contracts. As to the extent of that liability the Minister of Finance has not been able to give this House any adequate or satisfactory knowledge. The reason is clear. Under the guarantees of the various provinces bonds have been sold to a limited extent and work of varying character has been commenced, the acquisition of right of way in one section, the building of a grade in another, the laying of a few miles of ties and rails in another, all involving the expenditure of a portion of the money realized by the sale of the whole or part of the bonds of the enterprise. Such money having been raised by the sale of securities, it can only be used for the purpose for which the securities were sold. That is clear. That cannot be disputed. Now, what the extent of the outstanding construction liabilities are this House has not been, and cannot be, advised, because it depends upon many factors about which it is impossible to speak with certainty. That point has been settled.

There has also been settled one other question, it would seem to me, and that is that by this arbitration, which it is assumed will shortly be held, it is proposed to enter into a full, complete and adequate explanation of what these liabilities and assets may be. But, in my experience in the practice of my profession, when I desired to acquire the capital stock of a company, I always took an option for as small a sum as possible; then I investigated the company and acquired the shares. To this extent the investigation to which the Prime Minister referred last night, and to which the Minister of Finance referred, never touched in any way, shape or form the liabilities to which I have just invited the attention of the House. These construction liabilities have never been touched, they are still there, and what the amount of them is we do not know. But this I do know, that if the Canadian Northern can successfully withstand the people of Canada, the people of Canada, as owners of the Canadian Northern, cannot withstand the political pressure that will demand the completion of lines partly constructed, even though it involves duplication of existing facilities.

There has been introduced in this debate a matter to which I wish to allude. It has been said: If you do not do what we want you to do this road will be acquired by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I am no longer in the confidence of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is just six years ago this month since I terminated my service with them, but I have it on the highest authority that there never was a time when the Canadian Pacific railway would acquire the Canadian Northern system, however much it might be willing to acquire a portion of the line. I am at a loss to understand why that should be held up to the people of this country. It must be either for the purpose of stampeding this Parliament into doing something which it should not do without adequate inquiry and investigation, or to enhance the value of the shares and increase the amount of money to be paid for them.

These are the only two reasons. I desire in this Parliament to say that, so far as I am concerned, I resent the introduction into this debate of the bug-a-boo of the Canadian Pacific railway acquisition of this property, for the simple and obvious reason that it is calculated to prevent a full, free and fair discussion on the very largest domestic question that has engaged the attention of Parliament since the Canadian Pacific railway measure was before this House. But there is another point in respect to that, a very clear one it seems to me. We have heard a great deal in this House about a few gentlemen in Montreal, and we have heard it said that they represented the Canadian Pacific railway. I do not know why a few gentlemen in Montreal should not get together and say to Parliament that they do not like the business character of a transaction, when a few gentlemen in Toronto could get together and say that they did not like certain negotiations of five or six years ago with respect to reciprocity. I cannot see any difference between the two. Speaking as one member of this House, I resent very greatly the introduction into this discussion of any effort to make it appear that this House can be stampeded from doing its manifest duty by having it made appear that the Canadian Pacific railway are trying to gobble up the rest of Canada. It used to be popular in my country to hold up that bug-a-boo. I thought that that day was past. I hope it is. In my country it is past. If we measure the service of the Canadian Pacific railway in this war to Canada and to the British Empire, whether in respect of the services given by its officials or of the money it has loaned to enable business to be carried on in Canada, or by reason of the deposit as collateral of its shares that have a higher value in New York to-day than Canadian securities, we at once see that the man who seeks to introduce into this Parliament that bug-a-boo in an effort to stampede this House is not doing his patriotic duty, and I leave it at that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My hon. friends will not be hear hearing in a moment. I pass to another point. I am asked to vote that the equity of redemption of the Mackenzie and Mann interests should be taken from them without the payment of any money. I am not going to repeat my argument with reference to that. It seems to me to be fundamental that any man who has something should receive payment for it if he can get it, and he should have the right to go to a tribunal to present his case to fix that value. I shall not labour that issue. But let me point this out. The Prime Minister said last evening that if we had a receivership for this enterprise there would be seven receiverships in seven provinces. In most of the provinces of Canada a moratorium now exists, and you could not foreclose a mortgage if you wanted to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not in Quebec at least.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There is no moratorium in Quebec?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Well, the people of Quebec did not go to war and did not require any moratorium. I suppose that is the reason.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Quebec never guaranteed any Canadian Northern bonds.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, but it guaranteed some railways in Mercier's time that were heard of.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no moratorium in the Maritime Provinces either.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am glad to hear there is no moratorium in the Maritime Provinces. The question whether there is a moratorium in some of the provinces is not, however, the point I want to make. Neither New Brunswick nor Quebec has guaranteed Canadian Northern securities, but in the West, where this has been largely done, if you undertook to foreclose them, by virtue of the statutes in those provinces, an extension of time would be given probably until after the war. All that has been done, so far as this Parliament is concerned, is to say that, by reason of the financial condition that exists in consequence of the war, these men should have the opportunity to present, if they have a claim, that claim to a tribunal properly constituted, to determine its value. I shall not argue that point further. That is the principle most men follow in private business, and it should apply here. I am told that a receivership would be destructive to the interests of this country, and no man would question that. I have always said that the proper manner to deal with this was by a statutory receivership. But my voice has been as the voice of one crying in the wilderness, and I have to accept the statement of the Minister of Finance that this is the only way in which this business can be done. Then, accepting the principles he has declared for and stated, I am going, as my last word upon this Bill, to direct attention to certain anomalies, certain facts with relation to it, and I shall prove conclusively to this House that the measure that we are passing to-night is absolutely useless for the purpose for which it is intended and that unless it is amended in another chamber it will have no value at all. For the purpose of placing myself upon record, I desire to indicate clearly and very briefly the various paragraphs and what I would substitute for them.

You will observe that the Bill commences with authorizing an agreement between certain pledgees and owners of stock for the acquisition of 600,000 shares. The Minister of Finance has said that money must be paid to save the Canadian Northern railway. This road cannot go into the hands of a receiver, this road cannot default. I want to ask him to-night, and to ask the members of this House, what is going to happen if the Canadian Northern railway people do not sign the agreement. What is going to happen under the provisions of the Bill? The minister has not taken power to take all of the shares if they do not sign. He has taken power to take the difference between 500,000 and 600,000, which is 100,000; in other words, it is simply provided that after this legislation is passed he can, by Order in Council, acquire 100,000 shares. But we will have to pay the money for interest etc., or else the road goes into a receivership, and that the Minister of Finance says is not to be considered. Therefore, I submit that section 1 should be as follows.

1. His Majesty may acquire the six hundred thousand (600,000) shares of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, having a par value of sixty million dollars ($60,000,000) not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, on such terms and conditions, not inconsistent with this Act and satisfactory to the Governor in Council, as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners, registered as such, on the stock or share registers of the said company, of not less than five hundred thousand (500,000) of the said shares, for a price to be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided.

In other words, I submit that only the registered owners of the shares are interested. Nobody else, and any agreement arrived at must be with men whose names are taken from the share registers, and people on the street or elsewhere in this country shall not be considered. That is my first submission. The second section of the Bill, I submit, should read as follows:

2. (1) Upon the completion of the said agreement at least five hundred thousand of the said six hundred thousand shares shall be transferred and delivered by the registered owners thereof to the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and if there be any of the six hundred thousand shares not transferred and delivered as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may declare the said shares to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same shall thereupon become the property of His Majesty and shall be paid for pro rata with the shares so transferred.

Mark you that no provision has been made in this Bill as to when this transaction is to be completed. Suppose that these gentlemen keep putting off dealing with the matter until after the maturity of the loans mentioned. I have provided for that as follows:

(2) In the event of the said agreement not being executed and at least five hundred thousand of the six hundred thousand shares being transferred and delivered to the Minister of Finance in trust as aforesaid on or before the ..... day of ..... 1917, the Governor in Council may declare the whole of the said six hundred thousand shares to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same shall thereupon become the property of His Majesty for a price to be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided.

I now come to deal with the income convertible securities. This Bill has gone out of committee, and we have not dealt with these at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the $25,000,000?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes.

(3) In the event of all or any of the holders of Income Charge Convertible Debenture Stock secured by trust deed made to the British Empire Trust Company Limited and the National Trust Company Limited, dated the 6th day of May, 1910, exercising the option granted to them by the said trust deed, of exchanging the said debenture stock, not exceeding in all twenty-five million dollars ($25,000,000) for fully paid shares in the capital stock of the said company, the Governor in Council may when and so soon as the said exchange is effected and the said shares are issued, declare the same to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same shall thereupon become the property of His Majesty and shall be paid for when transferred and delivered to the said minister at the same price per share as that fixed by arbitration for the one million (1,000,000) shares of the capital stock of the said company, as hereinafter provided.

(4) The necessary qualification shares for directors may be transferred to or allowed to remain in their names by the Minister of Finance on such conditions as he may determine.

I conceive that to be very important. Why should 25,000,000 possible shares be outstanding, without provision being made for their acquisition? I deal with the next matter as follows:

3. So soon as five hundred thousand of the said shares have been transferred or all of the said shares have been acquired as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any other company included in the Canadian Northern system in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purpose may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, but not exceeding the sum of twenty-five millions of dollars ($25,000,000) during the current fiscal year.

(2) The Canadian Northern Railway Company and each other company comprising the Canadian Northern system shall from time to time do all such acts and things, make, issue and execute such agreements, obligations and securities in connection with the payment or settlement or postponement or payment of the said indebtedness as the Minister of Finance may from time to time require.

Now I proceed to the arbitration clauses. I ask this House to look at the sections of this Bill. There is no Arbitration Act in Canada of universal application. There is an Arbitration Act in most if not all of the provinces, or at least in those provinces that have seen fit to pass legislation of that character, because it is a matter affecting property and civil rights. The old Dominion Arbitration Act was repealed when we substituted the Exchequer Court therefor. We must deal with the arbitration in some manner. Suppose Mackenzie and Mann or the majority shareholders do not name an arbitrator, what happens? Is there any provision in the Bill for any arbitrator being appointed? Suppose they sit tight and do not sign the agreement, and let the short-date loans mature. This country must help them. They do not sign the agreement, and are in charge of the road, and what is going to happen? Every one knows that the submission to arbitration is the all-important thing, after you have constituted the board of arbitrators. First constitute your board; secondly, determine what your submission shall be. Therefore, I would enact as follows:

4. (1) A Board of Arbitration consisting of three arbitrators to be appointed as hereafter provided, who shall select one of their number as chairman, and who shall preside at the sittings of the Board, is hereby constituted under the name and style of "The Canadian Northern Arbitrators." Such arbitrators shall have full power and authority to examine witnesses under oath, and for the purposes of this Act shall have, exercise and enjoy all the rights, powers and authority conferred upon the Exchequer Court of Canada or a judge thereof by the Exchequer Court Act, being chapter one hundred and forty of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and the arbitration hereunder shall for the purpose of this Act be a cause or proceeding in the said court.

That constitutes my tribunal. Then,—

(2) The registrar of the Exchequer Court shall be the secretary of the said Board of Arbitrators.

Then,—

(3) The Minister of Finance shall appoint one of the said arbitrators and shall within five days after the completion of the said agreement notify the said registrar in writing of the name and address of the arbitrator so appointed.

(4) The majority of the said shareholders who may have executed the said agreement shall appoint one of the arbitrators and shall within five days after the completion of the said agreement, notify the said registrar in writing of the name and address of the arbitrator so appointed.

(5) In the event of the majority of the shareholders who may have executed the said agreement failing within the time specified to notify the said Registrar of the appointment of an Arbitrator, or in the event of the agreement not being completed and the shares acquired by the Governor in Council, the Registrar in either such case shall forthwith certify in writing such fact to the Chief Judge of the Exchequer Court, who within five days from the date of the receipt of such notice shall notify the said Registrar in writing of the name and address of an Arbitrator who shall have and exercise the same power and authority as though he had been appointed by the majority of the said shareholders.

(6) The said Registrar shall after the appointment of the said Arbitrators, notify each of them in writing of the said appointments and request them on or before a day therein named, but not less than five nor more than ten days from the date of the appointment of the last appointed Arbitrator, to appoint a third Arbitrator, and notify the said Registrar in writing of the name and address of the person so appointed.

(7) In the event of the two said Arbitrators failing within the time specified to notify the said Registrar of the appointment of a third Arbitrator, the said Registrar shall further certify such fact to the Chief Judge of the Exchequer Court, who within five days from the day of the receipt of such notice shall notify the said Registrar in writing of the name and address of a third Arbitrator.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: By my watch, I thought I had three minutes more. May I be permitted to conclude?

Mr. PUGSLEY: By unanimous consent.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: May I hand in this paper, as the rest of my speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is contrary to the usual practice of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: Send it over here, and we will finish it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is only done in the case of ministers of the Crown, in exceptional cases, but never with a private member.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I shall ask one of my hon. friends opposite to read it, commencing at page 7. May I add that, instead of moving any amendment in relation to the measure, I will content myself with hoping that, in another chamber, the members will safeguard the interests of this country, when this matter comes before them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to briefly deal with the several points mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett). My hon. friend has stated that the effect of this legislation will be to release the provinces from obligations under guarantees of Canadian Northern Railway Company's securities. But, Mr. Speaker, it is common ground on both sides of this House that this railway system is not to be allowed to go into the hands of a receiver. That being the position taken by both Government and Opposition members in this House, the question will never arise as to the provinces being liable upon their guarantees of these securities. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), who made to-night—as he always does—an interesting speech, put forward the proposition that the Dominion Government should continue, in the future as in the past, to make good the deficit the Canadian Northern might have from year to year, in order that it might continue to operate as a railway system. He did not suggest nor has any other hon. gentleman in this House so far as I know suggested—except the hon. gentleman from Calgary—that there should be a receivership. If there is no receivership, and if the Dominion Government, instead of taking over this system, is to make good each year the amount of deficit, no question can possibly arise as to the liability of the provinces, because the railway company will be able to pay the interest upon its securities, and consequently the provinces will not be called upon for payments under their guarantees. When hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear" when the statement is made that some of the provinces will be released at the expense of other provinces, they overlook the fact that both the Prime Minister as representing this side and the leader of the Opposition as representing the other side have said that there must not be a receivership, and that this system must be continued as a solvent going concern. In that case no question at all can arise as to the liabilities of the provinces under those guarantees.

I pass to the next question. My hon. friend (Mr. R. B. Bennett), who is a good lawyer, made the statement that the effect of this legislation is to vest in the people of Canada all the assets and make them responsible for all the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. As a proposition of law, I say that is not so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is intended to be so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As a proposition of law, that is not so. The Government is acquiring the whole of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, of which it now owns 40 per cent. I put forward this proposition. If it is to be the policy of this Government not to permit the Canadian Northern Railway system to go into default, the position will not be essentially different from what it is to-day; because to-day we hold 40 per cent of this stock, and we have given a $45,000,000 guarantee, which is junior to the securities which have been issued in the past, and consequently the Dominion Government, as a matter of practical business, and especially in view of the declarations of both parties in the House, would have to sustain this system—that is, to make good its deficit from year to year. The system is not to go into the hands of a receiver. Then, as a matter of law, the fact that the Dominion is acquiring all the stock of the company does not cause the assets of the Canadian Northern Railway Company to be vested in the Dominion, nor does it make the Dominion Government directly responsible for the liabilities of the railway system. That is a legal proposition from which no man in this House can dissent. Just to confirm that, the Drayton-Acworth report—and I have said we are following out the leading lines of that report—did not recommend that the Board of Dominion Railway Trustees should acquire the physical assets of the Canadian Northern, as has been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite, but they suggested that those trustees should acquire the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. And on page 88 of their report they make this specific recommendation:

> We recommend the transfer to the trustees of the common stocks of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific, subject to certain conditions and reservations made hereafter.

That is to say, they recommended that the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, not the physical assets of that company, should be vested in this board of trustees which they proposed should be constituted. What further did they say?—and this is the reason why I am referring to their report. Touching upon this question of liability, on page 73 of their report, under the caption "Financial responsibility of the Government," the commissioners say:

> We have recommended that the Government should assume responsibility towards the trustees, but not directly towards the present holders, for the interest on all the securities charged on the new combined system.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is any more importance to be attached to that portion of their report than to the portion which overlooked the value of the lands?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have dealt with that before, and will deal with it again. In the meantime the point I make is that Messrs. Drayton and Acworth recommended that the board of Dominion trustees, representing the people of Canada, should acquire the stock just as we propose the Dominion Government should acquire the stock. Then they go on to say:

> We have recommended that the Government should assume responsibility towards the trustees, but not directly towards the present holders, for the interest on all the securities charged on the new combined system.

What does that mean? It means that in the opinion of Messrs. Drayton and Acworth —and any lawyer knows that this is so—if you acquire the stock of a company you do not become directly liable to the creditors of that company, because a company is different from any or all its shareholders; that is, from a legal standpoint. It is however the intention of the Dominion Government to continue the system as a solvent and going concern. When hon. gentlemen talk of all the assets of the system being vested in the Dominion, and of all the liabilities being directly assumed by the Dominion, I say they are making a misstatement, speaking from the legal standpoint.

My hon. friend speaks of the short-date loans of $98,000,000. He stated that those may be said to be liabilities, and he is correct in that; they are liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway company. That has been admitted.

As far as construction and other contracts are concerned the railway department knows the situation accurately. The Dominion Government has full information with respect to the construction of the lines of the Canadian Northern Railway system. And I say further, that there has been placed before this House complete information as to the amount owing to contractors to-day, and as to the amount outstanding by way of liability on contracts undertaken. So the House has full information under those heads.

My hon. friend has referred to the Canadian Pacific Railway company. No one has greater admiration than I have for the Canadian Pacific Railway company, as a great transportation system organized to the highest degree of efficiency. It is a wonderful organization, and is so regarded throughout the world. The point that was made in this House by the Prime Minister and by myself was this—not in criticism of the Canadian Pacific Railway company, but in dealing with the question of what shall be done with the Canadian Northern system: If you eliminate receivership, then there is only one of two destinies for the Canadian Northern Railway system, and there is no man in this House will gainsay that. It either must be taken over and operated by the Dominion Government, or taken over and operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway company. That is as far as I have gone, and I subscribe to that proposition to-night, because it is sound. There is no railway company in this country except the Canadian Pacific that is able to take over the Canadian Northern railway, which is the second greatest system in this country. The only alternative to the Dominion Government taking over the Canadian Northern railway, if it is to be saved from receivership, is that the Canadian Pacific take it over. I pass no opinion as to whether the Canadian Pacific would take it over or not, but am simply stating my opinion that if it is to be saved, it must be saved by either the Dominion Government or the Canadian Pacific. I go further than that and say, that even if the Canadian Northern Railway system went into the hands of a receiver, it could only be re-constituted by one of two organizations—the Dominion Government or the Canadian Pacific Railway company. So that, no matter whether it goes into the hands of a receiver or is saved from receivership, you get back to one of two alternatives: Either the Dominion Government takes it over or the Canadian Pacific takes it over. I shall say no more under that head.

As my hon. friend has referred to the manifesto issued by some prominent business men of Montreal, I desire to say this: This is a free country, and it is perfectly open to any gentlemen to issue any statements they desire to their fellow-citizens.

Certainly there is no objection on my part, and I should never have referred in any way to the statement made by these gentlemen in Montreal if my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) had not read it in the House as a part of his argument. That is how the matter was introduced into this House, and as it had been discussed in this debate it was open to me to deal with it, and in dealing with it, I passed no reflection at all on these gentlemen, as Hansard will show.

Now I come to my hon. friend's suggestion that there should be a statutory receivership. There is not much difference between a statutory receivership and any other receivership. A statutory receivership would be one in which by statute a receiver of the system was appointed. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that there is a moratorium in most of the provinces. But a moratorium does not pay the interest or the debts; it only defers payment of the interest and the debts, and if a moratorium were taken advantage of, instead of dealing with the matter from year to year, two or three years from now we should have to deal with a much worse situation, because there would be the indebtedness that had accumulated during the course of those years.

My hon. friend comes to the Bill, and when he was dealing with it I could not help thinking what a wonderful thing it is to be a lawyer. A lawyer can see more difficulties in a Bill, when he wants to, than any man of plain common sense can see.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the reason you are a lawyer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will take as good a lawyer as you can find on this side of the House, and as good a lawyer as you can find on that side of the House, and I will give the two of them the best Bill that can be drafted by the best lawyer outside, and I will guarantee that the two of them will raise more difficulties in connection with that Bill than could be raised by one hundred laymen, no matter how much they might try.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the cheap answer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend says that Mackenzie and Mann may not sign the agreement. Let us see what that means. This agreement cannot go into effect until Mackenzie, Mann & Company, as holders of five-sixths of the shares of the Canadian Northern Railway company, do sign the agreement, and if it does not come into effect what happens to Mackenzie, Mann & Company and to the Canadian Northern? What is the purpose of this Bill? It is to save this company from going into the hands of the receiver, by providing money and to take over the stock of the company. My hon. friend suggests that the great danger is that Mackenzie and Mann won't come in under this legislation. Well, I have heard Mackenzie and Mann called a great many names since I have had a seat in this Parliament, but never until to-night have I heard it imputed to them that they were suffering from insanity. If they do not come in under this Bill what happens to the Canadian Northern Railway company, and to the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company which they hold?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: You will save it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: On the one hand, hon. gentlemen say that the road will go into the hands of a receiver if we do not give it assistance. We know that. On the other hand, my hon. friend says: Oh, you are incurring a great risk because they will not come in; they will not lodge their stock. If they do not lodge their stock the Dominion Government will not worry, because, in that case, there will not be any money advanced under this legislation. The responsibility will be that of the majority owners of the stock.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They do not care.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We do not need to worry about Messrs. Mackenzie, Mann and Company not lodging their stock under the agreement. We come to the next bogey that is put up. My hon. friend says: If they sit tight—well, if they sit tight, the Dominion Government will also sit tight, and if they sit tight and do not brings in their stock, then the Minister of Finance will not pay out the money from the Consolidated Fund under section 4 of this Bill. He says that only—

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I wish to say that there are entirely too many interruptions from hon. members sitting in their seats.

An hon. MEMBER: The time is up.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I purpose adding not less than one more minute to the minister's time for speaking because he has been interrupted so often.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend (Mr. R. B. Bennett) says that only the registered shareholders are interested. There is not so very much in this matter of holders of stock and pledgees. I pointed out the other day—and every lawyer in this House knows—that if I am the pledgee of stock, I can make myself the registered owner by transferring my stock on the books of the company. When you are taking away stock from shareholders, you must not forget that those who have a limited interest by way of pledge also have the right to come in. If the word "pledgee" were eliminated entirely from the Bill, it would simply mean that the pledgees would transfer the stock into their own names and thus become the registered owners and be represented in the arbitration. There is nothing in this point that pledgees should not be mentioned. If pledgees were not mentioned, they would turn themselves into registered owners by transferring the stock into their own names on the books of the company.

My hon. friend says that there is income convertible debenture stock of $25,000,000. I pointed out to this House that this agreement covers only the acquisition of $60,000,000. It does not cover the $25,000,000 at all, and it is not intended that it should cover it. My hon. friend, as I understand him, says that we should take away the $25,000,000 of stock which is held in trust for those debenture holders who have the right, if they so desire, within a certain time to convert their debentures into shares. He says that we should take away that right.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, to pay for it at the same price.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I say that we should not pay for it at tne same price. Not only that, but the debenture holders who have right as creditors would never think of surrendering their shares for stock in this company in its present financial position. My hon. friend knows that perfectly well, and that is the reason why it is not necessary to provide in this agreement for the stock which is held in trust, if those parties should desire to come in. Take a company that is not earning within four or five million dollars of its bond interest every year after paying its operating charges. Does my hon. friend mean to put forward seriously the view that debenture holders who are creditors of the road are going to convert their debentures for which they paid par into stock of a company like this? They are certainly not going to do that, and even if they decided to do it, there is nothing in this Bill that would give them the right to do so, because all we are dealing with is the $60,000,000 of stock in addition to the $40,000,000 of stock which we hold. My hon. friend says that the arbitration clauses are not workable.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All I have to say is that they are pretty complete. In the first place the Dominion Government will appoint an arbitrator; Mackenzie and Mann and the other shareholders and pledgees will appoint an arbitrator; and the two together will appoint a third arbitrator. If they do not agree, the judge of the Exchequer Court will appoint an arbitrator. You now have your arbitration constituted. It is not necessary that we should embody a whole arbitration Act in this section of the Bill to which my hon. friend has referred. There is no difficulty about three arbitrators with the powers they are given in this Bill. What are those powers? They are given the powers of determining the value of the stock, and they proceed in a summary way. What does that mean? I sit at the feet of the Gamaliel from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who told me this two or three years ago—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: —that a court which proceeds in a summary way was not a court that required formal pleadings. These arbitrators proceed in a summary way. They receive reports and statements authenticated in such way as they may decide and such evidence as they may deem necessary or helpful, examine witnesses under oath and hear parties by counsel or representatives, and the unanimous determination of the arbitrators shall be final.

From a common sense standpoint we have constituted a tribunal which can proceed in a summary, practical, business way to determine the value of those shares, and if they all agree, their determination is final, and if they do not all agree, there is a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. Further, I am going to point this out to the House—

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My time is not up yet. I want to point out—

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Those shares are absolutely——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. When hon. gentlemen are calling "time", they are calling in question the decision of the Chair. The minister has had one and one-half minutes less time than the majority of hon. gentlemen on my left, and he has half a minute more.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I probably deserve it.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Give him a taste of the "gag" too.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When those shares are lodged with the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, they are there irrevocably, so that no such questions as my hon. friend has raised are likely to give any trouble in connection with this transaction.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, in the midst of this very serious discussion, if one sits on this side of the House, one cannot but be really amused at the plight in which members on the Government side have found themselves. Stringing up a beautiful rope with a noose on the end of it for the benefit of hon. members on this side, they find themselves dangling with their heels in the air at the end of their own rope. The Minister of Finance himself, anxious to tell the world that he has jammed this measure through by use of the closure, finds himself gagged.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is not correct. I have finished.

Mr. GRAHAM: He did not accept the gag very gracefully; it seemed to stick in his throat, but the gag was there, made by himself. It is not such a serious thing, you know, if you put up a good fight and are killed by somebody else, but it is a terrible thing to find yourself in such a state that you are committing suicide. The Minister of Finance, in his anxiety to prevent the rest of us from making a few observations, discovers all at once that he has fallen into his own trap and been caught. Perhaps next time he will be a little more careful and reasonable.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not take all the time.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, the minister took all the time that he thought he had and more than some of us thought he should have taken. He had, however, to stop before he was through, which is the effect of this measure which he put into operation by a motion last night, just twenty-four hours before he should have done so. The Bill would have gone through just the same without this gag, and the Finance Minister would be able to face the country and say, "The Opposition as well as the members of the Government had every opportunity to discuss this measure." I dare say that when he goes on the stump he will tell the people "I could have said a great deal more to squelch the man from Calgary, if I had not been stopped by the Speaker; I had arguments which I could have advanced, when I was choked off by my own resolution." Up to date, he has not replied to the hon. member for Calgary, and this argument of his goes to the country stillborn. I do not know what it might have been had it been allowed to develop. But the Finance Minister told us that lawyers may use a lot of words without saying much, and he proceeded to exemplify it. I want to take him up on that little technicality argument of his. I have not the disadvantage of being a lawyer—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: —but I have the authority of the Finance Minister for saying that I ought to be thankful. He has told us a lawyer can raise more bogeys in five minutes than a sensible man can think of, or something to that effect; and I admit with him, he being a lawyer, that that is so. I will tell you why—and in this I "appeal to Caesar," and away from the lawyers. The Finance Minister argued that although the people of Canada became the owners of the stock of the Canadian Northern, they were not the proprietors of the Canadian Northern. If, after taking this stock—and I am dealing with business men—the people of Canada are not the owners of the Canadian Northern, who are the owners?

An hon. MEMBER: Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. GRAHAM: If that is not a legal technicality raised to becloud the issue, then I do not know what it is. I will put the reverse side. If the Government owns all the common stock of the Canadian Northern railway, is it not going to be liable for the debts of the railway, and if not, who will be liable for them?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. GRAHAM: After taking over the common stock, we cannot cast the physical property of this system adrift, saying it is of no value, no one owns it, and that no one will pay the debts of the concern.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Who is liable now?

Mr. GRAHAM: As a matter of fact, we may becloud it with all the legal technicalities we like, but when this Bill passes, if it does pass, the people of Canada will own the Canadian Northern railway and will be liable for what the Canadian Northern owes. The Minister of Finance, as a lawyer can weave threads of technicalities around it, but that will not do away with the business fact that we shall own the Canadian Northern, and we shall owe the debts of the Canadian Northern. I wish to call attention to the fact that the closure is in use to-day in order to shorten up this debate because it did not proceed at sufficient length last night. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were not responsible for the length of the discussion last night. After warning us that there would be closure to-day, the Prime Minister stepped in and took two hours, nearly the whole of the evening, in discussing this measure. After doing that, he became a party to shutting us off. He took two hours to repeat a speech he made the other day, and said that we should each be confined to twenty minutes. And they call that fairness in discussion.

An hon. MEMBER: British fair play.

Mr. GRAHAM: Passing on from that the Prime Minister called attention to what he—as a lawyer, I suppose I may say—considered was a fair statement of the case. He said, why should Parliament endeavour to review the finding of a board of arbitration and of a judge of the Supreme Court? I say that is not a fair statement of the case. If those arbitrators are unanimous, the case never goes to the Supreme Court at all. If it goes to the Supreme Court, it will be because one of the arbitrators disagrees with the others. When the Prime Minister endeavoured to make the country believe last night that we were proposing by this amendment to review the findings of the Supreme Court, he was in a measure misleading the people. The hon. member for Calgary and two or three others, including myself, suggested a few days ago that there should be some provision in this Bill by which the Government might refuse the award of the arbitrators if that award was too great. The Government declined to amend the Bill in that respect, and, I submit, the amendment proposed now only says that, if in the judgment of Parliament the board of arbitrators have made an award which is too high, Parliament should have the right to review that judgment and reverse it if it sees fit.

Whom do we represent? We represent the people of Canada. We may sidestep this question as much as we like, and may becloud it with legal technicalities—saying for instance, that we will own the stock but will not own the railway, that we will have the assets but will not be liable for the debts—still we cannot get away from the fact that the people of Canada will hold us responsible for every dollar those arbitrators give for stock which the Government's own commission says is not worth a penny. We cannot escape from that responsibility, either through the Supreme Court or through the Board of Arbitration.

I did not rise to tempt closure, but I want to point out again that the Opposition is composed of good Samaritans. I find that not only did the Minister of Finance get into trouble over his own resolution, and have to stop before he was through, but another leading supporter of the Government, got into trouble also. My good friend from Calgary found himself in the midst of proposing a Bill to the House, when owing to the measure which he had supported and the action of the Finance Minister which he criticised, he was not able to put before the House his entire views concerning what ought to be in this Bill. I am opposed to closure, and I am prepared to do anything I can do to help the hon. gentleman in overcoming its provisions still keeping within the rules of the House. I am sorry for the hon. member for Calgary that he is in such company that they tied him up in this way, and I will try to get him out of the scrape. I purpose to read what he was choked off from reading through the action of the Finance Minister. I will place before the House the remaining clauses of the Bill proposed by the hon. member for Calgary as a substitute for the Bill we are now discussing. I do this because I think it is fair that the House should know my hon. friend's proposition in its entirety. I do it, further, because this Bill will go to the Upper Chamber, and I believe the members of that House should have before them the counter proposition of my hon. friend from Calgary. And if it be better than that of the Minister of Finance, then, possibly, the Senate will accept this Bill and reject the one now before us. The new Bill could not be much worse than the one we have, and possibly it may be better. I shall begin reading where my hon. friend from Calgary left off.

(8) The said arbitrators shall as soon as practicable after the appointment of the third arbitrator, meet, organize and proceed with the arbitration in as expeditious a manner as possible.

5. (1) The said arbitrators shall determine the value (if any) of the one million shares of the issued capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, as represented by the value of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises particularly mentioned and described in the "Canadian Northern Guarantee Act, 1914."

(2) In the event of the said arbitrators determining to ascertain the cost of the reproduction of the undertakings, plant, equipment, properties and assets of the Canadian Northern System, such cost of reproduction shall be ascertained on the basis of the prices, costs and wages prevailing before the outbreak of the present war.

(3) The said arbitrators shall certify the sum to which each of the shareholders registered as such on the stock or share registers of the said company shall be entitled, rateably and proportionately to the value (if any) fixed by them on the one million shares of the capital stock of the said company.

6. The award of the said arbitrators shall be made in writing on or before the first day of ..... 19... or such later date as any two of the said arbitrators may by writing fix and determine, and shall forthwith be filed with the registrar of the Exchequer Court at Ottawa, and shall thereupon become a final judgment of the said court, and the practice of that court with respect to appeals therefrom shall apply thereto. Provided that in the event of the award being unanimous there shall be no appeal therefrom.

7. If the said award is unanimous or no appeal is taken therefrom, the Minister of Finance shall pay out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada to the said several shareholders, the sums to which they may be entitled by the said award.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, that is not there.

Mr. GRAHAM: That amendment mentioned by my hon. friend from St. John probably will be put in the Bill, with the consent of the hon. member for Calgary, when it comes back from the Senate. I just rose to read this addition to the Bill which is proposed by the hon. member for Calgary. Just one word more before I respond to the gavel. The Minister of Finance has referred on two occasions to-night to the limited amount borrowed on this stock as collateral. If the minister would just tell us what that amount is it would help us to an understanding of this question because, if it be small, it might make a great difference; but, if it be very large I can see why the pledgees are put in this Bill. It may be yet that the pledgees will become the registered stockholders and they will be sure to sign the agreement. There may be doubts as to what Mackenzie and Mann may do, but the pledgees themselves will be up before daylight to get their hands on that agreement if they have any right to sign it. I am not sure that Mackenzie and Mann will rush to sign the agreement. Before this agreement is made, if Mackenzie and Mann can find some other way out they may do so and never sign the agreement, but as to the pledgees, I agree with the Minister of Finance there will be no trouble at all; they will sign that agreement almost before it is drawn.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) I am not a lawyer and I am glad of it. We have had sufficient talk from the legal fraternity and it is about time that some other gentlemen took part in this debate. The hon. member for South Renfrew says that this is gag rule, but he must remember that thirty-five hours had already been spent on the measure previous to the bringing in of the closure.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is hardly a million an hour.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Some twenty-five members spoke the other night and to-day we will listen to some twenty-five more. The hon. gentleman says he is very willing to help out the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite are very willing to help him. I think the speech of the hon. member for Calgary to-night was a most unfair and uncalled for criticism of the Minister of Finance in connection with this Bill. The Minister of Finance has dealt with the remarks of the member for Calgary in such a manner that it would be folly for me to attempt to add to what he has said. But, there are a few things that I deem it my duty to call to the attention of the House. The hon. member for Calgary has referred to the construction accounts due to companies. If he had looked at the general balance sheet he would have found the following:

Due to other companies on construction account	$16,000,000
Current liabilities, bills payable, pay-rolls	18,000,000
Audited vouchers and other floating liabilities	11,000,000

That ought to be sufficient evidence that the Government had investigated that part of it, and it ought to have satisfied him that it covered his argument in that regard. Then we find that in many instances hon. gentlemen seek to make mountains out of molehills. We should look at this as a great national question, one that is worthy of our best consideration. Instead of quibbling over words here and there, words uttered in 1914 especially, we should get down to the practical business proposition and see what this great public utility demands of the people of Canada. If you approach the subject in that spirit, I am sure that you will come to the conclusion that I have come to, that this is a great national project, the greatest that any country ever undertook at one time. It is a question that is worthy of our closest attention. In future years, I am satisfied, the members who sit in this House will fully realize and appreciate the steps which are being taken by the Government in this measure and will consider them to have been in the best interest of our people.

Both parties are practically united on the question of public ownership. They are both agreed that it is in the interest of the country that the people should own this road. In the early stages of the debate two hon. gentlemen proposed that the Government should pay over $20,000,000 and continue Mackenzie and Mann in the position which they now occupy. But to-day practically every one on both sides of this House is in favour of taking over the road, except the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). There are only two possible ways in which this road can be taken over. The one is by the Government and the other by the Canadian Pacific railway. If we should allow it to go into the hands of a receiver if we should put it up at public auction, there is no question but that the Canadian Pacific railway would be able to bid a greater amount than even the Government would care to put into it, with the result that the Canadian Pacific railway would own and have a monopoly on all the railways of this country. When you take into consideration that by the acquisition of this road, the people of Canada will own, control and operate 13,247 miles of railway, whereas the Canadian Pacific railway has only 12,900 miles, and when you remember that the Canadian Northern has the best grades and curves of any road on the continent, you cannot but appreciate the fact that this is a measure that is going to be of great advantage to the people. But the Canadian Northern is in such a position that it cannot possibly pay its running expenses, interest charges and provide rolling stock and betterments.

I believe that it is in the interests of the people that it should be taken over and run by them. We do not perhaps appreciate to the full that the Canadian Northern railway has been a great colonizing road. It has been as great an element in the development of the Northwest as any other railroad, or even as great as any institution established by this Parliament. Owing to the opening up of this line of railway, tens of thousands of homesteaders are now settled along its right of way across the continent, and in addition to that, many important industries have been located in different parts of the country. There are along the line of the Canadian Northern railway 980 interior elevators. The road operates six steamships on our Great Lakes, and has five terminal elevators with a capacity of 10,000,000 bushels. The total elevator capacity in the west along its lines is 60,000,000 bushels. Thus this road is a splendid undertaking, and one that, I am sure, will receive the approval of the people of Canada. Within a few years we will take over the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Then the people of Canada will control and operate 19,000 miles of railway out of the 40,000 that are in operation in Canada. This will be a mighty factor in the development of our country.

There is a matter to which I wish to refer before taking my seat. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) at page 4760 of Hansard said, referring to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann:

> And lastly, they have corrupted the public life of this country. They have corrupted it alike in the provinces and in the Dominion, and if the members on both sides of the House were to tell the tale of contributions that have been made to party funds, it would indeed be an enlightening and revealing story.

This statement has gone broadcast throughout the country, and I say most emphatically that nine-tenths of the members of this House—and I defy the member for Calgary to successfully contradict me—have never received any remuneration whatever from any of the railways. I have been a member of this House for the last fourteen years and I have never been approached in any way as suggested by the member for Calgary by any representative of a railway or of any other corporation, and I think it ill becomes a member to try to belittle the standing of the members of this House by making any such statement. The member for Calgary was a member of the special committee on the Rail-

10 p.m. way Act. He must know that the twenty-six men who took part in the work of that committee fulfilled their duties as faithfully as any men could do, and that they brought in advanced legislation for the general benefit and development of the country. Having been a member of the Railway Committee for the last fourteen years, I resent, in the strongest language I can bring to bear, any such statement as that made by the hon. member for Calgary as referring to myself, and I feel that I am voicing the sentiments of nine-tenths of the men in this Chamber when I say that not a man of them has ever been interested in anything such as he has suggested. I regret exceedingly that the hon. member should make such a statement. I feel that it was a reflection on the members of this House, and I for one did not wish to be seated and allow such a statement to go unchallenged.

I sincerely hope that the third reading of this Bill will be carried, as I am satisfied that it is legislation in the public interest.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I rise to a question of privilege. The observations I made some ten days ago I desire to repeat. I referred to contributions to party funds, and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) knew that or else he is unable to understand the King's English. No reference was made to him, and if he so construed it he is making a very considerable draft upon his imagination.

Mr. COPP: Too innocent.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is one way of putting it—referring to party funds. That is about as unfair a way as any other. I want the hon. member for Calgary to know that he is not the only Simon-pure politician there is in this country at the present time.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He does not pretend to be.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: It is astonishing how some men are able to parade themselves in a manner to endeavour to show that all other men in public life are ready to be bought or sold in connection with any of the transactions of this House. I repeat that I believe it is an unfair statement to make with regard to members of this House, and that nine-tenths of the members are as honest and open and above board a body of men as you can find in any walk of life.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: "Methinks the lady doth protest too much."

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Very clever.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the long and vigorous addresses coming from the Government benches to-night. They are particularly interesting in view of the fact that we are charged with killing time and blocking the wheels of Parliament in getting Bills through. I wonder what hon. gentlemen opposite are doing. Of course they may have a wonderful conception of time that we have not. It seems to me that the sun moves and the moon moves, particularly the moon when they are speaking just as well as when we on this side are speaking. I therefore take particular interest in watching their performances. I was more than usually interested in the performance of the Minister of Finance himself. He reminded me of the old saying that a man sometimes bites off more than he can chew; to-night the Minister of Finance found himself caught in his own net. He was certainly like Haman of old when he found himself dangling upon his own gallows. So much for the Minister of Finance. I must remind him of the declarations and opinions expressed by his bosom and close friend and supporter, the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett). It appears to me that, according to the deliverance of that hon. gentleman, who has more than a national reputation as a corporation lawyer, and particularly a railway corporation lawyer, the legislation that is now before this House is in the position of the old Indian's gun. It wants a new lock, stock, and barrel.

The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) has addressed the House. He is a lawyer of great repute. And the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in sunny days and balmy weather admits he himself is a lawyer but the profession of law is to him something like Abraham's wife,—sometimes she was his wife and sometimes she was his sister. The Minister of Finance is a lawyer, and he is not a lawyer, just as it suits him; to-night is one of the nights when Sarah is Abraham's sister;—the hon. gentleman is not a lawyer to-night. I have no reason to disagree with him when he says he is not a lawyer. I always thought his theoretical ideas in law were very good, but, it seems, when he comes down to the surgical part of law, operating, he finds himself somewhat at sea; at least, that is the conclusion reached by the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), and when that hon. gentleman undertakes to discuss corporation law, I must follow the example of the hon. Minister of Finance and uncover my head—"take off my hat" to him. Then in view of the exposition made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, and the riddling which he gave this legislation, there is only one consolation for the Canadian people, and that is, when the new Government comes in, if an effort is made to enforce this Act should it be passed, we can very easily get out of it, because we can plead disability,—I think we can put forth the disability of infancy on the part of everybody who is handling this legislation as members and supporters of the Government.

We hear a great deal about this arbitration, and I want to deal seriously with this matter, as an important national question, as the hon. gentleman from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) wishes us to deal with it. He said that it was a great national question. I would be very glad indeed if the Government and the supporters of the Government would take that broad view of it and deal with it in that way; but it appears to me that the members of the Government and those supporting them think it is a tu'penny ha'penny matter not worthy of consideration—a matter that should be dealt with in twenty minutes and wiped off the slate, to be replaced with something else. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman from East Lambton speaking in this Chamber. He has a style peculiarly his own. He doesn't remind me, of course, of Parliament, but he brings me back to the temple where righteousness rules and where we hear the evangelist hold forth. I am sure there is not a member in the House who, in season and out of season, stands to his guns for party purposes better than the gentleman from East Lambton. With all the graft, money and party patronage that the Conservative party have had in their hands in the elections which have been run in this country since the hon. gentleman became a politician, if he, who has been faithful in his service to the Conservative party, got none of it, he has good ground to find fault. I must say that that is the great difficulty with governments handling money of this kind, the honest member never receives a fair share; and if there was ever a case where an arbitration should be established, and a full and thorough investigation made this is it. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should put his case on paper, and submit it to this House, and I will vote with all my heart for an arbitration board to have an accounting in order that his just and full share of that money shall be paid to him, as was paid to the others. It is said that only one-tenth of the party gets it. It is all very well to go back to those old Jewish customs of a tenth, but it should spread wider in the party than one-tenth, and I think my hon. friend should get his share.

He said this should be a national Bill, and dealt with in a national way. My own conception of the measure is that it should not have originated in this branch of Parliament, but should have originated in the other Chamber, and should have gone through the hands of the Divorce Committee, because it is a Bill for the relief of Mackenzie and Mann. It being a Bill of that character, I am sure, no matter what else may be wrong about it; it began in the wrong chamber.

Mr. COPP: Who is the co-respondent?

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose there would be quite a few of them. The management and shareholders of the Canadian Bank of Commerce might be co-respondents.

We have reason to complain of the meagre information that has been given to the House and the country in connection with this large transaction. It involves more money than any other piece of business that was ever before this House since I came here, about fourteen years ago, which was about the time the gentleman from East Lambton became a member of the House. I have followed the proceedings of the House very closely ever since, and apart from the big votes we passed for war purposes, this is the biggest transaction that has ever been before the House. We should certainly, when dealing with our own money, have all the facts before us. Why should there be any mystery or back-door business about the thing? Why do we not know all about it? We are told to go to arbitration about this question. We are going to arbitrate, and get into our own possession some property belonging to somebody else. I never saw a case of that kind, except where one person had made an offer to the party owning the property, for him to accept or refuse. If we are going to expropriate this stock—because it is a species of expropriation—where is the record of the offer of the Minister of Finance to Mackenzie and Mann for it? If he were going to buy it, the proper way would be for him to say to Mackenzie and Mann, "Here, we are going to take this stock, and will give you so much for it." Of course if they refuse to accept the amount, the proper course would be for the Minister of Finance to say: "If you do not accept it, we will go to arbitration." There was not a word submitted to this House in regard to any offer and if there were negotiations we are in entire ignorance in regard to them. As a business proposition, something like that should have been done, and it was not business for the minister to go ot Mackenzie and Mann and say: "We are going to take this stock, and we are going to appoint a number of arbitrators who will deal with it, and I am not going to say what it is worth, and I do not know what you will ask for it, but we will put ourselves entirely in the hands of those men who are going to arbitrate."

I submit that such a transaction as this would never be put through by any ordinary business man without first finding out in some way what was the value of the stock and what Mackenzie and Mann were willing to take for it.

As to the arbitration itself I submit that we have no knowledge at all as to what they would be willing to take for the stock, or that any effort was made to find that out. We have asked that the correspondence between the Government and Mackenzie and Mann and the pledgees of this stock in reference to this transaction be laid on the table of the House, that we might know what were the negotiations that led up to this legislation. I do not know if there was any correspondence or not, but if there was, it certainly should be laid on the table so that every member of this House and the press of this country should be put into possession of the facts. We have no knowledge as to whether an offer was made; or as to the answer to that offer. I submit that if this was only a $100 transaction, if the Government was simply buying a horse, the slipshod manner in which the business is being done would be unworthy of the transaction. Then how much more unworthy, when the transaction involves something like $650,000,000 or $700,000,000 of the people's money.

Suppose we were to approach a tribunal to get at the proper value of this stock; what should we do, or where should we go? If a precedent is required the Government established one a year ago last May or June, when legislation was passed in this House for taking over the Quebec and Saguenay railway. We had the same conditions in the country then as we have now, and the same Government, the same Minister of Finance, and the same Minister of Railways. In that case the value of the property that was to be taken over was to be determined by a certain line of arbitration. I am using the word "arbitration" in this case as being synonomous with the method of obtaining the property. On that occasion the matter was submitted to a court that was particularly fitted to deal with questions of that kind. That was the proper course to take, and it is extraordinary, when a similar transaction arises, that the Governement should not acquire the Canadian Northern Railway property in the same way that they acquired the Quebec and Saguenay property. Why not follow the same procedure and go to the same court in both cases? Many years ago we had in this country a standing committee of arbitration to deal with cases of this kind. I saw them for the last time in Cape Breton, I think, in 1887 or 1888, when they were sent down there to value the right of way of the Intercolonial which was being extended to the island of Cape Breton. That was before the days of the Exchequer Court. The Government of that day, and the people who were doing business in those days, found it convenient to do away with this whole business of arbitration, and the Government established the Exchequer Court. The old committee was disbanded, there being no further use for it. I wish to refer for a moment to section 19 of the Exchequer Court Act, chapter 140 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1900, which defines the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court and the subjects with which it was particularly appointed to deal:

> The Exchequer Court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in all cases in which demand is made or relief sought in respect of any matter which might, in England, be the subject of a suit or action against the Crown, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in all cases in which the land, goods or money of the subject are in the possession of the Crown, or in which the claim arises out of a contract entered into by or on behalf of the Crown.

So the Exchequer Court was created particularly for the purpose of dealing with cases of this kind. And when you have a court of that kind created for this specific purpose, it is beyond my comprehension why we do not avail ourselves of it, but try to create a court which must be far below the Exchequer Court in experience and capacity for dealing with such questions. In the arbitrator appointed by the Government we have, of course, an old jurist, and no doubt a very respectable man; but I have no knowledge, nor has anybody else here, of his having had any particular experience in dealing with the expropriation of any lands, property or stock. That does not come within the purview of the court over which he presides. On the other hand we have a court established for that purpose.

I see I have only one minute more, and it is a pretty hard proposition to deal with this matter when one is standing on the trapdoor and the black cap is going over his head. In that one minute I can only say that this is not the time to take over this road under public ownership, because we have not the money. According to the minister's statement the other day, we are paying out at least $30,000,000 a month on account of the war, which amounts to $360,000,000 in the year. That, together with the ordinary expenditure of this country to keep the wheels going, is such a load on the people of this country that we are not in a position to put ourselves under the obligation of $650,000,000 or $700,000,000 more. The time is not ripe, no matter what the merits of the case may be, and we should let the matter stand until a more suitable time. There are parts of this country where they have no railways at all, though this Government pledged itself two years ago to give extensions. If this transaction is to go through, farewell to any railway extension in that part of the country from which I come. I protest against this legislation, protest against its origin, the manner in which it has been brought forward, and everything connected with it. It was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. If I had only a few more moments at my disposal, I should like to see it buried, and the epitaph over it which its merits deserve.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): I have a suggestion to make arising out of the proposition of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) to pass an Act through this House known as the Daylight Saving Bill. As that distinguished colleague of the Minister of Finance did not succeed in getting that legislation through, notwithstanding it had the approval, I suppose, of the other members of the Government, I would suggest that the hour proposed to be saved by the minister's Bill be appropriated to the Minister of Finance, the member for East Lambton (J. E. Armstrong) and the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), so that members on this side of the House may have that much extra time to discuss this measure in place of the time having been taken up by the hon. gentlemen I have named.

I do not wish this debate to close without expressing my views on the question of the public ownership of railways in Canada under present conditions. Public ownership of railways in Canada has been an exceedingly extravagant ownership under the present government. The results to the country of the operation of the Intercolonial railway, during the past five or six years, are not, I am sure, such as will produce any great enthusiasm among the people of this country for further government ownership of railways. The argument in favour of government ownership of the Intercolonial, as respects that portion of Canada through which it passes, was that by reason of it being a government-owned railway the public would enjoy cheaper transporation rates than those enjoyed in other sections of Canada where the roads were owned by private corporations. The boon of reasonable railway rates was accorded to the people of the Maritime Provinces and of the Province of Quebec up to a recent period, but since this government came into power there seems to have been a combine entered into by the Government, the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway, by which the rates of all these roads are brought up to the same level. As a matter of fact, although the Intercolonial is a government-owned road, those who have to make use of it in the Maritime Provinces enjoy no advantages whatever in the matter of rates at the present time. Freight rates have been largely increased by the Department of Railways within the last few weeks. So that in respect of rates nothing is to be gained by the general public by the public ownership of that railway. I am sure that if the Canadian Northern railway comes under the operation of the government the same conditions of affairs will exist. I have heard loud complaints voiced by members of this House who represent constituencies in the West against the exorbitant freight rates they have been obliged to pay in that portion of the country served by railways owned by private corporations. But if they think that by the government taking over the control and management of the Canadian Northern Railway system they will enjoy lower freight and passenger rates, they are doomed to disappointment.

There is another matter which presents itself to me as an argument against government ownership. The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) asked some weeks ago for a return showing the amount of money that had been spent for the upkeep of the Intercolonial extending from Point Tupper to the city of Sydney. Although no great improvements were made on the Intercolonial in that section of the country, the return showed that during the year 1916 the cost for the ordinary work on the upkeep of the Intercolonial had increased enormously over the year 1911. The explanation for that is that there was a municipal election in the province of Nova Scotia during the fall of 1916, and it is a fact that for some weeks before the holding of that election a gang of men were employed along the line of the Intercolonial from Point Tupper to Sydney, doing work which, if it were necessary, should have been done earlier in the season, and if it were not necessary, should not have been done at all. I do know that candidates of the Conservative party in that municipal election appeared to have carte blanche to employ men all over that section, on condition, of course, that their votes would be polled for Conservative candidates in the municipal election. I think we are getting down to pretty small business when the operation of a great railway in this country should be used for the purpose of promoting the political interests of municipal councillors. If the Government assumes the control of the Canadian Northern Railway system, if the present conditions prevail, the same thing will be true as regards the system of railway extending not only from Sydney to the city of Montreal, but clear across the continent and along all the branches of the Canadian Northern Railway system.

We have been very seriously embarrassed as regards the discussion of this question by reason of the Government's refusal to bring down information that is absolutely essential to enable us properly to discuss this question. The hon. member for North Cape Breton pointed out that, when the Minister of Finance was asked to produce the correspondence that led up to the proposals brought before Parliament by the Government, he said that there was no correspondence whatever. It is inconceivable to me that a transaction of this magnitude should have been carried on between a large railway corporation and the Government without a single line of correspondence to indicate the manner in which the negotiations were conducted. It appears as if the Government and the Canadian Northern railway interests had come to an agreement that, under any circumstances and under all conditions, this deal was to be made and the sum of money asked for by those interested should be paid by the Government irrespective of the merits of the transaction and irrespective of any opposition that might be developed to this legislation in the House of Commons.

It will perhaps be interesting to the House to know just the amount of money which Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern Railway company have obtained from the people of Canada up to the present time. As regards bonuses, land grants and securities for loans, I have the following statement which I desire to place upon Hansard. The province of Ontario granted to this corporation 2,000,000 acres of land; it gave it $1,825,000 in cash, and guarantees amounting to $7,860,000. The province of Quebec gave in cash $3,526,000. The province of Manitoba gave in cash $641,000, and guarantees amounting to $24,408,000. The province of Saskatchewan gave $8,258,000 in guarantees. The province of Alberta gave $8,719,000 in guarantees. The province of British Columbia gave $33,175,000 in guarantees. The Dominion Government gave 4,000,000 acres of land; $28,354,000 in cash, and guarantees amounting to $104,746,000. That was up to the year 1914. In 1914, the present Government gave to the system $45,000,000, and in 1916, $15,000,000. The cash payments to Mackenzie and Mann, therefore, amount to $94,346,000. Placing the land grants the company received from the Ontario and Dominion Governments at the very moderate price of $3 per acre, we have the sum of $18,000,000. In addition to that there is the sum of $70,000,000 of cash subsidies paid to this concern by the various municipalities throughout the country. That makes a total, in cash and land, of $182,346,000, and the guarantees total $187,166,000, making a total altogether in cash, land and guarantees, of $369,512,000. That is a nice sum for this corporation to receive in respect of aids and subventions which they have obtained from the taxpayers of Canada. No other corporation in Canada has ever been treated so generously as has the Canadian Northern.

It was a great relief to Parliament, as it was a relief to the people of Canada, when in 1914, we received from the Minister of Finance, the Solicitor General and other members of the Government the assurance that that was positively the last time that Mackenzie and Mann would receive money from the federal treasury. Parliament was assured that if the sum of $45,000,000 was paid over to them on that occasion on no account would they get further aid. In order to convince Parliament and the country that they meant what they said the Government inserted in the Act authorizing this advance a clause which provided that in the event of default in payment of the interest upon their loans and advances the Government would step in and without any more formality take control of the assets of the corporation. Considerable opposition developed among the ranks of the Government to the proposal of 1914. This opposition was voiced more particularly by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) and the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett). I have no doubt it was the opposition which prevailed within the ranks of the Government that compelled them to introduce into the legislation the clause to which I have referred. There was a further guarantee made by the Minister of Finance, in respect of the control of the common stock. It was pointed out that the Canadian Northern Railway company might dispose of the common stock, or place it in the hands of pledgees, and thus render it impossible for the Government to get control if they desired to put into operation the clause in the Act of 1914 providing for the acquisition of the property of the company. The Minister of Finance told Parliament that the door was locked, that the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company would remain in the treasury of the company, that it would not get into the hands of pledgees, and that therefore there could be no question arising as to the ability of the Government to acquire that stock whenever it might be necessary. The ground upon which this legislation is asked for, and upon which arbitration is provided for at the present time, is because since 1914 that stock has got into the hands of pledgees. If the Minister of Finance had kept faith and had kept his pledge to the people of this country and the members of this House, it would not be necessary to ask for this legislation.

The Prime Minister in the course of his observations last evening combatted the opposition on the part of the Liberals in this House to arbitration, on the ground that the commissioners, Messrs. Drayton and Acworth, suggested that arbitration proceedings should be adopted for the purpose of estimating the amount to which Mackenzie and Mann were entitled. It must not be forgotten, however, that the arbitrators did not admit that the Canadian Northern Railway Company or Mackenzie and Mann were entitled to one dollar in cash, but they reported that inasmuch as there was $60,000,000 of stock outstanding, it might be proper to apportion a part of that stock to Mackenzie and Mann, and the portion to be so allotted to them was to be estimated by arbitration. If this stock ever came to be worth anything, they would be able to get the advantage of the increased value. That is a very different proposal from the one before Parliament at the present time.

I will now refer briefly to the amendment proposed by the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), which is the subject of discussion in this debate. This amendment provides that in the event of the award being made, and there being no appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, the award shall not be paid to the holders of the stock until the whole matter has been submitted to Parliament. The Prime Minister endeavoured to lessen the effect of the argument of my hon. friend from St. John, as regards that amendment, by quoting the position of the Liberal party in the House of Commons in 1914, when the legislation to which I have just referred was under consideration. There is one reason why the amendment of the hon. gentleman from St. John should be accepted, and the final award of the arbitrators made subject to the approval of Parliament, and that is the experience we have had as regards the proceedings taken to fix the amount paid to the Quebec and Saguenay Railway company. Mr. Justice Cassels was selected by the Government under the statute to estimate the amount due the Quebec and Saguenay Railway company in respect of the property acquired by the Government under the legislation of last year. Counsel was appointed to represent the Government and the people, and was appointed for the purpose of reducing as much as possible the amount of money to be paid to the Quebec and Saguenay Railway company under the terms of the Act. I have here before me the decision of Mr. Justice Cassels, in which the following significant paragraph appears:

> Crown counsel in their statement were of opinion that the two items of $500,000 and $794,869.58 should be taken as the cost up to that date, namely, July 1, 1898. I do not agree with that contention. I fail to see how it can be assumed without further proof that the proceeds of those interim bonds, namely $500,000, went into the construction of the railway.

Mr. Justice Cassels was investigating the amount of money that was put into the railway by the Quebec and Saguenay Railway Company, and it was determined by legislation that only such amount as was actually put into the construction of the railway should be paid by this Government when the road was taken over. Here was counsel for the Government admitting that two large items, amounting to $1,294,869.58, should be charged up against the Government of this country as part of the consideration to be paid to the railway. Mr. Justice Cassels was obliged to dissent from his argument, and strike out the sum of $1,294,869 which the lawyer for the Government agreed should be paid by the Government to the company. If instead of this matter being determined by Mr. Justice Cassels it was determined by two arbitrators under a provision that if they both agreed there should be no appeal, the taxpayers of this country would have lost $1,294,869 in respect of this transaction alone. The Government has refused to accept the arbitrament of Mr. Justice Cassels in this matter, preferring to have it adjusted by two arbitrators, one to be appointed by Mackenzie and Mann, and the other to be appointed by the Government. If those two arbitrators should agree, there is to be no appeal to any higher court and no appeal to Parliament. No doubt the Government will be represented by counsel, but what guarantee have we that it may not be the same counsel as appeared before Mr. Justice Cassels in the investigation into the cost of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway Company, and who considered it proper that the railway company should be awarded $1,294,869 to which Mr. Justice Cassels said they were not entitled? What guarantee have we under the present Bill that a very much larger sum will not be improperly paid by the taxpayers in respect of Mackenzie and Mann's alleged equity in the Canadian Northern railway? This is an argument which cannot be lightly turned aside. My hon. friend from St. John has provided a means whereby the people of the country will be absolutely protected against any collusion between Government counsel, the arbitrators and the interests to be benefited by this legislation. If the amendment is adopted, the public will be protected along the lines I have suggested; if the amendment is rejected, then there is no protection to the public, and whatever sum the arbitrators and the Government counsel decide to pay shall be paid out of the treasury of the country, and there will be no recourse and no redress for the people of Canada. There is no reason why this amendment should not be adopted, unless that reason is in line with a predetermined effort on the part of the Government and the Mackenzie-Mann interests, that they shall be paid a sum of money whether they are legally entitled to it or not. There has been some talk of party funds which have been contributed by railway corporations in the past, and taking the language of the hon. member for Calgary as it stands in Hansard, I assume he had reference to the contributions of the Canadian Northern Railway company. It has been a matter of corridor gossip around this House for the last two or three months, that certain party funds had been provided by this Government for the purpose of carrying on the coming election. I am not going to say that party funds are always illegitimate and always improper, but it has been said that certain party funds were collected by and under the control of the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). That hon. gentleman has gone out of the Cabinet, and it is stated that he has taken the money with him and that it is not now available for the purposes of his party.

The SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has exceeded his time.

Mr. KYTE: I did not get the notice of one minute before calling time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KYTE: It may be that the Canadian Northern Railway company will contribute to the election fund of the Conservative party out of the money proposed to be awarded to them under this legislation.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU (Three Rivers) (translation): Mr. Speaker, when we consider the performance we are now witnessing, we may well ask ourselves what has struck the Government. Last night at a late hour, after a hard day's work, the hon.

Minister of Finance has seen fit to ask for the third reading of the Bill now before us. As soon as the proposal was laid before the House the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) rose up in order to move an amendment and to add a few remarks in support of his amendment. After the member for St. John had taken his seat, we saw the Prime Minister rise, under the pretense of addressing the House and of discussing the amendment just proposed, and give us a speech—I should rather say, Mr. Speaker, to be more exact—a political harangue which to-day fills some fourteen pages of Hansard.

The Premier had just taken his seat, when the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) believing we had had enough labour done during the day, moved to adjourn the debate and, immediately, the hon. Minister of Finance moved that the gag be imposed upon us to-day. I was asking myself the reason for that proposal made by the Minister of Finance. When the matter came before the House today we were told: If you will assure us that the vote will be taken to-night, we will consent not to put before the House the motion for closure of which we have given notice. The Prime Minister's answer, Mr. Speaker, has set me athinking. I was asking myself why he did exact such a promise from us, and after having pondered over it quite a while, I think I have found a solution. The solution is a very simple one. Our position towards the adoption of this proposal was evident; we believe it to be an iniquitous measure and we have qualified it as such, we believed it contrary to public interest. He was setting a snare for us; he wanted us to say: Very well, we will consent to have the vote taken at eleven o'clock—and, the next day, you would have heard the Tory press, themselves and their friends, crying: See what a lot of humbugs they are, they oppose the Canadian Northern Bill, they have nothing to say, they have no suggestion to offer us, since they consent to the vote being taken at such an hour; therefore, they are only playing to the gallery. We refused our consent and we have had to suffer the penalty. I am one of those who believe in the law of compensation. This very evening, I have seen a striking example of it, when I heard the most appropriate remarks set forth, the very strong attitude taken by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) in connection with the adoption of the Bill. The Minister of Finance would have liked to answer him more at length; he had already, if I may use the expression, begun to stake out the argument he intended to make—for he has in no way replied to the member for Calgary—but, Mr. Speaker, you have recalled him to the fact that the gag rule, harsh for the Opposition, must also be merciless for the Minister of Finance, and the latter had to resume his seat, a victim of his own measure. It was his deserved punishment, for having prevented us from throwing more light upon the subject.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened tonight and paid much attention to the remarks made by the Prime Minister, not in defence of the Bill, for I do not believe any reasonable defence can be made in that line, but to the stump speech delivered by the Premier, and his very argument has struck me as the best reason that could be given to the House why this Bill should be voted down. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, when we have advanced $45,000,000 to the Canadian Northern in 1914, we made with that company an agreement, which is set forth in the statute of 1914, and in consequence of that agreement, the Parliament had the right, without any procedure, to authorize the Governor in Council to take over the stock, the value of which it is now intended to submit to an arbitration board. In the speeches delivered in 1914, this stock which we now wish to submit to an arbitration commission, was declared to be absolutely worthless, and it was then stated, to support the non-value of that stock that not one cent had ever been paid for this stock, and that the proceeds of the stock had never served nor contributed to the construction of the railroad. Now, what are the reasons advanced in order to justify this transaction? It is said it would be unfair to deprive a man of his property or of his rights, without giving him an opportunity to apply to a tribunal, if he feels wronged, and last night, the Premier, in prevision, I suppose, of the arbitration commission which shall be appointed, spoke as follows, on page 5394 of unrevised Hansard:

> Therefore, I say, under the Act of 1914, if the owners of the equity of redemption were able to show—as I think they have shown—that there is some reasonable claim for some value of the property over and above the encumbrances, we ought not to deny them the right to be heard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister tells us: "As I think they have shown." These words mean something or they mean nothing; if they do mean anything, it must surely be that they have somewhere some information that they have not seen fit to communicate to this House; certain details which they keep under the seal of secrecy. Who then has shown the Prime Minister the value of these shares, for I know, at least I suppose, that a prime Minister of Canada would not have made such an assertion, without having valid reasons and sufficient data to support that assertion. Was it wise on the part of the Prime Minister, under the present circumstances, when we are to submit to an arbitration commission the task of determining what is the value of this stock, when we, on this side of the House, have the words uttered by the Prime Minister in the first place, then by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) and, lastly, by the Minister of Finance, to the effect that not a single cent had ever been paid for this stock, when we have the report of the Drayton-Acworth commission, experts appointed by the Government itself, telling us that this stock is absolutely worthless, was it not unwise, I say, on the part of the Prime Minister, to declare that the Canadian Northern properties represented some value, in spite of all the liabilities encumbering them?

Last evening I heard the Minister of Finance launching out vigorously against the lawyers; he stated that in any contract lawyers could find more difficulties in one minute than an ordinary man could find in a whole day. That reminds me that the hon. Minister of Finance, a few years ago, based a whole theory, when he pointed out before this House that he had won a certain medal in some college for studying the legal profession. But, notwithstanding all this, the Minister of Finance comes to this subtle conclusion that a judge or a lawyer would not dare maintain or consider that, when we acquire the company's assets, we do not become responsible for its liabilities. Technically speaking, no. But let us put aside this aspect of the question. When we become owners of the company's stock we acquire everything which constitutes that company, such as charter, rails, supplies or subsidies, in short everything which the railroad may have received. Were it not so, I should maintain that this transaction is a manifest robbery and made under false representations; that it is simply acquiring a capital stock which represents absolutely nothing. On the other hand, if we buy this railroad with all there is in it, we must likewise assume the liabilities encumbering it, as the assets are mortgaged for these liabilities. Besides, Mr. Speaker, can it be otherwise, since we are purchasing, so to say, the company's physical assets. What would happen should this company pass into the hands of a receiver and if it were sold? What would happen, if the Government did not acquire it? Another party or corporation would take it over, and that other party or corporation bought it at a sum lower than the total amount of the company's liabilities, then the creditors, coming in, in the last place, would lose their money. On the other hand should the Government take it over for a sum covering the total liabilities, for which we are immediately giving our guarantee, then the company's various creditors shall be repaid, which means that we are practically assuming all the debts which encumber the company and that, under the Bill we are now discussing. That means that, when we acquire the capital stock of the Canadian Northern we are also acquiring its liabilities, since we obtain full control. Why were we not given a detailed statement, a complete inventory of all that makes up both the assets and the liabilities of the company? Why do they want to compel the country into purchasing a property without any knowledge of what it is? The Prime Minister has also said something else in his harangue of last night. He has said that it was an elementary principle of justice that no one could take another man's property, except according to the prescriptions of the law. Further on in his speech he adds:

> It is an elementary principle of common justice embodied in all the provisions of the British Constitution that no man shall have his property taken from him, his rights taken away, or his liberty interfered with, unless he shall have had the opportunity of being heard before a competent tribunal in respect of his claim.

Then I ask, what becomes of the right to pass a contract? Here is a company coming before Parliament, asking it an advance of money and passing with this Parliament a contract in which it is stated: "If I do not meet any obligations, you will assume the control of the company." And this Act, which contains the very terms of the contract, specifies in what manner such control shall be assumed. It shall be declared that the stock to the amount of $60,000,000 or 600,000 shares of the company may, with the sanction of Parliament be taken in trust by the Governor in Council, by the Minister of Finance for the benefit of the Canadian people. This Act means something or it means nothing. If it means something all that the Government had to do was to come before Parliament and tell us: We now ask you to declare that the provisions of the Act be enforced and we ask you to take over this stock without paying one cent. Is that taking that property unjustly? I say, no. A man has the right to sign a contract and he has the right, in the contract, to pledge himself to anything that is not immoral or contrary to public order. The Canadian Northern, through its president and its secretary, had agreed that its stock be transferred, in trust, to the Minister of Finance for the benefit of the Canadian people. I therefore say that the Prime Minister's argument is worth absolutely nothing. It is only a subterfuge he is trying to set up before the people in order to afford this arbitration commission an opportunity to put some kind of a value upon the company's assets, thereby helping the interests of the gentlemen who are here represented, as everybody knows, by the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister must have forgotten himself, or he must have forgotten what he had just said, when he states that no man shall have his liberty interfered with unless he shall have the right to go before a tribunal to defend his claim. Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has a very short memory. When the conscription Bill was being discussed here we rose up in this House; we protested as strongly as we could, because it was intended to interfere with the subject's liberty; we have said: You have no right to impose such an Act upon the Canadian people, unless you go before the tribunal that must decide such matters, and that tribunal is the Canadian people themselves. What answer did we get? They laughed at us; they invoked urgency, they invoked the condition in which was, not only our country, but the whole world, and they said: "Gentlemen, a single hour's delay may bring on a catastrophe." To the subject they said: We deprive you of your liberty in this case, because it suits us; but cast a cloud of smoke over the other transactions we have made and which may not be transactions to suit the people's taste. However, for that measure which caused some members to declare in this House that the people were no longer in a state to govern themselves, but that they should be led and driven, the gag was not resorted to; but when the interests of Mackenzie and Mann come before the House, when the Canadian Northern's interests are at stake, the safety of the country is not the question—the matter is far more important—it is the safety of the interests which are represented by the Minister of Finance; it is the safety of the millionaires who hold the Canadian Northern's stock as a security and who to-day want to be repaid at par. Now, what are the objections which have generally been raised against this Bill introduced by the Government, and how did the latter meet them? Some Montreal financiers have dared to express their opinion, a few days ago, in a manifest published by a newspaper, and immediately, the cry went up: "Oh! those people represent the Canadian Pacific's interests." The next day, the Government's organ in the city of Ottawa, stated: "What do they fear? The shareholders and the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway company fear that a competition, under Parliament control, will not allow them to charge the rates they can demand to-day." The argument falls to the ground and is ridiculous. You know, as well as I do, that the railroad freight rates are determined by the Board of Railway Commissioners. You know, just like me, that the Government railways, which were not under this board, as far as the freight rates were concerned, will be under such a control in the future and, consequently this is only a subterfuge. I have only another word to say and I take my seat. The Prime Minister has told us, last night again, that if we interfered with the Canadian Northern's obligations, such as they were, there would ensue a general confusion. Now, we are going to acquire the Canadian Northern by taking over the stock; we are going to give to that stock a value which it has not, and we will maintain, as board of management the same staff which is now administering it; a staff whose incapacity is a matter of public notoriety, for it came year after year to ask the Government's assistance, because it could not run the railroad so as to pay the interest upon the debentures. It seems as if they were telling us: We will acquire the stock in order to pay the debts, and at the same time, we are going to maintain the same administration which has been a disastrous one; we will allow the same staff keep on doing the same thing; we are going to have a second class road and entrust our millions to men who have themselves come before Parliament and admitted their own incapacity to run the concern with the only revenues they could get out of it. I therefore say that this Bill should be thrown out under such circumstances, because we have not had the time to discuss it fully, and because we have not been given the data which we asked for. In concluding I may be allowed to state that, in the discussion, previous to the imposition of the gag rule, there are fifty pages of Hansard containing the opinion of the Opposition members, while that of the Government covers sixty-nine and a half pages.

Mr. ETHIER (Two Mountains) (translation): I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to bring any new arguments in support of the objections which the Opposition has already raised against the Bill now before this House. I have already submitted to this hon. House the reasons for which I believe it my duty to object to the adoption of this Bill. The newspapers took hold of my protests. Throughout the country, the press has generally reported, accurately enough and as much as possible—that portion, at least, of the press which is not of the reptile kind—the arguments in favour of the passing of this Bill as well as those who offer opposition to it.

While glancing over this evening's newspapers, I noticed that a certain Montreal daily, La Patrie—I have much respect for the journalists, all of them, without regard to party, are, I believe, my best friends—has qualified as unprecedented the language which I used in order to denounce the transaction proposed by the Government. Is there any violence, Mr. Speaker, in denouncing the Government who, as I have stated the other evening, want to take away from us, particle by particle and shred by shred, every liberty which the British Constitution has guaranteed us? Is there any violence in denouncing this most iniquitous law of conscription? Is there any violence in denouncing this other more iniquitous law, perhaps, which they call the Military Voters Act? Is that resorting to violence when I most strongly denounce this feminine franchise Act which this House will soon be called upon to consider? Is that violence, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to protest against the delivery of the country over to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann?

In that report of La Patrie, it is moreover stated that I took up the greatest portion of the twenty minutes which had been allowed me, to the reading of extracts from the Drayton-Acworth commission's report.

Evidently, the correspondent of La Patrie was not in the press gallery when I made the speech to which he refers. Instead of sending over to his paper erroneous reports, why does he not publish the resolution adopted by a distinguished group of Montreal citizens and signed by financiers of the highest standing in the province of Quebec? Instead of manufacturing broadcloth a fanciful report, why does he not give the names of all those who are, directly or indirectly interested in the Canadian Northern Railway company; why does he not publish in extenso the remarkable speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), without omitting the so-called defence of the hon. Minister of Finance who, in spite of all his efforts, has not been able to reply to the objections raised by his colleagues.

I have just returned from the county of Two Mountains, which I have the honour to represent in this House; I there met the most important citizens of my county and also the best known men of Terrebonne county, at St. Jerome, and of the county of Argenteuil, in Lachute. I am prepared to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of the efforts of the Nationalist party, in spite of the aid of certain people hailing from Quebec, in order to lend a helping hand to their Ottawa friends, in spite of the efforts of the Opposition leader in Quebec, the county of Two Mountains will give, by its vote, a majority to your honourable servant, because he has defended the peoples' interests; because he has strongly protested against and opposed this Canadian Northern deal; and the county of Terrebonne, where Mr. Prevost has been chosen as the future representative, will probably elect that gentleman by acclamation. As to the county of Argenteuil, I think I may tell you that its present representative, Sir George Perley, shall be crushed, notwithstanding all his millions, on account of this very law.

If we may judge from the insistence and the persistence shown in his defence, or at least, his would-be defence, by the Minister of Finance, against the charges set forth by my hon. friend from Calgary, the weakness of his cause is self-evident. Notwithstanding the arguments advanced by the Minister of Finance with reference to lawyers—although himself a lawyer—he should not forget that it would not hurt him should he pursue somewhat further his law studies and try to obtain a bacherlor's degree or again the title of King's Council, in spite of all the medals he may have won.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the main clause of the Bill. Here it is:

His Majesty may acquire the six hundred thousand shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company (par value sixty million dollars), not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths thereof, and for a price to be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided.

We are called upon to vote and to express our opinion as to that clause, and also upon the following amendment moved by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley):

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions that they have power to amend the same by inserting between the word "may" and "acquire" in line 1 of section one the words "subject to the approval by Parliament of the award hereafter provided for."

Section 4 provides for the appointment of one arbitrator by the Governor in Council, of another one appointed by a majority of the owners and pledgees of the company's stock, and finally, these two arbitrators to appoint a third one.

Why do they object to the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John, which states that the award of these arbitrators appointed by the interested parties, shall be subject to the approval of Parliament? Why, I ask you the reason, Mr. Speaker? Is it because they are afraid of Parliament? They should not, however, have any fear of it. Why these puerile apprehensions? Have you shown by your behaviour during the few months past, that you feared Parliament? Have you not always the Minister of Finance and the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) ready to take up your defence? Will you not have, in the statutes, that gag rule, which you unhesitatingly apply, twice in the same week in order to push through the adoption of a Bill which every honest man condemns? Cynicism is your own breeding, do not disown it. In the future, as by the past, will you not be able to trample underfoot the rights and liberties of the people? I repeat it to you, iniquitous, reptile, corrupted, Boche and Prussian Government—for you are all that—you should not be afraid of the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John.

But what you fear, for instance, is that this arbitration award might not be given and submitted to Parliament before the expiration, now close at hand. You are afraid that this arbitration award should not be made in time to be passed upon by this Parliament, because your moribund Parliament shall have expired. You should accept that amendment because it is sincere, for you must know, should the award be given before October 7, that you always have at your disposal the gag which you are so fully using to-night.

The Minister of Finance says: But there are only two ways of solving the question: either the Government must take it over, or the Canadian Pacific will buy it. But, is there any such proposal before this House? Did the present Government ever propose to Lord Shaughnessy, or to the Canadian Pacific authorities, to purchase the Canadian Northern? Most probably, the Canadian Pacific would have refused to do so. But this proposal of the Minister of Finance has never been laid before the House, and the proposal he suggests does not exist.

No, the Government take it over and, as the hon. Minister of Finance has just said a few minutes ago: "We intend to run the affairs of the company in the same way as they are being run at present."

Would it not be, perchance, the Government's intention after the general elections—should they be returned into power, what I neither expect nor believe—to hand over to Mackenzie and Mann this same railroad which we are now purchasing from these same parties?

Now, why did they not offer this railway to the Canadian Pacific? Because they well knew that the Canadian Pacific would not accept it. But, if the Canadian Pacific company manage their concern and declare dividends, as they do, why could not Mackenzie and Mann, with the subsidies and the millions they have been receiving from the country; with the subsidies, both in cash and in land, which they have received from all the provinces—except that of Quebec and the Maritime provinces—why could not those millionaires, Mann and Mackenzie manage this railroad on a business footing.

Why? It is because they have taken both the stock and the subsidies granted them, to invest them in the Toronto Street railway.

Some MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ETHIER (translation): Ah! here are a few who seem to know something about it, I should not be surprised if they were interested in the Toronto Street railway. And, it is also because Mackenzie and Mann have used these millions, so obtained, to invest them in Mexico, in the Argentine Republic and in Brazil, where they have hidden these stocks under assumed names, in order to save themselves bankruptcy, a bankruptcy they now invoke and which they want to saddle on Canada under the protection of the present Government.

Were an investigation made into the private pecuniary means of Mackenzie and Mann—of the Mann family alone, and of the Mackenzie family, privately, what would we discover? Here are people who, twenty years ago, were not worth one cent, who were lobbying in the House of Commons in 1896 and previously; who were small common contractors and to-day they are arch-millionaires. Where did they get their money, if it be not with the country's money they have stolen, which they have used for their personal ends, and who again today want to be paid and repaid from the public treasury?

I was speaking, a few moments ago, upon the amendment of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and I asked the Government whether they were afraid of having Parliament ratify the arbitrators' award. The Government cannot be afraid of that arbitration award, for if it should not suit them, they would only have to do as they did in order to whitewash Bob Rogers; they will only have to appoint new arbitrators to ratify the award; they will only have to contest that award and appoint other arbitrators to ratify as they please and to make a second award, just as the judges, McLeod and Tellier, have done to whitewash the black we call Bob Rogers; they would only have to do as they did in the case of the O'Connor investigation that is to say, appoint another judge of their caste, of their kind, of their opinion, to disprove the opinion of their own friends. It is an easy matter. Weathercocks are well known on the other side of the House, weathercocks exist since 1911. Before that, they were unknown. They change and turn round like the wind, and every one opposite is satisfied.

Mr. Speaker, I was amused to listen to the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) denouncing so vehemently the transaction now before us. He is an excellent lawyer, he argues his case to perfection; but he can draw arguments contrary to the principle he lays down.

Hearing him, as we have done the other day, upon the Bill's second reading, we would have been led to believe that the conclusion of his premises would be a direct condemnation of the Act as submitted, just as he did in 1914. But no, Mr. Bennett is compliant, the hon. member for Calgary has a compliant temper; a versatility of judgment which the House has had the opportunity to appreciate. Believing he was against Mackenzie and Mann, after he had accused them of robbery, of forgery, after he had charged them with dilapidating the public treasury, Mr. Bennett says: That is all true, but, anyway, they are my own creatures, they are creatures of the hon Solicitor General, they are creatures of the Government which I must support, they are creatures of the Government that appointed me head of the National Service, I have to earn my money, and I vote for Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. GEORGE E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have noticed during this debate that the Government are putting forth this measure as an acceptation on their part of the principle of government ownership and are claiming for the proposal all the virtues which should belong to government ownership. I myself am in favour of government ownership as a general principle. But in the fourth year of an unfinished war; when we have yet no idea what our financial undertakings may have to be; when we have a national debt which has run well over one billion dollars; when we have been obliged to pay nearly eight per cent for the last loan on the New York market; and when we have in prospect in taking over the Canadian Northern railway, an expenditure for betterments of over $80,000,000, I would most strongly advise this Government to have nothing to do with any proposal of government ownership at this time. The pretended virtue, however, arises out of what is really a dire necessity. To me it looks like a pretty bad case of a mortgagee having to take over a security which he would not be disposed to take under any other circumstances. We have put a lot of money into the Canadian Northern railway, and as a system it is wrapped up with the national future of this country. But at this time to undertake its ownership and to raise money for carrying on its improvements seems to be very doubtful policy. The ownership of the Canadian Northern railway is so far from bringing any advantage to this country at this time that, instead of taking it on even terms we should be receiving a very large subsidy from Mackenzie and Mann for at this time having to assume the responsibilities of the system.

I shall not discuss in connection with this proposal the question of receivership or expropriation. The Act of 1914, it appears to me, gives an adequate remedy in the circumstances. The circumstances are not circumstances of purchase; they are circumstances of foreclosure. If the Government, apart altogether from the liabilities under which they stand and as carrying out any scheme of national undertaking with this railway, were to come to Parliament, they would come here as a matter of purchasing title to the Canadian Northern railway and not of acting under terms of foreclosure. The terms of foreclosure are contained in section 24 of the Act of 1914, which has been read so often that I shall not repeat it; but the authority of the Act is not to be invoked except on conditions imposed by Parliament. Bearing in mind that the conditions are conditions of foreclosure, this Bill proposes that the conditions to be imposed by Parliament are the payment of money by the mortgagee to the mortgagor. I never heard of such a term or condition being imposed in foreclosure proceedings. The terms of foreclosure proceedings are a period given to the mortgagor to redeem, or a sale. I can quite believe that when this arrangement was made between the Government and the Canadian Northern railway in 1914, those very questions were considered. There was no purpose in giving to a concern of the magnitude of the Canadian Northern railway a provision of a few months in which they might reorganize their finances before being foreclosed. At any rate, if to-day it were thought desirable, that would be one of the terms to which this legislation might apply. Another term might be that there should be sale, but the policy of this Parliament is against sale to the only corporation that could buy the road. The legistion of 1914 contemplates circumstances which could arise under foreclosure, and we have to decide whether we should act under that legislation at this time. The Finance Minister has pointed out to us, and I accept his argument, that it is desirable that Parliament, instead of using the Act of 1914, should acquire title through the stock certificates. To my mind the stock certificates are valueless to the stockholders, because with the liability which there is against the Canadian Northern railway they have no value to any person apart from the legislation which this Parliament is now putting through. The holders of those stock certificates, apart from the fact that this Parliament is likely to enact this legislation, cannot get one cent on the dollar for these certificates on the market.

I think that is the test of their value. But I accept the reason which the Finance Minister gives, that it is desirable that we acquire the capital stock of the company rather than act under foreclosure, which gives us the physical properties of the company, apart from the capital stock. In going into that matter, or making any payment, I would act as a mortgagee would act who had to take over a property he did not want to take and had to expend money on improvements, and I would consider what he could afford to give the mortgagor for title rather than to take foreclosure proceedings. On that basis alone would I discuss it. I would certainly not consider any sum which might be paid by the mortgagee to the mortgagor, or by this Government to the holders of the stock, as a matter of right. I would consider the question as to whether it was desirable in this case to acquire the capital stock in the light of the amount of money which we have to pay for it, and in that light alone. Otherwise I would stand by the foreclosure proceedings provided in the Act of 1914. I am opposed to this idea, in connection with foreclosure proceedings, of submitting to the court of arbitration, as a matter of legal right, the authority to give any judgment from one dollar to sixty million, but I would like to have the report of the commission as to what sum this Parliament could afford to pay the holders of these stock certificates to get the title in that way rather than foreclosure. Then let them report here; let Parliament consider whether it wants to take the title by foreclosure, or through the capital stock. It seems to me in this whole discussion we are confusing two questions, the question of public ownership on one hand—which ownership we would get by purchase and through the capital stock—and the question of foreclosure proceedings, that is, taking over a property which, at this time, we do not want, and which we would have on our hands. Holding that view, I am going to support the amendment of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley).

Mr. CARDIN (Richelieu) (translation): The Government, Mr. Speaker, have evidently acted upon a wrong inspiration, when they saw fit to make use of the arbitrary power, given them by the rule of closure, in order to compel the passing into law of the Bill we are discussing to-night. When that closure regulation was adopted, we were given to understand that it would be only enforced in cases of extreme gravity; that, most probably it would have to remain a dead letter. None of us ever dreamed, in those days, that it could be utilized with the object of forcing Parliament to enact a law authorizing such a dark transaction as the one now submitted to our consideration. What is being done to-day fully justifies the most energetic opposition which the Liberal minority then made to this autocratic regulation. Mr. Speaker, just as, in the wake of a ship, one may sometimes see the voracious shark awaiting, as its prey the corpses cast into the sea for its next pasture; thus, after a battle's slaughtering, the vulture rends the bloody flesh of the dead bodies strewn along the upset furrows; so, in our own country, when the people are already bent under the burden of utmost sacrifice, voracious ravens are fattening at the people's expense, and some of them are even coining money upon the very hardships and upon the blood of the country's sons. It seems to me that the two most dangerous ones are those which seemingly constitute the occult strength which is the main-spring of the activities of the present Government.

In 1914, Mr. Speaker, you may still remember it, in the lobbies of the House of Commons, any one could hear the dull sound of money being accumulated in bags or in the private purses of twin individual money getters, Mackenzie and Mann; such a noise made us feel quite uneasy, and we were expecting an appeal in favour of such a "poorness," in favour of those same gentlemen who had made a fortune and become wealthy by the single management of the Canadian Northern railway. They were calling for help, telling the Government that they needed, so they said, a sum of $45,000,000 in order to meet the urgent demands and expenses they had to pay towards the maintenance and the operating of that railroad. At that time, they pretended that this sum of $45,000,000, which they were begging from the Government, as a guarantee, would be quite sufficient to permit them to continue the operating of the railroad. We were also told: You will have sufficient guarantee against any possible danger. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that loan or advance of funds, was made after an agreement had been entered into through which a certain portion of the company's capital stock was transferred to the Government, and we were repeatedly given to understand—it is in the Act itself—that in the case where the company should default in paying the principal and interests, the so-called equity of redemption which it had reserved, would become foreclosed, and that the Parliament could, through ordinary procedure, declare that the railroad had become a State property.

The Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, harboured then most serious suspicions; they did greatly hesitate before accepting the word of those who were attempting to bleed the public treasury. The fears entertained in those days by the Liberal party were more than justified, since, in the year 1917, which might be rightly called the "plague year", we see these bad millionaire beggars coming again before Parliament; we see before us the same people who should never have returned before Parliament. To-day, they want to sell to the Government what is actually the property of this country, by right; and the Government, through an excess of generosity towards these gentlemen, I might almost say, through an impulse of gratitude, wants to have a commission appointed in order to estimate what may be the value to Mackenzie and Mann of a property, which, by right, belongs to the country.

In 1914, an equity of redemption was provided for. Since then, that right has ceased to exist. Those who might have used it, did lose their privilege. I say that the Government deserve the most severe censure for the demand they are making, through this legislation in order to obtain authority for taking over the stock of the Canadian Northern company.

Mr. Speaker, the situation in which our country now finds itself is, everybody knows, a desperate one. The gaunt spectre of famine is already looming on the horizon; a heart-rending anxiety oppresses every honest and intelligent citizen; and now the Government want us to throw millions into the whirlpool of that bankruptcy, called the Canadian Northern railway. While the people are toiling, suffering and dying, they mean to saddle upon them a fabulous debt for the benefit of some friendly speculators. It is only to permit those unscrupulous financiers to plunder the public treasury, that they mean to force Parliament into enacting such a law. A despotic Government, authorizing a transaction of such a nature, does no longer represent the people of this country; and their action can only justify me in believing that they rather represent that disreputable class of war profiteers and of Canadian bloodmongers.

What! such a discredited Government as this one, a Government that fears elections, that is afraid to appeal to the country, would, before going out of power, drain to such an extent the public treasury! They even dare to limit the discussion of such a Bill; and, Mr. Speaker, they arm you with a mallet to count the minutes taken up in the discussion of that Act which must saddle upon the people an additional indebtedness of $600,000,000.

What a sad sight, when the whole world is shivering under the blows of a world war! What an insolence on the part of a Government having no mandate from the people!

The present Government, it should not be forgotten, only exists on account of a compromise. Its very existence is not absolutely regular. When that compromise was agreed to, it was understood, if not absolutely, at least indirectly, that during the existence so extended of this Parliament, no contentious measures should be submitted to it for final adoption.

Now, the Bill we are now discussing is not only of a contentious nature; such an Act would spell disaster to the country, and the Government have, in no way, justified their action. What do they say to justify the measure now submitted to Parliament? They say that the credit of Canada would be compromised, should we allow this railroad to pass into the hands of a liquidator or of a receiver. I submit that such an argument is groundless. Admitting there might be some truth in such a pretension, Canada's credit could only be affected indirectly, were the Canadian Northern company to be put into liquidation or in receivership. Canada's credit would only be affected indirectly. But should the country itself assume the burden, in pursuance of the Act which the Government intend imposing upon us, should the country accept all the responsibilities, all the liabilities with which the railroad is encumbered, its credit will directly suffer a diminution and will be considerably affected.

We are moreover told that this Bill leads us towards nationalization. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the time is ill chosen to talk of state-ownership. When our country is suffering so much on account of the war, when the financial crisis places us in our present difficult situation, I say that the country has no money to risk in such an undertaking. And why expend such a considerable sum as shall probably be fixed by the arbitration commission, in order to acquire this railroad and nationalize it, when, under the Act of 1914, the Government might take it over and nationalize it, without the country spending one cent? And, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would be applying a very wrong principle in order to nationalize railways, to lay out heavy sums of money for the purchase of an insolvent company. If the present Government is ready to pay a fabulous amount to acquire the capital stock of an insolvent company, what a formidable sum will it not be compelled to pay when it will have decided to nationalize a railway managed by a solvent company? Far from leading us towards nationalization, I say that the present Bill rather removes us further from it, because it sets down a principle which will render impossible—because too onerous—the nationalization of the companies in full prosperity.

It is moreover stated that it is not fair to take over this property without paying and to take away their rights from those who hold shares of this company's capital stock. But, Mr. Speaker, what is the present value, what is the actual value of the stock which Mackenzie and Mann may have in the Canadian Northern Railway Company? That company is practically in bankruptcy. Its shares are absolutely worthless. The liabilities exceed the assets, and if we undertake to pay the debts, it seems to me that we should not bind ourselves to pay a "bonus" to those who have contracted such an indebtedness. Since when is an insolvent company a rich one? We are told: "Have no fear, the arbitration commission to be appointed, shall protect the people's interests."

The mere fact of appointing a commission to determine the value of the company's capital stock is tantamount to admitting that it has some actual value. The mere fact of appointing or of consulting a commission to define the value of the stock we intend to buy, constitutes a formal admission that we recognize some kind of a value in this capital stock, which de facto and by right, should already be to-day the country's property. Mr. Speaker, there is no need either to appoint a commission to determine the value of an insolvent company's capital stock. I say it is an insult to the most elementary common sense to come and pretend that we should pay anything for definitely acquiring the balance of this insolvent company's capital stock. I was quite right in stating when I opened my remarks, that the transaction proposed to us by this Act is rather a hazy one.

Did any one speak of a commission in 1914? Did the hon. Solicitor General, who was the sponsor of the Act of 1914, mention a commission to estimate the shares which were to be taken over in the case of the company being in default? The hon. Minister of Finance and certain other hon. gentlemen who then supported that proposal, wreathed a garland of flowers for the hon. Solicitor General because he had prepared that Act which thus entitled the Government to acquire the Canadian Northern without spending a single cent. And to-day, Mr. Speaker, they are coming with new sophistry, with new exaggerations and new imaginative schemes, and trying to make the people of this country believe that it is necessary to appoint a commission to value this stock. Either we were imposed upon in 1914 or we are being imposed upon to-day. When we were told in 1914, that we could acquire this railroad without spending a cent, without the necessity of going before the courts, we were therefore deceived. We are told that it is Sir William Meredith, Chief Justice of the province of Ontario, who will be appointed as the Government arbitrator, to value this capital stock. May I be allowed to state, Mr. Speaker, that I strongly doubt whether this distinguished magistrate will accept such a position, because it really seems to me he would bring discredit upon himself by accepting such a position as that offered him, a position that will compel him to declare, if he wants to follow the Government's instructions, that ruin is wealth, bankruptcy a progress, and failure a success.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure of one thing, that is if, to pay him his salary for the commissions he has been called upon to preside, he had been offered stock of the Canadian Northern company's, he would certainly have refused it.

We might ask ourselves, Mr. Speaker, what are we to do? Since we do not accept the Government's project, what can we do? Simply apply the Act of 1914, take over the railroad which is already, by right, the country's property. And if Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann were bold enough to pretend that the capital stock of their company still have a par value, we could sell them back to them. They are perfectly able to buy this railroad with the pennies and the millions they have made in ruining it.

Mr. Speaker, should the Government acquire this road, under the Act of 1914, even if they took it over under the Act proposed to-day, I say that they should rid the company of the worthless administration that has led it into bankruptcy.

[Mr. Cardin.]

The right hon. Prime Minister stated yesterday in his stump speech, that this railway's organization should not be destroyed; that the way of letting it expand, the way of developing it to the country's benefit, was to preserve its present administration. I say that the present administration that has led this railroad into ruin, should be discharged, if the Government see fit to take it over.

On behalf of the electors whom I represent, and I believe I might also say in the name of the province of Quebec, I protest against this Bill, and I demand that the solution of such an important question as this one be left to the care of a Government holding a direct mandate from the people. I deny to the present Government the right to so heavily burden the people of our country. And, by-the-way, I believe that this Government have not, upon their own admission, the required authority to deal with a question of so grave an importance; for, since several months already, Mr. Speaker, they are in quest of new blood, they beg a coalition which those they want to come in refuse to join in and which would be worthless with others who are offering themselves.

I think the amendment of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) should be accepted. This extreme means would permit us to safeguard the people's rights, to a certain extent.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the people, in their just wrath, will shatter those who are lauding their valour and their sons' heroism only to better impose upon them.

Will you allow me to tell you, Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat, that every knock of your mallet drives a nail into the Government's coffin; that the hollow sound of the table under its repeated strokes echoes harshly, in our ears, but does not reach our hearts. The people cannot mourn over that coffin. When it will have itself, through its ballots, sealed that misshapen box, it will be with enthusiasm that it will sing the joyous hymn of relief which the purified echoes of our country will repeat ad infinitum.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): In so far as this measure before the House means the taking possession of the Canadian Northern railway by the people of Canada I have no objection to it, but there are certain features of it to which I do object, and I think in voicing the view I shall voice here to-night I represent the opinion largely of the people of this country

When this Government gave assistance to the Canadian Northern railway in 1914 I am satisfied that the public felt that if the Canadian Northern railway did not in the future meet its obligations to the Government that railroad would automatically pass into the possession of the people of Canada without any more money being handed over to the parties behind the railway company. Now the prospect before us is this: That under arbitration the men behind the railroad may get from the Parliament of Canada more money of the people of this country, and the people of this country do not think that these interests should receive any more assistance out of the public treasury. Consequently, I feel that the public are opposed to that feature of the measure.

I am in favour of government ownership, and I come from a part of the country where the idea of government ownership is held by most of the people. Under this measure we are acquiring not only a very extensive railroad system throughout Canada, but also a telegraph system, an express system and other properties of value. But practically all this system—express, telegraph and railroad—has been created out of the money of the people of Canada, and when the gentlemen who started the Canadian Northern railway with high ambitions, thinking they were going to have a transcontinental system, failed in their efforts there is no reason why we should adopt any measure to provide them with more assistance from the people. They took their chance and failed, and consequently this property of theirs should come into our possession on account of the assistance we have given so extensively during recent years. I might compare their situation to the situation of many men in Western Canada who invested their money in subdivisions of real estate. They had ahead of them the prospect of making a fortune, but they failed to realize their ambitions. Nobody came to their assistance. In many cases the properties have been sold for taxes, or have passed back to their original owners. And so it is with the promoters of this railroad. They came to the Government of Canada and to the provinces of Canada and received assistance, and with all that assistance they have failed to meet their obligations. They should, therefore, be placed in the same position as the man who gambled in real estate and failed; they should lose their property and that property should come into possession of the people of Canada, because the people of Canada practically provided the means whereby this road was created.

The commission appointed by this Government have told us, as I understand it, that the balance of the stock is not worth anything. Now, if it is not worth anything, why should there be any arbitration to decide the value of the stock? I am not a lawyer, I am an ordinary layman, but I come to the conclusion at once, that if a commission of reputable men say the stock is not worth anything, I do not see any reason why arbitrators should be appointed to find out whether the stock is worth anything or not.

We have before us an amendment providing that the arbitrators the Government are going to appoint shall submit their report to Parliament, for Parliament to reject or sanction. I am in favour of that amendment, and I believe the people of this country are in favour of it. I am going to conclude my remarks by reading part of an article from a paper that is of much influence in Western Canada, especially amongst the farmers there; it voices their views, and is not always antagonistic to this Government. It praises the Government when it is right, and criticises it when it is wrong. Its article in connection with the Canadian Northern railway is not a severe criticism of the Government proposal, but it certainly commends the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for St. John. I will read it for the information of the House:

> On a proposition of this magnitude it would seem quite reasonable that the decision of the Board of Arbitration should be submitted to the next Parliament to be passed upon. How much the promoters of the Canadian Northern Railway will make out of stock manipulation nobody knows, but it can safely be assumed that it will be a tidy sum. The fact that the Canadian Northern Railway promoters are apparently quite satisfied with the present deal arouses widespread suspicion. For form's sake at least it would have been better to have heard them all kicking and kicking hard. We may take it for granted that Mackenzie and Mann will make more by selling the road to the Government than they would make by operating it themselves.
> No doubt there will also be a very satisfactory contribution to the campaign funds, and as usual, probably both political parties will benefit thereby. But even though the cost will be high it cannot be any higher than it has been under the old system of giving the Canadian Northern Railway promoters all they want from the public treasury with no return.

This article approves the proposal that the award of the board of arbitrators should be submitted to Parliament to be passed upon. This is an independent newspaper representing very important organizations in western Canada, and, I believe, it voices the sentiments of the bulk of the people of western Canada. So far as I personally am concerned, I am in favour of Canada acquiring this road, because of its failure to meet its obligations, but I am opposed to arbitration, because there is a possibility that, under arbitration, we shall be called upon to contribute more money to people interested in the road. If there is to be arbitration, then I agree with the sentiments expressed in this article, namely, that the report of the board of arbitrators should be submitted to Parliament.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, this is a war session of a war Parliament. The only reason why this Parliament is sitting to-day is because a world-war is in progress. We are here not by the mandate of the people but by our own decision under pretense that world-war conditions, in which war Canada was taking part, were of such character and of such gravity as did not permit that intervention of the people of Canada in the management of their own affairs that is provided by the constitution. Under these circumstances after the war has been in progress for three years, when no man can tell how much longer it will run nor what the result will be; after the debt of Canada has been increased to $1,250,000,000, of which $750,000,000 is war debt, we are asked to consider and to assent to a proposition that, in one week's debate of this dead Parliament, we shall add to the debt of Canada within measurable distance of what has been added to that debt by the three years of war in which we have been engaged.

It is true that we are to have assets in respect of those liabilities amounting to $650,000,000 which we shall assume, and if the assets that we assume, as a previous speaker has said, will earn the fixed charges upon them, then there is no addition to our net debt. But does any one suppose that the administration of 9,500 miles of railroad under this Government, judged by the results of its administration of the Intercolonial and of the Transcontinental, will result in earning interest on that vast sum of money? That would be the vision of a wild imagination. We have been running railroads in Canada for fifty years, and government operation of railroads has never yet paid a cent on capital cost. Not only has it never done that, but tens of millions of dollars have been added to capital cost because of failure to pay running expenses. Under those circumstances, it is no figure of speech to say that the Act of to-day that will pass at two o'clock in the morning, will add to the debt, to the liabilities, to the non-earning liabilities of the people of Canada, nearly as much as our three years of war have done.

If we are to take effective part in this war, we must have credit and we must have money, and if we destroy our credit by assuming non-productive liabilities of such a stupendous amount, where and how are we to get the money that will enable us to take that part in the war that it is our duty to take? It has been said already during this debate that Canada's credit has reached a point at which she can borrow only on short terms and at an abnormally high rate of interest. A few weeks ago we borrowed $100,000,000 in New York for only two years, and we are paying what amounts to 8 per cent for that money. That was before we entered upon this undertaking to assume ownership of the Canadian Northern Railway, to assume the obligations which the Canadian Northern Railway company has undertaken, to assume the responsibilities of management of 9,500 miles of railway, when we have proved before the world during half a century that we cannot manage 1,000 miles of railway and make it pay. We are undertaking to submit to arbitration the question whether this country shall have to pay in addition up to $60,000,000 for that which we have evidence is of absolutely no value. If our credit was as it was four weeks ago, what will it be to-day or to-morrow after this Bill passes?

I have already said, in the course of the discussion on this Bill, that it does not bear the marks of an honest transaction. If this Government intended to deal honestly by the people of Canada, they would not come to Parliament with a proposal that we should arbitrate upon the question of whether that which was valued at nothing at all was or was not worth $60,000,000, They would have made their arrangements, whatever they might be, before they came to Parliament, and they would be able to say that by the payment of a certain amount of money we would achieve the ownership desired. That would have been honest, that would have been fair. Such a proposal as they bring to-day is not honest and it is not fair. It is an attempt to humbug, to mislead, to rob the people of Canada under pretence of law and right.

Is it a matter of importance to the people of Canada to-day that their credit shall be kept up? Is it a matter of importance to them whether or not they can raise more money for the prosecution of the war? We are being called upon to send our men—the casualty lists in this evening's paper cover a page—and we are expected to back up those men with more men. And what are we going to do in regard to money if we have spent our money for that which has no value, if we have burdened our credit so we have no more credit? I ask you, what is our position going to be? It was said in the House the other day that munition-making was being shut down in Canada because the Canadian Government was unable to finance the making of munitions in Canada. It was said that the purchase of bacon in Canada for British supplies had ceased for the same reason. Because the United States was able to continue to finance the making of munitions, and the purchase of bacon, munition-making and the purchase of bacon are continuing in the States, while both were being shut down in Canada. Is this a matter for light consideration? Is it a light thing that we should see our industries shut down and the products of our farms left in our warehouses, or going to the Allies through the medium of our neighbours, because our Government has seen fit to destroy our credit and to spend our money in this enterprise they are undertaking at the present time?

I have nothing to say against the Canadian Northern Railway company and I have nothing to say against the Canadian Northern railway. It is a great enterprise, and I have every confidence that under other circumstances it would have been a success. I would have been glad to see means taken to tide the enterprise over present difficulties, so that it would still become a success. However, that is not the question before the House. The question before us is the payment of an unknown amount, not to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, not to Mackenzie and Mann, the projectors and controllers of that railway company, but to the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the pledgees who hold the stock. It appears the Canadian Bank of Commerce has advanced money, the Government refuses to say how much. This amount was advanced on security of this stock, which the Drayton-Acworth report says is worth nothing, and which every man knows is worth nothing. The Canadian Bank of Commerce has seen fit to make advances of untold amounts on security that has no value. On what ground did the Canadian Bank of Commerce make those advances? On the ground that they had sufficient influence with the Government of Canada that the Government, acting as their servant, would come to Parliament and put through legislation that would protect them in having paid out money contrary to the terms of the Bank Act, contrary to good finance, and contrary to every rule that should govern business in this country.

This is an act for the relief of the Bank of Commerce, a member of the financial group in the city of Toronto which directs the policy of this Government and which has a strangle-hold on the business of this country. That is the reason this legislation is going through. It is not because of the Canadian Northern railway or the devotion of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to the principles of government ownership; it is for the salvation and the help of Big Business in the city of Toronto, that the people's millions are to be poured into the coffers of the Canadian Bank of Commerce on the judgment of an arbitration that should never sit. We have millions to hand to the Bank of Commerce to save them from the consequences of acts which were never justified and which could not be justified; at the same time the wives and children of our soldiers at the front are depending on the passing of the hat for charity to keep them in comfort or decency—there is no recognition of the increased cost of living in the case of the dependents of our soldiers. We have not the money to spend; we have not the money in the treasury, and we cannot afford to spend it to maintain those dependents in the manner in which they should be maintained, but we have millions, and we do not put a limit on the millions, that we can pour into the coffers of the Bank of Commerce. Our disabled soldiers who come back from the front are not receiving the consideration to which they are entitled at the hands of this country which they have served, and for which they have suffered. The Government is convinced of this; the Prime Minister has told the House and the country that it is a fact. But the soldiers can wait; the Bank of Commerce cannot wait. The soldiers will get consideration when the next Parliament meets, but the Bank of Commerce must get consideration now. This country at this time and under these conditions is being compelled to assent to an expenditure of money of the amount of which we have no knowledge, and in regard to which the Government refuses to enlighten us, not only so far as concerns the amount that we shall pay for the stock of the Canadian Northern, but so far as concerns the obligations that lie against the Canadian Northern enterprise.

Time does not permit to go over the total list, but in one particular, we take $147,000,000 of the unguaranteed securities of the Canadian Northern Railway company, entitled to receive over $6,000,000 interest, and by a stroke of the pen, we make this Dominion liable for the payment of that interest. We follow that up by becoming obligated for the completion of all the undertakings of the Canadian Northern and for the payment of all the liabilities that they have incurred. It is not a matter of $1,000,000, it is not a matter of $10,000,000, it is not a matter of $100,000,000, but it is a matter of hundreds of millions that we are dealing with here to-night. I want to support the amendment of my hon. friend from St. John who asks—asks only—that this stupendous transaction, when the valuation has been arrived at shall be submitted to Parliament and to the people for their approval.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Saint-Hyacinthe) (Translation): Mr. Speaker it is with pleasure, indeed that I shall improve the twenty minutes allotted to me, in condemning the measure now before the House for its third reading and in supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for St-John (Mr. Pugsley). The future historian of Canada will state that since September 21, 1911, our country was unfortunate in having an administration steeped in toryism to a degree unparalleled heretofore; and under a Government such as this, it is a relief to listen to a man such as the hon. member for St-John (Mr. Pugsley) who is fired with the spirit of true Liberalism.

What has been the present Government's policy? True to their traditions, they have bent their efforts towards encroaching upon civil liberty; they have outrun the term of their prerogatives; they have substituted to Parliamentary action Commissions, appointed by themselves in order to load their friends with all possible favours. But the greatest encroachment upon the liberties and the rights of the people and of their representatives, has certainly been the application of the closure rule which we are presently enduring, and through which they silence the voice of the Opposition and force through the passing into law of the measure now under consideration. Commission after commission has been appointed. The House's privileges have been taken away one by one. Under the cover of every just cause, of the noblest principles, measures of the vilest character have been enacted, to an extent unknown to any previous government.

I have not the time, in the few minutes at my disposal, to review the whole question now before us, besides I have already discussed it previously.

Mr. Speaker, what is the object of the amendment of the hon. member for St-John? Merely to assert the authority of Parliament, should the Government see fit to put this measure through by means of the closure. Indeed, this amendment provides that, before being carried out the award should be submitted to Parliament, the latter having the opportunity of threshing out the evidence, the testimony, the engineers' advices; in short, the evidence given by all the experts summoned.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of this House and of the country upon one particular item. On August 23, 1917, the hon. Minister of Finance brought down a statement as to that work known as the "Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal" and which happens to be in the city of Montreal. We who belong to Montreal, we are in a position to see what is going on in that city. The Government assert that the total cost should be $4,631,427, and that the expenditure up to April 30th last had reached $4,566,072.52, leaving an amount of $65,354.48 to complete the enterprise. Now Sir, I am informed by a competent engineer that the amount stated as having been spent for the tunnelling of Mount Royal, is a fictitious one. This engineer, who is an expert, and who has consulted other engineers, colleagues of his, contends that there has never been, on this continent or elsewhere, a tunnel where the cost has exceeded $200 per foot, that is to say, $1,000,000 per mile.

Now, this tunnel covers two miles and a half, which consequently puts its total cost at $2,500,000, and here we have the Government, accepting the figures submitted by Mackenzie and Mann, fixing the cost of that tunnel at $4,631,427 and contending that, on April 30, 1917, the expenditure amounted to $4,566,072.52. The engineer from whom I obtained this data, which I believe credible, declares that it is impossible for Mackenzie and Mann to have spent in the tunnelling of Mount Royal the amount which they set down as having been expended.

We ask for information and the Government refuse to give it.

In the blue-book concerning the Canadian Northern, we find entered as an unpledged security for the "Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company", an amount of $11,430,033.39 as outstanding debentures. Everybody knows that only $7,000,000 of that enterprise have been floated on the New York market, to the firm of Lazard Bros, and here now we shall be called upon to pay for $11,000,000 of debentures, when $7,000,000 only have been floated.

What of the balance? Who holds it? Nobody will extend the information and in spite of the Opposition's persistent inquiries, the Government turn a deaf ear. They resort to the gag and thus make totally obnoxious a Bill based on the most monstrous iniquity but which will bear in our statute books and in the minds of our people, the odium of having been put through by shutting off discussion and by force of majority vote, through which we are debarred from obtaining information to the benefit of our constituents.

The Government are using their full power and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that we, on this side of the House, have not been at all surprised at the stand taken by these hon. gentlemen. Every one knows that, in spite of the nefarious influence which has paralyzed the press of this country, in spite of the means used by the occult power moving those who are the administrators of Canada; every one realizes that public opinion is awakening, in spite of the silence of the press, notwithstanding the moneys spent to deceive, to chloroform public opinion; every one realizes that public opinion is on the point of rising and of compelling the Government to go before the people.

Oh! I know that these gentlemen have taken every possible precaution; I know that they have, as they always had at their disposal every means to extort a verdict from the people. We are expecting as much. Had they been able to put off the date of final reckoning, this nefarious measure would perhaps never have been brought up under such circumstances at this very session. But the Government feel that they must appear before the people; the Government are forced to face their judges and, realizing that the struggle will be a very hard one, that the result may be disastrous to them, these gentlemen, before leaving, have devised this Bill which I may sum up in a few words; Mackenzie and Mann having built a railway through subsidies obtained from every government in Canada, have thriven by impoverishing their company with its subsidiary companies, and to-day, after succeeding in enriching themselves by beggaring the companies of their own making, they ask the Government to come to their rescue and take over their debts so that they may keep all the profits.

As I see it, the transaction is summed up as follows; whether the money goes to the Bank of Commerce, whether the money, which we are going to vote or which will be the product of this legislation, goes to the Bank of Commerce, or to the National Trust or again, to Lazard Brothers, every body knows that it is through the advances made by those financiers, that Mackenzie and Mann have accumulated their private wealth, and that the debts these same gentlemen have created, the Government shall take them over, leaving to those who have had the talent and the genius to accumulate colossal fortunes, their millions and relieving them of their debts.

Mr. Speaker, is it credible that, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, in a country which lays claim to every British institution, in a country which has been brought to sacrifice as its war contribution the greater part of its wealth, its brightest prospects and its best men, to the very point of facing national bankruptcy; is it possible to believe that, in the last days of a Parliament which had been granted a new lease of life by formally pledging themselves not to bring up any contentious masure; is it possible to believe that, during the last days of the last session of this moribund Parliament, the Government would be bold enough—were they not compelled to do so—previous to going before the people, to assume the responsibility of such a legal crime as this? Not by any means. It is because those who are the masters of the administration have forced them, before leaving the place, to open the public Treasury and allow them to draw upon it to any extent, in order to repay themselves for advances made to enterprises which, had they been managed with the prudence and wisdom that should characterize the administration of any large industry, would certainly have fully succeeded.

And because the masters of this Government, because those who have put into power, those who have kept them in office, feel that public opinion is awakening, because they feel that the public conscience is on the point of revolting, because they know that the people's verdict, which the voters of the country will soon be called to give, will be the signal condemnation of six years of squandering, six years of iniquitous legislation and of scandalous administration, because they know that this verdict will go against their creatures and their valets; they exact, before this Government go away, that a last onslaught be made on the public Treasury.

Can one be surprised, Mr. Speaker, that, before such a legislation as that one, can one be surprised that the Opposition should demand that the voice of the people and the voice of the people's representatives be listened to? Is it surprising that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), anxious as he is that the people's wishes be assented to and unwilling that the Parliament of this country should be deprived of its last prerogatives, is it surprising, I say, that this hon. gentleman proposes in his amendment that, when the arbitrators' award shall have been prepared, it be not executed before Parliament has been consulted and has declared, through its representatives, whether the bargain is good or not, whether we are getting the actual value of what we are purchasing?

I will go still further. If, in order to indemnify the builders of this railway system, the promoters of the Canadian Northern, the arbitrators should declare that an indemnity be given them to recognize their initiative, their go-aheadedness, the loss of time and of energy they have incurred—from the country's development point of view—recognizing the fact that the Canadian Parliament have declared, by an Act, that the Canadian Northern had been built in the public interest. even if the award contained the shadow of a doubt, the members, in the new Parliament, would not hesitate in the least to grant, to those who have been the promoters of that enterprise, an indemnity, as a matter of recognition for all that those gentlemen have done in Canada's interest.

But the Government, by refusing to accept the amendment of the member for St. John, deprive Parliament of the right to examine the evidence and the expert testimony and, at the same time, of looking into transactions which, after all, the administration were not effected in their own personal name, but on behalf of the whole of Canada. It is the Canadian people who will have to pay and they should know what they are buying, and it is only fair that their representatives in this House should be in a position to decide, in last resort, upon the amount of the abritrators' award. In my opinion, this transaction should not be closed without the Canadian Parliament having decided upon the award, as to the value of the goods we are acquiring.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I have been reminded by the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance of an old proverb, 'Consistency thou art a jewel.' When one reads the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance at the close of the last session and compares it with the speech he has delivered to-day in reference to the interpretation to be given to the Act passed in 1914, really one cannot but believe that the argument of the hon. gentlemen is, with all due respect, nothing but tomfoolery. It would be of little importance if this legislation which we are considering and will be called upon to vote upon in a few minutes was only tomfoolery, but, unfortunately, it is Clifford roguery too. Lord Milner, one of the distant progenitors of the present Tory organization had a slogan which he used some years ago. In discussing the rejection by the House of Lords of the famous Lloyd George budget, when it was represented to him that the House of Lords should not run counter to the House of Commons, he said, " Damn the consequences." When I see this Government, with the Minister of Finance at its head, coming before Parliament in the dying days of a dying session of a moribund Parliament with such a stupendous proposition as the present one, I say that they have evidently adopted as their motto, their slogan, the words of Lord Milner—that silent and somewhat sinister figure in British politics—damn the consequences. I approve of the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). The hon. gentlemen opposite, in order to cover their iniquity, claim that the Canadian Northern railway in the future will be the people's railway. Sir, if this Parliament represents anybody or anything it represents the people of Canada, and as representative of the people of Canada this Parliament should pronounce upon the award because the award will represent the price that the people of Canada are willing to pay for what will become ultimately their railway. But the Government will not accept this amendment. This is exactly the cleavage between Toryism and Liberalism. Liberalism will trust the people but Toryism will mistrust them. The present Government, if they could do away with all parliamentary representation, with all advice from this House, would do it very quickly, because the Star Chamber is their type of government.

And are not the people of Canada being governed at the present time by a Star Chamber? The Government is not on the benches I see before me. The present Government is not even sitting in council on the hill. The present Government receives its inspiration, receives its orders from a certain parlour in the Chateau Laurier. In the annals of Great Britain and of the British dominions I have never read of such a nefarious system of managing public affairs. The Government has completely surrendered what rights, what powers, it had into the hands of a few filibusters, into the hands of a few well known looters and plunderers. This is nothing else but a raid, and it is because it is a raid perpetrated on the Canadian treasury, that it has to be done by closure. A raid must be made swiftly and sharply, it must be done in the dark, far from inquiries, far from the surveillance of the elect representatives of the people. That is why the Government rejects the amendment of my hon. friend requiring that the award in the present arbitration shall be passed upon by the representatives of the people.

I said a moment ago that this amendment has all my support. It may seem extraordinary that, after having submitted this question to three arbitrators, we should claim the right to revise the award of the arbitrators. But this is a most extraordinary transaction. It is a transaction which reminds me of the looting and plundering which in years gone by was committed in the western states by desperadoes. When the desperadoes in California came sweeping down the mountains to raid the poor inhabitants of the plains, the citizens, in order to protect themselves, formed vigilance committees and that is how they got rid of the desperadoes in the Far West. We have desperadoes at the present moment before us. The vigilance committee is here represented by His Majesty's loyal Opposition, and the plain people at the next election will see to it that the desperadoes are dislodged from the hill yonder.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: It will not take long.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I said a moment ago that the explanations of the Minister of Finance amounted to something like tomfoolery. May I explain in his own words the covenant which was passed in 1914. Let me quote in a few words what the hon. gentleman said:

> Under that legislation in 1914, in the event of default on the part of the Canadian Northern Railway in the payment of interest upon its securities, or in the event of a receivership, which would be in the event of default, then this Government—

Mark these words—

> —has the power, as that legislation is existing to-day, to appoint a board of directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and of its subsidiary and consituent companies to enforce its security.

Then he quotes section 24, and continues:

> The effect of that enactment, which is in existence to-day, is that, in the event of default on the part of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, so far from the Canadian Northern Railway Company being able to take this Government by the throat—

As this company is taking it to-day—

> —the Government can demand that the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway System resign their offices, and the Dominion Government may appoint directors in their places, may take complete control of the Canadian Northern Railway system and may foreclose the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern Railway and deal with that equity of redemption as Parliament may see fit in the interests of the people of Canada.

He says further:

> My hon. friend still misunderstands the legislation of 1914. So far from any delay being opened to the railway company under that legislation the Dominion Government can at once appoint boards, take possession and administer the system by these boards. It has as full power as if it had all the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway and its subsidiary and constituent companies.

And further on the hon. gentleman says, in answer to a criticism which was offered on this side of the House:

> I have told my hon. friend that the Government is investigating the whole Canadian railway situation. We are doing what I believe is the sensible thing under present conditions. The Canadian railway situation is exceedingly complicated and one of the most important that has ever confronted any government in Canada. We are taking the opinion of experts, and when we have their advice we shall be in position to act.

We are taking the advice of experts, in order to act on the opinion of these experts. The experts, honest men all, were appointed. They said:

In the case of the Canadian Northern Railway Company no proceedings in court are requisite. Under the provisions of section 24 of the Canadian Northern Railway Guarantee Act, 1914 (4-5 Geo. V, chap. 20), the Governor General in Council has power, when authorized by Parliament, to declare by order, if default is made by the company in payment of interest on the $45,000,000 guaranteed securities (the interest on which is at present being found by the Government) that the equity of redemption of the company is absolutely barred and foreclosed; and thereupon the whole property becomes vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada.

Let us follow the case. The hon. gentleman declared, when he introduced the resolution to the House, that the Canadian Northern Railway Company had failed to pay its interest charges. He admitted that the company had defaulted, and therefore he had only one thing to do. If he had been frank, sincere and honest with himself—not to speak of the honesty he should have exhibited to the people of this country—he would have followed the advice of the experts he employed—as he said last year, advice upon which the Government might act. I say that never in the history of this Parliament was a crime of that magnitude ever perpetrated against the interests of the people of Canada. I say to the hon. gentleman: You have appointed Chief Justice Sir William Meredith; Mr. Lash will be appointed; both of them will appoint a third. I am not saying anything against the integrity or the honour of the Chief Justice of the province of Ontario. I know that he is honourable, I know that he is a great jurist, but the people of this country will have no faith in the award of that tribunal. Let my hon. friend address himself to the Exchequer Court of Canada, and go before Sir Walter Cassels. He knows he is an honourable and eminently able judge, and that by the very nature of his functions he is conversant with such questions as these. He knows, further, that Sir Walter Cassels has protected the taxpayers of this country within the last months when the Quebec and Saguenay deal was being argued before him. I hold the judgment in that case in my hand. It shows that, although the counsel appointed by the Government recommended the payment of nearly $2,000,000 out of the public treasury to the Quebec and Saguenay, and the Quebec and Montmorency, the judge of the Exchequer Court, faithful to his trust refused to be bound by the dictum of that counsel. In one instance he said:

Now it is admitted that these two items of $500,000 referred to in schedule (A), and also the item of $794,869.58 floating liability comprise part of this item of $2,038,149.40. Crown counsel in their statement were of the opinion that these two items of $500,000 and $794,869.58 should be taken as the cost up to that date, namely, July 1, 1898. I do not agree with that contention.

And he cuts off the two items, amounting to about $1,200,000. That is the judge I want to see as the Supreme Arbitrator in the present instance—a man who has the courage to say to the Crown Counsel: "You have allocated too much to the claimants, and I, as protector of the public treasury, and faithful to the trust imposed on me, refuse to allocate these two amounts." This is the judge I want to see appointed as a valuator in the present instance. What will the people of this country think when my hon. friend, having appointed the experts of last year, Sir Henry Drayton, Mr. Acworth and Mr. Smith, after having declared that he would accept their advice and act upon it, comes before the House this year, and begins by throwing overboard his own experts' report? He declares they have made serious omissions and have not properly valued the stock. Mr. Speaker, is that the way the watchdog of the treasury should protect the interests of the people? I say to my honourable friend that he has lost to a considerable degree the confidence of the people of Canada in the last few days.

It is hinted the Canadian Pacific would like to snatch the Canadian Northern from the people of Canada, and that by this legislation we are preventing the Canadian Pacific from getting control of that road. If it is true the Canadian Pacific is so anxious to snatch such a valuable asset as the Canadian Northern railway from the people of this country, if the minister had been wise he would have left the road first appraised by the Canadian Pacific, and then by Act of Parliament taken possession, as he was entitled to do under section 24 of the statute of 1914. I regret my honourable friend has not given the House a complete list of all the bondholders. The House would be glad to know, for instance, the names of those for whom John Aird has $1,000,000 in trust. The holders in trust should be brought to the bar of the House to divulge the names of the real shareholders.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This is the second time I rapped.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no tower so you cannot send me there.

Mr. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) who has preceded me, finds it strange that the Government should have taken such a stand and my hon. friend has left no stone unturned to try and convince them. It was all of no use, and he might have spared himself the trouble. Long before the debate had started, the subject-matter had been pondered and weighed, and it was a foregone conclusion that the goods were to be delivered and I am even led to believe that such is the case. What is the use of putting forward cogent and unquestionable arguments? Why should I go to the trouble of reading and quoting Acts and Statutes? As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly save myself the trouble, seeing that the bargain was made and settled in advance, that everything has been well examined and weighed and to-day they only come and ask the Parliament to ratify what has been done outside of it. So that, Mr. Speaker, it is only a waste of time and labour to try and convince the hon. gentlemen opposite. The unknown quantity here is as to who is to get the lion's-share; all the rest is an open secret, but, as I said, I should like to know who will get the first prize. That is, Mr. Speaker, what puzzles me or rather rouses my curiosity.

During the elections, which will soon come off, these gentlemen will be seen everywhere, liberally scattering gold and silver, throughout the country, in the hope thereby of being returned to power. But their hopes will be dashed to pieces. Mr. Speaker, they are egregiously mistaken, for there is no power on earth, there is no conceivable deal that could allow these gentlemen to come back to power; there is not enough gold and silver in the country to save them from defeat at the polls. It is preposterous. Before going out of office, they mean to take advantage of it; it's their business. For my part, I know I shall not get anything out of it.

Mr. Speaker, I have carefully listened to the hon. members who have spoken before me, from the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that the transaction which is about to be concluded is the most disastrous ever heard of. A few moments ago, the hon. member for Saint-John (Mr. Pugsley), who is an orator out of the ordinary, a man of wide experience and great learning, conversant with every large transaction, did put forward crushing arguments which none among our hon. friends opposite could refute. As a matter of fact, our hon. friends never offer any reply to our arguments; they are magicians with all kinds of ready tricks in their bag, to explain or not to explain their conduct; try as you may, you can't reach them.

There is a good deal of talk about the so-called watch dogs, on guard over the public treasury. For my part, I should rather think they are only small foxes. A watch dog, Mr. Speaker, is the bull-dog that is often seen depicted in illustrated papers by cartoonists; it is representative of the guardianship of honour and probity and it has for its motto "What I have I hold." But, Mr. Speaker, I repeat it, it is not that kind of guardians we have across the House. As I have said, they rather belong to the fox variety. But they will have an account to render, and it will be a severe one. They have climbed into power under very extraordinary circumstances and think the learned Speaker who presides over the House to-night, knows something about it. Yes, our hon. friends opposite did indeed come into office under circumstances altogether peculiar, and when the people demand some explanation about the transaction we are discussing to-night, you may try and defend it one way in the province of Ontario, and another way, in the province of Quebec; you may go from North to South or from East to West, there is none among our friends opposite who will be able to say that this transaction is an honest one. Everybody is sick and tired of the present Administration. As for this transaction, we see the most influential men of Montreal, men held in the highest esteem, thoroughly conversant with financial affairs, as the president of the Bank of Montreal, for instance, coming out and condemning it most severely. I do not refer to the testimony of the members on this side of the House, because that would not satisfy the hon. gentlemen opposite. A "Rouge" is a negligible quantity. Liberal opinions don't amount to anything. But, le us take the opinion of Conservatives, of these gentlemen's own friends, of men who have never trespassed, never transgressed, who never were traitors to their party; and what do they say? Not one of them approves of that transaction.

When we see men who have severed their connection with their party, vote against their own friends, vote against this Government, and later recanting their probity, their honourableness, their respectability and their honour, in voting in favour of this transaction, those men do certainly not wish to come back here with a new mandate from the people and sit in the new Parliament Buildings, for never will they cross the threshold, never shall those men be re-elected, unless they prove their good faith, their sincerity, as did the hon. members Achim and Barrette. These two gentlemen have broken with their party in order to come over and side with us. They are entitled to our respect and to our protection. There is also Mr. Mondou. As for Mr. Barrette, he did indeed cut loose from his party, but he returned right away to the party fold. He voted once with us, but he cannot renounce his life-long views; he cannot abandon the men with whom he has so long united his political bonds. He will surely have to atone for that in purgatory. He will not be elected.

Mr. Speaker, I really do not feel like admiring such actions.

When we debate something worth discussing, when we hear plausible cogent arguments pro and con put forward, then there is a wide field opened up for debate; but how can we go into discussion over so plain so easy, so elementary a matter? That cannot be discussed Should a man try to prove that two and two are four, he would lose his time; it would be sheer nonsense to try and prove such a truism. It is a loss of time for one to try and prove that this transaction is worthless. It is not even disputable, it is impossible. It required the brains of man who is now terrorizing this country, a man who has seen happy days, who enjoyed some consideration, was respected once, but to-day he is fallen so low that nobody wants him on either side, I refer to that gentleman, Sir Clifford Sifton, Neither one side nor the other cares for him; everywhere he shows his face, he is a terror, a scare-crow, an object of abhorrence, some even say, it is the polecat. When he went out West, he pestered his friends. He boards at the Chateau Laurier, and every body shuns him, they all keep aloof from him; he remains alone.

He keeps on jobbing, plotting, conspiring, lobbying, corrupting, and he is the adviser of the members of the cabinet.

[Mr. D. A. Lafortune.]

Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like to see him in the province of Quebec trying to justify a transaction like this. I should like to see these men trying to convince the good electors, not only of the province of Quebec, but of the whole Dominion. I should like to see them come and discuss, pro and con, this question with men as competent as my most venerable leader, or my hon. friend from Saint-John (Mr. Pugsley) and all the other members who know the transactions on the tip of their fingers; who have made study the labour of a lifetime. I should like to see, do I say, men as these gentlemen seated alongside our good friends opposite, who come to Parliament for the first time—they hardly lobbying, corrupting, and he is the adviser immediately fashioned into ministers, instead of others who have given proof of their capacities. Any first comer should not be given a portfolio; and so, there is no wonder that the wheels should not run smoothly. Take for instance the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) who came here in 1911. They succeeded in finding fault with everything he was doing, and so they shoved him out. Others have disappeared and more yet are to go at the coming elections. Take my word for it, they will drop like ripe nuts; they will topple down and I can assure you, the people will make short work of it. No, it is impossible for these gentlemen to ever be returned to power.

Our good friends opposite, Mr. Speaker, are well aware that the transaction they propose is malodorous and so they bend themselves to the task of shutting off discussion by force of majority rule, making use of the closure or the rule of the gag to throttle the members of the House.

I was delighted to-night to hear the Minister of Finance finding fault with his own medicine; it was a bitter pill for him to swallow. He would have liked to explain his case—a very bad one—a little longer than he was entitled to; he wanted to give more detailed explanations, but he also had the gag put on to him. The Minister of Finance is known as a serious man, who can handle figures all right, when millions are at stake; but when a man frames a contract like this one, I can assure you he never has a chance to make another one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, they want to sell us a railway which the Government can take over under a contract passed in 1914. I have been practising at the Bar for the past thirty-six years; I know what a deed of sale is; I know what is a mortgage and I also know what a security is. This contract has been discussed on every aspect, shape and form, and the right hon. leader of the opposition understands the matter. He has made contracts of the most serious, of the most complex kind, when there was no possible equivocation. The present administration applied to the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), that gentleman who is a past master of hair-splitting. This gentleman is most skilled, he has done all kinds of things, he puts me in mind of some magician who does all sorts of tricks. He will succeed in passing his Bill, and you will see that those gentlemen called Mackenzie and Mann, who have had millions and millions from the Government, will come out of this deal several times millionaires. More than that, Mr. Speaker, because they cannot meet their liabilities, they have been "sired"; they are called Sir Mackenzie, Sir Mann, and for all that, they will live in grand style at our expense, as the big millionaires of this country, because they don't pay their debts. In our parts, a man who steals a loaf of bread is sent to the penitentiary, unless he can prove dire want, and then he is forgiven. But should we lay a charge against these gentlemen for having obtained as many millions from the present administration as from the late administration—at least, as to the late administration, we had been given a railway, they had built a railway, but the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had proceeded warily so that no trick be played on him. But now, Mr. Speaker, it is the general bankruptcy, complete bankruptcy—not the bankruptcy of Mackenzie and Mann, for they remain millionaires just the same—but an imaginary bankruptcy of those who have built that road and other moral persons besides Mackenzie and Mann. And those people say: "Now, it is a case of bankruptcy, we are unable to pay our debts, take over the road, but we shall remain millionaires, don't touch our millions."

You will see these gentlemen running over the different provinces of the Dominion, go on junketing trips throughout the various countries, in high style, at the expense of that poor people they have so well imposed upon. And the hon. gentlemen opposite will loudly applaud. You will see them in a few minutes; just now, they hang around the corridors, in the lobbies, you will see them return in gangs, and the whole lot of them will vote as a man, to say: "Mackenzie and Mann are bankrupts, they have not done their duty, they are in default of payment, but never mind, let us pay all these gentlemen ask, let us hurry and saddle millions and millions upn the poor people." And these gentlemen will say: "In war times, let us economize, abstain from meat on Tuesdays, and on Saturdays—two meatless days—let us economize." But when these gentleman are in it, all that is of no account. Little mites of meat, little slices of bacon, that counts. They forbid the Canadians, the voters, eating a little bacon. "Big round millions that flies, let us not mind that."

You will see these hon. gentlemen vote in a body, and applaud. I see the member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay), who had the courage to vote with us on the Conscription Bill, blaming the Government, blaming his friends, and the next day, the osculation was given, let us vote for this good Government—it works so well—he expects so much from his good friends; you will see him vote and he will go down into his county, he was there recently, he tried to explain the prepared contract and he was told: "Sir, please go home, we don't need you any longer." You will see what kind of a reception he will get in his county.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are looking at the clock, the gag is ready for me. What a fine Government! What a fine country! Country of liberty, country of freedom, country par excellence!

In our times, we never had any mallet like that. In our days, there was more mutual respect, people were not stopped by mallet strokes, one stopped speaking when he pleased. Since you are in power, the mallets fly. It is with that mallet that we shall crush you at the next elections.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, it will be only a few minutes now until the curtain of this Chamber is drawn down on what I apprehend will be considered one of the most scandalous transactions that have ever disgraced the administration of any country under British rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is surely exceeding the rules of debate.

Mr. GERMAN: If, by using the word "scandalous," I exceed the rules of debate, I will withdraw the expression "scandalous" and say that this is one of the worst transactions that have ever disgraced the administration of this or of any other country under British rule. We have here a proposition, introduced in the last days of a session, for taking over one of the great transcontinental railway systems of this country, involving a responsibility on this country amounting to about $600,000,000; and the Government, without giving information which members of this House desire to have and are entitled to have, are using the rules of closure to force this proposition through the House. That is an action on the part of the Government for which they will have to answer to the people of this country in a manner which, I apprehend, will not be to their satisfaction.

I do not think we can bring too often to the attention of the House and of the country what the position of the Government has been in regard to this matter. The transactions of the Government in connection with the Canadian Northern railway system began in 1914 when they guaranteed $45,000,000 of the bonds of that company. Yesterday, the Prime Minister, after repeated suggestions from various members of this House, endeavoured to explain—no, he did not endeavour to explain what was meant by his statements in 1914, but he made certain statements, and I think it is well we should place the statements of the Prime Minister made yesterday in this House side by side with his statement made in 1914 and the statement of the Minister of Finance made at the same time; the people of the country will then be able to use those statements standing in juxtaposition, and we shall see what the people think of them. This is what the Prime Minister said yesterday:

> I have pointed out, and it has been repeatedly pointed out by hon. members on this side of the House, that if the Government utilized the legislation of 1914, it would be absolutely impossible, unless we desired to wreck the credit of this country, to proceed on any other principle than that which is embodied in this Bill. That is to say, that if the persons who own the equity of redemption in the Canadian Northern Railway and its subsidiary companies claim with any show of reason at all that there is some value in that equity of redemption, it would be absolutely impossible for this Parliament, for this Government, or for any other parliament or any other government having due regard for the public interests, to deny to the persons raising that claim the right to be heard as to the merits of their claim before some properly-constituted tribunal. If you depart from a principle of that kind, you might just as well bring into Parliament a Bill which would authorize expropriation of the property of any citizen, or firm, or company in this country, without compensation, or with one-half or one-tenth of the compensation that might be found by any court in respect of such property taken by the Crown for public purposes. It is absolutely impossible to do it. It is absolutely impossible to deny the right to be heard to any man whose property is taken and who makes a reasonable claim that it has some value. Therefore, I say, under the Act of 1914, if the owners of the equity of redemption were able to show—as I think they have shown—that there is some reasonable claim for some value in the property over and above the encumbrances, we ought not to deny them the right to be heard.

[Mr. German.]

The Prime Minister said yesterday that those people must have the right to be heard; that there must be an arbitration to settle the value of the equity of redemption of Mackenzie and Mann in this railway enterprise. This is what he said in 1914:

> If such default takes place the Governor in Council may, upon such notice as he deems expedient, declare vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or of any of the allied companies, and may appoint a new board or boards, upon which very extraordinary powers are proposed to be conferred. Among such powers are the creation of any additional securities, the making of arrangements with the holders of any outstanding securities, and the transfer, with or without compensation, of the Canadian Northern system, or any part thereof (subject to then existing charges) to any corporation created by the Parliament of Canada for the purpose. So if, as apprehended in some quarters, the road cannot, with the assistance now afforded, be brought to a successful conclusion, the Government and Parliament of Canada will have the situation in hand better than by any possible method at the present time. In effect we propose to provide in the first place that a certain amount shall be available for the early and immediate completion of the road, and, if the road is not carried to completion by means of that aid, then the people of Canada, through their Government and Parliament, are enabled in the most effective and vigorous way to grasp the situation, and to carry to completion, for their own benefit, one of the great transcontinental railway systems of Canada.

I want to know where in the four corners of that statement of the Prime Minister, made in 1914, there is any suggestion that there will be an equity of redemption. As a matter of fact, he absolutely repudiated any idea of an equity of redemption of Mackenzie and Mann in this property. Mackenzie and Mann themselves, as has been repeatedly pointed out in this House and as I purpose again pointing out—because it cannot be too often and too fully emphasized—agreed that there would be no equity of redemption in them to this property.

The Prime Minister there says, in speaking of the Order in Council, that the representatives of the parties, both Mackenzie and Mann as a corporation and Mackenzie and Mann individually, will be cut off, and that they will not be at any time, make or seek to enforce any claim for contractors' profits, commissions or otherwise against the Canadian Northern or against any of the constituent or subsidiary companies upon or in respect of any expressed or implied contract, understanding, agreement or stipulation of any kind, heretofore or hereafter made whereby or whereunder they or any one or more of them may now or hereafter be entitled to receive from the Canadian Northern, or from any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, any consideration or profits in respect of work heretofore undertaken or as consideration for transfers of properties, rights or franchises already transferred or to be transferred under subclauses (a) or (b) of this clause, or for consideration or remuneration for services in financing or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released. In the face of that, how can the Prime Minister or the Finance Minister stand up in this House and declare there is an equity of redemption in Mackenzie and Mann in regard to this property, for which they have a right to be paid? On the face of the whole transaction it shows that the proposition of the Government has some ulterior motive in view. It is not to recompense Mackenzie and Mann for any equity of redemption they have in this property. The Government knows, as we all know, that Mackenzie and Mann have renounced and released their equity of redemption in this property in consideration of having their bonds guaranteed to the extent of $45,000,000 in 1914. That being so, why does the Government come to-day and attempt—yes, even more than attempt, assert—to this House that there is an equity of redemption for which Mackenzie and Mann must be paid? What confidence can we have in any action of the Government in connection with this matter? What confidence can we have that this Government will in any energetic or thorough way go before the arbitrators and seek to show that there is no value in the equity of redemption of Mackenzie and Mann? We have the right to assume, in view of the action of the Government in connection with this matter, that they will instruct their counsel to go before the arbitrators and admit that there is a value in the equity of redemption of Mackenzie and Mann in this property. Admitting that, then Mackenzie and Mann will call their expert witnesses, and will bring evidence before the board of arbitrators to show that this stock is actually worth par. We on this side of the House cannot have, and have not, any confidence in the Government energetically prosecuting this matter on behalf of the people of Canada, and that is why we declare here that it is the duty of Parliament to keep control until after the whole thing is decided and disposed of. We should not have any confidence in the Government, because they have deliberately gone back on every pledge they made in 1914. They have deliberately turned their backs on every proposition of law that they laid down in 1914. They have deliberately gone back on every principle of equity and justice and fair play. That being the case, how can we on this side of the House, and how can the people of Canada, have the slightest confidence that the Government will prosecute this matter in the interests of the people? For those reasons, we declare that the Parliament of Canada should remain seized of the question until after the arbitrators have made their report, and then on the evidence which is made before the arbitrators, Parliament can decide whether or not the award they have rendered is a just and fair award. The Parliament of Canada is the highest tribunal in the land, as the Parliament of Great Britain is the highest tribunal in the British Empire. Why should not the Parliament of Canada remain seized of this situation until the arbitrators have made their report? The Government say it will delay matters. It cannot possibly delay anything. All the Government has to do is to place their own directors in charge of this road, and take over the operation of the road from this minute. They are not pinned down by anything. The law is as plain as the writing on the wall. The Minister of Finance declared in 1914 that all they had to do was to place their own directors in charge of the Canadian Northern Railway system, and operate it for the benefit of the people. It is the duty of the Government to do this now. The Solicitor General said this afternoon would that it be fair to accept an exparte decision of the Royal Commission in connection with the valuation of this property. This was a Royal Commission appointed by themselves to investigate this whole question, and there is not a man in the House who has denied that the findings of that Royal Commission were true to the facts, excepting Mr. Bell, Comptroller of Railways has said there is a mistake of some $65,000,000. On the face of it there is no such mistake. He says there was a mistake of $25,000,000 in the assets, but there was also a mistake of $25,000,000 in the liabilities, one offsetting the other. He says there was a mistake in not taking certain lands into consideration, but as a matter of fact the commission took into consideration the money that was raised on the security of the land, so there was no mistake there. More than that, the commissioners themselves assert there was no mistake at all. The Government, knowing that there was no value to the equity of redemption in this property, is deliberately forcing through this House a proposition which will give, if not to Mackenzie and Mann, at least to their pledgees the Canadian Bank of Commerce, several millions of dollars of the people's money.

There is another point in connection with this Bill about which I spoke the other night, and in regard to which I have not heard any explanation, that is, the agreement which is suggested in the Bill as an agreement to be made between Mackenzie and Mann and the pledgees and the Government before this stock is to be handed over. Why in the name of common sense should an agreement be suggested? There is no necessity for any agreement. Mackenzie and Mann lose all their rights in this road, and the pledgees have no higher rights than have Mackenzie and Mann. Then why an agreement? I wish to state, in all sincerity, and hon. gentlemen opposite will find that what I say will be very near the truth, that that agreement will be prepared in such a way that Mackenzie and Mann will be given further time for redemption of this property. Why should there be an agreement unless it be an agreement to give Mackenzie and Mann further time to redeem the property? The arbitrators will make an award of perhaps $10,000,000, or $15,000,000, or $20,000,000, which will go to the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Mackenzie, Mann and Company will have four, or five, or maybe more years in which to raise this money if they can possibly do it, and redeem the property.

If it is a failure they will leave it in the hands of the Government, but if it is a paying concern, I am strongly of the opinion they will make provision in the agreement that they speak of in this Bill to give Mackenzie and Mann the right of redemption in the property. That is one reason why I claim that this proposition should be kept in the hands of Parliament until we see what is likely to happen. We have not the information on which we can decide with judgment and confidence in regard to this matter. We have not the information because the Government refuse to give it to the House. I asked the Minister of Finance the other day to let us know what that agreement would contain. He said that it was simply an agreement for the handling over of the stock? Why is an agreement necessary for the handing over of the stock? The arbitration fixes the price to be paid for the stock under this Bill and the Government takes it. There is no necessity for an agreement. Mackenzie and Mann have nothing to agree to. The stock is taken from them in spite of them and the pledgees must accept the money which the arbitrators say they are entitled to get, if any. There is no necessity to make any suggestion of an agreement in the Bill. It is all an open, blank proposition. But under the Bill this Government can enter into any sort of an agreement with Mackenzie and Mann that they see fit in connection with this transaction. I believe it will be an arrangement to extend the time for the redemption of this property.

The time is growing short and soon the official axe will fall—and this debate will stop. The Government has not given the explanations that we are entitled to but there is another tribunal before which the Government will have to go in a few days, before which it will have to give explanations. Before that tribunal it will have to justify its actions in connection with this matter in the light of open criticism; before that tribunal there will be no closure rules to apply and before that tribunal every man will have as much time as he wishes to discuss this matter and the people will be glad to listen to him because it is a gigantic undertaking. When that tribunal has made up its mind, and when it gives its decision, I believe most firmly that the decision will be a condemnation of the Government which has shown itself spineless, corrupt and extravagant.

Mr. ARTHUR LACHANCE (Quebec-Centre) (Translation): Really Mr. Speaker, Fortune seems very fickle towards me. The other night, I had, by authority of the chairman, to put up with the hardship of the closure rule; to-night again, I am bound to suffer the same inconvenience, since I have but a few minutes left before the clock strikes two, the hour of crime, the fatal hour also for the present Government.

However that may be, could I make better use of these last minutes than by letting you listen here to the voice of citizens of the city of Quebec, of which I am one of the representatives?

A few weeks ago, the Boards of Trade addressed to the Government a memorandum containing important considerations upon the railways of Canada; several of the remarks have a direct bearing upon the question now before us.

This is the memorandum:

The Canadian Railway Companies
Quebec, June 21, 1917.

Proposed by Jos. Picard, Esq.,
Seconded by E. Harper Wade, Esq.,
And resolved

That, in view of the differing reports which have been recently made by the majority and minority members of the Royal Commission, appointed by the Government to study and report upon the railway system of Canada, and the best mode of overcoming the difficulties which have been created by the unfortunate duplication of railway in many districts, the Quebec Board of Trade is of opinion that it would be wise for the Government to carefully study the position again, before coming to any decision in favor of the adoption of either of the reports which have been submitted. That there are many reasons why it would not be advisable that the railway system of Canada or any very considerable part of it should be under Government ownership and management, which experience has proved to be not satisfactory in many respects; that the progress of the country would be better stimulated by the initiative developed by company management, and that the Government management of the mileage betweeen Halifax and Winnipeg, now operated by the Government should be sufficient to regulate rates so as to direct the western trade to Canadian seaports; and that it would seem wise for the Government to let the railways work out their own financial problems, and to concentrate its efforts upon the proper equipment of our seaports with steamship docks and grain storage, upon reducing marine insurance rates and thereby attracting vessels to our seaports upon building or causing to be built ocean steamers to carry the trade of Canada, and in this way making our railway system fulfil the objects for which it was created, and arrest the alarming diversion of our trade to United States seaports. And that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways and the city representatives in the Cabinet and Parliament.

True copy.

T. Levasseur,
Secretary.

I am glad to lay before the House these opinions of a distinguished body and I hope the Government will give them all the consideration their importance entitles them to.

And now, may I be allowed to make a few observations about the Canadian Northern. This measure is of a most serious character; the consequence will be for Canada to assume a debt of $500,000,000 to $600,000,000, besides $60,000,000, the price for the 600,000 shares of the company's capital stock, and not including, in fine, the Government's intention to take over this railway.

The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) moves an amendment to the effect that the administration should not take that step without the assent of Parliament.

It is Parliament's duty to so step in; a large number of business men have declared that this transaction might seriously affect Canada's credit abroad. It is the most gigantic undertaking that any Government of this country has ever contemplated.

But the Government refuse to accept this amendment; they want to settle the whole matter at their own will; they don't want Parliament's scrutinizing eye upon this game of chess.

However, they cannot get away from the fact that this whole affair will be earmarked in the Dominion's financial records under the name of "The Canadian Northern deal", that is to say a legerdemain trick, a juggling with the public funds.

Why do the Government refuse to assume the ownership conferred under the Act of 1914? The Prime Minister replied, yesterday, that it was to allow the proprietors to submit whatever claims they thought proper under the circumstances. At first sight, the proposition seems reasonable, but less so when we recall that the advances, made in 1914, were in full settlement of any possible claim on the part of those gentlemen, the day when, in order to secure itself, the country should take over that road.

On this point, Mr. Speaker, let me quote the sections of the Bill, such as I find them contained in a speech of the hon. member from Rouville, of August 15, pages 4739 and 4740 of Hansard (unrevised edition). Mr. Lemieux said:

What does section 21 of the statute say? It reads as follows.

The following shall be events of default within the meaning of this Act, viz.:

(a) If the Canadian Northern shall make default in payment of the principal or interest of the guaranteed securities or any part thereof, or default in observing or performing any of the provisions of the new Trust Deed and the security constituted by the new Trust Deed shall thereby become enforceable.

And a little further:

Therefore I say, according to section 21 of the Act passed in 1914, the company is in default, and if the company is in default foreclosure follows, by section 24. The marginal note of that section reads as follows:

Equity of redemption foreclosed on default and vested in His Majesty.

And section 24 itself reads:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may, on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

In view of such statements, these would be reservations, in the name of equity are empty statements, a red herring thrown across the track.

The Prime Minister, always to justify himself for not applying his enactment of 1914, says: It were better to leave the management and the operating of the road to the parties now in charge, in order not to create too much friction.

However, the results attained should have induced him to eliminate that very staff who have put that road into bankruptcy. They blame the war for it; but, there are other railways in Canada, and the war has not forced them into liquidation.

No, Mr. Speaker, the truth of it is that this enterprise, ever since it was started, seems to have been used more especially to enrich a few gentlemen at the expense of the public Treasury both of the Provinces and of the Dominion, and the present Act moreover shows that those men are impenitent and, so long as golden pieces shine within their reach, they will never be satisfied until they tinkle in their pockets.

Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, this Act should be condemned by this House, as it will certainly be condemned by the people when the latter are consulted.

The amendment moved by Mr. Pugsley was declared lost on the following division:

Mr. KYTE: I was paired with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel). I did not observe that he was in the Chamber. I desire my vote to be recorded in favour of the amendment.

Mr. WEICHEL: I was paired with the hon. member until ten thirty o'clock last evening.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is a precedent. The other day I was allowed to vote.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to ask the clerk if my vote has been counted in favour of the amendment.

Mr. CARVELL: Since I recorded my vote I have been notified by one of the whips that the member for York, New Brunswick (Mr. McLeod) considered himself paired with me. I had never heard of it, but in view of the possible misunderstanding, I should like to withdraw my vote if, under the rules, I may be allowed to do so.

Mr. EDWARDS: When I voted I understood that the member for Quebec, with whom I am paired, was in the Chamber. I understand he is not, and I would ask to have my vote withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the rules a vote once recorded cannot be withdrawn, but we have a happy coincidence to-night, as an error has been committed on each side of the House, so it comes out even.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I cannot vote because I was paired with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). Had I voted I would, of course, have voted for the amendment.

Mr. PROULX: I was paired with the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). If I had voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. ROBB: I was paired with the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT: I was paired with the hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. J. J. Hughes). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. LALOR: I was paired with the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Marcile). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Motion agreed to on the same division reversed, and Bill read the third time and passed.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 2.20 a.m. (Friday.)

Friday, August 31, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

VALOUR OF THE CANADIAN SOLDIERS AT LENS.

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE FROM SIR EDWARD KEMP AND REPLY OF GENERAL SIR ARTHUR CURRIE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, it may be of interest to the House to read a message from Sir Arthur Currie, General Officer Commanding the Canadian Corps in France, in reply to a message which I had sent to him on August 23. My message was:

Ottawa, August 23, 1917.

Lt.-Gen. Sir Arthur Currie,
Headquarters Canadian Corps,
France.

On behalf of all ranks of our military forces in Canada, I desire to extend to you and to the officers and men under your command warmest congratulations upon the splendid manner in which Canadian troops have conducted themselves during the fighting around Lens, in defeating the pick of the German army against heavy odds, and steadfastly holding gains made in the face of desperate and repeated counter-attacks. Canada is prouder than ever of her gallant sons who have so bravely and determinedly maintained her honour. We mourn with you the loss of many brave comrades.

Sir Edward Kemp.

I received this morning the following answer from General Sir Arthur Currie:

Sir Edward Kemp,
Minister of Militia,
Ottawa, Canada.

Your message of congratulation is sincerely appreciated by all ranks Canadian corps. Tell our comrades in the Canadian militia that in addition to winning and consolidating ground of great tactical value, we have inflicted casualties on the foe at least treble our own. In repeated and determined counter-attacks the flower of the German army was thrown against us, but our line remained unshaken as our own Rockies. Will not the pride which you say Canada has in her sons inspire her to send us men to take the place of those so nobly fallen.

Lt.-Gen. Sir Arthur Currie,
General Officer Commanding
Canadian Corps in France.

MILITARY VOTERS' ACT, 1917.

THIRD READING OF THE BILL.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Hon. Mr. Doherty (Minister of Justice) for the third reading of Bill No. 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I was not here when this Bill passed through the committee. Acting on suggestions from this side of the House, the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) made some amendments which I think are an improvement. At the same time there are wide opportunities still for irregularities by those who are inclined to be irregular. My experience has been that while men may be absolutely honest in business transactions, they sometimes look on things as, what they call, smart in political transactions which are not quite honest. I hope that those charged with the administration of this Bill will not take advantage of their opportunities to commit irregularities. I had hoped that the minister would at least have seen his way clear to have allowed the non-residents who are to vote an opportunity to elect one member at large for themselves which would give the n representation in the House. But, apparently he has not seen his way clear to do so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That could not be done without amending the British North America Act.

Mr. NESBITT: That Act could be amended, I have no doubt. It has been done before. We have the example of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. DOHERTY: They have power to amend their constitution; we have not.

Mr. NESBITT: That is exactly what I propose, and I do not see why we could not have that amendment made to the Act. But the minister will know whether that can be done or not. That presents one of the greatest opportunities for irregularity, and I had hoped that the provision would be so amended that there would not be any opportunity for wrong-doing. However, I suppose the Bill was fully discussed in the committee, and now it is open for the third reading and the confirmation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was suggested to me to-day that the oath taken by those who enlist in the Canadian forces might be regarded by aliens as equivalent to naturalization. I am not sure as to the nature of the oath taken by those attesting. It may be an oath of service to the King and probably is. I can quite understand how aliens might regard that as tantamount to naturalization. I suppose there are a great number of aliens in the army. I call the minister's attention to it so that he may give it some consideration with a view to providing some amendment, probably in the Senate. It might be well, in Form "B," to put a further question and to ask: "When and where were you naturalized if not born a British subject?"—or something like that. I have not given the matter much thought.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will be glad to think about it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

THIRD READING OF THE BILL.

House again in committee on Bill No. 53, respecting insurance—Sir Thomas White—resumed from August 4.—Mr. D. Stewart in the Chair.

On section 142 (b)—Accident and sickness insurance:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All the clauses of this Bill have been passed with the exception of 142 (b), which relates to conditions under which the business of accident and sickness insurance is to be carried on by companies obtaining a license under this Act. The section was held over until the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) should be present, and I would ask him to state to the committee the point in which he is particularly interested in connection with it.

Mr. MORPHY: The clause which I consider objectionable reads:

> (h) if the policy provides that written notice of injury must be given to the company within a specified period after the date of the accident causing such injury, such period shall be not less than thirty days.

At first sight that would appear to be in the interest of the person insured as giving him a longer time to give notice to the company; but my contention is that it is absolutely against the interest of the insured—that is the honest insured—and in favour of the man who has fraudulent intentions. I object also to the same clause under subsection 3 on page 55 which relates to casualties through illness. While it appears arbitrary, it must be noticed that there is this further clause applying to both of these clauses, that failure to give such notice within the specified time shall not invalidate the claim if it be shown that it was not reasonably possible to give notice within the time required. I contend that the experience of casualty companies must necessarily be the only safe guide for the House in determining on the safest and best legislation about matters of this kind. I contend that the natural result of legislation providing for a period of thirty days within which notice may be given in cases of accident, and forbidding the insertion of any other period in a policy, will be to open the door to fraud. Casualty companies are peculiarly susceptible to fraudulent practices by dishonest insuring persons, who at times profit by their dishonesty and also compel companies to charge higher rates to honest insurers, as they are compelled to pay these dishonest claims. In other words, every dishonest claim that goes through increases the cost to the honest person insured. The longer the period for notice of any accident the more opportunities are given for fraud. The honest insurer generally gives notice immediately; the dishonest insurer hides his illness and, under this clause in the Bill, the man who is injured so as to incapacitate him for ten days, sees on the face of his policy that he is not required to give notice until the end of thirty days. If he is dishonest, he nurses his illness after he is cured and gets thirty days indemnity where he is rightly entitled to one, two, three, or four days. That is an objectionable feature of this Bill.

I contend that my argument is in favour of both the company and the honest insuring person. We all know that in New York some few years ago there was a perfect plethora of dishonest transactions with insurance companies. It became a great abuse, and the trend of modern legislation, both on the other side of the line and here, is to shorten the period of notice rather than to lengthen it, in order to get at the fraudulent insurer. I contend that it is the duty of the Dominion of Canada, it is the duty of any state, to protect the honest insurer and to differentiate between him and the dishonest one. Under this Bill the period for giving notice of injury cannot be less than thirty days; it is imperative, and no company can insert anything else in its policy. In other words, notice may b given after the injury has long passed away, after the man is better, and it is quite apparent upon the face of it that this will give a great lever to the fraudulent man in putting in a claim to which he is not entitled. That must be computed by the insurance companies in dealing with such claims, and will therefore increase the cost to the honest insurer. The honest insurer has to pay the cost which the companies are put to in meeting dishonest or fraudulent claims.

The same argument applies to the illness clause. One of the largest companies in Canada in the accident and illness casualty business finds that out of 3,726 claims for accident made upon it from January 16 up to July 21 of this year, 2,583 claims, or 70 per cent of the total claims for disability, were for less than twenty days duration, and out of 5,074 claims for sickness, 3,476, or 60 per cent, were for disabilities of less than fifteen days duration. See the absurdity of inserting an arbitrary clause allowing thirty days in all those cases, where the duration was from twenty to fifteen days. The avenue for fraud is clearly opened up for every one of those cases to nurse the sickness or injury, for fifteen days in one case and ten in the other. I do not say that every case would be fraudulent, but I do say that the practice is vicious; it is not in line with modern legislation, and this Bill is wrong in every place where it lengthens the term of notice. If the minister differs—I do not know that he does; in fact I fancy from what I have seen that he rather inclines to my point of view—but I do think the superintendent of insurance does. I do not like to speak about an official of the Government but there are some men who are obsessed with theories and are oblivious of facts—and the minister might find a gentleman of that kind in his department. I point out that this particular company, whose name I do not put forward, paid, in 1916, to its policy holders in Canada. $103.948.

It paid 3,726 accident claims, involving $46,887, and 5,744 in sickness claims, involving $57,061. Considering for a moment the triviality of many of these claims, one can see the danger of fixing a minimum period of thirty days, and compelling the insurance companies to state in their own policies, if they give any notices at all, that they are compelled to fix that period of not less than thirty days within which notice of accident must be given. The main object in giving notice of an accident, as I understand, is to give the insurance company a chance to investigate a claim, to send a man upon the spot to see the insured person, and to ascertain the particulars of how, when and where the accident occurred, and I think it is proper that any insurance company should have that notice within a reasonable time. As a matter of fact, I think, generally, throughout Canada, the words used in the statutes are "a reasonable time." But in this Bill the Government is providing what I maintain to be an unreasonable time, in reference to the class of insurance which these particular clauses are intended to deal with. The lengthening of the period is an incentive and an invitation to fraud. It is as much as to say to the man who is slightly injured: "Come along, you are hurt, it is true, but do not tell the company for thirty days, although you are able to get around in three days." That part of it strikes me as very serious. Fraud hurts the company and hurts the insured. Fraudulent persons sometimes have been known, particularly in the large centres of the United States, to insure for the purpose of having an accident. Companies are up against it, and, as the companies are up against it, they put, in their schedule of rates, an allowance on account of fraud, and, naturally, the honest man taking out insurance has to pay the bill for the fraudulent one. In this case I say it hurts both the company and the man who is injured, if he is honest. The Government does not want to protect the fraudulent man who insures. To my mind the Government's duty is to consider the interests of the honest person who insures, and this provision is standing in the way here, and putting a penalty upon the honest person insuring, in favour of the fraudulent or dishonest man. The trend of modern legislation in matters of this kind is entirely opposite to the course pursued here. I have read the evidence taken before the Banking and Commerce Committee, through whose hands this Bill passed, and, while they discussed other important features of the Bill, there is not a scintilla of evidence upon the record which touches these clauses. I am told the reason the Bill is introduced in its present shape is that certain insurance companies wanted it that way; that it is a model Bill and a standard form. Yet no discussion took place about it in the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I invite the members of that committee to consider the question now. As I understand it, the trend of modern legislation is diametrically opposed to long terms within which notice must be given, and is equally favourable to the shortening of that term, in the interests of the insuring public. I would suggest to the minister that twenty days for accidents, and fifteen days for illness, would be fair, and yet to my mind it is too long.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is my hon. friend satisfied with the provision as to the notice regarding sickness? The notice in the Bill is fifteen days for sickness.

[Mr. Morphy.]

Mr. MORPHY: I think ten days would be sufficient. I think notice of twenty days for accidents and ten days for sickness would be about right. I would be satisfied with the sickness provision, because I can see that sickness will sometimes prevent a man from considering his ordinary business affairs in the same way as a man would who is free from illness. Accidents are notoriously public as a rule, and generally some one is looking after the man who has met with the accident. An accident brings with it the idea, have you any insurance, more than sickness does, and for that reason I would make a distinction between the two classes of cases, and would suggest twenty days' notice for accidents and ten days' notice for sickness. These are the periods which are fixed in the states of New York, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, South Dakota, Iowa, Texas, Montana, Oregon and Washington. The hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) will agree with me when I say that in metropolitan centres, such as New York and Chicago, and those large cities, they have had an experience which no city in this country ever had, and their dates have been fixed upon the basis of the experience of the companies in those cities. I have not the general rule in the States, beyond those states I have mentioned, but those states cover the main insuring states, and most populous cities. North Dakota is an exception, that state having a thirty-day provision in case of accident. I do not apprehend that the Minister of Finance would really rather follow North Dakota than New York or Illinois. It would be like following an amateur, instead of a professional, in the business. But even if he follows North Dakota he would not be long right, because three companies have withdrawn from North Dakota since that law was put in force, and three other companies operating there have threatened to withdraw, and the Commissioner of Insurance, W. C. Taylor, North Dakota, has recently acknowledged that the Bill is a mistake, and is asking for legislation reducing the time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have looked over the Bill, and I do not observe that there is any definition as to what shall be deemed to be notice. Would the hon. gentleman be willing, suppose the time were shortened, to treat the mailing of a letter as notice? Because there might be cases where the person resided a long distance from the office of the company, and it would be difficult to give them notice in the short time allowed. If the mailing of a letter were deemed to be notice, it would make it much easier.

Mr. MORPHY: I am under a different impression, but I think there is something in the Bill in regard to giving notice. As a matter of law I should think that the mailing of a letter is the giving of notice, no matter when it reaches the company, if the mailing of the letter can be proved. The law is that when a letter is put in the post office it becomes the property of the man to whom it is addressed, and I think that proof, by secondary evidence, that a letter was mailed, would cover the case, notwithstanding the want of a clause of that kind in the Bill. But, with all due deference, I should like to consider that question before I give an out-and-out opinion.

Mr. EDWARDS: The provision is in the next section.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) tells me that in the following section there is a term regarding the notice; but apart from the United States legislation, let us come nearer home. In the province of Ontario we have what is known as the Workmen's Compensation Act, the product of the mind of one of the most able and skilful members of the judiciary in the province. That Act was drafted after some two or three years' labour and study by Sir William Meredith, who so adorns the bench of that province.

Sir William Meredith made a special study of that Act. He examined all the compensation Acts adopted by other countries, and he worked out a form of legislation admitted by even the United States authorities to be the best, the most complete, and most comprehensive Compensation Act that can be found to-day upon the statute book of any country. Section 20 of that Act goes a good deal further than the provision that I ask for here. That section provides that compensation shall not be payable unless notice of the accident is given as soon as practicable after the happening of it, and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured. It will be observed that notice is to be given, not quickly, or within thirty days, but as soon as practicable after the accident. Of course, there is a saving clause in subsection 5 of section 20 to protect the honest insured for failure to give the prescribed notice, if the board is of opinion that the claim for compensation is a just one and ought to be allowed. That language, to my mind, is preferable to the language used in this Bill under section 142B, clause (1). The Workmen's Compensation Act is more drastic in shutting out entirely the claim which the board may deem to be dishonest, and putting an end to it at once on account of failure to give notice as provided in section 20.

To show further the trend of modern legislation, I point to section 99 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which reads as follows:

> Every employer shall within three days after the happening of accident to a workman in his employment notify the Board by registered post of the (a) happening of the accident and nature of it; (b) time of its occurrence; (c) name and address of the workman; (d) place where the accident happened; (e) name and address of the physician or surgeon, if any, by whom the workman was or is attended for the injury.

Why such care? Why such specific provision in point of time? Moreover, what happens if the employer does not give notice?

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. gentleman not realize that there is a great difference between the Workmen's Compensation Act and insurance against injury and accident?

Mr. MORPHY: If there is any difference, it is that in the one case the Government protects against fraud, and that in the other it does not. Why should not this Parliament protect the people who are paying premiums to these companies, just as they protect those who pay under the Workmen's Compensation Act? I cannot see why the Government should protect the people in one case and not in the other. This proposed legislation ought to come closer to the legislation respecting workmen's compensation, not go further away from it.

For every contravention of section 99, the employer shall incur a penalty of $50. The Act, therefore, is of a drastic nature; it compels the giving of notice quickly, so that the provincial Government may be enabled to look into the case. If that were the case here, the company affected could look into the matter in the same way, I think that the two Acts are on all fours; there is no distinguishing difference that I can see.

Mr. CARROLL: Would the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Act make any provision for the employer's giving the notice if the injured man was unable to do so?

Mr. MORPHY: It is definitely specified here: every employer shall within three days give such notice.

Mr. CARROLL: The employer gives notice if the man is so badly injured that he can not give it himself. But in some cases nobody may know that the injured person is insured; he may be so badly injured that he cannot give notice of the accident within the ten or fifteen days.

Mr. MORPHY: This Bill provides that if reasonable cause can be shown why notice was not given, failure to give notice shall not operate against the claim. The section that I have just read comes very close to the point; it should make the minister hesitate to disregard the trend of modern legislation.

There is an abstract argument which enters into this question. The whole body of the insuring public is affected by the morality of that body. The higher the moral standard, the cheaper the insurance; fraud is entirely eliminated if the morale is absolutely good. The shorter the term for notice, the less opportunity for fraud. The fewer fraudulent claims paid, the cheaper the insurance to the individual. Such provision should be made as would tend to elevate the moral standard and not give opportunity to persons of doubtful intentions to create a bad rather than a good moral atmosphere. I have referred to the fact that this Bill protects the honest insurer; it does seem to me that there should be some drastic method of shutting out the dishonest one.

The provinces have the right to legislate upon such questions as this. I should think that the minister would deem it desirable so to standardize this clause with which I have been dealing that it would cover the whole country. Quebec province has in its code a provision that reasonable notice shall be given in such cases. The provincial courts have decided that such reasonable notice means twenty days in the case of accident and fifteen days—perhaps not more than ten—in case of illness. In the United States the tendency is not to lengthen the notice; the trend of legislation is rather to shorten it.

I know a company in Canada that gives for $12, one dollar a month, $40 a month indemnity in case of accident. The other companies in Canada are charging $21 for the same thing. That company informs me that if this Bill goes through, they will have to increase their rates. I do not think the Superintendent of Insurance will deny that; if the minister asks him about it, he will admit it. Under these circumstances, how can the minister justify the increase of the rates against the honest insuring public that would result from the provision of the present Bill? I hope that the minister will consider carefully the suggestions that I have made; that he will be guided only by his own good judgment; that he will consider the advisability of amending the Bill—I am prepared to move an amendment if that is necessary—by so changing the clauses in question that the provisions for thirty and fifteen days' notice shall be changed to twenty and fifteen.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. member, I think, misreads the clause. I do not think it is necessary for a man to wait for thirty days before giving notice. He can give notice in thirty minutes, if he so desires.

Mr. MORPHY: Certainly.

Mr. NESBITT: But this clause prevents a company from shutting out his claim if notice is given within thirty days. Only the companies are affected by this clause, and if there had been any serious objection on their part to it, we would have heard about the matter while the Bill was before the Banking and Commerce Committee. The mere fact, therefore, that none of the companies made any objection to the clause at that time leads me to think that they do not object to it. I have had nearly twenty years of experience in connection with accident insurance, and I have represented and still represent some of the strongest companies doing business in Canada, but I have never had experience of a company shutting out a claim on account of notice not being given within the required time. I have sometimes seen notice given two or three months after an accident has occurred. It is just possible that a company might take advantage of that provision to shut out a claim, and I do not think they should be allowed to do so because a person does not give notice within thirty days, but this provision prevents them from shutting out a claim if notice is given within thirty days. That is simply for the protection of the insured. My hon. friend (Mr. Morphy) speaks of fraudulent insurers. No hon. member wants to endorse fraudulence in regard to insurance or any other matter. Many people who may have incurred apparently slight accidents, have later on been laid up owing to their injuries developing into something serious. Many of them may not give notice to the company, letting those slight accidents go by default. If they had to give notice within a short time, they might not do so, and the company might take advantage of notice not being given within the prescribed time. During my experience I have never known of any one trying to defraud a company to any extent. Sometimes, when a person has an accident, he may make claim for a few days more than those during which he has been laid up, but nearly all the companies issue policies that cover total disability and partial disability, so that there has, in my experience, never been any trouble in settling claims. Fraud may occur in the larger cities. I distinctly remember the case my hon. friend speaks about which happened in New York. The companies found that a sort of syndicate of fraud had been created there and they took measures to counteract it. In Canada I have never heard of anything of the kind, and we, of course, are legislating for Canada. I am sorry to hear my hon. friend rather censure the Superintendent of Insurance, because I believe, if there is a capable Civil Servant in Canada to-day, it is the Superintendent of Insurance. Not only does he know his business thoroughly, but he is absolutely upright and straightforward in regard to it. I could not, so far as my experience is concerned, speak too highly of him. The clause, as it stands, is all right, and it ought to pass in its present form.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The particular paragraph of which the hon. member complains is (h) of subclause 2 of section 142 B of the original Bill. I believe it is section 134 of the Bill as reprinted. The particular provision is this:

> If the policy provides that written notice of injury must be given to the company within a specified period after the date of the accident causing such injury, such period shall be not less than thirty days.

The intention of this was to protect the insured. I appreciate fully the point made by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), namely: That if the effect of this provision would be to cause frauds to such an extent that the rate of accident insurance would rise, it would, of course, not be in the interest of the public. Personally, I have not been of the view that that would be the result of the enactment of this proviso. It is to be borne in mind, in connection with this question of notice under a Dominion Insurance Act, that Canada is a very large country geographically. I can understand that, in the case of an accident insurance company doing business, say in the state of New York or in the state of Illinois or in any other state of the United States, it might be wise to provide for a shorter period of notice. But giving the matter my best consideration, I thought there was a distinction between the case of a company carrying on business in a state or a province and the case of a company carrying on business in so large a country as the Dominion of Canada. It takes a considerable time to give notice from one part of Canada to another portion which may be separated from it by two or three thousand miles, and although provision is made in this Bill for giving notice to an authorized agent of the company, all the public might not be aware of that, and most of them would naturally send their notice to the head office of the company. That is a feature that should be considered. I have an open mind upon the matter, and I would rather invite the opinions of hon. members. We do not want to make a mistake either way. I do not want a provision under which the public will be prejudiced through failing to send in their notices within too brief a time.

On the other hand we certainly do not desire legislation which will encourage fraud. With the permission of the committee, I shall read part of a memorandum I have received from the Superintendent of Insurance dealing with this matter:

> One of the clauses contained in the policy is to the effect that the insured shall have 30 days from the date of the accident within which to give notice thereof to the company. This provision conforms with what is the practice at the present time of a considerable number of companies licensed by the department. It may be pointed out that during the last few years there has been a tendency on the part of a number of the companies to increase the time within which notice may be given. Many of the older policies required "immediate notice". Those of a later date required 10 days, 14 days, 20 days, 21 days, and in recent years a number of companies have adopted 30 days. This tendency has been quite marked in practically all companies, and it is believed that the change is in the interests of the insured. The following companies have filed with the department policy forms containing provision for 30 days notice: Canada Accident Assurance Co., Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Co., Employers' Liability Assurance Corp., Globe Indemnity Co., Maryland Casualty Co., North American Accident Co., Yorkshire Insurance Co.
> The following will indicate the provision of the policies of all companies licensed by the department at the present time.

It is true, as stated by the hon. member for North Perth, that the courts in the province of Quebec have ruled that reasonable notice is twenty days. That ruling was given, I suppose, with reference to the Quebec law governing provincially incorporated companies, but it must be borne in mind that our Act is an Act for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the Quebec decision hold that 20 days is the proper construction of the statute, or that the elapse of 20 days would not be unreasonable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not quite positive, but I think it is a fact that the legislation of the province of Quebec requires reasonable notice to be given, and the courts have held that 20 days is a reasonable notice under that provision.

Mr. CARVELL: Did they hold that 20 days would not be unreasonable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I don't think so.

Mr. CARVELL: That's the point.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is to be borne in mind that while most of the companies carry on their business fairly and honourably, our legislation should nevertheless be such that it is not within the power of any company or companies to take undue advantage. Cases have been drawn to the attention of the department in which companies have sought to take advantage of the insured, not because there was any doubt as to the validity of the claim, but because notice had not been given within the time limit specified in the policy. I should like hon. gentlemen who have had some experience in this matter to give me the benefit of their views, because, as I stated before, I have an open mind on the subject. Our first duty, I think should be to protect the insurers, that is, the public.

4 p.m.

Mr. NESBITT: Is not that what we are doing in this clause?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is what I said, but the hon. member for North Perth makes this point, and it is worthy of consideration—he says that if the notice is so long as practically to invite fraudulent claims the companies, being subject to such fraudulent claims, will necessarily have to raise their rates, and in that way the public will suffer. It is pretty difficult to decide whether the difference of ten days, as between twenty and thirty, would make so much difference to the companies in the way of having to settle fraudulent claims that the rates would have to be raised.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would not "reasonable time" be the best expression of all?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That would leave it open. I think my right hon. friend will agree with me that if we can fix a time that is deemed to be reasonable it would be better to fix it, because otherwise the question of what was a reasonable time would depend upon the point of view of the court, and a man who had suffered an accident, and was insured against accidents, would not know in advance what the court would hold as a reasonable notice, and consequently he might be prejudiced. I do not think we should insert a provision that it should be a "reasonable notice." If this committee can come to a conclusion as to what is a reasonable notice with respect to the filing of claims arising out of accidents in a country such as Canada, I think we should insert that term in the Bill, so as to have it fixed and definite.

My hon. friend has touched upon one other point. He says that many of these companies are provincially incorporated, which is true, and that they might therefore be left to provincial legislation. It is to be pointed out, however, that we are about to license such of these companies as will submit themselves to the provisions of this Act, and take out a license from the superintendent of insurance, and it is open to us to provide, as a condition of their obtaining that license, and for the sake of uniformity in accident and sickness insurance in Canada, that they shall be subject to the provisions of this Act, including among others a limitation as to period of notice.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite agree with the Finance Minister as to what should be the intention of the Act. Personally, I think that thirty days is not an unreasonable limit. I appreciate that we can hardly decide what the law ought to be in respect of sickness and accident policies from our experience with life insurance policies. For a great many years I tried to get fire insurance legislation introduced into this Parliament, or at least, I tried to get the officers of the department to admit that we had jurisdiction enough to get the kind of law I wanted with regard to fire insurance policies; but I did not succeed. My experience with insurance companies has been that there was not sufficient time, or their regulations were so framed as to prejudice the insured on account of technicalities. My professional experience, of course, has been more largely concerned with fire insurance cases than life and accident cases. I remember that I lost the first case I ever had against a fire insurance company, because it was provided that proof of loss must be filed within fourteen days. In this case proof of loss was not filed until the seventeenth day, but the court held that I was right and I got a verdict, but I lost the case on appeal. I have had many other cases; some I have lost on that very ground, and in others I have had a very close call. Quite a number of years ago the legislature of Ontario adopted the standard clause, and practically all the other provinces have followed in providing that proof of loss shall be filed as early as can reasonably be done, or some words to that effect. The courts of the different provinces have held that in some cases thirty days was a reasonable time and they have even gone so far as to hold that sixty days was not unreasonable. I had a case within the last ten years in which our own courts held that fifty-nine days was reasonable under the circumstances. I would not want to see this time limited. I do not know that I would advocate extending it beyond thirty days because there is a difference of principle between fire insurance companies and accident companies. If a building is destroyed by fire it is destroyed so that if damage is done it is there and it can be seen at one time as well as another; whereas, in the case of an accident company, it is quite possible that a man may receive an accident and within thirty days the man would have recovered and the insurance company would have no opportunity of examination. I presume that is the point that the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) has raised. I think it would be a mistake to limit this time to a period under thirty days. Any man ought to have at least thirty days in which to give notice. There are not many cases of fraud and there are few cases in which companies wish to contest claims. They are surrounded by sufficient protection. The claimant must prove his case on some reasonable evidence. He cannot go into court, and say: I was sick, or I was injured, or laid up, for two or three weeks. He has to produce some kind of proof. He may have to produce medical proof. I do not say that he necessarily must do all that, but in the ordinary course of business in proving a case in court, we have to give evidence of some kind. Therefore, I do not think a delay of thirty days would prejudice the case or that the company would not be in a position to protect itself. I take it to be the principal object of giving notice that it puts the company in a position to make an investigation if it chooses to do so. If I were going to err at all, I would want to err in favour of the insured. Cases of fraud are very few and what is proposed by the hon. gentleman, I am afraid, would militate against the insured in order to protect a company against a possible case of fraud. I think the clause as it now stands is reasonable.

Mr. CARROLL: I think the minister is correct in stating that a time limit of at least thirty days is in favour of the insurer. On the other hand, if what the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) says is correct, his suggestions are both in favour of the insured as well as the insurance companies. If the insurance companies have to raise their rates on account of fraud being practised under this particular section, the persons getting insurance would have to pay an increased premium. But we have the statement of the Minister of Finance that the insurance companies themselves are the best judges of whether an increased time limit for giving notice will tend to fraud and thus force them to increase their permiums. The fact that there are seven companies, licensed under the Dominion Insurance Act, who have, of their own volition, limited the time within which notice was to be given to thirty days, and one to three months, is some evidence that these insurance companies do not share the opinion of the hon. member for North Perth. As regards the ground taken by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) that perhaps there should be no time limit—

Mr. CARVELL: I did not say that.

Mr. CARROLL: That reasonable notice should be given—

Mr. CARVELL: I did not say that; I said that thirty days was reasonable.

Mr. CARROLL: With regard to the provincial statutes, which have these words "within a reasonable time" in them, if my hon. friend from North Perth looks at the Supreme Court reports for the province of Quebec, he will find, in the case he mentioned in which the judges decided that twenty days was a reasonable notice, and the decision was based on the circumstances surrounding that particular case. He will find a case from that province in which it was held that 78 days was a reasonable time because the insured was not in a position before the 78th day to give notice to the company. So that I do not think that this Quebec case is going to carry you very far. Each particular case is based on the circumstances by which it is surrounded. I do not think that thirty days is a sufficient time. There have been many cases in which the public have been defrauded and not the company. I think that even if this legislation only provided for twenty days the public would still be protected because the next paragraph says that,

> Failure to give such notice within the time provided in the policy shall not invalidate the claim if it shall be shown that it was not reasonably possible to give such notice within such time, and that notice was given as soon as was reasonably possible.

Therefore, I do not think it makes much difference whether it is twenty or thirty days.

Does the minister not think I am right in that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is right in stating that the policy would not be invalidated even if the notice was given beyond the thirty days provided it would be shown that it was not reasonably possible to give such notice within such time. But it would be a question of fact as to whether it was reasonably possible or not. It is difficult to say just how the court would construe that.

Mr. NESBITT: That would be a case of dispute.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: I cannot see that the provision as to thirty days is going to breed fraud in connection with this matter. If I thought so I would be one of the last persons who would uphold the section, but I cannot see it in view of the action of these accident companies themselves in allowing the extended time. As the section stands it suits me all right.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. NICKLE: My hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) has directed attention to the fact that there was not much discussion on these subsections when the Bill was before the Banking and Commerce Committee. My recollection is that upon the day that these subsections were under discussion I was the acting chairman. I think the reason there was so little discussion was that the representatives of the accident insurance companies who were present and taking an active part in the discussion in reference to the other sections were agreed that thirty days was a fair compromise as between the insured and the insurer as to the time within which notice should be given of accident, and that fifteen days was a fair time within which notice should be given of sickness. I think the committee approached the subject in the light that insurance was for the benefit of the insured and not primarily for the benefit of the company, and that regulations should not be of such drastic character that by too rigid advantage being taken of the time limit the companies might escape liability. They also regarded the subject from the point of view that the giving of the notice after recovery from them did not deprive a company of the opportunity of making inquiry and of satisfying itself as to the extent of the injury. If I understand it, the company always has a right to demand that proof be given of an injury suffered, or of the duration of an illness, or the time when a man was laid up as the result of an accident. It may demand proof from the members of the family; it may demand proof of those who saw the accident, and it may require that the evidence of the medical practitioner who was in attendance be given as to the extent of the injury.

Looking at it from the practical standpoint, cases have come under my notice of men receiving what they thought were trifling injuries which subsequently developed into something very much more serious. But on presenting their claims to the company, they were put out of court and the claims not recognized as notice had not been given within the time provided.

I think the object of this committee should be to hold a balance fairly between the company and the insured, and reviewing all the facts as they have been advanced by various members this afternoon, I do not think much injury will be done to the insurance companies by leaving the terms thirty days and fifteen days, and I certainly think there are cases in which it will be honestly to the advantage of the insured.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) says that his mind is made up by the figures given by the Finance Minister. Those figures were that twelve companies had expressed a preference for a period of notice running from fourteen to twenty-one days; three had filed a preference for fourteen to fifteen days; five of twenty days and two of twenty-one days. There were only seven companies in favour of a requirement of 30 days' notice as against twelve who favoured a notice of twenty-one, twenty, fifteen or fourteen days.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carroll) spoke of the necessity of giving proof. There is no danger that the man who goes out to be fraudulent will not have his proofs ready. That was well shown in the New York frauds. They even went out to have the accident made; they had the motor car burned, they had the witnesses all on hand —some of them strangers whom they had never seen before. Everything was in complete order. The proof will always be ready when the fraudulent man undertakes to deceive; he is in it for the business. It is all right to say that we have not much fraud of this kind in this country; but if the hon. members ask the companies they will find that there is any amount of it, especially in the larger centres, and the companies do complain, and I think with great cause.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the evil complained of, as in the automobile case, be remedied by having a shorter period of notice?

Mr. MORPHY: The fraud would not be perpetrated so easily. With the longer term, opportunity is given to prepare the evidence and get everything shipshape.

As to the suggestion of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) about holding the balance evenly, there is only one way to hold it and that is to do a good turn to the company by lessening existing fraud, which will enable the company to give insurance to the public at a cheaper price and at the same time protect the honest insurer from the payments out by the company to fraudulent claimants. It is easily seen that every fraudulent claim paid out increases the cost of insurance to the honest insurer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This matter appears to have been considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee, and as the consensus of opinion here appears to be in favour of the proviso as it stands, I do not feel that I would be justified in suggesting any change.

Amendments agreed to, section as amended agreed to.

On the schedule.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I may say to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that the superintendent of insurance has gone most carefully into the checking of all references and cross references. We believe that the Bill now is accurate in respect of the numbering and references and other matters so essential in a Bill of this kind. The Bill and schedule have been reprinted, and the sections renumbered.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the minister any information as to whether or not the New York Life Insurance Company has a federal charter?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: The reason I ask is that I find they have been holding up a lot of insurance on soldiers killed at the front, and I want to take the matter up. I do not know whether it has been brought to the attention of the department or not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the hon. member has a special interest in this matter, he had better speak to the Superintendent of Insurance. I think there is a regulation which covers the case.

Bill as amended reported. Amendments concurred in, and Bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply. Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Trade and Commerce—Salaries, rents, wages and contingencies, under Canada Grain Act. Further amount required, $75,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is the additional amount required for the administration of the Canada Grain Act. It is largely required because of the increases that have been made on account of the existing increased cost of living to the employees of the eastern and western division of the grain inspection staff, as recommended by the chief inspector and approved by the Board of Grain Commissioners; also to provide for such increases in the staff, as may be recommended by the chief inspector and approved by the board, to take effect on the first of September, 1917. This is really the explanation of the vote. It will be recollected that the total number of employees in the whole system east and west is a little over 400, and, distributed amongst those, these increases amount to about $60,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the present expenditure for salaries to-day of those 400 employees?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The total expenditure last year for salaries was $433,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is increased by $75,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We gave a ten per cent war bonus, and we have increased some of the salaries a small amount.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is proposing to increase the salaries of gentlemen who are administering the Canada Grain Act, and he is proposing to do this by reason of the high cost of living. I understand these very gentlemen who are administering the Grain Act would have it in their power, if they exercised proper judgment, and the Government gave them the proper authority, to reduce the price of foodstuffs, by reducing the price of grain, which is the essential element which regulates the cost of flour and the cost of bread; and such a reduction would be very beneficial to the masses of the people of this country. We have had the expectation held out to us that, by reason of the appointment of a food controller, there would likely be a reduction in the cost of living. We know that the price of flour is very high indeed, and one of the excuses put forward for these high prices is that the cost of grain to the millers is very high, and speculators, middlemen or dealers in grain are receiving large profits by reason of the high price charged to the millers. Has any reduction been made in the cost of living as a result of the appointment of the food controller?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Only a short time has elapsed since the appointment of the food controller, and a period of preliminary examination is, of course, necessary. My hon. friend's question, therefore, is a difficult one to answer. We have deemed it necessary to make a reasonable advance to the workers in all the departments of the Civil Service, inside and outside on account of the increased cost of food staples, rents, and things of that kind, owing to the war.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There has been no increase in rents; on the contrary, there has been a decrease.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will compare the rents of this year with those of three or four years ago, I think he will find that there has been an increase.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They are less to-dav than they were three years ago.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend chooses to dispute that point. However, there is a general conclusion that the cost of living has very materially increased, and on that account we have made increases in all branches of the service, inside and outside. My hon. friend thinks that the persons employed in this large branch of my department have the matter in their own hands; that they can bring down the prices if they choose, and that, therefore, it is not necessary to increase their salaries. As a matter of fact, the workers under the Grain Act have no such power. The Board of Grain Supervisors—an entirely different body from the Board of Grain Commissioners, who administer this Act—have the power of fixing the price of wheat. That is their only power; they have nothing whatever to do with the administration of the Grain Act. They temporarily fixed the price of wheat at $2.40, first as a maximum, and for the latter half of the month as a flat price. The United States authorities have within the last twenty-four hours fixed the price of grain for the year's crop in that country at $2.20 for No. 1 Northern spring wheat. There is a marked difference between the price of $2.20 for that grade of wheat, with accompanying prices for lower and higher grades, and the price last year, and the year before. There is no possibility or probability, so far as I can see, of prices being decreased during the coming year. So that circumstances over which the food controller and the workers under the Grain Act have no control combine to make the cost of living high, and it is to compensate for that that we have made provision in this vote for a reasonable increase to the officials and workers in this branch of my department. My hon. friend asks whether as a result of the appointment of the Food Controller, reductions, in the prices of foodstuffs have taken place. As a general rule, I think that decreases have probably taken place, having regard to the prices that would have prevailed if there had been no food controller. But we must recollect that the two or three weeks' work of the food controller have been almost entirely preliminary work. The fixing of the prices of food in a country like ours or in the United States is a task of very great magnitude; very careful and prolonged investigation is required before prices can be fixed with the assurance that they are based on the best information that can be obtained. So that it is a little too early to look for specific reductions in the cost of food owing to the fixing of prices. But the work is under way, and I hope that from time to time, as the Food Controller covers the various fields here and as the same fields are covered in the United States, reasonable reduction of prices shall be obtained.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In view of the fact that the war has been on for three years and that the cost of living has gone up steadily month by month, the minister ought to be able to make to the committee a more encouraging statement than that which he has just made. Instead of taking official measures to control and to keep within reasonable bounds the cost of living, the minister, knowing that that increase in the cost of living bears hardly upon certain officials in his department, proposes to increase their salaries. The Government does not seem to be able to devise means to give relief to the general people of Canada —the masses of the people, who are not in the employ of the Government, and who are ekeing out an existence as best they can in the face of very great difficulties. I have received many letters from people who ordinarily can get along very well. They complain of the meatless days; they complain of their being obliged to eat bread without butter, to go without potatoes, to pawn their clothes in order to secure the necessaries of life. Those are not exceptional cases; they are numerous throughout the country. Perhaps my right hon. friend does not hear of them. If he will go amongst the poorer people of this country, he will find that what I have stated is true. Yet the Government of the day, with all its power, knowing as it does that prices are exceptionally, unreasonably and unnecessarily high, is not able to give any positive statement that there will be a substantial reduction. The most that the minister is able to say is that possibly, if it had not been for the appointment of a food controller, prices would have been higher than they are to-day.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Where does this state of affairs exist—in the imagination of the hon. member or in Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It exists, as a matter of fact, in Canada.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I can tell my hon. friend that it does not exist in Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the hon. member thinks it does not exist, then he does not know the condition of affairs.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Produce the letters.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: From what portion of Canada has the hon. member received the letters?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have received some from the city of Ottawa. I have received quite a number from New Brunswick. I have received many from people who are not known to me, who state facts which have impressed me very much. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) the other day read an extract from a newspaper, stating that the millers are making a profit of $5 per barrel on flour.

Mr. BRADBURY: That is nonsense.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member was informed by the Government that an inquiry would be made and that information would be given to the House on the subject. We have not so far been favoured with that information, but we know, taking the present price of wheat, that the present price of flour to the consumer must give to the miller a profit beyond all reason. If this Government had any regard for the interest of the consuming masses of the country they would take effective steps to control and to reduce the cost of flour to the people of Canada. There are two ways in which the cost of living can be kept down. I throw aside the question of the increase in rents suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce because it is within my knowledge that, in many of the cities in Canada, rents to-day are very much lower than they were three years ago. It is the cost of food which makes the cost of living high. The two ways in which that can be reduced are, first, by controlling the cost to the consumer and, secondly, by increasing the production. We have over and over again urged in this House that the Government should encourage our farmers to get farming implements of the most modern type and capable of the greatest production. It has been urged by speeches.

and by resolutions which have been moved, that the duty on farm tractors should be taken off. Gentlemen of very high intelligence in the Senate have brought the matter up, and the Government have been urged to act. There is an opportunity to utilize to very great advantage, not only in eastern but in western Canada, farm tractors of the cheaper sort with which large tracts of land could be brought under the plough and made capable of producing in the coming year, if the farmers could get those tractors at a reasonable price. But the duty which the farmers have to pay is kept up—I think it is 32½ per cent—and this Government is giving no encouragement whatever to increase production. They are appealing to the farmers to increase the production of wheat and potatoes, but upon every implement of a modern character which is required for the production of potatoes, there is a very high, almost a prohibitive duty, and the same is true with regard to farm tractors. I will make a last appeal—I presume this is the last opportunity I shall have of doing so during this session—to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the Minister of Finance to take this matter into immediate consideration and, by Order in Council, to place farm tractors and implements necessary for the production of potatoes upon the free list in order to give every possible encouragement to the farmers to increase production. This is a most important matter, and I believe, if the duty were taken off farm tractors, the result would be that many hundreds, I am inclined to think many thousands of those tractors would be brought into Canada in the near future, so that during the present season, before the winter sets in, there would be a large increase in the land which would be ploughed up and made ready for increased production in the coming year. Is it hopeless for us to appeal to the Government to take an intelligent view of the situation and to act without delay?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I do not think the hon. gentleman is taken more seriously outside than he is inside this House when he makes a statement as wild as the one he has made about poverty stalking through the country and people being utterly unable to obtain work. I will place alongside of his wild statement the fact that in the Toronto Telegram there are seven columns of advertisements for "help wanted" of all kinds, aggregating in round figures 500 vacant positions, and the people will judge for themselves about want of employment in Canada. Let us look at some of the positions which are vacant. There are wanted mechanics of all kinds, railway help, bakers, electricians, first class machinists, men in shipping departments, ordinary labourers, young men with fair education, pile drivers, chartered accountants, returned and discharged soldiers only to register for all classes of work in the city, some one to take charge of large offices, chauffeurs, drivers of motor trucks. There are almost innumerable vacant positions in the city of Toronto. There is an almost interminable list of female help wanted. Against that goes the bald statement of the hon. member that no person can get work in the country. In the Toronto Globe I find column after column of advertisements offering employment. I live in a town in which you cannot secure a man for an odd day's work for less than $3 a day, and that state of affairs prevails throughout Ontario. The hon. member cannot get any one on his own side to support the statement he has made.

Mr. WRIGHT: The statement has been spread broadcast throughout this Dominion by a man engaged in the grain business around Port Arthur—and it is largely quoted in the press of this country and by hon. members in this House—that the millers of this country are making very large profits and that the public are being bled accordingly. I have made just a small tabulation with regard to this matter. Those who are acquainted with the milling business know that in the eastern provinces it takes about five bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour.

You might sometimes make a barrel of flour out of four and a half bushels of the very finest grade of wheat grown in the Northwest, but as a rule four and three-quarter bushels of wheat are required to make a barrel of flour. Figuring that out at $2.40 a bushel, which is the price that has prevailed in Winnipeg for a very considerable time, we get $11.40. Out of the four and three-quarters bushels of wheat, the miller would probably get $1.50 worth of bran and middlings; that is figuring bran and shorts at 2 cents per pound almost, and it would not average that to-day. But we will suppose that the bran and middlings are worth $1.50; that leaves $9.90 as the net cost of a barrel of flour at Winnipeg. To that must be added the price for milling the wheat, the freight from Winnipeg, or Port Arthur, to the various centres from which the flour is distributed, the wholesaler's price—the wholesaler generally buys by the carload—the retailer's price, the bags for the flour, the cartage charges from the retailer to his customers and from the station to the retailers. All these things add to the price, and when a man makes the statement that millers in this country are making $5 a barrel out of the flour they make, he is making an absolutely ridiculous statement, which ought not to carry any weight, and which certainly does not carry any weight, with those who have the slightest knowledge of this business. A man who makes a statement of that kind either does not know what he is talking about, or he makes the statement for the deliberate purpose o misleading the consumers of this country. I have no objection to a man spreading his opinions on the pages of Hansard and publishing them broadcast throughout the press of this country so long as he gives the actual facts and knows what he is talking about. If the millers are getting too much the people of the country should be told.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. WRIGHT: My hon. friend denied me the courtesy of asking a question a few days ago, but I will be more courteous to him than he was to me.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the hon. gentleman must be mistaken. I do not remember the occasion; it must have been some years ago. The hon. gentleman says he has knowledge of these things, and I will not dispute that. What in his judgment would be a fair price for flour to-day?

Mr. WRIGHT: His question would be more intelligible if he would indicate the grade of flour.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The best grade of flour.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not think that flour can be retailed much cheaper than it is to-day, if the millers are to have a reasonable profit. I do not say but what the price might be reduced a little, but it depends altogether on the grade of wheat the millers are grinding. For instance, anybody conversant with the business knows that No. 1 Northern is not the same quality from year to year. The millers and the grain dealers get together every year and arrange what shall be the standard, based on the average quality of that year's crop. So it is somewhat difficult to answer my hon. friend's question. The point I was making was that the assertion that the millers are making $5 a barrel is so utterly outrageous that nobody ought to thoughtlessly spread it broadcast throughout this country. The statement is so absolutely untrue and unreasonable that I thought it was time somebody got up and denied it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does the hon. gentleman say the millers are making?

Mr. WRIGHT: A good deal will depend upon the miller's ability to finance; whether he can buy in a large stock at some particular time to last him through the season, or whether he has to buy from day to day; whether he can conduct his business prudently and with economy, and some men can conduct their business much more economically than others. All these things have to be taken into account, and consequently, it is very difficult to state what would be a reasonable profit.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is desirous of correcting a wrong impression with regard to the profits made by millers. The profits made by millers naturally depend upon the price they pay for the wheat and the price they get for the flour, and I presume the statement to which my hon. friend objects was based upon a comparison between certain prices paid for 5 p.m. wheat and certain prices received for flour.

I made a little calculation while I was listening to him, and so far from finding that the statement to which he objects was incorrect, I find it is capable of being very seriously accentuated. A large part of the wheat of last year's crop in the West was bought at $1.25 a bushel.

Mr. WRIGHT: What grade?

Mr. OLIVER: On a basis of No. 1 Northern. I do not say it was all bought at that price, but a large part of it was bought at that price. My hon. friend knows as well as anybody else that they bought that wheat, ground it into flour, and sold part of it on a basis of wheat at $3 a bushel. That gives a profit, not of $5, but $8.75 a barrel, and my hon. friend cannot figure it out any less, on his own calculation, so long as the multiplication table stands. It was on the comparison between the price received by the farmer for his wheat and the price received by the miller for his flour that I presume the statement to which my hon. friend objects, was made. There is no manner of doubt that it was absolutely correct if it is taken in the proper sense, but if it is assumed that what was meant was that the miller makes $5 a barrel on every barrel of flour he sells that would be an absurd statement, and I do not think anybody ever made it.

My hon. friend estimated the price of bran and middlings at two cents a pound. Now two cents a pound is what the farmer received for his whole wheat, as regards a great deal of last year's crop. So on my hon. friend's own showing, the miller is getting for the waste product the same price per pound that he paid for the wheat out of which the waste product comes. I think it will be admitted that that is the basis of a very profitable transaction in which the miller is not losing any money.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. gentleman has had to take refuge behind an imaginary condition. He pictures the miller buying his whole year's supply of wheat at some favourable time. Now, there are very few millers in Canada who can afford to do that, and the miller who bought wheat at $1.25 must certainly have bought it a long time ago. I do not know any who have bought wheat at that price this year.

Mr. OLIVER: Last September and October.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does my hon. friend think that the millers, taken as a whole, could buy enough wheat last September to last them for a whole year, and would take the chances of the price of wheat going down as well as up? Any man engaged in ordinary business figures out his profit on the basis of cost at the time he buys the article. Supposing wheat goes down 75 cents a bushel, where will this miller be? He will be out that much.

Mr. KNOWLES: He will hold up the price of flour.

Mr. WRIGHT: The only reasonable way to figure this is to figure the cost of wheat and the cost of the flour after the wheat is ground. As to the price of bran, I admit that I possibly overstated it. I figured it at $40 a ton. It is not worth that, even including the freight.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the hon. gentleman is entitled to more credit than he takes to himself.

Mr. WRIGHT: My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), not very long ago, was urging this Government to do something to cheapen flour. He asked: Why do you not commandeer wheat as you did last year?

Mr. OLIVER: No, I did not.

Mr. WRIGHT: He made the statement that wheat was practically all out of the hands of the farmers. He said that it was in the hands of the grain dealers, and that they were the friends of the Government. It was not very long after that, when the Government fixed the price of the balance of the crop, that the hon. gentleman was heard from again. According to him, the grain had, in some miraculous manner, got back into the hands of the farmer. He said the farmer was suffering because he was only getting $2.40 a bushel for his wheat, and he tried to suggest to the farmer of the West that he was being prejudicially affected. After stating that the grain was all out of the hands of the farmer and that the man who was profiting was the grain dealer—who is his friend, I presume—he was very anxious to convey the impression that it was the farmers who were suffering. The farmers of the West have to eat flour just the same as anybody else, and if setting the price of wheat at $2.40 a bushel was a proper thing to do in the interest of the consumers of the East it was a proper thing to do in the interest of the consumers of the West. Some of the farmers of the West are taking the position of speculators in wheat. They are going into buying on margin just the same as other classes in the West. I do not think we ought to shed very many briny tears over the losses of the farmer who can get $2.40 or $3 a bushel for his wheat and does not take it. If, in July or August, there is a fixed price and if he is still holding wheat for which he could have got nearly $3 before that, I do not think he suffers to any very great extent if he has to take $2.40. The consumers of Canada, as a result of this fixed price of $2.40 per bushel, are getting their flour a great deal cheaper than they otherwise would have at this time. We know that elevator men and big grain dealers all over the country, who had bought wheat with the expectation that they would get a large price at the close of the season, were disappointed and no doubt they were making a pretty heavy squeal. I take it for granted that the criticism did not come from the ordinary grain grower of the West who was confining his energies and enterprise to the growing and selling of wheat. A grain producer in the West, who is going into speculation and buying on margin, and who supposes that he can compete with the big grain merchants, must take what comes to him, the same as other speculators, if he chooses to go into that line of business. I want to refer again to the point that I mentioned at the outset of my remarks.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not understand what the hon. gentleman means by "other speculators." Other speculators were not interfered with in the least by the Government. For example, Sir Joseph Flavelle was not interfered with. There was no price limit fixed for his bacon, beyond which he could not go. Therefore, I do not understand what my hon. friend means by saying that the farmer should take the same chance as other speculators because other speculators are not interfered with.

Mr. WRIGHT: Other speculators are interfered with to a great extent.

Mr. KNOWLES: How?

Mr. WRIGHT: I was dealing with the question of wheat and I am quite prepared to go into the other question at any time the hon. gentleman suggests. But, I want to deal with one thing at a time.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought the hon. gentleman was dealing with other questions as well.

Mr. WRIGHT: No. It is said by the hon. member for Edmonton that the farmers only got $2.40 a bushel for their wheat when they expected to get $3. My answer to that is that the Government acted in the interest of the consuming public and that the people were saved probably millions of dollars through this action. Yet the hon. member for Edmonton would condemn that action and he points out that, because of it, wheat was dearer, in Minneapolis than it was in Winnipeg. The Minneapolis buyers were depending on getting their little surplus of No. 1 hard wheat at a particular time in the season and they expected that they would get what they needed from the Northwest. That supply was suddenly cut off. We know that there are certain times in the year when grain dealers themselves are needing grain, when some are on the short side of the market, when they have to get a little more to fill an order, and we also know that everybody is buying very close when it comes down to the end of the season. It will all depend on whether wheat is scarce or not whether it does or does not go up abnormally. The man who is in the business has to take his chance and the price may go up or down. Under ordinary conditions nobody can tell what, at a particular time in the future, is going to happen with regard to the price of wheat. But we know that the conditions are not ordinary and the probability as to what will be required is a matter of judgment on the part of the buyer. Those who had the necessary money and credit bought ahead. No doubt those who bought wheat made some money, but that fact is not a ground for objection to the price. We must take the price as we find it, offset it by the charges and arrive at a decision as to what would be a proper profit to take on a barrel of flour or any other commodity. I submit that that is the proper way of going about it. When the statement is sent broadcast that because a man bought something a year ago and it happened to go up abnormally, he is to be condemned for his acumen in looking to the future and judging how things would be. I say that such a statement has no basis in reason. He had to take his chance of the price going down as well as of its going up. It is only an ordinary principle of business that the man who uses his best judgment in regard to these things is going to get a little extra profit; but if he makes a loss he bears it as well as he may. It is an unreasonable thing to take the price of flour now and the price of wheat a year ago and put one against the other. The thing is so utterly absurd and unfair that I wonder at anybody taking that ground in this House.

Mr. DOUGLAS: My hon. friend appears to have forgotten that this country is at war. When he makes the statement that flour is sold on the basis of the price of wheat, he overlooks the fact that the millers' trust is one of the most nefarious trusts in the world.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the millers' trust? Is the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) one of them?

Mr. KNOWLES: Suppose he is, what has that to do with it?

Mr. DOUGLAS: The Lake of the Woods Milling company, the Ogilvie Milling company, the Maple Leaf Milling company and the Robin Hood Milling company practically control the output of flour to the consumer. The small miller buying on the market from day to day to supply his mill cannot compete in the price of flour. The statement made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is absolutely correct, inasmuch as the bulk of the wheat for milling purposes was bought last fall at a price ranging from $1.25 to $1.60 per bushel. The Ogilvy and the Lake of the Woods companies have elevators all through western Canada, and they purchase grain at these elevators for the purpose of producing flour and taking advantage of every rise in the market. If these were normal times, no exception could be taken to the attitude of the millers, but we must remember that this country is at war; that the submarine campaign being conducted by the Germans is accounting for a part of our supply of grain, and when you argue from ordinary business ethics in connection with a product such as flour, which is essential to human life, I think the argument is absolutely without foundation and cannot be substantiated.

Mr. WRIGHT: The statement has been made that the miller is making $5 per barrel on flour. I take exception to that statement. I do not believe it is true, and I do not think any gentleman who inquires of any miller in this country will get a reply that will warrant him in making such a statement.

As to the statement of the hon. member for Edmonton that the bulk of the wheat for milling was bought last September, I want more than the hon. gentleman's unconfirmed word. I do not think there is money enough in all the milling companies to buy sufficient wheat to keep all the mills of Canada running for twelve months. That would be an enormous amount. No doubt they would buy as they could, but I venture to say that somebody has been buying wheat from that time until to-day. Who was buying it? The milling companies. No doubt they are buying wheat to-day and have been buying it every business day since last September. They are buying it to grind it into flour, and it is being ground into flour.

Mr. OLIVER: I think my friend has thoroughly established the truth of the statement that there was a profit on flour to the miller up to $5 a barrel.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. gentleman says so; I certainly did not.

Mr. OLIVER: His argument substantiates that fact, and if there is any doubt about it, he can find that $5 a barrel right in the dividends of the milling companies. He could find it last year, and I am satisfied he will find it this year because, if they made a killing last year, they made a double killing this year.

I do not think that the hon. gentleman is right in quoting me as objecting to the Government fixing a price for wheat. My memory is that I was anxious to know if a price had been fixed for flour. Whether I said so or not in connection with the price of wheat, I think it would have been only fair that, when a maximum price was fixed for wheat, a maximum price should also have been fixed for flour. That is the position I took, and that is the position I still take.

I plead guilty to having asked the minister questions in regard to the difference in price between Winnipeg and Minneapolis, and I have no apology to make for having asked them. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) will recall a very lengthy lettergram which he received from an association in Calgary, who were certainly in very close touch with the farmers, because they are entirely an association of farmers, in regard to this very matter. I did not find fault with the Government for having fixed a maximum price for wheat. Recognizing war conditions, I am of the opinion that speculation should, so far as possible, be cut out; that is to say, that no man should be allowed to take advantage of the needs of the country by reason of his special position of advantage in regard to money or anything else, and that it is perfectly right that, under war conditions, there should be a fixed maximum price for wheat. The question is, what is a fair price? It is not the business of the Government, in fixing a maximum price for wheat, to put that maximum below what is fair according to the world demand and the world price. I agree to the fixing of price as a means of cutting out speculation, of cutting out the obtaining of an undue profit by individuals or associations by reason of the exercise of what my friend speaks of as their best judgment in taking advantage of the situation. That, I quite agree, should be cut out; but I do not agree that it is any part of the business of our Government or our country to fix a price below what is fair according to the market prices of the world

Mr. WRIGHT: Does my hon. friend suggest that $2.40 is too low, that it should have been fixed higher?

Mr. OLIVER: As matters turned out, I say so, certainly. That was the point I had in mind, that when we found that, for almost one whole month, the price in the United States was anywhere from five cents to fifty cents a bushel higher than it was on the Canadian side and it was necessary to impose a prohibition on the export of grain to the United States—I say that was evidence to my mind that the price had been fixed lower than it should have been, and I think it was perfectly legitimate on my part to call attention to that fact. I cannot agree to the principle that the price of wheat to the farmer should be fixed simply at the whim of the Government or of the Board of Grain Supervisors or of anybody else. It should be fixed on the basis of the fair world's price at that time and from time to time.

Mr. WRIGHT: It was fixed, as I understand, at the price which prevailed at that time.

Mr. OLIVER: I could not say anything about that. There is no doubt that the holders of grain in the prairie West lost, as a result of the fixation of price by the minister, a matter of not less than $3,000,000 in cold cash in the month of August. My judgment is that this country cannot afford to lose money in that way, that it is not right that we should be put in that position, and that the judgment upon which the minister fixed the price was not well founded. That is my criticism, and I think it is a perfectly legitimate criticism. I have further been anxious to know what is to be the future course. We know that grain goes down in price as the supply comes in, and while $2.40 was the price fixed until the end of August, we are anxious to know what the price is going to be in September, if the same policy of a fixed price is to prevail.

It is understood that the United States has fixed the price for September at $2.20 a bushel. I am not altogether familiar with the matter, but my impression is that that is somewhat above the price at which September options have been sold. However, we are anxious to know what our Government is going to do, and what the fixed price in Canada is to be. I take it that the Government must now have reached some decision. This is the last day of the fixed price of $2.40 a bushel, and we are anxious to know what the price is going to be for September, or if there is going to be a fixed price, and whether it is going to be a minimum as well as a maximum price.

Mr. LALOR: Did the hon. gentleman make a statement in the House this session that the price of $2 per bushel was perfectly satisfactory to the farmer?

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, no, I never presumed to say what the farmers would be willing to take, but I was discussing some negotiations that were in progress between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and certain representatives of the farmers last fall when it was suggested, on the one hand, to fix the price at $1.30, and the farmers' representatives, as I understood, were willing so far as their influence could go, to close the transaction at $1.72. That is my recollection of the circumstances.

Mr. LALOR: I think, in answer to a question by myself, the hon. minister said the farmers of the West were perfectly satisfied, if they received $2.

Mr. WRIGHT: My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) is trying to get away from the contradictory positions which he has assumed in this House in the last few weeks. He took the ground that this Government was refusing to take action in setting a fixed price for wheat, stating positively that the farmers of the West had practically got rid of all their wheat, and were no longer interested in the price.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT: He said it was in the hands of the big concerns. He immediately turns around and seizes the opportunity of bringing a little political grist to his mill, and he appears to think that the farmers of the West got that wheat back again in some miraculous way, that they were interested, to a very serious extent, in the action taken by the Government in setting a fixed price, and that they lost a large sum of money, I think he said $3,000,000. Did the farmers lose that?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. WRIGHT: Or was it the grain dealer?

Mr. OLIVER: I said that in large measure it was the grain dealers, and that the grain was largely out of the farmers' hands. At the same time, any farmers who held grain would suffer the loss just the same.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I was listening, and I understood the statement of the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) to be as alleged by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor). I am quite sure he said—whether he meant it or not—that the farmers of the West had lost $3,000,000 by the fixation of the price at $2.40.

Mr. OLIVER: I would ask to have the statement corrected, because my memory is as I have stated. I may have said that the farmers had lost it, but I corrected that statement, and said it was largely the grain dealers, because the grain was largely out of the farmers' hands, but it was $3,000,000 lost to the business of the West, and we could not afford to lose that money in that way.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is so solicitous for the grain dealers that he would like to see them get $3 for the grain they held for speculative purposes, rather than $2.40, which would result in mulcting all the consumers in Canada in the increased cost of flour.

Mr. OLIVER: I hold no brief for the grain dealer, but I think he is entitled to the same consideration as any other business man. He is entitled to a fair profit on his business transactions, and to the money his property is worth, just the same as anybody else. My contention was that the board of grain supervisors fixed the price below what turned out to be the price of the world's demand, and to that extent we were losers, and the action was not well judged. With reference to the consumers of flour, until my hon. friend takes action to fix the price of flour, based on the price that he fixed for the wheat, he cannot say that the price of flour to the consumer is fixed by the price of wheat. It is fixed by the combine of the millers, not by the price of the wheat.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I do not know about that $3,000,000. The hon. gentleman will have to have some means of knowing the amount of wheat that was sold during August, and I am not in a position to contradict what he says, or to question his statement that $3,000,000 were lost, but I have extreme doubt as to whether any such amount was lost. After considerable agitation by some of us—not all on one side of the House—we got free wheat. Wheat went over to the United States. Whatever that market may be worth, we got it anyway, and the Government saw fit to give us free wheat. After the United States became our ally by going into this war, it was up to this Government to see that the same price was fixed on this side as they were getting on the other side. Further than that, the Government had no right to fix the price of wheat without fixing the price of flour. There is nothing coming to the millers of this country. If there is any class of men in Canada that has done the farmer, and done the people of the country, it is the miller. I do not refer to the small miller, but to the large millers of this country. They have been absolutely soulless, in my opinion. If I had anything to do with the Government, I would see that the millers were brought to time, and I say that when the Government permits wheat to go to the United States free, they should not permit flour to go to that country.

Mr. KNOWLES: The discussion which has been going on might be continued indefinitely, but probably there is no time to go into it further. It seems to have now more or less closed itself. It is fortunate that one of our hon. friend's own brethren on the other side finally gave the quietus to this argument. I thought the hon. gentleman from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) was a little severe on the Government, now that the war is on, when he said in such bold language, that the Government failed to do its duty. It would have smacked very much of disloyalty if an hon. gentleman on this side of the House were to make such a remark about the good Tory Government guiding the affairs of this country, but there is such a preponderance of truth in what the hon. gentleman from Souris says that we will have to agree with the statement he makes, namely, that the Government failed to do its duty when it left that great loophole. It put a maximum price which this millers' trust had to pay for the wheat, the very most it can be called upon to pay, and it leaves the price the millers could demand for their flour without any limit whatever, and the Government forbids the export of our wheat to the United States to the south of us, and we presume deliberately and designedly, because this Government is supposed to be a gathering of very intelligent and clever statesmen. Therefore, designedly and deliberately, they give to the flour manufacturer the opportunity of selling his flour at the very highest price.

It cannot be argued that they were trying to protect the consumer; if they were trying to protect the consumer they would think of what the consumer would have to pay. But they did not give any consideration to what the consumer would have to pay; they put a maximum upon what their friends the millers would have to pay. It is a sad commentary upon almost the first step taken by the Government with a view to controlling prices that they should put a maximum upon what the farmer should get for his wheat, but enact no legislation, make no regulation, in respect of what the poor consumer would have to pay. This is so much in line with the chief characteristic of the legislation of this Government—benefits to privileged classes—that I am forced to the belief that the member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) is quite justified in the more or less savage attack that he has just made upon the Government.

With respect to this item of $75,000 for salaries, rents, wages and contingencies under the Canada Grain Act, I may point out that while we may be willing to give the last man and the last dollar for this war, I do not think that we can spare $200,000 extra for the Grain Commission unless some good reason is given for our doing so. I do not speak with finality in the matter, because the Government may be able to give some good reason for bringing down this vote. The reason may have been given in my absence; I have not heard it. To me this increase is a surprising one: Last year the vote was about $600,000, so that the increase, roughly speaking, amounts to 33⅓ per cent.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did give a brief explanation of this item; my hon. friend was not here. The additional amount of $75,000 is to give the 400 odd employees of this branch of my department a reasonable increase of salary. Every department of Government has given similar increases, which have been voted by the House on the ground that the cost of living has gone up and that such increases are, therefore, justified.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the increase in the expenditure under this item amount to 33⅓ per cent in one year, as I figured it?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The expenditure for 1915-16 was $659,000, and for 1916-17, $874,000. The main vote was $850,000. This amount of $75,000 added to the $850,000 makes a total of $925,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: In two or three years, then, the expenditure has gone up 33⅓ per cent?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. If my hon. friend will go over the list of employees and their salaries, I think he will not come to the conclusion that they are extravagantly paid. The permanent officers are employed upon a fixed salary basis; they come in at a minimum and receive a yearly increase until a certain maximum is attained. That calls for a certain increase each year, and the increase for this year forms part of this vote. In addition, this year we have granted increases, not very high in any case, for the reasons which I have stated; and for that reasonable increase the remainder of the $75,000 is in most part required.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not offer unfavourable criticism of my hon. friend's administration of the Grain Act. I believe in giving credit where credit is due; I think that the minister has kept the administration of the Grain Act, as I have observed it, fairly free from cheap party politics, especially in respect of the personnel of the staff of the commission.

During this session I introduced a Bill providing that the employees of Government elevators should have the same status as employees in any similar industry. The persons employed, say, by the Ogilvie people in their elevators have the advantages of the privileges and benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Injuries are not infrequent in these different elevators; they have occurred in Moosejaw and Saskatoon, as my right hon. friend is aware. Simply because the elevators to which I refer are under the control of the Crown, the employee does not receive the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act. An employee in His Majesty's elevator, therefore, is in a less desirable position than an employee in an ordinary commercial elevator. That is not a desirable condition of affairs. The purpose of the Bill which I proposed—which, of course, will not be reached again this session—was that the Government should put itself in the same position with regard to claims made upon it under the Workmen's Compensation Act or otherwise as that in which any other employer—such as the Robin Hood mills, the Ogilvie Elevator, or the Lake of the Woods Elevator—finds himself under similar circumstances. It is undesirable that His Majesty's employees should be less favourably treated than employees of these other commercial institutions. A year ago or more the Government was paying an accident insurance company for carrying the risk of damages which these men might claim because of injuries received. I am informed that the Government paid the same premiums as were paid by any of the companies carrying on private enterprises of a similar character. If that be so; if the Government evades the risk—so far as workmen's compensation involves a risk—then the accident insurance company had a gold mine. Any one who is acquainted with the amount of damages paid by employers to employees, especially in Saskatchewan, knows that a substantially large part of them are paid because of the statutory compulsion involved in the Workmen's Compensation Act. The Ocean Accident & Guarantee Insurance Company was being paid for carrying that risk, the same as if they were insuring the employees of the Ogilvie elevator or of any other commercial institution. But they were not carrying the risk, because His Majesty was not liable to the Workmen's Compensation Act—a provincial statue. There was an anomaly; the people's money was being paid out for carrying a risk which was not being carried, and of which the employees in the Government elevators were not in any way the beneficiaries. The employees in Government elevators should surely be as well treated as the employees of any ordinary corporation employing men for similar purposes.

In my Bill I asked that employees in Government elevators might have permission to sue in the ordinary courts, the same as was granted by a special amendment to the law in connection with the employees of the Intercolonial. I once acted for a man who had to bring his case to the Exchequer Court at Ottawa. He had to have the claim printed, and, for a poor workman in circumstances like that he was put to great expense and trouble. That is an added handicap and disability under which His Majesty's employees are.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: On the main estimates, I was prepared to take up questions with reference to everything involved therein, but on these supplementary estimates, I find that I have not my papers which I had at the time the main estimates were going through. It is, of course, impossible for me to carry all these things in mind, and I am not in a position to discuss that question. My impressions of it are something like this, and we do not insure our employees.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not now. You certainly did a year ago.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: About two years ago I think they were under the Employers' Liability Insurance and we did not insure them. We, however, discontinued that, because it is not the policy of the Government in any of the departments to insure their employees. Therefore, whatever may have been the case two or three years ago, the condition of things now is that we are not paying insurance companies for carrying risks on employees. We have established the Exchequer Court, and the raison d'etre of its establishment was that it should be a court that would be peculiarly fitted to take up all cases of claims against the Government on the part of its employees for damages or for any thing else. It is considered that that is the best policy to be pursued by a Government, You have a court which is specially instituted for that purpose and you have the rules of procedure thereof which are stated and uniform and not subject to provincial differences as would be the case if actions were brought under different provincial laws. The Department of Justice, to which I referred the matter, was very strongly of that opinion, and I receded from the position I had taken at first that we should put a general insurance policy over employees in Government elevators the same as is done in the case of employees in ordinary elevators. What is the reason we preferred to keep that policy which certainly has its advantage in the way of clearness and economy?

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister did not speak to the question as to whether it would not be better to put our employees in at least as good a position as employees of the Ogilvie Elevator company in connection with the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have thouands of employees throughout the Dominion and they have always been placed upon a uniform basis; the Government have never been accused of dealing harshly with reference to claims for compensation which have arisen.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Department of Justice contests the case very keenly when the claimants go to litigation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You have to contest the cases pretty keenly, but where you have a deserving case, the Government always recognizes it, as the votes from year to year show.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there still hope that a sample market may be opened at Moosejaw? Some years ago, when the Canada Grain Act was going through Parliament, I urged very strongly that a sample market be placed at Moosejaw, and I gave reasons which I thought were good. Moosejaw is the railway centre of the country north and west, and is directly connected by rail with Minneapolis where there is a special opportunity for the sale of wheat through a sample market. Although I am a Moosejaw man, I think, on the merits of the case, that there is more ground for having a sample market at Moosejaw than at any other place. It is so situated that the wheat would "funnel" right through it to Minneapolis.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend very rightly brings forward the claims of Moosejaw, but there are others in the Northwest who bring forward the claims of other towns with equal strength. Sample markets have been put on at two points: Fort William and Winnipeg. It is not intended to open sample markets at any other points in the West this year. As things develop, it is quite probable that other points will from time to time be chosen. Wherever you have a sample market, you have to make certain provisions for sampling and inspection which involve demands upon labour and interference, to a certain extent, with transport. This year, on account of the scarcity of labour and the inadequacy of transport, we would not be justified in opening up additional sample markets. In establishing the sample market, we have not made either Winnipeg or Fort William an order point to the extent of necessitating an overlay of twenty-four or forty-eight hours. That has not been done, because to do it would have made an interference with transport this year which we did not feel, under the circumstances, it was proper for us to make.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister kindly make a short statement as to what special authority constitutes a sample market?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A sample market, as my hon. friend knows, is a market in which buyers and sellers congregate and make their bargains with each other for the purchase of wheat upon the inspection of the sample of the car which is to be sold. In the first place, you must have samples taken west of the point in which the sample market is established.

Mr. OLIVER: I am aware of the conditions of the sample market. What I wanted to know was what regulations or what changes of authority had been made in order to constitute a market.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Act itself gives the authority for the constitution of the sample market. My hon. friend will find the provision in section 57 of the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. KNOWLES: The places are named in the Act.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. On that authority the Grain Board acts, and the points are named at which sample markets may be established. More or less time is given for deciding upon the routing and destination points, and for the examination of the samples. The Government has no responsibility for the sample market, so far as the carrying on of its operations is concerned, and simply designates the order points, so to speak. The two points that have been designated so far are Fort William and Winnipeg.

Mr. OLIVER: The authority is the authority of the Board of Grain Commismissioners.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The basic authority is the Act. The Grain Commissioners make their recommendation, and by Order in Council the sample market is established. Then the Board of Grain Commissioners make rules and regulations which are embodied in an Order in Council. I am quite willing to lay on the Table the Orders in Council that have been passed, for the information of my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the Board of Grain Supervisors been appointed for the duration of the war?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No stated period was mentioned in the Order of Council appointing them, which simply confers upon them certain powers which they are to exercise so long as the Order in Council remains in effect. The Order of Council can, of course, be eliminated by the same authority that called it into existence.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under the War Measures Act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: The operation of the Order in Council would automatically cease with the ending of the war?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, or before.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there any connection between the Board of Grain Supervisors and the Grain Board?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. They are entirely separate.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there a separate item for the expenses of the Board of Grain Supervisors?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As the board has been created on account of the war, its expenses are paid out of the War Appropriation fund.

Mr. OLIVER: I was under the impression that the Grain Supervisors are not salaried.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: None of them are salaried. There is a paid secretary, but the supervisors receive simply their expenses.

Mr. OLIVER: How big a staff is employed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I know of no staff that has been appointed, except the secretary and his stenographer.

Mr. OLIVER: Do they not receive any allowance for the time they spend on this work? One of the members I know is from Alberta. Any members of the board who live outside of Winnipeg would be put to considerable expense in attending the meetings.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are quite willing to give their services as a contribution to the war.

Mr. OLIVER: There is this other point. If men of not unlimited means are serving without remuneration, it is just possible that there may not be quite the same readiness to respond to the needs of the service as if they were being paid by the country. I am not speaking on behalf of any one, but the idea occurred to me just at the moment.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think there is a great deal to be said on the other side. These gentlemen were quite willing to give their services. If my hon. friend has followed the course of events in the United States, he must have observed that nine-tenths of the men on the great committees, composed of men of all sorts and conditions and representing a great many interests and activities, are giving their services as a contribution to the nation. That is a splendid illustration of the public spirit of the people of the United States. Their territory covers a great area, and these different committees have often to be summoned to Washington. They get their expenses, I imagine, but outside of that their services are voluntary.

Mr. OLIVER: I asked a question of the minister in regard to the proposed action of the Board of Grain Supervisors fixing the price of grain from August 1.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Board of Grain Supervisors have been considering that question. In the action they had to take covering the month of August, the board were at a disadvantage, and our Food Controller has been at a disadvantage also in fixing the prices of different commodities, especially flour. Although there is close correlation between the United States and Canada, the United States had no authority to act, and that meant that for a period of one month—the month that has just passed —we had either to do nothing but wait until the United States had received authority for the fixing of prices and had acted upon it, or do the best we could in fixing prices for that intervening month. But now that legislation has been passed authorizing the authorities in the United States to act, our Board of Grain Supervisors and our Food Controller are on more solid ground, and action may be expected from the Food Controller which could not have been taken with the expectation of good results, until co-operation with the United States had been provided for.

My hon. friend and some others have spoken of the foolishness and injustice of putting a maximum price on grain and not putting a maximum price on flour. If things were normal it would be inconsistent to fix the price of one and not of the other, but there was no certain knowledge of what conditions would be at the end of this intervening month, and we could not very well fix a price for flour made of grain that had been bought in the undetermined period. But now that the period is determined, now that the fixation of price in Canada will be for a period, as it is in the United States, the price of flour will be fixed having regard to the price of wheat.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the minister wish to get this item passed this afternoon?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I should like to. I shall be glad to give any information regarding this matter on any other item in the estimates.

Mr. OLIVER: I just wish to make this statement, so that I shall not be caught in cross-fire by my hon. friend from Muskoka in the future. In any fixing of the price of grain in Canada, now that the price is being fixed in the United States, I claim that there should always be recognition of the difference in value in grades of the same name as between Canadian and United States grain.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend understands that from the 11th of August the new system of grading has been in effect in the United States.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Militia and Defence—To provide for an increase in salary to the Assistant Deputy Minister to $4,000, $150; to provide for an increase in salary to the Director of Contracts to $4,000, $150; to provide for an increase in salary to the Assistant Director of Contracts to $2,800, $200; to provide for a clerkship in First Division, Subdivision A, for R. P. Brown, in lieu of one in First Division, Subdivision B, $2,800; to provide for four clerkships in Second Division, Subdivision B, at $1,300, $5,200—$8,500.

Mr. OLIVER: Are these statutory increases?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is no increase in the last two items. These officers are put into another class but at the same salary. There are increases in the first three items of $150 to the deputy minister, $150 to the director of contracts and $200 to the assistant director of contracts. The only way in which these officers could get increases was by putting the amounts in the Estimates.

Mr. OLIVER: I thought there was provision for statutory increases to all officials of the inside service. Are these outside of the statutory increases?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is the reason these slight increases are put in the Estimates, —they are over and above the statutory increases?

Mr. OLIVER: Have these officers received their statutory increases?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, they would be entitled to them; but $100 is all that the statutory increase amounts to. These officials have done very laborious and faithful work since the war began and it was thought, in the interest of the service, that we should give them some slight recognition in this way.

Militia and Defence—to cover expenditure by party of officers of the Canadian militia attending British, French and Swiss army manœuvres in 1913, as per detailed statement, Auditor General's Report, 1913-14, p. 65, $24,620.33.

Mr. OLIVER: This seems to me a rather remarkable item. Would the minister give an explanation of it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: This is a formal matter more than anything else. The Auditor General asked that the item should be put in the Estimates because he thought it was not legal unless it was voted. The expenditure occurred in 1913-14. In that year and in the years following it was thoroughly discussed in the House.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the money been paid?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Supposing the House did not pass the item, what would happen? Would the fabric of the constitution dissolve?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It would be rather an unfortunate situation, but the Auditor General would not consent to its going forward until it was passed. It is not an extraordinary item in any sense. Money appropriated for this purpose was spent for many years under the administration of Sir Frederick Borden.

Mr. OLIVER: When was the money paid?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The money must have been advanced at the time. These items for years had been paid out of the vote for "annual drill." That has been the custom, I know, since this Administration came into power, and it was the custom under the previous Administration. Now, the Auditor General has insisted that the amount shall be included in the Estimates.

Mr. KYTE: If it is not an unusual item, why has it been held up by the Auditor General?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Auditor General addressed a letter to the deputy minister in which he said:

I would suggest that an item be placed in the Supplementary Estimates as directed by the Treasury Board, and also additional sum of $3,194.13 to cover the account for motor hire. Until this is done I shall have to refuse to pass certificate for the payment.

Mr. KYTE: Is that the final determination, I assume that there must have been a good deal of correspondence leading up to it between the Auditor General and the officials of the Militia Department.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is only one letter on record from the Auditor General, an extract from which I have read. The treasury board asks that it be intimated to the Auditor General that an item will be placed in the Estimates. This has been discussed in the House time and again, and I thought it was all over and done with. It occurred before the war.

Mr. KYTE: Why has this vote not passed Parliament long ago if, as the minister says, it is not an unusual item and similar expenditures were incurred by Sir Frederick Borden in the past? There must be some difference between the conditions under which this expenditure was incurred and the cases referred to by the minister.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The only explanation I can give is that the Auditor General only brought it up on July 23, 1917.

Mr. KYTE: The fact that the expenditure was incurred in 1913 and was only proposed to be voted now, proves that there must have been a great deal of trouble in relation to the payment of the item.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The only question raised by the Auditor General is that it has been a payment out of the vote to which I referred—"annual drill." The Auditor General referred it to the Treasury Board for a ruling and the Treasury Board orderd that it be placed in the Supplementary Estimates, to make it regular.

Mr. KYTE: The money voted by Parliament for annual drill could not have in contemplation this large amount for an entirely different purpose.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is part of the training for an officer, and has been taken out of the vote for "annual drill" for many years past.

Mr. OLIVER: How does the amount of this item compare with the amounts in previous years?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The pay of each of the officers is the same, but more officers went on this trip.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the bulk sum, say, in 1911 or 1912?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I find that the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), speaking in this House on May 7, 1914, said:

> Annually, for a number of years, my predecessor sent military officers to the old land. In 1907-8, seven officers and six non-commissioned officers were sent. They cost the country $26,772, or two and a half ordinary good town drill halls. In 1908-9, my predecessor sent six officers and six non-commissioned officers. Mark you, these were all of the permanent force and these moneys were voted by this Parliament, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition being then Prime Minister, supported by hon. gentlemen opposite. For these six officers and six non-commissioned officers the cost in 1908-9 was $32,601, or three drill halls and a half.

So that, after all, the sum is not exorbitant compared with the amounts paid in 1908 and 1909 for a similar purpose.

Mr. OLIVER: With all due respect to my hon. friend's predecessor, I would prefer to take the accounts of the department as given by the minister rather than the ex-minister's statement.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am satisfied my predecessor was speaking by the book in giving these items.

Mr. KYTE: Would the minister give a list of officers and the total entourage, and their expenses on the tour?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The statement is as follows:

Aug., 1913, Secy. of State, passports	$ 56.00
Sept., 1913, High Commissioner's Expenditures:
Col. J. Lyons-Biggar, advance travelling expenses manœuvres, 1913	299.99

Wolseley Tool & Motor Co., motor hire, officers attending manœuvres	6,904.00
Total	$ 19,936.85

Mr. KYTE: That is not the total amount, the total was $24,620.33.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The total amount is made up as follows:

Pay of 16 officers of the Active Militia	$ 3,984.00
Subsistence 16 officers of the Active Militia Subsistence 5 officers of the Permt. Militia	8,399.87
Estimated steamship passages 17 officers	3,330.00

Incidental expenses disbursed by Col. Biggar	129.46
Subsistence and travelling expenses two private secretaries and two orderlies	588.00
	$24,620.33

Mr. KYTE: One of the items is for the pay of officers while attending the manœuvres. Were these officers not in the employ of the Militia Department?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, they were in the Militia Force, but not on the permanent staff. There were about twenty militia officers who were not on the pay roll.

Mr. KYTE: Is there any report in the Department of Militia as to the result of manœuvres that were performed?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have no doubt that there will be a report in the department in connection with this trip. I think the country has benefited greatly by the visit of these officers in Europe. They would be able to learn a good deal about warfare in the continental armies, a great advantage which they would not have if they had never made this trip. Some of these officers have been engaged actively at the front ,and some have been killed.

Mr. KYTE: One of the advantages is the valuable suggestion Miss McAdam received while attending these manœuvres, which resulted in a shovel being patented by the Militia Department, and a considerable expenditure of money involved in it. Is there any item of the minister's own expenses there, apart from the expenses of the other officers?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There would be no details in respect of the minister's travelling expenses.

Mr. NESBITT: That would be charged to the general expenses of the militia, would it not?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is an item for contingencies, and I presume it would come under that, but there is no account of these travelling expenses. It is not a very large item.

Mr. KYTE: Would the minister be able to say what use was made of the large quantity of shovels which were purchased from the Midvale Steel Company, and sent across with the first contingent of the Canadian troops that went overseas in 1914?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am informed that the shovels to which the hon. member refers were sent to the Old Country. Whether they were sent to the front I am not prepared to say.

Mr. KYTE: Does the hon. minister know whether any use was made of them or not?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I could not possibly answer that question.

Mr. KYTE: This being rather an unusual item, and as there is a desire on the part of a great many members of this House to get full particulars, I think it would be well to let the item stand over till further information has been obtained.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The expenditure has been discussed in the House almost every year since it was made, and the total amount expended is not in excess of amounts spent by previous ministers. Under those circumstances, I hardly think it fair that the item should stand over. I have read what the ex-minister stated in regard to the amounts spent formerly, which were larger than the item before us.

Mr. KYTE: The item has been discussed in a general way from time to time, but, inasmuch as the vote of Parliament was not asked to defray the expenses incurred on this trip, the public would not have so much interest in it. But now that Parliament is asked to pass the vote I think that further discussion is very desirable. With all deference, I do not think the hon. minister has given a full explanation of the reasons why this item should be delayed for four years without Parliament being asked to make the vote. I think a good deal of correspondence must have passed between the Auditor General and the Department of Militia and Defence, and I think some further explanation should be made as to why the item has been held over and an attempt made to get it through Parliament at the present time. It is more particularly desirable to hold the item over because the hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) who, when minister, incurred the expenditure is not now a member of the Government and not now in his seat. If he were here he would probably be in a position to give information which the hon. the Minister of Militia is not able to give this evening. I think it is very desirable that we should obtain more information, and, obtain it, if possible, from the ex-Minister of Militia himself.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Hansard is full of explanations in regard to this particular matter. Question after question has been asked, and the item has been in the Estimates year in and year out.

Mr. KYTE: No estimate for this item.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The ex-Minister of Militia has made an explanation in regard to it, and I think the hon. gentleman is raising more serious objection now than previously. The matter has been threshed out in the House, the Estimates have been passed each year, and questions have been asked. Questions were asked on February 16, 1914, and the matter has been the subject of many discussions, but no protest so severe in its character as the one my hon. friend now makes was ever made.

Mr. KYTE: We would like to know what was the exact expenditure incurred by the predecessor of the ex-Minister of Militia. The hon. minister has not that information. He has read a statement made in the House by the ex-Minister of Militia. While I am not questioning that explanation, I think that under the circumstances he should have the exact amounts from the Militia Department to compare with the expenditure incurred in 1914 for this particular service.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is nothing new about this matter. As I read a few moments ago, the expenditure in 1907-8 of a similar character was $26,772.

Mr. OLIVER: Is that for the two years?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is for the fiscal year 1907-8. In 1908-9 the expenditure was $32,601.

Mr. KYTE: It is quite possible the last item given by the hon. minister in 1907-8 includes items other than those included in the item we are asked to vote this evening. In order that a proper comparison may be made between this expenditure and the expenditure by Sir Frederick Borden for this service, we should know absolutely whether the items correspond or not.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not know, I am sure, that the items would absolutely correspond. I am satisfied these officers were just as economical in the expenditure of money as the officers were on any previous trips. I think my hon. friend should permit the item to pass, because the money has been spent, and the item has passed the Treasury Board and has been placed in the Estimates. Moreover, the matter has been up every year since the occasion referred to. The pages of Hansard have been filled with the discussion of it, but no such severe criticism was made as has been made tonight.

Mr. KYTE: The fact that the pages of Hansard were covered with discussion of this item from year to year since 1913 goes to show that there was something extraordinary about it. If the item were the same as, or similar to the one placed in the Estimates by the late Sir Frederick Borden, Hansard would not be filled with criticism of the expenditure; there would not be repeated inquiries for information. The reason given by the minister for allowing the item to pass is a reason why it should not pass until we have more detailed information.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister has stated that certain military advantages were obtained by the presence of the officers at these manoeuvres in Switzerland in 1913. That may be correct, but certain disadvantages resulted from this expedition. The ex-Minister of Militia stated that it was at these manoeuvres that Miss McAdam conceived the idea of the shovel. This brought upon the country an expenditure of some $40,000, and, so far as we can learn, no advantage, military or otherwise, ever resulted. What became of these shovels is not very clear; the minister himself does not seem to know. That is another reason why the item should stand until the minister obtains further information.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: This item has nothing to do with the shovels.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The ex-minister stated that the shovel idea was the result of these manoeuvres; the two matters, therefore are very closely connected. It would be advisable to get all the information possible in connection with this matter, because quite a number of people are interested in it. There is considerable mystery about it, and this item should stand until it is cleared up.

Mr. NESBITT: I have not seen any item in the Estimates providing for an increase in the pay of the soldiers. The conscription Bill is now in force, and there is no doubt that the pay received by soldiers is not in any sense equal to the pay of labourers employed in this country at the present time. When I spoke on the conscription Bill I expressed the opinion that the pay of the men should be increased. I know that many of the men are anxious to get an increase of pay; it need not be given them while they are in France or in England; it would be desirable that they have something more coming to them when they return to this country. I know that this would mean increasing the cost of the war, but it is an added expenditure that the public would be very willing to meet. I am quite sure that there would be no objection on the part of the people if the men were paid at least fifty cents a day more than they are getting now. The average labourer throughout the country is getting from $2.50 to $3 a day. Although the price of munitions has been very materially cut down, I understand that in some of the munition factories the men are earning from $3 to $8 a day. The last time I was home I heard about a man who was getting $8 a day. Ordinary mechanics in factories get a great deal more in proportion than the men who are asked to risk their lives for our country. I appreciate the fact that the men do not go for the purpose of drawing pay; they enlist for the purpose of defending their country. At the same time, there is no reason why the country that they are defending should not pay them more than they are getting now. I hope that the minister will take this matter into consideration, and that if he does decide to increase the pay, he will make the provision retroactive in respect of those men who have enlisted since the outbreak of war. The result would be that they would get a good start when they came back to Canada—it would not be necessary to pay the money to them while they are in Europe—and they would not be depending upon the public for assistance. They do get three months' pay when they are discharged, but that is not anything in proportion to what they could save if their pay was increased at least fifty cents a day.

Mr. CROTHERS: Would my hon. friend have every soldier paid the same salary that he was receiving when he enlisted?

Mr. NESBITT: No.

Mr. CROTHERS: Why not?

Mr. NESBITT: I would have every soldier paid the same amount.

Mr. CROTHERS: That would not be fair; some men might have been earning more before they enlisted.

Mr. NESBITT: That would be perfectly fair. It does not matter what the men were earning before they enlisted; after they join the colours they are all in the same service.

Mr. CROTHERS: It is just as fair now as it would be that way.

Mr. NESBITT: I think not. The men are being paid for what they are doing now. A private is a private, a corporal a corporal; one man is supposed, so far as the defence of the country is concerned, to be as valuable as another. I think their pay ought to be equal.

Mr. CROTHERS: They are all paid the same now.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, but I want their pay increased.

Mr. HANNA: How much?

Mr. NESBITT: Fifty cents a day.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Although the Canadian soldier is paid at a higher rate than the soldiers with whom he is fighting side by side, no one would say that he can possibly be paid in money for the services that he is rendering to his country.

Mr. NESBITT: You could not pay for his services in money.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No. The service which the Canadian soldier is rendering to his country by fighting in France is beyond payment. The ordinary private soldier's income, with his pay of $1.10 a day, taking into consideration a certain amount per month for clothing and subsistence, and, if he is a married man, taking into consideration, also, his separation allowance and the amount given by the Patriotic Fund to his family if his family needs it, comes to about $95 per month.

Mr. NESBITT: The amount of the income depends upon the number of children a man has. He would have to have a number of children for his income to reach that amount.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Not many. It has been estimated in the press that the average income was about $100 per month, but, roughly speaking, it would be about $95 per month. These soldiers are the very flower of the country, and it is heartrending to think that so many of them are being killed or wounded and that the country is going through such a severe trial in these terrible losses. The single man is obliged to leave half of his pay with the Minister of Finance and he receives interest upon it. That accumulates while he is away, and a good many million dollars are accumulating in that manner. The private soldier who is married assigns $15 to his wife or his family.

Mr. NESBITT: The married man receives a separation allowance of $20, which is in excess of what the single man gets, is it not?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: The allowance for subsistence and clothing would be equal to about $1 per day. That is why I say that the unmarried soldier should be paid $1.50 per day and field allowance of ten cents, or $1.60 per day. That, with subsistence and clothing, would amount to $2.60 per day. The married man receives a separation allowance of $20 per month. As a country, we have nothing whatever to do with the Patriotic Fund. That fund is supported by voluntary contributions, and the married soldier should not have to receive assistance from a voluntary fund. The separation allowance should be increased, and the people should not be called upon to give these voluntary contributions, because those contributions are not equally distributed. Some men pay a great deal more in proportion to their wealth than others do. In the county from which I come, the county council and the towns that are separated from the county assess so many mills on the dollar and pay over the amount collected to the Patriotic Fund, so that in that case the contributions are equally distributed. The income of the married man, counting his pay, clothing, subsistence, separation allowance and Patriotic Fund contribution may come to $95 per month. I have not figured it up, but the amount depends upon what he gets from the Patriotic Fund. If he is a married man without children, he gets less from the Patriotic Fund than if he has children, and if he has a number of children, the amount he receives from the Patriotic Fund is fairly large. The mere fact that, even if we paid the soldier $100 a day, we could not compensate him for risking his life for his country does not affect the principle. We should pay him a sufficient amount so that he will be able to have something saved up by the time he returns. The minister says that a certain amount is held back on which interest is paid. That interest, however, does not mount up very quickly. I have had occasion to take up cases of back pay of men who have been killed, and the paymaster general has been very courteous in looking after those matters, but the back pay coming to the relatives of those men has never amounted to more than $85 or $86, and that is not very much. If the soldier were paid fifty cents a day allowance while he was in Europe and a dollar a day held back, he would have quite an amount coming to him when he returned to this country, and I am pleased to say that the bulk of our troops will return. In that way they will have something to start with when they come home and will be able to retain their pride in themselves. There is no reason why the country cannot pay that amount, and I believe the country would be perfectly willing to pay it.

Mr. OLIVER: While I do not know that it is quite in order to discuss this question and I will not delay the House for any time on it, I just wish to repeat what I have said so often before in this House, that the time has come when the separation allowance to the dependents of our soldiers should be increased so that there would not be any necessity of the the work of the Patriotic Fund as is the case at present. We know that the cost of living has increased since the beginning of the war. We have raised the salaries of our employees at Ottawa, and in many cases working men have had their wages increased, and justly so, because of the increase in the cost of living. We are, however, paying the same separation allowance to-day as we did when the war began, and we are placing the same dependence upon the Patriotic Fund as we did then. The time has come when we should decide on an increase in the allowance to our soldiers' dependents that will meet the increased cost of living and what is now drawn by them regularly from the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. KYTE: There appears to be some laxity in the militia office in London with respect to the assignments of soldiers' pay. There have come to my notice several cases in which men who have enlisted f[illegible] overseas services have, shortly after their arrival in France, written their parents at home that they have assigned their pay, but no payments have been made to those in whose favour the assignments have been drawn. I took the matter up with the officials of the department, and I am bound to say that they manifested every courtesy and determination to investigate thoroughly all those causes of complaint. In every case I find that the difficulty does not exist in the Militia Department here, but, in some way or another, the trouble is on the other side. In many cases months and months have elapsed without a single dollar being paid to the parents of those men. After taking the matter up with the department, I have been able to get the assigned pay to begin from the time I made the complaint, but the back pay which has been assigned has never been handed over to the parents. There must, therefore, be some laxity, no doubt due to the large quantity of business of that character which has to be dealt with.

It is a great disappointment to the parents of these men that the pay which has been assigned to them by their sons overseas is not being regularly paid. In cases where it is ultimately discovered that there was an assignment, there is no reason why the pay that was withheld should not be paid from the date from which the assignment was made effective. I desire to call the minister's attention to this, because cases of this kind are very numerous and are becoming more numerous every day. If there is any way of getting a better line on that particular branch of the work of the Militia Department in London it is eminently desirable that steps should be taken without delay.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Is my hon. friend speaking of the unmarried or the married man?

Mr. KYTE: The unmarried.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The unmarried man is not obliged to assign his pay, and very frequently does not do so until his regimental paymaster perhaps draws his attention to some inquiries that have been made from this side. Cases such as my hon. friend has mentioned will always occur, of course, but it must be borne in mind that they are very few in number compared with the thousands of cases that are handled without any hitch at all. The complaints are certainly not as numerous proportionately as they have been in the past.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: A good many complaints have come to myself, and so far as my experience goes, I wish to bear testimony to the fact that all the officials in the Department of Militia and Defence are very anxious to do the best they can, and that has been particularly noticeable during the last five or six months. One cannot help remarking on the courtesy and the desire on the part of the minister and his officers to have all these cases straightened out.

To cover hire of motor cars for Major General Hughes, then Minister of Militia and Defence, during his visits to England and France in 1912, 1913 and 1915, $3,194.13.

Mr. KYTE: There was an item for $6,000 covering the cost of motor cars for the minister and those associated with him in his trip to Europe in 1913. How is it necessary to have another item of this amount to cover the same expenditure?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: This item is to cover a bill which has been certified as correct, which has been accumulating with the Wolseley Motor Car Company during the years 1912, 1913 and 1915.

Mr. OLIVER: What was wrong with 1914?

Mr. CARVELL: Has this anything to do with that famous junketing trip? Is the minister quite sure that he is not mixing up some motor cars in Ottawa with some on the other side? Any one who lives in Ottawa and watches the string of beautiful motor cars that drive up to the Chateau and the well-groomed gentlemen, and sometimes ladies, who get into them, all driven by men in uniform, might be pardoned for the suspicion that part of this amount should be charged to Ottawa instead of to the other side. But possibly the item is all right.

Monuments on battlefields—Grant to Women's Wentworth Historical Society towards the preservation of the monuments at Stoney Creek, $125.

Mr. COPP: I wish to direct the minister's attention for a moment to some battlefields in different portions of the province of New Brunswick. Some years ago the question of preserving and taking care of the old forts in the province of New Brunswick and elsewhere in the Dominion was brought up in the House. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) and the late Mr. Emmerson succeeded in getting some expenditure made on Fort Beausejour, and having the premises fenced in. I have been recently informed by a letter from the Daughters of the Empire that the fort at Annapolis has been taken over by the Parks Branch, and also a fort at St. John.

9 p.m.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Who made the expenditure my hon. friend has referred to?

Mr. COPP: Probably my hon. friend from Cumberland could say. I understand that it is under the control of the Militia Department. I think it is well that these old battlegrounds which are falling into decay should be taken care of by the Government and preserved as a memorial for future generations. I would ask the minister if something cannot be done to preserve these old forts in New Brunswick and elsewhere.

Mr. ROCHE: I might explain that the Parks Branch is in the Interior Department. An arrangement was entered into comparatively recently under which these particular properties are being converted into Dominion national parks. It is our intention to conserve them for that purpose.

Mr. COPP: Is Fort Beausejour under consideration for this purpose?

Mr. ROCHE: The Annapolis one was taken over, but I cannot say as to the other.

Mr. COPP: I understand that Fort Annapolis was transferred from the Militia Department to the Interior Department?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Gratuity to the widow of the late F. G. Anson, employed at the Royal Military College, $616.46.

Mr. KYTE: Some weeks ago a return was brought down, on the motion of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Tobin), giving the number and salaries, amounting to some $400,000 a year, of those employed on the headquarters staff in Military District No. 6, Halifax. Has that number been reduced or increased since that return was brought down?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Some changes have been made, although not very important ones. Changes are always taking place in regard to such an important district—No. 6 Military District includes New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I had the matter investigated recently by one of our best officers. I have not had a full report from him of his views in reference to the matter, but in a conversation with him he told me that, while there were some officers whose services could be dispensed with, there were places where more officers are needed. I am not in a position to tell this House about all the military operations that are going on, particularly on the coast of Nova Scotia. I will go so far as to say that, confidentially, I shall be glad to discuss the matter with, and to explain the exact situation to, any member of the House. The Maritime Provinces comprise the district which is nearest to the seat of the war. We are carrying on all kinds of defences, not only in Halifax, but in other places around the coast, and doing many things which we did not have to do even a year or two ago. While the list to which my hon. friend refers is a long one, yet I want to assure him that the officer of whom I spoke tells me that these officers are necessary.

Mr. KYTE: Then there has been no material reduction in the expenditure of the headquarters staff in that district?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There has been no material reduction. The matter is under consideration. Whether it may be reduced or not I do not know. If it can be reduced it will be, but I doubt very much whether it will be advisable to reduce it.

Mr. CARVELL: I realize that the minister is not responsible for the condition of affairs, and I would not expect him to say too much in condemnation. But surely the business ability of the minister must teach him that there is a condition with regard to the general staff that ought not to exist. I went over that return and I found 176 officers.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Does that include nurses?

Mr. CARVELL: No. The nurses were outside of that; there were 57 nurses. I have nothing to say about that; wounded and sick men have to be looked after; I assume that the nurses are properly employed, and therefore I make no comment about that. One thing I did admire was the ingenuity of the officers down there in creating the offices which you will observe by reading the list. There were all sorts of initials before and after the names, initials that I do not know the meaning of. I have been out of the militia for about ten years, but I used to know something about militia matters and I know what all the ordinary officers were, but the initials before and after these names were like Greek to me. One thing that impressed me was the enormous number of medical men at Halifax on the list. I do not believe there is a Conservative doctor in Halifax who is not on the pay roll. Now, I come to St. John, which I do know something about. It is true that in the winter time soldiers come through in quite large numbers and that there have been a few regiments permanently in New Brunswick since the war began, but the number of gentlemen travelling around that city in uniform is legion.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Are they members of the headquarters staff?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, they have the red tabs. I know the difference between a staff officer and an ordinary army or fighting officer. The hotels are filled with them. You meet them travelling on railway trains wherever you go. Sometimes it is impossible to get accommodation because it has all been taken up before hand. In addition to the staff there are the names of numbers of gentlemen who are rendering no military service in the Maritime Provinces, but who are drawing down big salaries. I am speaking of men who are outside of the staff entirely, because I know whether they belong to the staff or not. I saw them. I know some of these people in New Brunswick, and I know a lot of gentlemen who have been drawing pay for three years who have rendered no service to the country. The number of men who are paid by the Militia Department but not employed in any useful serivce is nothing short of a scandal. I cannot believe, notwithstanding the statement the minister makes—and I know he makes it in good faith—that it is necessary to have 176 officers on the general staff to look after the small amount of business there must be in the Maritime Provinces. My hon. friend speaks of the defences along the coast, and things of that kind. These are all necessary, and we do not expect the minister to give any detailed account of them. But the gentlemen on this staff are not looking after the military defences on the coast of Nova Scotia. These are fellows who are drawing pay and doing nothing for it. The man who is performing service is all right; nobody objects to that. It is necessary to have the defences of the country looked after. But when anybody tells me that it is necessary to have 176 officers, I am bound to say that I cannot accept any such statement. In addition to the salaries paid to these officers, their wives are drawing big separation allowances, and in addition to that you have a whole army of stenographers, batmen, footmen, messengers, and all that sort of thing. I do not think I am extravagant when I say that $600,000 a year will not pay the expenses of the general staff in the Maritime Provinces. The list which was laid on the table of the House a few weeks ago totals up to $398,000—practically $400,000. I figured it at that including the nursing sisters. I think I am perfectly justified in adding $200,000 on account of separation allowances and the army of unemployed which is attached to the general staff in the Maritime Provinces. We do look to the minister as a business man to see that this condition of affairs is remedied. We do not believe it is necessary. While I realize that there must be some staff officers, as far as the office work in New Brunswick is concerned I could find twenty-five men in that province who, with two first-class clerks and four stenographers could do all the business. There cannot be any great amount of work to be done. It is not possible, because the men are not there. There is some correspondence, I will admit, but three or four good stenographers and a couple of first-class clerks will turn out a lot of that work in a day. The country is full of these officers. I do feel that, with the enormous financial burden that this country has incurred and with a condition of affairs which I would not dare to speak of in Parliament in connection with military matters, there can be no justification for this expenditure.

Munitions plants, I am told, have been closed down on forty-eight hours notice. It seems to me a most horrible thing, with this financial condition staring us in the face, that $600,000 or $700,000 a year is being expended on what you might call the overhead expenses of looking after military matters in the Maritime Provinces. The services of three-quarters of these men could be dispensed with. The minister shakes his head? I say I live in that country, and I have some idea of what is going on. I tell him that, outside of the staff, there are officers by the dozen in the Maritime Provinces who have managed to get shifted from one unit to another, who have never gone across the water, who never intend to go if they can help it, and who are simply a burden upon the country. These are the men who ought to be conscripted first in Canada, not as officers, but as privates in the rear rank. I can give the minister the names, although I do not want to speak about them publicly. What is true in the Maritime Provinces is true of Canada as a whole. There is a whole army of these unemployed officers throughout this country and every member in this House knows it; men who have managed in some way to work themselves into the army, men who draw down pay and whose wives draw down separation allowance, but who render no service and never intend to; and who, when their unit goes overseas, always manage to get transferred to another unit. I can tell of some men who have been transferred three times, and then, when they could not put off going overseas any longer, they got into the Forestry Battalion. And so it goes. There is work to be done in this country; I have always believed that the present minister had the business ability to do it, and I am pointing out some of the conditions that exist in my part of the country. I hope he will apply his business principles to these matters and see if he cannot clean up some of these conditions that are disgracing the country in army matters in that part of Canada.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to read an editorial from the Quebec Chronicle, a newspaper owned and edited until the outbreak of the war, by General Watson who has been at the front for some time. This newspaper is strongly in sympathy with the present Administration:

A shameful thing.

An unusually large number of officers returned from England to Quebec yesterday. While some of them were casualties, there is no doubt that very many of them were men who would not revert or sacrifice a grade in rank in order to go to the front. Quite a few of them have been kept in England for many months at Government expense. In fact, we believe that the cost of paying officers that never intended to go to the front has been appalling and we are convinced that the matter should be aired in Parliament at an early date. These are the first men that conscription should reach out and gather in.

That editorial is written with knowledge on the part of the person who wrote it. If such comments appeared in newspapers unfriendly to the Government, they might be passed over without any remark; but when a newspaper of the standing and of the well-known sympathy with the Government of the Quebec Chronicle makes a statement of that kind, it gives great cause to the people of this country to look well into militia matters as they are being carried on by the present Administration. This editorial contains a charge which it is necessary for the minister to refute at the earliest possible moment, by giving actual figures as to the number of officers enlisted in Canada since the war broke out for overseas service and who have been kept in England under large pay and living allowance up to the present time, but who absolutely refuse to go to the continent because they are not willing to revert to a lower rank.

Referring to the headquarters staff at Halifax, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has spoken of the large number of medical men in the city of Halifax who are drawing large salaries and apparently not giving very much time to the work for which they were appointed. There are medical men in Halifax who attend to their general practice day by day, at the same time drawing large sums in salaries which might be saved to this country if there was a desire on the part of the Minister of Militia and Defence to economize in respect to that expenditure. Some weeks ago I was asked the following question to which the Minister of Militia replied:

DR. B. A. LEBLANC.

Mr. Kyte:

1. What is the amount of pay and allowance and monthly separation allowance paid to Dr. B. A. Leblanc, Arichat, Richmond County, Nova Scotia, since his appointment with the Army Medical Service Corps?

2. What is his rank, and date of appointment?

Sir Edward Kemp:

1. Pay and allowances, $624.50. No separation allowance paid.

2. This officer was appointed a lieutenant (supernumerary) in the Army Medical Corps on 28th February, 1917, and a captain in the Canadian Expeditionary Force on the 30th June, 1917.

Dr. Leblanc is the Conservative member for the county of Richmond in the Provincial Legislature. He obtained a commission while the Legislature was sitting in Halifax and was appointed supernumerary lieutenant in the Army Medical Corps, and captain in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, on the 30th of June. In the return brought down some weeks ago to which reference has been made, Dr. Leblanc's name appears as Captain Leblanc employed as medical officer, field hospital, at a salary of $1,916. He was in Halifax since his appointment and remained there, and it was stated that he was going overseas. As a matter of fact, he did attempt to go overseas a few weeks ago. He went on board a transport for the purpose of going to England to perform such services in the Canadian Expeditionary Force as might be allotted to him, but he states that after he was on board the transport he received a telegram from Ottawa not to go overseas but to remain in Halifax. The telegram arrived about the time that the resolution to extend the life of Parliament was considered in this House and the Prime Minister announced that, for reasons which he then stated, no further effort to have the term extended would be made, but an election would be held in due course. After Dr. Leblanc enlisted for overseas service and attained the rank of captain at a salary of $1,916, certainly it would be necessary for him to go overseas in order to perform the duties assigned to him. He has not gone over. It is well known, it is common gossip among his friends, that he received a telegram from Ottawa not to go overseas because his services would be required in the coming election. That is not an isolated case; the country is full of political military officers who are drawing large pay and who are kept upon the ground in order that their services may be available when the election comes. The same condition of affairs prevailed in Nova Scotia in 1916 when the provincial election was on. Several military officers were given commissions and at the same time given nominations as Conservative candidates. These men, instead of going overseas or remaining in training for the work to which they were to be assigned, became candidates on behalf of the Conservative party and, while officers and drawing pay, they devoted their time to political work. It is also well known that at certain polls, where military officers were Conservative candidates, electors who have enlisted as privates received telegrams from the commanding officers telling them that they must vote for these particular officers. We are going to have an election in a short time, and there is every indication that the whole machinery of the Militia Department, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, is to be employed, not to win the war, but to win the election for the Government. I am not making too strong a statement when I say that. I say that the facts connected with the appointment of Captain B. A. LeBlanc, member for the county of Richmond, and the instructions he received not to go overseas after he got on board ship, are proof positive that his services are to be enlisted for political purposes, instead of for the relief of the sick soldiers at the front. He never did any work. While he was a member of the legislature he obtained his commission and uniform, and since then he has been under pay, and his name appears in this return at the salary of $1,916.

Mr. PROULX: Is he receiving his pay now?

Mr. KYTE: Yes, and if I can judge from the past, he will continue to draw his pay while acting for the Conservative party in the constituency of Richmond.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was very much surprised at seeing the very large amount of money necessary for the upkeep of the military establishment of Military District No. 6. A layman cannot very well criticise that return, not having the necessary military knowledge. But when you realize that it means $400,000 for the administration of Military District No. 6, I submit that it becomes quite a serious question, and, as the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has suggested, that probably does not include, by any means, the entire cost of administration of that district. When hon. gentlemen on this side of the House suggest that many of these appointments are unnecessary and political, the minister may say that we have no evidence. To a large extent that may be true, but I think the burden is upon the Department of Militia and Defence to satisfy the country that there is any necessity for such an expensive military establishment in the Maritime Provinces. I tell the minister now that, if he would make an honest effort to remove politics from the administration of that military district, he would at once get rid of a large number of men. It is a fact that in the city of Halifax many civilians have more to do with the running of some military matters than the officers who are supposed to do the work. The officers in charge of the military hospitals in that city are not being treated properly by the department, because the department permits the local politicians to interfere with their work. I desire to ask the minister to remember my remarks particularly in connection with military hospital matters, and to make some investigation. I would like him to make sure that the officers in charge of the hospitals are really and truly in command. They are being interfered with daily by politicians; they are doing things every day which they do not want to do. They are employing help frequently for which they have no need, but they are obliged to do it, owing to the demands made by local politicians.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Does the hon. gentleman refer to the hospitals under the Military Hospitals Commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I refer to the Militia and Defence hospitals. The minister should instruct his officers that they are supreme in their positions, and that they need take no instructions or advice from anybody except the heads of the department at Ottawa. If this were done I am sure he should have very much better administration. We would not require to employ so many men, nor would the minister require to spend as much money as he is now spending for these purposes. It is very difficult for one to tell whether all the doctors now employed at Halifax are necessary. I doubt very much if they are. If all these doctors are necessary, then I think the very best medical men available should be employed. I think the minister will agree with me in that respect. If the Militia Department at certain points in Canada must employ the services of doctors in connection with sick or returned soldiers they should employ only the leaders in the profession. I am not so sure that in Halifax it is necessary to employ doctors and pay them. I have an idea that if the medical profession in Halifax were asked to give their services to the military hospitals free of charge they would do so. That is the practice there, in so far as other hospitals are concerned, and I think is true of every city in Canada. Ordinarily medical men are willing to give their services free to hospitals, and I think that if the leaders of the medical profession in Nova Scotia were asked to give their services to the military hospitals they would do so, and would ask no remuneration. We ask men to go across and fight in France. We do not attempt to pay them at rates at all commensurate with the services rendered, and now we propose conscripting men. Why not conscript medical services and compel the doctors to give their services at nominal rates to the military hospitals? According to this return, I find that a number of recruiting officers in the Maritime Provinces are still employed. It seems to me altogether too many are employed for this purpose. I do not think they can do very much successful work at the present time and, therefore, I think the Minister might well ascertain if a number of them could not be eliminated. I observe that a number are employed as recruiting officers in Prince Edward Island. I think there are hardly any recruits being obtained these days in Prince Edward Island, and it looks as if these men were continued in their positions just because they obtained those positions when there was really some work to do. I notice on this list the name of an officer, Major Purney. I understand that he is doing recruiting work in the New England States. Is that correct?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I think so; he is somewhere in the United States.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He might as well go to any other country to search for recruits—not because no recruits are available in the New England States, but because he is not the right kind of man to send there to do that work.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Has he not been at the front?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, but I say that he is not qualified for this particular work in the New England States. I have in mind a gentleman who has been in the service in Canada—he has never been overseas—a Nova Scotian by birth, who resided in the New England States for twenty or twenty-five years. He knows that country pretty nearly as well as any man living. He has from time to time offered his services to the department; he has informed me that he could get not many hundred, but several thousand recruits in the New England States—men who would rather join Canadian regiments than be drafted into the United States army. This gentleman, however, has been unable to get any satisfaction from the department. I have nothing against Major Purney, but he does not know the New England States; he has not the qualifications for recruiting work there. Even though a man has been overseas and has done good work there it does not follow that upon his return he should be given a military position in this country. I have no doubt that the list of men in Military Division No. 6 could be very considerably reduced. I hope the minister will not be satisfied with the report that he has recently received from the Maritime Provinces with respect to the number of men employed there.

I wish to bring to the attention of the minister also a matter in respect of which criticism is openly made by many people in Halifax, regardless of political considerations. I refer to the number of batmen who attend the officers there. I do not present this complaint through any personal knowledge of the matter, but a great many people in Halifax during the past two or three years have complained persistently about it. You see these batmen caring for officers' gardens, officers' horses, carriages and automobiles—having apparently little else to do. When people see a great number of men employed in this way, naturally they become very critical, particularly in view of the fact that our war expenditure is so exceedingly heavy. The expenditures in Military District No. 6 will bear a very thorough investigation. I think that the minister will find upon examination that a great many men could be eliminated from the list and the expenditure materially reduced.

Mr. VERVILLE: I wish to call the attention of the minister to certain things that have happened at public meetings in Winnipeg, Sydney and Toronto. I would like the minister to tell the committee what attitude soldiers are supposed to adopt in respect to their attendance at public meetings. I quote the following paragraph from the King's Regulations:

> An officer or soldier is forbidden to institute or take part in any meetings, demonstrations, or processions, for party or political purposes, in barracks, quarters, camps, or their vicinity. Under no circumstances whatever will he attend such meetings, wherever held, in uniform.

If these regulations are not applicable to the soldier who has returned from the front, he may lose that respect on the part of the people that he has justly acquired by his services on the other side. Any one who wishes to command respect must himself respect others. We know what a group of men are likely to do when they meet together; we know what they did in Toronto —some officers themselves let them do it. I am very much afraid that sometime the people will bring back to their senses men who act in that way. I bring this matter up because I am desirous that soldiers who return from the other side shall be respected—and surely they cannot be respected if they themselves do not respect the freedom of this country. In Winnipeg a meeting was held; whether it was conscriptionist or anti-conscriptionist makes no difference. A large group of soldiers broke up the meeting—my hon. friend knows about it as well as I do. In Toronto they even went into the Labour Temple and broke almost everything—my hon. friend knows about that, too. As to the occurrence in Sydney, I am credibly informed—I can prove it—that politicians in Sydney incited these poor soldiers to do what they did. I really believe that if the soldiers were left alone, they would not do anything of this kind; but if they are incited by politicians, as they were in Sydney, one cannot tell what may happen.

In Halifax there was no trouble because there was no meeting, but it was understood in that city that if they had decided to hold a meeting they would be holding it regardless of the people who were there. My hon. friend can see the danger of that as well as I can. One man is, in certain circumstances, as good as another, and there is liable to be trouble. We want to avoid that in this country. The minister should give orders that the King's regulations must be observed, and if soldiers are not satisfied with any speech they may hear, all they have to do is to walk away. That is what we do ourselves: If we do not like the speech of some speaker, we walk away. This is a free country. In a very short time we shall engage in a political battle, and it would not be safe for soldiers to interrupt a meeting. If they were to do that, it would not be respectable for the country, for the soldiers or for the citizens. If we are going to engage in a political fight, the minister should ask the soldiers to abide by the King's regulations. Far be it from me to ask the minister to prevent soldiers from attending meetings. They are free citizens and they have a perfect right to attend meetings, but the minister should ask them to keep the peace. The minister knows that sometimes any one in uniform in a big meeting is like a red flag before a bull. It is often the case that, if a police officer is around, there is trouble. I do not believe there is one soldier who would go one step to disturb the peace unless he was incited by some politician behind him and for reasons that my hon. friend can imagine, to attack a man like myself. I am asking the minister what he intends to do. The matter was raised in this House, I believe by my hon. friend from Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) who asked if it was the intention to give to the soldiers on this side of the water the same orders as were given to our soldiers on the other side. From the experience we have had lately, it seems that matters are going to get worse and worse, and if it is possible to avoid that, it would be better for the country, better for the soldier and better for the citizen at large.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Verville) said that I drew the attention of the Government some time ago to the regulations imposed upon soldiers overseas in regard to their attending public meetings in uniform. Soldiers in uniform in Canada are largely men who have returned from the front wounded and who, on account of the wounds they have received on the battlefield, are of no further service to their country at the front. Those men are in uniform, not because they want to be in uniform, but because they must remain in uniform until their pensions are adjusted. They have all the rights of citizenship; they should not be debarred from attending any meeting, and it is in very poor taste for any hon. member to say in this House, as the hon. member has stated, that it would not be safe for those men to go into public meetings. It would not be safe for whom? For the soldier or for the anti-conscriptionists in the hon. gentleman's county?

Mr. VERVILLE: I said that it would not be safe for either side.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman thinks it is right that he or any other gentleman may, in the province from which he comes, address public meetings that, to say the least of it, are not very loyal, but he denies the right of soldiers to attend those meetings or any others. That is absolutely unfair. Those men should have the right—

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Just a few words about those meetings we had in Montreal.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is the hon. gentleman going to make a speech? I thought he was going to ask a question.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I do not want to make a speech, but I want to correct my hon. friend.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Verville) said that those soldiers misbehaved themselves at Sydney. I presume the meeting on the occasion to which he referred was one to be addressed by a friend of his, Mr. J. C. Watters, I do not think the people of Canada have anything against the soldiers for having broken up that meeting, if they did so.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It was a labour association. A labour man is sometimes as good as a soldier in this country.

Mr. ARTHURS: The soldier is as good as the labouring man. The soldier is a man who has proved his worth so far as this country is concerned. If a man goes to the front, is wounded and comes back and, whether he likes it or not, has to remain in uniform, he is surely entitled to every privilege that any labouring or other man in Canada may have. Those soldiers should have the absolute right not o ly to attend public meetings in uniform but to join any political clubs, whether Conservative or Reform. They should have the absolute right to attend those meetings in uniform for the simple reason that they are not permitted to attend them in any other costume. Any man who knows the circumstances knows perfectly well that those men may be retained, and that, for many months after they return to Canada, they have to appear before board after board. During all that period, in order to draw their pay, in order to live, they must abide by the military regulations, which state that they must be in uniform. Does any man in this House think it fair that those men should be deprived of the ordinary rights of citizenship, whether at election time or at any other time, simply because they are forced into that position and have to appear in uniform if they appear at all? There is not a gentleman within the sound of my voice who does not believe with me that those men have the same rights as anybody else. I am not asking that they receive greater rights than the labouring men, or Mr. J. C. Watters, or any other man.

Mr. VERVILLE: The hon. member does not seem to understand me correctly.

Mr. ARTHURS: I cannot understand any hon. member making an argument of that kind.

Mr. VERVILLE: Those men should have their rights or they should not have them. I stated frankly that I did not mind whether a soldier attended a meeting in uniform or not, and if my hon. friend did not understand me, it is not my fault. I have as much respect for a soldier as my hon. friend has. My hon. friend would not say that they have a right to go into any meeting and break it up. Although they have the right as free citizens to attend meetings the same as any one else, whether they are in uniform or not, they have not the right to break up a meeting. I asked the minister what the Government were going to do about the matter. When I am addressing a meeting, I do not mind seeing any number of soldiers. They have a right to attend meetings, but they have no right to use their positions as soldiers to break them up. From now on there will be more soldiers in this country than ever before, and those men will surely have a right to hear whatever is said at any place, but if they are going to utilize their position in uniform as soldiers to break up a meeting of a body of men, that is wrong for the soldier, wrong for the country and wrong for the citizen. When I bring this matter up, my hon. friend must not put into my mouth statements that I have not made. I like the soldiers just as much as he does. I want this to be well understood. Whatever has happened, my hon. friend always refers to another province. I have mentioned the places where trouble has arisen, and it has arisen in Winnipeg, in Sydney, Cape Breton, and in Toronto. Surely I am not going to be accused of having had anything to do with that. When J. C. Watters addressed that meeting in Sydney he was simply exercising the right of all free citizens in this country, whether soldier or civilian.

Mr. ARTHURS: Does my hon. friend say that Mr. Watters had the right to express the views he did in Sydney?

Mr. VERVILLE: This is a free country. Hon. gentlemen are always bragging about the Union Jack and freedom of speech Freedom of speech should, of course, be subject to certain restrictions, but if the Union Jack does not stand for freedom of speech it had better be removed from this House. I do not believe that any man should abuse this freedom; we should all keep within the law. We all know that there is a great difference in speakers; we see that in this House, where some are more fiery than others. We have to take into consideration the mentality of our citizens. If we do not like what is said by a speaker at a public meeting we do not have to take it; that is all. I was not present at the meeting in Sydney, but I know J. C. Watters pretty well, and in the reports I have seen of the meeting I have been unable to find that anything very wrong was said. I have seen Mr. Watters since the meeting, but have not asked him about it. But later in the year I shall be attending a labour convention in Ottawa, and I intend to find out exactly what was said. I believe in freedom of speech for all. Let the soldiers attend the meetings if they will, but let them behave like law-abiding citizens. They should always remember that a great many of our soldiers are labour men. There is absolutely no need for trouble of this kind.

Mr. MARTIN: I declare to this House and the country that the man who started the meeting against conscription and asked the people to revolt was a man from Ontario. His name was Villeneuve, and he came from St. Eugene in the county of Prescott.

Mr. ARTHURS: He knew enough to go to Quebec.

Mr. MARTIN: On the occasion of the first parade in the city of Montreal against the high cost of living, I permitted the citizens to make a demonstration on the condition that they would be quiet, but trouble was started by an assault made by a soldier. There were 25,000 people in the parade, and as it was going east on St. Catherine street a regiment of soldiers going north came along and the parade was stopped to allow the regiment to pass through. Just as the regiment had passed the last soldier snatched a French flag from some one in the parade and threw it under his feet. The people in the parade had not said anything to the soldiers, and the trouble was all the fault of this soldier who tried to insult the French-Canadian people. There was a fight, and I do not know whether the soldier was killed, as I have not seen anything about it in the newspapers. I remember that a meeting at the park five weeks ago, which was called by me, was attended by 150,000 people. A soldier started to insult my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), who was giving an address. I did not want the people to attack the soldier, but I had a hard time saving him from injury. Eventually I got him to the car with some constables. I admit that the soldiers have the right to attend meetings, but they have no right to provoke the people. They are the ones who are making the noise. I do not allow anybody to make speeches such as have been made this week in Montreal. I do not allow anybody to preach revolt, because we have enough on our backs already with conscription. The minister must tell his soldiers to respect civilian citizens, not only in the city of Montreal, but everywhere else in the Dominion, and then there will be no trouble. The soldiers sometimes go in groups of twenty or fifty. I have often gone to them and said: "Boys, don't do that. Go back to your regiment. What is the use of trying to provoke the French-Canadians?"

10 p.m.

In this House, when the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) was speaking against conscription, one man in uniform in the gallery used insulting language against the French-Canadian race and against the hon. member for Rouville, which I will not repeat in this House. He was drunk, and perhaps was not responsible for what he said. But think of it! A soldier right here in the House of Commons insulting the French Canadian race in language which I would not repeat. If any trouble happens it will be the fault of these people. I do not say that all the English-speaking people are like that. He was only one, but he insulted the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux). I had for witness Mr. Ashby, a member of the Quebec Legislature. He was sitting next to this soldier, and said it was terrible to listen to him. I know the Minister of Militia is a gentleman and does not like trouble, and I ask him to give instructions to his officers in the different cities that the soldiers must not provoke the French Canadians and incite them to fight. I will try to stop these meetings that are advertised in to-night's papers. If I am obliged to go on the platform I will go. But I will allow no more meetings. If anything happens it will be the fault of the Prime Minister, through passing this conscription law without giving the people a chance to pronounce upon it by means of a referendum. It is not only the people of Quebec who are opposed to this law, but the people of every province in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the people are going to do all that it is possible to do when you try to get them to enlist. You cannot put that law into force. The people will not enlist, and you have no way of locating them as the different classes are called. If anything happens in Montreal, I shall be very sorry, because I do not like trouble; but if any trouble happens the soldiers will be responsible for it. The minister must stop the soldiers from drinking, because when they are drunk they do not know what they are doing, and they are trying to force the French Canadians to fight. I have often said to the soldiers, "Do not do that. What is the use of it"? I respect the soldier, especially those who have fought for the flag. I repeat, it is not only the French Canadians of Quebec who are against the conscription law, but the people of every province from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If anything happens, if blood flows in the streets of Montreal or any other city, the fault will be with the Prime Minister and with those who helped him pass that law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think we have just had, possibly without exception, the most remarkable exhibition that has ever taken place during the whole history of Canada. The mayor of the greatest city in Canada, present in this Parliament, knows that for the past two weeks statements have been made at public meetings and statements have been published in the press which demand his presence in that city in order that he may see that the law is observed by all its citizens. Instead of that we have him here to-night making statements that are not a credit to the representative of any constituency in this Dominion. He has tried to put the blame for the condition that exists in Montreal and in the province of Quebec on a returned soldier, on the Prime Minister, on the Minister of Militia and particularly on some resident of the province of Ontario. A more inflammatory speech was never made by the representative of a constituency in the whole history of Canada. A greater responsibility rests upon the mayor of that city than upon any other person to see that the people are given to understand that they cannot violate the law. We have heard from another hon. gentleman from the same city to-night (Mr. Verville). He points to the flag and says: "This is a free country, we should enjoy free speech, and if we cannot enjoy free speech then tear the flag down." The free speech that we are complaining about is not the free speech that ought to be tolerated by the Mayor of Montreal or by any representative that we have present in this House to-night. He tries to inflame the passions of the people of that city by saying that somebody from the province of Ontario is responsible. During this session we have had speaker after speaker from the province of Quebec trying to make excuses for their province and putting the blame upon Ontario for the fact that Quebec has not done its duty, a fact which has made it necesary to enforce the Military Service Act. If that province had done its duty, as other provinces have, it would not have been necessary to put that law on the statute book. But it is the law of the country to-day, and yet you find the representative of the great city of Montreal trying to make it appear that the Prime Minister is the guilty party and that to him is attributable the condition of affairs in the province of Qubec and in the city of Montreal. He also blames a returned soldier. He says that the remark of a returned soldier could set the whole city on fire. He speaks about a returned soldier in the gallery.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not say that he was a returned soldier.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: You said that he was a man in uniform.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, right here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The chances are that he was a returned soldier, a man who has arrived back from the front who realized what the conditions are, as you do not realize and as your province does not realize. He realizes that this country is at war and that the Military Service Act is necessary at this particular time if we are going to carry the war to a successful conclusion. It is a shame and a disgrace to make the statements that you have made here to-night. If you were doing your duty you would be in your city—the city you are supposed to represent but do not represent. I believe that there never has been, during the whole history of this country, a more inflammatory speech made than that made by you to-night. In so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, you do not need to trouble yourself about that——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. D. Stewart): If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) would address himself to the Chair he would be more in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I bow to your ruling. I want to say to the hon. member (Mr. Martin) who represents the city of Montreal that he would be attending to his duties much better if he would pay a little more attention to the province from which he comes rather than trying to put upon some solitary individual, who he says comes from Ontario, but who may be a resident of Montreal, who has a French name, and who comes from the county of Prescott, the responsibility for these disturbances. I do not think it strengthens the hon. gentleman's case very much when he refers to that, but it certainly does emphasise the fact that he knows what is going on there at the present time. In the face of these inflammatory speeches that are being made there night after night, he knows what the law of the land is to-day and he knows that these speeches are in defiance of it. If he were careful in regard to what his duty is, and if he were anxious to see that the people of that city did their duty, he would be looking after the interests of the city, and he would not be in this House to-night.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sorry to see that my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) never reads the papers. I gave orders before I left Montreal to the chief of police, Mr. Campeau, that if any one opened his mouth to encourage the people to revolt, he should be arrested. If I am not in Montreal to-day, or if I was not there last night, it is because I thought it was my duty to vote against the Bill to buy the Canadian Northern railway. I had to be here. If you look at La Patrie you will see what we say about Villeneuve:

(Translation): Villeneuve is the man whom Mayor Martin threatened to have arrested the moment he opened his mouth in public, to preach revolt.

I am doing my duty in Montreal more than the hon. gentleman is doing his duty here. I gave orders and I tried to stop all these meetings. I am willing to go myself on the platform and try to stop these young people. Their proceedings are not in the interest, not only of Montreal, but of all Canada. I do not know why I should be reproached by the hon. gentleman because he does not read the papers. Since the conscription law has been passed I have been doing all I possibly could to counsel our citizens to remain quiet and to obey the law, since the law has been passed. If they do not want to enlist, well and good. These young men are responsible, especially those who come from Ontario. I do not know why they have been sent from Ontario to try and throw the blame on the city of Montreal and province of Quebec.

Mr. PROULX: I do not see why my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Mary's (Mr. Martin) should single out an individual who happens to come from my county. I know young Villeneuve. He has a brother who went to the front and came back wounded He is not living in Montreal. He came up to Prescott with a young man. He must have been impressed by the company he kept in Montreal. Villeneuve did not begin the agitation in Montreal, there were many who carried on that agitation before he took part in it. He has been most moderate. I hope the hon. member for Montreal, St. Mary's, will not be too hard on this young man who comes from my county and who has been speaking against conscription in Montreal.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. D. Stewart): I think we have spent enough time on matters that are not at all relevant to the item under consideration which has to do with gratuities and compensation to retired staff officers and others. The hon. member for Maisonneuve has asked certain questions, and if the minister will make the explanation, then perhaps we can get back to the subject matter properly under consideration

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) asks what

I am going to do. I do not have to do anything in regard to the matter. Every member of this House knows what is right and what is wrong with respect to the conduct of private individuals and of soldiers. I would not want to admit—in fact I would take exactly the opposite position—that the soldiers who have enlisted have conducted themselves in any but a soldierly and gentlemanly way, with very few exceptions. There are exceptions in the conduct of civilians and there may have been exceptions among the soldiers; but, so far as I am able to judge, they have been very few indeed. There have been no serious complaints to the department in regard to the conduct of soldiers. Perhaps on some occasions they have been blamed when they were not blameworthy, but, as I say, the commanding officers know what their duties are, and I feel that the soldiers will conduct themselves as they should. The blame must not be placed on the soldiers on all occasions because we know of many occasions when the civilians were at least as blameworthy as the soldiers. I do not think that the incident to which the hon. member refers, or the circumstances arising out of it, are sufficiently grave, to base an argument upon, and I do not anticipate any difficulty in the future.

The hon. members for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) raised a very important question and I do not at all complain of their doing so. We have done a big thing in this country with regard to voluntary enlistment. We went at it in a certain way, adopting the system of recruiting by battalions, appointing recruiting officers and making as many appointments as were necessary. As the war went on, there accumulated overseas and in Canada a large number of officers. Many of these have been retired to private life in the last three or four months. It is sometimes a good deal easier to get the uniform on a soldier than to get it off, but most of the soldiers are willing, when there is nothing further for them to do and they have performed their full duty, to revert to civil life.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not find fault with the employment of returned soldiers. I think that the man who has gone overseas and returned is entitled to anything the country can give him. I found fault with the men who never went overseas. I was told in St. John, I think it was two weeks ago to-day, by a returned soldier, that, of 176 officers of the staff of the Maritime Provinces, only 14 or 15 had ever been overseas. I have no personal knowledge of the matter.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The question whether or not a man has been overseas is sometimes important, and sometimes not, in deciding questions of employment. I have had an investigation made with respect to the headquarters staff and the staffs of different divisions to ascertain if any men could be let out and allowed to revert to civil life. This is a big and difficult task, but the investigation has been completed and we have made great progress. In the division from which my hon. friend comes, No. 6, it is necessary to have a great many officers. That has just been investigated, and I have not yet received the report in respect to it. I wish to assure hon. members that it is not the policy or intention of the department to allow abuses, if there are any. On the other hand, I think my hon. friend will admit that, perhaps, sometimes when they see men in uniform there is a tendency to think they are doing nothing. Hon. members may be entirely mistaken. A man who wears a uniform is a marked man. I have heard this question raised very often and I have heard decent hardworking officers criticised, when the parties criticising did not know the real occupation of the officers. There are hundreds of officers in this country who would have made just as good officers, if they had been able to go to the front, as those who were fortunate enough to get to the front. As a general rule, an officer is considered fortunate if he is able to get to the front. An officer said to me the other day: We have been held in Canada and we have been asked to do the dirty work—using that term in the same sense that there is not as much kudos in doing work at home as in going to the front. There are a lot of men in Canada, who have performed splendid service, and it is not their fault that they have not been able to get to the front. Because of our system of organizing by battalions and appointing a full quota of officers, we have had more officers than were needed. The situation is not an easy one. It has caused me concern; but I am prepared to handle it in as fair and decent a way as possible. I am glad that the question has been raised by my hon. friends from Halifax and Carleton counties, and I am prepared to discuss it frankly. I have no fault to find with the remarks made by the hon. gentlemen.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not think we should leave this subject without the minister telling us he will do something to improve the situation at Halifax. This matter is not new, it has been before the House from time to time. It commenced as soon as the war broke out. At the short session of Parliament, in August, 1914, we learned that the politicians in Halifax were becoming active and endeavouring to get all the money they could out of the department by interfering with military affairs. The matter was drawn to the attention of the Prime Minister at that date, and we got an assurance from him that it would be stopped. It has never been stopped, it is going on to-day, and we have the junior member from Halifax stating to-night that the military hospitals cannot be run without the interference of local committees, who order everything that is bought for the hospitals, doing all the business over the heads of the men who ought to do it and who should be entrusted to do it by the minister. That is very easily stopped; the minister could stop it with a stroke of the pen. Let him instruct his chief officer at Halifax, whoever he is, that he must not accept any recommendation from any local politicians, or any man who interferes with him in conducting the local business. Let him do that in good faith. Let him tell his officer that if he wants to purchase goods for the military hospitals, or wants to do anything at all in the way of repairs or spending money —and there is a good deal of money being spent—he will have a free hand to do it, in a business way, and that if he refuses to accept the orders of local politicians the minister will stand by him, that he will see to it that he does not suffer by that refusal. If the minister will tell us that he will do that, I think it will cure the whole business. I think he should give us an assurance to-night, because this is a complaint of long standing, and should not be allowed to go on from year to year without something being done about it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Coming from one of the Maritime Provinces, I am somewhat interested in this matter, and know a little about it. I was somewhat disappointed at the minister's attitude, because he seemed to take the ground that the military establishment at Halifax was not overmanned. The headquarters are at Halifax for the three Maritime Provinces. When that list was published a few days ago, it was really startling to see the number of names, and the enormous aggregate of salaries. And the list is not complete. How many were left off the list I do not know, but I know that some are left off, because I see only one medical man from Prince Edward Island. Every business man knows, no matter what his business is—and I presume this applies to military as well as civil affairs—that if you have too many men in your employ you get less work and inferior work from them. They are falling over each other, and I think this is the case at Halifax to-day. I will give some concrete cases which will illustrate the point.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Dugald Stewart): I ask the hon. member to be as brief as he can. His remarks are not at all relevant to the matter under consideration, and I thought we had agreed that, with the statement of the minister, we would come back to the business properly before the committee, and I may say to the hon. gentleman, also, that as I understand his remarks, they are not much more than a repetition of what has been said by others who preceded him, and I can see no harm in his shortening his remarks, so that we can get down to the work properly before us.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is closure invoked?

The CHAIRMAN: Order, order.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am asking a question. Are we to be shut off?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman understands me. I only want to get the committee back to the discussion of what is properly before us. I have no desire to restrict the debate, and I do not think the minister has any such desire.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it is a rule that great latitude is allowed in committee. We are on the militia estimates, which provide the money of the country for military purposes, which, of course, we are glad to expend in a proper way, but I think it is unwise for the Chairman to draw the line too sharply when the discussion is in regard to the expenditure on militia matters.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I will endeavour to comply with the Chairman's wishes in regard to the brevity of my remarks, and I believe I would have been through now if I had not been interrupted. I was saying that the overmanning of any staff leads to inferior work, and less work, being done, and I was going to give some concrete instances. I have been informed, for instance, of the case of a young man from Prince Edward Island who is now at Halifax. His mother wished to communicate with him because his brother was seriously ill, and she wrote him several times, getting no reply. She kept writing, and he got fourteen letters all at once. She sent him a telegram that his brother was seriously ill, and he did not receive the telegram until he got leave of absence for other reasons, and went home. This young man has a brother at the front. In connection with this case, I wish to direct the minister's attention to this fact: that young man enlisted, but when he reached Halifax he underwent another medical examination, and was pronounced unfit for overseas service. Being unfit, he wished to leave the army, as there was no use remaining there any longer. This happened six months ago, and he has not received his discharge yet. His brother is seriously ill, and there is no person at home to take charge of the farm, his mother being a widow.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Has the hon. gentleman reported the matter to the department?

Mr. HUGHES: No, I just got the information the other day. The soldier's uncle gave me the information, and I understood it has been reported to the department.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: What answer did they get?

Mr. HUGHES: No answer.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Oh, they must have received an answer.

Mr. HUGHES: I will take it up with the minister and the department, and give him all the names and facts in connection with it. The amount mentioned in this return is exceedingly large. I want to bring another fact to the minister's notice, showing clearly, I think, that there are entirely too many officers at Halifax. Last winter in my home town there were eighteen men, in barracks. The captain in command of these few men had been in his father's office for some years; he was a business man of considerable experience. He had under him a lieutenant also a man of considerable business experience. Yet an officer was sent from Halifax to that town to purchase the food required by these eighteen men. Surely that was waste and overlapping; the captain of that detachment could surely have done that work himself. In fact, it was generally known that the officer from Halifax was sent to that town in order that he might have something to do. These things make a bad impression upon the country; they lead the people to believe that actual waste is going on. Any business man would come to that conclusion. Moreover, the employment of a large number of recruiting officers at salaries of over $2,000 each, when no recruiting is being carried on, is surely a serious waste of public money. The department cannot be wholly without knowledge of these conditions; it is time that they were taken up and remedied.

Mr. KYTE: Is there any difference between the pay of officers of the militia and that of officers who have enlisted for overseas?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: Which is the larger?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Canadian Expeditionary Force rates are higher than the militia rates.

Mr. KYTE: The general officer commanding Military District No. 6, Halifax, General Benson, receives a salary of $3,675, while the officers under him receive much higher pay. Take for instance, Brigadier-General McLean, who is getting a salary of $6,012 a year. Lieut.-Colonel Powell is receiving Canadian Expeditionary Forces pay at a much higher rate than that at which General Benson is paid. These gentlemen are not performing overseas services; they are enlisted in Military District No. 6; they are under the command of General Benson, yet their salaries are much in excess of his.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The return brought down in respect to the matter is misleading. The pay and allowance of an officer commanding a district is $4,600 per annum. General Benson receives that salary, but certain deductions are made on account of house rent, fuel, light, etc., bringing the amount down to $3,675 per annum. The return is misleading also in reference to Brigadier-General McLean; the amount of $6,012 is too much by $720. There was an error in respect of the separation allowance; it should not have been included. Brigadier-General McLean is on the Canadian Expeditionary Force and receives the pay of a Brigadier-General. He is temporarily employed, receiving the same pay as an officer overseas.

Mr. KYTE: As a matter of fact, he is not overseas; the ordinary mind finds it difficult to understand why the pay is so large. This list shows that Major Purney received last year $2,972. Is he getting overseas pay?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If he has been overseas he is still in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. KYTE: Is it the rule of the department to continue overseas pay to officers after their return from overseas?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That has been the rule. They are temporarily employed until they receive their discharge.

Mr. PROULX: I see in the newspapers that over a hundred officers have come back from England without going to the front. They would not go to France as privates. Will these officers get their discharge?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, they are being discharged all the time—hundreds of them—upon their return to Canada.

Mr. PROULX: Will they be liable to service under the Military Service Act?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will have to refer my hon. friend to the Act; some might and some might not. Off-hand, I should not want to speak with authority in the matter.

Compensation to Mrs. Mary Hannon for loss of her husband who received injuries while employed as foreman at Valcartier Camp, which caused his death, including $25 for medical and funeral expenses, $2,025.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this the sum usually allowed in such cases?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: In the absence of a Dominion law or a central authority governing such matters, the Pensions and Claims Board recommend that, under the provisions of the revised statutes of the province of Quebec, 1909, there be paid to the widow, Mrs. Mary Hannon, in full compensation, the sum of $2,000 and that she be further paid the sum of $25 for medical and funeral expenses in connection with the death of her late husband.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You are paying just what would have been recovered under the Workmen's Compensation Act?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: The department, then, proceeds upon some system in regard to the payment of death claims?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, the Compensation Act of the province in question.

Mr. OLIVER: Of course, the Compensation Act of the province does not really govern the case.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is a basis upon which to act.

Mr. OLIVER: The department establishes as a principle that they accept the terms of the Compensation Act of the provinces in case of death?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Act is used as a basis for compensation.

Mr. OLIVER: The Militia Department, of course, not being under the control of the provinces, can accept the provincial law as a basis and yet, in the superstruction raised on that basis, not come altogether close to the provincial law. I am asking only for information. If I am to understand the minister as saying that they, in effect, adopt the provincial law, then I understand. But if he says: We use the provincial law as a basis, then I do not understand.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The provincial law is used as a basis or a guide on which to settle such claims. These claims come before the Pensions or Claims Board and are adjudicated by the Board. The awards are made in that manner.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not the Provincial Compensation Act that governs, but the Pensions Board?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, the provincial law is used as a basis or guide.

Mr. OLIVER: Therefore, as a matter of fact, there is no standard. The award is whatever the Pensions Board may decide?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If it is the departmental policy to compensate dependents for injuries caused to persons while in the service of the department, that means the adoption of a very wide rule. I have had some correspondence with the minister about the case of a man in Halifax who was engaged in doing some work on the forts. While he was so engaged, there was a premature explosion of powder, and he lost the sight of both eyes. That case would be just as strong as this could be.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Did my hon. friend take it up with the department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, with the minister himself.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: With my predecessor?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, with the present Minister of Militia, but I do not, of course, anticipate that he is dealing with the matter personally. I think, in a case of that kind, such a person is entitled to some compensation because he is unable to work and never again will be able to return to his former occupation. It is true he has not lost his life, as did the husband of Mrs. Hannon, but the case is a very serious one. Still, I can bring the matter to the attention of the officers of the department later on.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: What was the answer I gave in the case?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That it was having every consideration.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is under consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Well, it has been considered for a whole year, and I have very little hope of any action being taken. But, after having heard the minister's explanation about this claim, I give him notice that I shall call upon him personally some day soon.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: All right, I shall be delighted.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it the policy to recognize claims for injuries as well as for claims for death?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, we are doing that all the time.

Mr. OLIVER: On the basis of the provincial Act?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is taken, as I said, as a guide.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does that apply especially to the Militia Department, or does it apply to other departments of the Government?

Mr. CROTHERS: On page 17 there are a number of similar cases of compassionate allowances paid to widows.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is a great variety of ways of dealing with these cases. A few evenings ago it was drawn to the attention of the Government that the dependents of a man in New Brunswick received $600, and another allowance of $1,000 and another of $2,000 were referred to. There should be some way of dealing fairly with all the cases in all the departments. I had occasion to bring to the notice of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) a case in my constituency in which I was unable to get anything at all for a helpless child, the dependent of a sailor who had died in the service of the department—he contracted a cold from exposure and died in a hospital. The case was one of great hardship. I do not know if there is any universal rule about these matters; there does not seem to be. But the minister should bring the matter to the attention of his colleagues in the other departments, and a system should be adopted to apply to every one alike.

Mr. OLIVER: I would very much prefer to depend upon the provincial law, and if the Pensions Board, in considering a claim, would consider it not only upon the basis but upon the terms of the provincial law, that would be much more satisfactory to all concerned. The Pensions Board, so far as they have yet gone, judging by many reports that I have, seem to be under the impression that their business is to stand people off instead of to provide for the payment of claims. If they are dealing with those cases of accidental death or injury on the same basis, that is certainly not very gratifying to the parties who have suffered.

For payment to Mr. George McArthur of interest at three per cent on security cheque, $189.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What does that mean?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is a security cheque deposited with the Government, and this is the interest on it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is not this a new principle to adopt?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The interest is three per cent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the security was with the Government in the shape of a certified cheque, there is apparently to be a refund for interest during the time it was held. Was Mr. McArthur a contractor for the department?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, and this is interest on his cheque held by the department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The reason I am interested in this matter is that it has been the policy of the Government and of all departments to decline the payment of interest upon securities lodged with the Government. Was that security lodged during the time tenders were being called for?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The cheque was, by inadvertence, held in the department instead of being deposited with the Receiver General.

Mr. CARVELL: Is this man from St. John or Sussex, N.B.?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not know. The work was at Sussex.

Mr. CARVELL: I think I know the man. This is all right.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All I want to say about the matter is this: I am not very much interested in this particular item, but it is not the practice in other departments to allow interest.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Receiver General allows three per cent interest.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think so.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: We could not take millions of dollars on deposit without paying interest.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not done by the Public Works Department.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am surprised to hear that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have often thought it was unfair not to pay interest.

To provide for the following gratuities: Professor A. Laird, on his retirement from the staff of the Royal Military College, $3,271.67.

Mr. CARVELL: How is it these are all revotes?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They were all voted last year, but were not paid.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why did Professor Laird leave the department?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Because of illness.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If these amounts were voted, why did not the parties get the money?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The financial year had expired before the money was voted.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They will get it now?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I hope so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Professor Laird has since died; the money cannot be paid to him.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, it should be paid to his estate, and I move to amend the item accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the explanation of the next payment of $2,628 to the widow of the late Major Kilborn?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: This is based on one month's pay for every year the man has been in the service.

Mr. OLIVER: It is on a pension basis? The reason I ask is that lower down I see a gratuity to the widow of the late Mr. Gibson for only $365.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The gratuity depends upon the length of service and the rank.

To provide for the payment of the value of loss of timber licenses by reason of expropriation of land for site of Petawawa camp grounds to Robert Booth estate, $16,077.59; Samuel Bromley, $9,553.76; James R. Gillies, $12,724.40—$38,355.75.

Mr. CARVELL: I think this item requires some explanation. I remember a great many years ago, when Sir Frederick Borden was Minister of Militia, we used to have a good deal of discussion in this House over the claims for compensation by owners of timber licenses at Petawawa camp. I do not know whether the claims were settled in 1911 or 1912, but I think two large amounts were paid. This is certainly a large amount of money we are asked to vote. I used to go to Petawawa ten years ago. I suppose there may have been some timber there, but I never saw it. All I ever saw at Petawawa was sand and a sort of sagebrush, but there must be timber up the river. I often wondered on what ground these men based their claims for such enormous sums of money. I think the country is entitled to some explanation why this amount of $38,000 should be paid after so many years, unless of course it is a new expropriation, or something of that kind.

Contribution in aid of sufferers from an explosion in mine No. 3 of the Crow's Nest Pass Coal Company, on the 7th of June last, $537,250.

Mr. CROTHERS: In this explosion 38 miners lost their lives, leaving 24 widows and 52 young children. This compensation is to be distributed by a committee composed of the mayor of the town of Fernie, the manager of the Imperial Bank, the manager of the Home Bank, and three miners.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any system of compensation in British Columbia which would have been available for these people?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not sure as to that, but I know a contribution was made by private individuals amounting to about $11,000.

Mr. KYTE: I would draw the minister's attention to the explosion that took place in the town of New Waterford some weeks ago, in which 62 miners lost their lives. I should like very much if the minister would take that into consideration and, following the precedent he has established in this case, make some provision for the dependents of those who were killed at New Waterford. I suppose the minister has all the particulars, and I would once more urge upon him to consider whether the department could not make a similar allowance in this case.

Mr. CROTHERS: As soon as I heard of the accident at New Waterford through a press despatch, I communicated with our agent there for full particulars. I then took the matter up with the mayor of Sydney and one or two other prominent men, and they all wrote to say that they did not desire any donation, that the company was making ample provision for the dependents of the men who had lost their lives.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crothers, the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Saturday, September 1, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Eighth Annual Report of the Commission of Conservation, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1917.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 129, to amend the Companies Act so as to provide for the incorporation by Letters Patent of Corporations for purposes other than that of gain—Sir Thomas White.

Bill No. 130, relating to War Charities.—Sir Thomas White.

BACON AND LARD—PURCHASES IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): A special cable to the Ottawa Journal, dated London, August 31, contains the following:

The (British) Government cannot purchase in Canada bacon and lard owing to the limitations placed on it by the Imperial Treasury, as America is ready to finance contracts while Canada is not. As regards private buying, the Canadian prices are too high for Britain.

I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if there is any foundation for this dispatch?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): I do not think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) would have been in a position to answer, because that is merely a newspaper report which may or may not be authentic. I think I can say that the Government has no definite information in respect to the matter.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved:

That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1918, the sum of $51,681,871.90 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1917, the sum of $4,821,217.80 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

SUPPLY BILL.

Sir THOMAS WHITE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 128 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1918.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Dugald Stewart in the chair.

Department of the Secretary of State—To provide for one clerkship in First Division, Subdivision A, $2,800; to provide for four clerkships in Second Division, Subdivision B, 2 at $1,250, 2 at $1,150, $4,800; to provide for the administration of the Companies' Act, $5,000—$12,600.

Mr. MURPHY: I presume on account of the increased work in the Department of the Secretary of State, additional clerkships have been provided. There is an item here of $5,000 to provide for the administration of the Companies Act. What is that vote for?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The $5,000 for the administration of the Companies Act is to be withdrawn. A revision of the Companies Act has been introduced by the leader of the Senate, and it has been found impossible to go on with it this session. So this item will be withdrawn.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then there is a motion to reduce the amount to $7,600?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it will be reduced to that amount. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) was not quite right in regard to the additional clerkships. This is simply to provide for the promotion of certain clerks, and this item is necessary to comply with the provisions of the Act to amend the Civil Service Act. I move to strike out the item of $5,000.

Motion agreed to.

Miscellaneous expenses under the Canada Temperance Act—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is impossible to tell, I am informed, so far in advance, what moneys will be required for the administration of this Act, for the reason that we cannot tell how many counties will ask for the vote to be taken on the adoption of the Act. These moneys are required for six constituencies in which a vote is now to be taken, but chiefly to take care of the constituencies of Quebec and Quebec City. In view of the opposition there, it is necessary to hold an inquiry called an enquête, and the expenditure there will be considerable. The other constituencies are Compton and Missisquoi, in Quebec; Fredericton and Sunbury and Charlotte in New Brunswick.

Mr. CARVELL: Could the hon. gentleman give me any information as to the position of the Bill in the Senate? I suppose I can hardly expect an answer to that question now. There is a provision in the Bill which passed this House and went to the Senate which affects my own constituency, and that is the reason I ask the question. A prohibitory law came into effect in New Brunswick on 1st May, but it does not take effect until these counties which have adopted the Canada Temperance Act get that Act out of the way. There was a proposal that, in many cases, we might suspend the operation of the Canada Temperance Act by an Order in Council, and provision to that effect is included in the Bill. A petition has been sent to the Secretary of State—I do not know whether it is in Ottawa yet—from the counties of Charlotte and Carleton, New Brunswick. The vote was to take place in Charlotte on 21st September. I have received a number of letters in the last ten days inquiring as to what was going to be done. Have we to go on and hold the election, in order to get rid of the Canada Temperance Act, or can we get rid of it by Order in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill my hon. friend refers to passed this House, but is not yet through the Senate?

Mr. CARVELL: I believe it is not yet through the Senate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will make inquiry. The matter might be spoken to on the Orders of the Day on Monday or Tuesday next.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If it passes the Senate, what then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not say what the Government's course would be. We would have no power at all until it passes the Senate. I will make inquiry, and I will endeavour to obtain an answer.

Mr. CARVELL: I have a letter from the chief inspector of the province, pleading for an answer to the question, and I am unable to tell him exactly what might happen.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would like to know the policy of the Government with regard to this matter, as it affects my constituency. The Canada Temperance Act is in force in the constituency I have the honour to represent, and some of the people are opposed to having it repealed. There appears to be a difference of opinion as to whether it would be wise to repeal it or not. I want to know if it is the intention of the Government, by Order in Council, to repeal the Canada Temperance Act without any reference to the people of the constituency, or the county council, or any authority in the constituency?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman's question is the same exactly as that of the hon. gentleman from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and, of course, is answered by the statement already made. Possibly the hon. gentleman from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) might give us his best advice as to what should be done with respect to the repeal of the Act in those two counties.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would be glad to ascertain the views of the people if I could, and do anything I could to assist the minister in dealing with the question, but I must say that I do not altogether like the provisions. The policy of local option is a good one, and when the people vote for a measure and have it made law in the county it would be a little extreme to abolish it without any reference to them. But I am not sure what is the best policy to adopt. I would like to know whether the Government intend to take that step without any reference to the authorities in the county concerned?

Mr. CARVELL: The minister will pardon me for answering a question that is not directed to me. I think I can assist him to some extent. Under the Canada Temperance Act there must be a petition signed by twenty-five per cent of the qualified electors asking the Government to submit to the people a proposal either to adopt or to repeal the Act. We in New Brunswick have asked that when we have complied with these conditions precedent and have finished the petition signed by the necessary twenty-five per cent of the electors, the Government shall suspend the operation of the Act by Order in Council. The result would be that the Prohibition Act would automatically come into force. The reason why we have asked for that is that there is a provision in the New Brunswick legislation that there shall be a plebiscite upon the question whether or not the prohibition law shall continue. If the general prohibition law should be defeated, we would rather fall back upon the Canada Temperance Act by having the Order in Council repealed. That is the proceeding that we are trying to work out in New Brunswick, and I am sure it was what was in the mind of the Government when this Bill was introduced.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understand the hon. gentleman's explanation, it is this: Action by the Government merely suspends, whereas action by a vote of the constituency permanently repeals. It follows, he says, that where there is a petition of twenty-five per cent of the electors in the county in favour of such procedure, it is preferable that the Government should act by suspension rather than wait for the vote.

Mr. MARCIL: I did not understand the explanation given by the minister with regard to what was intended to be done in Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government has no special policy, of course, with regard to that province.

Mr. MARCIL: Applications have been received from some constituencies, I understand, in Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From the constituencies of Quebec city, Compton and Missisquoi.

Mr. MARCIL: What is to be done in Compton and Missisquoi?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Elections under the Canada Temperance Act are to take place in the three constituencies that I have named. We are providing $5,000 to cover the expense of these elections, particularly that of the election in Quebec, where there is very much opposition. The $5,000 covers the cost of administering these three elections and the three in New Brunswick.

Mr. MARCIL: The Canada Temperance Act is not in force in Missisquoi at present?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. MARCIL: I see in the Gazette to-day a notice that a petition has been received from Quebec city signed by over 8,000 electors; that Mr. Antoine Gobeil has been appointed returning officer, and that voting has been fixed for the 4th of October. Is that information correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no reason to think that it is incorrect.

Mr. MARCIL: Mr. Gobeil was the former Deputy Minister of Public Works in the province of Quebec. I am glad to know that a vote is to be taken in Quebec city, because there would be some difficulty in taking the vote under the provincial Act. There is a provision in that Act that there shall be only one polling booth in the whole city. I suppose that under the Canada Temperance Act the polling booths would be numerous and the vote would be taken under rules similar to those which prevail in a Dominion election?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think so.

Mr. CARROLL: There are only two counties in Nova Scotia now under the operation of the Canada Temperance Act, and I do not think it would make much difference whether the Canada Temperance Act were revoked by Order in Council or by reference to the people. We have a prohibition law in Nova Scotia, and when the Canada Temperance Act goes out, the other comes in. If application were made to the Government for the putting out of the Canada Temperance Act, there would be a saving to the Government if the necessary action were taken by Order in Council. I think the people of Nova Scotia are inclined to believe that they will not have the license system there in future. There can be no such thing as local option in Nova Scotia to-day. There was what was known as the Nova Scotia Temperance Act, but when the Canada Temperance Act was voted out of existence in any particular county, the Nova Scotia License Act came into force. They did have licenses in a few municipalities, but to-day there can be no licenses at all.

Miscellaneous—to provide for the expenses of the Commissioners, and other disbursements in connection with the Royal Commission to review the findings of the Hon. Mr. Justice Galt, $5,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The commission sat in Montreal for thirty-five days. The expenditure is not all settled, but so far it amounts to $4,800. It covers the expenses of one commissioner, $835, the official reporter, $696; counsel, $2,156; secretary, $800, rent of office, $215, incidentals, $100. There still remain the expenses of the other commissioner and a few incidentals.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Upon what ground is this Parliament asked to vote money to pay for expenditures in connection with that commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the commission was appointed under the authority of Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Under the authority of this Government, not of this Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Parliament passed the Inquiries Act; this Commission was appointed under that Act.

Mr. MARCIL: Is this a matter of Dominion jurisdiction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: I thought it related to Manitoba affairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not refer to Manitoba legislation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under what provision of the Inquiries Act can there be an inquiry into an investigation held under commission by a government of a province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not the Inquiries Act before me, but I am pretty sure that the Order in Council authorizing this inquiry purports to be under the authority of the Inquiries Act. The Inquiries Act is very wide.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If I remember rightly, the Inquiries Act has reference only to matters connected with management of a department of the Dominion Government. I do not see how the report of a Commissioner appointed by a provincial Government has anything to do with any of the departments of the federal Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would appear to the ordinary mind that the report of a King's Bench judge of a province reflecting seriously on the head of a department of Canada would form the subject of an inquiry that this House would be concerned with.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is true, but this House might perhaps appoint a committee to inquire into such a matter. This does not affect the head of the department as such; it affects the minister only when he was a member of a provincial government; it relates to conduct some years ago when he was not connected with this Government at all. A commission might just as well issue to investigate the conduct of any member of this House when he was in charge of some office not connected with the Government of Canada at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I remember that was the stand taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) some years ago. He is quite consistent now in taking the same stand; but then as now, we take higher ground. We take the ground that the previous public conduct of a minister of the Crown is a matter of present importance if the man concerned is still a minister of the Crown.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not the position which was taken years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was the position taken in 1910 by this side of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Quite the reverse.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The position taken then on this side was, and the position taken in England has always been, that anything that affects the honour of a public man elevated to the post of minister of the Crown, although the matter may have antedated his elevation to the post of minister of the Crown, was a matter of immediate public importance; that there really was no distinction in time arising from the fact that the subjects in question did antedate his elevation any more than should they be immediately concerning the conduct of his present department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The position which was taken years ago by the Conservative side of the House in regard to a commission headed by Mr. Justice Landry to investigate the conduct of some members of the New Brunswick Government was that the report of that commission was a judgment, that the commission was a court of justice and that therefore the decision of that court was not revisable by this Parliament. This Parliament has no right to revise a decision of a court of justice. The position taken by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) at that time was exactly what I said, namely, that the commission was a court of law, and that its judgment was final. He would not even look into the evidence. He took the judgment just as it was and contended that this Parliament had to accept it just as it was. We then, sitting on the other side, did not admit that at all. During this session I stated that the report of a commission is simply the opinion of a man of high character as to certain events which took place at a certain time. I do not think even the Minister of Labour will contend otherwise. The very fact that he acquiesced in having the opinion of Mr. Justice Galt revised by this commission is proof positive that, in his opinion, the judgment of Mr. Justice Galt was not equivalent to a judgment of a court of law. When the hon. gentleman who was then Minister of Public Works was not satisfied with that report, the Parliament of Canada was not entrusted with the matter of reviewing the findings, but the Government chose to take action under the authority of the Inquiries Act. I am not prepared at the present moment to say whether the Government had or had not jurisdiction. We can discuss that point later on, because I presume, before we separate, the Government will set a day for the discussion of the new report which was laid upon the table of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think my statement of the position taken then was correct. It is true, we took the stand that the judgment of Mr. Commissioner Landry of that date was of the nature of a judgment of a court of law, although not in precise terms such a judgment. Consequently, while it stood, Parliament could not shut its eyes to it. But that does not say that Parliament should reverse it. We have not reversed it here; we treat it simply as being in the nature of a judgment of a court of law and subject to the incidents of any judgment of any court of law, namely, subject to revision by a tribunal of the same nature but of higher status. We did not presume ourselves to sit in judgment over the findings of Mr. Justice Galt. We appoint a tribunal of similar character, but of higher status, to review that judgment. That is all. The same stand as we took then we take now. While that judgment stands, Parliament cannot shut its eyes to it. That is the doctrine followed in England, and we follow it here. When it is reversed by a judgment of a tribunal of similar character but of a higher status——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How is the present tribunal higher than that of Mr. Justice Galt?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was higher first of all in that the senior member of the tribunal was the Chief Justice of a province—the Chief Justice of Manitoba is surely higher than Mr. Justice Galt. Secondly, the tribunal was higher in point of—numbers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How is the Chief Justice of Manitoba higher than a judge of the King's Bench of Manitoba?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Chief Justice of Manitoba is higher than a judge of the King's Bench of Manitoba.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the judges in question are of different provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The provinces are equal. Therefore it follows mathematically that the status of the same courts are equal. The King's Bench of Manitoba is not the highest court of that province. There is a court above that; and above that again, there is the Chief Justice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why did you not appoint him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We appointed a man of the same status. I do not think my hon. friend does very great credit to his province when he says that the Chief Justice of New Brunswick is not of the same status as the Chief Justice of Manitoba. I do not think he would be thanked by the Bench or Bar of New Brunswick for that statement.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister cannot take that ground with regard to Mr. Justice Tellier. He has ceased to be a judge; he has retired.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think his status falls or his qualifications are diminished on account of his retirement. The status of the other commissioner was undoubtedly equal to, if not higher than that of Mr. Justice Galt, and from the point of numbers, of course, they had a right to review, on the same principle that in various provinces in Canada a court en banc sits as a court of appeal over the judgments of members of a court of the same status—simply by virtue of numbers, they become a higher tribunal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says that the Chief Justice of New Brunswick has a higher status than a judge of the King's Bench of Manitoba. Would he suggest for a single moment that any person could appeal from the judgment of a judge of the King's Bench of Manitoba to the Chief Justice of another province?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He could not unless Parliament authorized him to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Parliament has not that power.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, acting under the Inquiries Act, passed by this Parliament, we have that power. If my hon. friend will read the Order in Council, which recites the Inquiries Act, he will find he had a basis for it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me read the section of the Inquiries Act, chapter 124 of the Revised Statutes of Canada:

> The Governor in Council may, whenever he deems it expedient, cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of Canada or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof.

It does seem to me a most absurd thing to say that this Government could appoint a commission to reverse the report—or rather the expressed opinion, because as my hon. friend has stated, it was only an opinion—of a commissioner appointed by the provincial government to inquire into certain transactions connected with the administration of the affairs of that province. What the Inquiries Act provides is that in any matter connected with the good government of the Dominion, a subject over which this Parliament has jurisdiction, or connected with the public business of Canada, there may be inquiry. I should think that the Government of Manitoba could to-morrow, with equal reason, appoint another judge to revise and express an opinion upon the report of Chief Justice McLeod and Mr. Justice Tellier. And what a farce that would be! It seems to me the only proper course to take would be the course that was taken in 1909, when this Parliament was asked to inquire into the evidence and form its judgment upon the question whether a person occupying a seat in the Government was worthy to be continued in that office. But the result of this Government appointing commissioners to revise the opinions of commissioners appointment by a provincial government can only be of the most farcical character. I understand that $2,100 is to be paid to counsel. Who appointed counsel?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The commissioners.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The counsel was Mr. Teed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not intend to discuss this question now, because my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has intimated that there will be another opportunity. What I cannot understand is this: suppose that the two members of the Bench whom the Government appointed to revise the finding in a purely local affair in the province of Manitoba had brought in a report that did not suit the Government; would there be any objection to appointing three more judges to see if they could bring in a decision that would suit the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would never do that.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend would take that ground, and not the ground that this was in the interest of the public, he would get along very much better. While the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) has a very acute legal mind, and argued his case as well as he possibly could, he must have realized that it was hard going to argue that the Chief Justice of New Brunswick and a retired judge of the province of Quebec formed a court that in some way had a right to reverse the finding made by a Manitoba judge, without calling witnesses and without going over the evidence thoroughly. Mr. Justice Galt made a finding after he had had the opportunity of seeing the witnesses and observing their demeanour on the stand, which helped him form an opinion whether they were telling the truth or not. It is an elementary principle of law, which every lawyer in the House learnt in his first year when he was at Blackstone, that except in a very flagrant case a court of review will not interfere with the finding of facts made by a judge in the first instance on the ground that he had the advantage of observing the demeanour of witnesses in coming to his conclusions. Mr. Justice Galt came to a certain conclusion, partly from certain evidence that was taken before him, and partly from the manner of the witnesses in giving their evidence. Then this Government appoints two other men, who never saw one of the witnesses, and who could not possibly have gone over all the evidence in that time—they may have glanced over it, but they could not possibly have had time to read all the evidence, all the exhibits, and everything like that. Then these two judges say, "We find differently." What weight can be attached to a finding under those circumstances? But I am not going to discuss that now. I should like to know on what reasoning this Government asks this country to pay $5,500 to defray the expenses of this commission. I think I am correct in saying that when this commission was appointed some member of the Government informed the House that the commissioners were acting without salary. I know from personal knowledge that one of the commissioners was acting without salary. Where, then, does the $5,500 come in? My hon. friend says that counsel was appointed. Counsel for whom? Counsel to assist the gentleman whose conduct was being investigated? No counsel was appointed for the country, because nothing was done; they did not call witnesses, except the gentleman whose conduct was being investigated, who, I understand, appeared before the commissioners and made a statement. No witnesses were called, and there was no argument. The public does not know what took place, or whom counsel represented, if it was not the gentleman whose conduct was under examination. Does the Government ask this country to pay $5,500 to defray the expenses of counsel for the Hon. Mr. Rogers? That is about what it means. I know that one counsel who was there was not representing the gentleman whose conduct was being investigated; he was not there representing the people. I cannot reveal personal matters, but I will take the responsibility for saying that he was there simply to assist Mr. Justice McLeod. Now if Mr. Justice McLeod was receiving no salary, by what right does the Government appoint somebody else to go in and do his business?—because that is what it amounts to.

I have no objection whatever to the gentleman who received the salary. He is one of the best lawyers in Canada, and no doubt rendered valuable services. I hope he got a good fee out of it. (I may say that I adjourned legal actions in order to give him an opportunity to finish up this matter.) At the same time. I must seriously object to the people of Canada being called upon at this late date to reimburse the men who paid those fees. I think we ought to have a pretty clear explanation from the minister as to who employed these gentlemen, how much they were receiving, the conditions of their employment, and generally, the reasons why the country is being called upon to pay the expenses of defending the gentlemen who were attacked.

Mr. CROTHERS: I would like to say a word in reply to the reference made by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to a motion made in this House in May, 1909, asking the House in substance to express its disapproval of the conduct of the then Minister of Public Works as set forth in a report made by Judge Landry and two others. My right hon. friend repeated here to-day what he said a few weeks ago, that that motion was founded entirely upon the report, and that there was no reference whatever to the evidence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CROTHERS: My right hon. friend is quite mistaken in that. Speaking on this subject a few weeks ago, he quoted some remarks I made at the time I had the honour, or otherwise of launching the motion. It is quite true as he quoted the remarks I made then, that I took the position that there was a report of this tribunal very solemnly constituted, as my right hon. friend will remember.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very solemnly constituted.

Mr. CROTHERS: Very solemnly constituted, by a special Act of the legislature. I took the position that so long as that report stood we were warranted in concluding it was right, and that if there was any objection to it it was the duty of the person chiefly involved to take steps to have it set aside.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How could that be done?

Mr. CROTHERS: I was just going to refer to that. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) took the position then that he knew how it could be done, and he told us he had already taken steps before the courts to have it done. He told us that he had already issued a writ in the courts of New Brunswick asking for certain accounting which would bring before the courts the whole matter that was investigated by that commission. I am advised, however, that he never went any further than issuing the writ. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was quite right in citing some remarks I made on that occasion, but he is quite wrong when he says the whole motion rested on the report and not on the evidence. He will remember very well that we had all the evidence before Parliament at that time and that the hon. member for St. John had it in his possession, but refused to refer to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY Who had the evidence?

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley).

Mr. PUGSLEY: I refused to refer to the evidence?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend's memory is entirely wrong. I demanded that the evidence should be quoted.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have my hon. friend's speech under my hand. If he will refer to page 5710 of Hansard for 1909 he will find:

> Mr. Pugsley: Mr. Speaker, before recess I was pointing out some statements contained in the report, which statements show how little reliance is to be placed upon this report. I am doing this without troubling the House by referring to the evidence. I may say I could not refer to the evidence even if I desired to do so because I have not been able to obtain a full copy. I have copies of, I think, two volumes, but have not been able to obtain the rest.

There were only two volumes, and the hon. gentleman admitted he had two volumes, so he had the whole of the evidence; therefore he said, in so many words "I will not refer to the evidence at all."

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend pardon me a moment?

Mr. CROTHERS: Not unless you ask me a question. I do not want you to make a speech. You will have an opportunity when I sit down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I simply want to correct my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. CROTHERS: What is your point of order?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My point of order is that my hon. friend is making a statement which is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is not a point of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As a matter of fact I had certain of the evidence. I also stated that the provincial government had been requested to lay the entire evidence upon the table of the provincial legislature, which they had refused to do——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY—and I quoted from all the evidence I had available.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have my hon. friend's speech before me, and there is no quotation whatever from the evidence throughout the whole of it. I remember very well that the present Mr. Justice Crocket, then a member of this House, followed my hon. friend. Reference to his speech will corroborate what I am saying. He said that the hon. member for St. John admitted having two volumes of the evidence, and that there were only two volumes, and that the hon. member did not refer to any portion of the evidence in his speech. I have read the speech very carefully and if any hon. gentleman in this House is sufficiently interested in this matter to look it up in Hansard he will find that my hon. friend did not refer to the evidence at all, although he had the whole of it in his possession. The present Judge Crocket also had the evidence. My hon. friend from St. John spoke for four hours and a half on the subject, without referring to the evidence once. Mr. Crocket spoke for five hours and a half and is reported in 69 columns of Hansard, a large portion of which is taken up with extracts from the evidence. Yet, notwithstanding these facts, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), either through inadvertence or lack of memory states that this motion went forward in the House in 1909 without any reference to the evidence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is what I said.

Mr. CROTHERS: But, that is not the fact. The fact is, as appears by Hansard, that the present Judge Crocket cited column after column from the evidence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He referred to the evidence after I had done so. His reference was in answer to mine.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend from St. John never referred to the evidence at all. I would like to say a word in reply to what my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) said in regard to the evidence. I admit he is a good lawyer, and has enjoyed a large practice for many years. He will agree with me, I think, that on a question of evidence a court of appeal will not consider a matter where there is a conflict of evidence, or where it is a question of the weight of evidence. This is especially so in regard to the finding of a jury, which has the advantage of seeing the witnesses, of observing their manner in the box, and so on. So far as my memory goes, however, it is not the practice in a case where there is absolutely no evidence.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope my hon. friend does not contend that is the case in the Galt report?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, I do. If my hon. friend has read the evidence at all—

Mr. CARVELL: I have

Mr. CROTHERS: —and the findings of the two judges who considered the matter in Montreal. They did not discuss it as a conflict of evidence; they said that there was absolutely no evidence to warrant the inference drawn; that there was no direct evidence at all, and no evidence warranting the inference. They did not rule on a question of weight of evidence, but they ruled that there was no evidence warranting any such inference.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend remembers and admits that he introduced the resolution of censure against the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in 1909. He spoke of everybody's speech except his own.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I spoke of mine.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You spoke of the speeches of the hon. member for St. John, and of Mr. Crocket, now Judge Crocket.

Mr. CROTHERS: I admitted that you correctly quoted what I said on that occasion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend took a position exactly the reverse of his position to-day. In presenting his motion he took this position: I refuse to look at the evidence; here is the judgment of a court of law, I shall not go beyond the judgment; upon that judgment I ask a vote of censure upon the hon. member for St. John. My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) very properly said: This is not the judgment of a court but only the opinion of Mr. Justice So-and-So, and I am prepared to say that in many respects the opinion of the commission is in error. Then there was a discussion between the hon. member for St. John and Mr. Crocket revising the evidence adduced before the commission. If I drew attention to that it was simply to say that the opinion held at that time by the gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury benches was that a commission of that kind was a court of law, that its finding was the judgment of a court of law, and that if it was such a judgment, it could not be revised by this Parliament. But all of this is now discarded; it is sophistry; the commission of Mr. Justice Landry was not a court of law, the commission of Mr. Justice Galt was not a court of law. The commission of Mr. Justice Tellier and Mr. Justice McLeod was not a court of law, but simply a commission of gentlemen entrusted to do what Mr. Justice Galt was entrusted to do, to investigate certain facts. He made the investigation; he had witnesses brought before him; he could have reported to the Government without an expression of opinion, but he expressed an opinion.

Mr. CROTHERS: The question between my right hon. friend and me is not anything about Judge Galt. The question is whether he stated that we did not use the evidence at all on the motion made in this House in 1909, and if he did make that statement, was it correct?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I say that my friend who made the motion never used the evidence.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is not the question. You said the evidence was not used.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That was the question as presented to the House, but my hon. friend from St. John riddled the speech of the Minister of Labour; he showed that the commission was not a court of law or its findings a judgment, but that its finding was only the opinion of Mr. Justice Landry and of gentlemen associated with him; and he proceeded to riddle the report made, and there was a controversy between him and Mr. Crocket. No one pretended—I never pretended—that the opinion of Mr. Justice Galt was final. It was simply the opinion of Mr. Justice Galt, a man of high character, at one time an eminent member of the bar, a man selected by the Government to be a justice of the court of Manitoba—and I think it was a good appointment according to everybody. He gave his opinion. But I never contended that the opinion of Mr. Justice Galt was final; it could be discussed and it will be for Parliament, or for the Legislature of Manitoba primarily, to determine whether or not the report is well founded. The Government have taken the position that the opinion of Mr. Justice Tellier and Mr.

Justice McLeod is final; but their opinion has no more weight than the opinion of Mr. Justice Galt. It has to be laid upon the table of the House, it has to be discussed by the House, because it is the result of action taken by the Government, and the Government having taken that action, rightly or wrongly, the result is subject to be revised by this Parliament. But between the report of one judge and the report of two judges, there is no difference whatever. When my friends say that the judgment of Mr. Justice Galt has been revised by a court of higher jurisdiction, that is all sophistry and fallacy. Mr. Justice Tellier and Mr. Justice McLeod occupy no higher standing than Mr. Justice Galt. What is the chief justice of any court? He has no more power than any other judge; he has the same rank and standing. The only difference between one report and the other is that, in the case of the latter commission, the late Minister of Public Works was a party to choosing the two men who sat upon the report of Mr. Justice Galt.

Mr. CROTHERS: My right hon. friend, by making a long speech concerning Mr. Justice Galt, cannot get away from the statement made the other day and repeated to-day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Which?

Mr. CROTHERS: That there was no reference to the evidence on the motion made in this House in 1909—that we did not rely upon the evidence. That is not according to facts, although the right hon. gentleman has repeated it to-day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We may discuss that.

Mr. CROTHERS: You find in Judge Crocket's speech column after column of references to the evidence. My right hon. friend knows that, and yet he said in the House a month ago, and repeated to-day, that our motion was not founded on evidence, and that there was no reference to the evidence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If you pass me the volume I shall quote your own words.

Mr. CROTHERS: I admit that I launched the motion, and that I had not the evidence before me; I made my speech on the report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is what I said the other day.

Mr. CROTHERS: But it does not follow from that that the motion was not supported by evidence. It was supported by evidence quoted by Mr. Crocket during four and one-half hours. When the statement is made that it was not referred to by Mr. Crocket, although he had it in his possession, the inference is that he knew his statements would not be corroborated by the evidence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The inference is that my hon. friend had the evidence and would not use it because it was against his own motion.

Mr. MURPHY: What was said or was not said, what was done or not done, in 1909 will not answer the question asked by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). This discussion arose out of that hon. gentleman's question. He asked what authority the Government had for asking this House to pay the $5,500 set out in this item. The Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) replied that the Government had the authority of Parliament. When pressed he explained that by that reply he meant that Parliament had passed the Inquiries Act and that, as the Commission which whitewashed the late Minister of Public Works was appointed under the Inquiries Act, therefore the Government had the authority of Parliament for doing what it did. My hon. friend the member for St. John joined issue with the Secretary of State upon that reply, and I submit that the position taken by the hon. member for St. John is entirely correct, and that it is borne out by the terms of the submission or reference to the McLeod-Tellier Commission. I have not the terms of the Order in Council here—the Secretary of State referred to them— but I have under my hand the report of the judges Tellier and McLeod. The first paragraph of that report recites the facts and circumstances relating to their appointment, and referring to the Order in Council appointing them, which was based upon the Inquiries Act, they state that by that Order they were empowered and directed to conduct an inquiry and investigation for the purpose of reviewing and considering the evidence taken by Mr. Justice Galt, and to review and consider his report and findings on such evidence, and to report whether such evidence sustains or supports the findings of the said Commissioner as set forth in such report in so far as they reflect upon or prejudicially affect the honour or integrity of the Honourable Robert Rogers, or the honesty of his dealings or transactions.

The very terms of the Order in Council appointing the Commission, I submit, bear out the contention of the hon. gentleman from St. John that, in this case, the Government is straining the Inquiries Act beyond its uttermost limits when it seeks to justify itself in asking this House to vote a sum of money to pay these gentlemen for the services they rendered in connection with this Commission. Obviously, as the hon. gentleman from St. John pointed out, the Inquiries Act relates only to matters over which this Parliament has jurisdiction. This Commission was not appointed to consider anything of that kind. It was appointed to consider matters arising out of Mr. Rogers' connection with other things, when he was a member of another Government, before he came to Ottawa at all. I submit, the very terms of the Order in Council itself, which are referred to, and briefly extracted in the first paragraph of the Tellier-McLeod report, establish the soundness of the position taken by the hon. gentleman from St. John, and justify the question asked by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot understand why the matter of the report of Mr. Justice Landry, of the Supreme Court in New Brunswick, should be referred to in connection with this vote. Neither do I understand why the matters which were the subject of a debate in connection with that report should be dragged into this discussion.

There is obviously a great distinction between the two matters. In the discussion upon the New Brunswick report, the conduct of the present member for St. John—formerly a minister of the Crown—was in question. It is true it had relation to matters which occurred in the administration of provincial affairs. This Parliament is supreme in anything in reference to the conduct of a member of Parliament. It might be quite competent for this House to declare that the conduct of a sitting member at any time in his career was of such a nature as to debar him from sitting in the House, and in that respect and for that reason, it might be contended at least that this Parliament had absolute jurisdiction to discuss such matters, and that they might do so with propriety. But this case is altogether different. The judgment of Mr. Justice Galt was not questioned in this Parliament. It was not a subject of discussion here. No charges were preferred against the late Minister of Public Works, Hon. Mr. Rogers, in connection with his administration of public affairs in the province of Manitoba. Nobody here in Parliament asked for the appointment of a parliamentary committee, or moved that it be referred to a commission of judges. He was not asked to defend himself in this House. Parliament never asked for the appointment of a commission. The Government appointed the commission themselves, and I say they had no right or authority to do so and it was absolutely improper. Nothing has been gained by the appointment of the commission. The report does not illuminate the matters at issue in the province of Manitoba. The late Minister of Public Works was to blame a great deal in not being represented at the inquiry in Manitoba. He should have been represented by counsel. The inquiry at Montreal the other day was an ex parte affair. The Government of Manitoba denied the jurisdiction of the commission to make the inquiry—at least they denied the propriety of the inquiry. I say that, on no ground whatever should we be asked to vote this money. If Parliament had asked for an inquiry, all very well and good, we probably should pay the expenses of the commissioner. Parliament never asked for the appointment of a commission; it was the former Minister of Public Works himself who asked the Government to appoint such a commission. I submit that it is an unjustifiable thing for Parliament to vote this $5,000. I say, further, the committee should not be asked to vote it, and I move that this amount be struck from the resolution.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Parliament is the custodian of the honour of its members, and the Government to that extent represents Parliament. A minister of the Crown, and a member of this House, had been found, by a tribunal appointed by the province of Manitoba, to be guilty of certain grave offences, which, if true, would disentitle him, in my judgment, to occupy an office under the Crown, or possibly a seat in this chamber. This Parliament, through its Government, appointed this commission. Every member of this House acceded to the request of the hon. member for an enquiry when he pointed out that these charges had been made, and that these unfounded conclusions had been arrived at by the tribunal who considered them. He asked, not so much that the evidence be reviewed, as that two men of eminence should determine whether or not there was any evidence upon which he could be found guilty of the charges made. It is common ground, it seems to me, to every lawyer in this House, that when a verdict is reached by a jury against evidence you may go to the Court of Appeal, and when the verdict is against the weight of evidence you may go to the Court of Appeal, and in either of these two cases you must consider the question of the sufficiency, so to speak, of the evidence to establish the charges. But there is another ground common to all members of this House engaged in the practice of the legal profession, and that is whether or not there is any evidence at all to submit to the jury, and if there be no evidence to submit to the jury any judgment founded upon that state of facts must inevitably be set aside. Within he last two years I presented unsuccessfully to the Supreme Court here, on behalf of the appellant a case in which the Grand Trunk Pacific was the respondent and in that case the learned judge had left to the jury the question of negligence. The issue in the Supreme Court was whether or not there was any evidence at all to go to the jury upon that issue, and the court here held that the mere fact that the ladder had slipped was not in itself evidence of negligence, and therefore the verdict of the jury, and the judgment of the court based upon such verdict, must be set aside, because there was no evidence to go to the jury.

They did not enter into any discussion with respect to the credibility of the witnesses; they did not enter into any discussion of the character of the evidence; they merely determined, on a perusal of the record, that there was no evidence whatever to leave to the jury. In this case the Government of this country, speaking for every member of Parliament, determined that the accused minister, in view of the statements made by him, was entitled to have a court of appeal determine whether or not there was any evidence to be left to the jury. Two gentlemen of eminence, one the Chief Justice of New Brunswick and the other an ex-Justice of Quebec, reviewed the evidence, went over the findings, considered the conclusions. Any lawyer in this House, however biased his opinion, or however prejudiced his views may be, will agree that in the testimony referred to in the report of Mr. Justice McLeod and Mr. Justice Tellier there is not a single scintilla of evidence upon which an appellate tribunal would determine that there was any evidence to go to the jury. Of course, as the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has said, the ex-Minister of Public Works should have been represented, but he was not. Serene in the consciousness of his own innocence with respect to the charges preferred against him, he was willing that the matter should be heard without his being represented by counsel. Having regard to the circumstances, and to the high state of party feeling which prevailed at the time of the hearing before Commissioner Galt, the judges who sat as the appelate court properly concluded that the views of counsel had obtained over the evidence. The counsel who presented the case on behalf of the province did it so powerfully and so strongly that they were able to convince the learned Commissioner Galt that certain charges had been well preferred; that they had been established to his satisfaction.

Hon. gentlemen in this House must put themselves in exactly the same position as that in which the ex-minister found himself. Unfounded in fact, without a scintilla of evidence, without there being a line of testimony to support it, the conclusion arrived at by a tribunal properly constituted by the province of Manitoba was that there was evidence of guilt, when in fact there was none. Would hon. gentlemen not expect the Government of the day, under these circumstances, to ask that a commission be appointed for the purpose of reviewing that testimony—not of reviewing it in the broad sense of the term, but to determine really whether or not there was any evidence that might be left to any jury to which a man might with safety and confidence appeal in respect of the charges preferred against him? I do submit that this item should be carried. This expenditure was properly incurred. The case of one ex-Minister of Public Works may be the case of some other gentleman to-morrow; it might well be the case of some other gentleman now. This Parliament, under all constitutional usages and precedents, being the custodian of its own honour—the Government being the mouthpiece of this Parliament—must ever be on the alert to protect the reputation of its members from assaults that may be made against them under the stress and strain of bitter partisanship. Is it reasonable, at a time when the prejudices of men's minds were excited by certain revelations in Manitoba, that, Mr. Rogers, simply because he had taken a very active part in the elections and had been a member of the Provincial Government, should be charged with malfeasance and maladministration, and stripped of his reputation? Is it reasonable that this conclusion should be arrived at upon an accumulation of a vast quantity of evidence that directed itself to no particular point or against no particular facts?

But it is not the late Minister of Public Works that we speak of; it is the man who occupies a position of trust and authority under the Crown. Hon. gentleman opposite themselves would like to—and may—occupy similar positions. They must put themselves in the position in which Mr. Rogers was placed; they must put themselves in the position of hon. gentlemen who are anxious to maintain the dignity and honour of this Parliament. Undoubtedly, had the conclusions of Mr. Justice Galt stood, Mr. Rogers would not have been considered a fit person to occupy office under the Crown and to sit in this House. The same considerations should obtain to-day as those which induced the House of Commons in days gone by, both in Great Britain and in Canada, to expel from its membership men who should not sit in it because they were not fit to do so. The considerations that sent Lynch from the Imperial Parliament and Riel from this Parliament on the motion of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, still prevail. It is still within the constitutional right of a member of this House to stand in his place and move the expulsion of a fellow member on the ground that he is unfit to sit in the House or to hold office under the Crown. The ex-Minister of Public Works was improperly and unfairly charged with offences which were not proven. I can readily understand, however, that the then commissioner might conclude that these charges were established, having regard to the criminal proceedings that were then being had against ex-ministers of the Crown and to the state of excited public opinion that had arisen because of wrong-doing in Manitoba. Mr. Justice Galt arrived, then, at conclusions with respect to Mr. Rogers and those conclusions have been determined to be without the support of a single scintilla of evidence or vestige of testimony. It seems to me that with a larger aspect and a wider view, hon. gentlemen opposite should look on this case not as the case of Mr. Rogers, not as the case of an individual, but as the case of a member of this House, a minister of the Crown, who is charged with offences which were not proven, with wrong-doing which was not established, with malfeasance and maladministration of which there was no evidence.

[Mr. R. B. Bennett.]

No man in this House, no speaker on a public platform, no newspaper has been so bold as to say that in the whole of the record of the proceedings before Mr. Justice Galt, there was a single line that pointed to the conclusions at which the commissioner arrived. That is a fact that should be kept in mind. Eminent lawyers, not associated with the party with which I have been associated, read the testimony with care, and not one of them has said that a single line of the evdience established the conclusions against Mr. Rogers This House should be proud and glad that we have in power a Government willing to spend a few thousand dollars in order that one of our fellow members, one of the ministers of the Crown, holding a high office and enjoying a position in which he has the confidence of his Sovereign, should be given an opportunity before an unbiased tribunal, not to present new testimony, but to have the former testimony reconsidered. The commission appointed to review the findings of Mr. Justice Galt made it clear that upon the closest scrutiny and the most careful examination of the record, there was not a single word, a scintilla of testimony, upon which to base conclusions that were arrived at.

Mr. CARVELL: In view of the most remarkable statements made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) and by the member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) who is half in and half out with the Government—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, he is all out.

Mr. CARVELL: I want to second the proposal made by the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), and I do so with the very greatest sincerity. When the Government ask the people to pay $5,500 to meet the expenses of reviewing the findings of Mr. Justice Galt on the ground that there was not a scintilla of evidence—to quote the expression used by the member for Calgary at least three or four times—to justify that finding, before I vote for the payment of this money I am going to demand a chance to investigate that matter and to discuss it in this House. I have persistently opposed the public investigation in the House of Commons, of the Hon. Mr. Rogers' affairs in Manitoba. We have passed through a session of six or seven months since these reports became public and from this side of the House not one word has been stated in reference to it, and there has been no condemnation of Mr. Rogers.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There has been in the press.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not our fault. We have refrained from discussing Mr. Rogers' position, and up to the present time we have decided to take that course. We believed, when Mr. Rogers resigned and quietly slipped out of the Government, that would probably be the end of the matter, and perhaps it was better to let him rest in peace. But if our friends want us to vote an amount of money—it is true it is not very large, but the principle is the same—to pay for a whitewashing report over Hon. Mr. Rogers on the ground that there was no evidence whatever to justify Mr. Commissioner Galt in making his findings, then I say that, before I vote for it, I am going to demand the right to discuss the evidence in the most public manner; and I think I can convince my hon. friend from Calgary that there is more than a scintilla of evidence, indeed, that there is a mountain of evidence, to justify Mr. Justice Galt in the report he made. In that case, this item should stand until we have an opportunity to discuss the matter, and we will then try to convince hon. gentlemen opposite who clapped their hands at the statements of the hon. member for Calgary, and some of whom have not read a line of the evidence, that there was ample evidence to justify Mr. Justice Galt in his findings. We will then discuss the matter and give the whole story, and show those hon. members and the people of Canada that there was no justification for reviewing that evidence. There was ample evidence on which to make a finding—so much evidence that no other finding could have been made than that made by Mr. Justice Galt. We, therefore, demand that this item stand until we have an opportunity to discuss the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Personally, I accept the findings of the last and highest tribunal on the subject, but it is not because that tribunal has found that there is no evidence to support the findings of the lower tribunal that we asked that this vote be passed.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what we are told by the Minister of Labour and the hon. member for Calgary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Calgary said that there was no evidence, but he did not say that was why we asked that this vote be passed. We would have asked that this vote be passed if the findings of Mr. Justice Galt was justified, just the same as if it was not. The position here is one of the outgrowths of the constitution of this country. We are not constituted, as Great Britain is, with a single Parliament; we are a federal Parliament, and we have nine provincial parliaments, all of which have plenary jurisdiction within their spheres. The consequence is that any provincial parliament may appoint a commission of inquiry, a semi-judicial commission, and that commission may investigate the conduct of a minister of the Crown of Canada, either while he is minister or before he became minister. They have power either way. That commission of inquiry may come out with a report which may reflect in the most grave and serious manner on the common honesty and honour of a minister of the Crown of this Dominion. That has been the case already in more instances than one in Canada. That being the case, and such a report coming out and being made a public report of a semi-judicial character, what is to be done by the Government of Canada and by the Parliament of Canada? Only two courses are open. The one course is to ignore it; to blind our eyes to it; to say that we have nothing to do with that report whatever; that we do not care what that semi-judicial judgment says; that it may declare that this man is a thief or a murderer, but that we have nothing to do with that report; that we pay no attention to it; that we do not care whether it blasts the reputation of this man throughout Canada or not; that we do not care whether it undermines his consequence or his influence as a minister of the Crown or not; that we turn our backs to it and shut our eyes to it, and let it go. We have another course. We may have an investigation; we may have a review, and if we have a review at all, we should have it before such a tribunal as would be looked upon by the country generally as being higher in status, more disinterested and more entitled to public confidence than the first. Unless we do that, we might as well not have a tribunal at all. That is the second and only other course, for the reason that there is no way of submitting the judgment of the first commission of inquiry to any court of the land. If we tried to bring it before a court of the land, we should immediately be told: This court of appeal has no jurisdiction; we can do nothing with the judgment of Mr. Justice Landry in New Brunswick; we can do nothing with the judgment of Mr. Justice Galt in Manitoba. There is no judicial tribunal competent to review the findings of that court of inquiry appointed by a provincial legislature. Therefore, if there is to be a tribunal, it would have to be established by this House. There are only those two courses. The one is to permit a minister of the Crown, if he be such, or a member of this House, if he be such, to lie under the shadow of that finding without any appeal at all; to place him in the position of a man charged with theft or murder and to deny to him the right of the ordinary citizen of Canada. We could take that course, or we could take the only other course, namely, to establish a tribunal of the same nature as the one that found against him, but higher in status, and to submit to that tribunal for review and appeal what was submitted to the first.

I ask the members of this House to compare the wisdom of the two courses. Suppose we adopted the first course. Is it fair, honourable or just? Is it fundamentally right or sound? We are told that it does not concern this House; that it does not concern the public affairs of Canada. I say that it vitally and fatally concerns both. I know nothing that comes so clearly within the purview of the Inquiries Act which says that we may make an investigation into any matter that affects the good government of Canada. Who would suggest that the impugned honour of a minister of the Crown of Canada does not affect the good government of Canada? It fundamentally and vitally affects it. No one in the world can compare the two courses. The one permits him to sit in this House of Commons as a minister of the Crown, while his honour is under the shadow of a finding of a tribunal appointed by a legislature or by a government of a province. Is that a right state of affairs? Is it just or fair? The other is the only course open—to seek to appoint a tribunal that will better command the confidence of the people than would the first tribunal, to submit the facts fairly to it and to ask it for a finding. It is suggested by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) that this tribunal was appointed to whitewash and that, pursuant to its appointment, it whitewashed the former Minister of Public Works. I do not think my hon. friend should make that statement. I do not appeal against the statement acting particularly for the ex-Minister of Public Works, but I do appeal against the statement standing by the honour and reputation of the eminent justices who reviewed the findings. I do not think there has been anything in the public career, in the judicial reputation, of Sir Ezekiel McLeod or Mr. Justice Tellier, that would justify any citizen of Canada—not to say, any hon. member of the House of Commons—to attribute to them the character of being whitewashers of public men. I do not think the chief justice of his own province will thank the hon. member for Carleton for describing him before the people of Canada as a tool of this or any other Government, or as a whitewasher of public men of any party, or as anything but an honourable and reputable judge.

It was stated, when this commission was appointed, that neither of the members of it was known to the hon. Mr. Rogers at all; that he had never so much as seen either of them. They were appointed solely because of their eminence on the Bench, and because upon inquiry they were found willing to undertake the work, and because of their disinterestedness in this particular matter, for they could not possibly be said to be swayed by any of the provincial partisan activities in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They could not be influenced by what the judge called the "atmosphere".

Mr. MEIGHEN: By what was described by the trial judge as the "atmosphere" of the case. That was why they were appointed.

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never saw Chief Justice McLeod or Mr. Justice Tellier in my life. I had heard of them both, and believed they were honourable and able judges. That was all that concerned me, and I think that is all that concerned any member of the Government. I should like to know who could have been selected from the Bench of Canada who would be described as able judges fit to review the evidence, if not the men selected. Who would not be described as whitewashers, if these men are to be described as whitewashers? The only alternative was to ignore the finding of Mr. Justice Galt altogether, and allow a minister of the Crown of Canada to rest in a position inferior in matter of right to that of the commonest thief or murderer in this country. Every man is entitled to an appeal. The humblest citizen of this country, of any class or race, if he contends that no evidence was submitted to substantiate the finding of the judge or jury, is entitled to an appeal from any court in the land. And upon what principle could an appeal be denied to a minister of the Crown? He could not go before the courts, and the only way to grant him an appeal was to establish a tribunal to hear that appeal, and that is exactly the course that was taken. The tribunal was established under the Inquiries Act, which directly empowers us to take that action. And, having taken that action, no matter whether the tribunal's finding may be favourable or otherwise to the minister concerned, surely it is in the interest of this country that the appointment of that tribunal be ratified and its expenses paid.

It was argued further that what we have to debate now was whether there was a scintilla of evidence or not. I do not think we have to debate that at all. I think that when a Provincial Commission impugns and maligns the character of a minister of the Crown, Parliament cannot shut its eyes to that fact, and pending investigation, if such is to be had, the minister should be relieved from the performance of the duties of his office. That is precisely the position we took in 1909, and that is the position we take to-day. Hon. gentlemen then contended that it should not be a judicial tribunal that should review the findings of the first tribunal, but it should be the two partisan sides of the House of Commons. Hon. gentlemen were then content to allow a minister of the Crown to rest for the meantime under the shadow of the finding of Mr. Justice Landry of the Court of New Brunswick, and the Minister of Public Works of that day remained a minister of the Crown simply because the partisan majority of this House decided that he was right and Mr. Justice Landry was wrong. Is that a better course than the course we pursued? We erected, on the contrary, a tribunal which is judicial, which is not swayed by partisanship from either side, which has been long divorced from the atmosphere of partisanship in Canada. We appointed a judicial, and not a legislative or a partisan, tribunal. We submitted the case to them, and we asked them not to weigh the evidence of one man against the evidence of another—that is not the province of an appeal tribunal at all—not to find whether Smith gave false evidence and Jones gave true, but to ascertain whether Smith or Jones gave evidence upon which that judgment could stand. That was the wording of the Order in Council; that was the intent of the Order in Council, and that and nothing else is what the Order in Council meant. The evidence was submitted. No new evidence was taken, but a statement was made by the Minister of Public Works, at his request, I believe. If evidence had been given which in the judgment of the commissioners supported the finding of Mr. Justice Galt, they would have so found. But they reviewed that evidence with the assistance of council; they went over it line by line, and then they came to the conclusion, no matter what conclusion any man in this House might come to, that there was no evidence that should have gone even to a jury in that case—no evidence at all to support the finding.

Had they reported differently the item before this House would be just the same. The tribunal then would not be impugned by hon. gentlemen opposite; I have no doubt that in that case they would have lauded the tribunal. But this vote would have had to be taken just the same. It is not the finding that establishes the right to the vote, but the fact that the tribunal sat. That is why this vote is before the House.

Hon. gentlemen ask about counsel—why we should pay counsel to defend the ex-Minister of Public Works. We did not pay counsel who acted in any respect whatever for the ex-Minister of Public Works in that case. The minister employed and paid for his own counsel. He never submitted bills to this House or to the Government. This money is required to pay counsel appointed by the commission to assist them and to act in the interests of the people of Canada. We did not select counsel. They were selected by the commission. I do not know Mr. Teed, but my hon. friend from Carleton knows him, and he pretty generously gave him a certificate of ability in the House just now. A fair counsel was undoubtedly selected.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no doubt of that at all—good for the purpose for which he was selected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: His duty was to go through the evidence with the commissioners; to look up authorities, if necessary, with the commissioners; to go through exhibits with the commissioners; and to enable the commissioners, without unnecessary loss of time which to one of them at least was very valuable just then, to come to a conclusion whether the evidence was or was not there to sustain the judgment of Mr. Justice Galt. That is the largest item in this vote. The Bill has been submitted to the Justice Department, and I understand that the deputy minister thinks that it is not unreasonable considering the work done.

Let me repeat that this money is not for the purpose of paying the expenses of counsel for Mr. Rogers at all. This man was counsel for the commission, and counsel for the people of Canada. He alone is being paid. Whatever counsel Mr. Rogers had, he paid for himself. I do not know that that course would be pursued by every other public man in this country. I do not know but that Mr. Rogers might have been justified, seeing that his honour was entirely vindicated by that tribunal, and seeing that the expenses he was put to were proven to be expenses to which he should not have been put, in submitting his bill of expenses to Parliament. But he has not done so; he has paid his bill himself.

Mr. CARVELL: I rather expected that my hon. friend would attempt to show that I was trying to vilify the Chief Justice of New Brunswick. As to that, I have nothing to say. The Chief Justice and I have known one another for a long time, and we get along all right, and therefore I do not propose to enter into any discussion of that branch of the case. But I want to say this: That knowing the Chief Justice of New Brunswick as well as I do, knowing his abilities, and knowing the abilities and relationship to him of the gentleman who was selected as his counsel, I have no hesitation in saying that if the people of this country had been represented, or if Mr. Justice Galt had been represented——

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Justice Galt was asked by the commission to appear or to be represented, but he refused, and so did the Government of Manitoba.

Mr. CARVELL: And rightly so. I say that if any of them had been represented they would not have got the finding they did get from the Chief Justice of New Brunswick.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is a prophecy, I suppose?

Mr. CARVELL: It is not a prophecy, because we cannot go over the case again. I am only saying that it would not have happened. The trouble is that the intention from the beginning must have been to obtain the finding that was obtained, and every means was taken which human ingenuity could suggest to obtain that finding, and every means was taken to prevent any other finding from being arrived at.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did the province of Manitoba refuse to be represented?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know. I only ask why on earth did not this Government appoint somebody to represent the other side?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did.

Mr. CARVELL: Who was it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Teed was appointed by the commissioners.

Mr. CARVELL: I happen to know better than that. Mr. Teed was appointed to assist Mr. Justice McLeod in making his findings. I know what I am talking about; as a rule I do not make statements in Parliament that I cannot back up. Mr. Teed was not appointed to bring out the facts of the case at all, he was appointed to assist Mr. Justice McLeod. What I find fault with is that the Government did not appoint somebody to take the other side and to argue the matter. There was no argument; there was nothing put before the Commissioners except one side of the case. Mr. Lacoste, a very prominent lawyer of Montreal, or Mr. Montgomery, another prominent lawyer acted for Mr. Rogers. Mr. Teed was there assisting the Chief Justice of New Brunswick. There was nobody to represent the other side of the case. There was nothing said at all in the way of putting the case before the commissioners from the point of view of the other side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say we should have employed counsel to present the case from the point of view of Mr. Justice Galt? If that be so we should have also appointed counsel to represent Hon. Mr. Rogers.

Mr. CARVELL: You should have appointed counsel to represent the public. What is the use of trying to cover it with narrow technicalities. Hon. Mr. Rogers was charged before a tribunal of the province of Manitoba with wrongdoing, and it was as serious a charge as was ever preferred against any public man in Canada. I agree with the position taken by the Solicitor General that, as long as that finding stood, Hon. Mr. Rogers was not properly a member of the Government, and I realize that something had to be done. At the request of Mr. Rogers a commission was appointed, but, the Government took no steps whatever in regard to ascertaining whether Mr. Justice Galt was justified in coming to his conclusions, but they took every means that could possibly have been conceived in order to prove that he was not justified in his conclusions. That is what I find fault with. If the other course had been taken, if those portions of the evidence which justified Mr. Justice Galt in his conclusions had been brought before the commission, if able counsel had been there to argue the matter, I know Mr. Justice McLeod well enough to know that he could not possibly have come to this conclusion. I have read the evidence, and I have some knowledge of what I am talking about. When I say I have read the evidence I do not mean that I have read the newspaper reports of it—I am speaking of the actual evidence. When a man says there is not a scintilla of evidence, I can only say he has not read the evidence. I say the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has not read the evidence.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. member for Calgary read the evidence as it came out from time to time.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. member for Calgary never read the evidence, and if he had read the evidence he would not have made the statement that there was no evidence.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I read the evidence from day to day as it came out.

Mr. CARVELL: Newspaper reports of it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The newspapers published verbatim reports of it.

Mr. CARVELL: But, I read the actual evidence, and I state again, if this matter had been properly argued and if the facts had been properly marshalled, not improperly marshalled, there would not be such a finding made by Mr. Justice McLeod. However this is getting away from the argument I was making a while ago. While the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) attempted to get away from the position in which he found himself by the statement of the Minister of Labour and the member for Calgary he stated they were creating this commission as a matter of principle, and therefore, no matter what the result was, we should pay the bills. But he had to come back to the fact that this commission found there was no evidence upon which Mr. Justice Galt could make these findings. After having read the evidence I am so opposed to that, and my whole sense of justice so revolts against it that I, for one, must demand that this vote be not passed until we have a chance to discuss the evidence in the House, and give the people of the country an opportunity of knowing whether they are justified in paying the bill.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Ever since a few misguided people concluded that the hon. member for Carleton had about him some semblance of statecraft, and might become an important individual in this country, he has arrogated to himself an importance he does not possess. He stands here this afternoon and coolly states to Parliament that he knows more than all the judges of Canada ever did know or ever will know. He tells us that when the court before which he has been accustomed to practise decides in his favour it is a good court, but when the conclusion it arrives at is not the one he would arrive at then the court is no good. He expects the people of Canada to take him seriously. He has become minister of war, or would become so in the near future.

Mr. CARVELL: That is more than the hon. member for Calgary could do, although he never tried anything so hard.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I desire to say to the hon. member for Carleton that that is not so. The hon. member for Calgary came into this House with a very distinct understanding as to what his position must be while he was here. Such a statement as that by my hon. friend cannot possibly be sustained. There is this to be said about my hon. friend, he has stood up in this House and told the people of Canada that he knows much more than the Chief Justice of the province of New Brunswick What a beautiful spectacle for a member of the bar; what a beautiful spectacle for a member of this House; what a beautiful spectacle for any public man who wishes to be taken seriously, to stand here in his place in Parliament, and for the sake of a little cheap political notoriety, for the purpose of endeavouring to make capital against a man who is not present, for the purpose of casting reflection upon a man who is no longer a member of the Administration, to tell us that no honest man could have concluded with Mr. Justice McLeod and Mr. Justice Tellier that there was no evidence to support the finding. According to his story, Chief Justice McLeod is dishonest. My hon. friend charged him here this afternoon with being dishonest. Will the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) support that? Will he bear out the statement made by the hon. member for Carleton? My hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) says that no honest man could have arrived at the conclusion arrived at by Chief Justice McLeod and Mr. Justice Tellier. Does my hon. friend from Montreal, St. James (Mr. L. A. Lapointe), say that Mr Justice Tellier is a dishonest man? Will he say that no honest man could have arrived at the conclusion Mr. Justice Tellier arrived at? Will any lawyer who practices at the bar of the province of Quebec say that Mr. Tellier is a dishonest man? Yet it remains for the hon. member for Carleton to say that no honest man could have arrived at the conclusion those two gentlemen arrived at. My hon. friend from St. John has known Sir Ezekiel McLeod for years. I have known him since I was old enough to know public men. Will my hon. friend from St. John admit that Sir Ezekiel McLeod is a dishonest man?

Mr. CARVELL: Would the hon. member like to lead us in prayer?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That would be something so entirely foreign to anything the hon. gentleman from Carleton knows anything about, that it would be useless to do it; however, I should say the words of the prayer he would use are so well known that it is unnecessary to repeat them. They would be those of the Pharisee: "I thank thee, Lord, that I am not as other men." I cannot possibly understand the hon. gentleman making the statement he has made with reference to the honesty of these gentlemen. One would think that he was counsel against Mr. Rogers and for the Hon. Mr. Justice Galt and in that capacity was saying "The conclusion the appeal court arrived at is rotten." When I was a young man and used to learn much from the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Pugsley)—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am afraid you have gone astray.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No. I have never forgotten many of the lessons that I learned, but the lesson of urbanity I have never yet been able to learn. I have never been able to say "Thank you" with that same kind consideration that he does. I should like to, but I fear I never shall.

Mr. McKENZIE: You have not practised enough.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have not, to the same extent. But this was a fundamental lesson, that courts of appeal sometimes decide against us. I can remember cases in which, as counsel, the hon. member for St. John sometimes buoyed me up with high hope that possibly we might succeed. I have known cases in which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) was interested in which we were buoyed up with high hope. When we succeeded before the trial judge, we went on, with hope still springing eternal in the human breast, to the court of appeal, and that court decided against us—and we were wrong, the trial judge was wrong. But it is not usual for counsel, in cases like that, to stand up and charge the tribunal with arriving at a conclusion which no honest man would arrive at.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the hon. gentleman not had experience that would induce him to believe that sometimes, after all, the judgment of the lowest court was the best judgment?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There have been cases in which we still thought so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But we were bound by the decision of the Appellate Court.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is not a court of appeal.

Mr. CARVELL: And has not the hon. gentleman known of cases where a third or final Appellate Court has reversed the findings of the first Appellate Court? Therefore, would it not be well to appoint another tribunal to try the findings of the first appeal court?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Unfortunately, as the law stands, there is no provision for a higher tribunal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Nor was there for this.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member agree with the Secretary of State that this Government had power, without a reference to Parliament, to appoint a second tribunal under the Inquiries Act?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I tried to make clear in my few remarks a moment ago why any tribunal was appointed. The Inquiries Act enables us to create machinery and, to issue, under the Great Seal, a commission to inquire into a question. The Inquiries Act is a part of the statute law of this country. It is there for that very purpose. Being there, we took advantage of the machinery of that statute for the purpose indicated by the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) and by myself, namely to determine whether or not the honour of this Parliament would in any sense be offended through these charges against one of its members being supported by any evidence. That is all.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member not think that the Inquiries Act makes provision for the initiation of investigations of this kind, and not for courts of review?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: What my hon. friend has said would certainly be entirely in order were it not for one fact, and that is that this was a provincial matter and the inquiry was with respect to wrong-doing alleged during the term of office of a provincial minister.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is the same King in Manitoba that we have here.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The only King my friend knows sits directly to his right, and I do not think he sits for Manitoba.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are greater things than these.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But the same King unquestionably, as my friend the judge (Mr. McKenzie) has said, but there is no appeal from the findings with respect to a provincial matter to another tribunal in that sense, so we had to create some tribunal to make the inquiry for this Parliament, and the inquiry it made was an inquiry de novo as to the extent to which, if any, there was any evidence upon which to predicate those findings.

Mr. CARROLL: Would it not have been better for the Government to have instituted an inquiry de novo to take the evidence either in Manitoba or here, probably by sending the judges to Manitoba, and then have counsel on both sides, and have the judges see the witnesses? Would that not have been the better course to pursue?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am sorry to say that that course would have been entirely unconstitutional. It would not have been within the ambit of our powers to intrude ourselves upon matters which were purely provincial in their character. We have no right to make that inquiry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is exactly what I was desirous my hon. friends would say. They are angry and balked because a public man has not been permitted to lie under an unfounded and unwarranted aspersion upon his character.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is what is the matter with them.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the whole story, and I feel quite sure that, with the great wealth of experience that their right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) enjoys, he will be the first man to say that if any machinery can be created and put in motion that will make it clear, not to some other tribunal but to this Parliament, whether or not there is any foundation for the conclusion arrived at with respect to one of its members, that machinery should be used, and used promptly. To that extent it seems to me we are on common ground. Now they complain because the tribunal has found in favour of the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works. That is the whole complaint.

Mr PUGSLEY: There is no complaint of that.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I quite understand that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has no complaint as to that, but I am talking now about the hon. member for Carleton and those who take that view.

Mr. CARVELL: I made no complaint whatever. I care nothing whatever. I complain because we are called upon to pay $5,500 for something that was none of our business, but a purely personal matter between Mr. Rogers and his friends in Manitoba.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Let me give an analogy. I am a member of a club. The question of the expulsion of members of clubs engages the attention of the courts in England more than it does here, but it occasionally does so here, as for instance in connection with the Garrison Club of Quebec. This House of Commons is a club. The people have elected us here. The analogy is complete, and this club of members has the right to expel from its membership any member against whom charges are preferred or findings made that would indicate that he was unfit to be a member of this Parliament, or this club.

Mr. McKENZIE: In dealing with members of clubs, is it not a judgment of the members of the club itself that is passed upon the erring member, if he does err?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Precisely, except that the committee of the club is usually charged with the duty of making investigation.

Mr. McKENZIE: Messrs Justice McLeod and Justice Tellier are not members of this club.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But Parliament constituted them a committee to act and to determine that matter because they are judicial in their character, and this club, unlike the ordinary social club, is torn into two or more factions by political differences.

Mr. McKENZIE: But from that you must not presume that this Parliament would not fairly try one of its members. That is a wild presumption.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am not making presumptions of that character, but I am sure any judicial inquiry is to be preferred to one by members torn by distracting questions and partisans in their character admittedly, as we are—and no man has made a stronger statement in respect to that than the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie).

This House, under the authority of the Inquiries Act, has seen fit to create a small committee, consisting of two eminent judges, and charged them with the responsibility—not as my hon. friend suggests, of going down to Manitoba and inquiring into a provincial matter—but of determining whether or not, on the evidence given before that tribunal, there was any evidence to go to the jury of the guilt of the person charged.

Mr. McKENZIE: If there is any objection to the commission composed of Chief Justice McLeod and Mr. Justice Tellier going into the province of Manitoba, there is ample provision, under the Inquiries Act, to bring the evidence here. Let them sit here.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My dear, learned and honourable friend, the ex-judge, is too astute a man, too subtle-minded for a single moment to think it was a question of geography I was dealing with. I was dealing with jurisdiction, and he knew it as well as I knew it. He knew that this Parliament should not be intruding itself into provincial matters that affected provincial administration only.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend, who is a big lawyer—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, not now.

Mr. McKENZIE: —says they would have no jurisdiction if they heard the evidence de novo, but they have jurisdiction if they read the evidence and report. Is that the logic of my hon. friend?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, no. My hon. friend knows what I mean. I can see by the colour of his face that he appreciates the position.

Mr. McKENIE: It is past me, I cannot understand it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows it is purely a question of jurisdiction. The Legislature of Manitoba has plenary powers, and this Parliament, under its constitution, also has plenary powers. The Legislature of Manitoba create a commission to inquire into the administration of its own affairs.

This Parliament has nothing to do with the administration of the Public Works Department of Manitoba, but has to do with the honour of one of its members, and, based upon the assumption that a member of this House had been found guilty of malfeasance in his administration in the provincial government—that having been certified to as a fact—this Parliament created the tribunal to consider whether or not any evidence had been adduced which would justify such finding, the accused having said that there was no evidence to justify it. This Parliament has no right to go down to the province of New Brunswick, and to inquire into the Public Works Department there. If it did, it would have a lively time, but it would have no power to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: During the last five years there would be considerable to investigate.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The administration of the last five years would not compare with the administration of the days long past.

Mr. CARVELL: They are not doing badly as it is.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And as long as it continues my hon. friend from Carleton will find some scope for his activities, and will be able to earn a good fee. But I want to emphasize the fact that we, as a Parliament, could not inquire into the Public Works Department of Manitoba, and that one of our members having been assailed, and found guilty of an offence in Manitoba, it became our duty to determine whether we should let it go, or have a decent and proper tribunal review the finding and determine whether there was any evidence to sustain it. That tribunal has declared there was no evidence, and now against that finding, the hon, gentleman from Carleton says no honest man should have so found it. Is that a proper way in which to approach this matter? I am sure the hon. member for St.

John would have been better pleased, his reputation as a public man would have stood much higher in years to come, and the perspective would have been better when the history of our country is written, when we are long gone, if a proper tribunal had reviewed the Landry report, rather than that a partisan majority should vote that these charges against him were wholly unwarranted. The Landry report found the member for St. John guilty—he says falsely. The report to-day stands uncontroverted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And the Government counsel said it was false.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But it stands to-day. The hon. gentleman sits in this House with that finding against him. Whenever he rises in his place to speak in this House, he speaks as one against whom a finding has been made, and why? Because the Government of the day never appointed a tribunal to inquire whether or not there was any evidence to warrant that finding, and the reason is because they dare not do so. That is the whole story. Everybody knows that. The partisan majority stood up, and said: "We shall have no investigation, let the false charge stand against him forever," and he stands in the eyes of public men of this country for all time, in successive generations, as one who is guilty.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And never whitewashed.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Never whitewashed, because whitewashing would be absolutely useless. No process of whitewashing would accomplish any result. There it stands forever. That is not the course that was pursued by the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), a member of this House. He wrote a letter to the country and said "I abandon my portfolio, I resign my position and I want to go out."

Mr. PUGSLEY: He just stood aside for the time being, and was still minister. He kept his portfolio?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) did not do that. Mr. Rogers stood aside and said: I am not guilty of the charges Judge Galt made against me, I demand an inquiry by some tribunal.

Mr. CARROLL: It was not an inquiry.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It was an inquiry, because it had to determine whether or not there was any evidence upon which the Galt findings might be predicated, and anything that determines that is an inquiry.

Mr. CARROLL: Not under the Act.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The question was, was there any evidence on which the Galt findings could be predicated so far as Mr. Rogers was concerned. The hon. member from Carleton said I had not read the evidence. I read the evidence as it came out from day to day, and followed that evidence. I may not be as well able to arrive at conclusions as the hon. gentleman from Carleton, but when the conclusions of Mr. Justice Galt were arrived at I failed—and I have failed ever since—to put my finger on the evidence upon which those conclusions could have been predicated. That illustrates the difference in view between my hon. friend and myself, and shows the soundness of appointing men absolutely removed from the scene and away from political influence. That is the reason Chief Justice McLeod and Mr. Justice Tellier were appointed. What a lovely mess it would have been if we had appointed members of this House to investigate.

Mr. McKENZIE: You had a majority in this House and could put good men upon that committee.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: We do not find our ministers innocent by majority.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps you could not get a majority.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There was no trouble when my hon. friend was in power in getting a majority. The dark lantern was in evidence in season and out of season. If it were a sawdust wharf, there was no trouble——

Mr. McKENZIE: There was no charge about the sawdust wharf.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Or if it were a question of the ballot papers of that gentleman named Lott—not the Lot my hon. friend knows so well in Scriptures, whose wife was turned to salt, but the Lott who was connected with the ballot boxes, and the ballot papers. On that side of the House you always acquit by majority. We find our men innocent by judges. That is the difference.

Mr. McKENZIE: You choose your own magistrate.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And we chose a chief magistrate, and one who knows the Scriptures as well as my hon. friend from Cape Breton. My hon. friend speaks of the prophet Ezekiel. (My hon. friend from Carleton refers to prophets, but he spells it with an "f".) I submit that on the statement made by my hon. friend from Cape Breton the case is complete.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Which case is that?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The case I am making for Mr. Rogers, and this Government. I will admit there was completeness also in the case established against the hon. gentlemen from St. John. I have no doubt that is what he refers to. Here we have my hon. friend standing in his place, and saying "What we want is an acquittal by a partisan majority."

What we say is that we want the reverse, a judicial tribunal, to determine whether our ministers are falsely or properly charged with these offences. The judicial tribunal has made its report, and it ill becomes any gentleman practising his profession as a lawyer to charge men with whitewashing who have had the administrative and judicial experience of Sir Ezekiel McLeod and Mr. Justice Tellier. I do think this Parliament should rise beyond that. To-morrow some hon. gentleman opposite, having become a minister of the Crown may find himself in a similar position. If the leader of the Opposition were called upon to form a government. I have no doubt that he would exercise the same discretion that he did in years gone by. Knowing how unfit was the material he had behind him, he would go to the provinces and get men to form his government; he could not form a government with men of the type of the Carvells, the McKenzies, the Copps, the Carrolls and the Pugsleys.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But I had heard that the Prime Minister wanted to rule with Carvell.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Judging from the applause with which that remark was greeted what my right hon. friend says may be so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would not have to go so far, then, as my hon. friend says.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My right hon. friend has that great quality, that commanding quality, which has always characterized him—it is almost genius—of inducing those with whom he has been associated to believe that in the event of his coming into power every one of them would be fit to hold a position in the Government. But alas, when the moment comes, the fruit is found to be the apple of Sodom; and when his eager followers come to taste it, they find that it turns to ashes on their lips. My right hon. friend under these circumstances would do what he did of old—go outside for his Blairs, his Mowats and his Fieldings.

Mr. McKENZIE: They filled the positions well.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes, they filled the positions with great distinction and with high honour to themselves and to the country which they served. I have no doubt that those who sit behind my right hon. friend now are anxiously waiting for the day when, they think an ill-guided people may put them into power, and when each of them will become ministers. I can tell by the look of profound wisdom on the face of the member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that he would fill the office of Marine and Fisheries with distinction. I can imagine the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) wondering whether he will again adorn the Bench, fill some portfolio or, peradventure, serve the State in a lesser capacity. I can see the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) vieing with the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) as to which shall be which; as to who shall be the greater in Israel. I can see the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) vieing with the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and endeavouring to determine which shall represent the great province of Nova Scotia if, peradventure, the member for Guysborough is overlooked. But when the great day comes, they will all find themselves beyond the pale.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope that the Chairman is making a note of this discussion. The hon. gentleman is going rather far afield.

An hon. MEMBER: I suppose it is all in order.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Entirely in order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Admitting all that the hon. gentleman has said, I would ask him to justify the proposal to ask the people of Canada to pay for the vindicating of the character of Mr. Rogers.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I was just illustrating my argument. I was pointing out that some hon. gentlemen opposite were hoping to fill positions of responsibility in the State. I hope that some day they may. It is in the interest of the State that they should, so that they may once more illustrate by their performances in office their unfitness for the positions. I was pointing out that if a minister of the Crown from Nova Scotia should by a commission of inquiry be found guilty of malfeasance, the Government of the day should have the strength, the power and the courage to say: We will appoint a commission to determine whether or not the findings made were justified by the evidence, in order that the public life of our public men may not become the subject of attack by every man who wishes to throw mud from any quarter. The hon. Mr. Rogers, despite what may be said, had the courage to ask this Parliament to determine, by tribunal, whether—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: —this Parliament, and this Government, in whose hands the honour of Parliament rests for the time being—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Heaven help this Parliament, then.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Well, I would rather trust a matter of this kind to a competent tribunal than leave it to the judgment of a partisan majority, as was the case with the hon. member for St. John.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is prejudiced.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not prejudiced, merely biased. After all, those who occupy high office and discharge public trust must have an opportunity to have themselves vindicated if charges made against them are deemed to be unfounded. I believe that if the member for St. John had his way, he would rather that the charge preferred against him and the finding made should have been reviewed by a competent tribunal under the Inquiries Act than that his name and fame should rest entirely upon a partisan majority's view. Of course, in his case the evidence was so conclusive that no tribunal would ever change the original finding; but he would have liked to have the finding reviewed for the sake of history and his place in it. It is too bad that that matter must rest upon the judgment of a partisan majority rather than upon the judgment of justices who are sworn fairly to administer justice and law. Mr. Roger's case is safe in the finding of Sir Ezekiel McLeod and Mr. Justice Tellier, despite the fact that the member for Carleton says that the conclusions which the Commissioners reached are not such as any honest man could accept.

Mr. McKENZIE: What has the hon. gentleman to say about the fact that hon. Mr. Rogers refused to submit any evidence before Mr. Justice Galt, after he was asked to do so?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is hardly the fact.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is on record.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was asked to appear in argument only after the evidence was in.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to express my sympathy with the Solicitor General in the fact that his estimates are being obstructed by the member for Calgary. He has spoken about almost everything under the sun except the matter which is immediately before the committee. The member for Calgary says that he has learned many things from me; there is one thing that he did not learn: to curtail his speeches in the House. Another thing he did not learn was to say the right thing in the right place. If my hon. friend ever did an injustice in his life to any friend he did it today to the ex-Minister of Public Works. He has brought into the consideration of this item the question whether the report of Mr. Justice Galt is sustained by the evidence. That was not an issue until the hon. gentleman rose in his place and made the very extraordinary speech which he delivered to the committee. He has put squarely before the committee the question whether the finding of Mr. Justice Galt was or was not justified by the evidence. My hon. friend, a prominent member of the House, a warm supporter of the Government, a gentleman occupying a position which many people thought would be second in importance only to that of the Prime Minister—Chairman of the National Service Board—eulogizes the finding of the McLeod-Tellier Commission and discredits the finding of Commissioner Galt. The member for Carleton, therefore, takes the right course in claiming the right to have a full discussion of the matter dealt with in this item.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is my hon. friend aware of the fact that the hon. member for Carleton (M. Carvell) raised the issue before I came into the Chamber?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Well, I heard a part of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: All that the hon. member for Carleton pointed out was, as I understand his argument, that there was no authority, under the Inquiries Act, for the issue of this commission, and he did not see why the country should be called upon to pay the expenses of it and particularly the fee of the counsel employed to assist the commissioners in arriving at a conclusion. The view I take of this matter is that we have no judgment of a court. The expression of opinion by Mr. Justice Galt is not a judgment of the court; neither is the expression of opinion by Chief Justice McLeod or ex-judge Tellier a judgment of a court. They are simply expressions of opinion by those gentlemen which will have no weight and which ought to have no weight either with the people of this country or with the members of this Parliament unless the evidence justifies either the one or the other. That is all. The one is the expression of opinion of two very worthy gentlemen, and the other is the expression of opinion of a gentleman who was appointed, on the recommendation of the ex-Minister of Public Works, to the very high office of judge because of his great ability and integrity, and presumably also because of his impartiality. We have one opinion one way and another opinion the other way. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) appealed to me as to whether or not Chief Justice McLeod could be suspected for a moment of coming to a wrong or improper conclusion or of dishonesty. I would be the last man in the world to suggest such a thing with regard to Chief Justice McLeod. He was long at the Bar of New Brunswick, he is a very eminent judge; he has discharged his judicial duties with great ability, and I have nothing to say against him personally. But the trouble in regard to the investigation that took place before those two gentlemen was that there was no counsel to represent the public—no counsel to represent the other side. I would not trust the Angel Gabriel to come to a proper conclusion in regard to a question unless both sides were fairly represented.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What side did Mr. Teed represent?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Teed—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Teed is one of the warmest Conservatives in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has that to do with the matter?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Teed was no doubt employed because he was—

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. STEVENS: Because he was an honest man.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He was employed because it was felt he would aid the commissioners.

Mr. CROTHERS: Who employed him?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no doubt the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) suggested his appointment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member forgets that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) stated that Mr. Teed was employed by Sir Ezekiel McLeod.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no doubt he was suggested by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as a gentleman desirable to appoint for the purpose of aiding the commissioners. But you cannot have an investigation which can be depended upon unless you have both sides of the question fairly represented. Counsel was not present to represent the people and to sustain the view presented by Mr. Justice Galt, to see that all evidence which would have a bearing upon the correctness or otherwise of his opinion was fairly presented before the commission. You must have that in order to have a proper investigation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We appointed counsel to assist the commission. The commission was representing the people and no one else. Consequently counsel represented the people. If we were to appoint counsel on one side as against the other, then we would have to appoint counsel for Mr. Rogers. Mr. Rogers had his own counsel. Why did not the Government of Manitoba follow the same course?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not concerned with the Government of Manitoba. They appointed a commissioner who investigated the matter, and if there was not the fullest opportunity given to Mr. Rogers to be represented by counsel, then the commission was very greatly at fault.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You do not answer the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: After all, it is simply a question of the evidence. The matter is still for Parliament to deal with if it chooses to do so.

Mr. CROTHERS: I understand my hon. friend from St. John has known Chief Justice McLeod for a great number of years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know him, but I ask my hon. friend: Is Chief Justice

McLeod a man who would sign a report without knowing and approving its contents?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have known very eminent judges—

Mr. CROTHERS: What about this particular judge?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have known very eminent judges, judges quite as eminent as Chief Justice McLeod who have been greatly misled by counsel.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would Mr. Teed mislead him?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If you have a counsel, no matter how honest he may be, whose inclination was to present views favourable to those who employed him, it is easy for him to lead a judge into error.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would Mr Teed mislead Chief Justice McLeod when Chief Justice McLeod employed him? That is a fair question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is trespassing upon the credulity of this House, if he thinks that we shall believe that Mr. Teed was not appointed because it was known that he was in sympathy with this Government; that he would be in sympat with Mr. Rogers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) said that he was appointed by Chief Justice McLeod, and he was right. Why would Chief Justice McLeod appoint him if he thought he was favourable to this Government?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no doubt he was recommended by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. As I have said before, I would not rely upon the judgment of any judge, no matter how impartial, how eminent, unless opposing counsel were present. If there is only one counsel presenting one view, there is great danger of a misjudment. I am sorry that my name has been dragged into this discussion. I am rather a modest man, and I do not like my name unduly brought before the House or before the country.

Mr. CROTHERS: Your leader introduced it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, it was the Solicitor General who said that the Government was taking a different course to-day from the course taken in 1909. That was the first time my name was introduced, and it has been bandied about rather freely since then. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) says that I stand guilty to-day before the people of this country because I did not adopt the machinery and get thoroughly whitewashed. I could have had that done, I suppose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What did the House of Commons do?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If I had written my leader saying to him: I want you to appoint two judges and I will suggest——

Mr. CARVELL: And a lawyer.

Mr. PUGSLEY:—I would like you to appoint a lawyer, and I have in mind a lawyer, very eminent, whose eyes are directed towards the position of Chief Justice of my province, who will do me justice in any case, I would like you to appoint him to assist those commissioners in the investigation. In that case, I have no doubt the lime and the liquid would have been splendidly mixed and a good brush put into play, and I should have received a good coat of whitewash.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: You certainly need one.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But I preferred not to do that. I thought it much better that my trial should take place in the light of day, in the presence of the whole people of this country, that there should not be a commission that would sit secretly on my case. That is what I thought. And when my hon. friend the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) made a charge against me in the House based on the Landry report, so-called, as those who were present will remember, the Speaker ruled that he had no right to do so and that the matter must come up in a different way. My right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who was then leader of the Government, stated, and I repeated what he stated, that we would take no technical objection, that we wanted the fullest possible inquiry and the most complete investigation. We wanted Parliament to have the evidence upon which this charge was based. The Speaker said that it was irregular for my hon. friend to bring the matter up in that way, but that if we consented, he would allow the matter to proceed.

Mr. CROTHERS: You did not give Parliament any evidence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When the present Minister of Labour made certain statements, I said—and Hansard shows it—that the evidence did not support his statements, and he answered with indignation, "I have nothing to do with the evidence, nothing whatever, I rely upon this judgment of the court." My hon. friend rather questioned that to-day.

Mr. CROTHERS: You had nothing more to do with he evidence than I had.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is what he said—(Hansard, 1909, P. 5655):

Mr. Pugsley: My. hon. friend must pardon me. I say that there is nothing whatever in the evidence which would justify a statement of that kind, and the statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Crothers: I am not here for the purpose of discussing the evidence in this case.

And it was he who was prosecuting; it was he who was making the charge that was to drive me out of the Government and out of public life, if possible. He had nothing to do with the evidence, he said. He relied upon the judgment of the court. It did not concern him whether the evidence supported that judgment or not, or whether it was false or not; he had nothing to do with it. To continue:

Mr. Pugsley: I am not surprised at that.

Mr. Crothers: I am here standing on the judgment of a court.

When I came to make my defence I relied upon such evidence as I had.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You did not read any.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did. I quoted many parts of it. I said I had only two volumes of it, and that was all I could get. I said there was more than that.

Mr. CROTHERS: You said you would not use the evidence at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I said that the Government had been asked to submit the evidence to the provincial legislature so that we could get a copy of it, but that request was refused. But a friend of mine, acting as counsel for the commissioners, had had the evidence taken by a stenographer, and he sent me a typewritten copy of part of it. That I used, and with that evidence I was able to show that in upwards of twenty instances the report was absolutely contradicted by the evidence, and in a great many other cases not supported by the evidence. I am not going to refer to it particularly to-day, because I do not want to follow my hon. friend from Calgary and take up a great deal of the time of the House, but I remember that I called attention to one statement in the report, that the evidence had been conclusive that a certain act of wrong-doing had been committed. I made the statement that it was absolutely untrue, that it showed the partisan character of these commissioners, and that so far from it being the case, the evidence was absolutely the other way. Now my hon. friend says that they wanted to try me by the evidence. Let us see for a moment. To begin with, we have the statement which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition read on the 6th of August. Then we have the statement of the present distinguished Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in a letter to Hon. Mr. Hazen, then Premier of New Brunswick, in which, referring to the matter, he said:

He will say that the report is not based on evidence and that he will, after getting a copy of the evidence, issue a statement showing this to be so. That will be his defence. We propose to get after him here before he gets a copy of the evidence.

Who was the hon. gentleman selected to get after me before I got a copy of the report? It was my hon. friend the present Minister of Labour who lent himself to that design of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They were going to try to drive me from the Government, and if possible, from public life, before I could get a copy of the evidence.

Mr. CROTHERS: You had a copy and you did not read it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But my hon. friend thought I had not. He was doing what the Minister of Trade and Commerce had written to Mr. Hazen that they would try to do; he lent himself to that design, in which, I am happy to say, he did not succeed. We have the further fact that the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries knew that it was the intention to get after me before I got a copy of the evidence. That was why they refused to submit the evidence to the provincial legislature, because if they submitted it they knew I would get a copy, and they thought I had no copy of it. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, then Premier of New Brunswick, knew that that was the intention, because he had the letter from the present Minister of Trade and Commerce before he sent the report up to Ottawa to be used by my hon. friend in the improper way in which he sought to use it, and did use it. What evidence had Mr. Hazen at that time, when he knew he was sending a damnable and false report to Ottawa for the purpose of accomplishing the design he had in view? He had in his possession a letter from Mr. Powell, a very distinguished Conservative employed by the Provincial Government—paid by the Provincial Government—to assist the commissioners, just as Mr. Teed is to be paid by the Government of Canada to assist these commissioners; he was equally eminent, equally honourable, equally high in the public esteem, equally prominent in the Conservative party—in fact, I would think that Mr. Powell was even more prominent in the Conservative party than Mr. Teed, because he had been a member of his Parliament, and to-day he occupies a high-salaried position under this Government as a member of the Great Waterways Commission. He also says that he was doing a great deal of the work which, I presume, Mr. Teed was employed to do in connection with this commission; that is to say, he assisted in drawing up many parts of the report. Mr. Powell, in his letter to Mr. Hazen of March 31, 1909, said, among other things:

> Another matter which I am sorry has gone in as it did inasmuch as it will give the Opposition press an opportunity to make an attack on the commissioners, is the statement at the bottom of page 18 and top of page 19 to the effect that it appears conclusively from the evidence that the whole $250,000 par value of the 3 per cent bonds had been guaranteed and delivered to the company up to August 6, 1903.

When I was making my speech I referred to the evidence and said it was absolutely false—not only unsupported by the evidence but absolutely contradicted by it. I did not know then that when Mr. Hazen sent that report here he knew it was false, and that he had a statement from Mr. Powell to the effect that it was false. I simply had to present the matter to the House from my own standpoint, and as I knew the evidence would show it to be. Mr. Powell goes on:

> The only evidence to that effect was an impression Mr. Shadbolt had that the whole $250,000 of 3 per cent bonds which were delivered to him at that time had the provincial guarantee on them. Mr. Shadbolt may have been right in his impression, but the statement is not consistent with the Order in Council with reference to guaranteeing the bonds.

A little further on he says:

> I drafted the portion of the report referring to the guaranteeing of the bonds, but Judge Landry himself changed it in the respects I have mentioned. Fortunately the fellows on the other side will know nothing about the matter, and if the statement is challenged the reporter has Mr. Shadbolt's evidence much stronger than he gave it.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does that mean?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It means that the Government reporter had changed the evidence from what was given, and he would find in the typewritten copy a report of evidence which had never been sworn to by the witness. It also means that when Mr. Hazen sent that statement forward to Sir George Foster, Mr. Hazen knew the report was false. It means he knew that the stenographer had the evidence in his transcribed copy much stronger than it had been given and he sends this false report forward to Sir George Foster, and Sir George Foster hands it to the present Minister of Labour in order to present those falsehoods before the members of this House and before the people of this country and to ask that I should be condemned. You have in that evidence of conspiracy in which four prominent members of the Conservative party were engaged. Perhaps I should not in this House call it a conspiracy—I will call it an enterprise.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of Labour would not be engaged in any enterprise.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Engaged in that enterprise was the present Senator, Hon. Mr. Fowler, who wrote Mr. Hazen recommending certain gentlemen as commissioners and who said that this was a very important thing for them and he believed that the "Genial William"—meaning myself—

Mr. McKENZIE: That was the only truth in it.

Mr. PUGSLEY:—Could be driven out of business if the thing was handled properly, and he suggests how it might be handled. Then we have Mr. Powell, appointed to the same position as Mr. Teed was appointed to in connection with this commission, not only taking part in the presentation of the evidence, but taking part in the making up of the opinion. We find him writing to Mr. Hazen, and calling his attention to an important matter in which the report is false, and saying that fortunately if it comes up the fellows on the other side would not know anything about it, and if it is questioned the reporter has it down already much stronger than the witness gave it. We find Sir George Foster handing this report to my hon. friend the present Minister of Labour to act upon. Notwithstanding all this, these gentlemen try to make the committee believe that they acted in a very different way, and in a very much better way in regard to Mr. Rogers than the way followed in 1909 by the supporters of the former government. I should be very sorry indeed if in respect of the Hon. Mr. Rogers any members of the Liberal party were guilty of half the crimes that were engaged in to drive me from public life. I cannot for a moment conceive they would stoop so low as to try to drive a man from public life from a report which they knew to be false and try to accomplish their object before he could get an opportunity to read the evidence or present it to Parliament. I am content to-day with the fact that I was able to present the evidence to this House and have the matter discussed in the open light of day, and have the judgment of this Parliament, rather than simply have the opinion of gentlemen who had gone over the evidence in secret, who had been assisted by counsel employed by the Government and who had formed an opinion without any opportunity being offered to those who might desire to submit a different view.

However, the question is as to whether or not these fees should be paid. I do not think the Government had any right whatever to appoint this commission. I say nothing at all with regard to the innocence or guilt of the late Minister of Public Works. I should be very sorry indeed to condemn him unheard, and if the matter comes up in this House on the Galt report we ought to examine the evidence with the utmost care. We should not be guided by that report any more than we would be guided by the expression of any men of high standing. I say the same thing with regard to the McLeod-Tellier report. It is simply the opinion of two reputable gentlemen who have been chosen by this Government, and whose report has the advantage of having been prepared in secret and under the circumstances I have mentioned. I would not have risen to speak upon this matter at all had it not been for the reference made to the course which was followed with regard to myself in 1909.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the committee rises it seems to me that on the stand taken by the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for St. John there should be no objection to the item going through. As I understand it, they want a chance to discuss the McLeod-Tellier report.

Mr. CARVELL: I never asked for a chance to discuss the McLeod-Tellier report, and I have been persistently opposed to discussing the Galt report. I felt it was a matter that should not have been brought up here at all. I object, however, to the item being voted to-night in view of the attitude assumed by the Minister of Labour and to a great extent by the Solicitor General, that there was no evidence on which the Galt report could be sustained. Before the item is voted, I think there should be an opportunity of discussing the evidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman misrepresents me. I have not asked for this vote on the ground that there is no evidence to justify the Galt report. I distinctly took the other ground; I should ask for the vote just the same if the finding were the other way. I never assented to anything on my own responsibility. I simply say what the tribunal found. The hon. member for Carleton stated very clearly and rightly that the report of Mr. Justice Galt being out, it was impossible to proceed, and we know that the proper course was to have an investigation, and the minister step out in the meantime. That being so, that is all the reason there is for this item. If, by reason of anything that arose in this debate, hon. gentlemen opposite desire to discuss the McLeod-Tellier report, I will undertake that their right to do so will not be prejudiced by this item going through. But we are sincerely anxious to get on as rapidly as we can. I do not want to put my own inconvenience as too important before the committee, but I do not want to come back and have an afternoon or night spent on this item for the purpose of a discussion at which I do not need to be present. Is there any objection to the motion being withdrawn and the item passing, it being understood that if hon. gentlemen wish to discuss the McLeod-Tellier report, they will be given, I am pretty sure, by the Prime Minister, the right to do so. At all events, their right to do so will not be prejudiced by the item going through.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We can take a vote upon it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that there was an arrangement between the whips that there would be no division this afternoon.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It could be declared carried on division.

Resolution agreed to on division.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 6.05 p.m.
