QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

MILITARY HOSPITALS COMMISSION.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Who are the members of the Hospitals Commission?
2. When were they appointed?
3. What salary or remuneration do they receive?
4. How much has each been paid to date, (a) for salary, (b) for travelling and other allowances?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1 and 2. The following are the present members of the Military Hospitals Commission, with the dates of their appointments: The Hon. Sir James A. Lougheed, P.C., K.C.M.G., President, June 30, 1915; the Hon. Thomas W. Crothers, P.C., K.C., October 14, 1915; W. M. Dobell, Esq., October 14, 1915; Hon. Colonel Sir Rodolphe Forget, M.P., June 30, 1915; W. K. George, Esq., October 14, 1915; Robert Gill, Esq., May 18, 1916; Lloyd Harris, Esq., October 14, 1915; J. S. H. Matson, Esq., June 30, 1915; D. Lorne McGibbon, Esq., October 14, 1915; the Hon. J. S. McLennan, June 30, 1915; Brig.-General Sir H. M. Pellatt, C.V.O., June 30, 1915; F. W. Peters, Esq., April 4, 1916; Lieut.-Colonel C. W. Rowley, June 30, 1915; F. J. Shepherd, Esq., M.D., April 4, 1916; Lieut.-Colonel Clarence F. Smith, June 30, 1915; Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Walker, M.D., June 30, 1915; Smeaton White, Esq., June 30, 1915; the Director General of Medical Service, Ottawa, June 30, 1915; W. F. Nickle, Esq., M.P., December 14, 1916; Hector McInnes, Esq., K.C., March 16, 1917.

3. The members of the Commission receive no salary or remuneration.

4. (a) None. (b) The following is a statement of amounts paid to members of the Commission for expenses: The Hon. Sir James Lougheed, from June 30, 1915, to May 27, 1917, $3,052.50, (this amount covers travelling expenses for the period from June 30, 1915, to the 27th May, 1917 the work having fallen upon the president to travel from the Atlantic to the Pacific several times in connection with the establishment of convalescent homes and hospitals); Lieut.-Colonel C. F. Smith, from June 30, 1915, to February 24, 1916, $128.40; Hon. J. S. McLennan, from June 30, 1915, to March 26, 1917, $685.10; F. W. Avery, Esq. (deceased), from June 30, 1915, to February 19, 1916, $114.70; Brig.-General Sir H. M. Pellatt, from June 30, 1915, to April 8, 1916, $110; Smeaton White, Esq., from June 30, 1915, to April 8, 1916, $150; Lieut.-Colonel T. Walker, from June 30, 1915, to September 6, 1916, $377.65; Lieut.-Colonel C. W. Rowley, from June 30, 1915, to November 10, 1916, $390.45; W. K. George, Esq., from October 14, 1915, to August 10, 1916, $152.70; the Hon. T. W. Crothers, from October 14, 1915, to December 30, 1916, $40; W. M. Dobell, Esq., from October 14, 1915, to September 20, 1916, $1,150.41, (this amount covers the period from October 14, 1915, to September 20, 1916, and includes a voyage overseas to investigate similar work in France and England); R. Gill, Esq., from May 18, 1916, to November 15, 1916, $56.35; Dr. F. J. Shepherd, from April 4, 1916, to June 30, 1917, $412.80; F. W. Peters, Esq., from April 4, 1916, to April 20, 1917, $163.50; J. S. H. Matson, Esq., from June 30, 1915, to April 30, 1917, $410.

MR. GEO. F. HENDERSON, K.C.

Mr. McCOIG:

1. Is Mr. Geo. F. Henderson, K.C., chairman of the commission appointed by the Government to review the report of Mr. W. F. O'Connor, K.C., High Cost of Living Commissioner, on the operations of cold storage corporations in Canada, the same person who appeared as counsel for certain food supplying corporations alleged by the City of Ottawa to be charging extortionate prices, at the Government investigation of cost of living conditions held at the City Hall, Ottawa, in January last, at the request of the municipality on behalf of its citizen consumers?

2. Was this investigation conducted at the request of the citizens through their city council by Mr. W. F. O'Connor, K.C., acting for the Labour Department on the question of the high cost of living?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Mr. Henderson represented the Ottawa Dairy Company, Ltd., as their counsel, at an investigation into the cost and price of milk, held in January, 1917, before W. F. O'Connor, K.C., as an examiner under the Order in Council No. 2777, of November 10, 1917.

2. Yes.

ASSISTANTS TO FOOD CONTROLLER.

Mr. ROSS:

1. Has H. P. McCue been appointed to act in any capacity with the food controller, or in connection with the Government?

2. If so, in what capacity? What are his qualifications for such position and what is his salary?

3. Who are Messrs. Willison, Todd & French, appointed to assist the food controller, and what are their qualifications for this work?

4. Are such appointments, if made, in harmony with the national thrift and economy advocated by the Government and the food controller?

Mr. HUGH CLARK:

1. Not with food controller.

2. Answered by answer to No. 1.

3. W. A. Willison: Active in newspaper and educational work, connected with the News Advertiser of Vancouver, B.C. for some time, connected with the Toronto Daily News for several years as staff correspondent and associate editor, an accredited correspondent of the Toronto Daily News in London, England, for two and a half years during which time he was closely associated with the Canadian troops at the front, and made a special study of the educational and publicity work in connection with the food problem in Great Britain.

S. E. Todd, B.S.A.: Practical farmer, graduate of the Ontario Agricultural College, district representative of the Department of Agriculture for a number of years, farm director of the public institutions of the province of Ontario for over five years, being in charge of the farms at the twelve provincial institutions. His work included purchase of large quantities of provisions, being in special charge of the meat supply and the public institutions abattoir, and the growing, storing, canning and preserving of fruits and vegetables and otherwise provisioning a population of upwards of eight thousand.

F. W. French: Employed in the Department of the Provincial Secretary, Ontario, for a number of years, studying and installing office systems within the department, business manager of the Hospital for Insane at Whitby through a large part of the construction period, assistant director of Industries, Ontario Reformatory, Guelph, having charge of the reorganization of the various industries and the installation of modern cost-accounting systems throughout. Resigned his position with the Ontario Government to take up like work with Robert Simpson Company, Limited, at better pay, and was temporarily released by them to take up the present work, at as nearly as may be the same remuneration to him as was paid by the Robert Simpson Company.

4. Yes.

SONORA PREVENTIVE OFFICER.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Why was a change made in the personnel of the Preventive Office at Sonora, Guysboro County, N.S.?

Mr. REID: In the interests of the public service.

RIMOUSKI PUBLIC WORKS ENGINEER.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. What was the cost of the heating of the office of the engineer of the Department of Public Works at Rimouski, Mr. J. C. Taché, during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917?

2. From whom was the coal and wood bought, and at what price per ton or cord?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The department pays Mrs. J. C. Taché $30 per month rent for office accommodation at Rimouski which includes the heating.

2. No information in the department.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. How many employees are there in the office of Mr. J. C. Taché, engineer, at Rimouski?

2. What are their names, occupations and salaries?

3. Upon whose recommendation has each one of the said employees been appointed?

Mr. ROGéRS:

1. 10 employees.

2. J. C. Taché, district engineer, $2,800; L. G. Trudeau, senior assistant engineer, $1,500; Alex. Bailey, assistant engineer, $1,200; Maurice Leblanc, general foreman for Bonaventure Co., $1,200; A. Lavoie, general foreman for Rimouski, County, $1,200; Jerome Legare, draughtsman, $1,100; Theodore Dery, junior assistant engineer, $900; Miss E. Caron, stenographer, $780; J. A. Turcotte, clerk, $900; Ernest Bois, messenger, $240.

3. No information in departmental records.

*Mr. LANCTOT:

What was the total amount spent for the office of the engineer of the Public Works Department at Rimouski, Mr. J. C. Taché, during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1917, in salaries, including that of the engineer, rent, office supplies and heating?

Mr. ROGERS: $12,615.08.

THE STEAMER DRAKE.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Was the oil cargo of the steamer Drake, belonging to the Standard Oil Company, seized on January 26, 1917, for undervaluation?
2. If so, was the cargo released on January 28, 1917?
3. What amount of duty and penalty was paid on account of the cargo of the Drake?
4. Was any back duty on previous shipments by the same company collected?

Mr. REID:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Full duties have been paid on cargoes landed from Drake. No penalties have been imposed on such cargoes for the reason they were properly entered.
4. Answered by No. 3.

FUEL CONTROLLER'S STAFF.

Mr. KAY:

1. Has the Government come to any decision as to the number of secretaries, assistants and office employees, which will be required in the office of the Fuel Controller?
2. Have any appointments been made?
3. If so, what are the names of the persons appointed?
4. What salary is paid to each?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The only help that has been ordered under pay for the Fuel Controller up to the present time has been the appointment of which I spoke yesterday, of Mr. H. P. McCue. Whatever help may be necessary in the future, that is the condition of things as it is to-day.

LIEUT. ROSWELL BLAIN.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Is Lieutenant Roswell Blain, whose home is in Brampton, Ont., and who originally enlisted in the 126th Battalion, subsequently transferred to the 116th Battalion, in Canada at present time?
2. Has he been discharged or is he home on furlough?
3. Is he still drawing pay?
4. If not, when did it cease?
5. Is Lieutenant Blain's wife drawing separation allowance?
6. If so, what amounts have been paid her?
7. From what date did the separation allowance start?
8. If not drawing separation allowance at present, when did it stop?

269½

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.
2. On furlough.
3. Yes.
4. Answered by No. 3.
5. Yes.
6. His wife is drawing the separation allowance to which she is entitled according to rank of her husband.
7. February, 1916.
8. Answered by No. 5.

WESTERN BUILDING INSPECTOR.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has Mr. Gerrie, of Winnipeg, been recently appointed building inspector for the West in the Public Works Department?
2. If so, was he recommended by the Civil Service Commission?
3. What is his salary?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Charles Gerrie, appointed building inspector for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, on 5th July, 1916.
2. No; the outside staff of the Public Works Department does not come under jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission.
3. $150 per month.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX.

INFORMATION AS TO RETURNS BY BUSINESS CONCERNS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): I wish to ask the Minister of Finance if it is possible to have a clear statement of the policy which the Government intends to pursue regarding the publication of details of the taxation under the business profits war tax. I referred to this in the House some two or three weeks ago in the absence of the Minister of Finance, and the Prime Minister said he would bring it to the attention of the minister, but I have heard nothing further about it. I wrote to the Minister of Finance giving the names of four or five companies who I know have made large profits in the province of New Brunswick. I received the reply that no returns had been filed for the first year. I have received no further information. I am not bringing this up with a view to finding fault with the answers I received from the Finance Minister, but I feel it is a matter of so much importance that the House is entitled to a straight declaration from the Government as to how much or how little information the public are to receive in reference to matters of this kind. I do so largely because the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) was able to give to the country certain detailed information with regard to twenty-three of the most important companies that come under this Act, and when I ask for information regarding other companies, I am unable to obtain it except to be treated as confidential. While it might be some pleasure to me to have private information, it is of no public value, and therefore it could not be used.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When the Business Profits War Tax Act, which was introduced in the session of 1916, was under consideration, the statement was made that returns would be brought down provided a resolution of the House was passed asking for such information. It was thought inadvisable that details of private business should be given, There seems to be a consensus of opinion that such details should not be made public. There is a provision in the Business Profits Tax Act providing a penalty against any official of the department giving any information to the public respecting the details given in the return made by the taxpayers under that Act. I have given this matter a good deal of consideration, because my hon. friend from Carleton has raised the point in the House. I do not desire that the administration of this Act should be exempt from criticism. I think that would not be in the public interest. I shall always be prepared to discuss any resolution referring to the administration of that Act in respect to the assessment of any firm or company carrying on business in Canada, and subject to its provisions.

My hon friend has asked, what is the policy which the Government will adopt with reference to this? The conclusions which I have reached are: I think that a member of Parliament, as a member of Parliament, is entitled to know the amount for which any taxpayer is assessed. I think that, if he desires detailed information showing the amount of capital, the reserve and profits and other intimate particulars of the business of any individual or concern carrying on business in Canada, he ought to move for such information, and in so moving he should give the grounds upon which he desires it. He should lay a foundation which would justify the Government in placing before the country the intimate details of the private business of those engaged in commerce and industry. Then each such motion could be dealt with upon its merits. The Government could take the position that this information, by reason of the foundation which has been laid and the argument of the member asking for it, should be brought down, or, on the other hand, the Government could take the position that no proper foundation had been laid, and that the information should not be brought down. My own view is that a member asking that information of a confidential nature should be brought down and made public should lay a foundation, indicating that the assessment had not been properly made. Then, if such position were prima facie sustained in the argument, the Government would, I think, be justified in bringing down the information.

It is a very important matter to business firms in Canada that the intimate details of their private business should not be made public to their competitors. I believe 99 per cent of the business concerns will subscribe to that proposition as being sound, and only fair to them. They do not desire to escape taxation, but they do not want their competitors to know the details of their private business. I am not speaking of public utilities, or of public companies where returns are required by legislation or otherwise; I am speaking of the business of companies generally. Further, I may say that since this question has been raised I have asked the Acting High Commissioner in London, to ascertain from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the practice in Great Britain, and I am informed, in reply to my cablegram, that under no circumstances would they permit the publication of detailed information relating to the business of individuals, firms, and companies carrying on business in the United Kingdom, and subject to the excess profits tax. The Government should, I think, take the position that we do not desire to be exempt from criticism. If there is a measure in force in Canada providing for taxation, the administration of that measure is a proper subject for debate in the House. On the other hand, we must be fair and just to the business community. The position therefore, is, as I have indicated, and it is not in any way inconsistent with the furnishing to the hon. gentleman for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) of the assessments of a certain number of firms which paid during the first year the highest amount of business profits taxes. I have written to my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) stating substantially what I have stated here to-day

If a member of Parliament, as a member of Parliament, desires to know how much "A" is assessed for, I think he should know, but if he desires to make public information relating to the details of private business, I think he should move by way of resolution in this House, and lay a foundation setting forth fully his reasons for making such motion and the ground upon which it is made.

Mr. CARVELL: Suppose that I, as a member of Parliament, should apply to the minister to obtain the amount for which any firm or corporation had been assessed, would he consider that was purely confidential to myself, or would I be entitled to use it? I assure him that unless I could use it it would be of no value to me.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I stated that information would be supplied to a member of Parliament as a member of Parliament. When he gets that information, it is for him to use it in such manner as he thinks he is justified in using it, having regard to the responsibility of his position as a member of Parliament. There is a differentiation in my mind between giving information as to the amount of assessment and the details of a man's private business, which latter I do not think should be given. My hon. friend refers to one or two cases in which he received an answer from my department. The assessment for the second accounting period has not yet been made.

In one of the cases which he asked for information, there was no such company as my hon. friend named, and I suggested that he should see the Commissioner of Taxation. I do not believe there is an office in the Government that is more open so far as information is concerned than my own; it has always been my object to keep it so. At the same time, unless there are grounds for the charge that full information has not been supplied or that the assessment has been wrongfully made, it is not in the public interest that these matters which we have been discussing should be made public.

Mr. KYTE: I asked the Minister of Finance some months ago for the amount of the earnings and war tax of the Ogilvie Flour Mills company up to the end of the accounting period terminating August 31, 1916. The Minister of Finance about July 15 stated that the figures had not been worked out by the department. Can he supply the information now?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The assessment on the second accounting period is now being made; we will have until September to make it up. The department is very busily engaged in going over the multitude of returns that have come in and it will be well into the fall before these assessments are settled. I think I gave my hon. friend some information with regard to the first year.

THE CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF RESOLUTION RESPECTING CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Consideration resumed in committee of the proposed resolution of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) respecting the Canadian Northern Railway company, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Last evening I stated that I could obtain at once some of the information that was asked for in addition to that already supplied to the committee. The member for Welland (Mr. German) asked for a copy of the trust mortgage securing the $45,000,000 issue in 1914. Only one copy is available; that I now lay upon the Table. Some hon. member asked for a copy of the mortgage securing the issue of $15,000,000 which was made last year; I lay that mortgage also upon the Table. The member for St John (Mr. Pugsley) asked for the official returns of the Government auditors. I have their monthly audit up to February last. I have not the audits made since that time, because it takes a couple of months to close up an audit in connection with a system as large as the Canadian Northern Railway system. I lay upon the Table this statement of the audit from May of last year until February of this year, inclusive. I think that is nearly all the information that was asked for, with the exception of an approximate balance sheet as of June 30 of this year. I have already laid upon the Table the balance sheet of last year; it is printed in the document now before the committee. I hope to have the balance sheet for the last fiscal year ended June 30, 1917, by the time the Bill is in the committee stage. I think that covers all that I was asked to obtain.

Mr. MARCIL: Has any information been asked for or brought down with regard to Model City, which Mackenzie and Mann are establishing near the tunnel in Montreal? Considerable interest is taken in this matter by the citizens of that city.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not understand that that land is vested in the Canadian Northern—though if I am mistaken, I should be glad to be corrected. Mackenzie and Mann have hundreds of enterprises throughout Canada and elsewhere. If this matter has any relevancy to the discussion of the acquisition of $100,000,000 of stock of the Canadian Northern Railway system, I shall endeavour to obtain what information I can about it.

Mr. MARCIL: The citizens of Montreal were told that this Model City was being opened up in connection with the new tunnel. In fact, it cannot be reached except through the tunnel. All the land which could be purchased on the north side of the mountain was acquired and promises were made that a magnificent city would be laid out there. What I wanted to know was whether that enterprise had any connection with the Canadian Northern system or its subsidiary companies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not aware that it has any connection, but I shall inquire, and if I find that it has I shall make a statement in regard to the matter.

Mr. MARCIL: It is only fair to the public that the minister should explain exactly how the matter stands.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I can obtain information about it only if the Canadian Northern owns the land. If it is some subsidiary enterprise owned by Mackenzie and Mann, or others, it has no connection with this resolution; it would have no bearing upon our determination of the issue.

Mr. MARCIL: In the statement that has been issued, certain lands owned by the company are dealt with; I thought that these might be in the same category.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The debentures amounting to $21,000,000 which are to be assumed by the Government have as their sole security the sales agreements of lands in the West, about 800,000 acres of unsold lands, and the cash proceeds of the sales which are in the hands of the National Trust company. They do not cover the land grants either in Ontario or in Quebec. My hon. friend will, I think, see the importance, before asking the committee to authorize the country to become liable for these debentures, amounting to the enormous sum of $21,000,000, of furnishing information with regard to these lands, where they are situated, what sales have been made each year since the Government became represented on the board of directors pursuant to the resolution of 1914—because the assurance was then made that the Government would be so represented—and what has been the average value per acre of the lands sold. My hon. friend will find that when those lands are all sold there will be a large shortage, amounting to several million dollars, which the country will be obliged to assume, and I think the people are entitled to have the information for which I have asked.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I stated last night, and as the Prime Minister stated, I utterly fail to follow the argument of my hon. friend from St. John. The Canadian Northern Railway company issued its debentures to the amount of about $20,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: $21,000,000 is nearer the correct amount.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, say $21,000,000. If they had had no lands at all to pledge, and had issued their debentures and taken the proceeds and used them in the construction of the system, if we took over the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, that would not in any way lessen or diminish the indebtedness of that company in respect of the issue of debentures. Instead of issuing those debentures unsecured, the Canadian Northern Railway company had land, and in order to make their debentures more attractive to the investing company, the railway company pledged the land as security for the debentures. My hon. friend says that when the transaction is at an end, there will be a shortage representing the difference between the amount realized from the sale of the lands and the amount of debenture stock issued. Assuming, for a moment, that that will be so—I do not know whether it will be or not—I ask: How does that affect this question? In what different position is it from other debenture indebtedness of the Canadian Northern? My hon. friend suggested last night that the Government might have nothing to do with those lands.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government does not get into privity with the debenture holders except to this extent: They are in precisely the same position as with the other debenture holders. If those debentures are paid off in time, the Canadian Northern Railway company will have whatever security is left there, in lands, deferred payments, cash in trust or otherwise. This particular debenture issue is in a better position than is any unsecured debenture issue of the Canadian Northern, because it has those lands as collateral. My hon. friend asks for certain information as to where these lands are situated. I think I can give that to him. The Canadian Northern Railway company had in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, 4,002,848 acres of those lands. There have been sold 3,159,720 acres, leaving unsold 843,128 acres. The value placed upon those 843,128 remaining acres is $15 per acre, making a total of $12,646,925. In addition, the Canadian Northern Railway Company, has a land grant from the province of Quebec of 402,860 acres, all unsold; from the province of Ontario, a land grant of 2,000,000 acres, all unsold, those lands in both cases being valued by the company at $3 per acre.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not know if the minister is aware of the fact, but if the documents laid on the Table are correct, those debentures do not cover the land grant of 2,000,000 acres in Ontario nor the land grant of 402,860 acres in Quebec. On the contrary, those land grants are both hypothecated together with other securities, as the minister will find by turning to page 10 of the statement.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not dissenting from that statement. I am giving these particulars for the information of the committee. In the province of Nova Scotia, there is a land grant of 150,000 acres, all of which has been sold. The deferred payments and accrued interest on the land grants I have mentioned were $7,140,996, less commissions on the collecting of the instalments, $478,887, leaving balance due on deferred payments and accrued interest on sales of $6,662,109. I understand that the 4,000,000 acres of land referred to were originally obtained by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann as contractors in connection with construction of certain railway lines which they built in Manitoba. Those lands belonged absolutely to them. As the system grew, they transferred those lands which they owned to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and they now appear amongst the assets of that company. In 1899, the company issued a land grant mortgage to the amount of $2,000,000, the proceeds of the mortgage being used for the purposes of railway construction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On what lands?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: On the land grants.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the West?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, a part of them, not all of them, about 1,600,000 acres. Again in 1909, they made an issue of $5,000,000. Provision was made under these two mortgages for retiring the mortgages as the sale of the lands proceeded. In 1913, an issue of £3,500,000 of 5 per cent land mortgage debentures were made, and the proceeds devoted to the purposes of the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What are these last lands?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Part of the 4,000,000 acres in the West. In addition to the above, the Canadian Northern obtained 120,000 shares of stock in the Canadian Northern Prairie Lands Company, which, at par, amounted to $600,000, and in exchange that company gave the lands company 200,000 acres of land. The stock has been paying 10 per cent since its issue, and provision has been made from the sales of lands to retire the original stock at par. This was a transaction in connection with their issue of debenture stock, and the point I make is this, because I fail to see what bearing this has upon the question—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will show the minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not see what bearing it has, and I do not think it has any bearing at all, if we are going to take the stock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I was arguing was that you should not take the stock; you should expropriate the railway system.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Canadian Northern Railway Company issued debentures to the extent of $21,000,000, and the proceeds went into the road. If there had been no collateral, the railway company would not have been in as good a position to-day as regards the collateral, namely, the lands, which represent a substantial value, no matter what the precise amount may be. Therefore, I do not follow my hon. friend when he suggests that the railway company should not retain these lands. Why should the railway company give up its equity in valuable lands, even if those lands are pledged to secure an issue of debenture stock. My hon. friend says that he is in favour of expropriation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not in favour of engaging in the enterprise at all while the war is on, or so long as present conditions continue. What I said was that if the road was to be acquired, it should be by expropriation, the country paying for the property what it is actually worth.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend put forward that argument last night, and I pointed out to him that if the Government expropriated this system, including all the physical assets of the several railway and other companies embraced in it, we should have to find a very large amount of money—my hon. friend said about $300,000,000. I pointed out to him that, from the standpoint of financing in times like these, it was very much better to continue the companies as they are, permitting them to do their corporation financing, and assisting them only to the extent that was necessary, rather than to attempt to expropriate the physical properties of the whole system, and having to find some $300,000,000 to do it with, because the indebtedness would have to be paid off. I pointed out further—and it has been pointed out frequently in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway system because the question has been before the House many times—that if the Government foreclosed and took possession, there would at once be liquidation proceedings in connection with all the companies included in the system.

My hon. friend has radically changed his mind on this question because in 1914, as was pointed out by the Prime Minister last night, he suggested that the stock should be acquired and that it should be valued by arbitration. More than that, he suggested that a maximum amount of $30,000,000 should be fixed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister is not stating the facts correctly. If he would read the resolution he would see that by the amended clause the company was to have control of the system, provided they made no default If they made their interest payments promptly on the $45,000,000 and on all the other securities, things were to be allowed to run as they were for five years, the Government having the option of taking the stock by arbitration in case the company pulled through and took care of its liabilities for that period. But in case of default, the Government would have the right to take possession of the railway.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon friend has taken two or three different views of this Canadian Northern Railway situation. He has a different solution every time the question comes up.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And if he has, he does not differ much from the Minister of Finance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have had a consistent policy. In 1914 we took $40,000,000 of their stock in return for our guarantee. That left only $60,000,000 to acquire, and we are now proposing to acquire it. My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) has a different view every time this question comes up and he is always prepared to make his view fit in with what he thinks the political exigencies demand. In 1914 he was in favour of taking over the stock of this road at a maximum price of $30,000,000. More than that, his leader—and I shall place this upon Hansard before this debate is closed—moved in 1914 that immediate steps be taken to acquire the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed a maximum of $30,000,000. I shall be very much surprised if my hon. friend from St. John did not vote for that resolution.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I certainly did.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He says he did, and now he wants us to expropriate. At a time when the financial conditions are as they are, he wants the Government to provide $300,000,000 to expropriate the property He goes back upon the view which he has expressed on more than one occasion, goes back upon the view which his leader expressed, and which he voted for in 1914.

Mr PUGSLEY: Was it not then represented to the House that the total liabilities did not exceed $300,000,000? To-day we find them put at $400,000,000. We do not know just what they are.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is pretty good at explaining, but I think it will tax even his powers to explain his change of view.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Last evening the Prime Minister, departing from that courtesy which is characteristic of him, said that I appeared to be talking with an entire want of common sense in the remarks which I had made, and he based that suggestion on the fact that he could not for the life of him understand why, as the proceeds of the bonds which had been sold, being secured by the lands, had gone into the road, the Government should take over the road and not the liability which existed against the unsold lands. Now to me there is nothing unreasonable in that. If it is in the public interest that this railway system be acquired, I do not see why the Government should not take proceedings simply to acquire the property which the country wants, and leave the land just as it is to-day, the title being in the Empire Trust Company as security for the bondholders. Those who put their money into the land grant bonds had no interest in the question, and no right to determine the question, as to what would be done with the money. We have no evidence that they knew, and I presume they never inquired whether any portion of the money went into the road or into tramways, coal mines, and the hundred and one other enterprises in which Mackenzie and Mann are engaged. To-day we are in this position: There is a railway and rolling stock—a very large railway system—which the Government says it is in the interest of the country to acquire. There is a land grant in respect of which 800,000 acres remain unsold. There are also some sales agreements, and there is also some money in the National Trust company. Now the country does not need these lands. Everybody will admit that they form no part of the railway system. Why should the Government, in taking what it requires as regards the railway system itself, be compelled to take lands which it does not need, which form no part of the railway system, and against which there is an enormous debenture liability, which this Government has to assume if it acquires the stock as is now proposed? The argument which I was making was, that the Government should expropriate the railway system, leave the Canadian Northern Railway Company as a company, leave the Canadian Northern stock as stock, and leave the lands, and the debentures against the lands, just as they are to-day.

Suppose a man owns two properties, upon one of which he has erected a building. Then he wants to put a building on another property, and he borrows money upon the security of property on which he has already put up a buliding. The Government comes along and says "we want one of those properties on which to build a railway station." Would it not have the right to take it? Could he say "you cannot take one property unless you take both, because I have actually borrowed money on one of those properties with which to erect a building upon the other. If you take one you must take the other?" Would not such a contention be treated as entirely absurd? Yet the Prime Minister is not able to see—perhaps I am doing him an injustice, and that I should say that he professes not to be able to see how the Government can expropriate a railway system without taking a lot of other property, simply because some money may have been raised on other property for the purpose of assisting in the construction of the railway. If the Government takes the railway, the company gets the benefit of the money which was put into is as a portion of or as the whole proceeds of the land which was sold. The Government pays for that. It has added that much to the value of the railway, which the Government pays for when it expropriates the title of the company. I think one has only to state the proposition in order to show the grave injustice it is proposed to perpetrate against the people of this country by compelling them under the arrangement which this Government brings forward to force the people of this country to become liable for the enormous sum of $21,000,000, and simply have those lands as security, the cream of which has, I believe, been sold years ago, and which lands, in all human probability, would not realize more than one-third or one-half of the obligations which this Government is going to make the country assume with respect to those land debentures. Yet the minister asks us to go into this thing blindly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Why does my hon. friend use the words: "the Government is going to assume in respect of the lands?" The proceeds of the debentures went into the construction of the road, and the lands will be collateral for the debentures, and are the equity which remains the property of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. I may say to my hon. friend that I have before me the official report of the Canadian Northern Railway Company for last year, which shows that during the year 19,443 acres of the system's lands were sold, at an average price of $16.37 per acre, an aggregate of $318,248. As I understand my hon. friend he wants us to get rid of those lands, which sell at $16 an acre.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister is not so much of a child as he would try to make himself appear. He assumes that because settlers, or land purchasers from the States, come in and go all over a tract of land, picking out here and there from the best, which they buy at $16 an acre, that the rest of the land is worth $16 an acre. I can take the minister into sections of the Northwest, where he will find lands worth from $15 to $20 an acre, and even find some land worth perhaps $40 an acre, depending upon the location. In the same township, he will find hundreds and thousands of acres of land which would not sell for $5 per acre—land which no one wants, being either alkali or rough broken land, which is not saleable at all. The "American invasion" was beginning in 1902, when thousands of settlers from the United States came into this country. They went over those lands in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba which are comprised in the land grant of the Canadian Northern system, and they picked out the very best lands in those districts. We have no right to assume that the land which is left to-day is worth anything like the same price as the land which was then chosen by those settlers. I venture to say a great portion of the land bought by people from the United States was purchased at from $2.50 an acre up to, perhaps, $16 per acre. The minister says the proceeds of those land bonds went into the railway. If they did, does not the country pay the company for them? For the sake of argument let us say the railway is valued at $100,000, and $25,000 represent the proceeds of the sale of land debentures which went into the railway. Does not the country pay that $25,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In valuing the stock, does my hon. friend mean to say that he would only consider the amount spent on the road, and would not consider its liabilities?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In valuing the stock, you must consider all the liabilities. The trouble is when you propose to value the stock you start out with the idea that it has a market value. The commissioners whom you appointed to investigate the matter say it has no market value. Anybody who has given any thought to the subject will agree that in all human probability a judge of the Exchequer Court would not allow a valuation up to the amount of the securities. All I am arguing for is that this country shall simply pay what the property is worth, and let the proceeds of the sale be divided among those who are holders of the securities and who may be entitled to it. If under a valuation there is anything left after paying off the obligations, then of course the holders of the stock would be entitled to get their share of it.

My hon. friend has referred to what occurred in 1914, and spoke of the position I took at that time, and of the amendment which was moved, but he has not stated all that took place. When it was proposed to lend the company a sum of $45,000,000 it was represented to this House, which took the word of the Government, that with that $45,000,000 the company would be able to pull through, and would not come back again to Parliament for more assistance. That was the assurance which was given to this House. We believed the statement of the Government, and we, on this side of the House, said that the company was coming in a bankrupt condition, admitting that unless it was aided to the extent of $45,000,000 it could not pay its liabilities, and could not continue business, but must go to the wall. Our view was: "assuming what you say is true, and that this will enable the company to pull through, provide, as a condition to the company getting this $45,000,000 aid, that it shall hand over to the Governor in Council all of its issued stock. Place that stock in the hands of the Government, so that if there should be any default, and if the company should not be able to pull through, then the country will have that stock without paying anything more, or giving any further assistance. Stipulate that it shall be held for five years, and if during those five years there is no default, then the Government will have the right—the railway having kept the road going, paid its liabilities, met its interest and demonstrated that it could carry its affairs along—if it should be the will of Parliament to take over the road, it shall be taken over at a valuation which shall not exceed $30,000,000."

Is not that a different proposition from what is before us to-day? All the promises held out to the people of this country through this Parliament have proved to be false. The company was not able to carry on its business, and, apparently, was not able to provide the necessary rolling stock, or make the necessary betterment, if we are to believe the Finance Minister to-day, and give way to the arguments he puts forward in respect of this resolution.

To-day the liabilities are admitted to be upwards of $400,000,000. In 1914 the Government led us to believe they were only $300,000. Is the position very different by reason of the vast increase in liabilities beyond what we were told they were in 1914? The conditions are different for another reason, that in 1914 there was no war on. The Government could then borrow money in the markets of the world at 3 per cent per annum. Even the Provincial Government of New Brunswick of which I was formerly a member floated a large loan not many years before that at 3 per cent. To-day the minister is obliged to go out of this country down to the markets of the United States and borrow money at the enormous rate of 6 per cent per annum. The credit of this country is being strained to the utmost. Burdens unthought of and deemed to be impossible of realization some years ago are to-day being put upon the people of this country, and they are responding cheerfully in order to carry on the war and to do their portion to enable the Government to assist the Empire to the fullest extent possible; and in this time, when the minister knows that this is the condition of affairs, he is coming and asking the people of this country to undertake an additional burden running up to the vicinity of half a billion dollars and to assume an unknown liability which may amount to thirty, forty, fifty or sixty million dollars more, to go into the pockets of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. They are also putting this country under the necessity of spending in the near future many millions more in building the road up to standard at which the people of this country will expect it to be maintained in case it is acquired by the Government—and the minister is doing all this in face of the deplorable financial position in which Canada stands to-day, and in face of the enormous rate of interest which the country is obliged to pay. The minister talks about me changing my mind. How is it with him? Last year when he came before Parliament he gave us to understand that, in his opinion, it was a thousand times better to give temporary assistance to this railway, to carry it over these troublous times, and he told us that he would look——

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is misrepresenting my position. I said in my speech last year that these repeated applications for aid had become intolerable and that we would appoint a commission for the purpose of finding a permanent solution for the railway situation in Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the minister did not intimate that he would take over this great liability and incur these enormous obligations while the war was on. He said that he would deplore any movement that would involve the country in such a great liability. He said we must look, first of all, to the credit of the country, to the obligations which Canada must bear in connection with the carrying on of the war, and the only conclusion that could be drawn from the argument of the minister was that after this report would be made and when the times would become good again, when the war would be over, when the credit of the country would be re-established and prosperity would come to us again, then the Government would decide what should be done in connection with both of these great railway systems.

I have thought it desirable to make these remarks in answer to the statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance yesterday.

Mr. CARVELL: I was not able to be in the chamber yesterday, and did not hear all the Minister of Finance said. I should like to know if he could tell the committee how much money it would take to meet the present liabilities of the company. Can he also give any estimate, based upon reasonable facts, as to what it is going to cost to finish the system? For instance, we know that the Montreal terminals are in a semi-completed condition; that the Vancouver terminals are in the same condition; that there are enormous trestles on the North Thompson river and on the Fraser river, and that there are unfinished or uncompleted portions of the work all over the system. Before Parliament can intelligently decide upon this thing we ought to know exactly where we stand, because, as I understand the resolution, it is the intention of the Government to preserve the entity of the Canadian Northern railway, with which I must say I agree in a sense, because under present financial conditions it would be a serious matter if we were compelled to liquidate all its liabilities. The Canadian Northern railway is to be maintained as an entity, but purely under Government control. Now, if it be under Government control, the Government must go on and finish the road, and I think the committee should have as nearly accurate figures as the minister can give as to what it will take to pay of the present liabilities and complete the road as at present laid out. I do not mean this year; it might take two or three years to do it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I made a pretty full statement last evening covering all the matters to which my hon. friend has referred. With regard to the Montreal and Vancouver terminals, there is part of the proceeds of the $45,000,000 remaining with the receiver general available for finishing those works.

So far as concerns rolling stock, I pointed out last night that the Drayton-Acworth report dealt with that, and that while the company had stated that it would require $25,000,000 worth of rolling stock, the report of the commission was that, in their opinion, it would require $50,000,000 of rolling stock, spread over five years. But it was stated in the report that that was on the basis of the business of the system being increased by 90 per cent. I pointed out that it would be the object of the Government that the public of Canada should be served, so far as possible, by the Canadian Northern railway being adequately equipped with rolling stock, and I said that the Minister of Railways was giving orders for cars for the purpose of still further equipping the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental railway. I said also that, while it might require large sums to ideally equip any railway, the company could reasonably get on with such expenditures for rolling stock and other equipment as might be possible, having regard to financial conditions. I do not believe myself that would present a very considerable financial burden, that is in financing the company to the extent necessary to purchase rolling stock for, as my hon. friend knows, the ordinary railway company furnishes itself with rolling stock by issuing what are called rolling stock debentures. The Canadian Northern railway will remain as a going concern and can issue debentures secured upon rolling stock purchased, provided it is in a position to pay down a certain small percentage at the outset. My hon. friend is familiar with the way in which these debentures are retired by paying off each year the interest and part of the principal. My hon. friend has information that the company has spent its earnings in betterments and other instalment payments, principally upon rolling stock, and that it has run behind to the extent of the interest upon its underlying securities, which is a matter of some $15,000,000. I stated that the company would require, in order to go on until the spring of next year, some $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, and instead of the Government making them a loan, we determined we would take over the stock, so that any advances made would enure to the benefit of the people of Canada.

So far as the short term loan situation is concerned, there is something like $98,000,000 spread over two years, but those loans are all very well secured in many cases by Government guaranteed securities to an amount more than representing the short date notes which had been issued against them. What I would look forward to would be—just as during the past two years—the company renewing those loans as they fell due, or making one or two short date issues, for the purpose of obtaining the money to retire the present short date issues as they matured. In other words, the company will continue its corporate financing after the Government becomes the sole stockholder. That is one of the advantages, as I submitted, in our maintaining the corporate entities of the Canadian Northern and all the other underlying subsidiary and constituent companies.

Mr. GERMAN: Are these land grant bonds or debentures secured in any other way, excepting on the land itself? As I understand, there are no liens against the physical property of the Canadian Northern railway. Are these four per cent land grant bonds, 1909 and '99, etc., and land mortgage debentures secured by a mortgage on, for instance, the Canadian Northern Railway system, or are they secured by mortgage on the land itself?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Before the Bill is considered in committee, I shall inquire particularly into that matter, but I may say to my hon. friend that the debentures, while they are the obligation of the Canadian Northern railway, are secured only upon the lands which were owned by the Canadian Northern, the equity of which, of course, is still in the company.

Mr. GERMAN: Then the Canadian Northern would be personally liable for this indebtedness, but there would be no lien for the amount of that indebtedness against the Canadian Northern railway itself. I presume these unguaranteed securities are secured by a mortgage on the physical property of the railway?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: And in priority to the trust deed taken by the Government in 1914?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: So that if foreclosure proceedings were taken under the trust deed of 1914, the mortgage securing what I would call the unguaranteed securities would have priority, and would have to be paid off?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: I presume that is so. That clears the situation somewhat to my mind. I stated when this resolution was introduced that I was opposed to the proposition for more than one reason. I am opposed to the proposition because, in my opinion, it does not go far enough. Last year, when the Government asked Parliament to grant further aid to the Canadian Northern Railway company, the Minister of Finance stated, as he has stated to-day, that a commission would be appointed to inquire into the whole railway system of Canada, and to report as to the best means of dealing with the whole railway system. That commission was appointed, composed of three of the best men that the Government could get—three undoubtedly exceptionally good men. These men have reported, and two of them, Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, have made the majority report. They have reported in favour of a scheme altogether different from the scheme which the Government is proposing. Their report is absolutely at variance in my opinion with the proposition which the Government had suggested. I would have been glad to have seen the report of the majority of that commission more fully carried out than is being done.

I think the time most opportune when the Government should have courageously taken over this whole matter, in view of the duplication of railway lines across the Dominion of Canada, which are paralleling each other, and which are absolutely unnecessary. There are branch lines being projected all over the country which are not necessary for the development or the needs of the country. I think it was the duty of the Government, and the people expected the Government, to take a more courageous stand in this matter and follow out, to a very large extent at any rate, the recommendation of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth. But they are not doing that. I am not at all in accord with the report of the majority of the commission in regard to the Grand Trunk I quite agree with the statement of the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew, that the report is a very harsh one in regard to the Grand Trunk railway, which is the pioneer road of the country, but it is not necessary to develop that position at the present time. I wish to state, however, that I would have been in favour of a broader and more courageous policy, one which would have gone further in the way of public ownership of these railway systems than this proposition goes. Whatever we may have thought in the past in regard to public ownership of railroads, we must change our opinion at the present time, if we are to keep pace with the opinion of the public, because it is an undoubted fact that the wheels of democracy are revolving very rapidly. The democratic juggernaut is advancing rapidly, and those who stand in the way will be crushed under its wheels, whether they are lords, barons, knights or premiers.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then do not stand in the way.

Mr. GERMAN: And I tell the Government they must not stand in the way. The people are determined to have public ownership of these utilities, and it will come. As far as I am individually concerned, I am in favour of the proposition of the Government for taking over the Canadian Northern railway, so far as it goes, but not at all in the manner in which they are doing it. In 1914 I, at any rate, advocated the taking over by the Government of this whole system. I stated then that the Canadian Northern system was bankrupt. The Prime Minister acknowledged it was bankrupt. The Solicitor General acknowledged that they had to have assistance from the Government in order to complete the lines, or bankruptcy stared them in the face. It is bankruptcy to-day, in so far as being capable of going ahead and doing business is concerned.

As the Finance Minister has stated, they must have $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 immediately to tide them over their present difficulties. That being so, it is the duty of the Government to take over this road. But under what system should it be taken over? I say most emphatically—and I believe that in this I am borne out by the majority of the people—that the system that the Government is adopting in taking over this road is not the best system. The member for St. John has said—in that I agree—that there should be an expropriation of this property. Hon. gentlemen opposite try to surround this question of expropriation with a considerable degree of mystery. But there is nothing mysterious in expropriation proceedings; such proceeding are being taken every day; they are being taken continually by the Government. The very day the Government began expropriation proceedings in respect of the Canadian Northern Railway system, the people would become the owners of that system; the Government could take possession of it and begin to operate it, just as the Minister of Railways and Canals can take possession of lands on the new Welland Ship canal. He begins his expropriation proceedings—he does not wait to have the value of the lands fixed—and the moment he begins those proceedings the title to the land is vested in the Crown and the Government can begin operations on it at once. If the parties cannot agree as to the value of the land, the matter is left to the decision of the Exchequer Court. There is no reason why the same proceedings should not be taken with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway system. There would be no delay; indeed, it would be a quicker transaction than the present method, because the Government, by virtue of their right of eminent domain, would become the owners of the property the moment they began expropriation proceedings.

Mr. BURNHAM: Who would provide the operating staff?

Mr. GERMAN: The operating staff would be provided by the Government just as they propose to provide an operating staff now. There is no difference.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understood my hon. friend to say that he was in favour of the Drayton-Acworth report. Does he not know that what he now suggests as to taking immediate possession of the system and operating it is opposed in the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report?

Mr. GERMAN: The Drayton-Acworth report recommends that the Government take over the property, but not by purchasing the stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I wish to correct my hon. friend; he is entirely wrong.

Mr. GERMAN: The Drayton-Acworth report says that the stock has absolutely no value and that Mackenzie and Mann have by law no right to any compensation. If any compensation is given, it is a matter of charity; it is an equitable right which they may have if all things prove to be in accordance with their hopes. The Drayton-Acworth report simply says that the Government should take over this property. In that the Finance Minister and myself differ; but I shall refer the House shortly to the words of the report. I contend that the proper way to acquire ownership of this road is by expropriation proceedings. When they begin expropriation proceedings of any kind, the Government state the amount that they are willing to pay for the property. There are a large number of mortgages—whether you call them debentures, debenture bonds, debenture stocks or debentures of any kind, they are mortgages against the Canadian Northern railway system—securing the people who have advanced money for the construction of the road; and those mortgages are registered against the property. There is no mystery about that; the mortgages are there, and their total amount is easily determined. If the Government thought that Mackenzie and Mann were entitled to any honorarium by reason of their years of work they could add the total amount of the mortgages to the amount of the liabilities against the company. They could simply say to the Canadian Northern Railway company: here is $450,000,000; we will pay that for the property. That amount is to cover all the legitimate liabilities against the property. What would then happen? The Government would immediately become the owner of the property. If the Canadian Northern Railway company did not see fit to accept the $450,000,000, the matter could go to the judge of the Exchequer Court and the valuation be there determined. If they did accept the $450,000,000 the Government would see to it that that money went to the security holders. But the minister says: under that plan you would assume greater liabilities. I submit that you would not be assuming any liabilities at all. The men who now hold mortgages against the property would be perfectly willing to allow the mortgages to stand. They are not anxious to get their money; in fact, the money is not due. The Government takes the property subject to the mortgages and when the mortgages are due they will attend to them. Suppose the Government is expropriating farm lands for canal purposes. Suppose the land is worth $10,000, and there is a mortgage against it for $10,000; and suppose the owner is further indebted to Tom, Dick and Harry around the country in very large sums of money. The Government expropriate the land and they say: we will give $10,000 for it. They do not necessarily have to pay the $10,000, because the mortgagee is perfectly willing to let his mortgage stand there if the Government is willing that it shall so stand. Simply because they have expropriated the land and are liable to pay the $10,000, they are not liable to pay all the other indebtednesses of the owners of that land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman will admit that the party who held the mortgage would have the right to collect for the land expropriated, if he wished to do so.

Mr. GERMAN: If the mortgage was due, he would have the right to collect it, but not otherwise, unless there was a clause in the mortgage providing that any change of ownership would give the mortgagee the right to collect. If I sell to the Solicitor General a farm which has a mortgage on it, the mortgagee cannot collect the amount of the mortgage unless there is a provision in the agreement that any transfer gives him the right to collect.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Suppose expropriation proceedings were taken and my hon. friend represented an unsecured creditor for a large amount. My hon. friend could take out an order for a receivership. Does he not know that when an order for receivership is taken out, having regard to the terms of the mortgages securing the underlying issues of the Canadian Northern, the principal becomes due and payable and the whole of these companies can be thrown into liquidation. That is what we are trying to avoid.

Mr. GERMAN: That of course, is beyond the comprehension of any man who knows what would likely happen. They may have that legal right, but you would get the property without any difficulty. In my opinion, there would be no difficulty from that source.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There could not possibly be any greater difficulty. Every man with a claim would force liquidation. His mortgage would become due. What was worth fifty cents the day before liquidation would be worth $1 and the Government would have to pay it.

Mr. GERMAN: Not at all. The Solicitor General is quite wrong. The Government would be the owner of the property subject to the mortgages that were against it. If there were any unsecured creditor who thought that the Government was offering less for the property than the property was worth, he could undoubtedly institute proceedings. That would not necessarily put the whole matter into liquidation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not if we paid up the debt.

Mr. GERMAN: Not at all, because the judge of the Exchequer Court would immediately proceed under the expropriation proceedings to ascertain the value of the property, and as soon as he had done that, his decision would be final, and it would cut out all the unsecured creditors. There could not be any difficulty of that kind at all. Any unsecured creditor could, if he saw fit, appeal from the decision of the judge of the Exchequer Court to a judge of the Supreme Court, as to the value of the property.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That might be the end of it, but what about any man's claim in respect of which he could at any time throw the company into liquidation, and immediately liquidation proceedings are instituted, liquidation follows. At the same time, the bondholders have a right to their money and can call upon the Government for it.

Mr. GERMAN: How?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If all the claims, unsecured and otherwise, could be paid, then everything would be paid just the same as now when we are taking over the stock.

Mr. GERMAN: My hon. friend is bringing up a question which could not possibly arise and which only emphasizes the difference between the Government's proposition and the proposition which I think they should adopt. I presume the Government purposes forcing through their proposition as they have outlined it. The best, most proper and quickest way would have been the expropriation. The Prime Minister said yesterday in reference to these land grant bonds that the $21,000,000 or thereabouts, which is a liability against the Canadian Northern Railway company, is not secured on the property of that company.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Only on the land.

Mr. GERMAN: Only on the land. If the Government take the physical property of the Canadian Northern Railway company, they would not be bound to pay that $21,000,000, because they took the property. That money is not secured on that property, and the holders of those bonds would be relegated to the land on which they have the security and that would be all, except that, as the Solicitor General says, they could bring an action for the liquidation of the company, and that is the only remedy they would have.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: By expropriation proceedings, does my hon. friend mean that he would dismiss altogether the unsecured claims against the property?

Mr. GERMAN: No.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Then, why should you dismiss claims secured on only part of the property?

Mr. GERMAN: What I say is this, and I am coming to the last point in regard to the matter. This point was raised the other day by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I refer to speculation in those unsecured claims. By expropriation proceedings we would know how much money from those unguaranteed securities went into this road; how much money was actually advanced. Hon. gentlemen must remember that as soon as this scheme passes through this House, those securities will rise enormously in value, and there will be an enormous amount of speculation in them. The Government will have to pay 100 cents on the dollar for security which, so far as benefit to this road is concerned, yielded only about 60 cents on the dollar, or there will be forty or fifty million dollars paid to the holders of those securities to recompense them for securities on which they paid only, perhaps, 50 per cent of the money which they are getting. That is why I raise that point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On what securities did they only receive 60 per cent? No securities in the world are of that character. There were securities sold slightly under par on a 4½ per cent basis and some on a 3½ per cent basis, which have since gone down in value because money is worth more now than it was then; it is worth more to the Government to-day than it was then. It might not pay the Government to discharge those securities.

Mr. GRAHAM: The securities of some of the subsidiary companies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They did not sell down to 60 per cent.

Mr. GRAHAM: They fell to 70 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All the securities sold fairly high.

Mr. GERMAN: Under the Government's proposition, the position would be that the creditors could dictate terms, whereas under expropriation proceedings, we would be able to dictate terms. I am not suggesting that the Government should repudiate by a fraction of a cent any proper liabilities of the Canadian Northern railway, but by expropriating, the Government would be in a position to dictate the terms and do justly by those people without allowing them to rob the treasury of Canada, as I am afraid they will do if the proposition of the Government is adopted.

[Mr. German.]

The Government is purposing to refer to a board of arbitration the question of the value of this stock. This is the first time in my experience in matters of this or any other kind that a proposition was ever made to refer to arbitrators the question of fixing the value of something which every one admits has no value, Every one, in this House or out of it, knows full well that the report of Messrs. Drayton and Acworth as to the value of that stock is absolutely correct, and they report that that stock has no value. Let us see what they say, and it is proper that this should appear very fully on Hansard. In the first place, at page 41 of their report, they speak of the value of the Canadian Northern undertaking. They estimate the value from three separate points of view—from the point of view of the cash investment, from the point of view of the physical basis, and from the point of view of its value as a going concern. They say, from the point of view of a cash investment, that the maximum cash investment that can have been made in the property is $383,302,451. That is based on the report of Professor Swain, the highest possible authority on railway matters. According to the balance sheet, the liabilities against the company, without considering the value of the $100,000,000 of stock of the parent company and the $5,000,000 of stock of subsidiary companies, amount to something over $470,000,000. As to the cash investment, $383,000,000 actually went into the property, and there are liabilities amounting to $470,000,000 against it. On that basis the commissioners find that $383,000,000 would be the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern Railway system as at present existing. In other words, it is frankly admitted by Canadian Northern witnesses that the shares represent no cash investment.

What about the physical basis? The cost of reproducing is calculated in the same way, and the figures are to be found on page 43 of the report. The commissioners give practically a summary of their previous finding. They say:

> We find then that, on the physical basis, the value of the property of the Canadian Northern shareholders is distinctly less than the amount of the liabilities against it. On this basis the equity of the shareholders must be regarded as non-existent.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does not my hon. friend think that if the stock cost nothing or next to nothing, it would be good business to get control of the Canadian Northern in that way?

Mr. GERMAN: If we acquire the stock, whether we acquire it for something or for nothing, we have absolute control over the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. BURNHAM: If its value is nothing or next to nothing we need only pay a dollar for the purpose of making the agreement legal. Is not that good business?

Mr. GERMAN: Yes, but the liabilities of the company have also to be taken into account.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says that we have to pay all the liabilities in any event.

Mr. GERMAN: Any legal and proper liabilities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When we take the stock, we shall certainly not have to incur any liabilities that are not legal and proper.

Mr. GERMAN: I am not so sure. Arbitrators are to be appointed—

Mr. MEIGHEN: They do not decide the question of liability.

Mr. GERMAN: They decide the value of the stock, and that is the point to which I am directing my remarks at the present time. It is in respect of that, that I propose to take as strong exception as I can. My hon. friend from Peterborough says that if we get the stock for nothing or next to nothing, we shall be making a good bargain. Very well, but the reason I am objecting to the appointment of these arbitrators is that I fear they will make us pay $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 for stock that is worth nothing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Why did my hon. friend vote for acquiring it by arbitration in 1914?

Mr. GERMAN: I am not so sure that I did, but at all events the hon. member for St. John has explained that very clearly and very successfully.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not touch it at all.

Mr. GERMAN: I am touching it now. Whatever I may have done in 1914, I know what I am going to do now. I know what the people of Canada expect us to do, and what they will approve of and disapprove of, and I am very certain they will disapprove of the appointment of arbitrators in the manner proposed, when they know all the circumstances connected with it.

The Minister of Finance said three years ago that the railway, with the $45,000,000 advanced, would be practically on a sound financial basis, and would require no further assistance. That is one reason why we might have voted for acquiring the stock by arbitration at that time. Last year, when $15,000,000 was advanced for the road, the Minister of Finance said: "We will not continue this yearly advancing of money, but will appoint a board of commissioners to ascertain and report upon the whole railway system of Canada, and when we have received their report we shall know what to do." The Government now have the report in their hands, and I ask them to carry out the recommendations that have been made, instead of doing what they now propose. The Minister of Finance says that in regard to arbitration, he is carrying out the recommendation of the commissioners, but I beg to differ with him. The report does not recommend that an arbitrator be appointed by the Government; there is no such suggestion in the whole report. The commissioners say on page 62, under the heading "Arbitration Recommended":

> But under the scheme we propose, the trustees will operate the Canadian Northern lines as part of a combined system. . . .We suggest that if it is decided to permit the present shareholders to retain a portion of their holding—

They do not suggest that the shareholders be paid cash. To continue:

> . . . if it is decided to permit the present shareholders to retain a portion of their holding, the Act of Parliament constituting the Board of Trustees shall contain a provision for arbitration between the trustees and the Canadian Northern Company, and establishing an arbitration board to act forthwith. The trustees should appoint one arbitrator—

Not the Government. It is the trustees who are to be appointed by the Government who are to appoint an arbitrator. The Canadian Northern shareholders appoint the other, and those two arbitrators agree on the appointment of an umpire, and failing agreement, he umpire is to be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court. I say that in that there lies a distinction as well as a difference.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Who was to appoint the arbitrator under the proposal of my hon. friend in 1914?

Mr. GERMAN: I do not remember, I am sure. I have not taken the trouble to look it up, and I really do not care at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not the hon. gentleman think that the Government, who he admits had succeeded in appointing the three best commissioners possible, might be trusted to appoint one arbitrator?

Mr. GERMAN: I do not think so, and I will give reasons why before I get through. Let us see what these arbitrators are to determine, and let me say, first of all, that the scheme recommended in the majority report is not the scheme proposed by the Government. My hon. friend can whistle to keep up his courage, if he sees fit, but the people of Canada will appreciate that the two schemes are not the same.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We are adopting the mode suggested by the Drayton-Acworth report in dealing with the Canadian Northern. There is no board of trustees now. The recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report for the creation of a board of trustees could not be carried out.

Mr. GERMAN: If you are abandoning the Drayton-Acworth report in that respect, why not appoint a judge of the Exchequer Court to determine the value, if there is any value. Let us now see the difference between the Government's reference to the arbitrators, and the reference suggested by the commissioners.

At page 62 of their summing up they say:

> We think that, on the whole, the equity of the case would be met if the Canadian Northern shareholders were permitted to retain a moderate portion of the $60,000,000 of shares which they now hold.

That is not a reference to arbitration to find the value of the stock. They say equity would be met if the shareholders were permitted to retain a moderate portion of the stock. They say, further, after speaking of the manner in which the trustees should be appointed:

> the arbitrators should be empowered to decide two questions.

Not the value of the stock at all, but, > what proportion of the Canadian Northern common stock may fairly remain the property of the present holders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And what they should get on it.

Mr. GERMAN: What portion may fairly remain the property of the present common stockholders, and > what proportion of the earnings of the Dominion Railway Company may fairly be regarded as attributable to the Canadian Northern lines. To illustrate our meaning, we will assume that the arbitrators decide that five per cent of the Canadian Northern shares still remain the property of the existing holders—

5 p.m.

That would be three million dollars' worth of the stock.

> —and further decide that one-half of the total earnings of the Dominion Railway Company will be fairly attributable to the Canadian Northern lines. Then their decision will mean that out of any dividend declared in future by the Dominion Railway Company 2½ per cent (one-half of five per cent) will be payable to the existing Canadian Northern shareholders or their transferees. We think the arbitrators should fix this resulting percentage once for all.

That is, the arbitrators were to be appointed to fix once for all what was the actual cash value of the two and a half per cent—not the value of the stock on a two and a half per cent basis on the probable dividends which the company would pay, and when they would pay it—not any question of any value of $60,000,000 of stock at all. When this Government refers the question of the value of this $60,000,000 of stock to three arbitrators, they at once admit, tacitly at any rate, that there is a value to that $60,000,000 of stock, and I will venture to say that Mackenzie and Mann will, perhaps, be able to get men of high standing, who will put a good high value upon it. Sir William Mackenzie himself puts a value of par upon it. He says it is worth $60,000,000 or more, and one of the reasons why he asserts that is because the Government took $40,000,000 of the stock as a security for a guarantee of $45,000,000. That is what he says. Whatever argument there may be in it is another thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no argument in it, and of course the hon. gentleman knows that. I did not see that Sir William Mackenzie had uttered such a statement.

Mr. GERMAN: That is the ground upon which he put it, as I understand the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he said that, it is the poorest exhibition of his intelligence I have ever seen.

Mr. GERMAN: It would be a poor exhibition of intelligence on the part of any one else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As a matter of fact, he did not say it at all.

Mr. GERMAN: Might I ask my hon. friend what he did say?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I saw the statement that in his opinion it was worth $60,000,000 but he did not say the Government had fixed the value of it because we took $40,000,000 of it as security for our assistance to the company in guaranteeing $45,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. GERMAN: Did he say what was taken?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not see that he said that.

Mr. GERMAN: Our position in regard to this board of arbitration is as I have stated it. In the first place, it is not a board appointed in compliance with the report of Messrs. Drayton and Acworth, and it is not a board appointed to inquire into and determine the things which Messrs. Drayton and Acworth decided a board should be appointed to inquire into. In those particulars it is altogether at variance with the Drayton-Acworth report, and to say that the Government will appoint this board of arbitrators or the Government will appoint one arbitrator and the Canadian Northern railway will appoint another, and these two will appoint a third, and if they are not unanimous there shall be an appeal, does not mean very much. I will venture to say they will be unanimous, and there will be no appeal, and for this very reason—and if I hurt any one's feelings I cannot help it. I will state my belief. Owing to the influences which will be at work behind the appointment of this arbitrator—we have a member of this Government who has been very closely identified with Mackenzie and Mann from the inception of their organization, and who has been, it is alleged, and I believe alleged properly, one at any rate of the dominating factors in this Government. I refer to the hon. Minister of Public Works. Those gentlemen started their career in railway building and in politics at practica'ly the same time—seventeen years ago; and what was the first business connection they ever had?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did the hon. gentleman start his political career?

Mr. GERMAN: Twenty-six years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You were a little ahead of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. GERMAN: Twenty-six years ago I was first elected for the county of Welland, and I can tell my hon. friend that at every election since I have been re-elected with increased majorities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood my hon. friend was out for seven years, so that would leave them about the same time.

Mr. GERMAN: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken. I was not out for one year. For twenty-six years I have represented the county of Welland in the Dominion Parliament and in the local legislature, and I have been elected every time with increased majorities. My hon. friend may take any consolation he likes from the knowledge of what has happened in the county of Welland. Seventeen years ago those gentlemen began their careers together. I mention this because when men are for years closely connected in business operations, and closely connected in their personal arrangements, to my mind it goes without saying that those men would naturally have a strong inclination to help one another. What happened in Manitoba at that time? In December, 1899, the Government of Mr. Greenway was defeated by the Conservative party under Hugh John Macdonald, on the policy of Government ownership of railways. That was the policy which defeated the Greenway Government. Mr. Hugh John Macdonald formed a government in January, 1900, and remained as Prime Minister until October, when he was pushed aside and Mr. Roblin assumed the office of Prime Minister, with Robert Rogers as Minister of Public Works. What was the first act in the political career of those two gentlemen in regard to the Mackenzie and Mann outfit? At that time there was a line of railway in Manitoba known as the Northern Pacific railway. Messrs. Roblin and Rogers, ostensibly acting in the interests of public ownership, with a view to purchasing the Northern Pacific railway for the Government, in compliance with the policy of the party which put them in power, went to St. Paul and purchased that portion of the Northern Pacific in the province of Manitoba. Before they got back to Winnipeg they handed it over to Mackenzie and Mann. That was the beginning of operations between Mackenzie and Mann and Roblin and Rogers, and the pathways of those gentlemen have lain side by side from that day to this. Those pathways have been marked by milestones which in a great many cases are objectionable. That is only one out of perhaps scores of instances. There was also the increasing of the guarantees on the subsidies.

Mr. Greenway had granted to the Manitoba Railway and Canal company a subsidy of $8,000 a mile, and had taken security on all the terminals and rolling stock of that company. When these gentlemen came into power, they immediately increased the subsidy to $10,000 a mile and abandoned their security on the rolling stock and terminals. From that time until the present these men have been closely allied in all their enterprises, and I say that a man who has occupied that position in close connection with Mackenzie and Mann during all these years is not a man who should appoint an arbitrator to decide so great a public question as this question of taking over that stock at a valuation, when it means so much to the people of this country, when $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 may be very easily given to Mackenzie and Mann for something that is not worth the report which they issue every year. I say that is one reason why I object absolutely to this Government having the right to appoint an arbitrator. I say that I believe that influence will be detrimental to the appointment of an arbitrator, as a man so appointed would naturally be in sympathy with Mackenzie and Mann. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) is in close touch with gentlemen who will be beneficiaries of this money. The hon. minister sits here. He will not deny that the men who are the creditors of this Canadian Northern system and will benefit by any money, and very largely benefit by any money, which will be paid for this stock, are the most intimate personal friends of his own. I will say very frankly, what every person believes, that the influence of these men was very large in putting the Minister of Finance in the position in which he is at present. Now I say that with influences such as that, whether there would be anything wrong or whether there would not be anything wrong, with influences such as that behind two of the leading members of this Government, the people of this country will not be satisfied with the award of an arbitrator appointed by these gentlemen.

That being so, I say that the proper course for the Government to pursue, the only proper course for the Government to pursue if they intend to refer the question of the value of this stock to arbitration at all, is to refer it to a man who stands higher than any other man in Canada as a man capable of deciding a question of this very kind, and that is Sir Walter Cassels, a man of the greatest uprightness, a man whose character is absolutely above reproach, a gentleman who had, while practising his profession, as wide or wider experience in matters of this kind than any other lawyer in Canada, in connection with Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk Railway problems, pertaining to this very Canadian Northern railway. No man could be better fitted to give a decision as the value of this stock, if it is to be referred to any one for the purpose of fixing a value, than the senior judge of the Exchequer Court; and I say that a decision by Sir Walter Cassels would be a decision which would meet with the absolute approval of the people of Canada, no matter what it might be. There would be no feeling that there had been any influence whatever to induce him to give a decision other than what he believed to be the true, righteous interpretation of the reference; and I say to the Government that it is their duty, at this time and before this Bill goes through, to cut out this question of appointing arbitrators and to refer this matter to the senior judge of the Exchequer Court. If they do not do that, what will be the effect? The people of this country will believe, and I say it with all seriousness, that there is some ulterior reason why the Government refused to refer this matter to the judge of the Exchequer Court and why they refer it to arbitrators one of whom is to be appointed by Mackenzie and Mann, the others by this Government. I say there will be a feeling that there is this ulterior object in view, some reason other than a desire to get at the real merits of the case.

Then I say that the reference should not be a reference of the value of the stock at all. The stock has no value, as every one admits. What should be referred is just what Messrs. Drayton and Acworth say should be referred: what are Mackenzie and Mann to be entitled to in the proportion of this stock, and what would be the fair cash value, settling it once for all, to pay them out of the prospective revenues of this company?

There is this further in connection with the matter. Messrs. Drayton and Acworth say in their report that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann have never received any compensation for their services, and for that reason they should receive some honorarium now from the Government. Now, have they not? Here is something that impresses itself on my mind very strongly: We have in evidence taken by this Royal Commission the evidence of Mr. Mitchell, a clerk in the offices of the Canadian Northern, and of Mr. Hanna. These gentlemen assert that Mackenzie and Mann have received no compensation. Well, it has always appeared to me most singular that neither Sir William Mackenzie nor Sir Donald Mann, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has ever said himself that he never received anything out of this company. So far as I have been able to ascertain neither one of these gentlemen has ever verbally or over his own signature, much less under the sanctity of an oath, pledged his word that he has received no compensation. And is it not most astonishing that these two men, who were the contractors, the contracting firm, building this whole transcontinental line of railway practically from the Atlantic to the Pacific for the last 17 years, the sole contractors—subletting their contracts to subcontractors, but the sole contractors so far as the company is concerned—have built this whole line, and have never made anything out of it? It would be a most astonishing thing, to my mind, and I cannot understand it; and what is more, I cannot believe it until these gentlemen have pledged their word, at any rate, that they have received no compensation. What about the model city at Montreal? My hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) asked a question as to whether the model city was included in this, if it is owned by Mackenzie and Mann or a company in which they are the chief shareholders. That concern was built by reason of the terminals of the Canadian Northern in Montreal. Is it to be supposed that they, owning that property, are not making enormous sums of money out of it? And they could only own it, and as a company come into existence, by reason of the Canadian Northern. When any man stands up and tells me that Mackenzie and Mann have never made any compensation for themselves out of the construction of this railway, from the beginning up to the present time, I cannot believe, and certainly will not believe it unless they pledge their oath to it. Then I say that these two men should make a statement, because it is on that ground that Drayton and Acworth report that Mackenzie and Mann should be paid something by reason of the fact that they believed Hanna apparently of course, and so do I, and Mr. Mitchell. They say that these men said that Mackenzie and Mann have received nothing out of it and consequently should receive an honorarium, not in cash, so far as this matter is concerned, but so much of the capital stock and then ascertain, by reason of the possibilities of future dividends what that capital stock is worth.

I say that the only proper method for the Government to adopt, if they carry on the scheme as they have outlined it and take over the stock, is to refer to the senior judge of the Exchequer Court the question as to what Mackenzie and Mann would be fairly entitled to, in view of all the circumstances, as compensation for the services they have rendered to the country.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is it not true that Judge Cassels was formerly a member of the firm of Blake, Lash and Cassels, Toronto?

Mr. GERMAN: He was.

Mr. DAVIDSON: And Mr. Lash, of that firm, is the chief counsel and one of the principal stockholders in the company?

Mr. GERMAN: Sir Walter Cassels was one of the prominent members of the firm of Blake, Lash and Cassels; and Mr. Z. A. Lash, of that firm, is prominently connected with the Canadian Northern Railway company. But, notwithstanding that, I have no hesitation in saying that the people of this country would have absolute and implicit confidence in any decision that Judge Cassels would arrive at in regard to this matter. Every man in this House who knows Judge Cassels would have implicit confidence in his decision. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Railways would have absolute confidence in his decision. Why does the Government not appoint him? There must be some reason other than a desire to arrive at a fair and just compensation for Mackenzie and Mann, and to render a decision which would be fair in the interests of Canada.

The Government proposes, when this road is taken over, that "so soon as five-sixths of said shares has been transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway company," and so on. Now, evidently that company is to be carried on under the same name, and I gathered from the statement of the Finance Minister the other day that it was to be carried on by the people who are at present operating it. The Minister of Finance stated that Sir William Mackenzie would be willing to give his services for the good of the country, although not necessarily for nothing, and that Mr. Hanna and the other officials of that company would be quite willing to continue in office. I know that Mr. Hanna is a very excellent man, and I doubt if the Government could get a better. But, so far as I am concerned individually, I think the Government should not only take over this line of railway, but they should have a policy to bring the Canadian Northern, Intercolonial, National Transcontinental, and Hudson Bay railways all under one management, a board of eminently capable business men, who would be absolutely free and independent of politics, and who would represent the people of this country to as great an extent as possible. That is the only sort of management with which the people of Canada will be satisfied. Those railways are not Government roads, they are the people's roads, and the people will have, if not immediately, at any rate in the very near future, a greater control of the railways than they have at present. If the people cannot vote directly for directors, my opinion is that this Parliament should elect the directors. You could have a board representing all sections of Canada —say, two from the Maritime Provinces, and two from each of the other provinces, with a general manager, bringing the number up to fifteen. These men would be elected each year by joint ballot of the Senate and House of Commons. In such a board representatives of the whole of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and non-political—because in the selection of men of that kind in that way politics would not enter at all—you would get the best men that could possibly be got. They would carry out the people's wishes in regard to the management of the people's railroads. In my opinion that scheme is advisable and should be adopted. So far as arbitration is concerned, I say with emphasis, and without any doubt at all as to the wisdom of the procedure, that any question of valuation or compensation to Mackenzie and Mann should be decided by the senior judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not purpose to traverse the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Welland. Nothing new would be brought out in doing so. He has now announced his adherence to what he calls a scheme of solution. In the various discussions that have taken place in the House, he has announced his adherence to admost every imaginable scheme. He started at one end and has gone down the list, and supported each in turn. Now he is simply reverting, turning to the first again, and taking an adverse stand on each of the various schemes he has heretofore supported. However, there is no use following that matter. I only rose to refer to something new in his address. He drew a very interesting analogy between the career of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) and Mackenzie & Mann, Limited, and argued that because the one commenced his career in politics contemporaneously with the career of the other in railroading, there was some link or chain of interest binding them from the beginning. I interrupted him to ask when he began his career, and he said twenty-six years ago, and that continuously since that he had been a member either of the legislature of Ontario or the House of Commons of Canada, without interruption.

Mr. GERMAN: I withdraw that. I was out one year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He withdraws the statement now. We will see what he will do later on. Let me remind him that if the coincidence of contemporaneous periods of careers is an argument showing connection, then he is much nearer Mackenzie and Mann than the Minister of Public Works. It is sixteen or seventeen years since the Minister of Public Works entered public life. It is twenty-six years since the hon. gentleman from Welland commenced his public career, and Mackenzie and Mann entered public life just at that time. The analogy is more favourable to him, as an associate of Mackenzie and Mann. But he has not been in public life continuously since 1891, if he gave correct information to the compiler of the Parliamentary Guide. He entered the House of Commons in 1891 as member for the county of Welland at the general election, but was unseated. He was elected then to the Ontario Legislature at the general election of 1894, three years afterwards. Is that right or wrong? Will the hon. gentleman speak up, so that it will be recorded on Hansard?

Mr. GERMAN: I was in the House of Commons for two years, 1891 and 1892, and in the winter of 1893-1894 I was elected to the Ontario Legislature—

Mr. MEIGHEN: In 1893 or 1894? I do not know about these matters myself; I am asking for information.

Mr. MARCIL: I would ask the Solicitor General, has the session not lasted long enough, without going into matters of this kind?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Parliamentary Guide shows he was out three years. This is either right or wrong. The hon. gentleman told us he was sitting continuously in one House or the other.

Mr. GERMAN: I said with the exception of one year. I sat in this House in the long session of 1891. I was in this House in 1892, and in that year the Supreme Court decided against me in the appeal from the decision of the election trial, when I was unseated. My unseating and disqualification were confirmed, and in the following year I contested the seat against Mr. McCleary for the local legislature, and defeated him, he being the sitting member for Welland. I have defeated every Tory that has appeared on the scene since then, and I intend to continue to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman will know better than I do. He may correct the statements in the Guide.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Talk railroad.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the hon. gentleman had better read Judge Galt's report in the case in Winnipeg.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated that the hon. gentleman (Mr. German) was reverting now, and taking the negative side of every scheme on which he took the positive side before.

I have no doubt that so long as the question of the Canadian Northern continues to be before Parliament he will pass over all the various schemes until he has completed the record of taking both sides of every one. The compass will be gone round again and again; he will support arbitration one day and expropriation the next. Then he will return and argue against arbitration, and the next day he will argue against expropriation. If arbitration is a wrong method to-day and expropriation is a right method before the Exchequer Court, why was expropriation a wrong method in 1914 and arbitration a right method? Why was it that Sir Walter Cassels was not eulogized as the proper man in 1914? Why did the hon. gentleman advocate arbitration? Why can we not take him at his word? Why can we not take his advice and depend upon its standing, having the assurance that when we adopt it he will not immediately repudiate it? In 1914 he did not argue in favour of expropriation. He did not say that this was a subject that could, under the Expropriation Act, properly or fittingly go before the Court of Exchequer.

Mr. GERMAN: I told my hon. friend in 1914 that it was the duty of the Government to take over the whole $100,000,000 of stock. If that had been done you would not be having this trouble now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will read what my hon. friend's leader said on that occasion, and I will read the resolution which my hon. friend himself voted for. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said:

> I said a moment ago that my intention was simply to summarize the views and the policy which we have laid before the people on this question, and I summarize them in a few words. We must carry on this enterprise; we cannot allow it to go by default; we cannot allow anybody or anything to come in which would imply anything detrimental to our credit in England; this enterprise has to be carried out; but, instead of carrying it out in the way proposed, we propose that we should carry it out by other means—that we should take absolute control of the enterprise; and for that purpose, I beg to move, seconded by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley):
> That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that under existing circumstances no assistance should be given to the Canadian Northern Railway Company unless at the same time it is provided that the Government have power, within a reasonable time to acquire the ownership of the entire stock of the company at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed thirty million dollars.

The reason why the hon. gentleman now objects to arbitration is that it suggests a value—though no specific value is even suggested.

Mr. GERMAN: Does the hon. gentleman pretend that there is no difference between the conditions then and the conditions now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there is no difference between Mr. Justice Cassels then and Mr. Justice Cassels now. There is no difference between the principle of arbitration then and the principle of arbitration now.

Mr. GERMAN: No one suggested what board of arbitration the matter should be referred to. The resolution simply said that the price should be fixed by arbitration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then, that is not arbitration; it is expropriation?

Mr. GERMAN: Not at all. It is not expropriation; you would be referring the matter to the judge of the Exchequer Court as arbitrator.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman want this matter referred to the judge of the Exchequer Court as arbitrator?

Mr. GERMAN: I am not saying that at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think my hon. friend had better look over some of the old schemes rather than try to think of new ones. It was suggested in 1914 that we should take, not the rails, not the right of way, not the physical property of the company, but the stock; and that we should fix a maximum price of $30,000,000. Would that not suggest that there may have been a value of at least $30,000,000 in the stock? The resolution now before the committee does not suggest a dollar of value. If the arbitration board find that there is no value in the stock, we have no value to pay for the stock. The hon. gentleman cannot trust the Government of Canada to appoint an arbitrator, because he thinks we will help Mackenzie and Mann. Did we help Mackenzie and Mann when we appointed the commission whose report my hon. friend lauded this afternoon? Did we confer with them and appoint men that we knew would bring in a report to their advantage when we appointed Sir Henry Drayton, Mr. Acworth and Mr. Smith? The hon. gentleman says that these are the best men we could have selected. Why should we select good men as commissioners and poor men as arbitrators. I have no doubt at all that if in this resolution we had proposed that the matter be left to the Exchequer Court, the hon. gentleman would have said: Why did you not do what I told you in 1914 and what the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) himself reaffirmed in 1916? The hon. member for St. John last year referred back to this resolution and said: That was the step to take then as well as the step to take to-day. How is it that my hon. friend's view changes so quickly when we take that step? What would suit the member for Welland? (Mr. German) Immediately we follow his advice, he says that is the worst advice we could follow. He asks the Government to assume that when he advises the Government he does not mean what he says; indeed, does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. CARVELL: I have listened this afternoon with a good deal of interest to the remarks of the member for Welland (Mr. German), as I always do, and also to what the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) has said. Really I do not know what the Solicitor General is driving at.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The member for Welland.

Mr. CARVELL: Then my hon. friend's aim was very poor. He failed both to reach his mark and to make it clear what he was aiming at. Every man in the committee is entitled to have views of his own, and he ought not to be kicked around too badly if he expresses them. Anyway, I am going to take the responsibility of giving some of my views on this question. First, I may say that I cannot agree with the Government; neither can I agree with the member for Welland. I do not believe that any member of Parliament ought to be asked to vote for a proposal which he thinks is unsound, simply because the juggernaut is going and public opinion is such that it ought not to be withstood. My opinion has always been that if a man has opinions of his own, he had better assert them and try afterwards to convince the public that he is right. If he is not right, then he can let the public do what they have a mind to do about it. That may be a very independent attitude, but I have always taken that view.

I do not believe in public ownership of any kind. I do object to the Government going as far as they are going in respect to the proposed ownership of the Canadian Northern railway system. The Minister of Finance stated that it was the intention to appoint a commission that should be subject to Parliament, not to the Government. Well, if the Government can do that, it is a wonderful step in the right direction. But no man who has lived in the Maritime Provinces all his life as I have done can honestly say that he is in favour of the public ownership of railways. I know that in Ontario there is a fetish in respect of public ownership; men are worshipping the public ownership of everything. But it will not be many years before they come back to sound business principles. We had an illustration of that in the House the other evening. In Ontario they have had public ownership of utilities in the way of electrical energy—the greatest administration of electrical energy which the world has known. There is no doubt that the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario has done wonderful work. But they are commencing to get up against the wall. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) was compelled to call upon his supporters to vote for an amendment to the general Railway Act of Canada absolutely to put out of existence a competitor to the Hydro-Electric because it stood in the way of this juggernaut. You would not find a better illustration in the records of Canada, from Confederation down to the present time, of the failure of public ownership.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is hardly a fair statement. The reason why the Conservatives voted as they did on that point was stated in the committee when that company was getting its rights from this Government. It was that the rights of the municipality in certain streets should be protected. Sir Edmund Osler asked to have this amendment put in, and he was told by the minister and by the lawyer who was putting the matter through, that it was put in.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not going to go into the details of that. I simply bring it up as an illustration to show that when public ownership starts out to usurp the proper functions of business men, those who have charge always come to the end of their tether; they always come to the time when they cannot carry on things as a business proposition, and then they have to resort to power of some kind in order to work out their scheme, exactly as the Hydro-Electric did in the case in question.

There was another point made by my hon. friend which struck me very strongly and that was that, in his judgment, there ought not to be arbitration under present conditions. He illustrated the fact that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) commenced his public career about the same time as the Canadian Northern Railway company began their career in Manitoba as railway builders. He naturally would argue from that, that the people of Manitoba should have gone on with public ownership and not have public utilities handed over to the Canadian Northern or Mackenzie, Mann and Company. He referred to the devious ways of Mackenzie, Mann and Company and the Minister of Public Works during some years that followed in Manitoba politics, and I think he naturally would have drawn the conclusion that all the troubles were because in Manitoba they had not adhered to the principle of public ownership in railways. The path trod by these firms in Manitoba was a "Great White Way" in comparison with the path trod by an hon. gentleman in Manitoba over the question of public telephones. If in the political history of Canada there is a paragraph or chapter that absolutely condemns public ownership of any public utility in this country, it is the story of the administration of the telephone system in Manitoba during the last seven or eight years. From the very inception of the purchase of the Bell Telephone system in Manitoba down to about three years ago, the path has been one which I would not want to follow, which I do not believe any hon. gentleman in this House would want to follow, and which, in so far as any one instance will condemn a system, must condemn public ownership of public utilities in Canada. If the minister could operate the Canadian Northern Railway system entirely free from political interference, he might get along fairly well, but certainly not as well as private enterprise would get along. He cannot, however, do that; he cannot run a railway in Canada of the magnitude of the Canadian Northern and keep political influence out of it. We have had an experience of that in the Maritime Provinces. I believe the present Minister of Railways started out to run the Intercolonial for a year or two fairly divorced from politics, but two years had not passed before you could not hire a man to shovel gravel for two days at a time unless he went to the man who controlled the patronage in the constituency, and that has been the case ever since. It is idle to speak about hiring a man on the Intercolonial who is not recommended by the man who controls the patronage, and the minister knows that. The minister knows it would be as impossible for him to hire twenty-five men who were not recommended by the man who controls the patronage in their constituency as it would be for him to fly.

Mr. COCHRANE: The trouble nowadays is to get men, no matter who recommends them.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister knows he has to have the recommendation of the patronage committee.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not true.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend knows it is true.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is not true.

Mr. CARVELL: I tell the minister it is true. The minister may think it is not true; he may think he is not administering the railway in that fashion, but if he asks his general manager what he can do in the face of the patronage committees, he will find that the general manager is absolutely powerless. I do not believe the minister can run the Canadian Northern, which is about ten times the magnitude of the Intercolonial, as a Government road and keep patronage out of it.

Mr. MARCIL: The Government do not intend to do so.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think they do, because I find in the last clause of the resolution these words:

> That the necessary qualification shares for directors may be transferred to or allowed to remain in their names by the Minister of Finance on such conditions as he may determine.

That simply means that the Minister of Finance or the Government appoint the directors under such conditions as they may determine. They put enough stock in a director's hands to qualify him, but he is simply a creature of the Government; he sits on the board as a member of the political machine, and the road will be run as the greatest political machine Canada has ever known. Think of the Minister of Railways running hotels, telegraphs, telephones, townsites, express—

Mr. GRAHAM: Steamboats.

Mr. CARVELL: —and all those things under a great government system. I know I shall certainly not get much credit in certain portions of Ontario for these statements of mine, but they are my views and I want to put them on Hansard. I am satisfied it will not be many years before the people of Canada come to my way of thinking. All they have to do is to have a few years of public ownership or public operation of this great railway system, which will inevitably involve the Grand Trunk Pacific, and they will all accept my view as correct, namely, that the sooner they get rid of this thing, the better.

I realize that it will not do to allow the Canadian Northern securities to go into default. If these were ordinary conditions, if the Government of this country were not straining every nerve to borrow money which must be borrowed regardless of what goes down, then one might say: Well, if this has been an improvident transaction —and I am afraid in many case it has been improvident—let the concern go into the hands of the receivers; if people have put money into an enterprise which is not profitable, that is their misfortune, and the Government cannot stand by every person who makes an investment in a Canadian security. But these are not normal times, and if you allow railway securities of the magnitude of these, running into the hundreds of millions of dollars, to default, you will create a financial panic that this country cannot afford to have created. Therefore, somebody must come to the rescue of the Canadian Northern Railway company, and the only body in Canada I know of having that power is the Government. So the Government is justified in taking whatever steps may be necessary to ensure that there is no default on the interest on bonds or other interest bearing securities. The Minister of Finance says that he understands it will take somewhere around $20,000,000 to meet the pressing liabilities at the present time. I cannot understand why the Government does not ask Parliament to grant them $20,000,000, or whatever the amount may be, and let the Government see to it that this money is not handed over to the Canadian Northern, but that the Government pays the money out after they have received undoubted evidence that the amounts are proper, real liabilities of the company, and liabilities which must be met, and see that they have proper evidences and proper receipts. I cannot understand why they want to go further than that. In that case, the Government ought to take over a large part of the remaining stock in order to secure the advances they have made.

My hon. friend speaks about inconsistency on this side of the House. He referred to the resolution moved by the leader of the Opposition in 1914, in which my right hon. friend laid down the principle that we should take over the whole of the stock, but that it should not exceed $30,000,000.

We have paid since then $45,000,000, and $15,000,000, and now we are going to vote $20,000,000; that is $80,000,000 altogether. If there is any inconsistency I do not think it lies in the mouth of the Solicitor General to charge us on this side of the House with it. He was the gentleman who piloted the Bill through the House in 1914, and while I have not his words here, he said in substance that this $45,000,000 would get the Canadian Northern out of the woods financially, put them on their feet, and enable them to complete the enterprise. My recollection is that there was something like $58,000,000 of available assets on hand at the time; it is three years ago, but I remember the figures pretty well. It turns out now that the $45,000,000 did not complete the enterprise. Then we advanced them $15,000,000 more, but that did not complete the enterprise. And I do not think that $20,000,000 more will complete it. I contend that the Government should take over a large portion of the stock as security for the money we are compelled to loan them in order to tide them over.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Would not that make us practically owners of the road, which is what my hon. friend objects to?

Mr. CARVELL: We are that now. The moment we took over 40 per cent of the stock of the Canadian Northern in 1914, we became, not legally, but as a matter of practical business, the owners of the road and became bound to see the thing through no matter what happened.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is making a very fair argument, and I do not like to interrupt him. As I understand it, he has suggested that we should make an advance of $20,000,000 and that we take a certain amount of stock as security. What would my hon. friend do this time next year, when the same question would arise again, and $20,000,000 more be needed to pay the interest on the underlying securities?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know. I should be in the same position as my hon. friend was in two years ago.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think we had better deal with it now.

Mr. CARVELL: We hope the war will be over this time next year. That is a wish that I am sure every hon. member of this House and every one in this country sincerely joins in, and when the war is over, things will be clear that are now dark. We can then grapple with the whole railway situation, ascertaining exactly what our financial liabilities and the prospects for the future are. But, as it is, we are here embarking the country on a scheme involving an expenditure of $140,000,000 or $150,000,000, and under a management which cannot possibly be economical or business-like from any standpoint. I was reading this afternoon the minority report of Mr. Smith, and was very much impressed with two statements that I read. They so thoroughly coincided with my own views that I feel like placing them on Hansard. The first is found on page 102:

> Compared with the total outlay involved in producing railroads by the Government for itself, as, for instance, the case of the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental, from three to six times that amount have been used to realize equal results. This shows distinctly the value of enlisting and retaining private enterprise.

If this statement be true, that the governments of this country from Confederation down to the present time have spent in building Government roads six times as much as the Canadian Northern has spent—and he was dealing directly with that company—it is an amazing statement. It so attracted my attention that I read it two or three times. I do not mean to say that the Canadian Northern lines are in as good a state physically as the Government lines. Mr. Smith, after discussing what government ownership would mean, the extra cost of construction, operation and management—and he certainly puts up a pretty strong argument against government ownership—concludes with these words:

> Upon these fundamental truths, I base my firm conviction that the brightest outlook for the future of your great Dominion can be assured through the extension of private railroad enterprises. The hope of honour and the reward of public approval must be open to human kind to get the best results from human endeavour.

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that if you take away from the Canadian Northern enterprise the hope of honour and reward, the ambition of the human being, you will absolutely divest it of everything that has made it the great enterprise it is to-day, and there is no disguising the fact that it is a great enterprise. I do not know whether money has been taken out of the road or not. I am something like my hon. friend from Welland in that respect—I do not believe that they have handled $400,000,000 without using a little on the side for their own purposes, although I have no evidence to that effect. I should like, however, to see a statement in writing, not to say an affidavit, that such is not the case. There is no use shutting our eyes to the fact that Mackenzie and Mann have worked up a wonderful railway organization in Canada. Their financing has been a marvel; I do not know how they have done it. They have built up an organization of very bright men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They have got money from the Government.

Mr. CARVELL: The Government might hand over $400,000,000 to my hon. friend or myself, but I do not think either of us would get the same results with it that Mackenzie and Mann have. I give them credit for that. I think they are wizards of finance. I do not think the public have given them sufficient credit for the manner in which they have handled that end of the business. Then there is a wonderful personal element running through their whole system. I know a number of their men, and perhaps I may be pardoned for mentioning two who, outside the principals, I regard as the greatest among them—Mr. Hanna and Mr. Moore. These gentlemen have impressed their personality—and many others besides them—on the whole organization from top to bottom. The Government may take over this system and say, "We are going to keep Mackenzie and Mann and some of their organization," but they will not be able to do it. Once the present officials realize that political power is interfering with their management, it will not be six months before they, if not Mackenzie and Mann themselves, will say, "I won't have a member of Parliament dismissing or appointing a man through his political influence." It would not be six months before the whole present organization would be disbanded and gone. I do not see any necessity for doing away with the men who are absolutely necessary to keep this enterprise going. I do not see any necessity for the Government taking over control of the road. I believe the present organization can run the road better than the Government. I believe that sufficient money should be put up to pay off the company's indebtedness, and as much of the stock should be taken over as is available, for extra security—not that I think the stock is worth anything. I believe that five-sixths of the stock would be available. With five-sixths of the stock in their hands there would be no question as to the Government having control over the road, and if Mackenzie and Mann were not handling things properly, the Government would have it in their power to interfere at any time. That, of course, involves the next question, whether or not the Government should go on and buy out whatever the equity of Mackenzie and Mann may be.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CARVELL: When the committee adjourned at six o'clock I was giving some reasons why I was opposed to public ownership of railways in particular, and of public utilities in general. I was pointing out that in my opinion the Government should put up whatever money was absolutely necessary to tide over the Canadian Northern for a year, and see what the future would have in store for us. I was pointing out, also, that in my judgment the personal element in the present Canadian Northern organization means a great deal. I still believe they can manage the affairs of the railway, both from the operating standpoint and from the financial standpoint, very much better than the Government of Canada could. I find, in looking over the statement laid upon the Table, as to the liabilities that are maturing within the next year, that $3,000,000 of equipment notes are maturing; about $10,000,000 of different bonds are maturing in London, and there are other large amounts of bonds payable on demand outstanding in Canada. There are also $10,000,000 of demand securities for liabilities in London. Thus $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 of securities or liabilities mature within the next year, or on demand. The moment the Government of Canada takes over the stock of this road and makes it a Government-owned and Government-controlled proposition, depend upon it every dollar of that money will have to be paid. It is very simple. The price of money is going up every day, and a man who has funds invested at four and a half or five per cent, with the Government of Canada behind it, will say: "I want the money," and the Government of Canada will have to raise it, because reinvestment can be made at a much better rate of interest. My contention is that if the Canadian Northern were still running this enterprise they could go to those people and say: "we cannot give you your money; there is no use talking about it, we have not the money, and we cannot get it; we will pay your interest, but you must renew the principal." I believe they could renew it on a basis that would mean millions of dollars over and above what could be done by the Government if it were taken over. If the Government takes the railway over it will have to pay every dollar in full at maturity, and will have to go to the markets of the world and borrow this money. Speaking offhand, I cannot see how we are going to get along on less than $100,000,000 of actual money, which this country must produce next year if we take over the road, to carry out the proposals as set forth in this resolution, while, as I say, I believe the Canadian Northern organization could finance it on one-third of that amount. They do like the rest of us when we get hard up and cannot pay our debts in full. Of course, I know this does not apply to the Minister of Finance, because he has lots of money. When I say "the rest of us" I mean some of my friends around me.

Mr. GERMAN: Bailiff-proof.

Mr. CARVELL: We find, when we are up against the real proposition, we can do wonders in financing, which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would not have to do, because with him it would be simply a matter of drawing a cheque. The Government would be in exactly the same position as is the Minister of Finance personally. "But," the Government says, "we are not going to do that; we will eliminate the Canadian Northern, except, possibly, we may try to keep some of the organization for operating purposes—subject always to the control of the politicians, and we are going to have an arbitration to decide what, if any, equity remains in this thing for the Canadian Northern." I do not know whether there is an equity in it for the Canadian Northern. If I read correctly either the majority or the minority report of the original commission, and if I believe the statements contained therein, there is no equity. The report says the actual value of the property to-day is under $400,000,000. It is true, they admit the cost of it would be a little over $400,000,000, but if the depreciation is deducted it is something under $400,000,000. Of course the liabilities are greater than that, and therefore they infer that the stock has no value whatever; there is no equity in it for Mackenzie and Mann. Well, I am not so sure of that. We must realize that the Canadian Northern have worked at this enterprise for seventeen or eighteen years, and we must realize they have built up a great system. It is true they have been—I was going to use the word "buccaneers," but I think that would hardly be fair—they have in any event "pulled" every one, and every organization, and every government in Canada that could be "pulled" for money. They have "pulled" the provinces, they have "pulled" the municipalities, and now they have the Dominion to stand behind them. At the same time, they have built up a great organization. There is no institution in Canada, with the possible exception of the munitions manufacturers, which has advanced to the same extent as this corporation has in the last three years. I find the gross earnings last year were $42,319,686.66; the operating expenses were $30,794,332.08, leaving $11,525,354.58 net earnings. In 1916 the gross earnings were $35,476,275.06; operating expenses, $26,102,744.52; net earnings, $9,373,530.54. In the year 1915 the gross earnings were $25,912,106.30; operating expenses, $19,288,814.42; net earnings, $6,623,291.88. From 1915 to 1917 the increase in the net earnings has been about forty per cent. I do not believe there is an institution in Canada, outside of the munition plants or something of that kind of an extraordinary nature, that can show such a magnificent increase in business. If you have an institution which can increase its net earnings by forty per cent in three years, surely there must be real business possible for that organization in the future. In five years at that rate of progress the Canadian Northern would take care of itself. It would be paying operating expenses and fixed charges. It might have some difficulty in providing as much money as it would like to provide for betterments, but that is a minor matter. Sometimes it is not in the best interests of people to have too much money to spend for betterments. The Canadian Northern could get along with fifty per cent, if not with thirty-three per cent, as much money for betterments and operating the railway as the Government of Canada could. For instance, the company could get along without new ballast, without relays of rails. They could put in a few new ties instead of all new ties. They could keep the salaries down instead of building them up. If the road goes over to the Government, all this goes to the junk heap. I believe the Government will spend three times as much as the Canadian Northern would on betterments in the next two years, and probably will not haul any more freight, or earn any more money. Every time you touch the government ownership of anything, you commence to pay out immediately. If I am right in my contention, from any standpoint you may look at it it is better to leave the road with the Canadian Northern rather than take it out of their hands.

I am coming around to the point that, in my judgment, there may be some equity in this thing—I do not know how much it may be. As I said, if you take the Drayton-Acworth report, or the Smith report, there is no equity, because the road has not cost as much as the liabilities amount to; but after all you have a great institution which is increasing its net earnings more rapidly than any other institution in Canada. Is it fair to say to people who have built up an organization like that: "It is true you have an organization which is increasing by leaps and bounds its earning capacity, but we will take it away from you and give you only the actual net cost of the road?" I do not think it is. If that is so, is it reasonable that the people of Canada, in this time of stress, when we need all the money we can lay our hands on, when the great problem of the Finance Minister and of the Government is to get the money which we must get in order to carry on the war—is it reasonable, with your eyes open, to go into a scheme by which you have to provide millions of dollars to pay debts, ten of millions of dollars to provide betterments, and, besides that, pay other ten of millions of dollars, possibly, to the men who have worked up this great organization, on account of the equity which they may have in the stock? I tell you I do not care how you figure it, if you hand this over to an arbitration they will find that Mackenzie and Mann have something in it, and yet I realize, if you take the figures submitted in the report to which I have referred, or any other figures, they can not show that they have actual physical assets that are worth more than the liabilities or worth perhaps as much; but they will be able to show an earning capacity which you are taking away from them, and you are taking away that earning capacity just at the time when it becomes a real earning capacity—because up to the last few years it has been problematical, but now it is a real earning capacity—and you are going to say to an arbitration: you will have to take all these matters into consideration. We all know how these things go. I know from my little experience with arbitrations of right of way and other things in connection with railways, all these matters must be taken into consideration; and the result will be that we will pay to Mackenzie and Mann $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, which we ought not to pay and which we have no license to pay to them at the present time. But, on the other hand, if they, through their energy and ability, have worked up an organization which has a money-earning capacity, then let them work it out. Why take it away from them? Why pay them money which they have not earned? Rather leave it in their hands and let them work it out, and if there is any money in it let them make it. I think, myself, that if you allowed this road to go on for four or five years more it would be self-sustaining. I realize that next year we will probably have to put up more money, and, perhaps, the year after. But we are in it. I think it was an improvident bargain three years ago. When the proposal to guarantee $45,000,000 was up I was opposed to it, and, while I have not looked up my remarks, I have a very good recollection of the attitude I took. I was opposed to granting the $45,000,000. Then, in addition to that, you have granted them $15,000,000, making $60,000,000, and now you are proposing to put up $100,000,000 next year. I say that is not good financing under present conditions; it is not good business for Canada. The proper business for Canada at this time is to put up just as little money as she can get along with and leave this road in the hands of the men who have made it a fairly successful enterprise up to the present time, taking, of course, all the security which they can give you, taking the stock, enough of it to put it beyond question that you have a majority and have control. In fact, I would take practically all the stock. I would hold it as a trustee and let these people go on and see if they cannot work out their own salvation. It will not become any worse in a year, because if you control the expenditure of money which you put up it will not be wasted, and the property will increase its earning capacity. You will not have to spend the $100,000,000 that we are going to spend next year, and if you have to take the road over a year from now, or two years from now, you will have saved probably $50,000,000 or $75,000,000.

That brings me to the last point I wish to discuss, that is, the method of arriving at the amount of compensation, if compensation is to be paid. I entirely agree with my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) in the statement he made this afternoon. I do not believe in handing this over to an arbitration board. I believe the arbitration would go at the matter in a sentimental way, in a manner which a judge of the Exchequer Court would not. If we have to arbitrate or to pay Mackenzie and Mann for their equity, surely the determination of the amount to be paid them should be put in the hands of a man who will apply all the technical rules and knowledge which ought to be applied in arriving at the real value of this enterprise. We have all had experience with arbitrations. I do not believe there is a lawyer in this House who, if he is honest, will not tell you that he has all his lifetime advised clients not to arbitrate. I have laid it down almost as a settled rule in my practice, invariably to advise clients not to arbitrate, because arbitrators, appointed as you appoint them here, will always give and take. One party will build up an unreasonable contention. I will venture to say that Mackenzie and Mann will claim before this board that they are entitled to $100,000,000, and no doubt the Government arbitrator will say: You are entitled to nothing. Then they will go on and argue and argue, and finally divide the difference. That is what happens in most arbitrations, and the result will be that Mackenzie and Mann will get three times what they are entitled to. Whereas if this is given over to the Exchequer Court you will at least have it decided on well-known principles which should govern the assessment of compensation in matters of this kind. So, Sir, for these reasons, I am very much opposed to the proposals contained in this resolution, and I hope the Government, even at this late date, will see their way clear to reconsider the matter and to put up as little money as they can to tide this road over for a year, or possibly two years, in the hope that the war will end—and surely it will end in that time. If, at that time, you had only the Canadian Northern to deal with, there would not be such a strong argument for delay; but you have still the great railway problem of Canada staring you in the face. If you take over the Canadian Northern, have you settled the railway question? No, we have the Grand Trunk Pacific, we have the National Transcontinental and we have the Intercolonial.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the branch lines.

Mr. CARVELL: We have the branch lines —branch lines all over Canada. Why, if the government of this country talk about taking over the Canadian Northern because they cannot run, how in the world are they going to avoid taking over branch lines all over the country which cannot run for lack of finances? The Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) knows that in his own constituency there is a branch line which practically is being closed down because they cannot get finances to run it. I realize that it is a small enterprise compared with the Canadian Northern, but it is as important to the people in that constituency as the Canadian Northern is to the people in any other part of Canada. How will the Government justify taking over the Canadian Northern and leaving other systems in Canada, small though they may be, that are unable to run because of lack of funds? Every branch line of the Intercolonial—and I refer to the Intercolonial because I presume there are very few branch lines elsewhere that do not belong to the big systems—has just as much right to come to the Finance Minister and say: We cannot go on without financial assistance, and to claim financial assistance, as the Canadian Northern. And my hon. friend is establishing a principle which he cannot get away from. He is establishing a principle which must be followed out in every portion of Canada.

So, Sir, for these reasons, I can only say that I hope the Government will stop to consider and see if they cannot withdraw from the position they have taken; put up just the least possible amount of money in order to keep this enterprise going for a year or two; and then you will have the whole railway situation—or whatever government may be here at the time, because I think it is very doubtful if my hon. friend will be the gentleman who will have to work it out, but somebody will.

Mr. GRAHAM: For this and other reasons.

Mr. CARVELL: The Government will have the whole problem of the railways of Canada to face at that time, and it is much better to face these questions after the war is over, when we know what our liabilities are, how much money we are going to raise, and where we are going to raise it. We will start out with a knowledge of the actual condition of affairs, which is better than starting out now on an expenditure of $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 but I do not believe that the Finance Minister knows where he is going to look around and get the money.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What are the maturities of the Canadian Northern within the next fifteen months that the Government would be obliged to extend, and what, in the judgment of the Finance Minister, is the least amount that should be advanced in the next fifteen months for equipment? I understood the hon. gentleman to say the net earnings could take care of the interest account, providing it is not expended upon equipment, extensions and betterments.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The financial position of the Canadian Northern is substantially this. Assuming net earnings of $11,000,000, the Canadian Northern have to apply that, as I pointed out the other day, for betterments and improvements, and for instalment payments upon equipment—principal payments on equipment. Having regard to the situation that exists at the present time—the liability incurred for interest, the payment on underlying securities, and the situation so far as concerns the next twelve months we will say—the rough estimate that I made after discussing the matter with the officials was that from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 would be required. In other words, if we took the course we adopted last year, and made a round vote to the Canadian Northern of the sum required to meet liabilities and payments to be made in respect of interest upon securities in priority to the $45,000,000 mortgage of the Government, for betterments and for instalments upon rolling stock, about $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 would be required. With regard to short-term maturities which fall due over the next couple of years, I hope that the Canadian Northern officials will be able to renew those with the Government, the sole owner of the stock, just as they would expect to renew them if sixty per cent of the stock remained in the hands of private owners. I do not agree with the hon. member from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and I will tell him why. After all, if money is seeking investment, it is a question of interest rate to be paid. These short-term loans of the Canadian Northern are pretty well secured. The loans in New York are secured with a substantial margin, upon bonds guaranteed by the Dominion Government and certain of the western provinces. That is very high-class collateral, and I expect the Canadian Northern officials will be able to renew the loans by reason of the fact that the Government is the sole owner of the stock. What I have said is subject to this, that in these war times no man can tell what condition we may be in after one month or two, and it is possible that in one or more instances the Canadian Northern might not be able to extend those loans. If they do not, then I think the Government, as sole owner—for it will be sole owner through its ownership of $100,000,000 of capital stock of the Canadian Northern—should protect its property. Assume we brought down a vote, as suggested by the hon. gentleman from Carleton, for $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, as we did last year, it is quite possible—although I do not apprehend it will take place—that during the year the Canadian Northern might not be able to renew one or more of those loans. Then you would have a difficult situation on your hands again. The real fact of the matter is that the essence of this Canadian Northern situation is that the Dominion Government, and the governments of nearly all the provinces of Canada, are so involved by their guarantees given during the years of the construction of this system that default cannot be allowed, and the Government, after giving the matter its most serious attention, and realizing all that my hon. friend from Carleton has put forward, reached the conclusion that if this system is not to be allowed to go into default, and if, in order to prevent default, the Government of Canada is obliged to put up $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year, and become practically sponsor for the financing of the system from year to year, we must take the next step and own that system for the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman from Carleton made a very interesting and very fair speech on this subject, and I asked him, when he suggested that we should take the course we took last year, what about next year? My hon. friend threw his mind ahead a year and considered the parliament of that time. I think there is no doubt whatsoever that, war or no war, the Canadian Northern Railway would have to make application for assistance. I pointed out last year, in the speech in which I introduced the estimates for the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific, that the time had come when we should appoint a commission, with a view to reaching a final solution of this railway problem, the greatest problem in Canada, outside the war, without a doubt.

I stated also at that time that the solution might involve taking over one or more of the railway systems of Canada, and that there might be involved the possibility of the nationalization of all the railways of Canada. I pointed out to the House pretty fully the other day that the last was a very large order indeed, having regard to the fact that we are in the midst of a war and having regard also to the financial problems touched upon by certain gentlemen opposite. But, after giving the matter our best consideration we reached the conclusion that we should take this property for the people of Canada in order that, if we are to pay out huge sums of money year after year, the fruition of that expenditure should inure to the people of Canada, not to the private owners of the road. In other words, if we are to continue to finance this system, it must be owned by the people of Canada.

I do not know that it is necessary that I should refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German); I thought he had a very weak case when he had to resort to personal aspersions. This railway problem has been the most difficult problem with which any Government of Canada has been called upon to deal, outside of the war. Every year it presents itself, and it would continue to present itself. This year, after considering the whole situation and having regard to all the financial questions involved, we reached the conclusion that we should take this forward step, which is a step in the line indicated by the Drayton-Acworth report. To take over the whole of the railway systems would, I believe, be too serious a step for a Government to contemplate, having regard to the burden of the war. But by taking over the Canadian Northern and by lending assistance to the Grand Trunk Pacific—I pointed out that we could not deal with the Grand Trunk Pacific at this time as we are dealing with the Canadian Northern because most important negotiations would be involved with the Grand Trunk Railway company—it seemed to us that the proposals which I addressed to the House were the best under all the circumstances, and I believe they are. I do not believe there is any other solution of this Canadian Northern railway problem that will meet the approval and support of public opinion in this country. I think that the Government have taken a proper step, and that looking to the future, we can see the working out of the recommendations of the majority report. No one can say at this stage how this railway, the Intercolonial, the National Transcontinental, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, if we should acquire it later, will be administered. It might be proper to administer them all by a board of experts constituted somewhat as suggested in the Drayton-Acworth report. I absolutely subscribe to the principle that if this system is to be efficiently administered it must be administered absolutely free from partisan interference.

Mr. CARVELL: I am glad to get that admission.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not an admission; that has been my principle throughout with regard to all these matters.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister feel that it is possible to get the same results from mere officials that you can get from men who are vitally interested, as the owners and managers of a railroad are?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A good deal of weight is to be attached to the opinions put forward by my hon. friend; but the trend of public opinion is unmistakably along the line of these proposals. Nor is it a recent trend; it has gradually developed over a course of years. The whole tendency of public administration has been towards enlarging, not restricting, the functions of Government. I think we must look forward to that; I think we must have sufficient confidence in ourselves to believe that we can administer these enterprises; that we shall obtain officials who will manage them as efficiently as private enterprise will manage them. But even if we do not succeed in managing them quite as efficiently as private enterprise would manage them, still the advantages that will accrue to the public from public operation will more than counterbalance any defects in administration. This problem, as I say, has been here for years past—the problem of aiding these railways from time to time so that the systems may be completed and so that they may render service to the people. We believe that the time has come when we must discontinue affording this annual aid and lay down the principle that if the Government is to do the financing the people must have the benefit of the ownership of the system. I listened with much interest—I always do—to what the member for Carleton said, but I believe that this is the step called for by all the circumstances existing to-day, and the step that the people of this country demand, if these roads are to be maintained, as I think they should be, as solvent going concerns.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not intend to go over all the ground again; I shall refer briefly to the chief arguments advanced by the minister. He says that we have to put up money every year; I agree with that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend said, over a period of five years; that is possibly correct.

Mr. CARVELL: I was arguing that, while you might get along with $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year, if you advanced money annually to the Canadian Northern railway system, the moment the Government attempted to operate the road they would put out $50,000,000 a year instead of $15,000,000. The Intercolonial is a Government enterprise; it goes through a good country; it is as badly operated as anything in the world could be, and we get no interest out of it. I believe the Minister of Railways does claim that he had a surplus of a million or two last year, but that was all by doing Government business; it was only a matter of bookkeeping. You get no interest on your investment, and you put out millions every year in order to keep the thing going. Sometimes I feel that I should like to know how much we are putting out on the Intercolonial railway every year; it would run into many millions. The same thing will happen if the Government take over the Canadian Northern railway system; we will put up millions—not $15,000,000, or $20,000,000 a year, but $50,000,000, $60,000,000, or $70,000,000. My hon. friend is correct when he says that there is a great trend of public opinion in Canada, especially in Ontario, in favour of public ownership. Public ownership of all sorts of utilities has been tried, but I have yet to see the public utility in Canada that in the matter of sound business management would compare for a moment with privately-owned and privately-operated utilities.

This afternoon I referred briefly to the Manitoba telephone system. The Manitoba Government took over the telephone business under very favourable circumstances. Does the minister know that to-day in no other place in Canada are the people paying such enormous prices for telephone service as the people of Manitoba are paying for a very indifferent service? They are, in many cases, paying from fifty to seventy-five per cent more for the service than the people in the Maritime Provinces are paying where the systems are privately owned and managed. Any public utility in Canada always costs more to operate under public ownership than it would if operated by a private enterprise. We are trying in this country to apply certain ideas and conditions that have been worked out fairly successfully in the Old Country. The bigger cities of Europe have operated tramway systems and other public utilities with a good deal of success; but for all that, we would not put up for two days with the service they have in those big cities.

Mr. GERMAN: Is my hon. friend sure about the tramways?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not sure, because I did not compare the tramways owned by the public with those owned by corporations. Take the telephone system in England. A man will wait half an hour to get telephone connection in England. He does not use the telephone; he uses the telegraph, simply because the telephone service is twenty years behind the times. The telegraph service is not any too good, but the telephone service is horrible. Yet we are told: Look at what the English people are doing; they are running the telephones in England. Yes, they are running them, but the people of this country would not put up with the service for two days.

My hon. friend speaks about the operation of railroads. I have been on Government-owned railways in Germany, Holland and France and the first-class accommodation on many of the roads in Germany is not equal to what we call the tourist class in Canada. The people of Canada would not put up with the accommodation for a moment. If you are going to have public ownership of public utilities in Canada, and if you are going to get down to anything like the cost of operation by private corporations, you will have to make the service inferior, because in Canada you cannot operate a public utility for the same money as a private corporation can and give the same service. In my experience of travelling over a portion of the world, I do not think I have ever seen such an excellent service as the Canadian Pacific railway gives us. I go to New York very frequently; I travel along the northern part of the United States and there is no service there equal to that of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: You ought to travel between Ottawa and Brockville. It takes four hours and fifteen minutes to go seventy-three miles.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no doubt that the Canadian Pacific is giving the finest service in the world to-day, and that is simply because the Canadian Pacific has been built up by men who have started at the bottom. Many of those men are alive to-day. It is unfortunate that many of them are passing away. There is not a man at the top in the Canadian Pacific Railway company to-day who did not start at the bottom, and each one feels he has a real interest in the operation of the road; he feels he is a proprietor in some sense. There is a loyalty to the system that you cannot find on the Intercolonial, or any other Government-owned road. I realize I am speaking to-night very much in opposition to current opinion in Canada. Nevertheless, those are my views, and I am stating them, no matter how they are received by the press and the people of Canada. Should my hon. friend happen to be Minister of Finance four or five years longer he will regret that he did not take the advice we are giving him this evening and not launch on this great principle of Government ownership of the Canadian Northern, which must inevitably carry along with it Government ownership of the Grand Trunk Pacific and possibly of the Grand Trunk as well.

Mr. MURPHY: In presenting certain information to the committee this afternoon, the Minister of Finance said that he thought he was bringing down all that had been asked for. Some hon. gentleman on this side—I think the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux)—asked the minister if he could bring down the names of the shareholders and also the names of the directors.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The bondholders.

Mr. GERMAN: The names of the shareholders and directors were asked for.

Mr. MURPHY: To that list I would ask the minister to add the names of the pledgees of the stock to which he has referred and also the names of the contractors referred to in the printed statement as having unsettled claims. There are, in Ottawa and vicinity, some contractors who, to my knowledge, have unsettled claims, and it will be interesting to note if their names will appear on the list presented by the minister or not. In that way we shall be able to judge as to the reliability of the statement made by the company. I should be glad to have that information from the minister before the Bill founded on the resolution is submitted to the House for discussion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would be impossible for us to obtain the names of the bondholders of the Canadian Northern Railway company, as those bonds pass from hand to hand and a holder to-day might not be a holder to-morrow. I do not think that matter would have any bearing upon the question before the committee, which is as to whether the Government shall acquire the entire capital stock of the Canadian Northern company. I will endeavour to get the other information asked for by my hon. friend. There is a further statement which I said I would lay upon the table of the House when the Bill is in the committee stage, when there will be ample time to discuss all its provisions; that is the balance sheet for the fiscal year of the company which ended on June 30, 1917. I think I can get that substantially correct. Hon. members will understand that in a railway system as large as this, two or three months are required to check all the vouchers to a certain date. I will endeavour to get that statement. I think that is substantially all that has been asked for, but if when the Bill is in the committee stage, any further information is required, we could get it fairly expeditiously, without a delay of more than a day or so.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister get the information asked for before the Bill reaches the committee stage?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I can get some. I might be able to get the balance sheet, although I hardly think so. I might be able to get the names of the shareholders. I will, at all events, endeavour to do so.

Mr. GRAHAM: Suppose a constituent of mine asks me: How much are you paying for the Canadian Northern? What shall I say to him?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Perhaps it is as well that you do not know.

Mr. GRAHAM: An hon. member says: Perhaps it is as well that you do not know. I have been in a quandary as to just what I would tell him. I know what the guaranteed liabilities are; I know what the unguaranteed liabilities are; I know what the short-term liabilities are; but I do not know yet what it is going to cost us during the next three years for betterments, rolling stock, etc. That is what I had particularly in mind. There are certain works such as the Montreal tunnel and terminals, the terminals at Vancouver, and other works of a similar nature but of less importance. The Finance Minister, replying to a question with reference to the Montreal terminals, said that there was a certain amount of the $45,000,000 guaranteed bonds still with the Receiver General, and the proceeds were to be applied toward the completion of the Montreal terminals. How much remains in the Receiver General's hands, and is it sufficient to complete the terminals at Montreal?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am told so.

Mr. GRAHAM: I should also like to have the same information regarding the Vancouver terminals, and other improvements of a smaller nature. These will come under the immediate liabilities, if liabilities they are.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will ask the Financial Comptroller of the Railway Department to have a statement prepared showing the financing in connection with the Montreal tunnel and the Vancouver terminals. My recollection is that an issue of bonds was made by the Montreal Terminal and Tunnel company. Those bonds were sold in New York and the proceeds applied to the construction of the tunnel and the terminals. The amount required to complete the work is available, I am informed by the Railway Department, from the proceeds of the $45,000,000 of bonds guaranteed by the Dominion Government remaining in the hands of the Receiver General. The same statement is made respecting the Vancouver terminals. But I will obtain that information specifically and give it to the House when the Bill is in committee.

There was one point I inadvertently overlooked in answering my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) and that was with reference to the item of $1,300,000 due to contractors. I am told by the Financial Comptroller of the Railway Department that practically all the contractors' accounts, with the exception of about $100,000, have been completely cleared up, and that this $1,300,000 represents principally drawbacks against construction. While there may be some contested claims outside, I do not think that they are of any considerable consequence. But I shall endeavour to obtain that information so that when we are considering the Bill in committee it will be available to hon. gentlemen.

Mr. GRAHAM: I understand that some claims have been made within the week.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the claims are against Mackenzie and Mann, our taking over of the stock of the Canadian Northern would have no immediate bearing on that, except that those claims could no doubt be settled out of the award to be made by the arbitrators in respect of the value of the shares, if they are not settled in the meantime. However, that aspect of the matter does not immediately concern the proposal before the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: The difficulty is this—and I urged it before: The ordinary contractor will not differentiate between the Canadian Northern and Mackenzie and Mann. He will say: The Government has taken over a mile of road that I have built, and I have not got my money; and I want it. The Government will have to make provision to meet those cases.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I shall reserve what I have to say on this matter until the Bill comes before the House, but whether the Bill comes up now or later, I wish once more to register my protest against this legislation. I believe that it should not have been brought up during the present session; indeed, it should not have been brought up during the war. The Government creates the impression throughout the country that we have money to burn. According to rumour, and, indeed, according to legislation passed since 1911, this Government might well be defined as being the creation of the Canadian Northern, and it looks as if it would end with the Canadian Northern. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who is versed in the classics, should remember that famous apostrophe of Mirabeau during the French Revolution. Addressing himself to his colleagues in the Assembly, at the time the Minister of Finance was proposing that Frenchmen should contribute one-quarter of their revenues to maintain and save the State, he said: "Messieurs, la banqueroute est à vos portes et vous délibérez," or, "Gentlemen, bankruptcy is staring you in the face, and yet you are discussing." I think it is well to remind the Minister of Finance this evening of those words of Mirabeau, because if bankruptcy is not staring us in the face, we are living in most crucial times at all events, and yet we are discussing whether or not we shall make another gift of several million dollars to Mackenzie and Mann. From the day he became Finance Minister, my hon. friend has thought of nothing else but giving slices of Canada's fortune to those two gentlemen.

Last session $15,000,000 was given to them. In 1914 their bonds were guaranteed to the amount of $45,000,000, and the Government took a share in the company, promising the country that this would be the last call on the public treasury, and that it would save the situation. This year we are to take over the company and control the whole $100,000,000 of stock. Last year my hon. friend appointed a commission of three most distinguished gentlemen—Mr. Acworth, an authority on railways in England, and, indeed, in Europe; Mr. Smith, one of the best railway men in America; and the Chairman of our own Railway Commission, Sir Henry Drayton. They prepared a report which has been published throughout the country, and which states in the most emphatic manner that the stock of the Canadian Northern company is valueless, and that Mackenzie and Mann are not entitled to any equity. And yet my hon. friend comes before Parliament in the dying days of this session, on the eve of a general election, with a proposition that Canada shall acquire the whole system by getting control of the stock. But whilst we assume all the liabilities he proposes to leave the management to the same individuals. He has the temerity to propose to the Canadian Parliament that the value of the stock shall be determined by arbitration. One arbitrator will be appointed by the Government, another by Mackenzie and Mann, and those two appointees will appoint a third. I am not so gullible as to believe that these three arbitrators will not be friends of the company; everybody knows that they will be. Mackenzie and Mann will appoint a friend of their own; the Government, which is the creation of Mackenzie and Mann, will appoint a friend of Mackenzie and Mann, and the two together will appoint a third friend of Mackenzie and Mann. In this way a combination will be formed to fleece the country of several million dollars. My hon. friend must not forget that he stated not long ago that the public debt of this country amounted in round figures to one billion dollars; that we shall owe at the end of this war nearer two billion dollars than one and a half billion dollars; that we are spending every day towards our military effort about $800,000; that we are borrowing today at six per cent, selling our bonds at 98.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister chided me because I dared speak of economy on the appointment of a new minister overseas, and two under-secretaries. He said that my advocacy of economy should not be taken too seriously. Sir, if the Canadian Northern had not chloroformed the press of this country, my hon. friend would know what is the sentiment of the people from one end of Canada to the other, and he would realize what the people think of this transaction which in my humble judgment is nothing less than a scandalous transaction. Not to speak of economy! When the revenues of every man, woman and child of this country are being taxed in order to replenish the Treasury of Canada so that we may meet the contingencies of the war. My hon. friend has read Gladstone, the greatest Chancellor of the Exchequer England ever had. I read in one of his speeches many years ago the following words: "A Chancellor of the Exchequer who is not ready to be cheese-paring is not worth his salt." Does my hon. friend realize the situation to-day? Does he not know that every man and woman in this country is working and saving in order that we may pass successfully through the present awful crisis? We have not saved one penny on the ordinary expenditures of the country. I say to my hon. friend that we had a right to expect from him in 1914 that in view of the war he would reduce the ordinary expenditure by at least twenty-five or thirty per cent. He has not done so; on the contrary, he has increased it. At the end of the session last year my hon. friend came with another scandalous proposition—the Quebec and Saguenay deal. The scheme involved several million dollars, and was referred to the Exchequer Court. Sir Walter Cassels declared in his judgment that at least three-quarters of the claim made by the owners of the Quebec and Saguenay railway should not be paid by the Government. If this transaction goes through, the least my hon. friend should do would be to discard the idea of an arbitration which admittedly will go in favour of Mackenzie and Mann, and refer the whole question as to the value of the stock to Sir Walter Cassels, a man eminently fit to preside over such a transaction, and in whom the people of this country have every confidence. I am sincere when I register my protest against this resolution, and I say again, if the press of Canada had not been chloroformed by the Canadian Northern, there would not be room enough in this building to hold all the protests and all the petitions which would be made against this scandalous deal.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) has been the first to introduce a political bias into the consideration of this question. He has waxed quite rhetorical over the fact that during the last four or five years the Government has had to deal with the Canadian Northern Railway situation. I would like to ask my hon. friend what he had to say during the years when the foundation was laid, so far as the Canadian Northern Railway company, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company, and the National Transcontinental Railway company are concerned, for all the difficulties which have confronted this Government since 1911. Does my hon. friend think this Government went out looking for those railway problems? Those problems were here when we came into office. They have been with us every year, insistent, and urgent. They could not be evaded by the Government, if it had any regard to the credit of this country, or of its provinces, or to financial conditions, or to the public service rendered by the transportation companies of Canada. What is the essence of the railway situation to-day? It is that we have three transcontinental railway systems where we ought to have two. I am not desirous to-night of carrying on a controversial discussion, but it has been started by my hon. friend from Rouville, and I must say something in defence of the Government with respect to the charges my hon. friend has made against it. We found the National Transcontinental unfinished. The Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg which was to have cost $60,000,000 according to the estimate of the then Finance Minister, stands Canada to-day at $200,000,000. Does my hon. friend say this Government is responsible for that expenditure? Who is responsible for the $200,000,000 expended on the National Transcontinental? Take the Grand Trunk difficulties, referred to in the Drayton-Acworth report. Who is responsible for the bargain which brought about the situation by which the Grand Trunk is liable as guarantor to the extent of $5,000,000 annually on the securities issued by the Grand Trunk Pacific? Is this Government responsible for it? This Government cannot be responsible, because that bargain was entered into in 1904, many years before the present Government came into power. We had to provide money for the completion of the National Transcontinental. We had to make loans to the Grand Trunk Pacific if it was to be completed. Although the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern as well, were enterprises originated by the Government of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when in power, I have always dealt fairly, as Minister of Finance, and this Government has always dealt fairly with the Grand Trunk Pacific. We finished the National Transcontinental. The money was found, and the work was completed.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not completed yet.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is in process of completion. I suppose, as my hon. friend is aware, it may be said that railways are always in process of completion. My hon. friend knows that immediately after coming into power we made a loan of $16,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific. We made another loan, of $8,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific last year. This year we have brought down an estimate of $7,500,000 for the same company. We did not do that because we want to do it, in the sense of desiring to spend the money; we did it because the situation calls for financial aid if those roads are to continue to be operated. We have not gone out looking for an opportunity to spend money for the National Transcontinental or the Grand Trunk Pacific.

What I have said also applies to the Canadian Northern. When we came into power we found the road partially completed between Montreal and Port Arthur, with a guarantee of $35,000,000 upon it given by the late Government. This was not nearly sufficient to finish the line, and the Government found itself in the position in 1914, just as we find ourselves in the position today, of having to extend further aid to the Canadian Northern company or allow the whole system to go into default, with great loss of money in connection with the guarantees given by the Dominion. I need not refer to the extensive aid by way of guarantee given to the Canadian Northern Railway system in the West. That is well known to the House, because it has been so frequently discussed here. The point I desire to make is that this Government found a certain railway situation when it came into power; that that railway situation has developed, has gone on to its inevitable conclusion in the completion of those lines, and that the Government of Canada has been meeting that situation as best it could from year to year. As I say, I am not disposed at this time to be critical of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in regard to his Grand Trunk Pacific project. This is not a good time to be controversial. We all realize that the times are serious. I have refrained from introducing any partisan or controversial matter into this debate because I think the attention of the House and of the country should be fixed, so far as possible, on our prosecution of the war, because that is the principle business of the time. But we are confronted with a condition and not a theory. If it was a theory we should not have to bring down these proposals. But it is a condition, a condition arising out of what was done by this Parliament and by the legislative assemblies of the provinces of Canada years ago. We are confronted with a condition which has been fully disclosed in this House, and it has been common ground on both sides of the House—my hon. friend's leader, the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has taken the position again and again—that these roads must not be allowed to go into receiverships. If they are not to go into the hands of a receiver, they must be saved, and the only way to save them, so far as I know, is to continue to finance them. My hon. friend speaks of arbitration; he condemns the Government for the proposal that these shares should be valued by arbitration. Let me tell him that he voted for that in 1914.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would refer the whole matter to Sir Walter Cassels.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend voted in 1914 for valuation by arbitration on an amendment moved by his leader, the right hon. leader of the Opposition. My hon. friend cannot deny that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But we had not a debt of a billion and a half dollars then, and we were not at war.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend can sing high and can sing low, and can blow hot and cold. It would not make any difference—he would be opposed to any proposal that this Government brought down in connection with this railway matter, for which we are not primarily responsible at all. My hon. friend would object. If we had brought down a proposal that this should be referred to the court, my hon. friend would have fallen back on his position of 1914 and said that the value should be determined by arbitration; he would say it would take two years to determine this in the courts, and that in the meantime the matter would be hung up indefinitely, and he would have all kinds of suspicions against the Government. That is what my hon. friend would do because, while he is a good fellow personally, he cannot help being a violent and truculent partisan in the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about yourself?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is impossible for me to be a partisan, that is a matter of temperament. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has a great advantage over me in that respect, because he was born a partisan.

Mr. MACDONALD: I admit it frankly, you don't. You are not frank.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a great help to my hon. friend. It is a great help to a man to be born with a bias.

Mr. MACDONALD: Like you have, but you do not admit it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some men are born with it, and some acquire it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not arguing in a controversial manner. I think that both sides of this House,at this critical time, should take into consideration the conditions which surround this railway problem, the most important, next to the war, that we have, and discuss it in a businesslike manner, eliminating partisanship and political controversy altogether. It is too big a problem to be mixed up with the political situation—altogether too big a problem.

I have given all the reasons that moved the Government to take the course we have taken, and notwithstanding the strictures of the hon. member for Rouville I believe it is the course which will best meet the railway situation and will be a step forward in the policy of preserving for the people what the people have financed; and I believe that it is supported by public opinion throughout this country. I do not agree with my hon. friend for one moment that the press of this country has been chloroformed. On the contrary, the policy which we have adopted is a policy which has been advocated by the great majority of the press throughout Canada, not only recently, but for a considerable time past. The press of this country are a great public influence, and, so far as I have been able to judge, on the whole a great influence for good, and for progressive government. My hon. friend from Rouville might do a good deal worse than follow the judgment of the press. I do not know any better way of forming the judgment of a public man than for him to study assiduously the editorial expressions of the press. They are good public men who are in charge of newspapers in Canada, and they know the trend of public opinion. My hon. friend is entirely wrong in casting reflections upon the press of the country. There has been a widespread expression of opinion since these proposals have been brought down, and they have met with general acceptance. I may say to the hon. member for Rouville that in Ontario, from which province I come, these proposals are received as embodying the proper policy to be pursued by the Government of Canada in connection with this most difficult question. I say to my hon. friend that he would make no headway in Ontario—I do not believe he would make any headway in the West—

Mr. GERMAN: Not with your arbitration attached to it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: —in attacking the policy of public ownership which the Government has introduced. In answer to my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German), I would repeat what has been said many times to-day, that in determining upon arbitration we are following the method which was suggested by the Drayton-Acworth report as to the number of shares which might be allowed to remain with the present owners and as to the earnings which might be attributable to those shares.

Mr. GERMAN: You are not doing that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I know we are not doing it, but we are following the mode suggested by them in connection with that. And not only that, but we are following absolutely the proposal which was made in an amendment moved in 1914 by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), voted for by the hon. member for Welland and by the hon. member for Rouville, and, so far as I know, by the entire Opposition. And if we had come down, as I have said, with any different proposals, they would have been opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, they certainly would have been opposed by the hon. member for Welland, the hon. member for Rouville, and possibly some others.

I am sorry to have taken up the time of the committee, but I felt that, on account of the violent attack made upon this transaction by the hon. member for Rouville, it was due to the Government and myself that I should make answer. I said I did not desire to bring the question of the railway policy of the late Government into issue. We have threshed that out so many times—the water has gone over the wheel, the wheat is out of the straw; it is waste of time for this House, at this of all times, to discuss the question of the railway policy. We have three transcontinental railway systems in Canada; no matter what we may say about the past, they are here; they have their requirements; the situation must be met, and it is for the Government of the day to determine what is the best policy to be adopted in order to meet it. These proposals which we have brought down represent the policy which we think right, and which we regard as in the public interest at this time, and I believe they will met with the general approval of the people.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend said he did not wish to discuss the water that has gone through the mill, but he did it just the same. The matter under consideration is the Canadian Northern, and I will confine my remarks to that concern. The hon. gentleman knows I am not averse at any time to discuss the other matter, but this is what we have in mind, and I will just refer to it for a moment. If the policy of the late Government, with which I had something to do, had been carried out, we should not have been found in the position we are to-day in reference to the Canadian Northern system. I do not say for a moment that that system would not have had its difficulties, and that we should not have had to come, in a measure, to its relief, possibly owing to financial stringency and unforeseen conditions. But the policy of the late Government in connection with the Canadian Northern was this: to first connect its gathering system in the West with the Atlantic system, before it ventured across the Rockies. Aid was given to that system to reach its coal mines, but the late Government refused absolutely to give aid to the Canadian Northern system west of the Rocky mountains for the time being. Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann then went to the British Columbia Government, and made an arrangement with the late Sir Richard McBride, building the British Columbia end of this road under a provincial, not a federal, charter. They came again to the Dominion Government, and were again refused any aid, for the time being at least, for that portion of the transcontinental line. They entered into an agreement with the late Sir Richard McBride, by which he aided them very liberally, as we find by this statement laid on the table of the House—$40,000,000 I think. In connection with that aid Mackenzie and Mann entered into a signed agreement with Sir Richard McBride that that portion of their transcontinental line should not come under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Board of Railway Commissioners. So extreme was that arrangement that Mackenzie and Mann agreed that if any person attempted to bring that portion, even as to through rates, before the Board of Railway Commissioners, they would appear personally and oppose the application. Now, this Government, coming into power, reversed that policy altogether, and they came to the aid of the Canadian Northern railway west of the Rocky Mountains. I submit that if the Canadian Northern railway had strictly adhered to the plan of first connecting up its gathering system on the prairies with the Atlantic seaboard, and got that system into operation before they attempted to build the British Columbia end of the line, they would not have been in the serious condition we find them in to-day.

I asked the Finance Minister a question, and he said he was going to answer, but we got away into something else. I said, suppose one of my constituents were to ask what is the Canadian Northern system going to cost us, what should I tell him?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As to stock?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, everything.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All that we are buying is the stock.

Mr. GRAHAM: We do not know what we are going to pay for that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, because we do not know its value. It may be little or it may be more. It will be for the Board of Arbitrators to determine that. I stated yesterday that I would not be frank if I did not say to the House that the Government, after acquiring the stock of the system, intended to continue it as a going concern, and while we are not legally liable for the debts of the company, any more than my hon. friend would be liable for the debts of the Canadian Pacific railway if he happened to buy some of the shares, at the same time the Government intends it should continue as a going concern, and, of course, would from time to time render such assistance as might be necessary to that end. The hon. member from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) made some pretty shrewd observations to-night, among them the statement that he thought the Canadian Northern in a period of five years would be self-supporting. I find a considerable opinion among those competent to judge that this Canadian Northern Railway system is likely in time to be a decidedly paying concern.

Mr. GRAHAM: It depends on the management.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, it depends largely on the management, and, of course, upon conditions, but there seems to be no doubt that the Government is taking over a good railway system. It is well located, with excellent grades, and with alignment that leaves nothing to be desired. I feel quite optimistic with regard to the future of the Canadian Northern Railway system, once it gets over this trying period referred to by the hon. member from Carleton. My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) says his constituents might ask him, what liabilities will the Government have to assume? I think he might reply something like this: In the stock ownership of a railway system is embraced the physical properties, the plant and equipment of the system. Those are assets which every year produce a certain amount of earnings. So far as the Canadian Northern is concerned, those earnings will probably in time be able to take care of underlying interest charges, betterments and improvements, and possibly purchases of a certain amount of rolling stock. Supposing that situation is reached, we have a great property that produces every year sufficient revenue to take care of the operating expenses, the fixed charges and the other matters I have mentioned. Therefore, the question of liability need not at that time particularly disturb the people of Canada any more than the liabilities of the Canadian Pacific railway to-day disturb its shareholders. The Canadian Pacific railway has liabilities, but the earning power of the company is so great that no shareholder is in the least degree disturbed as to these liabilities, because the earning power is ample to take care of the interest upon all the bonded debt, and also pay handsome dividends to the shareholders. So far as the immediate situation is concerned, I have told the House that on account of the Canadian Northern being unable, owing to war conditions and to the position of its securities, to do new financing—as a railway company in a better position would be able to do, at least in peace time—to provide for betterment, for rolling stock and for expenditures of the capital nature, the Dominion Government might have to provide fifteen or twenty million dollars every year, for the next three or four or even five years, as my hon. friend from Carleton has stated, in order to meet underlying interest charges and to assist the company in its financing. But this situation differs from the situation which has hitherto prevailed, and which would continue to prevail if the Government brought down a Bill to aid the Canadian Northern by way of loan, as it did last year. All the expenditures which we shall make from this forward will be for the benefit of the property which is owned and controlled by the people of Canada.

That is the essential difference between the situation now and the situation that existed hitherto. With regard to the value of the shares themselves, my hon. friend may tell his constituents that he approves of the manner of ascertaining the value, because the course adopted was the course recommended by the leader of the Opposition. As soon as he tells his loyal constituents that the right hon. leader of the Opposition recommended that course in 1914, I am positive that they will be quite satisfied and will vote for him as usual.

Mr. GRAHAM: The name of the leader of the Opposition is the best name in my constituency, by all odds.

Mr. MURPHY: Just like the West.

Mr. GRAHAM: But the people might change their views, as my hon. friend did, for instance, in certain matters connected with the conscription measure. I am afraid that I shall have to make up an answer myself for my constituents, because they will not understand the one given by the Finance Minister.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it intended that the operation of the road under the auspices of the Government will begin when the transfer of the stock is made, or will it be postponed until after the value has been fixed by the arbitrators and the amount has been actually paid over?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Under the terms of the agreement, as soon as the five-sixths of the stock is vested in the minister, the Government will be in a position to aid the Canadian Northern in connection with its financing and to control the board.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the Government at that time make any changes in the board that will interfere with the present method of operation by the directors now in control?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is premature to make any statement in advance of consideration of the question by the Government when it becomes the owner of the shares. But the Government will have to consider the personnel of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern and determine what, if any, changes should be made. I mean that the Government will then be in a position to determine the personnel. I pointed out the other day that the road is well managed. So far as the operating officials are concerned many of them are of the highest standing; I mentioned two or three of them by name. It is not in mind that any changes will take place. The Government's function will be to appoint a Board of Directors to administer through the officials the affairs of the road. The Government will not be brought into immediate privity with the officials of the road; in other words, the Government will be the sole stockholder of the road and as such will be entitled to name the board of directors. The directors will have general supervision over the affairs of the company just as the directors have now.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Government will be the owners of the stock and in that respect there will be Government ownership of the road, but there will not be Government operation. That would seem to be the purpose. My hon. friend lauded the desirability of Government ownership of railways. That phrase "Government ownership of railways" is very broad in its acceptation. It may mean that the Government simply have title to a railway and that somebody else is operating it, or it may mean that the Government owns and operates the utility. In this case we are having Government ownership in the former sense, not in the latter. My hon. friend since he became Finance Minister, has frequently come to Parliament in regard to the matter of aid to the Canadian Northern. We remember that in the early stage of his career he came to us and wanted us to vote $15,000,000 for that purpose. On that occasion he gave the House the impression that if we voted $15,000,000, that would be the last time of asking; that the Canadian Northern Railway company would be able to handle everything in connection with their affairs and that the country would not have any further trouble in the matter. We had a homily to-night from my hon. friend with regard to some views expressed by the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). My hon. friend forgets that he supported my right hon. leader in 1904 in his project of assisting in the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and that he remained a supporter of that proposal right down to 1911. Certainly my hon. friend cannot deny that he is a political acrobat—I do not know whether that is worse than being a partisan or not. My hon. friend exercised his acrobatic propensities in 1911 in respect of the matter of trade between Canada and the country to the south of us. Only quite recently, after denouncing free wheat and all such things as matters emanating from the Evil One, my hon. friend, with the greatest possible ease and eloquence, dilated upon the glorious advantage of having free wheat and freedom of trade north and south. I have said that when he asked us for the $15,000,000 for the Canadian Northern, we were told that that was the last time of asking. When he asked for $45,000,000 the proposal was opposed on this side of the House, an amendment being moved for a six months' hoist and issue being taken in the matter as between the parties. My hon. friend said that the country should congratulate itself upon the fact that it had obtained forty per cent of the stock and had made a good bargain. All that my hon. friend said in 1914 when he proposed the advancing of $45,000,000 will be called up in evidence against him before this board of arbitration which he proposes to appoint to fix the value of the stock. All his statements will be available for the counsel of the Canadian Northern people when they go before this board of arbitration. They will argue that if my hon. friend could buy $40,000,000 of stock for $45,000,000, the old rule of proportion would enable the board to ascertain what $60,000,000 of stock was worth. They can make a very fair argument to any tribunal based upon my hon. friend's attitude at that time. My hon. friend is now trying to ride the Government ownership horse, and in order that he may do so he is assuming a debt for this country in the vicinity of $600,000,000. My hon. friend is taking a very large order. He had the temerity the other day, on August 1, when the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) intimated that the country was assuming a liability of $500,000,000 to say:

> That is entirely incorrect. The corporate entity of the Canadian Northern railway and of all the companies in the system is being preserved, and we are going to operate through the Canadian Northern Railway company. It is not even an indirect liability.
> It is the liability of those companies, and the Government will own the $100,000,000 of stock besides the stock it owns to-day. The statement that we are adding $500,000,000 to the national debt of Canada is absolutely and entirely incorrect.

My hon. friend was simply quibbling when he made that statement. He knows that just as well as any other hon. member. He argues that because a shareholder of the Canadian Pacific railway is not liable on fully paid up shares for the amount of the mortgage debt of the Canadian Pacific railway, the Government of Canada is not liable when it owns the whole stock of the Canadian Northern. That is a very plausible argument for the man on the street who is not a business man or who does not understand how this thing is being worked out. But the Minister of Finance of this country has no business to come before this Parliament and make such a statement, because he knew and every other hon. gentleman here knew when he made that statement, that by the purchase of the equity of redemption of the road; this country, by every moral obligation that appertains to Governmental action was committing itself morally and practically to the total liabilities of the Canadian Northern railway. The minister holds up his hands in holy horror over the suggestion that a receiver should be appointed at this moment, regarding it as a terrible thing in the interest of this country. But what would he say if the interest on all those outstanding securities was not paid, or if those current liabilities to the extent of $98,000,000 were not paid by the Canadian Northern—and there is nobody hereafter to go around and look for money but my hon. friend—what would he say if one of the people interested in this liability of $98,000,000 applied to the courts for a receiver for the Canadian Northern? Would my hon. friend pay the bill or would he not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What is the essential difference between the situation when we acquire the stock and our position now with a mortgage of $45,000,000 next after all underlying securities?

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister must remember that to-day there are outstanding $147,000,000 worth of securities of the Canadian Northern which are not guaranteed by anybody.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They are a charge upon the system.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister will look at the addendum on page 7, he will find that there is a 5 per cent income charge convertible debenture stock of $25,000,000 and Imperial Rolling Stock company, Limited, equipment trusts of $14,846,500, which means over $39,000,000 more. That means that there are $186,000,000 of securities that are not guaranteed. The minister is making the country liable for them by becoming the purchaser of the equity of redemption. The minister says: What more liability are we incurring now than the liability of $45,000,000 we had before? He knows that liability comes only after the underlying securities; he knows that, as the matter stands to-day, the Government are not liable for those $186,006,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, he does not. The Government are not legally liable in either case. The argument my hon. friend is making is that they are morally liable by owning the stock. The point I am making is that his argument would apply to the Government as guarantors of the $45,000,000 just the same as with respect to all the other underlying securities, including the unguaranteed stock which is a charge upon the undertaking, and in priority to the $45,000,000 mortgage.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all, because at this moment you have the $98,000,000 of current liabilities which are not paid and which will have to be paid. The minister knows that any one of those creditors who go to make up that $98,000,000 could come into the court in the event of failure to pay his account and ask the court to appoint a receiver.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is entirely overlooking the collateral to that $98,000,000 of short term loans, against part of which is Dominion guaranteed security coming in priority to the $45,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not a great part.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A considerable part.

Mr. MACDONALD: You might find a stray amount. The minister is simply dodging the issue. He knows that the point I make in regard to this matter cannot be controverted. No matter what the situation has been in the past, the Government of Canada, by virtue of becoming the owner of the equity of redemption in this property, makes itself liable for every one of the securities, and if there is an attempt made by anybody to whom the Canadian Northern owes, say, $1,000,000 for balance due for construction, to put the railway into the hands of a receiver, the minister would have to call upon the Government to pay that money, just the same as he would have to pay the whole amount. The result is that to-day there are, according to this statement, approximately $399,000,000 of guaranteed and unguaranteed securities. In addition to that, there are $98,000,000 of current liabilities, as set out on page 8. That means $498,000,000, or approximately $500,000,000. Then, there is the interest charge which the minister has to provide for this year, and there are the expenditures that must be made for this year. When the Government takes title to the stock, which they will do upon the signing of the transfer of five-sixths of that stock, what is the source to which Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, operating the Canadian Northern railway, will look for money for the purpose of providing betterments during this year? There is only one source—the Government of Canada. Hitherto, Mackenzie and Mann were compelled to resort to their own methods of financing, and they did so. Now they will simply come to the Government of Canada and say: We do not have to go to New York in war time and look for money, and pay large commissions and sell stock at a low figure, or sell our securities at a low price; we come to the Government of Canada, for whom we are operating this road; you are our bankers, our superiors, and you will have to provide that money. Therefore, in addition to the $500,000,000 which are added at one swoop to the debt of the country, there are these liabilities for which the Government becomes responsible. The result is a profound disregard for that public opinion which the minister says exists in Ontario in regard to this question of Government operation. The Government says in effect: We are liable for all the debt, but we are going to let Mackenzie and Mann go on and operate the road. That is the situation in which we are.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is not correct.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend spoke of the fact that the gentlemen who were operating the road—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was speaking of the officials of the road; I was not speaking of the members of the board. I mentioned the other day Mr. McLeod, Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell, as very competent officials.

Mr. MACDONALD: Those are the gentlemen who have been operating the road in the past; they are operating it now.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think they are good officials.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister says they are good officials. He is going to let them operate the road. The result will be that instead of going to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, as they have gone in the past when they required money for betterments, they will go to my hon. friend. That is the only difference.

I am not again going into the question of arbitration, to which I referred the other day. The minister says that it is a modification of the suggestion contained in the Drayton report. What I am concerned about more than anything else is the way in which this matter is to be dealt with. According to the history that my hon. friend is providing for the counsel who are to be engaged in the case, the additional amount which Canada will be compelled to assume will to my mind be very large. My hon. friend has chosen to proceed in that way, but personaly, I think it would have been better to clean up this whole thing.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How?

Mr. MACDONALD: Appoint a receiver to operate the road as a trustee, and then it would have been open for the country to deal with it. Some hon. gentlemen seem to think a receiver is a most dreadful proposition, but as a matter of fact there is not a lawyer in the House who does not know that a receivership is very often the best way of dealing with a company that has got into difficulties, no matter what kind of a company it is. Here we have a large amount of securities which have been issued in the past and have not been guaranteed. I venture to say that where they have been disposed of they have been sold at a large discount from their face value, and large amounts have been paid in commissions. Why should the country be compelled to pay millions of dolllars to men who made their money in that way? If we adopted the method I have suggested we should know exactly how much money had gone into the road, an adjustment could be arrived at under a proper accounting system, the road could continue to be operated, and the whole matter would be cleaned up. My hon. friend stands aghast at that proposal, as do some other hon. gentlemen. Yet these are serious times. The financial problems pressing on the country are of the most grave character, and day by day they are becoming more serious. When I see my hon. friend going down to New York, and I see it advertised in the New York papers that Canada's securities are being offered there at 98 and that the parties who purchase them receive 6.7 per cent on their investment, then I say we are in a very peculiar financial situation, this security being only a two-year term proposition.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend happen to know what interest return the Imperial Government securities offered in New York, paid secured by high class collateral? Does my hon. friend not know that we have to have regard to that in our issues?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is speaking of something which does not for one moment help towards a solution of the problem I am dealing with. My hon. friend is paying 5 per cent in Canada for his money, while the United States Government are paying only 3½ per cent. The moral I was endeavouring to point out was that my hon. friend is compelled to offer his security to-day on a two-year basis, and the parties who are purchasing them are receiving 6 per cent on their investment. My hon. friend is increasing the debt of this country by this proposal and impairing our borrowing power in the New York market to the amount of $500,000,000 more. My hon. friend's suggestion that this does not mean an increase in our national debt may pass as an argument along the concession lines, but when he goes down to New York to look for money again, he will find that the shrewd bankers there, who are looking forward to making New York the money centre of the world will say: "Since you were here before, you have directly or indirectly assumed liabilities in addition to what you had before of nearly $600,000,000; your borrowing power is thereby impaired, because you have to pay interest on that amount each year, and we shall therefore have to charge you more; we cannot underwrite this loan at the figure we did before." Having in mind the financial conditions that will confront this country in the future, he ought to have been prepared to look to almost any resource before saddling this country with this liability, which will meet us at every turn whenever we seek to borrow money in the markets of the world for any purpose whatsoever. I have ventured to deal with this phase of the matter because it seemed to me that my hon. friend was not quite candid in his remarks to the House on this subject.

Resolution reported, and read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the resolution be read a second time?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: To-morrow?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my right hon. friend suggest that the resolution be read a second time to-morrow, and the Bill then introduced?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

LIVE STOCK EXCHANGE.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burrell (Minister of Agriculture) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution. Mr. Davidson in the Chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that there shall be a live stock exchange in connection with each stock-yard operated under these provisions, of which every commission merchant doing business at such stock-yard shall be a member; that the by-laws of such exchange be subject to the approval of the Minister of Agriculture; that such by-laws provide for commission merchants giving security to account for proceeds of sales received; that the Governor in Council may authorize the said minister to license such merchants and to prescribe a fee therefor; that the construction, equipment and management of stock-yards be as prescribed by regulations to be made by the Governor in Council and by by-laws to be approved by the said minister; that the stock-yards be subject to inspection; that stock-yards not managed as required by regulation may be closed after notice; that the said provisions shall not apply to existing stock-yards until after not less than three months' notice; that the Governor in Council may by regulation prescribe how live stock, meat, poultry, eggs and wool shall be graded, packed and marked; that penalties be provided for violating the Act and for assaulting or obstructing officers while in performance of their duties.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the minister explain?

Mr. BURRELL: This resolution and the Bill founded upon it is the result of a good deal of discussion in the country amongst the live-stock men, and the result also of a good deal of investigation by our own department. As the House knows, the stock-yards of the country are practically the only market the producer of live-stock has outside of his chances of selling to the ordinary buyer who comes along. The producer has to sell his stock to the drover or the ordinary buyer who comes along and take what price he can get, or ship his cattle to the stock-yards and take his chances there. While the stock-yards, therefore, of which there are six in Canada—one at Calgary, one Edmonton, one at Winnipeg, one at Toronto and two at Montreal —afford the very best market for the producer of live-stock, and provide a stimulus for producing more live-stock, a great many criticisms have been directed to the conditions which exist in some of the stockyards, and there is a very strong feeling amongst live-stock men throughout the country that there should be some Government regulation and control of the stockyards.

For instance, as the principal buyers in the stockyards are packers, exporters and butchers, it is quite obvious that the man who ships a carload of live stock to the stockyards is, in a sense, taking a leap in the dark, and has to depend on the integrity, the honesty and efficiency with which the stockyards are managed, as well as on the integrity of the commission man with whom business is done. In the United States, where there are some enormous stockyards, as my hon. friend knows, there have been tendencies towards monopolies on the part of great packing-houses and other corporations, and the farmer, the producer of live stock, has always felt that he is very much the under dog. I do not say the same conditions exist to the same extent in Canada, but I know there have been strong protests to the Government of the United States about conditions there, and we did not feel it was a happy condition to exist here. Therefore, it was thought better to take it in time, and have some kind of Government supervision of the stockyards management, in order, not to impose any improper restrictions on the stockyards, but to give the farmers and drovers of live stock in the country the security they should have in what is their particular market, an absolute knowledge that they would get a fair and square deal all round. I do not think it is necessary to explain the various provisions that will be embodied in the Bill, because they will be discussed at length when the Bill is introduced. We have wished to take some steps which will lead to a better system of standardizing our live-stock products, not only to strengthen our export market, but in order to keep the export market which we have happily gained during the progress of this war.

As all men who have studied the question know, the war has seen the replacement in the British market of a great many commodities of Danish, Russian and other origin, by an increase of exports from the United States, and a very great increase in the agricultural exports of Canada, to such an extent that it is felt if the conditions can be maintained and our flow of exports continued, it will provide the very strongest stimulus for the development of our country. This export trade is of vital importance, because if a steady increase in production occurs here it can only be warranted by a steady export trade, and in this way it re-acts on the whole market. That is, briefly, the purpose of the Bill which is to be founded upon the resolution.

Mr. NESBITT: I am one of those who would be very glad to assist the farmer by every means to get an honest deal. What I wanted the minister to explain was just how this Bill will help the farmer. I quite appreciate if a person ships stock in, say, the Toronto live-stock market, he must take his chances as to what he gets for it. He generally ships to a commission man there, and the commission man sells to the packer. As a rule the farmer does not do the shipping himself, unless he is accustomed to go to the market, and knows the ways of the market. The resolution says:

> That it is expedient to provide that there shall be a live stock exchange in connection with each stock-yard operated under these provisions.

As a matter of fact, is there not now a live-stock exchange?

Mr. BURRELL: Not at all stock-yards.

Mr. NESBITT: Does not the buyer who buys from the farmer ship the live-stock to the order of a commission man, or a broker?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: And, does not the latter sell them publicly to the packers? I do not wish to be understood as criticising my hon. friend. I am only asking for information.

Mr. BURRELL: I thought all those details would come up again and be more fully considered when the Bill was under discussion. My hon. friend's statement is correct, except that I do not think there are live-stock exchanges in connection with all the stock-yards. What we propose is that every stock-yard shall have an exchange, and that no commission man shall operate in these stock-yards unless he is a member of the livestock exchange, and no live-stock exchange shall operate unless its by-laws have been approved by the minister. In that way, the department will have a reasonable knowledge of whether an exchange has conducted its business on proper lines. It would also involve the bonding of the commission men on the exchange. There may be cases, particularly in the West, where farmers ship their live-stock long distances, and some commission men may not always do the fair thing. At the present time there is no check upon them. We propose to have them bonded and to have the by-laws of the live-stock exchange submitted to our approval, so that all along the line there may be a fair knowledge of the transactions which are made, and some guarantee that reasonable treatment will be accorded to the producer. It is chiefly in the interests of the producer that this Bill is brought forward. My information is that no stockyards management will object to reasonable government regulation, and I do not think they should object. There are many ways in which a shipper might not get a fair deal. For instance, some of the packers, transportation companies, and so on, might have a stronger pull in the running of the stock yard, and there might easily be an allocation of space and facilities that would be much more in favour of the wholesale man or packer than of the individual shipper. There is also variation in the fees charged.

Mr. NESBITT: Are you going to regulate the fees?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, we have power to regulate all those things.

Mr. NESBITT: Supposing I shipped a carload of cattle, and was not satisfied that the commission merchant or broker to whom I shipped had dealt fairly with me, what recourse would I have?

Mr. BURRELL: We propose not to allow a man to operate as a commission merchant on the exchange until he can satisfy, through the exchange, with whom we will deal—

Mr. NESBITT: The exchange will be a body corporate?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes. He will not be allowed to operate unless he can give absolute security as regards his integrity and financial standing. It will work out something in the same way as the bonding of the grain men on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. There is some criticism as regards the prices of feed, and as regards weights. We propose to have supervision of the scales, and details of that kind, in order to insure that the operations will be uniform and satisfactory, and the producer of live stock operating in this way will know he has all the encouragement and protection that can be afforded him, because he is going to get a fair deal.

Mr. NESBITT: Do you propose to have an inspector in the yards to see about the weights?

Mr. BURRELL: We would probably work very largely through the live stock exchange. The exchange would have to operate under our approval, through its constitution and by-laws, so that if there was any dispute or grievance at any time we could take it up through the exchange. We would reserve power to close the stock-yards if we wished, and license commisison men to carry on their business irrespective of the exchange. Not that we are anticipating anything of the kind, but the whole tenor of the Bill is simply to provide, in the interests of the producers of live stock, what I think should possibly have been provided before, some Government regulation and supervision of the stock yards which are a sort of semi-public utility.

Mr. THORNTON: Is it the intention that only live stock commission merchants shall be members of the exchange?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. THORNTON: A drover could not be a member?

Mr. BURRELL: It is intended to apply only to commission men.

Mr. THORNTON: And every sale should be through a commission man?

Mr. BURRELL: I should not like to speak positively of that now, but practically all the business is done in that way in the stock-yards. A man sends his stock there and it is sold on commission. This is only to systematize the business, and to give additional securities to the shipper, it was felt that the bonding feature was necessary. The matter has been discussed very vigorously in the West. Two years ago the Saskatchewan Government appointed a commission to investigate the live-stock industry, and one of the most vigorous recommendations was that some control of the stock-yards should be established. The Western Live-stock Union, the great organization of stock producers west of the lakes, has also for the last two years been passing resolutions along the same line. That the stock-yards have helped live-stock production is evident because in Edmonton, since the establishment of the stock-yards, the condition of the shipper has been greatly improved, although the features that this Bill is intended to improve may be still in existence there.

Mr. THORNTON: Would it undertake to regulate the conduct of a live-stock commission merchant?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. THORNTON: Because there are grievous and well-founded complaints of the treatment that drovers and farmers get from commission men.

Mr. BURRELL: There will be ample provisions in the Bill to exercise the fullest control in the interests of the shipper. I was going to suggest that, after the resolution is reported, the Bill to be founded on it should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, where it could be fully discussed without taking up the time of the House.

Mr. MORPHY: Why does the minister go so far here? The general discussion would indicate that this was a Bill relating to live-stock, but the resolution also gives this commission apparent power to regulate how meat, poultry, eggs and wool shall be graded, packed and marked. That seems to be a very broad departure. Am I to understand that every farmer who ships to that exchange must be subject to the regulations of this board?

Mr. BURRELL: It is not very well explained in the resolution, because the resolution embodies the whole Bill, but that is a separate feature entirely. The live-stock exchange and the stock-yards is one section of the Bill, and the Act to be cited as the Live-stock and Produce Act. The second part contains a clause which aims at the other feature, namely, the intention of the department and the Government to do something in the direction of generally supervising our live-stock products, bacon, eggs, wool and various other commodities, in which case we propose to consult all the interests thoroughly before passing the Bill. It is intended to link up the whole system contemplated by this Bill with the export trade.

Mr. MORPHY: Why is it necessary in this Bill to interject a clause providing for penalties for violating the Act or for obstructing an officer in the execution of his duty under it? It seems to me that the ordinary Criminal Code would apply to that, especially if the officer is a public officer.

It does not seem to me that a Bill dealing with farm produce or live-stock should have incorporated in it a clause of that kind. What is the reason for it?

Mr. BURRELL: Similar provisions have been inserted in a number of other Acts, both in my department and in others. This was done after consultation with the Parliamentary Counsel.

Mr. MORPHY: In a Bill like this, applicable to the countryside at large, I can see danger of that clause being taken advantage of by an inspector to take to himself power to which he has no right by threatening men with criminal prosecution under this section. It seems to me to be giving a drastic power to an inspector dealing with ordinary trade commodities, which should not be put in the Bill, because of the danger that an officer enforcing the Act might attempt to bulwark his own power by a threat of serious criminal prosecution. There has been some feeling of uneasiness on the part of the public because of the power that has been acquired by these stock commission merchants, and the law is sufficiently drastic to give any man all the protection he needs without incorporating a common, everyday clause of the Criminal Code in an Act respecting merchandise.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH: It appears to me that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) is taking a step in the right direction. This measure deals with a very important part of agriculture, live-stock. I would suggest to the minister that this resolution should be sent to the Committee on Agriculture, where it might be discussed in all its details, and no time would be lost.

Mr. NESBITT: I think no harm would be done if we allowed the drover to sell on the stock exchange or stockyard. I see no reason why I should not ship a bunch of steers or cattle to stockyards, and sell them without the intervention of a commission man. I do not think the Bill should force sales through the hands of a commission man. I understood the hon. minister to say, in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Thornton), that that was the intention of the Bill. That would mean that no person outside of the big brokers on the exchange would be allowed to sell stock. I ask the minister to consider that question, because I think his object is to make the market as open as possible, and to regulate it as well as possible to protect the interests of the ordinary greenhorn.

Mr. BURRELL: Our feeling in regard to the penalty clause was that it was really part of the protection. It is a protection to the farmers. However, all those details might be very much better discussed in committee, and I propose doing as my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith) suggested, and will refer the Bill to the Agricultural Committee. So we need not discuss details now.

Resolution reported.

Mr. BURRELL moved for leave to introduce Bill 123, respecting live stock, founded upon the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty for the second reading of Bill 97, to amend the Criminal Code respecting jurors:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would my hon. friend allow this Bill to stand? The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not present. I know he has had communications from at least one of the governments of the provinces upon this subject, and I feel quite sure he would like to be heard when the discussion takes place.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill contains one clause, and I rather hoped it would not give rise to discussion, but I do not desire to proceed with it in the absence of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Mr. PUGSLEY: To-morrow?

Mr. DOHERTY: I will bring it up to-morrow.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Thursday, August 9, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO REVISE RULES CONCERNING DIVORCE.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen, the name of Mr. Boys, was substituted for the name of Mr. Boyce, on the special committee to revise the rules concerning divorce.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF McLEOD-TELLIER COMMISSION.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I beg to lay on the Table the evidence taken by the McLeod-Tellier Commission. I am laying on the Table at the same time the evidence and proceedings before the Galt Commission, because of the fact that this was in major part the material with which the McLeod-Tellier Commission was called upon to deal. Whether it will be necessary, in the event of the proceedings before the McLeod-Tellier Commission being printed, to print also that most important material that they had before them may depend somewhat upon whether or not that evidence, having been already printed, I understand, by the provincial authorities, is available or not. But I thought it better to place before the House the entire material which the McLeod-Tellier Commission had before it.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY: Is it intended to print the evidence without the matter being further considered? My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) mentioned the matter, and perhaps it might be as well to allow it to stand till to-morrow and see what he desires. If the evidence before the Galt Commission is already printed and available, I do not see any reason for printing the same matter twice over. It would be merely necessary to print the supplemental evidence.

Mr. DOHERTY: I had a word last evening with the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and I rather understood from him then that he did not think it would be necessary even to lay on the Table this other material, but I think it is desirable, at all events, that we should put before the House the whole material which the McLeod-Tellier Commission dealt with. The evidence before the Galt Commission was perhaps the most important part, because their first duty was to pass upon the sufficiency of that evidence, and their report expresses their opinion on that. I think it will be found that there is no occasion to reprint that evidence, which is very voluminous.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are there several copies available of the evidence printed by the Manitoba Government?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to speak on that subject to-day. We might let the question of printing stand over.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You might have the supplemental evidence printed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY asked leave to introduce Bill 124 to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman explain?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are five amendments sought to be made by this Bill. They concern matters which are considered to be of some urgency and importance. The effect of the first section is to amend the existing section 4 of the Canada Evidence Act, so as to make the evidence of a wife admissible against the husband in prosecutions for non-support. The second section of the Bill proposes to amend section 213 of the Criminal Code, so as to include within its provisions those enactments making it a criminal offence to have illicit connection on the part of an employer, or, generally speaking, of a person in a position of authority over the victim or the participant in the illicit connection. The amendment consists in including another class of persons within that class of people the step-parent, foster parent or guardian who has illicit connection with his step-child, foster child, or ward. The third section proposes to amend the definition of a common bawdy house, so as to make it include a place where acts of indecency are committed, or a place to which people ordinarily resort for the purpose of indulging in such acts of indecency. Our attention has been called to a certain class of establishment, which is announced under guise of what might be a perfectly legitimate business or treatment, but which, according to the police information, is really used for acts of indecency. The fourth section amends a provision which was made, I think, a year or two ago constituting it an offence for a trader who has become insolvent to have failed to keep regular books of account. That is already the law, but in its interpretation the purpose was defeated, because there was ambiguity in the terms with reference to the period of time within which such failure must have taken place. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to correct that ambiguity. The last section proposes to amend the present tariff of constables' fees for services rendered in connection with criminal prosecutions. This is in response to a very general request, and the proposition has been submitted to the provincial governments which are also interested in it, and if my information is correct with regard to the most of them, if not all of them, it meets with no objection.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

[Mr. Doherty.]

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

MAJOR BARTLETT.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES:

1. Is Major Bartlett, of Charlottetown, P.E.I., now employed, or has he been employed by the Government or the Militia Department?
2. If so, how long has he been so employed and what remuneration has he received or is he receiving for his services?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes, as officer in charge of supplies, transport and barracks at Charlottetown.
2. Since January 1, 1916. He is receiving the pay of his rank.

CAPT. KENNETH C. MACPHERSON.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Is Captain Kenneth C. Macpherson attached to military headquarters at Ottawa?
2. If so, what are his duties and pay?
3. Up to the outbreak of war did Captain Kenneth C. Macpherson conduct a real estate business at Ottawa or elsewhere?
4. Did he perform active service in France or Flanders?
5. If not, in what capacity or rank did he go to England and why did he return?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.
2. An assistant to the Assistant Paymaster General. $6.25 per diem.
3. Yes, in Ottawa.
4. Yes.
5. Answered by No. 4.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. In what cities of the Dominion does the Post Office Department make use of the street cars for the transportation of letter carriers?
2. How many letter carriers in each city are privileged to have the use of street cars?
3. What is the price paid by the department per carrier in the several cities for such transportation?
4. From what basis is the amount paid by the department to the several street car companies derived?
5. On what dates do the present agreements with the street car companies in each city cease?

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—RATES ON COAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Cochrane) to a letter which I received from the manager of the Bras d'Or Coal company, Limited, in respect to the rates on the transportation of coal from Sydney to Montreal. The letter is dated July 28, 1917, and reads:

Dear Mr. McKenzie:—

In reply to your favour of July 23rd, the rates from Sydney, North Sydney, Sydney Mines and Little Bras d'Or have been increased to Levis and Carrier Junction from $2.35 a net ton to $3.75. These are the points that we are particularly interested in, but there has been a general increase in the rates of about proportionate to these increases from North Sydney to all points west of Mont Joli. Under Government supervision in the United States, the railways have been permitted to increase the rate by 15 cents a gross ton, and you can see that the Canadian Government rate has been increased by $1.40 a net ton.

Thanking you for your interest in this matter, I remain

Yours very truly,

Geo. B. Burchell.

The people in that part of the country are very much concerned about this large increase in the rates. I hope that the minister will be able to go back to the old rate.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is well known that the old coal rate was exceedingly low; it was put into effect when our traffic was largely to the east, enabling us to bring back our cars loaded. But the situation has changed; practically all our loading is now west, and if we did very much coal business it would be necessary for us to bring down empty cars for it. The rate that my hon. friend has mentioned is less than one half cent per ton per mile, which is as low a rate as obtains in the United States. It is one thousand miles from Sydney to Montreal and one-half cent per ton would bring the rate up to a good deal more than the rate my hon. friend mentioned. It is only in proportion that we have raised the rate to Quebec city and other places in Quebec province. Having regard to the tremendous increase we have had to make in the pay of our men, and to the increased amount we are paying the coal producers for coal, certainly we are justified in increasing our rates.

PROPOSED NEW PENSIONS ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): When does the Finance Minister purpose going on with the new Pensions Act? Many cases have come under the observation of hon. members in respect to which amendments ought to be made.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The matter is very important and, as my hon. friend knows, somewhat complicated. It has received a good deal of attention. I am not in a position to make a definite statement to-day, but I shall do so later.

THE CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

FIRST READING OF BILL RESPECTING THE CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of a certain proposed resolution in respect to the acquisition by His Majesty of certain shares and capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty.

Motion agreed to, and resolution read the second time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE thereupon moved to introduce Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

NUMBER OF JURORS IN PANEL.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 97, to amend the Criminal Code respecting jurors.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City): I am surprised that in moving the second reading of a Bill proposing such a drastic change in the administration of the criminal law, the Minister of Justice has not seen fit to give to the House a full explanation, not merely of the provisions of the Bill, but of the reasons for its introduction. It is true that on the first reading he stated the object of the Bill. But he ought to go much further than that; he ought to show to the House the reasons why this Bill should be passed.

I have had much to do with the administration of criminal law in my own province during a period of thirty-five years, and I have never heard the slightest expression of dissatisfaction with the law as it exists. It is absolutely essential for the proper, efficient and satisfactory administration of the criminal law that it should be continued on the statute book as it is to-day. If this amendment is adopted and the law is changed in the manner proposed by my hon. friend, in many cases the administration of justice will be paralysed.

In criminal cases where the circumstances are such as to arouse passions and prejudices, it is absolutely essential that there should continue to be vested in the Attorney General as the representative of the Crown the right to cause jurors to stand by until the panel has been exhausted, when, of course, the Attorney General again brings forward the jurors who have not been challenged peremptorily, and they must be sworn unless they are subject to challenge for cause. The existing law affords the greatest protection which could possibly be desired for the fair trial of a person accused of crime. By reference to the Criminal Code, section 932, it will be found that it is provided that:

> Every one indicted for treason or for any offence punishable with death is entitled to challenge twenty jurors peremptorily.

That is to say, a person indicted for treason or murder or any other offence punishable with death may, without giving any reason or showing any cause, peremptorily challenge twenty of the jurors of one panel. In addition to that there is the challenge for cause, for instance, for expression of opinion, which is usually regarded as a sufficient cause of challenge. There are many causes of challenge which I need not state to the House. Section 932 also provides that:

> Every one indicted for any offence other than treason, or an offence punishable with death, for which he may be sentenced to imprisonment for more than five years, is entitled to challenge twelve jurors peremptorily.

The power of the Crown to challenge peremptorily is limited to four jurors, no matter whether the indictment is for treason, or for murder, or for any other offence. Take, for instance, a trial for murder or for treason. In the first place the accused has the right to challenge peremptorily twenty jurors, and the Crown has the right to challenge peremptorily but four. In addition to that there is the right to challenge for cause, which in the case of a crime exciting widespread interest in the community, arousing the passions and prejudices of the people generally, may be made, and in many cases those challenges for cause are allowed. For good reasons, when the present Criminal Code was enacted Parliament, carrying out the provisions which have been in the Criminal law for very many years, continued the right of the Crown to order jurors to stand by until the panel was exhausted. I challenge the Minister of Justice to cite a single instance in the administration of the criminal law in this country in which any evil has resulted from the Crown having exercised that right. Unless it can be shown that some evil of a public nature has resulted from the law being as it is, why should the law be changed?

If we take the history of matters which have led up to this proposed change, we find that the reason for the amendment made by the Minister of Justice arose in Manitoba. In the other provinces of Canada there has been upon the statute book a provision that the panel may be increased materially. That provision has been upon the statute book of Ontario for a good many years; it has been upon the statute book of New Brunswick for twenty-five or thirty years. Some little time ago a change was made in the Manitoba statute making the same provision which, in the other provinces, has, for so many years, resulted in a very satisfactory administration of the criminal law. Certain correspondence took place in reference to that legislation. The Minister of Justice threatened to advise His Royal Highness to disallow it. The minister did not seem to be impressed by the fact that Manitoba was simply following the example of the other provinces. At that time there were important criminal trials of a somewhat political nature, affecting prominent public men in that province, and we can well understand that the matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice, and that he was pressed to consider whether or not the law passed by the Legislature of Manitoba should be disallowed. The Attorney General of Manitoba took the view, quite correctly, I think every one will agree, that the constitution of the criminal courts as well as of the civil courts is, under the provisions of the British North America Act, vested exclusively in the provincial legislature. The Minister of Justice must have taken that view because, after due consideration, he came to the conclusion that he could not advise His Royal Highness to disallow the statute of the Manitoba Legislature. But the Minister of Justice thought that he might get around the matter in another way, and so he comes to Parliament with the present Bill limiting the right of ordering jurors to stand by unless that right is allowed to be exercised by the presiding judge, not upon the exercise of his own judgment, but upon special cause shown. This is a very little Bill, but it is a Bill of enormous importance so far as the fair and proper administration of the criminal law is concerned.

The Bill reads:

Section nine hundred and thirty-three of the Criminal Code, chapter one hundred and forty-six of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, is amended by adding the following proviso at the end of subsection one thereof:—

"Provided that the Crown may not direct any number of jurors to stand by in excess of forty-eight, unless the judge presiding at the trial, upon special cause shown, so orders."

What must the Attorney General do in the effort to get a fair-minded jury? Let us bear in mind the fact that the verdict of the jury in criminal cases must be unanimous. If by hook or by crook the friends of the prisoner can succeed in getting upon the jury, one man who will hold out, there will be no conviction and the accused will go scot-free, because the jury will be discharged. There may, of course, be another trial, but, by the exercise of equal ingenuity, it may be possible to get another obstinate juror who will hold out for the prisoner, and the accused will go free. I have known that to be the case in the administration of the criminal law in my province. Juries were discharged, not only upon the first trial, but upon the second trial, and the result was that prisoners who there was the strongest possible reason to believe were guilty, were allowed to go free. The Attorney General must exercise his right of peremptory challenge first, before he can order the jurors to stand by. The Minister of Justice was wrong there.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will look at the Criminal Code, I think he will see that I am right.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think not; I will find the section later. The Attorney General exercises his peremptory challenge first. In a case of murder—in fact, in any criminal trial—he may challenge four of the jurors. The prisoner's counsel has the right to challenge peremptorily twenty. If the Attorney General, the prosecuting officer acting for the Crown, has reason to believe that there are men on the jury whom it is not desirable to have sworn as jurors, he orders them to stand by. In ordinary cases forty-eight would be a sufficient number to be allowed to stand by, but in cases which I have known, at least one hundred jurors have been called by order of the judge, because it was necessary to call that number in order to get an impartial jury. In a case where jurors have been called to a number exceeding seventy-five or a hundred, we will say, as soon as the Attorney General stands by forty-eight, his right of stand by is exhausted. The names must then be called again, and he is obliged to allow to be sworn on the jury any juror whom he may have ordered to stand by, but whose name may be called again, and whom he is not able to challenge at all. That is a most important right. I have never known it to be exercised arbitrarily, because we all know that in the administration of criminal justice the Attorney General—and the same may be said of counsel who are appointed by him to prosecute criminal cases—considers himself in the position almost of a judge. It is his duty to consider the accused innocent until he is proved guilty, and to give him every fair chance. In the trial the Attorney General places himself almost in the position of the judge.

Now, what does this Bill provide? It provides that after he has stood by forty-eight he must apply to the judge if he wants to stand by any more. He cannot give his private views to the judge, but must show special cause, which means that notice is given to the counsel for the prisoner, and that the Attorney General has to produce affidavits to show why such and such a juryman should not be sworn. Affidavits are also presented on the other side, and the whole question of the desirability or otherwise of having a jury against whom the Attorney General may have the strongest possible objection has to be tried out in public before the judge, and the judge must give his decision whether special cause has been shown, and whether the Attorney General shall be permitted to stand that jury by. What is going to be the effect of that? The Attorney General has to show cause. He has to show partisanship. He has to show that a man is not worthy to be a juror as between the Crown and the criminal. He has to establish special cause, to satisfy the judge that in the interest of justice that man should be stood aside, and if the judge decides that the cause is not sufficient, he has to allow that man against whom this charge has been made, which has been tried and decided against the Crown, to be called as a juryman to try the case as between the Crown and the accused. I hold that that would be very objectionable indeed, and it would in fact paralyse the administration of justice in important trials where great public interest and strong feeling has been aroused. My hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) will remember the case which was tried in the county of Gloucester a good many years ago where it was exceedingly difficult to get a jury. There was a strong feeling of sympathy with the prisoners, which is very often the case in murder trials. In this particular case, if I remember rightly, the late Mr. Justice King, who was Attorney General, had to get an order for 150 additional jurymen before he could say that he had a panel out of which there could be a selection which would give a fair and impartial verdict—fair and impartial towards the prisoners, and fair and impartial towards the people, for whom the Crown is acting. If his right had been limited to stand by only forty-eight of these jurymen it would have been very difficult indeed for him to have obtained such a jury as he could feel could be relied on to give a fair and impartial decision.

I do trust that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, knowing by what has been reported in the press that these gentlemen in Manitoba are not to be re-tried, will drop this Bill. The cases in Manitoba have been dropped, and I repeat, I trust my hon. friend will drop this Bill. There is no need for it, no public necessity has been shown, no evils have ever resulted from this right in the criminal law. No evils have ever resulted from the fact that the legislatures of the different provinces have done the very thing which the Legislature of Manitoba has done, of giving the right to stand by a large number of jurors in exceptional cases where that is necessary for the fair administration of justice. I will ask the minister not to press this Bill, because he will find that it will enormously hamper in the discharge of their duties those who are charged, as the Attorney Generals of the different provinces are charged, with the administration of the criminal law, and in many cases it will actually paralyse the administration of criminal justice.

Mr. DOHERTY: In reply to my hon. friend—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must direct the attention of the House to the fact that if the Minister of Justice exercises his right to reply, it will preclude any other hon. member from speaking on this motion.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What is the reason for this change in the law?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot give the reason without stopping everybody else from speaking, but if I may be permitted to make one remark—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilson) has practised in Quebec under a system where the limitation on the Crown is absolute.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I will wait to offer my opinion until the Bill is in committee.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will you permit me, Sir, to make just one suggestion? The Minister of Justice has not yet taken advantage of his right to reply, which would preclude others from speaking. Might he not be permitted by unanimous consent of the House to give the reasons for this change in the law?

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be highly irregular to do that. The Minister of Justice has spoken in moving the motion, and there only remains to him the right to reply.

Mr. PROULX: Have there been any requests for this legislation by the attorneys general of any of the provinces?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, there have not been any. If I may be permitted to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. minister of Justice chooses to make his reply now he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. MACDONALD: This Bill is one which, on its face, is very innocent, but at the same time it is very serious, and it is most desirable that the country should know why this measure happens to be here. The Minister of Justice has just told us he had no request from any of the attorneys general that this measure should be passed, and in this busy session, with war problems, taxation questions, and other serious matters engaging our attention, it is certainly of importance that we should know why the Minister of Justice turns aside to introduce measures calculated and intended to upset that well-established jurisprudence in regard to criminal matters which has existed in this country ever since Confederation. The history of this matter begins with certain things that occurred in the province of Manitoba. Prosecutions were initiated in that province against Sir Rodmond Roblin, a former attorney general of Manitoba, and the former provincial treasurer, the Hon. Mr. Caldwell, in connection with certain acts of a criminal character amounting to conspiracy against the public weal, for which indictments were laid. Those gentlemen came for trial before the Supreme Court of the province of Manitoba. Under the law of that province which had been in existence for many years, the number of jurors to be summoned on the regular panel at criminal sittings of the court had been fixed at forty-eight. I may say that is the same number as is provided for in my own province, and is a number, which, under ordinary conditions, has been found to be convenient in various provinces. From that panel of forty-eight men the jurors to try the particular case were to be chosen. After the first month of the sitting, if the sitting of any particular term of the court lasted over a month, the judge was empowered to summon a second panel of forty-eight, if he deemed it necessary. Then an amendment was introduced on account of the increase in population in the province, and the increased criminal business, and for other special reasons. This amendment left it to the discretion of a judge of the Court of King's Bench to summon a larger number of jurors to attend at the assizes in the first instance, if it appeared to him to be necessary or expedient. In other words, where the Attorney General of the province found that on account of the number of cases to be disposed of at a particular term of the court, and on account of the seriousness or important character of those cases, a question might be raised as to the personnel of the jury, he had power to make an application to a judge of the Court of King's Bench, and the judge might order the summoning of an additional forty-eight men in the first instance. Shortly after this was past, and the first jury panel was summoned for the assizes in November, 1915, and in March, 1916. If the trial of the ex-ministers had come on within the first month of the assizes, the total panel could only have been forty-eight. What did my hon. friend do? He threatened the province of Manitoba with disallowance of the Act which gave the Court of King's Bench of that province the right to summon 96 men instead of 48 at the beginning of the term. Similar legislation exists in every province of the Dominion, and the House will see how perfectly reasonable and natural it should be that under the discretion of the court having regard to the number of cases and their importance, the number of jurors to be summoned at the beginning of the term should be left to the discretion of the judge. The Minister of Justice, however, threatened to disallow that legislation, alleging that the passing of it was contrary to the provisions of the British North America Act. I read from a very full statement of this matter in the Manitoba Free Press, which quotes from the answer given by Attorney General Hudson to the statement of the Minister of Justice upon the subject—

Mr. DOHERTY: Would it not be fairer to read my statement rather than to infer my statement from the answer of the Attorney General?

Mr. MACDONALD: I regret I have not my hon. friend's statement. I would like to discuss it.

Mr. DOHERTY: It was laid on the table of the House some time ago.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister a copy of it?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have a copy of it, to which the hon. gentleman is quite welcome.

Mr. MACDONALD: The quotations which are made in this article were to the effect that the Minister of Justice spoke about the provisions of the Criminal Code being indirectly extended by means of local legislatior so as possibly to produce injustice, and mentions his intention "to regulate in a manner compatible with justice the right of the prosecution to require jurors to stand by"—a right which he complains is uncontrolled judicially. Mr. Hudson, in his reply to the Dominion Government, says:

> While he appreciates their solicitude on behalf of the prisoners now awaiting trial, the undersigned is of the opinion that the report of the Minister of Justice amounts to an attempt to interfere with the constitutional rights of the province, and while reflecting on the fairness of the prosecuting authorities in the province of Manitoba, entirely ignores the fact that the settling of the number of jurors to be summoned is left to the judges of the Court of King's Bench, and that they have no more power than has been given to and exercised by judges in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, the Yukon Territory and the North West Territories for many years.

That is the position which the Attorney General of Manitoba took in regard to my hon. friend's intimation that he proposed to disallow the passage of an Act which simply gave the judge power to direct the summoning of 96 men instead of 48. The Attorney General of Manitoba took the position that the number of men who were to compose the grand jury or the petty jury in any particular case is a matter which relates to the constitution of the court, and under the provisions of the British North America Act it became a matter which was under the control of the provincial government solely. As my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) pointed out, the Minister of Justice desisted from his threatened disallowance, and introduced this Bill instead. That is the history of the measure.

A great deal has been before the House arising from this question of maladministration in the province of Manitoba by certain provincial politicians, and I think my hon. friend is pushing the desire to assist his friends in that province beyond all reasonable limits when under those conditions, and at this time he undertakes to introduce legislation that would interfere with the whole course of criminal justice in this country, because of the fact that three political friends of his, charged with political crimes or misdemeanours, were on trial in the province of Manitoba.

That is what my hon. friend is doing by this legislation. In other words, instead of proceeding to disallow the legislation of Manitoba, the hon. gentleman undertakes to get at the question in a different way by declaring that the legislation being in existence and 96 people being summoned, the old law should be changed and the number of people who may be permitted to stand aside, to use the language which is well known to every hon. gentleman who has ever had anything to do with a criminal case in which a jury is empanelled, should be limited. My hon. friend proposes to restrict the right of the Crown to direct any number of jurors in excess of 48 to stand by unless the judge presiding at the trial upon a special case so orders. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has very aptly pointed out the difficulties under which crown counsel must be in reference to the question of asking jurors to stand aside. Every one who has had any experience, in either prosecuting or defending, knows how much judgment must be exercised by the crown counsel in dealing with a question of this kind. It is the proud boast of Canadians and Britishers that under the administration of our criminal law, the person to whom is entrusted the task of prosecuting an alleged criminal is not supposed to do so with that pertinacity, and that desire to secure a conviction at all hazards, which characterize the administration of criminal law in the United States. He is there to protect the interests of the people and where he obtains possession of information with regard to the possibility of certain persons who may be summoned on the jury panel having some sympathy one way or another 4 p.m. and exercises his judgment in the interests of the people, if he must submit, in the presence of the prisoner and counsel for the prisoner, to the judge the reasons why he should ask any particular persons to stand by, it will produce the great miscarriage of justice indicated by my hon. friend from St. John. Yet, the Minister of Justice wants to disarrange the whole procedure of the criminal administration in this country simply because he started out to disallow this Manitoba Act and he proposes to get at the same result in another way.

There is a question as to whether the Dominion Parliament has any right to deal with this matter at all. The question of the number of men to sit upon a jury, and thus to complete the organization of the court that is to pass upon the guilt or innocence of a prisoner, is a matter that goes to the constitution of the court itself. The court which is to finally determine this question of guilt or innocence is made up quite as much of the men who compose the jury, because they have to find on questions of fact, as it is of the judge who decides on questions of law. The appointment of a judge is a matter which is reserved to the federal power but the constitution of the criminal courts is unquestionably within the sole power of the Provincial Governments, the only limitation in regard to the constitution being upon the question of procedure. In all the provincial statutes there is to be found legislation determining the number of jurors who can sit upon a case and bring in a finding. The question of the constitution of the grand jury in any particular province is a matter which is fixed by a British statute. The Attorney General of Manitoba, in discussing with the Minister of Justice the question of interference by disallowance with the Manitoba legislation, urged that my hon. friend had no right to interfere with that legislation because the power to pass it was a matter which related peculiarly to the constitution of the court and was not a matter of criminal procedure purely. He pointed out to my hon. friend what Edward Blake said, when Minister of Justice, about legislation of similar character Mr. Blake gave his opinion with regard to the Manitoba Act of 1876 in these words:

> Many of the provisions of the Act appear to touch upon criminal procedure but it is to be observed that an act substantially the same passed by the Quebec Legislature in 1869 was left to its operation, being reported as free from objections.

That was the attitude assumed by Mr. Blake. The Minister of Justice would be well advised to leave untouched the legislation that has been passed by the provinces dealing with the number of jurors to be summoned and other conditions relating to the constitution of the jury, which my hon. friend is absolutely interfering with by this legislation. All over this country we have varying conditions as to population and other matters. It may be that in one province a certain rule will obtain and be absolutely satisfactory to the people while in another province situated in another part of the Dominion an entirely different rule might be invoked. There does not seem to be any question, having regard to the proper administration of justice, and seeing that the whole matter of criminal administration has been vested by the British North America Act, and by practice in the provincial attorneys general and the courts that the criminal law will be better administered through the courts and the legislatures which have to deal with the matter. The legislation proposed by my hon. friend is entirely unnecessary. I am surprised that at this session, at this time, in these days and after this House has had such a protracted sitting, we should be asked to turn aside from the consideration of serious and grave questions and devote ourselves to a proposition to overturn and disarrange the whole criminal procedure of this country simply and solely because my hon. friend's friends were on trial in Manitoba, and because my hon. friend's intimation that he proposed to disallow the Act was resented by the attorney general of the province of Manitoba and he is afraid to disallow it. Why should we, in this left-handed way, undertake to interfere with the well settled jurisdiction and practice in regard to juries standing aside for reasons of that kind?

Mr. MORPHY: I would not have risen to say a word in regard to this Bill were it not for the fact that there has been no explanation made of it. I shall not follow the line of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) but in the absence of any reason being shown why the Bill should go through, I have been struck with the total lack of necessity for it. Without going deeply into the matter, it strikes me that throughout Canada to-day there is absolute confidence in the judiciary, speaking at large. Most legal men have gone their ways professionally having the fullest confidence in the judiciary and in the exercise by the judiciary of a reasonable opinion.

This Bill has, in my opinion, a vicious feature. The prerogative of the Crown throughout the whole of Canada has been exercised fairly, and being so exercised, the public mind has been brought, I think, generally to the conclusion that the public right is fairly administered by the judges and by the Crown. To such an extent do I believe that to be true that I am prepared to say here that, instead of decreasing the prerogative and right of the Crown as this Bill decidedly attempts to do, that prerogative and right over criminal matters of trial before a jury should be increased rather than decreased. This Bill is going to tie the hands of the Crown, possibly in important cases which may go to the very fundamental root of the administration of justice, and such a condition might arise, if this Bill becomes law, that the judge, the jury, and the court are absolutely tied up in such a way that the jury, which ought to be constituted for a fair trial of a criminal indictment, cannot be so constituted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. MORPHY: The great difficulty, I think, as a member of this House, in voting upon a Bill of this kind is that I am forced to take just such views as I take from a careful reading of this three-line section, which apparently covers so little space, but means so much, involving essentially a radical change in the administration of justice, and especially since we are accustomed, upon the second reading of Bills in this House, to have some explanation. My remarks must be taken as expressed without having heard one syllable of a reason of any kind from the hon. Minister of Justice as to why he has introduced this Bill. I, therefore, reserve my right to vote upon this Bill as I see fit, upon receiving the reply of the Minister of Justice. If the reply is satisfactory to me I will support the measure, and if not, I will vote against it.

Mr. CURRIE: It seems a little out of place for an ordinary layman to express an opinion on a Bill of this kind, but it seems to me, after my experience politically, that there should be some limit placed on the number of jurors that the Crown, when seeking to attain a political end, should have the right to ask to stand aside without cause. I recollect one of the first trials of the character that occurred in Ontario, when Mr. Hartley Dewart, who is now one of the leading Liberals in the province of Ontario, was acting for the Crown in the case of Robert Gamey, and he called seventeen jurors to stand aside, in order that he might be able to get men on that jury that would give a verdict favourable to the Government that was then toppling to its fall and which, in a few months after, was driven from office by the people of the province. The same thing has occurred in the sister province of Manitoba. Men were ordered to stand aside until the Attorney General was sure that the men he was putting into the box would give a verdict, whether just or whether right or wrong, in favour of the Crown. I say unhesitatingly that the day has gone by, and it should go by, in this country, where any officer of the Crown can stand up, as if he were at another bloody assizes and cause every juror that is called to stand aside until he can get men who will give him a verdict, whether it is right or wrong. For that reason I approve of this Bill and am going to support it. It is a terrible thing to think a man for very little cause can be placed on trial for a political purpose, and virtually his honour and everything he has in the world jeopardized. Juryman after juryman is brought forward, and without the slightest reason being given the Crown says, "Stand that man aside." Why? Because the man might give a straight and honest verdict. If the Crown has an objection against a man acting as a juror, the Crown counsel should be prepared to stand up and say, "This man is a Tory and might not give a straight verdict." He should come out openly and say so. After a juror has been put in the box, the Crown can question him and say, "Have you made up your mind on this case?" That is when the Crown challenges for cause. And the Crown can question a man, and the Crown has lots of room left to see that a panel of jurors is established to try anybody in this country.

Supposing a man happened to be arrested at some future time for committing some act against the laws we have passed in this House, would it be fair to this man, for instance, if he were against conscription, that he should be placed on trial and that nobody should be allowed to sit on a jury unless the Crown was sure that he was in favour of conscription, and that he would soak that man. I say that this law is absolutely necessary. I will refer to my own experience, in my own election. Naturally when you go up against a man in a fight he takes his favourite weapon, the one he has been accustomed to fight with. If you are fighting with a man who has been digging ditches, he will take a shovel or a pickaxe, and when you fight a lawyer he starts out with a writ. In my election no less than fourteen bogus writs were fired at me, because I was running against a lawyer. None of them went to trial. This weapon has been used politically against people in Manitoba and elsewhere, and unjustly in many cases. It is time a curb was put on those bloody political assizes, and the limit of the Crown's jurisidiction should be settled by the people of this country and by this House. For that reason, I am in favour of this Bill and will fight for it, and I trust this House, and those who may have certain cases in their minds as possibilities, will see that there is a limit placed on the panel, so that the Crown cannot call three or four hundred jurors and tell them to stand aside, till they are sure they cannot get a man who has no idea in his head, except to soak the prisoner. I am in favour of the Bill, and I do not think there is any argument against it.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I desire to say—

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman has already exhausted his right to speak on this measure.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I will rise to a point of order and will discuss the point of order. This is what happened when you Mr. Speaker, were not in the Chair. I rose to ask a question—however, I see the minister agrees that I am in order, and I will proceed.

Mr. CURRIE: I have no objection.

Mr. BUREAU: Do not speak by the hon. gentleman's grace.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: No, I am speaking as a matter of right. The question involved in this Bill is a most serious one. It is against the law of the land, as I find it in the Criminal Code and in the Revised Statutes of Quebec especially, with which I am more familiar. It is the same principle all over the country, in every province. My hon. friend from North Simcoe is not in accord with what the law says as to the question of jurisprudence. Under section 3,437 of the revised statutes of the province of Quebec it is provided that except in the districts of Quebec and Montreal the panel shall consist of forty jurors, speaking either one or both languages; there is no distinction between the two. In the cities of Quebec and Montreal, sixty jurors are empannelled; I mean, outside of the twelve grand jurors. But in those two cities thirty jurors must be familiar with the French language and thirty with the English language. That is the reason the number has been raised from forty in all districts to sixty in those two districts, Quebec and Montreal. I have acted on both sides for a good many years and I know the position in which a Crown prosecutor is often placed. In the district of Three Rivers I acted as Crown prosecutor, specially appointed, in connection with two very noted murder cases, in both of which the verdict was quashed by the Court of Appeal and a new trial ordered. In those two cases much interest was evinced and partisans were cropping up among the people every day on one side or on the other. Everybody knows that challenge for cause may be exercised in any case provided the challenge is made immediately upon the juror being called. But that is not the case before the House to-day. When the first juror is called, if he is challenged for cause or challenged peremptorily by the defence, that ends his case. As far as the Crown is concerned, peremptory challenges are limited to four. The Crown has the privilege of setting aside as many jurors as it may think fit; that is the law under section 933 which we now propose to amend. Supposing out of the forty the Crown should challenge a certain number, either peremptorily or for cause. Here is where the view of the hon. gentleman who preceded me is not in accordance with the law and the jurisprudence. When the jurors who have been put aside are recalled, they are bound to serve, whether the Crown desires it or not. Important decisions, which I claim to be good law, bear out this principle.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the protection that I want to keep for the prisoners.

Mr. WILSON: But suppose out of the panel of forty, twenty are challenged for cause and a certain number are challenged peremptorily. You may reach a condition where you will not have any one set aside to be called. Then what will happen? Talesmen will have to be brought in. I see no reason why the Crown should be limited to forty, or even one hundred. In the murder cases to which I referred, no politics was involved; it was not during a time of election; it was not a question of Conservative, Liberal, or Nationalist. It was an extraordinary case in an ordinary time. We had to resort a couple of times to talesmen, sending out to the streets in the vicinity of the court house and securing men apparently qualified to serve as jurors. Any man is qualified as a talesman; you do not have to resort to the secret lists kept by the sheriff. I have known instances where it was found necessary to call 100 or 150 men in order to reach the number required by law. Of course, we have to presume, as has been said by an hon. member, that the people have the greatest confidence in the judiciary at large. But I have seen many cases where the Crown prosecutor has so far forgot himself as to become a partisan in the sense mentioned by the member for North Simcoe. However, I shall await the explanation of the minister that should have been given at first. En passant, it is not fair to the House that a measure of this importance should be launched without the minister's giving an explanation of the main reason at least why it is introduced.

Mr. DOHERTY: As to the criticism of my not having explained the Bill, I have to express my great regret that I am not as prompt a riser as the member for St. John City (Mr. Pugsley). The Speaker had just put the motion and was asking the usual question whether the motion should be adopted when the member for St. John rose.

Mr. CARVELL: May I intervene for one moment? I was not here when this debate started, but I am just told that there was a ruling—I do not understand why—that the Minister of Justice has the right to close the debate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He moved the second reading of the Bill without any explanation.

Mr. CARVELL: I should like to say a word on this subject, if the minister will allow me.

Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly. I have no desire to preclude anybody from speaking.

Mr. CARVELL: One of my friends told me that if the minister spoke I would be precluded from making any remarks.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister said something which requires a word from me. I hope he would not suggest that I had any thought of speaking before he explained the Bill. The Speaker put the question; the minister did not rise; thereupon I rose and made my remarks.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not say that everything was not done in good faith. I do not suggest that the hon. gentleman meant to preclude my speaking, but that is just what happened. As the Speaker was concluding, I did not rise as promptly as I might have, and the member for St. John rose. I do not suggest that he intended to preclude me; I quite understand that he supposed that I did not mean to speak. To be quite frank, it did not occur to me at the moment—for reasons which I will explain when I come to reply—that this measure called for explanation. Some things that have been said since make it rather clear to me, however, that it did.

Mr. CARVELL: Were it not for the peculiar circumstances under which this legislation was introduced, the minister might possibly have some argument in the matter. I had been hoping that he would give some reason for introducing this very important legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: May I not have an opportunity of at least making one observation on that subject? The Speaker has ruled that I cannot speak now without precluding everybody else from speaking. Therefore, if I am refraining from giving explanations, it is because I wish to afford an opportunity to any one desirous of speaking. If I might make a suggestion, would we not get this situation cleared up by allowing the Bill to go into committee, when I could give full explanations and every one could say everything he desired in reply? That is only a suggestion so that we may get out of the position in which I am suffering reproach for lack of explanation under the ruling that I must not explain without preventing any other hon. member from speaking.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a new doctrine to me that a minister of the Crown, in introducing an important piece of legislation such as this, is precluded from giving any reasons for its introduction. Why did the minister not give his reasons when he introduced the Bill? I was not there when this Bill came up this afternoon, but I know enough concerning parliamentary procedure to know that the Minister of Justice must have moved the second reading of this Bill this afternoon. Why did he not then state the reasons for bringing in this important legislation? He now complains that, by reason of a ruling of the Speaker, he is precluded from stating his reasons for introducing this Bill. The Minister of Justice is not such a child as that. He surely does not want to presume upon the credulity of the laymen of this House, let alone the lawyers—

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to the fact—

Mr. CARVELL: I protest against this interruption by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie).

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CARVELL: Order. Is the hon. gentleman rising to a point of order?

Mr. CURRIE: Yes. My hon. friend does not usually recognize points of order.

Mr. CARVELL: Not very often when they come from my hon. friend.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CURRIE: I want to point out to you, Sir, that the Minister of Justice had begun the final speech in reply when he was interrupted by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and for that reason the hon. member for Carleton has no right to indulge in a speech now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I should have asked if any other hon. member desired to speak. I did not do so. The hon. member for Carleton has the floor.

Mr. CARVELL: I was trying to point out to the Minister of Justice the position in which he finds himself. This poor gentleman has been on the bench of this country for many years; he has been in Parliament for nine or ten years; he has been Minister of Justice for six years, and yet he informs us that he has had no opportunity of explaining this remarkable piece of legislation, and he thinks we should not criticise it, but should allow the Bill to go into committee, and then we can discuss the details. The details and the principle of the Bill are one and the same thing, and when we have discussed, upon the second reading, the principle of the Bill, we shall not have much to say about the details in committee. There may have been cases in which possibly we do not require as much standing aside as has taken place in Canada upon certain trials, but the remarkable condition under which this Bill is introduced calls for protest from every hon. member in this House, no matter what his politics may be. As I did not know that this matter was coming up so early, I have not all the facts at my command; but, generally speaking, a criminal trial was held in Manitoba, and before the trial took place an amendment to the Jury Act of Manitoba had been passed by the provincial legislature giving the presiding justice the right, on the application of the law officers of the Crown, to order an additional panel or an extension of the panel. I am speaking generally now, but I am sure I am practically expressing the purport of that legislation. The Minister of Justice was called upon to disallow that legislation, and some correspondence took place between the minister and the Attorney General of Manitoba. Orders in Council were passed by both Governments and forwarded the one to the other. Finally, the Minister of Justice now asks the Parliament of Canada, in view of this correspondence and those Orders in Council, to amend the criminal law of Canada for the purpose of meeting one specific case which happened to arise in Manitoba and in which his political friends were interested. That is the whole question. It is not a question of whether this is necessary legislation or not. This is purely political legislation in accordance with the exigencies of the political party of which the minister finds himself a member. I am sorry for the minister, because I think he is a member of this Government who has tried properly to carry out the duties of his office as Minister of Justice, and I can quite understand my hon. friend did not have the face to stand before Parliament to-day and explain this Bill. That is the reason for his silence, rather than his lack of knowledge of the rules of procedure of the House of Commons.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am gradually acquiring courage.

Mr. CARVELL: To prove my statement, I will read to the minister the concluding paragraph of his report to Council of the 9th of December, 1916:

> The Provincial Government is responsible for the administration of criminal justice in the province, and may therefore enunciate its intention in the application of the amendment in question. Your Excellency's Government is likewise responsible for its policy in the promotion of such amendments to the Criminal Code as will tend to avoid injustice in the application of its provisions to existing conditions. The undersigned upon careful consideration of the situation introduced by the recent amendment to the local laws, deems it his duty to advise that the right of the prosecution to select jurors for criminal cases cannot, compatibly with the ends of justice, be enlarged in such a manner as might result from the application of section 46a to the project of securing a panel of petit jurors subject to the rule enunciated in section 933 of the Criminal Code; and therefore for the avoidance of doubt. and with a view to the application of the law in accordance with what he conceives to be the reasonable purpose, he would be disposed to consider the propriety of disallowance unless the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba be advised to give an assurance that his Government will see that, pending the consideration by Parliament of the provisions of the Criminal Code to which the undersigned has referred, the prosecuting authority shall not exercise any right to require jurors to stand aside at criminal trials in excess of that which would have been permissible if section 46a as enacted by the recent Act of Manitoba had not been passed.
> The undersigned accordingly recommends that a copy of this report, if approved, be transmitted to the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba, for the information of his Government, with a request for an early answer to the inquiry herein suggested.
> Humbly submitted,
> (Sgd.) Chas. Doherty,
> Minister of Justice.

I do not believe that you can find in the annals of legislation or jurisprudence in Canada such a document as I have read here, which I put forward as a copy of the memorandum submitted to the Privy Council of Canada, in which the minister says in effect to the Government of Manitoba: Important criminal trials are coming up, and unless you assure me that you will not apply the law as it stands to-day, I will disallow your legislation. That would have been bad enough if the necessity for this legislation existed to-day, because then the minister might have some reason for bringing it up. The necessity, however, has passed. We all know that the Attorney General of Manitoba has entered a nolle prosequi against the minister's friends. We know that they are not going to be tried. Therefore, this is no reason in the world why the law should be changed, and this legislation is brought in simply to save the faces of the Minister of Justice and of his political friends. It is a disgrace to the jurisprudence of Canada, and it is tampering with the dignity of Parliament, that we should be called upon to pass political class legislation of this kind. Let the matter stand for a year or two, and if there is any miscarriage of justice, let Parliament deal with it when there can be no imputation of political bias or political reasons.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What miscarriage can there be?

Mr. CARVELL: My right hon. friend asks what miscarriage there can be? I cannot conceive of any. What harm can there be if the Crown does stand aside a number of jurors? In a few days an important trial will come on in my province, which has been tried twice already and in which the juries have disagreed. I understand that the Attorney General has decided to try the case a third time. The matter is not of very great importance, but it is one which has aroused a great deal of prejudice in the city of St. John, and it will be a very hard matter to get a juror selected who is not prejudiced on one side or the other.

Suppose the Crown were limited as this Bill provides, and could only stand aside 48 jurors. I do not believe that the trial could go on. I do not know anything about the merits of the case; I have no idea whether the defendants are guilty or not; I have no opinion to offer on that at all. I do know, however, that it has taken up two weeks of the time of the circuit court of St. John, and it is a matter of so much public importance that the Attorney General and the presiding judge have decided to try the case a third time during the present term of the court. Suppose that this legislation passed and the right of the Crown to stand by was limited to 48. That would give 24 for each side, and I think it would absolutely prevent a fair trial.

The hon. member for Simcoe raised a question which showed, I am afraid, that the Minister of Justice is actuated by the same motives as my hon. friend, but that may be a violent assumption, and perhaps not quite fair to the minister. However, the hon. member for Simcoe, as usual, got his mind back to political matters. It is impossible for him to rise above a question of politics. He stated that there should be a limit to what the Crown could do for political purposes. I should like to know how many political trials there are in Canada in a year as compared with the ordinary trials in the administration of justice. I do not suppose there would be one in ten thousand. Therefore, when we change the criminal law of Canada, we are not changing it for political purposes. We are supposed to be enacting here a law for the better administration of justice in this country. Does the Minister of Justice believe that a change such as he suggests would tend toward a better and more honest administration of criminal law in this country? I would like the minister, when he replies—and I think he will be compelled to say something now before this legislation goes through—to say whether he can point in all his experience on the bench or at the bar, and with all his knowledge of the criminal trials of Canada, to a single case in any province where there was the least suspicion of unfairness, except possibly in some political trial. I have not had the experience in criminal matters that probably my hon. friend has had, but I have some knowledge of what has taken place in my own province, and I have never heard it suggested in my life that the Crown was actuated by any other motive than to see justice done. I believe that in every case the Crown gives the accused the benefit of every reasonable doubt. I also know that the amendment passed by the province of Manitoba was nothing new in this country, because practically every other province already had the law that Manitoba was enacting. By section 92 of the British North America Act it is provided that the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to > the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Were it not for those last words I would say that this Parliament had no jurisdiction to pass this legislation. These words, however, may place it within our jurisdiction; the language is so broad and comprehensive. We know that the provincial legislatures have invariably provided as to the constitution of the grand and petit juries, and their right to do so has never been questioned. I have before me the laws of my own province, which go very much further than the law of Manitoba, against which my hon. friend complains, and against which he is introducing this legislation. Section 14 of Chapter 126 of the Consolidated Statutes of New Brunswick, 1903, says:

> The presiding judge, or the judge appointed to preside, at any Circuit or County Court, or the Attorney General, may, at any time, direct the summoning of a grand or petit jury panel, or of a new grand or petit jury panel, or of an additional petit jury panel, and may direct that the number of petit jurors so to be summoned shall be any number not less than twenty-one in the Supreme Court.

That is, in our province, not only the presiding judge, but the Attorney General of the province also, has the power to direct the summoning of an additional jury panel. All that the legislation of Manitoba provided for was that the presiding judge should have that power, and yet my hon. friend complains against that. Two or three months ago I looked up the legislation of Ontario and of the other provinces, and I found that practically every province in Canada except Quebec has exactly the same law regarding juries as Manitoba passed, and against which my hon. friend is moving this amendment. I again ask the Minister of Justice to point to a single case in this country since Confederation where any person has claimed that an injustice has been done by reason of the Crown exercising this right of stand aside. But outside of that, I say that the circumstances under which this legislation has been introduced into this House and the correspondence which has passed between the two Governments regarding it, make it of such a character that it ought not to be pressed. It is against the dignity of Parliament; it brings the whole criminal law of this country into disrepute; it makes a political football of the enforcement of the criminal law. If people who find themselves in trouble in a province in Canada think they are going to have a hard time getting out of it, and are allowed to come to their political party in Parliament and say, "For God's sake change this law and put these fellows where they cannot prosecute us," what a condition of affairs we shall have in this country! Is the Minister of Justice willing to put himself in that position? I do not think so. I think before this legislation goes through the Minister of Justice will see that he is simply playing a game of politics, simply working for the benefit of men who at one time thought they were in trouble, but who now think they are clear, and who came to the minister as a political friend and asked him to do for them what they thought they could not get done by the courts of their native province. It is simply prostituting the powers of Parliament to pass this legislation. It is doing what this Parliament ought to be ashamed to do, and it is creating a precedent the end of which no man can foresee.

Mr. PROULX: I asked the Minister of Justice whether he had received any requests from the Attorney Generals of this country for this legislation and he answered in the negative. We are discussing a question of procedure. This Parliament has passed a substantive law, and the provinces fix the number of jurors to be summoned. In all the districts of Ontario the number of petit jurors summoned for each sitting of the General Sessions of the Peace is 48. I think there are very few instances in which it is necessary to have recourse to a larger number. I have never seen such a case in my district. If there are such instances, the attorneys general of the different provinces would know, and would be the proper persons to ask for this legislation. The Crown prosecutors make reports to the respective attorneys general, and if there were any necessity for this law surely the proper authorities would ask for it. The Minister of Justice has told us there have been no requests from attorneys general, and I submit there is no necessity for the adoption of this law.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not intend to say very much on this subject. It has been very well threshed out by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). I knew the Bill was on the Order Paper, and that it was liable to come up at any time, but I did not expect it would come up to-day. A constitutional question has been touched here as to whether this Parliament has a right to say anything about the number of jurors who may be appointed to sit in a case. The British North America Act contains something on the subject, in enumerating the exclusive powers of this Parliament, among which I find subsection 27 of section 91.

> The criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters.

That is, we have nothing to say about the constitution of the court, but we have power over procedure in criminal matters. I am very doubtful whether the number of jurors is a matter of procedure. My opinion would be that it is not. To lawyers procedure is the issuing of a writ, the number of days that must elapse between its issue and its service, the number of days for appearing, and so on. The manner in which proceedings are instituted in the criminal courts, and the notices that must be served on the parties accused, and how they are to be dealt with, constitute, to my mind, the procedure in the criminal court. I may be wrong, but as far as I am capable of judging I do not think the number of jurors that will sit in a court is a matter of procedure. It is a matter of substantive law.

Mr. NICKLE: The Bill does not touch the number of jurors.

Mr. DOHERTY: It only deals with the number of challenges.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand the effect of this to be that the number of jurors permitted to be examined or rejected is limited by this legislation. The Minister of Justice shakes his head, but according to the old story, perhaps he ought to know there is nothing in it without shaking it.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is wonderful how many things we ought to know, but do not.

Mr. McKENZIE: The view I take is that the limiting of the number of jurors is interfering with the constitution of the court, and as far as I can bring any judgment of my own to bear upon it, it is a matter for the local legislature entirely, and not a matter for this Parliament. I would suppose that a gentleman of the experience and wisdom of the Minister of Justice would have taken some warning from the difficulties in which he found himself either directly or indirectly some years ago, since he became Minister of Justice, in connection with being a little too lax about the bars of the penitentiaries in political cases. We had a famous instance before the House some four years ago, where a gentleman appointed by the Government of my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) who when he was to receive the seals of office and to be appointed, was found to be in jail. Rather an embarrassing position, for which something had to be done. The office had to lapse or go to somebody else, or the bars of this gentleman's imprisonment had to be removed. Appeal was made to the gentle heart of the Minister of Justice, or to those who were acting for him at the time, and, of course, between the two things—the lapsing of a political appointment, or the defeating of the ends of justice—the ends of justice had to be defeated, and the creaking door of the jail or penitentiary was thrown open, and out came this man. At the door awaiting him was his office from the Government of my right hon. friend. There was a great deal of trouble about this, and there was some very severe comment made upon it. The Minister of Justice manfully accepted responsibility, but gave us to understand that it was not himself but somebody else, a member of the Government, who was acting for him, who was responsible for allowing this man out. However, it was such a condition of things as should be a warning to the minister that he would not any more willingly interfere in matters political. Now, not satisfied with interfering with the jail, he began to tamper with the jury. This to my mind is most extraordinary, and I hope he will draw the line here, or the next thing we will find is some provision by which he can tamper with the evidence, and with the judges. It has been said by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), I believe, that we are exceedingly proud of our judges, and of the administration of justice in this country. I am getting to be somewhat of an old lawyer now, and I have had a good deal to do with criminal law. I never heard, in my province at all events, anybody complaining that representatives of the Crown, either the Attorney General or his representative, ever did anything but what was highly in the best interests of the very best administration of justice. I would suppose that laws of this character would be provided when some case arose calling for the interference of Parliament, and if the Minister of Justice can show there has been some case where there was a miscarriage of justice by reason of the condition of the law in Manitoba, or in any other province, I may change my mind absolutely. So far, however, I have not heard of any, and so far I will be quite willing to adopt the good old Tory doctrine of "leave well enough alone." The law has been going along first rate as it was, and I think it is dangerous to be tampering with it, particularly when there is no necessity. It would be a sad reflection to believe for a moment that the Minister of Justice is trying to trim the wind to suit the shorn lambs in Manitoba.

Mr. DOHERTY: It would be difficult work to trim the wind.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would be sad indeed, but when the lambs have escaped, I think the tempering of the wind could cease with their escape. It does seem, in the air, that there may be more lambs to be shorn. Perhaps the wind is being provided for them. I hope not. I hope the minister will maintain the high position a Minister of Justice should occupy in this country, and show that the balance in his hand shall be even, and that, as far as the administration of justice is concerned, he is blind to everything but the proper functions of his office.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I am surprised that a gentleman who has occupied the high position of a judge of the land should lend himself to the drafting of such a Bill, thereby degrading justice in our country. Every one knows the origin of this legislation. Some of the political friends of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) were brought before the bar at the criminal assizes in Manitoba. It was very difficult to find jurors to give a verdict in the very important cases that were brought before the court and the Government and Attorney General of Manitoba thought that the law should be amended so as to give the necessary power to find jurors, really to give justice to both the accused and society. We find the hon. gentleman intervening, at the instigation of whom I do not know, but whom everybody suspects. He comes before this House, without giving any explanation, and tries to pass legislation that reflects on the integrity of Canadian justice. I think this Parliament should at once mark its disapproval of such legislation and I shall move in a minute accordingly. It is strange, Mr. Speaker, that such complacency should be shown to the Manitoba politicians who have disgraced the public life of this country. They should be satisfied, as my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) said a moment ago, that a nolle prosequi should have had to be entered after efforts had been made to find a verdict against them. The other day I put a question to the Minister of Justice as to whether the goat, because poor Kelly was the goat, was still behind the bars at the Stoney Mountain penitentiary. I asked the minister if it was true that petitions had been received asking for the release of Kelly. I received from my hon. friend an answer which makes me believe that before the general election is over Mr. Kelly will be scot free in Manitoba. In order that the public may know what kind of a game is being played, not only with politics, but with such a sacred thing as justice I shall move:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted:
Bill No. 97, an Act to amend the Criminal Code respecting Jurors, be read this day six months.

House divided on the amendment of Hon. Mr. Lemieux, that the Bill be read this time six months hence, which was declared lost on the following division:

Mr. MACDONALD: I thought my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) was in the House. I was paired with the hon. member, and I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was paired with the hon. gentleman from Lunenberg (Mr. Stewart). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I was paired with the hon. gentleman from South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. CLEMENTS: I was paired with the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. BRADBURY: I was paired with the hon. gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. Cruise). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was paired with the hon. gentleman from Queens Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy). I did not know he was in the House. I should not have voted.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the measure of necessity for explanation be the extent of misunderstanding existing then most assuredly hon. gentlemen on the other side have demonstrated that explanation of this Bill was necessary. If it had not been for that extraordinary misunderstanding which their speeches have evidenced I would have thought that explanation was not necessary. It is said that in the tail is the poison. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) was pleased to be the tail, and to inject the poison of imputation upon myself—condensed from suggestions of some other hon. gentlemen—which I venture to believe has had nothing in view but the necessity of trying to convert into a means of creation of political ammunition a measure intended simply to protect the rights of our citizens before the courts of the country, and to see that they were placed under the guarding protection of the court itself, which we have been reproached for not respecting. Hon. gentlemen and distinguished lawyers have spoken of this measure as changing the law as it operated throughout the country up to this date. In certain provinces the right of the Crown to challenge had been limited to a lesser number than forty-eight by legislation fixing the number of the panel, and that provision will be in force after this law shall have been passed. Hon. gentlemen from those provinces have not hesitated, with others who come from provinces where that limitation has not existed, to complain about this extraordinary change in the law that is going to degrade the administration of justice. The member for Laval (Mr. Wilson) a most distinguished practitioner in the criminal courts, and the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) a former Solicitor General of this country, are of the opinion that a measure that will cause the administration of justice throughout the Dominion to be carried on as it has been carried on in their province and my province as long as I can remember, is a measure to degrade the administration of justice. Hon. gentlemen, would I think, do well to ascertain what the law is before they undertake to pronounce to what degree it is going to be degraded.

This Bill will create a uniform rule throughout the Dominion of Canada in regard to a matter of procedure in criminal cases which, admittedly, is a matter within the legislative competency of this Parliament. Hon. gentlemen say that it will degrade the administration of justice. Before the existence of the legislation enacted by Manitoba—which is not being affected in any way by this legislation—four out of the nine provinces of the Dominion limited the number of jurors that could be summoned upon a panel. In Quebec, as the member for Laval has pointed out, the general limitation is to forty, a lesser number than forty-eight, to which we propose to limit not the number of jurors, but the number of challenges. This legislation proposes to limit simply the number of challenges.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. C. A. WILSON: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: I wonder if my hon. friend has read the Bill?

Mr. WILSON: The Bill reads:

Provided that the Crown may not direct any number of jurors to stand by.

That is not a limitation of the number of challenges.

Mr. DOHERTY: This legislation proposes to limit the number of stand-bys, but not to affect the number of jurors to be summoned. My using the word "challenge" was a slip.

Mr. CARVELL: In his notification to the Manitoba Government the minister said that unless they would agree not to enforce their legislation as to the number of jurors to be summoned, he would be compelled to disallow the legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall come to that and I shall give the truthful explanation. Although he once in a while speaks strongly, when the exigencies of the case require it, I look upon the member for Carleton as a fair-minded man and a competent lawyer. I am sure that the reasons for the proposal of this legislation will appeal to my hon. friend as they should appeal to any man desirous of seeing that absolute fairness is maintained in the administration of the criminal law as between the Crown and the accused. This legislation puts in the hands of the court the protection of that absolute fairness, yet it is suggested that the measure is intended to reflect upon the judiciary of this country. But the measure leaves the judge to determine the number of challenges, just as the legislation of the province of Manitoba left to him the determination of the number of jurors to be summoned. This legislation is not defeating the legislation of Manitoba; it is simply carrying that legislation out to its logical consequence. The legislation of Manitoba is that the judge is the proper person to determine the number of jurors; this legislation is that under those circumstances the judge is the proper person to determine the number of stand-bys that the Crown is to have. It was brought to my attention that the legislation of Manitoba had created a situation where a judge might order a panel of a very large number. I have never suggested, and I do not now suggest, that that legislation in itself was either unconstitutional or undesirable—mark you, I say in itself. My attention having been drawn to the subject by the legislation of Manitoba, I ascertained that there existed in five other provinces legislation of the same kind under which the panel might be made to consist of an indefinite number. Again I say that I do not find in that any evil—in itself. I am free to confess, however, that that condition of the law came to me as a novelty. I, like the member for Laval, and the member for Rouville, come from the province in which, according to the member for Rouville, the administration of justice has been degraded from time immemorial because the number of stand-bys was limited through the fact that the number of jurors that could be summoned as a panel was fixed by law.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend surely does not mean to intimate that in Quebec the Crown does not have the same right of standing jurors aside as it has in other provinces, and surely there must be some provision in Quebec to provide for an additional panel if an additional panel becomes necessary.

Mr. DOHERTY: Undoubtedly.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, what is the difference between Quebec and the other provinces?

Mr. DOHERTY: I said that the number of stand-bys was limited in Quebec as it was previously to its recent law limited in Manitoba, and as it still is limited in two of the other provinces. It was limited by the fact that the provincial legislation made the panel a fixed number. Take it for instance in the district of Montreal. I am not suggesting that the Criminal Code limits the number of challenges in Quebec more than anywhere else, but I am pointing out what is the practical working of the combination of the law in a province which limits the number of the panel, and the provision of the Criminal Code as it now stands.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not acquainted with Quebec law, but there surely must be in the Quebec statute some provision authorizing a panel in excess of forty under certain conditions.

Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly, there is. That is to say, you can summon another panel, but you will not take the two panels and add them together and go on "standing by" indefinitely.

Mr. CARVELL: What is the difference?

Mr. DOHERTY: You cannot do that. You have a panel of jurors. There they sit —those sixty men. Under the Criminal Code, the Crown may stand by every one of them, but after it has stood by sixty men, then you go back again and call those same jurors, and unless the Crown can assign special reasons, then the man that the Crown stood by half an hour ago, sits on that jury. The effect of permitting an indefinite number of jurors to be summoned is that the court may for perfectly justifiable reasons say: There is a tremendous quantity of business before this court at this term; I will order the summoning of 250 jurors. That may be perfectly right and absolutely justifiable, but what is the effect that it produces if our Criminal Code be left to stand as it is? It produces this effect: That the Crown, without the assignment of any reasons, may stand by 250 men. I do not say that the Crown will abuse that power in any particular case, but I do say that that is an exorbitant power to put into the hands of the representative of the Crown. That is the evil, and may I venture to say to hon. gentlemen who have been so severe about the degradation of the law, that from a very early period it has been pointed out as being one of the methods by which a dishonest or even a zealous Crown prosecutor may deprive the citizen of the practical benefit and advantage of being tried by a jury, tried by his peers impartially selected.

We have to protect and to surround the subject with such safeguards as will withdraw from the representatives of the Crown, instruments susceptible of being abused to the unfair detriment of the accused. What is trial by jury for? Trial by jury exists as the bulwark of the liberties of the individual citizen as against possible abuse at the hands of the Crown. If you put, as the condition of this combined legislation does, into the hands of the Crown the power of taking a large body of individuals and "standing by" an indefinite number, you put into the power of the Crown to select and find for itself jurymen that the Crown may believe are absolutely to be relied upon to produce a verdict to its own liking. Perhaps it might be more correct to say that the more you increase the number of men from whom the Crown can, by this process of elimination, select the twelve that it wants, the more you increase the opportunity for the Crown to find a jury exactly to its liking.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What becomes of a juror who has been ordered to stand aside?

Mr. DOHERTY: The juror who is ordered to stand by, stands by. He does what he is told. He does not go away; he stays until called.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Until when?

Mr. DOHERTY: Until the panel is exhausted, and then the Crown begins over again and will have to call that juror.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: And then he goes on the jury.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. That is why I say that if you summon sixty jurors the time will come a great deal quicker when the Crown will have to take the man it "stood by" than if you summon 250 jurors.

Mr. C. A. WILSON. No.

Mr. DOHERTY: If your panel be 250 jurors, as it may be, supposing I am the first man of the 250 and I am ordered to stand by, the Crown will have to call, and stand by the other 249, if it likes, before it will have to come back and call me again. Therefore, if I am the first man of sixty the chances of the prisoner to compel the Crown to call me, notwithstanding its "stand-by," are immensely greater than they would be if I am one of 250. The matter is so obvious that I need not elaborate it. That was the situation created not alone by the legislation of Manitoba as combined with our provision in the Criminal Code, but that was a situation that existed as regards five of the nine provinces before the legislation in Manitoba.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister say that in any province in the Dominion, at the opening of any court, there have been provided 250 jurors who might be stood aside?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know of a case in which there were 250 jurors. What I am pointing out is that the legislation makes it possible for that number to be summoned. Why is this discretion given to the court? I am making no complaint against legislation which empowers the judge to summon the necessary number of jurors, because there may be conditions that require it, as in the particular case that was referred to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says that discretion is given to the court. Is any discretion left with the court when their powers are limited by reason of special cause having to be shown?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is discretion in the determination whether there exists the special cause.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not discretion; it is finding as to the fact.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman will observe that this clause does not define any particular fact or facts which are to be found as justifying it; it leaves that for the court itself. I think my hon. friend will realize, if he thinks it over, that he did not grasp what the requirements of special cause are. He spoke as if special cause meant special cause why an individual should be set aside. What the law requires, is special cause why in a particular case the Crown should be given greater latitude than 48.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What would be that cause?

Mr. DOHERTY: I was coming to that. The hon. gentleman, in giving an illustration where this would work badly, described a case providing precisely the special cause that would justify the change. He spoke of a case where on account of strong public feeling there might be very great difficulty, indeed, in getting a fair and impartial jury. He thought there might be danger of not getting a fair trial if the number was limited to 48. Now the provisions about extending the number are pretty much on the same footing as the provisions under which a court can order a change of venue.

Mr. CARVELL: Then what is the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the present legislation a judge, even if he thought it was an outrage and there was no reason for it, would have to sit back impotent on the bench and see the Crown stand by 150 men. This legislation is to place in the power of the judge the opportunity of seeing that no abuse occurs, and I may say that in endeavouring to give power to the judge to prevent abuse I have this afternoon brought on my own devoted head a torrent of about as unjustifiable abuse as I think it ever was my misfortune to listen to. There is no use in my protesting what my motives are.

Mr. CARVELL: You are on record.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are minds so constructed that if there are facts and circumstances that make it possible that a man might have acted on a vile motive, those minds immediately conclude to the vile motive.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who is the minister hitting at now?

Mr. DOHERTY: I say that the viler the mind the more readily does it conclude, to the vile motive, and I leave it to hon. gentlemen opposite to decide as between themselves the respective degrees of vileness of motive that have been attributed to me, and then they can determine for themselves the respective degree of vileness of their own minds.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister is waking up.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have heard some talk about the administration of justice. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is going to be possible for a Minister of Justice in this country to endeavour to put before Parliament the measures which in his judgment are necessitated in order that justice may be done if, when he does that, whether he be right or wrong, he has to run the gauntlet of this sort of imputation? May I ask you what difference it makes whether my motives be as vile as even the vilest of minds can conceive, or whether they be worthy of the purest of celestial beings? Either this measure is right, or it is wrong. I am prepared to meet hon. gentlemen upon the question of whether it is right or wrong, and I am prepared to ask hon. gentlemen, who are proud to describe themselves as Liberals, what fault they can find with this measure. Of course, they can find faults in me—lots of them. Anything that their minds may conceive as discreditable they can get up here and impute to me, and, with all respect, it leaves me pretty indifferent.

But I ask them to deal with this measure. What is the matter with the measure? Do they think it desirable that we should maintain a condition which puts into the hands of the representatives of the Crown this exorbitant facility of finding a jury just to suit themselves? Let me in all frankness point out that to-day at all events there are no political friends of mine at stake. Of course, there have been things in the course of my not very prolonged political career that have been of a nature to make me sick—there is no other way in which I can describe it—and the performance this afternoon is the worst of all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I could not hear what the minister said.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman desires that I should repeat it—I said that there had been things in the course of my not very long political career which I can describe in no other words than to say that they had made me sick, and I have experienced nothing that has been more of that nature than what has taken place here this afternoon. We, the representatives of the people of Canada—most of those who have spoken being distinguished members of their profession—are here concerned with the question whether a certain method of procedure is or is not calculated to give to the citizen the full protection intended to be given to him by the system of trial by jury. And what have we discussed, or rather, what has been put forward as a subject of discussion? Hon. gentlemen opposite have vied with each other in finding the vilest motive they could impute to the Minister of Justice. If for one moment we assume that every motive that was attributed to me actually existed, how much further are we advanced upon the question whether it is a proper thing that the Crown should have this extraordinary and exorbitant power of control over the complexion of the jury that is to try the citizen?

I have said that this notion was not born in my brain—though I must say that the thing coming to me, a man who has grown up under a system where the Crown could challenge but 60, because the panel at it disposal was 60——

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Is there any country within the British Empire that has limited the number that can be stood aside? My information is that for centuries back the privilege of the Crown in this respect has not been restricted to 48 or any other number.

Mr. DOHERTY: May I give the hon. gentleman a little history? It is a pity we should have to go so far back to determine whether it is desirable or not——

Mr. CARVELL: It is an important change in the criminal law of the country.

Mr. DOHERTY: Have I not made it clear yet that as regards the operation of that section of the Criminal Code it did, up to the enactment of this legislation by Manitoba, operate one way in four provinces, and operate in a different way in five provinces? What we are doing here—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did it not in all the provinces? Did not the right to "stand by" extend to the whole panel, whatever it was?

Mr. DOHERTY: It extended to the whole panel, whatever it was, and it extended no further than the panel. Therefore, in provinces that limited the number of the panel, the number of stand bys was limited to the number of the panel. In provinces that provided for an indefinite panel, you had a situation that wherever the judge thought a large number of jurors should be summoned, perhaps because there was an extraordinary number of cases, the practical result was that in each one of that large number of cases, the Crown had this indefinite advantage at least up to the full extent of the number the judge might admit the summoning of, because of this right of stand by.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is wrong in that? It is the panel.

Mr. DOHERTY: But the question is, is it desirable that for the purposes of "stand aside" the Crown would have the right to apply it to an exceedingly large number? Just in proportion as you increase the number of the panel you increase the advantage to the Crown resulting from "stand by." This custom of "stand by" grew up originally as an abuse. That is the way it found itself in the common law. One of the things that was done after the revolution of 1688 was to seek to curb the right of the Crown to control the nature of the jury, and whereas previously the Crown had had practically an indefinite right of challenge, it was by legislation absolutely limited to the right of challenge for cause, and practically the way the "stand aside" came into existence was that the Crown said "well, I can only challenge for cause, but I will stand you aside until I make up my mind." That was the origin of it, and this original abuse came to be accepted and to be recognized, but it was, even at that early date, recognized as a tremendous engine of possible abuse. It is material to the answer to my right hon. friend's question that I should say that while you could not find a statute fixing the number of the panel, nevertheless the accepted panel—the panel that in practice was summoned—was forty-eight jurors. That is the way Manitoba got her forty-eight, and, as an hon. gentleman from Ontario pointed out this afternoon, it is so in Ontario, where, though by statute the judge may order an indefinite number, the practice is to summon forty-eight.

Mr. CARVELL: We have only twenty-one in New Brunswick.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What is the number in Manitoba?

Mr. DOHERTY: The number in Manitoba was forty-eight, until this legislation was enacted; that is to say, it was forty-eight in the Winnipeg district and a smaller number in the other districts of the province. I do not recall the exact number.

Mr. CARVELL: Thirty-six.

Mr. DOHERTY: That was the situation up to the enactment of the legislation in Manitoba. Four provinces limited the number of the panel, and our Criminal Code, working in view of that provincial legislation, in effect provided the number of "stand bys" up to forty-eight, or up to sixty in Quebec, and left the Crown under the obligation, after that many had been made, of taking the men that were on the panel, unless it could indicate a reason why they should not be taken. Under the law of the provinces that permitted an indefinite number, whenever a judge ordered an extraordinarily large number—and he might do it for perfectly legitimate reasons—by the simple combination of the two laws the Crown that in Quebec could "stand by" sixty at most, and in Manitoba, up to that time, could "stand by" forty-eight at most, and that in other provinces could "stand by" a lesser number, became by the change of the legislation—whenever a province changed its legislation in that sense—entitled to "stand by" whatever number the court had seen proper to summon because it had a large number of cases to deal with. Now, in all fairness—I leave it to all fair men in this House, lawyers or laymen, as to whether that is a desirable situation in a country which boasts of its inheritance of British institutions, and boasts of none more than its inheritance of the system of trial by jury.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the trouble now?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman does not see the trouble yet?

Mr. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: The existence of that state of affairs was something that caused me to believe that the essence of the advantage of trial by jury is destroyed when you leave in force a system which makes it possible for the Crown to find its own jurors. I would not wait until somebody had come to me and said, "There is a man who suffered from a possible injustice; now is your time to remedy it." There is an old adage about the folly of locking the stable door after the horse is gone. I thought I would lock the stable door while the horse was still there; and that is the very head and front of my offending.

Mr. CARVELL: The horse was there when you started to lock the door, but he got out.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not aware of what horse the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does the minister refer to?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have done with any discussion on questions of motives. I leave the hon. gentlemen to their vile motives—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DOHERTY: —to get along together as well as they know how. We cannot, in this civilized Canada, in Parliament, discuss a question of what is the best system of trial by jury without hon. gentlemen seeking to interrupt even explanations by coming back to the old stories.

Mr. McKENZIE: I rise to a point of order, because it is well that a precedent should be established. I do not think it is competent for a member of Parliament to speak of his fellow members in debate in this House as having vile motives. The minister says we are left to our vile motives. I want to know if that is permissible in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is six o'clock, I shall give my ruling when the House resumes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I said that hon. gentleman had attributed to me vile motives.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I am mistaken hon. gentlemen will correct me. I congratulate the hon. member for St. John on his devotion to the exactitudes.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: At six o'clock the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) rose to a point of order with respect to the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice. As I understood the position and the language of the hon. minister at that time, it was that he was complaining that motives had been attributed to him by some hon. members, and that if they could be properly attributed to him such action on his part would be vile. But, in order to make it perfectly clear, I have examined the transcript of the Hansard reporters' notes, and I find the following:

Mr. Doherty: I have done with any discussion on questions of motives. I leave the hon. gentlemen to their vile motives.

In my judgment the language is not parliamentary, and ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. DOHERTY: I bow to your ruling, and withdraw the particular words as they appear in Hansard, with all the greater pleasure, because I had intended to say what you, Mr. Speaker, stated that you understood I intended to convey. I notice that the words appear in Hansard "vile motives". In speaking of their "vile motives," I may say that all that I had in mind was the motives they attributed to me, and if any hon. gentleman thinks it of sufficient importance, if he will look back to what I did say, he will see that I had imputed no motives to anybody. What I intended to say was that I had done with this question of motives, the question being the motives attributed to myself, and that I was quite willing to leave the hon. gentlemen who had imputed these vile motives to me, which I may say they had elaborated, out of their own inner consciousness, to digest the vileness attributed to me as best they might. At any rate, perhaps they may find it more easy to digest, as we have had our dinner.

If we may come to the real question which, while it is important—I should not have introduced it if I had not thought it was important—it is certainly very different from what hon. gentlemen seem to understand it to be. I stated before the House rose at six o'clock that the idea that the extension of a panel to a very large number, carrying with it, as it would if our law be not amended, the right to "stand by" a very large number, was of a nature to work injustice to the accused, is not original with me. I have before me the history of things that happened in the past, and I will cite what Hallam says in his Constitutional History. He is dealing with the difficulties that arose in the fair and just application of the system of trial by jury, and he points out that prior to the revolution it had been the practice of the Crown, not merely to stand aside but to absolutely challenge, without giving any reasons, any number of jurors, and that this situation was found to be so abused that there was express legislation, even under Charles I, restricting the right of the Crown to challenge, to the right to challenge for cause. Even under that legislation the Crown sought to enlarge its privileges by claiming to reserve its challenges until all the panel had been called, and that is the origin of the "stand by." And, though, at the outset, it was merely a claim on the part of the Crown justified by no provision of law, and in fact running counter to the special provision which prohibited the Crown's right to challenge to the challenge for cause, it was nevertheless persisted in until, from being an abuse at the outset, in virtue of the continued practice it was accepted and acquiesced in. Speaking of the methods which, even after the revolution, were resorted to in order notwithstanding the provisions of the law to give undue advantage to the Crown, he points out two means by which the Crown sought to control the trials, namely by the sheriff selecting a panel known to be favourable, or by punishing the jurors by fine or imprisonment if they failed to give a desired verdict. After the revolution, a third means was employed, namely of enlarging the panel, in some cases to more than 200, and making use of the Crown's right of standing aside in order to pack the jury. Prior to the revolution the panel appears to have been limited in practice to forty-eight. Then he goes on to speak of the right of challenge by the defence, with which we are not concerned. By the common law, the King might challenge peremptorily without being limited to any number. This was regarded as unfair to the subject, and it was enacted by 33 Edward I, chapter 4, that none should challenge for the King except for cause certain, and this also is re-enacted by 6 George IV, chapter 50. The practice, as I mentioned a little while ago, appears to have grown up for the Crown to withhold its reasons for challenging until the whole panel was exhausted. A strenuous effort was made in several cases to upset this practice, and to compel the Crown to assign a cause at the time of challenging, but without success. The case of O'Coigly and others is notable in this regard. Counsel there pointed out that the authority for this practice was Staunford, who had set it up in his Pleas of the Crown. Hale and Blackstone appear to have adopted this opinion, and the practice became general.

There is the origin of the "stand aside." It originated in what, at the time of its beginning, was certainly an abuse, but it seems to have been acquiesced in and accepted, and I am not criticising—although I might desire to criticise it—so long as its scope is kept within definite limits, as it is and was in our law in all these provinces where a limited panel is provided. The attempt by the Crown in any province to resort to the means which I have already referred to as having been employed on the part of the Crown to control trials, namely, the enlargement of the panel in some cases to more than 200, I do not interfere with, but this latter consequence of it, making use of the Crown's right of standing aside in order to pack the jury, will not be permitted. It is not necessary, in order to justify this legislation, as I was called upon to do, to point out cases where that power has been abused. It is, in my judgment, sufficient that it should appear, as it clearly does appear, that the condition of the two legislations as they stand—the provincial legislation, not only in Manitoba but in four of the other provinces, and our Criminal Code legislation—combined, make that abuse possible. In my judgment it is the duty of one in my position, when it is brought to my attention, that under existing laws there is room for abuse, to look for and apply a remedy.

Moreover, I desire again to call attention to the fact that this legislation does not propose absolutely to limit the right of the Crown to stand aside; it leaves that right absolute up to the number of forty-eight jurors. Inasmuch as under the existing law the number may be very much greater—I am informed that in one instance the number was 150; that may have been justified by the exigencies of the business before the court—this legislation simply puts under the control of the court the right of the Crown to proceed to "stand by" a greater number than forty-eight. It seeks to correct the above that is possible under existing conditions, but not by absoltuely withdrawing the exercise of the right of standby for a greater number. I quite recognize, as pointed out by the member for St. John, that there may be conditions and circumstances under which the right ought to be exercised for a greater number. But under this legislation, that is left to be determined not by the Crown alone but by the judge who sits there as arbiter to see that everything is conducted fairly between the Crown on the one side and the accused on the other. This legislation merely throws an additional safeguard around the liberty of the subject, and does it without imposing any undue restriction upon the Crown. The Crown, when it has reason for doing so, can always address itself to the judge; and if we all have that confidence which hon. gentlemen have expressed in the judiciary, we may all feel assured that the judiciary in dealing with an application of that kind will not lean unfairly against the Crown.

Something has been said about the fairness of Crown prosecutors. In my experience I have found that they have sought to act fairly. But I am free to admit also that in the course of my practice I have observed cases where I thought that there was a perfectly honest but still an undue zeal on the part of a representative of the Crown. These things may happen. The men who represent the Crown are human, as other men are. I think any lawyer will concede that one is apt to be carried a little further when he is interested in a case, whether it be for the prosecution or for the defence, than he would where he was not charged with the maintaining of one side rather than another. No fair Crown prosecutor, I am sure, will complain because he is limited in his number of " stand bys " to the number that the judge may think fair and just under the circumstances. After all that has been said this afternoon about motives, it may not be unfair to any one to say that all of us are sometimes under the influence of very honest and very strong convictions; under the influence of passion that may be aroused under particular circumstances; and disposed, if left with absolute power, to exercise that power to its extreme limit. While I fully recognize the fairness of the body of Crown prosecutors in general, still, under certain conditions, popular passion in a community may be aroused to a great height over some question—perhaps a political question; perhaps a question where racial feeling plays a large part; perhaps a question where religious prejudice plays a large part. As one member of that community the Crown prosecutor is liable to be swayed by those feelings just as many absolutely honest men are swayed by them. What can be the objection, under those conditions, to putting such restraint upon the Crown prosecutor that he shall not be entitled to go on indefinitely ordering men to " stand by " with the result that he is enabled, where the panel is very large, practically, in the words of Hallam, to pack the jury? Why should he not be subjected to the check of submitting to the judge the question whether he should exercise that power beyond the number to which he would have been limited in Manitoba before this legislation; beyond the number which at common law by practice—not as a matter of law—was the usual number of a panel; beyond the number which in the province of Quebec and in two otner provinces he is to-day limited? I ask the hon. gentlemen for the moment to forget this discussion about motives. Let them, if they like, remain with their belief that my motives are very bad; but let them look at the law. Are they going to vote against this additional protection to the liberty of the subject—which in no manner hampers the Crown or its representatives in the performance of their duties—which leaves it to the court to determine when and under what circumstances the right of "stand-by" shall be exercised beyond the number to which it was limited, though not by the terms of the Criminal Code, both at common law by the practice and under the statutes of all those provinces which fixed a limit to the number of jurors? I think the amendment speaks for itself.

I should like to say one word about the interchange of correspondence between this Government and the Government of Manitoba. It is not absolutely germane to the question whether this Bill shall be read the second time, but it may throw some light upon my awful motives. As the matter has been gone into I should like to rectify some statements that have been made, in good faith, I am sure, but as the result of imperfect examination of that correspondence. Those statements, I think, found some justification in the unfortunate misapprehension on the part of the Government of Manitoba of what was intended by the first communication addressed to them. What brought to my attention—let me admit, to my knowledge; because I had not known of it before—the fact that under any of the provincial legislations the evil that I have pointed out was possible, was the legislation of Manitoba which introduced, so far as that province was concerned, this power on the part of the judge indefinitely to extend—subject, of course, to his discretion—the number of jurors to be summoned. As I said before recess, I lived my life, and I practised my profession, and I sat upon the bench, in a province where no such abuse could be possible, because we had a fixed, limited panel of jurors, and I frankly admit that when, with my preconceived notions, I read that statute of Manitoba I was shocked. I thought that legislation was going to create a possibility such as I have pointed out, and, although it may be an awful confession of ignorance to say that one does not know all the laws of all the provinces of this Dominion, I did not know that similar legislation existed elsewhere.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister never heard of any evils resulting from it in those four provinces?

Mr. DOHERTY: The fact that the possibility I have pointed out should exist is, in my judgment, a very grave evil. I do not think that we should leave the security, which should be assured to the subject by the system of trial by jury, fairly administered, open to possible abuse. I have not investigated to ascertain whether there have been abuses in the other provinces, but so far as my inquiry goes—and it has been confirmed by what has been said here this afternoon by hon. members from other provinces—I find that, while the law left it open to fix a very large number of jurors, in practice, that has not been done, and therefore the opportunity for any abuse in the exercise of the right to stand by has not, to my knowledge at all events, and from the information I have gathered this afternoon from hon. members familiar with conditions in other provinces, arisen. But I think we ought to make that abuse impossible. I was confirmed in the view that we ought to do that by what is found in the citations I have made. I do not contend that there was on the part of the province an intent to work things unfairly. I have pointed out an evil that may result. May I point out a good that may result? While I was shocked at the possibility of that abuse happening, it did not occur to me that that legislation had been passed in Manitoba having in mind the provisions of the Criminal Code and for the purpose of enabling the Crown to do anything unfair in criminal cases. If hon. gentlemen will read my report to Council which was communicated to the Manitoba Government, they will see that I was at pains to point out and to recognize that the Provincial Government might perfectly properly, for its own purposes, think it desirable to create this power of summoning a larger number of jurors. But I proceeded to call their attention to what might happen in criminal cases, when they took place, by reason of the provision in the Criminal Code. I did go on to indicate what in my judgment were the objectionable features of that possibility. I concluded by suggesting—and I believed that all I had to do was to make the suggestion to get the assurance—that any steps on my part looking towards a consideration of the question of disallowance might be obviated by the assurance, which I thought would come without a moment's hesitation, that the Crown in Manitoba did not purpose using that law in that way and for that purpose. I do not want to criticise the Government of Manitoba. I did not think they had passed that legislation for that purpose; I do not think so now, and I never suggested that I did. I did not, as was stated this afternoon, threaten disallowance if they did not give that assurance. I said that, is such an assurance were given, it would not be necessary to consider the question of disallowance. That represented absolutely what was in my mind, and I had not given consideration as to whether the legislation ought to be disallowed or not. The only reason for mentioning that was that it was the only remedy open if one on consideration came to the conclusion that it was necessary to exercise it, and was the only matter in connection with which it was open for me to communicate with the Government of Manitoba. Much to my surprise, and also to my regret, the Manitoba Government seemed to take this representation as implying some imputation upon their good intentions. They furthermore seemed to have conceived that my action was based upon some suggestion of unconstitutionality of their legislation. Not only did I not take the position that it was unconstitutional, but if I mistake not I even said that my action did not rest upon any such contention. While that is true, I want to say that it is not as absolutely clear to me as it is to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that the legislation is constitutional. I think there is room for discussion as to whether the number of jurors forms part of the constitution of the court or is properly meant to be governed by the Parliament that has authority over criminal procedure. I did not, however, advance an opinion upon that subject, and I am not doing so now. If I had thought that was unconstitutional, there would be no reason in the world for me to suggest disallowance, because if it were unconstitutional, anybody affected by it had his perfect remedy before the courts. Therefore, I did not rest my position upon the unconstitutionality of the legislation. But I may point out that, as appears by the citation of the hon. member for Pictou, the late Hon. Edward Blake entertained doubt upon the constitutionality of legislation by a province fixing the panel.

Mr. MACDONALD: He did not ask them to amend it or to suspend its operation.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, but if the hon. gentleman will remember, Hon. Mr. Blake expressed his doubt, but he said: Inasmuch as similar legislation in another province had been passed and not questioned, I do not find it necessary to question it. I do not go further than to say that Hon. Edward Blake expressed a doubt, and I go no further than to say that I have a doubt.

Mr. MACDONALD: And he did not interfere.

Mr. DOHERTY: Neither did I.

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think, however, I might, after the somewhat animated discussion we have had, be allowed to make my explanation of the matter as it presents itself to my mind. I am not asking hon. gentlemen to part with those ideas of theirs of evil intent on my part; they are at liberty to keep them. But it is fair to the House and to the public, to whom I presume the observations of this afternoon will go—if indeed it was not to the public that they were specially addressed—that they should have my statement of what I did do and of the motives that inspired me.

As I have said, my intervention did not rest upon any unconstitutionality of the legislation. My intervention was the result of my belief that the authorities of Manitoba, having no motives of that kind, having no desire to use the legislation unfairly, would have simply said, as I myself would have said: "I have no idea of that kind; I will undertake not to extend my 'stand-bys' in any unfair way by reason of the change in the law." However, they entertained a different view. I regret that they took offence. I had intended to impute no evil motive. I thought it unnecessary that they should have entered into a discussion of the constitutionality of their law, which I did not question in my report, and I so replied. I then gave consideration to the question whether disallowance was a proper remedy. I came to the conclusion that it was not a proper remedy, and therefore I did not recommend to disallow. But I did proceed to do what from the very first I had pointed out what I thought was the proper remedy, namely, to propose to amend the law so that the abuse which was possible under it might be rendered impossible.

The hon. member for St. John did make some observations in criticism of this law. As far as I could follow the observations of other hon. gentlemen, they were largely, if not entirely, in criticism of myself.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Not as far as I am concerned.

Mr. DOHERTY: I had forgotten; I admit that the hon. member did not criticise me. The hon. member for St. John did point out some things which he thought were objectionable in the law, and I trust that I have made clear to him that the consequences which he apprehended need really not be apprehended. Perhaps he did not exactly grasp the effect of the provision with respect to special cause justifying a further extension of the right of "stand aside" beyond 48.

The hon. member for Carleton, if I followed him correctly, expressed the opinion that in itself this was rather a good law, or, at all events, it might be a good law to pass at some other time. If the hon. member is satisfied that it is a good law, then the good time to pass a good law is now. If this is a good law and gives a protection that ought to be given to the liberty of the subject, I do not think we should consider it a thing that it is not worth our while to deal with now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think any hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have spoken very warmly in favour of this legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: I only mentioned the hon. member for Carleton, who I understood to say—and I think I am citing his language correctly—that it might be a good law to pass at some other time. I did not affirm that he said it was a good law.

Mr. CARVELL: I said it was debatable whether it was a good law to pass at some other time.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am convinced that it is a good law. I do not know whether I have convinced the House, but I have given my reasons for thinking so, and it is because I believe it to be a good law that I am asking to have it passed.

When I decided that this law ought to pass, I was not blind to the fact that because of a combination of circumstances there might be persons—I wish to use no offensive words—who would say that because it was done at that time it was done for the reason that has been given this afternoon. I think I would be a very cowardly man—and whatever else I may be, I am not a cowardly man—if because introducing a good law at a particular time exposes me to the sort of language that I was subjected to this afternoon, I hesitated to introduce it. I would have failed in my duty, believing it to be a good law, if I had been frightened out of introducing it because I might be attacked in the way I was attacked this afternoon, and most assuredly I shall not be frightened out of pressing it by that sort of language that was indulged in. I am quite prepared to take the judgment of the public upon my motives, and upon the question how far this legislation is a degradation of the administration of justice. May I, without offence, say that the very wildness of the language used in attack upon myself is to my mind the clearest demonstration that there is nothing to be said against the law.

Mr. ROSS: Has any complaint been made to the minister by law societies, crown prosecutors, or the legislatures of the provinces, as to the old law working out oppressively?

Mr. DOHERTY: None at all. The hon. gentleman talks about the old law. I might point out that there was not any one old law prevailing throughout the Dominion.

Mr. ROSS: I mean the present law.

Mr. DOHERTY: The law to-day is not uniform throughout the Dominion, and there could not have been complaints from my own province of the evil of which I am speaking, because the legislation of my own province safeguarded the accused against that very evil. There might have been, as regards the other provinces, where it was within the power of the judge to order a large panel, but as I said some time ago I have not been given instances of the evil, and I have not acted upon reports of that kind. In my judgment, when you find that a law, particularly a law upon which depends the protection of the liberty of the subject, is open to abuse which may be absolutely prevented without doing injustice to anybody, then is the time to amend that law.

Let me point out an evil that comes from the existence of the possibility of abuse. If the abuse be possible, there will be many times when it will be imputed to those who have the administration of the law. If this unlimited power be in the hands of a Crown prosecutor he may in cases where he is exercising it for the most excellent reasons have imputed to him improper motives, just as I have experienced this afternoon. That is most undesirable and this legislation is to remove that possibility, while at the same time it leaves the Crown prosecutor all the rights he ever had, subject to the control of the court.

[Mr. Doherty.]

In reference to the very matter that has been referred to in Manitoba, I do not impute any evil motives to the legislation that was introduced nor to those who proceeded to carry it out. But, unfortunately because that legislation made abuse possible, and because certain cases did arouse a great deal of feeling, there was an element in the public who said that the legislation was brought down to enable the Crown to resort to that abuse—that it was done expressly to get at political adversaries. I do not believe it, and it was unfortunate that any of our population should think that. It was unfortunate that the modification in the law that made that possible should have synchronized with the approaching political trials. Under the amendment I propose, there will be no room for a suggestion of that kind, and we shall attain the very great good I have described.

In conclusion, in view of what has been represented as being the nature of what I am doing; in view particularly of the astounding language of the hon. member for Rouville, who accused me of having degraded the administration of justice and brought it down into the mire—I have forgotten how he described it—let me say this: That in my belief this is legislation simply to put an additional safeguard to the liberty of the subject, without restricting the rights of the Crown, and for my part if during my not very long career in this House and in the office I hold I should have done nothing else but provide this additional safeguard for the citizen, when he is accused, I would have felt that my presence in this House and my holding of the office I do hold, have been anything but entirely useless. Notwithstanding what has been said, I shall always take credit to myself for having observed a possible abuse, and, having so observed it, taken the means to correct it, and I trust this House will endorse my attitude in doing so.

Motion agreed to, Bill read a second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1:

1. Section nine hundred and thirty-three of the Criminal Code, chapter one hundred and forty-six of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, is amended by adding the following proviso at the end of subsection one thereof:—

"Provided that the Crown may not direct any number of jurors to stand by in excess of forty-eight, unless the judge presiding at the trial, upon special cause shown, so orders.

Mr. CARVELL: We have been treated to a spectacle this afternoon and this evening which fortunately does not occur very often in this House. The Minister of Justice introduced a very serious amendment to the criminal law of Canada, and he took a course which I have never seen taken by any other Minister of Justice or minister of the Crown in my fourteen years in Parliament. He introduced the Bill in absolute silence, and gave no explanation whatever as to the necessity for this legislation. While I may be charged with vile thoughts and probably vile language, one cannot help thinking that he had an idea the thing might slip through and nothing would be said about it. Then, after discussing the subject for an hour and a half, the minister becomes bold and says he is not a coward, and he proposes to justify his conduct. There are other people in this House who are not cowards either.

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not suggest any one was.

Mr. CARVELL: There are many people here who are as willing to justify their conduct as he is. Notwithstanding this charge of vile thoughts and vile language on my part, I will tell him what I think about it, for fear I did not make my previous remarks sufficiently plain, and I hope when I am through there will not be any misunderstanding whatever about my views on this question. I think the time has come for pretty plain talking to this hon. gentleman. We have been lectured by him this afternoon and this evening, and I object to being lectured by him over legislation of this kind, and being now in committee we will have it out. What are the facts? About a year ago the ex-Premier of Manitoba and two of his colleagues were indicted and brought to trial in the province of Manitoba on a very serious charge of conspiracy, of robbing and defrauding the province of Manitoba out of large sums of money. Either before or after they were brought to trial, the province of Manitoba decided to change its Juries Act. Before this trial came on, the Juries Act of Manitoba was as found in section 46, chapter 108:

> There shall be eighteen grand jurors and thirty-six petit jurors summoned in the first instance for any sitting of the Court of King's Bench for the trial of causes, matters and issues which are to be tried with a jury and for the trial of criminal matters and proceedings.
> 2. The number of petit jurors to be summoned in the Eastern Judicial District for any such sitting shall be forty-eight.

The Legislature of Manitoba proposed to pass the following amendment to that law:

> When either before or during any sitting of the Court of King's Bench referred to in section 46 of this Act, it appears necessary or advisable for any reason to have a larger panel, the Judge assigned to preside over such sitting, or any other judge of the Court of King's Bench, may in writing request the Sheriff to summon any number of petit jurors in excess of the number provided by section 46.
> (2) Thereupon, such additional petit jurors shall be chosen and summoned by the Sheriff in the manner outlined in the said Act, and all sections of the said Act shall mutatis mutandis apply to such additional jurors.

In due course, as the law provides, this statute was sent from Winnipeg to the Secretary of State for Canada, and in the ordinary course of procedure it was probably brought before the Attorney General of Canada, the present Minister of Justice. This honourable gentleman wants the House to believe that he was so shocked because the province of Manitoba was bringing its legislation in line with the legistion of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Alberta, and British Columbia, that without any knowledge of the fact that his political friends were liable to be tried or possibly affected by it, without even knowing that those men were going to be tried and that this might affect them, his sense of justice demanded that he should right this wrong, and remove this injustice and place the criminal law of Canada on an equality all over the Dominion. That is the attitude the minister wants to take. I do not believe it, and there is not a man in this House, either Liberal or Conservative, who believes it. It is not possible. If my hon. friend wants to be plain, we will be plain with him. On the 9th December, 1916, he sent a long memorandum to the Governor General in Council. I read a part of it this afternoon. In this memorandum he recites what the law in the province of Manitoba was before, then he sets forth the proposed amendment, and the Order in Council. The latter is as follows:

> The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, herewith, from the Minister of Justice, dated 9th December, 1916, upon a statute of the Legislature of Manitoba, passed at the last session, Chapter 62 of 1916, assented to on 10th March, 1916, and received by the Secretary of State for Canada on 8th April, entitled, "An Act to amend the Jury Act." By the provisions of which a section 46 (a) is added to the Jury Act of the province, Chapter 108 of the Revised Statutes, 1913, providing as follows:—

Then follows the addition to the Manitoba Jury Act, which I have already quoted:

The Committee concurs in the views of the Minister of Justice as set out in the said report, and on his recommendation advise that a copy hereof and of the accompanying report if approved, be transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, for the information of his government with a request for an early answer to the inquiry as therein suggested.

All of which is respectfully submitted for approval.

Rodolphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

In this report he plainly tells the province of Manitoba: "If you do not refrain from acting upon your legislation, I will disallow it," because Parliament is not in session and therefore the only way I can protect my political friends in Manitoba from your legislation is to disallow it; but, if you will promise me that you will not act upon it, I will not disallow it." The answer came back from the Attorney-General of Manitoba, the only answer that any self-respecting provincial government could send back to a threat of that kind, and it concluded as follows:

4. With all due respect to His Excellency's advisers, and while he appreciates their solicitude on behalf of prisoners now awaiting trial, the undersigned is of the opinion that the report referred to amounts to an attempt to interfere with the constitutional rights of the province, and while reflecting on the fairness of the prosecuting authorities in the province of Manitoba, entirely ignores the fact that the fixing of the number of jurors to be summoned is left to the judges of the Court of King's Bench, and that they are given no more power than has been given to and exercised by judges in the province of British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, the Yukon Territory and the North West Territories, for many years.

5. For these reasons, the undersigned recommends that the undertaking or assurance asked for by His Excellency's advisers be not given.

Respectfully submitted.

(Sgd.) A. H. Hudson,
Attorney General.

That was the answer that came back to the Minister of Justice and I say to him that no self-respecting attorney general for one moment could make any other reply to such a threat. That was on the 9th day of December. These gentlemen up there were to be brought to trial immediately, but on account of the illness of Sir Rodmond Roblin the trial was postponed. When they were liable to be brought up for trial again, some time in the winter, another report was prepared by the Minister of Justice dated the 31st January, 1917. In this document he says, in effect: As Parliament is now in session and as I can interfere by the power behind me and pass legislation prohibiting the province of Manitoba from carrying out its enactment, I will not disallow your legislation but I will introduce legislation here and jam it through in order to embarrass the province of Manitoba and render nugatory the very proper legislation which they have enacted. When we brought these matters to the attention of the hon. gentleman this afternoon in language with which no person could find any fault, making no imputations against him whatever, but simply in the most delicate manner possible calling his attention to the position of affairs, we were treated to a tirade of abuse for an hour this afternoon and an hour after we met again this evening. Under these circumstances I think it is time there was some plain speaking to this hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, he did not even know that the trials were liable to come on in Manitoba! A member of a Government in which three of the most pronounced politicians from the province of Manitoba are his colleagues, one of whom had been the colleague of the very men who were indicted—

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman says that I said that I did not know these trials were coming on. I have no recollection of having said so.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. gentleman said he was not affected by it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: For my purposes, there is no difference whatever. As far as the public and the members of this House are concerned, there is absolutely no difference between the hon. gentleman saying that he did not know and that he was not affected by it. He was not affected by it with Hon. Robert Rogers sitting on his right hand in Council, a man who was the colleague of these men, a man who was a member of the Government when the very things were done for which these men were to be put on trial and he was not affected by it! He hopes this House and the country to believe that. It is unthinkable. It is not debatable at all.

He apparently introduced this Bill for the purpose of thwarting the very proper legislation of the province of Manitoba. The Attorney General of Manitoba entered a nolle prosequi when the notice of this legislation was given. Then the minister could not very well do much less than he is doing to-day. He could not abandon the Bill because the political aspect would be so patent that everybody would know what the object of it was. Therefore he was forced to go on with it. Now he takes the high-and-mighty stand that if he accomplishes nothing else as Minister of Justice of Canada except to redress this wrong he will not have served in vain. Think of the Minister of Justice of Canada taking that attitude, of giving forth to the world the statement that if he does nothing else except to interfere with the administration of justice in Manitoba during the past six years his efforts will not have been in vain!

When we bring out these facts we are treated to a tirade of abuse such as has very seldom been handed out to the members of this House since I have been here. 9 p.m.

In order to substantiate the hon. gentleman's contention, he finds himself compelled to make two or three violent assumptions. In the first place, he is forced to assume that the judges of the King's Bench of Manitoba, or of any other supreme or superior court in Canada, are going to act from improper motives.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I must be allowed to correct that statement. I certainly said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not say you said so; I say you are forced to that assumption, and I am going to give you the proof of it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I was not aware of the assumption.

Mr. CARVELL: You cannot get away from it. Without the amended law of Manitoba the Attorney General could not succeed in getting an extra panel except by the order of the judge, and he had to convince the judge of the necessity of the extra panel before he could get it. Therefore, when he admits there was unfairness, that the law might work out harshly against a prisoner, and a prisoner would not get a fair trial—and that he should get all the protection of the British law that we heard so much talk about this afternoon—he is assuming there is fraud on the part of the presiding judge or that the presiding judge acts contrary to the interests of justice. That is an assumption that does not come with very good grace from the Minister of Justice.

If the legislation of Manitoba had gone as far as the legislation of New Brunswick—which had not shocked his conscience during the five years before this matter came up, and which was allowed to go on and did not get him waked up, and by which the Attorney General could order an extra panel—it would not have been so bad. Practically all the great English-speaking provinces having had these laws. Then the province of Manitoba passes legislation to bring itself into line with the other provinces, with the result that his conscience is shocked by a sense of outraged justice. Without any political interference or influence being brought to bear upon him, he at once rushes and says: I am going to remedy this outrage, and see that the administration of justice shall not be outraged any longer in Canada. He is not sincere. He was not sincere then, and he is not sincere to-night.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I want to know if it is within the rules of this House for one member to say to another that he does not believe what he says?

Mr. CARVELL: I did not say so.

Mr. CROTHERS: You did some minutes ago.

Mr. CARVELL: I beg pardon.

Mr. CROTHERS: I know what you said.

Mr. CARVELL: You did not wake up early enough.

Mr. CROTHERS: You said a moment ago that he was not sincere.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I say that now.

Mr. CROTHERS: I submit that that language is not permissible, that it is not allowable for one hon. member to say of another that in making a statement he is insincere. I would like your ruling upon it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): The word used by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), I think, is parliamentary.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Quite proper.

Mr. CARVELL: I will show wherein the hon. gentleman was not sincere. He says that his sense of justice was outraged when he found out that legislation such as this had been passed by Manitoba, and when, to his horror, he found that similar legislation existed in four other provinces of Canada

If the hon. gentleman was sincere, why did he not at once start in to repeal the enactment or amend it, as he is doing to-night? Did he do that? Not by any means. He simply held a club over the head of the province of Manitoba, and said: If you do not change the Act, I will disallow it. Was that sincere? Was his sense of justice outraged? If it had been outraged, why did he call upon Manitoba alone to repeal their legislation or he would disallow it? Why did he not say: I will amend the criminal law of Canada? What more evidence do hon. gentlemen want of his insincerity than that?

Mr. DOHERTY: Does the hon. gentleman want to know why?

Mr. CARVELL: You will have a chance later on. We are in committee now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): I would like the hon. gentleman to address the Chair.

Mr. CARVELL: I will do so. We have the whole night to thresh these things out, and if the hon. gentleman is getting a little plain talk he has only himself to thank for it, and he will find he will get all the talk he wants—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL: I have shown that the hon. minister was not sincere, and is not now sincere, in setting forward this resolution. I am not going to traverse the ground he has gone over. He laboured for an hour to show in some way that there was injustice, and that in some way certain provinces in Canada had fixed jury panels; and I want to tell him that there is not a province in Canada which has not a fixed jury panel by its legislation. It is true the panels vary in number. Manitoba had forty-eight up to 1916. I think they have forty-eight in Ontario. I am told that Quebec has sixty. We only have twenty-one in New Brunswick. But in all these provinces there was a provision, before my hon. friend attempted to interfere with the legislation of Manitoba, by which these panels could be increased to any extent whatever. Then, all you have to do is to take the criminal law of Canada, and there you find that from 1869 down to the present time all the machinery provided by which this could be extended, if the judge thought fit. Section 939 reads as follows:

> Whenever after the proceedings hereinbefore provided for the panel has been exhausted, and a complete jury cannot be had by reason thereof, then, upon request made on behalf of the Crown, the court may order the sheriff or other proper officer forthwith to summon such number of persons, whether qualified jurors or not, as the court deems necessary and directs in order to make a full jury; and such jurors may, if necessary, be summoned by word of mouth.
> 2. The names of the persons so summoned shall be added to the general panel, for the purposes of the trial, and the same proceedings shall be taken as to calling and challenging such persons and as to directing them to stand by as are hereinbefore provided for with respect to the persons named in the original panel.

That has been the law since 1869 in Manitoba and every province of Canada—that when the jury panel was exhausted, no matter what the fixed number might be, the court had the power to order an additional panel, or add numbers to the other panel. So that all this talk about unfairness and a lack of uniformity simply amounts to beating the wind, simply some sort of fancied justification for the legislation which the hon. gentleman is trying to force through the House. Then in his communication with the Attorney General of Manitoba, in his report to the Council, and in his discussion this afternoon, he talks about this unlimited number of jurymen, as though an order was given to the sheriff to go out and bring in the countryside, bring in the wayfarers. He had them up to 250, and he could have gone up to 500 without any stretch of imagination at all. The Minister of Justice knows better than that.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not know about that.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh yes he does. He knows that by the Criminal Code, by the legislation of every province of Canada, and by the legislation of Manitoba to which he objects, they could only summon the number of jurors that the judge ordered and thought fit and proper. There, again, I say my hon. friend must assume unfairness on the part of the presiding judge, he must assume crookedness on the part of everybody, in order to justify his position. If he has fault to find, and feels he has been unjustly attacked, he has himself to blame for it. If he comes in with sectional legislation, designed for the protection of certain persons, and tries to force this thing through Parliament and is hauled over he coals for it, it is his own fault. There is no use pleading for sympathy, or lecturing gentlemen on this side of the House, or making any threats. I hope the hon. gentleman will take a little lesson from what I am telling him, and change his attitude, and that during the rest of the debate we shall not be treated to any more such exhibitions as we had just before six o'clock and for three-quarters of an hour afterwards.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend, in defending a proposal to introduce this measure, gave a dissertation upon the law of juries from the time of Charles I, through various intervening periods down to the year 1907. All this dissertation of my hon. friend upon this abstract question of law has no more relevancy to the Bill which we are discussing than any academic problem with reference to the constitutional history of Great Britain. After this historical dissertation upon this irrelevant subject, he endeavoured to indicate to this committee that the fact that this legislation was introduced when it had been, and the fact that he wrote the Attorney General of Manitoba and passed Orders in Council dealing with the legislation enacted by the Legislature of Manitoba, were accidental circumstances. The Minister of Justice's soul was burning over this anomaly which he discovered in the statutes of Manitoba, under which every province in this Dominion has been staggering along, without anybody ever making any complaint about the administration of justice, ever since Confederation. The sudden interest of the minister in this question of jury legislation in Manitoba synchronized—to use that happy phrase which the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) introduced into this House, when he had been engaged in a somewhat similar occupation to that of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice—with certain political events in the Parliament of Manitoba. That there was a synchronism there is no manner of doubt, and the Minister of Justice admits that he knew that his political friends were about to be tried in Manitoba, but he did not allow that fact to affect him any. Well, we are bound to accept his word, only again we have this anomalous and very peculiar synchronism, which is, to say the least of it, very singular. My hon. friend resents the idea that anybody should suggest any particular motive in regard to this matter, but here are the facts—the House will have to draw its own conclusions, and so will the country. What does my hon. friend say in his Order in Council which he issued in December, 1916, after the first trial of Sir Rodmond Roblin, Mr. Coldwell and Mr. Howden had taken place, and while they were approaching the period when the second trial was to be held? My hon. friend's knowledge and zeal about the cause of criminal administration in this country became keen, and prompted him to pass an Order in Council on December 9, in which appears this very peculiar statement:

> Criminal trials are proceeding in the province of Manitoba; the Parliament is not in session and it will in the ordinary course of things be several months before a suitable amendment can be obtained to regulate, in a manner compatible with justice, the right of the prosecution to require jurors to stand by.

According to this Order in Council, criminal trials were likely to take place. What does my hon. friend say to the Government of Manitoba with respect to these criminal trials? The Order in Council continues:

> With a view to the application of the law in accordance with what the minister conceives to be its reasonable purpose, he would be disposed to consider the propriety of disallowance unless the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba be advised to give an assurance that his Government will see that, pending the consideration by Parliament of the provisions of the Criminal Code to which the undersigned has referred, the prosecuting attorney shall not exercise any right to require jurors to stand aside at criminal cases in excess of that which would have been permissible if section 46a as enacted by the recent Act of Manitoba had not been passed.

That provision of the Order in Council is most anomalous. The right to disallow legislation passed by a provincial legislature can be exercised by the Minister of Justice and the Government in a proper case. But here is the synchronism: Sir Rodmond Roblin, Mr. Coldwell and Mr. Howden were to be tried in January. The Minister of Justice says to the Attorney General of Manitoba: I will disallow your legislation unless you undertake not to enforce the provisions of your law with regard to the right to stand by. My hon. friend need not complain about hon. gentlemen on this side making statements or suggesting theories. Here is a statement which I find in the Manitoba Free Press, which gives in detail the subsequent events. The Manitoba Free Press and my hon. friend have not been so far apart within the last week or two. This is what that newspaper says:

> It is not in the interests of justice that the Dominion Government threatened to reduce the jury panel to forty-eight. The necessity for such a restriction had never appeared to any minister of justice till the second trial of the ex-minister loomed in view. It is not in the interests of justice that the law which prevails in England and in nearly every Canadian province was to be violated by the Dominion Government. It was to embarrass or prevent the due trial of the three ex-ministers.

No hon. gentleman on this side has suggested that. But the Manitoba Free Press, a great organ of public opinion, a few months ago thus arraigned the Minister of Justice, charging him with threatening Manitoba by his Order in Council in the interests of the ex-ministers. The article goes on:

Why the haste in wiring to the provincial government for its answer? The Dominion Order in Council was dated December 11 and received here—

That is, in Winnipeg.

—about the 16th. The Dominion Government wired for the answer on January 5.

Note the peculiar synchronism. The memorandum from the Minister of Justice reached Winnipeg on December 16, and he was in so much haste for a reply, in view of the fact that these criminal trials were coming on, that he sent a telegram on January 5 asking for a reply. That action is entirely without precedent in the history of my hon. friend's department. The Manitoba Free Press goes on:

Sir Rodmond's illness had not then arrived.

What occurred then? Sir Rodmond Roblin became ill, so ill that application was made to the judges for postponement of the trial. The application was granted. The Manitoba Free Press proceeds to say:

When the trial was postponed on account of Sir Rodmond Roblin's illness, the Dominion Government's anxiety immediately abated and five weeks after receiving the Manitoba Government's answer the Minister of Justice "is disposed to think that it is not necessary to recommend any further action with respect to this particular statute."

Sir Rodmond Roblin's trial was coming on in January. My hon. friend makes out his Order in Council dated December 11, posts it to Winnipeg immediately, and it reaches there on December 16. Not receiving an answer, he wires on January 5: Why have you not answered? Sir Rodmond Roblin becomes ill; the trial is postponed—and my hon. friend's interest in the matter suddenly ceases. Subsequently he receives an answer from the Attorney General of Manitoba. Instead of displaying a continued interest in the matter, he does nothing to prevent the operation of the law; he sends no telegram, he writes not even a letter. But five weeks afterwards he replies that it is not necessary to recommend any further change in that particular statute. And now we have this wonderful piece of legislation in the interests of jurisprudence which my hon. friend dilated upon for two hours this afternoon, and which, according to his view, is so essential in this time of war and stress. The Manitoba Free Press says:

But to save his face he repeats that he proposes, therefore, to introduce into Parliament a measure intended to give effect to his newly and precipitately acquired views of the month of December and to overturn a law of many years' standing.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

My hon. friend may complain of the Manitoba Free Press in making these statements several months ago, but neither he nor his colleagues can get away from the synchronism of all these events. The Manitoba Free Press says further:

The threat of disallowance is a barefaced attempt to prostitute the constitutional prerogatives of the Dominion to serve political and personal ends of Robert Rogers and Arthur Meighen—to subvert justice to save personal and political friends—to make the constitution the handmaid and protector of graft and crime. It is a fitting display of the debauchery of the present Government, that it is ready to become the tool of Mr. Rogers in undermining the administration of justice.

That is the statement of the Manitoba Free Press, made some months ago when the events were fresh in the minds of the people of that province. The minister this afternoon did not meet that charge made by the Free Press.

Note the category of events in regard to this matter: The coming on of certain criminal trials, the hastily passed Order in Council, the sending of a telegram, the postponement of the trial, the minister's sudden cessation of interest in the matter, and his holding the Attorney General's answer five weeks before replying. Then, as the Manitoba Free Press says, to save his face, he introduces this legislation. Is it any wonder that we on this side asked the House this afternoon to divide on the question whether this legislation should be put on the statute book?

Is it any wonder that we call the attention of this House and of the country to the fact that, at this time and under the serious circumstances, this Minister of Justice in this Government turns aside to delay the progress of Parliament in order to pass legislation which had its emanation purely in political conceptions and which would never have been heard of if there had not been criminal trials in Manitoba to be looked after?

Mr. MORPHY: I had an opportunity of saying a word or two on this Bill this afternoon and had I been present in the House when the division was taken, I would have voted against the Bill. I made the statement to-day that I would vote against the Bill unless the minister would satisfy me that it was in the public interest that the Bill should be on the statute-book. I have listened carefully to-night, since eight o'clock, to what the Minister of Justice has had to say, and nothing he has said has satisfied me. The minister said that criticism levelled in this House this afternoon appeared to be more at himself than at the Bill. Personally, I resent that. I do not think it is fair for a minister to make a matter of that kind personal. When an hon. member, as is his right in this House, rises to speak his mind, I do not look upon that as a personal matter, nor do I believe that the criticism was so much levelled at the minister as at the contents of the Bill he is putting forward. I see by section 933 of the Criminal Code that this law proposed to be amended has been upon the statute-book for about forty-seven years. I have been patiently waiting to hear something from the lips of the minister that would justify his tampering with this law. I have heard the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite and the motives they have imputed. I do not know that they are right; I cannot say that they are wrong. I have not gone into the subject deeply, and I have read nothing about it. But the view I take is entirely different from the view they take; my mind is directed along totally different channels. The minister has gone at great length into what I might term ancient English history to show the origin of the law relating to the powers of the Crown to stand aside in criminal indictments. I did not think that was relevant at all, and I thought it was a bit of a red herring that the minister was drawing across the scent. The point that strikes me is that, assuming that hon. gentlemen opposite are correct in their theory that this law was intended to help political friends in Manitoba, it is quite clearly shown to-day that the need for such a law does not exist, and if that were the motive, the Minister of Justice might reasonably drop his Bill. Since he hangs on with such pertinacity to the pushing through of this Bill, one must seek for another motive, and the motive that I would impute to the Minister of Justice—an Irishman might be entitled to use the phrase, an unconscious motive—would probably be this. I do not believe that the minister realizes to-night the effect of this Bill. I do not believe he has this Bill in his mind's eye, having relation to the situation that this country presents to-day. With sedition and rebellion threatening us in various quarters of this Dominion, the Minister of Justice brings in a Bill which tends to weaken the power of the Crown to deal with offenders. If there ever was a time in the history of Canada when the power of the Crown should be strengthened, that time is now. I have watched very carefully to find any concrete case of abuse given, and I find the minister has absolutely failed to give any set condition which has arisen throughout the length and breadth of Canada which authorizes him to bring forward this Bill. On the eve of a possible crisis in this country, with numerous acts of sedition being committed to-day, as will be found reported in the Montreal Gazette of this morning, with numerous acts of rebellion threatening to break out, at a time when the power of the Crown should be made supreme, I do not conceive it possible that the Minister of Justice in this Parliament will seriously promote a Bill which intends to sap, enervate, and weaken the powers of the Crown in this country, powers that, as he admits himself, have always been administered fairly. The Crown prosecutors throughout the country have been fair; the judges have had the weal of the country at heart; they have administered the law impartially, with absolute fairness and rectitude. And, after forty-seven years under the law as it stands giving the Crown the right to compel any number of jurors to stand by, or as we in Ontario say, to stand aside, we find that this Bill is curtailing the power of the Crown by limiting the number of jurors it can stand aside to a maximum of forty-eight. I cannot for the life of me see why the Bill is asked for, by whom it is asked for, or what evil it is intended to cure. If it were the Manitoba situation, that is out of the way. I ask the minister—now that we are in committee, when he can speak as much as he likes, when he is not limited as he was this afternoon when we were in the House—to tell me, as a member of this House, what case he wanted to meet, what concrete case gave rise to this Bill and who asked for it. The minister in answer to an hon. gentleman opposite to-day said: No attorney general of any province of the Dominion asked for this legislation. I waited in vain to hear the minister tell this House of one case which had arisen which constituted an abuse of the statute as it exists. As a professional man I have gloried in the Criminal Code as laid down through the professional genius of the late Sir John Thompson. It has been a model document, a model code of laws, and for myself I feel that the code will exist in strength in proportion to the fewness of the attacks that are made upon it. It is a pity to tamper with the Criminal Code unless good cause is shown. The minister has not shown good cause, and I purpose voting against this Bill at every stage unless I can get some light.

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to the observations of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) I feel I have already sufficiently dealt with what they have said. With regard to what has been said by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), I regret that I have not been able to carry conviction to him that there is good reason for the introduction and passing of this Bill. I notice that the hon. gentleman said that he heard my remarks after eight o'clock. I do not assume that if he had heard what I said before six I would have convinced him. Let me point out that this is not a modification of the law as it existed throughout Canada. It is not at all difficult for the hon. gentleman to apprehend the question when he looks into it, but I must confess that it is a little difficult for me to make quite clear how it is that the difficulty which I think should be met is brought about. That difficulty does not result from the disposition of the Criminal Code standing by itself. That disposition of the Criminal Code was enacted, I have no doubt, in view of an existing condition of affairs whereby in four at least out of the five provinces there was an absolutely fixed number beyond which the panel could not go. I have understood also, in view of the practice at common law, and which had prevailed, if I am correctly informed—and hon. gentlemen from other provinces rather bore that out this afternoon—that the panel summoned is not more than 48. The situation that this amendment is intended to meet is this: under the Manitoba legislation, and under the legislation of four of the other provinces, while in some there is a number for the panel mentioned, and in others there is no number mentioned, in all those provinces the judge may extend the number of the panel. I have been criticised for saying an "indefinite" number. I do not mean to convey by the word "indefinite" more than that the judge might summon any number that in his judgment he thought desirable. I was at pains to point out that I had no fault to find with that power being conferred upon the judge, and that there might in many instances be very substantial reasons which would not only justify but absolutely call for the summoning of a very large number of jurors. I think I mentioned one case which came to my knowledge of the holding of a court where 150 jurors were summoned. While I find no fault with that possibility, being, as it is, under the control of the judge, what struck me was that out of that possibility, combined with the provisions of the Criminal Code as it stands, might grow this situation. In the provinces where a fixed number had been created, the Crown was limited in its "stand by" to the full number of the panel. In Manitoba, for instance, that would be 48. But in Manitoba, since the amended legislation, the Crown came to have the right to extend the number of "stand by" to the full extent of the number of jurors that the court might consider advisable to have summoned. The result, as it works out without this amendment, is that in a particular case the Crown would have the right to "stand by" the entire number of jurors who had been summoned, and properly summoned under those circumstances, instead of only 48. Where there was a limited number to a panel the stand-by was necessarily limited to that number.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it not quite proper to assume that a judge, in making an order for increasing the panel, would always do so with a knowledge that the right of standing aside the jurors existed in the prosecuting officer?

Mr. DOHERTY: The judge would do so with a full knowledge of that, but at the same time there might be reasons quite independent of the existence of that right which might make it desirable or necessary to have a very large number of jurors.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: The number of cases to be tried in a district has nothing to do with the number of jurors. In a rural district, for instance, a panel of 40 will be summoned, and in Montreal and Quebec a panel of 60. By a provision in the law, if the cases are numerous, another panel can be summoned, and we sometimes see as many as three or four panels in the same district.

Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly. The hon. gentleman always speaks from his familiarity with the excellent system—I say it with all respect—that grows out of the legislation of those provinces with a fixed panel. If your first panel is not sufficient in number, you have the remedy by summoning additional panels. But in a trial before the first panel the Crown may stand aside until it comes to the end of the panel, and then it will have to go back and begin over again, and unless it has reasons to give against any man that it then wants to reject it must challenge. Now, if you proceed on a system where there is a fixed number to the panel, the abuse which appears to me to be possible is protected against, and you would not need this legislation. But it is because in certain of the provinces a panel might be of a very large number that the legislation is needed.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Would my hon. friend allow me to make a suggestion? I agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), who has convinced me more than any one in this House, without referring to the Manitoba question at all, that we are dealing with a more serious amendment to the Criminal Code than people imagine. I cannot foresee the extent of the effect of this new legislation. The minister says that, as far as the provinces where a limited number of jurors composing a panel is fixed, His Majesty's justice is protected, and the subject is also protected. That being so, it is very easy to infer that there are some provinces which have an unlimited number of jurors. The suggestion I make is that the Minister of Justice should enter into a conference with, or communicate with, the Attorneys General of those provinces which have not improved their law, and ask their opinion, or suggest that they should enact at the first sitting of their legislature an Act to restrict the number of jurors, in order to have uniform legislation, so far as numbers is concerned. The number may vary according to the population or the needs of the centres where those jurors may be called upon to sit. Then, if there is any complaint, a general measure of this kind may be passed.

While I am on my feet, I would like to draw the attention of the minister to one part of the Bill, and ask him how it will work out. Take, for instance, the last words "upon special cause shown." My experience before the criminal courts is this: My hon. friend from Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) is Crown prosecutor in Montreal. He may simply say to Juror No. 1 in case, "Stand aside," and may go through the whole panel in the same way. If he oversteps the number of forty—and this cannot happen unless we are in a rural district after talesmen have been called—if he "stands aside" the forty on the panel, he will not have exhausted the privilege he has under the law.

Mr. DOHERTY: This legislation does not say that he shall in all cases have the right to forty-eight, even if the panel is not forty-eight. It limits him as an absolute right to forty-eight. In the case where there are only forty, if the jury is not exhausted by challenge or otherwise, after you have stood aside the forty then you come back and go over them until you finally get a jury, or challenges have prevented you from getting one. That is when the jury panel is exhausted, and you resort to talesmen. This amendment deals with the right to "stand by" with regard to the panel, and it limits to forty-eight. Of course it does not mean or at least it was not intended to mean, that where the panel is less than forty-eight the Crown will still have the right to "stand by" forty-eight. Where the panel is only forty, the Crown is restricted to forty "stand bys."

Mr. PUGSLEY. In what districts is the panel sixty?

Mr. DOHERTY: In the districts of Montreal and Quebec.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister is speaking of the great advantage of a limited panel. Why does he try to pass a law by which in the province of Quebec, where there is an admirable limited panel, counsel representing the Crown can only cause forty-eight to stand by, leaving twelve over whom he is absolutely powerless unless he can challenge for cause?

Mr. DOHERTY: I had not quite concluded what I had to say in answer to my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. C. A. Wilson). I am not wedded to the particular number, forty-eight. When I was making the limitation I had in mind that it should be of general application, and forty-eight was the number which has become law by practice. I am not suggesting that there was at common law any restricted fixed number, but in practice forty-eight was the usual number. In Manitoba, whose legislation we were dealing with, that was the maximum number in any district. In the districts outside of Winnipeg it was thirty-six, I believe. Taking the two districts I have mentioned in Quebec, I was depriving them of twelve. On the other hand, I was taking a number which I thought was a fair average of the provinces which have fixed numbers. It may be that it would be wiser to keep this restriction down to what is the maximum number in any province having a fixed number, and I would have no objection to considering that suggestion.

Mr. CARVELL: That simply shows the danger and difficulty of tampering with a well-recognized law. If you apply that proposition you will get the fixed number down to twenty-one in New Brunswick, which would be ridiculous.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I was making a law of general application, I was trying to take a number that might be—not right up to the maximum or right down to the minimum—but that might fairly be considered a general number. As I have already stated, it is the principle that seems to me important, and if it be thought that there would be an advantage in saying sixty rather than forty-eight, I would be open to consider the suggestion. The hon. member for Laval has stated that I should take the matter up with the Attorneys General, and suggest to them that they should—in the case of Manitoba, at all events, and any other provinces which may have at any time fixed a number by statute—revert to that number. I would not have any particular objection to doing that, but if I did it I would be undertaking to intervene with the province with regard to the sort of legislation they should enact concerning a matter which they would most strenuously claim to be within their own jurisdiction, and which I am prepared to admit for all practical purposes in regard to this present measure, is their constitutional prerogative.

I had ventured to communicate with the Attorney General for Manitoba, and, whatever we may think about our own respective languages, his reply was not of a kind to indicate that he welcomed or was delighted with my intervention.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He did not like the bluff.

Mr. DOHERTY: That was his interpretation possibly. At all events, he did not like my intervention. I think we may all agree that he did not like my intervention, and then we will get peace. There may be a perfectly good reason for the provincial authorities claiming that I should not interfere with the right to say what number of jurors should be summoned. But on one thing, with all respect for the opinions that have been expressed, I think we all agree, and it is that this Parliament has responsibility, whatever action it ought to take, for the criminal procedure. If my view is sound, that there should be an amendment in our criminal procedure, it is merely because the action of the provinces in the exercise of their right and for their own legitimate purposes, has created a situation—which I do not suppose they had any desire or intention to create—in which, by reason of this unlimited provision of the Criminal Code, abuse to the detriment of the liberty of the subject may become possible.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: It has never done so. The criminal law has given absolute satisfaction.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman has made that argument before.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have tried to drive it home to the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have tried to meet that argument, and I think I have driven it absolutely home.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has repeated his argument a little bit more than once.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not finding fault with the hon. gentleman if he thinks it useful. I dare say that one is obliged to repeat what he has already said, but may I point out that I got on my feet because I was asked to do it. I was not endeavouring to make any undue repetition. My own conception was that possibly we should get as good a result and possibly save some time if, after I had heard the observations that hon. gentlemen were prepared to make, I should try to deal with them all in one speech. But it was considered better that I should reply after my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Morphy) had spoken, and I was quite willing to acquiesce in that view. But I do not want to claim for myself exemption from having repeated, nor do I intend by my suggestion to find fault with my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) for insisting on his argument. I only want to say that if my observations do not carry conviction, yet, in so far as I am able to give a satisfactory answer, I have given that answer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: These things may impress other members of the committee. What the committee will do does not depend entirely on what the minister says.

Mr. DOHERTY: The remark was addressed to me. I do not wish to curtail the hon. gentleman's privilege of reiterating any argument that he may think proper. I was trying to complete what I thought ought to be said in answer to my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. C. A. Wilson). I do frankly think, if the provinces see it that way, that the best way would be for them to fix a unmber for their panels. I quite recognize that there may be conditions in a province of which I know nothing that might make a larger panel desirable from their point of view. The hon. member for

10 p.m.

Laval apparently thought that it was desirable that there should be a limited number of challenges. The best way to get the result desired is to deal with the matter by the Criminal Code.

In regard to my hon. friend from North Perth, one thing which struck me very forcibly was his suggestion that this was an unfortunate time, by reasons of conditions that may exist throughout the country, to weaken the powers of the Crown. I submit with deference to those who may not agree with me that it was not in my conception that in doing what I was doing I was weakening the powers of the Crown, because I have not suggested that there should be an absolute limitation on the rights of any one. The Crown has always this recourse open to it. The judge who is sitting there will determine whether there shall be an extension or not, whether the conditions which my hon. friend from Perth pointed out exist in such a way as make it desirable, for the maintenance of order and the enforcement of law, that there should be a wider exercise of the right of "stand by." I should think that the hon. member would agree with me that we may safely trust to the courts to recognize those conditions. The proposed legislation does not end the right to "stand by," it simply lays down a rule for ordinary application open to variation under those circumstances and conditions in which a particular case presents itself affording good reason for an extension. I should be very sorry to think that it would be in anybody's mind that I was actuated in the introduction of this legislation by any motive of weakening the powers of the Crown to enforce the law at the present time. That was very far from my conception when I introduced the Bill. In some respects I think the hon. member will agree with me that some of the conditions that he has in view, if they existed at all at the time of the introduction of this Bill, have perhaps been brought still more closely to our attention since then. Frankly, I should not apprehend that a provision of this kind would in any way endanger the powers of the Crown with regard to the enforcement of the law; my confidence in the judiciary is quite too great for that. I would like to repeat one thing which I said this afternoon and which I think meets a great many of the objections that have been made.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The judiciary have lately not always given evidence that they are all worthy of confidence.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know why lately more than any other time. We have had evidence of the existence of a difference of opinion between judges from time immemorial, and which will continue, to the advantage of the profession to which my hon. friend and myself belong. We have both had to congratulate ourselves upon the fact that judges came to different conclusions on the same evidence and on the same arguments. I was going to say that what seems to me to have been a conclusive answer to the objections that were lodged is that the same authority which under the provincial law controls the determination of the number of the jury panel, under this law which gives the Crown forty-eight challenges without the intervention of the judge, also controls how much further the Crown should be allowed to go in the exercise of the right of "stand by."

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I understand that the "stand aside" number would be 48, and more if the presiding judge at the trial, upon special cause shown, so ordered. Those words, "upon special cause shown", perplex me. When the Crown says, "stand aside", I would not dare, as an attorney for the defence, ask the Crown prosecutor what his reasons for that request were. That would not be proper. What reason would be given by the judge? He will have to give the reasons in public why he gives the Crown prosecutor the power and privilege to order a larger number than 48 to stand by. Would he give those reasons? No. The Crown prosecutor may represent to the court that about 50 of the 100 of the new jurors that are called are Liberals, and this is a Liberal case, and the judge may permit the Crown to extend the "stand asides" to 56 or 58. Or, take the reverse case and suppose they are Conservatives, how can a Crown prosecutor give his reasons to the judge, except in camera, and how can the judge deliver those reasons from the Bench, to authorize the Crown to exercise that privilege in regard to the "stand aside"?

Mr. DOHERTY: I pointed out this afternoon what I understood would be the position in that regard. I do not understand that it is a question of whether one individual is going to be told to stand by. As the matter stands at the present time, my hon. friend, the member for Montcalm sits in His Majesty's court, where he prosecutes criminals.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: And where he shines.

Mr. DOHERTY: And my hon. friend from Laval sits at the desk and defends the accused, and he likewise shines. Now, my hon. friend from Montcalm has "stood by" forty-eight. He proceeds to ask another man to stand by. The hon. gentleman from Laval, if this law passes, will object. The hon. gentleman from Montcalm says, "I want to show to the court that there are special reasons for my going further." I do not think the hon. gentleman from Montcalm would dream of suggesting that the next dozen jurors were Liberal or that they were Conservative, or that he would give any reason of that sort. But there may be perfectly good reason. I think you might find the existence of certain conditions in the public mind which might constitute a reason. The hon. gentleman no doubt has had occasion to move for a change of venue.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: The case is not similar.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not identical, but the same causes might justify the extension of the right to "stand by." The law, moreover, does not lay down any rule for the judges, but leaves the matter in his discretion to say—upon special cause shown to him, which he thinks makes it desirable for the good administration of justice—that the right of "stand by" should be extended. Very cognent arguments have been put forward here, and instances given of cases where the "stand bys" should go beyond 48. These same arguments would be put before the court, and the conditions outlined in suggested cases might possibly exist, and the court would determine, in the exercise of its judgment and discretion, whether that was sufficient cause for the extension of the right to "stand by." I do not quite grasp why the hon. gentleman apprehends difficulty in that regard. There are many similar matters of procedure, where the judge is left a discretion as to the application of an absolute rule or its extension, and I do not think we need apprehend that any judge would look upon reasons such as have been suggested as applicable in any case I can conceive.

Mr. McKENZIE: I regret very much that the Minister of Justice should suppose we had no purpose in discussing this Bill but to find personal fault with himself. I am sure nothing could be further from my own mind than to give direct personal offence to the Minister of Justice. But the hon. gentleman knows that one's conduct and acts can well be criticised without any personal offence being intended. I may be promoting a certain line of religious belief that would be absolutely objectionable to the hon. Minister of Justice, and which he could abuse and tear to tatters and characterise as absolute heresy, and at the same time have no intention of saying anything against me. In like manner, it is quite open to us, I think, to criticise this Bill, and criticise it particularly because of its genesis, and the conditions of the country, and particularly the conditions in Manitoba, where this trouble originated. In this House it is well, perhaps, that we should be keen on the scent of anything that may savour of trouble, or savour of any undue exercise of the power of the minister or of the Government, particularly in the administration of justice; and it is better that we should err by going too keenly after matters of that kind than that we should sleep at the switch and allow matters to go on which would tend to abuses and lead people to believe that in the administration of justice, as well as other things, there was pull, and that the man who got clear was the man who had the big pull while the poor man, who had few friends at court, had no chance to escape. It would be a deplorable condition of things if that idea got abroad, and it is perhaps better that fault should be found with the Minister of Justice when he does not deserve it than that too much latitude should be given in the other direction. I have in my hand copies of a series of telegrams proven in court, and I think when the Minister of Justice hears them he will be perfectly satisfied that we, on this side of the House, have reason to believe that influences were being exercised from Manitoba from the very inception of this matter out of which these troubles arose, which were not proper and should not have been exercised. I have here a copy of a telegram which was proven in court, which I am satisfied is a correct copy, dated Winnipeg, 1st April, 1915, addressed to my hon. friend's colleague, hon. Robert Rogers, at Ottawa, in which it is said:

> Governor Cameron in collusion with Grits here. Has under his authority directed Government to appoint Royal Commission to inquire into Kelly contracts. Important that he should accept Government's nominee for the Commission. There is danger that he may refuse. If he should, it will precipitate crisis. Your interest in Dominion election at stake. Better protect your position and see that Cameron follows advice of Government. He is broke, as you know. I think this is very important and should be attended to at once.

No charge has been made against minister personally. He should have ignored the position if he wanted. His actions are very suspicious.

R. M. Simpson.

Mr. Simpson is a man who stood close to the minister. I wish to call the minister's attention to very extraordinary language in this telegram, which, I think, is enough to arouse suspicion anywhere. The Minister of Public Works is told that the Governor is broke. What is meant by that? That means that he is poor; that he has no money; that he can be approached with a bribe. It means: Bring money with you, and we can fix the whole thing. That is what the word means; I have never heard it used in any other connection. There is another telegram here to Hon. Robert Rogers, bearing the same date, and sent by Mr. G. R. Coldwell, Minister of the Manitoba Government of that day. It is as follows:

The Governor is evidently moving under instructions from the Grits. He is attempting to force our hand. You know his position. This thing means more to you than appears on the surface. Would advise you to take measures to protect. His removal promptly should be considered.

A Manitoba minister advises a minister of the Crown in the Government of my right hon. friend to take steps to remove this Governor and get him out of the way. There is another telegram from Mr. Rogers, replying to Dr. R. M. Simpson. It is marked confidential, and is as follows:

Thanks for message. Am acting strongly in the matter.

Strongly, I suppose, to get the Governor removed.

Governor has absolutely no right to take matter into his own hands. His plain duty is to follow the advice of his advisers.

R. Rogers.

Here is another telegram from Sir Rodmond Roblin to Hon. Robert Rogers, dated April 7, and marked confidential:

Governor wrote me officially this morning saying after fuller consideration that work should be stopped. Commission should be appointed to-day before my leaving and that Mather, Galt and Macdonald be commission. Saw him immediately; after long interview he had agreed that I could go east but that must return and appoint commission not later than Wednesday noon, fourteenth. He strongly objects to Haggart. Leaving to-night for Toronto.

As I understand it, Haggard is a judge of the Supreme Court, and it was in connection with his election that these moneys were used. Fault is found with the Governor because he does not appoint Haggart as one of the commissioners to try charges against his own election fund.

There is another telegram to Hon. Robert Rogers, dated April 9 and marked confidential. It is as follows:

Ministers here inform me that Governor acting in unfair and partisan manner respecting nominees for commission and its appointment by next Wednesday. Coldwell believes that unless matters are arranged satisfactorily the ultimate result will have far-reaching effects in Dominion election and thinks you should be here before Wednesday.

This is signed by R. C. A. Manning, whose name figured in some real estate matters.

There is another telegram dated at Winnipeg, April 13, 1915. It is sent by ex-Premier Sir Rodmond Roblin to Hon. Robert Rogers, and is as follows:

Conditions here demand your immediate presence if you are to accomplish what is desired. Imperative you leave to-night. Answer.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. Are these telegrams relevant to the subject under discussion?

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly. They are relevant to the question under discussion, as an objection to the introduction of this Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: There is only one way to question the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was not ruled out of order. I would advise my hon. friend to keep his encyclopedia closed for a moment. He is not the whole earth, the heavens above, the waters beneath, and everything else that God created. Let him allow other people to mind their own business.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. gentleman show that the reading of these telegrams is relevant to the question under consideration?

Mr. McKENZIE: I have one more telegram to read, and then I will show as far as I can that they are relevant.

Mr. CURRIE: I will have to ask you, Mr. Chairman, for a ruling. We have sat here during the whole sitting listening to the member for North Cape Breton occupy the time of the committee, spending thousands of dollars of the people's money, repeating old yarns and old statements. I ask if the hon. member is in order in reading those telegrams?

Mr. McKENZIE: The point is that these documents are too hot for my hon. friend.

There is no barn behind which he can get now.

The CHAIRMAN: Can the hon. member show that the reading of these telegrams is relevant to the matter that we are now considering? The rules are quite clear that discussion must be relevant.

Mr. CURRIE: I rise to a point of order. I ask that the rules of the House be observed. The rules of decorum require that when the Chairman rises the hon. gentleman who has the floor shall take his seat. I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that the member for North Cape Breton has not obeyed that rule, and never does.

Mr. McKENZIE: I never saw the member for North Simcoe right in anything; perhaps he is right now. He should remember the castigation the Prime Minister gave him on one occasion in connection with a ruling of the Chair. I understand you to intimate, Mr. Chairman, that you were open to conviction if I should show you that my remarks were relevant to the matter under discussion. We are showing that this legislation is improper; that it was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity; that it should never have been introduced; that it had its origin in an attempt to defeat the ends of justice in Manitoba.

I am showing by these telegrams that sinister motives and influences were, from the very inception of this trouble, being brought to bear upon this Government. For that reason I am reading these telegrams proving, with other matters, that this thing had its origin in an idea of preventing those men from being properly tried; that the whole thing from the beginning was a conspiracy, and that influence was brought to bear upon the Government to interfere, some of them saying: Dismiss the Governor; others saying: Buy the governor; give him money. I have another telegram that will show that further sinister motives were influential. As I have been allowed to read those telegrams, I might be allowed to finish. I am, Sir, however, subject to your ruling. We have been discussing all the afternoon the fact that there were motives behind this legislation. I am going to the very beginning and root of these things and showing that those telegrams prove what I say.

Mr. CROTHERS: I submit that the whole argument so far put forward by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) is out of order. We have had the second reading of this Bill when the principal of it was determined upon. We are now in committee. It is not open to any member of this committee to discuss the principle of this Bill now. My hon. friend has not said a word with regard to any of the details of the Bill. We are in committee to discuss the details, not the principle, of the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: By that suggestion of my hon. friend regarding the point of order, he establishes an altogether new rule which will not be found in the Rules of the House. It has been the custom in this House, ever since I became a member of it, to discuss in committee the principle of a Bill as well as the details. Time and again, at the request of the Government, the second reading of a Bill has been allowed, and all the discussion has taken place in committee.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is not so in this case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is another very good reason, too, namely, that the Minister of Justice went fully into the reasons for this Bill, went into the motives which had actuated him when introducing it, referred to the situation of affairs in Manitoba and discussed the whole matter quite fully.

Mr. CROTHERS: That was only in reply.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister was allowed to do that, and it is surely quite open to my hon. friend to deal with the same matter.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member is confounding what I said on the second reading of the Bill, with what I said in committee. When I spoke on this Bill, I was speaking in reply on the motion for the second reading of the Bill, and I may point out that I made the suggestion, when some little discussion arose, when there was some little flutter about the question whether I had had an opportunity to explain or not, that perhaps we might get out of that difficulty if we went into committee, and then I could give the explanations which were thought desirable and which it was thought I had with more or less sinister purpose refrained from making. My suggestion was quite rejected, and it was insisted upon that we were on the second reading of the Bill, and that, therefore, I could say nothing but my reply. My suggestion that we should throw the whole matter open in committee was absolutely rejected, and we proceeded accordingly. I do not, therefore, think there is anything to be made on the point of order out of what I said which was upon the second reading, and I do not think there is any reason to depart from what I understand to be the rule, namely, that we are now dealing with the details of the Bill, because hon. gentlemen opposite insisted that we should deal completely with the principle of the Bill on the second reading.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did not the minister in committee speak of the purity of his motives?

Mr. DOHERTY: That was not in committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did not the minister in committee say that he was proud of the Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the minister has forgotten.

Mr. DOHERTY: All that burst of eloquence was for the benefit of the House. Since we have become a committee, I think even my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) will do me the justice of saying that I have been very reserved in my observations.

Mr. CARVELL: A great change has come over the dreams of the minister since we came into committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Under the rules of this House, the details of a Bill are discussed in committee. Subsection 5 of rule 13 says:

> Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) read many telegrams not at all connected with the section, and, on a section, he was discussing supposed motives in regard to the Bill. Under these circumstances, I must decide that the hon. member was out of order.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will abide by your ruling, Sir, and I will not read these telegrams, but I have not finished my remarks.

Mr. CURRIE: As you have ruled in that way, I think, Sir, you should rule that those telegrams be struck out of Hansard. I would ask for a ruling on that point.

Mr. McKENZIE: This purist from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) does not want the truth to be known.

The CHAIRMAN: It is for the committee to decide.

Mr. CURRIE: Then put it to the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: All that I was pointing out was that notwithstanding the fact that the shoe pinches the hon. member for North Simcoe, who seems to be the "chucker-out" of the other side when any occasion arises—

Mr. CURRIE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has made a reference to me which I think is unparliamentary and altogether uncalled for. Hon. members on this side who are opposed to him have been accustomed to listening to his abuse in this House and taking it in silence, but I think it is time there should be a limit set to the manner in which he abuses hon. gentlemen in violation of the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) to speak relevantly to the section under discussion.

Mr. McKENZIE: Chucker-out is perhaps not relevant. I am satisfied to take that position.

Mr. CURRIE: What is a chucker-out?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am absolutely in the hands of the Chairman, and I will abide by his ruling. What I was pointing out, and what I could have pointed out without the use of any documents at all, was that improper influences were brought to bear upon this Government in connection with the Manitoba scandals from their very inception, and I have proved that from those telegrams. There is evidence under my hand, and there is, I am sure, evidence in the possession of the Government which will show that after Judge Macdonald—

Mr. CROTHERS: I rise to a point of order. Are those remarks relevant to the section under consideration?

Mr. GRAHAM: Is not the Bill embodied in one section?

Mr. CROTHERS: There is only one section.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to be always on my feet to call on an hon. member to speak relevantly, but I think if he would come back to the section itself and discuss its merits, that would be better.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am saying that this section should never have been introduced, and I repeat what I said before, that it has been conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, and I have been attempting to show its genesis, and now we are down to its revelation.

The Minister of Justice would not have thought of this legislation were it not for his confederates from Manitoba, not one of whom is here to defend him to-night when they get him into trouble. The motives that gave rise to those telegrams are the same motives and purposes which brought about this legislation. Those telegrams are just as much part of the record as the Orders in Council that were read and put in evidence; they were put in without a word of comment. I submit that the telegrams are coming down very close to the Government when they are directed to such an important member as the Minister of Public Works. He promised that he would be active in this matter and do everything he could to protect the men who were so desperately scared that they wanted the Prime Minister to advise the removal of the Governor, and they also purposed to buy Judge Macdonald by giving a commission to his son. That is contained in those telegrams, That is the character of the influence that was brought to bear upon this Government, when finally, after everything else failed, they introduced this legislation to block the trial. That is my criticism of this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend the Minister of Justice questioned a statement which I made this afternoon that the Crown prosecutor, after he asks jurors to stand by, can then only challenge for cause,—cannot challenge peremptorily.

Mr. DOHERTY: He has his four peremptory challenges.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My statement was that he must exercise his peremptory challenges first. If he orders jurors to stand by after that, he can only challenge for cause. My hon. friend questioned that, and I should like to refer him to section 928 of the Criminal Code, which I think will convince him I was right. My statement was in accordance with what I always understood the law to be; that was my recollection of the way the law was administered when I happened to be in charge of the administration of the criminal law in my own province. Section 928 says:

> If, by challenges and directions to stand by, the panel is exhausted without leaving a sufficient number to form a jury, those who have been directed to stand by shall be again called in the order in which they were drawn, and shall be sworn, unless challenged by the accused, or unless the prosecutor challenges them and shows cause why they should not be sworn.

So I think it is absolutely clear that the counsel for the Crown, if he desires to exercise the right of peremptory challenge, must do so before he orders the jurors to stand by.

I think that the views which have been presented by my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) are views which ought to have very great weight with the Minister of Justice, and if nothing else will prevail upon him, they ought to have the effect of inducing him to withdraw the Bill from the consideration of the committee. There is no more loyal supporter of the Government in this House than that hon. gentleman. He has had a long experience in legal matters, and I have no doubt much experience in the administration of the criminal law. As a Government supporter, bound as he would be to the Government by just the same ties that bind us on this side of the House to our leader, it would be with great reluctance that he would present a different view. I take it that my hon. friend, disposed as he would be to view favourably government measures, has felt constrained to express his opinion against this Bill and to state that he will vote against it at every stage on which it may be presented for consideration. My hon. friend has presented the view that we may have prosecutions of more than usual importance in this country. That is just possible; I do not know whether it may be so or not. But I do say that every man who wishes to see the criminal law of this country properly administered should take the position of my hon. friend from North Perth and vote against this Bill. It is a Bill which is calculated to weaken and to paralyse the administration of justice in important cases in which public feeling is roused, and I say that from a long experience extending over 35 or 40 years in administering the criminal laws, and in prosecuting for the greater part of that time. I know of many, many cases where I have had 75 to 100 jurymen summoned because of the widespread feeling that existed in the community, and if I had been limited in the right to "stand-by" the jurors to 48, as this Bill proposes, leaving 50 jurors whom I would have not right to "stand-by," no right to challenge peremptorily, whom I could only challenge for cause, and if, as is provided by this Bill, I had had to call witnesses or make affidavits showing why I should be allowed to "stand-by" additional jurors, my efforts in administering the law would, for reasons which any lawyer will understand, have been very much hampered, and, indeed, almost paralysed.

Is it wise to pass a law of this kind at any time? My hon. friend from North Perth refers to the present time, but at any time, in the interests of society, in the interests of good government, in the interests of the proper administration of the criminal law, is it wise to make an amendment which will weaken the administration of justice, and give greater opportunities for the escape of criminals? Is it wise to do that without the slightest evidence being presented to this committee that any evils have resulted from the present law, or that there has been any dissatisfaction on the part of the public with the way in which the law has been administered?

Reference has been made to our judiciary. I take pride, as other hon. gentlemen do, in the fact that with few exceptions here and there, this country has reason to be proud of its judiciary. But I think the same may be said of those from whom the judiciary of this country is constituted; that is, those who are practising at the Bar, and particularly those who have been charged, as Attorney Generals, Solicitor Generals and King's Counsel, with the prosecution of criminals and with discharging the most important functions in connection with the administration of the criminal law. Speaking generally, just as generally as one can speak, with regard to the judiciary of this country, they have performed their duties honestly and well, and I do not think they have ever shown—at all events, not to my knowledge—any desire but to do what is absolutely fair as between the Crown and those who have been accused of violating the law. But do not weaken their hands. We know how desperately an accused will fight for his liberty or his life.

We know how desperately his counsel will fight for him, and no blame can be attached to him for doing so. It requires the greatest judgment, the greatest care, and the most minute inquiry with reference to the personnel of a jury to get a fair and impartial jury, prepared honestly to discharge its duty and to do justice as between the Crown and the prisoner at the Bar. The difficulties surrounding the work of Crown counsel are very great. Forty or fifty years ago Parliament passed this law, giving to those who are indicted for murder the right to challenge summarily and peremptorily twenty of the jurors, and giving them an unlimited right to challenge for cause; limiting the right of the Crown to challenge peremptorily only four members of the jury, and providing that unless a jury, consisting of twelve members, were unanimous in their verdict, there could be no conviction, and still leaving upon the statute book that right of the Crown counsel to cause the jurors to stand by. I say we should hesitate before we weaken the law as it has stood there all those years, ever since this country has been a confederation, and particularly without any evidence or any suggestion that any evils have existed in connection with the administration of that law. I appeal to my hon. friend, as one who knows something of the administration of the criminal law and the difficulties which surround it, and the difficulties which stand in the way of securing convictions, to withdraw this Bill. He is bringing it before the House without any complaint from the Attorneys General of the provinces of Canada, who are charged with the administration of the criminal law, and whose duty it is to see that criminals are punished. Without consulting them or asking their advice, the Minister of Justice, who has nothing to do with the administration of the criminal law except so far as recommending the passage of statutes in this Parliament is concerned, is seeking to make this radical change, this change of enormous importance in the constitution of the courts which are to try criminals, and this without seeing that there has ever been the slightest evil or cause for dissatisfaction. I do not think he ought to do it. I do not think he should press this Bill. My view is that he should simply ask that progress be reported, and allow the matter to pass over in that way.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I have been listening with a great deal of attention to all that has been said on both sides and I absolutely concur in the statement which has been made, namely, that the amendment to the Act, now before you, is a most important one.

The administration of justice, in the province of Quebec, where I have had the honour of being the Crown prosecutor for almost twelve years past, has not taken cognizance of any error; nothing, absolutely nothing has happened, nor has been done that might justify the hon. Minister of Justice for introducing this Act.

I have practised at the Bar, before the assizes, several years before I was appointed Crown prosecutor, I have heard the most influential men, the most distinguished speakers who ever passed before the assizes, and never did any one surmise that the amendment now proposed could have its raison d'être.

I have just heard the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Wilson) who, is not a novice in our assizes—he is certainly one of the most distinguished lawyers practising before that tribunal—and when he was discussing the inopportunity of this Act a few moments ago, it were only doing him fair and full justice to tell the hon. members of the House that the reasons offered by the hon. member for Laval are absolutely right, and I beg leave, Mr. Chairman, to add a few words to what he has stated.

The sherriff who has in his hands the municipal lists of the whole Montreal district, uses those municipal lists when choosing, appointing or summoning the grand jurors as well as the petit jurors, and taking them, as far as possible, from the various counties comprising the district.

We have the right, the Crown attorneys as well as the lawyers for the defence, to look into the summons of the grand and petit jurors and the delay granted both the grand and petit jurors, in their respective classes, is only granted with a view to finding out whether there have been any errors or complaints. If they have any reason to offer for being exempted or discharged, they report to the Crown Attorney or to the clerk of the court and it is up to them to study their cases. If they are not qualified to act as petit or as grand jurors, we immediately replace them; we give the sherriff order to discharge them and to summon other men to replace them before the opening of the term.

The Crown, under the present Act, has the absolute right of saying "stand aside," when a juror is called, without stating any cause. It would be really painful, it would even be humiliating for the Crown to give the reasons for which we accept or do not accept the juror who has been summoned.

The hon. Minister of Justice does not realize in what a state of perplexity he would put the Crown, were we obliged to state the reasons why we want a larger number of jurors than the forty-eight he proposes. It would be rather humiliating to state before the public, before the jury, before the sixty jurors who have been summoned, that we need a larger number than forty-eight for the purposes of the trial. Indeed, no one thinks of the serious plights the Crown Attorney would find himself in, should we be obliged to make an inquiry, to decide the pro and con, to give the reasons wherefor it would be necessary to have more than forty-eight jurors. It would imperil both the Crown and the culprit's interest.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Justice has just told this House that this Act will give the culprit a greater protection. I venture to say that instead of giving the culprit any protection, you will rather take away that protection from him. When sixty jurors are summoned the prisoner at the bar is entited to the opinion and assistance of these sixty jurors.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): Certainly.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): Would this objection be met if, in this Bill, we substituted sixty jurors to forty-eight? This provision would leave the province of Quebec in her present position. The difficulty we are trying to settle is the one offered in cases where there is no limit as to the number of jurors fixed by the law. As I have already stated to the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Wilson), if good reasons can be offered for justifying such a change I will not hesitate and adopt the suggestion to change to sixty the number of forty-eight. I do not know if such a provision would meet the objections of my hon. friend, but, at all events, that number of sixty jurors would leave the province of Quebec in her present condition.

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): In reply to the hon. Minister of Justice, I may tell him that the law, such as it is in our statutes, works perfectly, and I have never heard of any complaint, or grievance, in a word, of anything reprehensible against it. That law ordains that the sheriff of Montreal shall summon sixty jurors, of whom thirty are English-speaking and thirty French-speaking. We, therefore, summon these sixty jurors, and to anyone of them, as they are being called, the Crown has the right to say: stand aside, stay where you are, you will not concur in the formation of the jury, and that, without giving any reasons. As far as the accused is concerned, the law determines how many jurymen he has the right to challenge; he can even challenge them all for cause; for instance, if he has grievances against them, sufficient reasons to eliminate them from the jury, such as questions of kinship, of personal interest or others. If the judge decides that the reasons offered are not sufficient, the accused has the right to recuse only a small number of the jurymen.

I may tell the hon. Minister of Justice that if he knew these matters as I do and if he wants full justice meted to all, he should put aside the smallest number of jurymen possible. In my long experience at the Bar, we have very seldom put aside more than three or four jurors, when the jury was being formed, for when the accused perceives that the Crown Attorney asks the elimination of a large number of the jurymen, he feels uneasy and believes the Crown is prejudiced against him, that it is ill inclined towards him. If the accused is in such dispositions, he will try and entangle the formation of the jury and may prevent full justice being rendered. Now, moreover, in the application of this law, it happens but very seldom that the Crown avails itself of its privilege of putting aside two or three jurors whilst the defence examines the composition of the jury and for reason of rivalries of lawsuits, of disputes or for personal reasons, generally exhausts the right it is granted by the law.

Why take away from the Crown the power it has to stand aside the number of jurors it may see fit?

As so well expressed by the hon. member for Laval, as well as by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Morphy), that would likely tend to lessen the Crown's power, and it is desirable that we should have, as representatives of His Majesty, absolute powers. It is important that we should be given the power to summon the jury to the best of our judgment and knowledge, and also to stand aside, such and such of these jurors for any reason whatever, in order to give full justice to the accused, and here I may remind the hon. Minister of Justice that he must not forget that, as representatives of the Attorney General, we are, so to say, the standing justice and just as interested that justice be meted out as the sitting justice, himself could be, and the Crown prosecutor who would deliberately assume to exhaust the list, to exhaust the panel of jurymen, would not be worthy of his high office.

It seems to me that we should not presume that those who are called upon to assist in the fair administration of justice can take it upon themselves to do unfair acts, acts that would be regrettable or reprovable. That cannot be supposed. Should such a thing happen, as the hon. Minister of Justice has stated, the Crown Attorneys are human, they may err, just as judges may err, as magistrates may make mistakes; but there would be something most regrettable were this Bill to become law.

As stated by the hon. member for Laval, when referring to the Bill now before the House:

> "Unless the judge presiding at the trial, upon special cause shown, so order."

I doubt whether it would be wise to give the judge presiding at the trial, a discretion which the law does not allow him to-day. As I have just said, Mr. Chairman, Crown attorneys are human, they may err; judges also are human and are also liable to be mistaken. The Crown attorneys are not more interested than the judges themselves. We are not paid to win cases; the Crown attorneys are paid by the State a fixed salary, and we have absolutely no interest to do anything which might not be of a nature to render justice to the accused. It is all to the contrary, and I believe that the members of the Bar now before me will do me that justice and render due justice to those who have preceded me: Hon. Justice Lafontaine, Hon. Justice Guerin, Col. Hibbard and a great many others who have filled the office of Crown prosecutor.

I think I am not going too far when I say that these gentlemen were all honourable men about whose conduct we never heard any complaint I say then, that to give discretion to the presiding judge is a dangerous thing from the view point of the administration of justice as well as from the view point of the accused.

I should like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the fact that if an investigation were to take place, that would necessarily cause delays, and would not permit of such quick disposal of cases as is essential in the criminal courts. When there are 150 cases on the roll, for a single term, if the Crown has to show cause in each case why more than forty-eight jurors may be asked to stand aside, if we have to investigate, it will require twice as much time to exhaust the panel.

When all the jurors have been summoned, has not the accused the right to say: "I leave it to the representative of the Crown; I leave it to his righteousness, to his honesty, to his responsibility, to his long experience and I am sure that he will do nothing, absolutely nothing to prejudice my case"?

A great deal has been said about things that took place in Manitoba. I will not speak about that, because I know nothing of the facts. I have but a very imperfect and incidental knowledge of the case. But in the province of Quebec, ever since I have been a practising member of the Bar, I have seen many cases conducted by the most distinguished members of the Montreal Bar and perhaps of the Dominion, and it has never entered the mind of any one that a measure as the one now under discussion could be brought down.

The jurors, Mr. Chairman, are summoned for twelve days. Sixty jurors are summoned and must stay at the disposal of the Crown during twelve days. If the delay is too short; if we see that it will not be possible to get through with all the cases in the twelve days, the sheriff is instructed to summon a new panel—two and even three if necessary—and sixty jurors are summoned each time—a panel is composed of sixty jurors.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Justice has given no good reason to justify the adoption of this Bill and I repeat the saying that I once heard in this House: Let well enough alone.

If the minister had stated a case or cases in order to establish the necessity of such a Bill, I would be the first man to approve of it and to say to my hon. friend: "You are quite right." If exceptional cases had been reported, if it had been established that some representatives of the Crown had taken undue advantage of their position, I would be the first man to approve of the change, but as the minister does not show cause, since he states no facts, and since he gives no good reason, I say again: "Let well enough alone."

Bill reported.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden, House adjourned at 11.20.

Friday, August 10, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE REPORT OF JUSTICES McLEOD-TELLIER.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That the report of the McLeod-Tellier Commission and the evidence taken before the said Commission, laid on the table of the House on July 27 ultimo and August 9 instant, respectively, be printed forthwith and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. MURPHY: Does that include the evidence taken before Judge Galt?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think it does. I do not know whether that has been laid on the Table; I will make inquiry.

[Mr. Lafortune.]

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILL.

Bill No. 126, for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon.—Mr. Edwards.

THE CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

PAYMENTS ON INTEREST ACCOUNT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM: In order that the Bill in connection with the Canadian Northern may be expedited, I would ask the Minister of Finance—in his absence, the Prime Minister—to bring down a statement showing how much had been paid by the Canadian Northern Railway company on interest account under section 29 of the Act of 1914 and how much money the Government had advanced on that interest account. Section 29 reads:

The Governor in Council may at the request of the Canadian Northern out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund pay all or any portion of the first six half-yearly payments of interest on the guaranteed securities falling due after the opening for traffic as part of the Canadian Northern system of the through line from Vancouver to the city of Quebec, but in such case the Governor in Council shall not enforce the repayment thereof against the Canadian Northern under the New Trust Deed until the maturity of the principal of the guaranteed securities. The Canadian Northern shall, however, pending the repayment of interest so paid by the Governor in Council, pay to His Majesty half-yearly interest on such interest at the rate of four per cent per annum, and such interest upon interest until so paid shall form a charge upon the mortgaged premises under the New Trust Deed.

What I want to know is how much money the Government paid out on this account and how much money the company paid as interest on the interest so advanced by the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall ask the Minister of Finance to see that the information is provided.

ATTENDANCE OF SOLDIERS AT POLITICAL MEETINGS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): I wish to call the attention of the Government to a despatch appearing in the press this morning, as follows:

London, Aug. 9.—Members of Canadian forces have had their attention drawn to the King's regulations forbidding them the right of attending political meetings in uniform. A similar reminder has been issued to the Imperials.

The despatch further says that the question having been raised in the British House of Commons, Mr. Macpherson, for the War Cabinet, replied:

I understand the War Cabinet have decided that the regulations are to be strictly and impartially enforced and soldiers are not to join soldiers' and workmen's councils.

A large number of returned soldiers are now in Canada, still in uniform—men who have done their bit and who are of no further military service, though they are still amenable to military discipline. I should like to ask the Government if they have noticed this statement and whether they will make provision whereby these men will have the ordinary citizens' rights and will not be affected by any such order as is mentioned in this despatch.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The attention of the Government had not previously been directed to the subject. We will give it the consideration which the hon. gentleman asks.

Mr. GRAHAM: Several soldiers are candidates.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT.

SECOND READING AND CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Frank Cochrane (Minister of Railways and Canals) Bill No. 118, to amend the Government Railways Act, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Davidson in the Chair.

On section 2—Definition:

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister explain the purport and effect of this measure?

Mr. COCHRANE: The effect of the Bill is to put the Government railways under the operation of the Railway Commission. Everything is put under the control of the commission except the expropriation clauses; and any actions taken against the railway go to the Exchequer Court instead of being dealt with in the usual manner.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister received any representations from persons or interests in the Maritime Provinces asking that this be done?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I have not.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Or any against it?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: This measure is a very important one, affecting the business interests of the Maritime Provinces and I think that more notice should have been given to the public of the Government's intention to deal with it. In view of the other subjects that have been engaging the attention of Parliament, the people of the Maritime Provinces are not familiar with this very important measure which the minister is introducing.

In brief, it is an anomalous position that the Government which owns and has been operating a public utility and which still purposes operating it, should create a condition under which an outside body should form a sort of regulating influence upon the Government of the day. One can well understand the reason why a private company controlling a railway should be placed under the supervision and regulation of a commission. The Board of Railway Commissioners, which has been in operation for some ten years, was constituted so that the public might have the advantage of the control and regulation which a commission would have over the operations of a private company which was handling a great enterprise. The minister now says that the Government which owns and operates the Canadian Government railways, are not able to deal with this question themselves, but they must create a commission which is to direct and control them in reference to certain matters concerning the operation of this railway. That is an anomalous position and one which is entirely new in the realm of government ownership and operation of public utilities, concerning which we hear so much nowadays. Does the minister mean to say that he has no confidence in himself or in his officials, and that he must, therefore, have the benefit and advantage of the control of Sir Henry Drayton and his officials in order to properly operate this railway, because that is what is involved in this Bill?

There is another phase of the situation. The Intercolonial railway is the only railway in Canada which was constituted by virtue of the terms of the British North America Act. It will be recalled that, what were at the time of Confederation these far away provinces of the Dominion, viewed, with some doubt and misgiving, the proposition of entering the Confederation by reason of the effect that would have upon their business interests, and the scheme of constructing what was known as the Intercolonial railway was put forward by the Fathers of Confederation for the purpose of doing away with the isolation by distance of the Maritime Provinces from the then central provinces of Canada. The viewpoint of the people of the Maritime Provinces—particularly of the province from which I come, where our industries arising out of our natural resources are of such character that to a very great degree our products so far as the markets of Canada are concerned, must be transported over the Intercolonial railway—has been that the extension of that railway as a government work, on account of the conditions which exist in consequence of the Government of the day being responsible to the people and thereby able to deal with particular matters as they may, from time to time, arise, and it is a matter which is not lightly to be disregarded. I have never heard of any agitation from any part of the Maritime Provinces that this railway should be dealt with in such a way that the Government should be under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the proposition will be viewed with a considerable degree of doubt and hesitancy by the people of those provinces. I am, therefore, surprised that at this juncture, without any preparation of the public mind on the subject, without apparently the interests affected in those provinces being considered, the minister should take such a radical step. It is due to the House and to the country that the minister or his colleagues should explain in the fullest possible manner the reasons that have led the Government to take this course, and why it is that the Government of this country want to subordinate themselves, in so far as the operation of a public utility is concerned, to the Railway Commission. Is there any reason why my hon. friend, as Minister of Railways, or his officials, could not, with regard to any phase of the operation of the Canadian Government railways, if there is any advantage to be gained by so doing, exercise this same supervision which is conferred upon the Railway Commission? This is the first time that I have ever heard of a Government of a country, which was operating a public utility, declare that they required some watch-dog to look after them, or somebody who should dictate to them what they should do. If this is to be the case with the operation of the Canadian Government railways, why should there not, for instance, be in regard to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries some board to direct and control what his movements should be as regards the operation of the vessels belonging to his department? Why should there be anybody greater or stronger than the Government of the day who should undertake to tell the Government that they should do this, that, or the other thing? Why should the Government not move in the interest of the people themselves?

In view of the absence of any suggestion from the provinces affected, and in view of the fact that the minister has never submitted the matter to the people in those provinces, I am at a loss to know why the Government should make this proposition at this time, to a very large degree in a surreptitious way. Neither the press nor the people of this country ever heard of this proposition until it was mentioned in this House the other day.

Mr. COCHRANE: As regards our not giving any notice of this proposition or of its not having been discussed, I may say that the hon. member was a member of the special committee on Bill No. 13. This matter was discussed several times in that committee, and it was urged by some hon. gentleman opposite. The matter has been discussed more or less ever since I have been in this House, and I therefore cannot take the same view as that taken by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). No matter what minister may be operating that line, there will always be a difference of opinion between him and the patrons of the road, and I think we should have this safeguard, especially as it looks as though the Government were going into further government ownership. Therefore, the more independently those government lines can be operated, the better it will be in the interest of the country. I certainly am a strong advocate of this proposition. The Railway Board is a splendid institution in the interest of this country, and as long as I am Minister of Railways, I am willing to go under their direction and to abide by and obey their decisions. The only reason why I am not putting the expropriation of lands under their control is because the Exchequer Court was created for that purpose. I am sure a number of my hon. friend's colleagues on his side of the House will agree with me that this proposition is in the public interest.

Mr. CARVELL: I am very sorry to be compelled to disagree with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), whose views on public matters are usually orthodox, but I must differ from him on the question of placing the government railways under the control of the Railway Board. My only objection is that the minister is not going far enough. Possibly there may be some reason for withholding from the operation of the Railway Act the expropriation rights. I can quite understand that if the Crown wishes to acquire property or land, possibly the better way for the Government to obtain it is under the Expropriation Act. Then the damages are assessed by the Exchequer Court. I think possibly, so far as the Crown is concerned, it works out better than the ordinary arbitration proceedings under the Railway Act, but I never could understand why, if the Government is going to be a railway company, and is going to assume all the rights and duties of a railway company, they should not also be liable for all the obligations of a company, because, so far as the people are concerned, they are simply a public utility corporation. They have the right to build their road, levy tolls, run their engines through the country, and burn up people's property as an incident of operating a railway. You cannot run a railway by fire without having the danger by fire, or without the danger of killing the people's stock.

Mr. COCHRANE: We are providing for that.

Mr. CARVELL: I realize that in small actions we already have the right to sue the Government in the ordinary courts of the country, but I cannot see why there should be any distinction between suing the Government in the small action and suing them in a large action. I think the amount is now limited to $400.

Mr. COCHRANE: $500.

Mr. CARVELL: I had a case within the last few months which illustrates this point very well. A man living up at St. Leonard, in New Brunswick, had a barn burned in the spring of 1916, and there is not the faintest doubt in the world that the barn was set on fire by a spark from an engine on the Intercolonial, because the engine went by, and in about ten minutes the barn was on fire and consumed. The value of the property lost amounted to about $1,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That proposition would not carry you through a logical school, would it?

Mr. CARVELL: We have won lots of cases under just such circumstances.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is the way the lawyer gets along.

Mr. GRAHAM: No wonder they kick on the judges.

Mr. CARVELL: The circumstances I have related are good evidence. I have won cases on just such evidence, and other counsel have succeeded on similar evidence. It is a good cause of action. But the difficulty was, here was a poor farmer, and I had to advise him that, unless he reduced his claim to $500, his only recourse was to sue the Government in the Exchequer Court. He would have to see the Minister of Justice and get a fiat authorizing him to bring the suit. Then he had to fight it out in Ottawa. The man said to me: "I will lose my farm. It is out of the question. I could not do it." I do not want to go so far as to say that I advised him to start the lawsuit, but at any rate he would not do it, because he said "I am not going to take chances of losing all the rest of my farm. I have lost my barn and my personal property, but I want to keep my farm." I wrote to the minister and it was referred to the general manager, and he sent somebody up there a second time. They sent the claims agent who turned the thing down in the first instance, and I do not know whether they have settled or not. I think they have arranged the matter. However, that is a case in point. If we can bring an action in the ordinary courts up to $500, why on earth should we not use them for $1,000 or $5,000? Surely the ordinary courts of any province in Canada are to be trusted in an action against the Crown, just as well as the Exchequer Court is trusted. The litigants and solicitors all over Canada know the practice and know their rights. You can tell a man in the province of New Brunswick: "I can bring an action for you in the Supreme Court of New Brunswick; it will be tried at home, under our ordinary laws and rules." And he will say: "All right, I am sure I will get justice." And he brings the action. But if you tell him he has to go to Ottawa and get the consent of the Minister of Justice before he can start his suit, and that it must be tried by the Exchequer Court, he says, "No, that is beyond my means," and he will not do it. For these reasons I think the Minister of Justice might very well consider the advisability of not withdrawing from the operation of this Bill suits against the Crown. If he wishes to withdraw the right of expropriation, I have not much objection. As to the general principle, perhaps I ought to state that I think I was the first member to suggest, in the proceedings of the special committee on Bill 13, for the codification of the Railway Act, that the Intercolonial should be brought under the operation of the General Railway Act of Canada. I have heard very much discussion about it, I do not know whether it would be popular or unpopular in the Maritime Provinces, because it has not been discussed to any great extent, and I was not approaching it from that standpoint at all, but from the standpoint of one who has had some practice in the courts, and some knowledge of railway affairs, and I do not see why one railway should be singled out in Canada to be governed by different laws and different principles from those that govern all other railways in Canada, especially as it is a government railway. There is no earthly difference in the object of the Intercolonial and that of any other railway. The object ought to be to serve the public at a fair remuneration, and give the people the very best service which possibly can be given for the money. I am not finding fault with the present minister in what I am going to say, because his conduct, or his operation of the road, is only a continuation of what has taken place for a great many years. Therefore, there is no political significance in this statement.

I think I am voicing the sentiments of every hon. gentleman in this House who has travelled and has had business with the Intercolonial, and with other railway companies, when I say that everybody admits that a very unsatisfactory condition of things exists, as far as the Intercolonial is concerned. You are tied up by all sorts of rules and regulations. If you want a siding put in on the Intercolonial it will take you six months before you can obtain consent to it, because the first man you go to will put the responsibility on somebody else, and then the second man will put the responsibility on somebody else, and finally, after a process of elimination, they will get it back to the minister, and the minister eliminates everybody else and gets it back to the general manager, and probably at the end of six months you might get a decision, and I would not say that you would get what you want. There ought to be some way by which you could go to a board like the Railway Board and let them lay down the law. They would say that the Government of Canada, if they are going to be a railway company, ought or ought not to give the man the accommodation which he demands. Get away from all political feeling, and give the people to understand that politicians have nothing to say about it. Under the ordinary railway law, if you want a siding, or a right to establish a certain thing, or if a certain right be taken away from you, you go to the Railway Board, and they will say yes, or no, and they will say it in about five minutes. The first time I appeared before the Railway Board I complained of the Canadian Pacific railway taking a siding away from the warehouse of a client of mine, and I came there armed with quite a brief, and witnesses to substantiate the case, and I got the decision before I knew it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did you get a fee?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and the siding.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Very much disappointed?

Mr. CARVELL: I got what I was after before I knew it. That is the way business is done by the Railway Board. If that had been a government railway I would not have got the decision yet, and that is eight or ten years ago. I give this illustration to show the great benefit of having these matters under the Railway Board, instead of under a political management. I do not care whether it be my hon. friend the Minister of Railways who is operating it, or my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), it is a political affair, and you cannot get away from it. The present operation of the Intercolonial is a political operation, and as long as it is run as a government road I am afraid it will be a political operation.

An hon. MEMBER: Not necessarily.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend says "not necessarily." Well, there must be a great regeneration in the minds of the people of Canada if you can run a government railway without having it a political affair. I think my hon. friends opposite will pretty nearly agree that what I am saying is correct.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) had charge of it, he would run it as a non-political railway.

Mr. CARVELL: Possibly he would, but he is an outstanding exception. Ordinary people obey the ordinary laws of humanity. You can talk all afternoon showing wherein you can get things done under the Railway Board on the Intercolonial, which you cannot get done at the present time. I know many people in the Martime Provinces fear that there may be an increase in freight rates if the road is placed under the control of the Railway Board. I would be very sorry indeed to see such a result, but we must realize that Canada is facing the most serious financial condition she ever dreamed of, and if the Government is going to run a public utility it must be run on business principles. It must be made to pay, if it is right and proper it should pay. While I would be sorry to see an increase in freight rates, still if it is necessary in order that the road may be run as a business proposition, the rates should be increased. Those are things we have to face, and I am getting old enough that I would like to see these utilities run on a business basis, so long as they are going to take the place of utilities that ought to be run on a business basis.

The press has been paying some attention to me in the last few days in connection with my views on public ownership, and I rather feel like reiterating them. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways may be a good business man, but he cannot run a railroad, as a government railroad. I think if he were president of a company railroad, and were running it as a business proposition, I would have about as much confidence in him as in any man I know, but he is not big enough to control the politicians, and he is not big enough to give the service we should have on the Intercolonial. Compare the service on the Intercolonial with the service on the Canadian Pacific, and you will wonder if both roads are in the same country. If a man starts out on a journey on the Intercolonial he allows twenty-four hours leeway. If he wants to be in Montreal on a certain day, he is pretty sure of being there at the same hour the day following, whereas if he travels by the Canadian Pacific railway he is safe with fifteen or twenty minutes leeway.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is all nonsense.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is not nonsense. I know what I am talking about. I travel by the Canadian Pacific railway once a week, and I travel by the Intercolonial about once every three months. I have never travelled over the Intercolonial in the last ten years that I have not registered a vow of "never again." I have broken my vow, but I always register it. This condition of affairs is not the fault of the minister. It is the fault of the system. It is the fault of government ownership, or government operation. If you can get the Intercolonial established on a business basis in certain things, and get certain rights from the Railway Board, it might have a rejuvenating effect on other portions of the railway. For those reasons, I am in favour of the proposition, except I think the minister should place the rights of suit against the railway under the ordinary law of the land, and treat the Intercolonial as an ordinary public utility, subject to all the laws and obligations of the country; and if it trespasses upon a man's rights he should be entitled to go before the ordinary courts of justice to obtain redress, just as he would do if he were dealing with the Canadian Pacific railway or any other private corporation.

Mr. MARCIL: It must be admitted that the Intercolonial occupies a unique position among the railways of Canada. It was built as part and parcel of the Confederation arrangement. The Intercolonial railway has had many difficulties to overcome, and if the road had been built merely for commercial purposes, probably a very different route would have been followed. For various reasons they were obliged to follow the route they did in order to overcome natural obstacles, to fulfil political considerations, and to complete the bargain that had been arrived at in the Maritime Provinces. I have heard it contended in this House on many occasions that the Intercolonial railway, the Post Office Department, and various other branches of the public service which are operated by the Government for the benefit of the public, should not be operated merely for the purpose of making money. The Intercolonial railway is not in the position of an ordinary private company with dividends to pay. The Intercolonial is serving a great public purpose along a route where a private company would have been very loath and very slow to build a line. The road is subject to water competition over practically its whole length. We are told that it was built in that way because the Imperial Government requirements had made it necessary that it should be close to the water. However, that is a remote question at the moment. About twenty-five miles of my constituency is served by the Intercolonial. I know if anything is sent direct to Halifax or St. John the same rate prevails on the Intercolonial as on the Canadian Pacific railway, but in what position would the people residing between the terminal points be, following the change now contemplated? Will the rates be reduced, or will they be increased? Every one admits the fact that the creation of the Railway Board of Canada was a boon to the public. At the time this board was organized it was said by the Hon. Mr. Blair, then Minister of Railways, that any man in Canada could send a postcard to the board and secure justice from it. Personally, I believe the board has done immense service to the public. I would like to know from the minister if this change will confer any advantage on the people of Bonaventure county, for instance, who have no other railway but the Intercolonial?

Mr. COCHRANE: All I can say is that the rates will be subject to the Railway Board. They cannot be raised without the consent of the board. I hope and trust they will not be lowered, because we would like to get something for running the road.

Mr. MARCIL: Are the rates now in effect on the Intercolonial railway in that district lower than they would be on a corresponding railway where there is competition?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Intercolonial Railway rates are lower than they are on the regular railways.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it proposed to have them increased as a result of this transfer to the Railway Board?

Mr. COCHRANE: That would depend on the Railway Board.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the Governor in Council still have some control, and be able to take the peculiar situation of those communities into account, or will they be left to the tender mercies of the Railway Board?

Mr. COCHRANE: The whole matter will be under the Railway Board, and that is the proper place for it.

Mr. GRAHAM: It may as well be taken for granted that the result of this railway going under the Board of Railway Commissioners will be to raise the rates. Notwithstanding all that has been said, there are many points on the Intercolonial where the rates are much lower than they would be under similar conditions on a company road where there is no competition. If you were to ask the manager of the road whether it is right or wrong to raise the rates, he will shut one eye and say: "We want it under the Board of Railway Commissioners because we will then get an increase in rates which will then be put on a par with the rates charged by private companies under similar circumstances. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has talked about sidings. He does not live on the Intercolonial.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I do.

Mr. GRAHAM: He lives on the Valley railway which is operated by the Intercolonial.

Mr. CARVELL: The Intercolonial has been brought within my county during the last two or three years and I have not seen any lowering of the rates. This talk about low rates on the Intercolonial under the Government is all moonshine.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was no railway where the St. John Valley railway, operated by the Intercolonial, now is. That railway came in. At competitive points rates are the same but at non-competitive points the government railway rates have been less and those rates will be raised by the Board of Railway Commissioners because this railway will be put on exactly the same basis as that occupied by a company railway. My hon. friend from Carleton is not living on the Intercolonial; he is on the St. John Valley railway and he has no sympathy with the old Intercolonial as it was constructed for political and national purposes originally. He spoke of sidings. That made me smile. I smiled inwardly and outwardly at that. If he had been on the Intercolonial and if he had wanted a siding he would not have gone to the Board of Railway Commissioners and asked for siding on certain terms but he would have gone to the Government and asked for a siding for nothing. That is one of the difficulties of the government system. Hon. gentlemen will find this entering into their own experience. There are certain conditions under which railway companies put in sidings. I think in all my experience I only found one man who wanted to comply with the conditions when asking for a siding on the Intercolonial railway. They would urge that there were special conditions under which the Government itself ought to build a siding and the men who ask for sidings do not want to make any contribution towards them. We had all these things to contend with. Under the Board of Railway Commissioners they will likely get an order for a siding but it will be on the terms that a railway company will get and that is that the gentleman making the application for the siding will have to pay a share of the cost.

Mr. NESBITT: Certainly, why not?

Mr. CARVELL: Why should he not?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not saying that he should not but I am pointing out that in ninety per cent of the cases in which applications are made for sidings, the people applying for the sidings are not willing to be treated as they would be if they applied for a siding from a private railway company. What will happen if the application goes before the Railway Commissioners and the plea is made that the person making the application should not pay? If the Board of Railway Commissioners make an order a member need not go before the minister and say to him: Do not do this; you ought to pay for it, and my friend should not pay at all. He will have to do what the Board of Railway Commissioners order.

Mr. NESBITT: On a business basis.

Mr. GRAHAM: On a businses basis. I am pointing out to my hon. friend from the Maritime Provinces what the Bill means. My hon. friend from Carleton does not appreciate what I am trying to get at. If he had been Minister of Railways for a number of years he would see the significance of what I am saying.

There is a clause of the Bill which strikes me as rather peculiar. While the Board of Railway Commissioners will be given the right to make orders as to sidings, service and that kind of thing, it has no power to enforce its ruling and that is expressly provided for in the Bill. Section 4 says:

> Notwithstanding anything contained herein or in the Railway Act, His Majesty shall not nor shall the Minister of Railways and Canals be liable to any fine or penalty, nor shall the board have power to impose any fine or penalty on His Majesty or on the Minister of Railways and Canals, and no order or judgment of the Board under or in consequence of which His Majesty would have to pay or expend any money shall have any force or effect until it has been approved by the Governor in Council.

That is the anomaly of putting the government railway under the Board. It cannot impose any penalty. The Canadian Pacific railway running side by side, say, at some point, can be fined, a penalty can be imposed upon it, if it does not comply with the order of the board. But owing to the very condition of things His Majesty cannot be fined by the Board of Railway Commissioners. Unless there be some amendment by which the railway itself is divorced from His Majesty for practical purposes and can be compelled by the board to carry out its order, this Act may not amount to much.

Mr. COCHRANE: Could the minister be ordered by the board to do something and not carry out the order?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what will happen. We will say that it would not happen with you or with me but the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) might not be so strong at first if he became Minister of Railways. Suppose that the board gives an order for a certain thing to be done. Twenty strong men in the community do not want that order carried out. It may be an order that express No. 1 or No. 2 need not stop at a certain station. That is always a vexed question, you know. Suppose the board makes an order excusing an express from stopping and several prominent men in the community affected come to the minister and say: Notwithstanding what the board says, you must not carry out that order. The board is helpless to compel the railway to carry out its order. The minister may say: We will not do it. There is nothing to compel him to do it. That brings the decision of the Railway Board right back to the minister again. Would it not be possible to put the findings of the Board of Railway Commissioners in the same category as the small claims, under the Small Claims Act, under which penalties may be imposed on the railway itself up to a certain amount for not carrying out the orders of the board? It seems anomalous but if something of that kind be not done you cannot carry out the orders of the board.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where would the money go that you would collect?

Mr. GRAHAM: The money would go to the same place that it would go if collected from the railway company.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It would go into the treasury?

Mr. GRAHAM: I presume so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Out of which it came?

Mr. GRAHAM: It does not make any difference. I say that doing it at all is an anomaly. But by this Bill you give the board power to make orders and then you say it shall have no power to enforce those orders. It may be impossible to do it in any other way with a government railway but it only adds to the peculiarity of the situation created by the fact that the Government is really divesting itself of control and handing it over to a number of men appointed by itself to report to itself. It makes the situation anomalous. Unless there be some provision by which the management itself can be compelled to carry out the orders of the board, notwithstanding this Act, the management will revert back to the minister and he will have to decide, just as he does at the present time, all questions with reference to the operation of the road.

Mr. MARCIL: Let me put a question to the hon. the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). Does the hon. gentleman prefer that the Intercolonial should be run for the purpose, prima facie, of making money, or that it should be run for the purpose of serving the community in which it operates? Should the Intercolonial rates be so high that the road would be enabled to secure a large surplus or should the road be run as cheaply as possible but with sufficient revenue to meet the expenses, and serve the communities which are not otherwise served? Would my hon. friend prefer to increase the rates, make money and have a big surplus, or would he rather give the people reasonable rates?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think if the Intercolonial railway charged a sufficient rate to pay all its expenses and carrying charges, everybody would be satisfied.

Mr. NESBITT: I was one of those on the subcommittee of the Railway Committee who strongly recommended the minister to bring in this legislation. I am sorry it does not go further and put the Dominion railways entirely under the board with reference to expropriation and claims as well as rates, etc., because I see no reason why the government railway should not pay for lands which it expropriates just as any private corporation would.

Mr. COCHRANE: We usually pay more.

Mr. NESBITT: I appreciate that, but at the same time I do not see why the road should not be in exactly the same position. We had some experience of that in Ontario at one time and had some trouble in going through legal processes and getting fiats to make the Government pay as a private company would have to pay. There was no reason why they should not be in exactly the same position, so far as I could see, or can see now. I believe that section 4 is put in for the purpose of not bringing the railway under the board so far as expropriation and damages are concerned, but that should be made plain.

The illustration given by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) with reference to sidings is one of the very forcible reasons which caused me to favour this legislation, because no one can dispute that if a private individual applied for a siding and through political influence could get that siding for nothing, that would be at the expense of the whole community and it is something that should not be tolerated.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is not done now. When the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) was Minister of Railways, he put into effect an arrangement under which no siding would be granted without the deposit of the cost of the rails.

Mr. NESBITT: I am glad he did that. It stands to his credit, as I am sure many other things do. That is only an illustration showing the difference between a private corporation and a government railway corporation. There should be no favouritism as to rates when this railway comes under the Railway Board. The Railway Board now in fixing rates do not consider whether there is competition, but they make a rate proportionate to the distance, just as if there were one thousand competitors. That is one of the objects of the Railway Board.

Mr. MARCIL: The Government of Canada operates telegraph lines in districts in Canada where the lines do not pay. The Intercolonial was built, not as a money-making concern, but to serve a great political purpose, and it runs through a country where there is no competition. To fix the rates there on the same basis as in North Oxford would be ridiculous.

Mr. NESBITT: Why ridiculous?

Mr. MARCIL: Because there is no competition.

Mr. NESBITT: I venture to say we give a good deal more traffic in proportion.

Mr. MARCIL: You have more railway competition too.

Mr. NESBITT: And it is according to the proportion of traffic given that the rates should be fixed.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend forgets that central Canada gets all its freight carried on the canals absolutely free.

Mr. NESBITT: I am not going into that political question at all. I do not care if they do make charge for the canals. No charge is made for our canals because they are in competition with the American canals and with the American railways.

Mr. MARCIL: Ontario gets the benefit.

Mr. NESBITT: We do not get any special benefit. If you ship anything to the West by water you get the same benefit as we do. There is no use talking about that sort of sectional questions. There is no reason why, in putting the railway under the Railway Board, the rates should be materially interfered with. If the rates are irregular and unjust in some sections of the country, no doubt the board will rectify such discrepancies and introduce uniformity. That is all we ask.

Mr. MARCIL: What remedy have the people?

Mr. NESBITT: They can pay the proper rates the same as the rest of the people in the country. That is the remedy they have.

Mr. CARVELL: Is the amendment which the minister has prepared along the line of allowing the public to bring actions against the Government in any court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. CARVELL: I wish he would consider that carefully. I feel so strongly on it that I would be prepared to draft an amendment.

Mr. MACDONALD: Some of us who have lived along the Intercolonial all our lives think that we know a little more about conditions on the Intercolonial than our friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), or our friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell). I say that with all deference to them.

4 p.m. My hon. friend from Carleton has in his district a hybrid railway called the St. John Valley railway, which is distinguished for the amount of money that has been stolen in connection with it by Conservative politicians in New Brunswick, rather than for the amount of traffic carried on it. He has such an aversion to that road that I have no doubt he is biased against government operation of railways.

Some people who talk about the Intercolonial have forgotten that the Maritime Provinces are separated from the rest of Canada by a very narrow strip of territory, not more than 100 miles wide, stretching from the St. Lawrence to the state of Maine, and that the conditions under which Confederation was brought about 50 years ago were such that every student knows that it would not have been possible but for the construction of the Intercolonial railway and for the assurance that the people of these provinces always had and which has been maintained from that time uninterruptedly until the present time that on account of our isolation we were entitled to certain concessions and rights and privileges which do not obtain here in central Canada.

The Grand Trunk railway and various canals were established in central Canada long before there was a line of railway in the Maritime Provinces. Then came the Canadian Pacific railway, with its marvellous developments; and subsequently the network of railways that to-day runs through Quebec and Ontario. The only means of getting in and out of our province is through the thin line that runs along the south shore of the St. Lawrence from Lévis east, along the north shore of New Brunswick to Moncton and thence into Nova Scotia. Notwithstanding the conditions with regard to the size and population of that country, the Government propose to put the Intercolonial railway, in regard to freights and matters of that kind, upon the same plane as lines running through largely populated portions of Canada. My hon. friend is discriminating against that part of Canada, and disregarding the terms of Confederation. The member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) asked if the local rates on the Intercolonial were lower than the rates in other parts of Canada. The minister said that they were. Does the minister want a board that he can use when he wants to put additional imposts upon the people of the Maritime provinces and whose rulings he need not obey if he does not want to? That is what he is doing here. If he wants to create company ownership of this road so that extensions may be made by companies interested in the development of our province, let him make a proposal to that effect. Notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen of this committee may say about the minister, he is running the Intercolonial under a system of patronage, consulting his political friends in every county; and he is going to do it when he gets this legislation through just as he did before. The minister dare not rise in his place and deny that assertion.

Mr. COCHRANE: I certainly do rise and say that it is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: Loud applause from gentlemen who do not know what they are talking about. The minister has not made an appointment in the county of Pictou since he became Minister of Railways without first obtaining through his officials the certificate of the gentleman who has the patronage in that county. My hon. friend will not deny that.

Mr. COCHRANE: I say that it is not true.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister say that any appointments to such positions as brakeman, cleaner or fireman have been made without his officials first consulting the gentleman who was nominated against me in my county? If he says otherwise, he will be regarded in my constituency as a gentleman whose word is not altogether consistent with the facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no use beating about the bush; the minister knows that it is so.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is not true. That is what I am accused of down there, but I will not play politics with it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: Loud choruses from people in Ontario who do not know anything about the matter. My hon. friend's refreshing assertions will be of illuminating interest to everybody down there. If my hon. friend has not taken the advice of the gentlemen who have the patronage in the matter of appointments in that county, who else in the Conservative party did he consult?

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not consult any one.

Mr. MACDONALD: The superintendents of the divisions, when they want to employ men in any capacity, go to the gentlemen who have the patronage. It is true that the minister himself does not consult them, but his understrappers and officials have full instructions to do so. When a brakeman or trackman is to be employed the minister in Ottawa may not take the steps to which I refer, but the superintendents take the recommendation of the men who have the patronage. My hon. friend himself may be all right; but he knows that orders have gone forth in this regard, and that they are obeyed in respect of appointments that are made. If the minister wants to deal with this matter fairly, let him wipe out entirely the system of patronage. If he is going to raise the rate of freight to the people of the Maritime Provinces, let him deal with the whole matter; let us not have the railway run by one political party, in the interest of that party, without regard to the terms of Confederation, to the proper considerations involved in the question of rates, and to the isolation of our part of the country. I do not speak in a sectional way about this matter. Hon. gentlemen from Central Canada and the West forget that this thin line of territory of one hundred miles is the only territory binding the Maritime Provinces to the rest of the Dominion, through the medium of this one railway. No matter how we may develop our resources down there, if we look for a home market—as we all naturally do look—when we sell our products we can ship them to other parts of Canada only over this one line of railway. At the same time, we purchase manufactured goods from that part of Canada where such goods are manufactured, and we have to pay the impost which is made upon us in respect of the long haul necessary to reach our far-away part of the country. There can be only one purpose in the bringing up of this matter: that of increasing the rates. That might as well be definitely understood. My hon. friend is going to give to the commission power to do certain things—to increase the rates, forsooth—but if the railway causes the destruction by fire of the property of a man who lives along the railway line, the minister will say to him: It is true that the operation of the railway is now under the Railway Commission, but when it comes to our destroying your property, we are not going to give to you the same remedies that are obtainable by persons living in other parts of Canada. You cannot sue us without coming to the Exchequer Court and getting a fiat. And this notwithstanding the fact that a man who lives along the line of the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific railway can immediately proceed in any court in event of damage occurring or an accident taking place. My hon. friend is not fair in that. He should accede to the request of the member for Carleton and, if the object of this proposal is to increase the rates, give to the people the same remedies that the people in other parts of the country have when they are dealing with a company railway. Under the legislation introduced by the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) when he was Minister of Railways, in the case of the killing of animals, the causing of fires or the occurrence of accidents, in respect of which the damages do not exceed $500, the matter can be adjudicated—

Mr. COCHRANE: It was only $200 when I came in.

Mr. MACDONALD: When the man who suffers damage to the extent of $500 is able to obtain remedy in his local courts, why should the man whose damage exceeds $3,000 be obliged to proceed in the Exchequer Court? If that man lived in any other part of Canada he could get remedy in a local court. My hon. friend must admit that that is not a fair position for him to take. Some remedy for that ought to be found in this Bill. For myself, I would like to see patronage, no matter what party might be in power, absolutely done away with in all the public services of the Dominion. Party patronage is a disease that is sapping at the vitals of this country in regard to every dollar that is being expended for war or other purposes, and it ought to be wiped out. If the result of this measure would be in any way to bring about that end, it would have my fullest accord, even if it did involve extra expenditure to the province from which I come. But if we are simply to have the extra expense and at the same time the burden together with inconveniences which people in other parts of the country do not have—

Mr. COCHRANE: People in any part of the country in which the Government expropriates property have, if matters cannot be amicably adjusted, to come to Ottawa to have their claims disposed of.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am not dealing with the question of expropriation of property; I am dealing with the question of a railway inflicting damage upon a man's property. If a railway in central Canada damages a man's property, that man can have his remedy in the local court. That is not the case with us, and it is a hardship for the people living in remote parts of the Dominion to have to bring their cases into the Exchequer Court.

We hear the cry: Why should not the people along the Intercolonial railway pay the same rates as other people do? I am not speaking in any sectional way, but before larger questions occupied the arena of this country, it was one of the favourite occupations of certain of the press of Ontario to discuss seriously making the people who live along the Intercolonial railway pay higher rates. They forgot altogether that exactly the same sum of money as was spent on the Intercolonial railway was spent by the Dominion in the construction of the canal system, which was their means of transportation, and for the use of which not a dollar is asked from the businessman who transports his goods along those canals.

Mr. COCHRANE: The use of those canals in bringing goods from the Northwest down to the lower provinces lowers the freight to you.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are dealing with a population in my province of 500,000 and with a population of about two millions in Quebec. The minister apparently thinks everything that is transported along the canals goes down into our province.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: The transportation of goods on the canals does not involve in any considerable degree the carrying of goods to the Maritime Provinces, because of the extra cost of the second handling. No goods come to our country by sea; the goods that come to our country are carried by rail.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the hon. member not realize that the mere fact that the existence of the canals reduces the freight rates on the railways, inures to the benefit of the people in the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is very solicitous for the people of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. NESBITT: I am not a bit solicitous; it is my hon. friend who is solicitous.

Mr. MACDONALD: The freight rates on the railways of central Canada are fixed by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and according to the minister the rates fixed by that board are higher than the rates charged on the Intercolonial. I am not complaining about the fact that the canals are carrying this freight. I am glad to see that those great waterways provide means for the transportation of the products of the country. What I complain of is the talk of those gentlemen who occasionally feel it their bounden duty to tell us in the Maritime Provinces: You must pay more.

Mr. NESBITT: We do not say so.

Mr. MACDONALD: That has been said in this House, and it has been stated in the press of the country for the last fifteen years. If the minister is going to deal with this proposition, of what use is it submitting a Bill to Parliament which says: We are going to refer certain matters set out in the schedule to the Board of Railway Commissioners, but if we do not like to obey that board we need not do so. That is what my hon. friend says, because that is the meaning of this section 4:

4. Notwithstanding anything contained herein or in the Railway Act, His Majesty shall not nor shall the Minister of Railways and Canals be liable to any fine or penalty, nor shall the Board have power to impose any fine or penalty on His Majesty or on the Minister of Railways and Canals, and no order or judgment of the Board under or in consequence of which His Majesty would have to pay or expend any money shall have any force or effect until it has been approved by the Governor in Council.

The result is that you are under the board and you are not under the board. If the Government are not satisfied with an order made by the board, the Government need not pay any attention to it. If the Government want to resort to the board as a cover to enable them to get something done, they can say to the people: Oh, the board ordered us to do that.

Mr. COCHRANE: We would hear from the hon. member in this House if we did not obey the decisions of the board.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister will not find that I will attack him if he will obey the decision of the board.

Mr. COCHRANE: They will certainly be obeyed so long as I am Minister of Railways.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then why does the minister insert the section which expressly provides that the board need not be obeyed? All I plead for in connection with this matter—and I do not put it on sectional lines—is this: That our friends in other parts of Canada should remember the conditions under which our Maritime Provinces are. We buy our goods in central Canada and there is this long haul. Our maritime position would enable us to go to the United States seaboard for the purchase of goods, but the Intercolonial railway was created for the purpose of developing interprovincial trade and it has done so. For years the complaint was made that there was no return traffic from the East to the West and that our industries and conditions in the Maritime Provinces did not give to the Intercolonial that return which would enable it to earn a profit. As we have gone along developing all our industries, our products have reached a stage which enables us to furnish to the Intercolonial a very large and increasing traffic. The minister now says that the rates are lower in the Maritime Provinces. I say: They have a right to be lower on account of the isolation. That is all I plead for. I do not complain about anything concerning other parts of Canada, or about the people in any other part getting fair consideration. Numerically, we are small, and we are isolated on account of this narrow strip of territory through which we must go to get East or West. But do not let us in this Parliament approach the consideration of this question from this standpoint: Oh, the Intercolonial railway has been getting along with less freight than obtains in any other part of the country and the people should be compelled to pay higher rates.

The primary need of this railway is to give a service to the people living along the line, and by reason of the fact that this railway was constructed under the terms of Confederation, there was, by the express representation made by the public men of that day, guaranteed to the people of the Maritime provinces special considerations in regard to freight rates which should not be taken away. I do not give my hon. friend credit for being actuated by the sentiments I have mentioned as existing in certain parts, but do not let us approach this measure from the standpoint that the rates should be raised.

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not say that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Let there be no discrimination against the people of the Maritime Provinces by compelling them to go to the Exchequer Court to have their claims settled, whereas men in central Canada can have their claims settled in the provincial courts. That is all I say in regard to this matter, and a Bill of this kind, which does not deal with the whole question is quite inadequate. As I said in my opening remarks the people of the Maritime Provinces ought to have been consulted on this question and their views taken into consideration before the minister introduced this legislation.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: As a member of the Railway Committee, I am surprised at the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) taking the position he has taken in regard to this measure. The matter was fully discussed at a special meeting of the committee, and the unanimous desire of the members present was that the Government railways should be brought under control of the Railway Commission. There should be no question about the importance of bringing them under the Railway Commission, and I am sure the people of Canada will heartily approve the action taken by the minister in that regard. The hon. gentleman from Pictou calls attention to the fact that the people in the Maritime Provinces have not had sufficient notice of this matter. It is some four months since the Minister of Railways stated that the Intercolonial would be brought under the Railway Commission. The question has been pretty thoroughly discussed in the papers, in the House, and in the provinces, and general approval has been given to this measure. In addition to that, I am sure, if the hon. member from Pictou will inquire of the workmen along the Intercolonial, or along any of the Government railways, he will find the different organizations heartily approve of this measure, and I am sure the more he investigates this matter, the more satisfied he will become that the workmen and employees on the Government railways are heartily in favour of the roads being brought under the Railway Commission. The hon. gentleman must also know that the clauses in the Railway Act which deal with the questions affecting the employees on government railways will come under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. gentleman's whole argument falls to the ground, because the Department of Railways is not obliged to submit to the rulings of the board. Will the hon. gentleman read clause 4?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am aware of the wording of clause 4, but the provinces in the East, through which the Intercolonial and the government railways run, have made no objection whatever to this legislation. Not one of the industries along the right of way has entered any objection whatever. In regard to the matter of sidings, which the hon. gentleman from Carleton was good enough to treat in a very fair manner, he will readily understand that the Railway Commission will have absolute power in connection with these, and will be able to deal with them just as fairly as they will deal with any other matter in connection with the road. I hope hon. members will see the necessity of passing this legislation, because it certainly is in the public interest. It was impossible, when the members of the House were before the committee, to have this provision placed in the Consolidated Railway Act, for reasons which are very apparent when you come to read the Consolidated Railway Act. I refer to such sections as the following: Incorporation of railway companies, offices, capital, shares, calls, meetings of shareholders, president and directors, contracts respecting rolling stock, purchase of railway securities, disposing of lands obtained as subsidy, purchase of railway, agreements for sale, lease and amalgamation, insolvent companies, sale of subsidized railways not kept in repair, limitation of time for construction, general powers, branch lines, naval and military lands, indian lands, lands and other companies, crown lands, leave to take additional lands, purchase and conveyance of lands, expropriation proceedings, arbitrators re lands, compensation for lands, paying money into court, respecting navigable waters.

Mr. GRAHAM: They could not deal with the government railway, unless the Government consented.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: These are a few of the many clauses in the Railway Act which rendered it impossible for us to insert this provision in the Consolidated Railway Act.

Mr. MARCIL: Are all these matters to be removed from the control of the Department of Railways and Canals, so far as the road is concerned?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: It would be impossible to have them connected up in any way with the Government Railways Act. This is the Government Railways Act.

Mr. MARCIL: I believe the Minister of Railways is sincere in this matter, but I am afraid he is getting support for this measure from a section of the country where the people are not as familiar with the conditions as they should be. From Quebec down to Halifax we have 600 miles of country with a single line of railway, without any competition whatever, with the hardest climate in Canada a winter that lasts for six months in the year. Do hon. members imagine that in that section of the country through the Matapedia valley, along the south shore of the St. Lawrence where the farmer has to put up with the hardest climate where his cattle have to be kept for six months of the year, that the rates should be the same there as in East Lambton, South Oxford, or South Essex, where the cattle are out for nine months in the year?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Does the hon. gentleman believe the Railway Commission will take that matter into consideration?

Mr. MARCIL: Surely if the Railway Commission is going to do what the Department of Railways and Canals have been doing, there is nothing to be gained by the change. The only reason for the change is to increase the rates, and I submit that is unfair, because the construction of the Intercolonial is a matter by itself in the history of Canada. The mere construction of that road does not fulfil the bargain and conditions that were made to the people of the lower provinces. The construction of the line meant nothing in itself; it is the operation of the road that means everything. If the operation of this road had been handed over to a private company, Mackenzie and Mann for instance, as was proposed some years ago, or to the Canadian Pacific railway, as was talked about later, the rates would have been increased, and the promises made to the people of the Maritime Provinces and the people of lower Quebec at Confederation would never have been fulfilled. Mr. Blair's scheme at one time was to link up the Canada Atlantic with the Intercolonial and get to the prairies of the West; and thus the Government railway would run through Canada, from ocean to ocean, to act as a regulator of rates on other railways. That was his great argument and he secured support not only from the Liberal side of the House but his greatest admirers in the declining years of his life were on the Conservative benches. His argument was that a government road controlled by the Parliament of Canada was a great desideratum and should exist as a controller and leveller of rates. I think if our friends from Ontario consider the peculiar conditions existing from Quebec eastward with a single line of railway without any competition, with navigation for six months closed, they will see that it is unfair to the people of that locality to put the railway rates in that district upon the same footing as in the peninsula of Ontario, or in the western portion of Ontario, one of the finest parts of the North American continent. The late Sir Charles Tupper, in his great fights in Cumberland county, used to say that the day was not far distant when Halifax would be the Liverpool of North America. That prophecy has never been realized, and the people of the Maritime Provinces have lost by Confederation. Their representation has been reduced. They had 21 members in this House from Nova Scotia, and that has been reduced to 18, and will be further reduced to 16. New Brunswick had 18 members, which number was cut down to 16, and that representation will be further reduced to 11. The same may be said of Prince Edward Island. The Maritime Provinces of Canada have not been benefited by Confederation. The population of those three provinces has decreased, I suppose, by hundreds of thousands, and the Intercolonial is the one connecting link which they have for almost twelve months of the year for a large portion of the territory. That railway should be operated by the Government, and the Government should take upon themselves the responsibility of fixing the rates. They should not make a pretence of giving the power to the Railway Commission and then put a clause in the Bill by which they say they are not obliged to submit to the conditions imposed by the Railway Board.

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I have always understood that the construction of the government railway system was one of the inducements held out to the Maritime Provinces to bring about Confederation. Before a change such as is contemplated by this legislation is made, it is only fair and reasonable that the people of those provinces should be consulted. The disadvantages of Confederation to the Maritime Provinces have been pointed out by the member for Bonaventure, and they are apparent to everybody who considers the subject. Before the Maritime Provinces entered Confederation, and for some years after, the customs duties of Canada were very much lower than they are to-day. I am not very old, but I remember when we were importing flour from the New England States, and when the flour we bought in Ontario was carried down to Boston and Portland over the Grand Trunk or the American railways, and brought from Boston to the Maritime Provinces and Prince Edward Island by water, because the transportation facilities between Ontario and the Maritime Provinces was not in a condition to handle the traffic, or because the rates were so high that commodities could be obtained more cheaply in this roundabout way. The rates were reduced on the Intercolonial, and the conditions were so changed that not a barrel of flour now consumed in the Maritime Provinces is manufactured in the United States. Is that not to the advantage of the millers of Ontario, and is it not to the advantage of the people of the province of Ontario?

Mr. NESBITT: Do they not have to sell in competition with the United States?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: But the duty was put on flour.

Mr. NESBITT: What about our coal duty?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The duty was put on to give the manufacturers of flour in the province of Ontario that advantage. What I have said in regard to flour also applies to every other manufactured commodity.

Mr. NESBITT: Why is our coal duty kept on?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: One thing at a time. Hon. members from Ontario state continually that the rates on the government railways should be increased. Are they dissatisfied with the interprovincial trade which has been established? Do they want it decreased? Do they want difficulties placed in its way? Is not this trade a benefit to the whole country? The time is coming, I believe, when those high customs duties will be reduced, and the manufacturing interests of Ontario may then be very glad to have a competing line of railway to the Maritime Provinces, which will give them lower and reasonable freight rates. This is one of the services the Government railway performs. There would be no sense in a government railway under the circumstances under which the Intercolonial has been built charging a rate of freight that would produce a surplus revenue to the railway. It would be simply taking the money from the people as an additional tax and putting it in the exchequer. Would it not be better to follow the system which has been in operation for some years, and have as low a rate of freight as possible, in order to encourage interprovincial trade? Who would benefit from this interprovincial trade? Would it not be the people of Ontario? It has been stated here to-day, and everybody knows it to be the fact, that for the sake of interprovincial transportation and for the advantages of interprovincial trade the canals are free. No one from the Maritime Provinces or from Ontario objects to that, because it is to the advantage of the whole country. The hon. member from Pictou reminded the minister that the question of patronage had not been eliminated from the Government railway system. I wish to corroborate that statement. I do not know why the minister thinks the patronage system has disappeared.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it not about time that somebody making those charges should specify something? Surely they could bring forward a little evidence?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: They have been specified time and again.

Mr. BURNHAM: Will the hon. member mention some of them?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The patronage system is just the same as it always was. It existed under the late Government, and it is just the same under this Government. It is useless for hon. gentlemen to deny it. That only adds deception to the patronage evil. Why, a porter is not appointed on the Prince Edward Island railway unless he has the approval of the patronage committee, or Conservative candidate.

Mr. BURNHAM: Considering that this is really a covert attack upon public ownership, does not the hon. gentleman think that in all fairness it is high time to specify at least one instance of what he alleges? We are sick and tired of those general charges—throwing mud and dust like a lot of children.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I will refer the hon. member for Peterborough to the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield), the ex-Whip of the Conservative party, and if my hon. friend will go to the member for Colchester——

Mr. BURNHAM: I am going to the hon. member who is making the charge, and to the man who has not pluck enough to make his charge definite.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I have pluck enough and I am making the charge. I make it of my own personal knowledge. Of course, I don't suppose anything I may say would enlighten the hon. member for Peterborough.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is the usual back-out.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I want to refer to another matter in connection with the province from which I come. As the minister knows, in that province we are under a very great disadvantage because we have a narrow gauge system. We are under additional expense inasmuch as every carload of freight going from that province to the mainland has to be transferred from the car to the boat, and freights coming from the mainland to the province has to go through the same process. Even when the car ferry is established, which I hope will be shortly, the same disadvantages will continue.

Mr. COCHRANE: Conditions are better than they were.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: No, they are worse than they were.

Mr. COCHRANE: Then I wish to the Lord I had not done it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: And I wish to the Lord you had not done it, unless you complete it. Unless it is finished you leave the trade facilities worse than you found them.

Mr. COCHRANE: I certainly will not.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I hope not, but they are worse now than they were.

Mr. COCHRANE: They certainly are not.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Once the minister makes up his mind, no matter what the facts may be, he will stick to his opinion. No man can convince him he is wrong. That is one of the minister's peculiarities.

Mr. COCHRANE: You say I am wrong because I do not agree with you.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: As some hon. gentlemen on this side has said, the member for Colchester is the only man in Parliament who can convince the Minister of Railways that he is wrong.

These conditions, these great disadvantages exist and, that being so, I ask the minister and every member of this House whether it is proper to put Prince Edward Island under this Board. The minister, or some other minister knowing the circumstances, would take into consideration the disadvantages and difficulties under which that province labours and make some concession; a board would not be inclined to make concessions not knowing the circumstances. Freight moved from Prince Edward Island is subject to an extra charge on account of so many handlings. Should not that be taken into consideration?

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about. We have absorbed not only the handling but the ferry too, and he does not know it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Yes, I know it, and I know you charge extra for the handling.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is all the thanks I get.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I know that the rate obtaining on the Prince Edward Island railway is not the same rate as that obtaining on the Intercolonial for similar distances.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, sir.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: There is no use in saying that, because I do business and I know the facts. We have not daily communication, we have only communication on three days in the week. Under these circumstances Prince Edward Island should be exempt from the operation of this Bill.

Mr. COCHRANE: Perhaps the board will give you all you want.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister will not give us all we want because he wants to establish a "wicked partner" in this business. If there is something he does not want to do, something that is unpopular, he will blame the Board. If there is something he wants to do himself, he will do it and take credit to himself for it. That is the kind of legislation this is and that is the kind of a system that the minister appears to wish to establish. The minister promised five years ago that he would standardize the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway. We were promised that the car ferry would be in operation in two years from the commencement of the work.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not true.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Well, five years have passed and it is not in operation. The hon. gentleman promised to standardize the road.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, but there is time enough for that.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: There is not time enough.

Mr. COCHRANE: You evidently do not know that there is a war on.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Yes, I have heard of it.

Mr. COCHRANE: Have you? I am surprised.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister has not heard about a great many things that are taking place in the world. He does not appear to know the conditions which exist on the railway he is operating. I am pointing these things out and again I appeal to the minister's business sense and knowledge. While these things exist, would it not be fair and reasonable for the Government to retain control over the Prince Edward Island portion of the government system at least until conditions were made more equal? Surely, until we have the privilege that the people along the Intercolonial enjoy, we should not be subjected to an increase in freight rates. When we come to the seventh section of this Bill I want to move an amendment to that effect, and I think it ought to appeal to the good sense of the members of the committee.

I regret to find that when matters of this kind are discussed, the members from Ontario seem to think that the Intercolonial is operated altogether in the interest of the Maritime Provinces. They appear to think that if there is no surplus from the road the Maritime Provinces get the benefit of it and that it is to the disadvantage of the rest of Canada and particularly of Ontario. That is the worst kind of a misapprehension. The Intercolonial is operated just as much for the advantage of the people of Ontario as of the Maritime Provinces. It is a link that binds Ontario and the Maritime Provinces together. The advantage is on the side of Ontario. We do not ship anything like the quantity of goods to Ontario that we get from that province. In the last few years the trade has been increasing and I am very pleased. It is to the advantage of the whole country that the rates on the Intercolonial should be kept at the lowest possible point. This should be encouraged by members from every province and particularly from Ontario. The people of Ontario may not always have the high customs tariff which they enjoy to-day. There is growing up in this country a very strong sentiment that the manufacturers of Ontario have too many advantages now. The West will be heard from and the Maritime Provinces feel that they have paid tribute to the manufacturers of Ontario for a long time. The manufacturers of Ontario should be careful lest this spirit be developed and their privileges be reduced. One way to prevent this reduction is to continue the rates on the Intercolonial at the very lowest possible point.

Mr. BURNHAM: It grieves me as an ordinary elector and a thorough Canadian to hear continually, year after year, the fair fame of this country aspersed by those who get up on the other side of the House and discuss the Intercolonial railway question, they, of course, coming from the Maritime Provinces. They say annually, especially against the present minister, that he is guilty of all sorts of political chicanery in the administration of the Intercolonial and just as regularly they fail to substantiate their charges. We hear, during election times in Ontario, the statement continually made that Government ownership is a failure—just look at the Intercolonial railway! All they know about the Intercolonial in that respect at least is what the defamers of the Intercolonial in the Canadian Parliament say without offering one tittle of evidence. I would go so far as to say that, of course, if they would substantiate—they have had plenty of time to do it—their accusations, whatever is wrong, if anything is wrong, should be rectified. But the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is here now. I heard the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. J. J. Hughes) and who is just going out of the Chamber, but I do not expect him to substantiate what he says because he gets all mixed up. He makes one charge that the manufacturers of Ontario are a wicked lot because they do the bulk of the freight business on the Intercolonial railway and the people of the Maritime Provinces do not send an equal quantity of goods to Ontario, and yet, according to the hon. gentleman, the manufacturers of Ontario are so stupid that they wish the rates on the Intercolonial to be increased. That kind of an argument is simply nonsense. But that is not what I am dealing with. I am speaking as a patriotic Canadian citizen and asking that this annual stuff be stopped—either backed up or stopped. From one end of this country to the other we hear continually: Look at the Intercolonial. I consult Hansard in vain and I listen to these men from the Maritime Provinces in vain for one single, solitary attempt to back up what they say. They say that a porter, or a cleaner, or a charwoman cannot be appointed without the interference or connivance of the minister. That is all. They never mentioned his name or her name.

Mr. MACDONALD: I proved to the hilt this afternoon, and the minister dare not deny it, that the superintendents of the various divisions of his railway do not appoint any trackmen or men to work in locomotive shops without recommendations from the men who have the patronage.

Mr. COCHRANE: I did deny it most emphatically. It does not do any good to deny it to you.

Mr. MACDONALD: What kind of proof does my hon. friend want to satisfy himself that that kind of work is going on?

Mr. COCHRANE: You make the charge.

Mr. MACDONALD: I make the charge here and now, that in my county no man has been employed in either of these departments for the last two years except he had the recommendation of the man who had the patronage, and I defy my hon. friend to investigate it.

Mr. BURNHAM: My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) is a skillful lawyer, and he knows that that kind of evidence would not get him into court at all; he would not even get a non-suit on such evidence.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would not get a non-suit; I would get a verdict.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. member could not go into a division court, not even into a police court, with such evidence; he has got to specify. If he knows so much, surely, out of the wealth of his knowledge and information, he can at least specify something, and surely he can drag up from his numerous acquaintances somebody who will make an affidavit, even if he will not back it up. When the hon. member is challenged he says he makes the charge here, and now and the minister denies it, but the hon. member will not come forward—

Mr. MACDONALD: I say to my hon. friend, who is, of course, irresponsible—

Mr. BURNHAM: Oh, of course.

Mr. MACDONALD: — that if the minister gives me a committee I will prove it.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is what we want. The charge falls to the ground until such time as it is substantiated. Having got as far as that, at least we have three or four years' dirty work cleared up; we have had these charges made, this mud thrown, long enough, and it is now admitted by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that he ought not to touch it until such time as he attempts to substantiate it, so it will go on Hansard. I hope it will be seen by the newspapers of this country who have done so much good, conscientious work for the benefit of the country, and that they at least will see what has been meant and said by such members as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) who, from time to time has made charges which he admits now he ought to at least attempt to substantiate.

Mr. MACDONALD: All I have to say is that this gentleman who gyrates around here occasionally, to the amusement of the House, and not to the edification of anybody, is talking through his hat, to use a vulgar phrase.

Mr. BURNHAM: I have not a hat on.

Mr. MACDONALD: I repeat that I make this charge: If the minister does not know that this condition is going on he ought to know it and if he will give me a committee I will prove it.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. BURNHAM: My hon. friend knows perfectly—and I say I use the words in a Pickwickian sense in order that I may be in order—that he is a moral coward when he makes such a charge as that and does not attempt to substantiate it. If the minister will give him a committee! Is it necessary to have a committee in order to have that evidence? He can at least bring forward a prima facie case, but he has not attempted to do so. He simply flings mud, not only at the minister but at the fair name of Canada. The hon. member should be ashamed to do such a thing without bringing forward one particle of evidence.

Mr. CARVELL: I want to make a charge against the minister that I will substantiate now. I think I shall satisfy the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) that all the Maritime members are not alike.

Mr. BURNHAM: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: Hold on, you had better hear what I have to say. I am going to charge the minister with having offered us a gold brick in this Bill, and I am very sorry to have to say it too, because I have been working here with my eyes on the book and one of my ears listening to the hon. member for Peterborough while trying to find out what this Bill really means. I am surprised how little it means. The minister said this afternoon, and I think conscientiously, that the Railway Act applied, except as to the expropriation of land and the right of bringing actions. I think that is the substance of the minister's statement. Why, there is nothing in the Bill at all. Practically all it does is to give the Railway Commission control of freight rates. I understand that the sections refer to the new Railway Act. I have here the new Act as it passed this House. I am amazed at what has been left out of this Bill. I understand that many things should be left out, for instance, the constitution of the Board and the application of certain principles that could not be applied to Government railways, and I understand also that the minister admitted that the expropriation of lands is left out. Everything from section 367 to 382 of the new general Railway Act is excluded from the operation of this Bill. I do not believe the minister knew this; I think some over-zealous official has prepared this Bill for him and did not tell him what it meant. I will give you what is left out. In the first place, all control of the Railway Board over telegraphs and telephones on the railway for railway purposes.

5 p.m.

Mr. COCHRANE: We have no telegraphs.

Mr. CARVELL: You ought to have.

Mr. COCHRANE: We ought to have, but, unfortunately, before I came in they had all been leased out.

Mr. CARVELL: But you are putting it here so that you will have no control if you get them.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong, and I do not think he intends to be. All the telegraph system on the Intercolonial is owned by other people and comes under the Dominion Railway Board to-day.

Mr. CARVELL: That may be the fact to-day, but may not be to-morrow.

Mr. COCHRANE: Why not? This is not giving us control.

Mr. CARVELL: Because my hon. friend is leasing a line from the Western Union to-day it does not mean he will lease it all next year.

Mr. COCHRANE: But we do not own it, the Government does not own telegraph lines. That is why I am finding fault. They are owned by other people and come under the Railway Board as it is.

Mr. CARVELL: You may own a telephone or telegraph line next year, and if you do you will not come under the control of the Railway Board in reference to it.

Mr. COCHRANE: I cannot put anything under them that I do not own.

Mr. CARVELL: Why purposely exclude from the powers of the Railway Board that which you may own and operate? Next, I find that you do not give to the Railway Board any power of putting wires across railways, or other wires, surely that is an important thing. You do not give the board power to permit the erection of lines and wires across or along highways.

Mr. COCHRANE: What section is that?

Mr. CARVELL: Section 373. If a telephone company want to cross the Intercolonial Railway tracks, surely they ought to have the right to go to the Railway Board and get authority to take the necessary steps. But you do not give them that right.

Mr. COCHRANE: We will put it in; there is no objection to it.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think my hon. friend intended to not do these things, but I am pointing out to him what the facts are.

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not draw the Act.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not think my hon. friend did. It was done by some overzealous official who wanted to protect the Intercolonial railway and prevent its coming under the jurisdiction of the board. He has offered my hon. friend a gold brick, and my hon. friend has offered it to the House.

Mr. COCHRANE: Oh, no.

Mr. CARVELL: It looks that way. I do not believe that the minister is purposely trying to deceive the committee, but I am afraid that is the practical result of the legislation he has offered. The next thing to which I wish to call attention is that under this Bill the minister does not have to get the consent of a municipality for lines upon highways, etc. Surely that is an important provision for a public utility corporation. Why should the Government railway have the right to do things with respect to a municipality that an ordinary railway company could not do without first getting the consent of the board? My hon. friend is not giving to the Railway Board the power to exercise its jurisdiction over his transactions with municipalities. That is in section 374.

Mr. COCHRANE: I agree that that should be in.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Does not section 15 of the Government Railways Act cover that objection?

Mr. CARVELL: Section 15 of the Government Railways Act is repealed by section 6 of this Bill.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am willing to have this go in; I am sorry that it is not already in.

Mr. CARVELL: After this discussion is over, the minister should ask the committee to report progress, and have the Bill redrafted. There have been a great number of omissions. The next omission is that of the provision respecting the price and supply of certain power. That is not so important; still, I see no reason why it should not be in. The next is the provision governing telegraphs and telephones. That is very important. I have some small interest in a telephone company in New Brunswick, of which I am one of the directors. We have to do business with the Intercolonial railway; why should not the Railway Board of Canada be the arbiter between our company and the minister's company, just the same as it is between our company and the Canadian Pacific Railway company? But under the Bill as now drafted the Railway Board has nothing to say about the matter. I am not finding very much fault our company gets along nicely with the Intercolonial.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have admitted that these should go in.

Mr. CARVELL: I am pointing out what the omissions are. The next is the provision relating to marine electric telegraphs or cables. Then there is the provision with regard to Government use and construction of telegraphs and telephones. Then there is the matter of statistics. Why should not the Intercolonial railway make returns of statistics to the board just the same as any other company does? That is section 380.

I now come to another phase of the matter. Section 4 of this Bill provides:

> Notwithstanding anything contained herein or in the Railway Act, His Majesty shall not nor shall the Minister of Railways and Canals be liable to any fine or penalty, nor shall the Board have power to impose any fine or penalty on His Majesty or on the Minister of Railways and Canals, and no order or judgment of the Board under or in consequence of which His Majesty would have to pay or expend any money shall have any force or effect until it has been approved by the Governor in Council.

I agree that the Minister of Railways should not be liable to fine or penalty; nobody would assume that the minister would maliciously do anything for which he should be fined. But the latter part of this section absolutely takes away from the board the power of enforcing a decision by fine, penalty or imprisonment unless that decision is accepted by the Governor in Council. Whatever the board may do, therefore, is only a polite invitation to the Intercolonial Railway authorities that, in their judgment, certain things should be done. If the minister says no, then you cannot fine him; you cannot fine the Government; you cannot fine His Majesty. According to this Bill you cannot make the Intercolonial pay any money unless the Governor in Council says that it shall be paid.

Mr. COCHRANE: Does it not stand to reason that nothing is accomplished by putting money from one pocket into another?

Mr. CARVELL: No manager of the Intercolonial Railway Company wants to have his revenues reduced. If you make him pay the fine out of the railway moneys, he will try to run things so that he will not be obliged to pay. If his company is not subject to fines and penalties the manager will be just as independent as he has been during the last forty-five years. I admit that so far as the balance sheet of Canada is concerned, that would not make much difference; but it would make a wonderful difference in the work of the officers who are carrying on the affairs of the Intercolonial railway. Section 381 of the amended Railway Act is as follows:

> Any company, or any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person, acting for or employed by such company, that does, causes or permits to be done, any matter, act or thing contrary to the provisions of this or the Special Act, or to the orders, regulations or directions of the Governor in Council, or of the minister, or of the Board, made under this Act, or omits to do any matter, act or thing, thereby required to be done on the part of any such company, or person, shall, in addition to being liable to any penalty elsewhere provided, be liable to any person injured by any such act or omission for the full amount of damages sustained thereby, and such damages shall not be subject to any special limitation except as expressly provided for by this or any other Act.

That provision is left out of the Bill now under consideration; therefore there is no such recourse against officers of the company as there is against the directors of a company railway. If my hon. friend wants to make this a railway company in the ordinary sense of the term, then the officials ought to be subject to the ordinary laws of the land.

The next clause that is left out is 387, which provides as follows:

> All actions or suits for indemnity for any damages or injury sustained by reason of the construction or operation of the railway shall, and, notwithstanding anything in any special Act, may be commenced within two years next after the time when such supposed damage is sustained, etc.

That is the section which provides for bringing actions against a railway company. Of course, if the minister maintains that you cannot bring actions against the Intercolonial railway except in the Exchequer Court, perhaps this provision would not be so important. Still, I think the same principle should apply in the case of the Intercolonial as in the case of any other company in the matter of the right to bring actions, regardless of what court you bring that action in.

Mr. COCHRANE: That was left out intentionally.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think that it should be left out. The right to bring the action should be the same no matter in what court you bring it. My hon. friend has purposely, as he says, left out the court in which you are going to bring action. I wish the minister and I had the money that has been expended in the last forty years in Canada in lawsuits to define the real meaning of certain sections of the Railway Act. Let me put the matter in this way: An action is taken to the Privy Council, and you get a decision. That is the law, and that law should govern malfeasance or negligence on the part of the Intercolonial railway just the same as it would the Canadian Pacific or the Grand Trunk. That is, the right to bring action should be exactly the same against the Intercolonial as against any other railway company. The minister says that you ought not to be allowed to bring action in the same court as you can bring action against company railways. We disagree on that, but we ought to agree on the fact that the law should be the same, and this legislation should make it without doubt that the law is the same; that the same principles of law apply against the Government railway as apply against any other railway. We come next to section 397, which provides for a penalty in case any structure such as a bridge, or tunnel, or any overhead structure does not comply with the requirements of the board. The board has no power, under this Bill as it is now drafted, to order the Intercolonial railway to construct a bridge of a certain pattern or to carry out certain specifications.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think that is provided for.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is left out. I have not had an opportunity to compare this specifically with the Government Railways Act, but section 397 of the General Railway Act is purposely omitted from this Bill. That means that the provisions of section 397 do not apply to the Intercolonial. The same is true of section 398, which says:

> Every company which shall erect, operate or maintain any bridge, approach, tunnel, viaduct, trestle, or any building, erection or structure, in violation of this Act, or of any order or regulation of the Board, shall for each offence incur a penalty of fifty dollars.

That means that the officers of the Intercolonial Railway can go on at their sweet pleasure and do all they have a mind to do. The Board has no jurisdiction over them, and no penalties are provided if they do what any other railway company could not do without the consent of the board. The next section covers the improper use of the highway. Under the general Railway Act, no railway can improperly use the highway of any municipality, and if they do. they are subject to a penalty. Why should not the Intercolonial railway be subject to the same penalty? In this Bill there is even omitted such a small penalty as for failing to erect sign boards—I refer to section 400 of the general Railway Act.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) means that the sections mentioned at the end of section 6 have been taken out of the Government Railways Act.

Mr. CARVELL: I am referring to the schedule. I have gone hurriedly over the schedule which includes the sections of the general Railway Act brought under the purview of this Bill, and section 400 is not one of those sections. The next section omitted is section 401. The next of any importance is section 403 which is very important so far as the farmers of Canada are concerned, and which provides that a railway company must remove all thistles and noxious weeds growing on the right of way.

Mr. COCHRANE: This Bill provides for that.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is purposely omitted.

Mr. COCHRANE: If we take the matter up section by section, we can settle it right on the spot.

Mr. CARVELL: Very well, if the minister does not want me to go on, but I am pointing out to him the enormous omissions there are. There is in the Bill practically nothing but the control of rates.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Most of the sections dealing with highways, bridges, fences, injuries to cattle, walking on the track, are still in the Government Railways Act.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not so sure about that, because I have not had time to go over them all. But why leave the sections in the Government Railways Act, instead of adopting the sections in the general Railway Act applying to the same matters? Every section of the general Railway Act which provides for a penalty of any kind seems to have been omitted. That is the general principle upon which the drafting of this Bill has proceeded. Take the section regarding noxious weeds and thistles. There may be something in the Government Railway Act which provides that noxious weeds and thistles shall be removed from the right of way, but there is in the Government Railways Act nothing which provides a penalty against the Government if they do not remove the weeds or thistles. In the General Railway Act, there is a penalty applied to the railway company which fails to carry out the provisions of it, and it is the penalty that has been removed from this Bill. Section 403 says:

The second section says that the mayor, reeve or chief officer may remove the noxious weeds and thistles, and the company may be compelled to pay the expenses. That is in the General Railway Act, but that is omitted in the Bill as drafted, and, therefore, we have no protection against the Government railways if they fail to remove those noxious weeds and thistles. The next section omitted is section 406, which provides:

(1) If any company refuses or neglects to comply with any order of the Board, made upon the report of the inspecting engineer, under the authority of this Act,—

(a) directing any repairs, renewals, reconstruction, alteration or new work, material or equipment to be made, done or furnished by the company upon, in addition to, or in substitution for any portion of the railway; or,

(b) directing that, until such repairs, renewals, reconstruction, alteration and work, materials or equipment are made, done and furnished to the satisfaction of the Board, no portion of the railway in respect of which such order is made shall be used, or used otherwise than subject to certain restrictions, conditions and terms by such order imposed.

Then it provides the penalty that if they refuse to carry out this they shall pay a penalty of not less than $2,000. All that is omitted in this Bill. The next is section 407 regarding non-compliance with notice of engineer forbidding the running of trains. If an ordinary railway company violates this section they are subject to a penalty of $2,000. The Minister of Railways can do this, and he goes scot-free. Section 408, which is very important, provides:

Every railway company which wilfully or negligently omits to give immediate notice as by this Act required, with full particulars, to the Board of the occurrence, upon the railway belonging to such company, of any accident attended with serious personal injury to any person using the railway, or to any employee of the company, or whereby any bridge, culvert, viaduct or tunnel on or of the railway has been broken, or so damaged as to be impassable or unfit for immediate use, shall forfeit to His Majesty the sum of two hundred dollars for every day during which the omission to give such notice continues.

That is omitted from this Bill, and therefore the minister can kill people if he chooses to do so. I do not mean the minister personally; I mean that the government railways can operate in as negligent a manner as they please.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Judging by the experience of last winter, the Government would have to have a large staff to report all the accidents.

Mr. CARVELL: Probably, if they are brought under the General Railway Act, there would not be so many accidents to report, and if I have one cause of complaint against the management of the Intercolonial more than all others, it is the fact that they have laid down the law that they will not pay damages for negligence. I do not blame the minister for this. I do not know who is to blame. I have had, in the past few years, a dozen cases, small matters, a man who has had a few sheep or a cow killed, something like that—

Mr. COCHRANE: We pay in every case where we are liable.

Mr. CARVELL: You never pay anything.

Mr. COCHRANE: Excuse me.

Mr. CARVELL: There has never been one claim paid on the Valley road since it has been operated for two and a half years. They send a man up there; I do not want to mention his name here, but he was a political heeler in the county of York, and, instead of paying the claim, he will say: "I will show you that Carvell cannot make this company pay; we will show whether Carvell can make the Intercolonial pay damages or not."

Mr. COCHRANE: I am sure the hon. gentleman will make them pay, if they are guilty.

Mr. CARVELL: I usually follow them up. The hon. member from Peterborough wants to know some of the reasons why we are finding fault with the Intercolonial.

Mr. COCHRANE: The argument of hon. gentlemen opposite is that I have not done things, and, if that be so, then I hand the matter over to the Railway Board, who, perhaps, may do better.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. gentleman from Carleton has demonstrated that the charge of political chicanery made by him, especially in this one instance he is speaking of, falls to the ground, because the hon. gentleman says that the minister has sent a political heeler up there. To do what? To buy up the people? No, just the very opposite.

Mr. CARVELL: I have digressed from the real purview of the Act. But I say the Intercolonial is not compelled, under the law as now drafted, to send a notification of accidents. One of the most important sections of the whole Railway Act is that which gives the board power to compel the company to properly equip the trains with all modern appliances. The companies are liable to a penalty of $200 a day for every day they fail to comply with the order of the board in this respect. That is provided by section 110, but that is omitted from the Bill. The next point is that they must keep a blackboard on the wall—a small thing like that—showing the time of the arrival and departure of trains, and whether they are on time or not, and if they fail to do this, they are liable to a penalty. Even that is omitted from the operation of the Act. Section 413, which provides for a penalty if they fail to stop at a swing bridge, is omitted. Then there is a penalty under section 415, as to sounding the whistle at a crossing, and that is omitted, and that is very important. Then section 41 reads:

> The company shall incur a penalty of $100 a day if any train or engine of the company passes over any crossing where two main lines of railway, or the main tracks of any branch lines, cross each other at rail level, whether they are owned by different companies or by the same company, before a proper signal has been received by the conductor or engineer in charge of such train or engine, from a competent person or watchman in charge of such crossing, that the way is clear.

If there is anything in the world that ought to be important, it is the regulations of the board, or the law of the land, providing for the operation of the trains where one railway crosses another, and yet even that provision is removed.

Mr. COCHRANE: We are losing time over this.

Mr. CARVELL: No, I am putting it in a connected form the things which the minister has not done.

Mr. COCHRANE: We could take it up clause by clause.

Mr. CARVELL: If the minister objects, I will not go any further. I am only half way through, but I will take it up later. I think I must have given him enough to convince him that there are a great many things included in the Railway Act which are not in this Bill, other than expropriation and rights of action. The minister stated that this Bill brought the road under the Railway Act, except as to expropriations and rights of action and that is not so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A great deal has been said about the Intercolonial railway being in politics, and that this is an effort to extricate it from that position. There is no doubt that, in the management of the Intercolonial, there is more or less politics, and that will occur, no matter what Government is administering that public utility. I do not say this as a special criticism directed against the present minister, because I am bound to say that I would anticipate approximately the same condition, no matter what Government was in power. I do not think, either, that the Intercolonial railway is open to the great criticisms which we frequently hear. The hon. gentleman from Carleton has made a vow that he will never travel on the Intercolonial if he can possibly avoid it. It may be true that the through train services of that road are not as efficient as on some other roads.

Mr. COCHRANE: With equal distances I think they are.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Intercolonial performs a service in many respects very much better than that given by the Canadian Pacific, or the Grand Trunk, in many other sections of Canada. However, will this Bill take the road out of politics? After all, that is the question. I do not think it possibly can have that effect. What was the purpose of establishing the Railway Board? It was created by Parliament to interpose between railway corporations and the public, to determine what was fair, as between the railway performing the service and the public receiving the service. It was quite natural and logical, therefore, that such a body should be established to regulate and control private railway companies, but does that principle apply to government-owned railways? These government railways are owned by the people, administered by the people, and the service is performed for the people. Therefore, this board is not intervening between any different interests. They are exercising control over a public utility which is owned by the people and carried on by the people. I do not think the placing of the Intercolonial under the jurisdiction of the Railway Board will assist in removing political influences from the administration of the road. I quite agree with hon. gentlemen this afternoon who object to political interference in connection with the administration of the government railway. We should endeavour to get away from it. We are likely to acquire the Canadian Northern Railway. Later on we probably will be obliged to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it would appear to be desirable and necessary that some scheme be worked out for the administration of these two railways, and the Intercolonial railway, freed from political interference and political influence.

I was going to suggest to the minister that it would be as well to allow this matter to stand until we have disposed of the major railway problem of this country. The acquisition of the Canadian Northern is now before us. Next year we will probably have to deal with the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and then will arise the question of the administration of these two roads and the Intercolonial, and I trust some method may be evolved whereby they will be operated jointly free from partisan influence. It seems to me the only purpose to be served by this Bill will be the fixing and controlling of rates by the Railway Board. According to the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Carvell), a great many matters which are ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the Railway Board will be wanting in this case, and the powers which are sought to be placed in the Railway Board by this Bill practically refer only to the control of rates. The administration of the Intercolonial railway is somewhat different from the administration of other railways in Canada. Other railway systems extend from ocean to ocean. The Intercolonial is, relatively, a short road. Many problems confront the administration of the Intercolonial which are not found in other railways. This legislation seems anomalous, because you seek to introduce into the administration of the government railway another body created by the people, who own and operate the railway. Inasmuch as the Bill does not put the Intercolonial entirely within the jurisdiction of the Railway Board, I would suggest that consideration of this matter might be postponed. I quite appreciate the desire of the minister to remove partisanship from the administration of the Intercolonial, and I sympathize with him in his efforts in that direction. At the same time I think we might well let the whole matter stand until we can deal thoroughly and effectively with our other railway problems.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Within a few days we are likely to take over 9,000 miles of the Canadian Northern Railway system. If that system is under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission at the present time we should keep it under that jurisdiction. This Act will attain that object, and will protect the public rights better than if the system is changed over now, taken away from the Railway Commission, and put alongside the Intercolonial without being controlled by anybody. If that were done we will simply complicate the situation, whereas if we keep this Act as it is now, and if it applies to the Canadian Northern, there will be no disturbance, and we are simply putting the Intercolonial on the same basis as any other road.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Except that if the Act is in the condition in which my hon. friend from Carleton says it is, it is incomplete. If we put the road within the power of the board at all it should be entirely within the power of the board.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) allow me to ask him a question? At the present time the Railway Act applies to the Canadian Northern in respect of all those things to which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has referred. The moment it is acquired by the Government, if, unfortunately, it should be acquired under the Bill now before the House, and if it is placed under government control, so that it becomes a government railway, there would be a number of clauses in the Railway Act which would not apply to it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: But there would be uniformity under this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend does not know what the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) said.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Yes, I do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The member for Carleton pointed out that there are a great many important sections in the Railway Act which apply to private railways like the Canadian Northern, but which are absolutely eliminated from this Bill. Clauses which are essential for the protection of the public are, for some reason which I am not able to understand, eliminated from this Bill.

Mr. COCHRANE: In answer to my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) I may say that what it is desired should be under the jurisdiction of the board is not so much a question of the rates as of the improvements. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that members, and every one else, wish to have improvements on the railway which are, perhaps, not justified, and they think I am a little arbitrary in not granting these improvements. They will now have the right to appeal to the board, and force me to do things I should do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But, the minister has left that out.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I am not leaving it out. The Bill is not through yet and I do not propose to leave those things out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of course, if the Bill is to be amended, it is a different thing.

Mr. COCHRANE: It certainly is. I told my hon. friend from Carleton it would be amended.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend speaks about bringing in those portions of the railway law that would make the railway workable. Take, for instance, "industrial spurs," section 185—that is all left out.

Mr. COCHRANE: I don't think it is. If my hon. friend would only consent to take the Bill clause by clause, we will reach something definite. As it is, we are only wasting time. If the strict rules of the committee were followed, we would discuss the Bill clause by clause, and not as a whole.

Mr. MACDONALD: No one wishes to obstruct the Bill, but we all want to understand it. I think the explanation made by my hon. friend from Carleton, in which he shows that certain sections have been left out of the Bill which should be included, is simply assisting the passage of the Bill on a proper form. We have a right to know why the sections were left out.

Mr. COPP: Inasmuch as this Bill, if adopted, brings about such a radical change in the operation of the Intercolonial railway, it is natural that members from the Maritime Provinces, through whose constituencies the Intercolonial operates, should consider it carefully and find out why this radical change is being brought about at the present time. So far as I have been able to gather from the discussion this afternoon, there has not been one solitary reason advanced to show what advantage the Government, the country, or the Intercolonial railway will derive from the change the minister seeks to make. The only argument my hon. friend from Carleton advanced in favour of the Bill was that he had made a vow he would never travel on the Intercolonial again. So far as I can see, that is the only cogent argument offered in favour of the Bill.

I might say to my hon. friend from Carleton, without making a criticism of the argument he used, that I never would travel by the Canadian Pacific railway. This would not be an argument against the condition of that road. If my hon. friend wanted to make an argument in favour of the Canadian Pacific railway in comparison with the Intercolonial, I might make the same answer, but it is no argument why we should have this very radical change imposed upon us that the Intercolonial does not happen to be the line on which he travels. If the Intercolonial traversed the country through which my hon. friend travels, as the Canadian Pacific railway does, I venture to say that he would gladly accept the privilege of travelling over the Intercolonial. Many arguments against and criticisms of the Intercolonial are made, but I wish to say, on the other hand, that the Intercolonial has served a splendid purpose. It has served the people of the Maritime Provinces well, and it is a good railway. While it is true that, in the past, some political interference may have taken place, while it may be true of the future and while it may be that the life of the Minister of Railways for the time being may not be the most pleasant in the world, still I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) will not soon forget many pleasant excursions he has made over the Intercolonial, barring the one or two unpleasant receptions he had at Moncton. But the minister in going over the Intercolonial will see evidence on every hand that the Intercolonial is serving a splendid purpose, that it is traversing a good country and giving the people of the Maritime Provinces a valuable service. If so, I would like to ask the minister what demand has been made upon him by the people of the Maritime Provinces or elsewhere to place the Intercolonial under the Board of Railway Commissioners. My hon. friend from Carleton says that all you will have to do will be to drop a postal note or send a telegram to the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commisioners and your grievance, if you have such, will be redressed instanter. That has not been my experience with the board. I am prepared to grant that this board has proved a useful purpose. But it takes time, just as it takes time to confer with the general manager or the officials of the Intercolonial, to get matters adjusted or arranged. I have taken up matters with the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I have had to wait their pleasure to consider them and to make their findings. What is true of the Board of Railway Commissioners is true of the railway officials at Moncton.

On the question of applications for sidings my hon. friend from Carleton adduces the argument that this change must be an advantage, because, forsooth, when you wanted a siding at any point on the Intercolonial you could not get any satisfactory attention by railway officials.

Mr. CARVELL: I know of one that was done.

Mr. COPP: I know of one that was done and done very quickly but it was also removed very quickly. But that is not the rule. As far as I have been able to gather, under regulations of the Intercolonial, if a man wants a siding put in to his plant, or to an industrial concern, he makes application and puts up a deposit. Then, the railway engineers lay out the siding and put it in. The freight rates that are paid on produce or anything coming from that siding are credited to the amount of deposit put up by applicant until same is returned to him.

Mr. COCHRANE: So much a car.

Mr. COPP: I have never been able to find that to get a siding in involved a great deal of trouble or expense. My hon. friend from Carleton points out that a great many sections of the General Railway Act have been left out. The minister claims they have been omitted unintentionally and they are going to be put in by amendment to the Bill. But it does seem to me that if there is one thing more than another that is going to bear on this question it is the control and increase of freight rates. The minister says: The Lord knows, we should have the freight rates increased on the Intercolonial.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I said they should not be reduced.

Mr. COPP: I disagree with my hon. friend in regard to that. I believe they should be reduced because they were increased very recently. A few years ago the freight rates on the Intercolonial were within reason. Annually, or at least very frequently, during the past ten years, the freight rates have been increased.

Mr. COCHRANE: So have wages and coal.

Mr. COPP: I was coming to that very point. Freight rates are being increased because my hon. friend and his officials are costing the people fifty per cent more than they did some years ago. The Government are employing high salaried officials who are absolutely unnecessary. It is the payment of higher salaries than are necessary that has caused my hon. friend and his officials to increase the local as well as through rates year after year and these rates are bearing heavily indeed upon the people of the Maritime Provinces. My hon. friend is making a mistake when he says that we should not reduce the freight rates. When you are paying officials $20,000, $15,000, $12,000, $10,000 and then down to $6,000, $7,000 and $8,000 a year, and when you are employing officials whose offices a few years ago were not in existence, you can see the necessity for increasing the freight rates. These positions have been made for these officials and these high salaries have been granted to them. Then you see these officials going about their work from station to station along the line of the Intercolonial in private cars using up the coal and the rolling stock of the country.

Mr. COCHRANE: Are there any more private cars now than before?

Mr. COPP: I do not know whether there are or not.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are a lot more at Ottawa.

Mr. COCHRANE: There are no more there.

Mr. COPP: Whether there are any more private cars now than there were ten years ago on the Intercolonial, I say it is wrong in the interest of the operation of the road. At this time of all times in the history of our country, it is unnecessary. If an official wants to go from Moncton to St. John on some little private business he goes in a private car at the expense of the Intercolonial railway which means at the expense of the people of Canada. I have no criticism to offer in regard to the use of private cars where it is necessary. The manager of the Intercolonial, if he is going on a tour of inspection or coming to Ottawa, he may ride in his private car without meeting any objection from me because he is doing business along the road, but I do object to minor officials, if they want to go and inspect some work, say for instance on Prince Edward Island, taking a private car down to Painsec junction and to Point du Chêne and having a private car meet them to bring them back. There is a great deal of that going on. That is a small matter, I admit, but these are things that are increasing the cost of the operation of the Intercolonial railway and with this increasing cost it has been found necessary to increase the freight rates until the people who have to pay for the carriage of freight on the Intercolonial, particularly local freight, feel the burden severely. The minister will be well advised if he will take this matter into consideration, and, instead of increasing the freight rates on the Intercolonial, try to do something to reduce the expense of operation. He will thus be enabled to decrease freight rates, and to give the people the same advantages they derived from the operation of the Intercolonial years ago, when freight rates were less and the cost of operation of the Intercolonial correspondingly small.

At six o'clock the House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THE CASCADE SCENIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the motion of Mr. W. H. Bennett that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 32, to incorporate The Cascade Scenic Railway Company—Mr. Morphy—be concurred in:

Mr. GRAHAM: Some important amendments have been made here. Perhaps it will be necessary to send the Bill back to the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) is in charge of the Bill. I have in my hand a letter from him to this effect:

> I have been advised by the promoters of this Bill that they accept the same as amended by the Senate. I would like to have the same forthwith concurred in when the Bill comes up in the House of Commons.

The promoters of the Bill, therefore, are agreeable to the changes made in the Senate.

Mr. NESBITT: If the Bill is materially changed the rule is to send it back to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have made a cursory examination of the amendments, and they appear to me, as far as I can judge, to be in the public interest.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT.

Consideration resumed in committee of Bill No. 118, to amend the Government Railways Act.—Hon. Frank Cochrane—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 2—Definitions:

Mr. COCHRANE: I beg to move that paragraph (b), section 2, be amended by inserting immediately after the word " railways," in line 9, the words " or ' Canadian Government railways ',' and by inserting immediately after the word " Canada," in line 13, the words " and operated under the control and management of the Minister of Railways and Canals."

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister think that these words would be strong enough to cover the case of the Canadian Northern Railway system if the Bill which is now under consideration by the House in respect to that railway goes through? Personally, I think not. It would be a great mistake to bring the Canadian Northern Railway system under the control of this Act as it is now drafted.

Mr. COCHRANE: This amendment is merely to make statutory recognition of the designation used in labelling rolling stock.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is not intended, then, that the Canadian Northern railway will come under this Act if the Bill dealing with that railway is adopted?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know. The Bill has not yet been adopted, and I cannot express an opinion.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a very important point.

Mr. COCHRANE: Upon the passing of the Act a new board of directors would be appointed for the Canadian Northern Railway system, and it would be operated separately from the other government railways.

Mr. MACDONALD: Subsection (b) of section 2 says:

"Government railways" means and includes all railways and all properties and works in connection therewith, owned, leased or in any way controlled by His Majesty in the right of his Government of the Dominion of Canada.

If the language were left as originally drafted, it might be contended that the Canadian Northern would come under the operations of the Bill. I apprehend that the minister by his amendment seeks to limit the operations of this Bill to such railways as His Majesty, through my hon. friend's department, regularly operates.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Application of certain sections of Railway Act to government railways:

Mr. CARVELL: In view of what I pointed out this afternoon—and of what I did not point out, at the request of the minister—I think this section ought to stand.

Mr. COCHRANE: What objection do you take to this section?

Mr. CARVELL: This is the section that adopts the schedule; this section and the schedule should be considered together.

Mr. COCHRANE: There would be no objection to coming back to this section if the schedule were not carried as my hon. friend thought proper.

Mr. MACDONALD: Logically, this section ought to stand until we see what is in the schedule. If we pass this in advance, we are passing the schedule, the contents of which we do not know.

Mr. COCHRANE: All right; let it stand.

Section stands.

On section 4—No fine or penalty to be imposed upon His Majesty or the minister!

Mr. CARVELL: This section is certainly objectionable. If the railway—I do not care what you call it, the minister or His Majesty or whatever it may be—is not liable to any fine or penalty under the Railway Act, we might as well throw this Bill into the waste basket, because if that be the case, the only object of this Bill is to give the board the power to increase the rates on the Intercolonial and not to give it power over anything else. I do not think that was the intention of the minister, and I know it was not the intention of the subcommittee that had Bill No. 13 under consideration. We went over this matter, and it was the unanimous opinion of the Railway Committee that the government railways should be brought under the Railway Act. I am not trying to obstruct the passage of this Bill; I am trying to assist the minister to make it as workable as possible. If you say that this railway is going to be under the General Railway Act of Canada, and then say that is not subject to any orders of the board which mean the expenditure of money, or the payment of penalties or submission to fines, unless the matter first has the approval of the Governor in Council, then all that you are doing goes for naught, the Railway Board has practically no power at all. The Railway Board can pass an order saying that, in their judgment, certain things ought to be, but if the Intercolonial Railway authorities do not want to obey that order, they need not do so.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think any minister could stand the pressure.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, let us have the Bill so that we shall not have to stand the pressure. That is what we want. The minister has been up against pressure ever since he has been in office, and every Minister of Railways has been up against pressure.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely the hon. member does not refer to me?

Mr. CARVELL: When my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) was Minister of Railways, he was subject to just as much pressure as the present minister is, and just as long as it is possible for a politician to get after the minister, he will do so. I would like to see this Bill drafted in such a way that there would be no possibility of a politician getting after the minister in any of these matters. Let us put the railway under the board so that the board will have some jurisdiction over it. The minister must admit that under section 4, if the board make an order, let us say, that certain appliances must be provided, as they have a right under the Railway Act to do, and say: If you do not do this thing, we will fine you; the Intercolonial railway authorities may say: It is true the Board of Railway Commissioners wish us to provide these appliances, but they have no power to enforce their order, they cannot punish us if we do not provide them. And some influential politician down in Moncton may say: I think if we enforce this, we shall lose votes. Therefore, it will not be enforced. This measure is the nakedest skeleton I have ever seen in my life—there is absolutely nothing to it whatever. I realize there might perhaps be a little incongruity in saying that a creation of the Crown shall have the power to fine the Crown and subject it to penalties. The difficulty is that this affects not only the Crown but all its officials. Secion 428 refers to carrying dangerous goods, and every company which does that, except in conformity with the regulations made by the board, shall be subject to a penalty of $500. But under this Bill, the Government railways can do as they please and nobody has a word to say about the matter. Section 429 provides that if any railway company improperly refuses to check baggage, they are subject to a penalty. That section is cut out of this Bill. I referred before to sections relating to making returns concerning accidents, refusal to make returns required by the board, and making false returns. Section 441, which should be discussed under this section, provides:

> For the purpose of enforcing any penalty under any of the provisions of this Act, or enforcing any regulation, order, or direction of the Governor in Council, the minister, the Board, or any inspecting engineer, made under this Act, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for, or employed by the company, shall, if within the scope of his employment, in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission or failure of such company.

That is a very important provision of the Railway Act, but it does not apply to this Bill. Subsection 2 provides that the company is liable to the same penalty as an individual offender, but that is all cut out of this Bill, and neither the individual offender nor the company would be liable. There is a section, which I am not able to find at the moment, which provides that a railway company is liable for all acts or omissions of its officers. That section is not included in this Bill, so that any officer of the Intercolonial may be as negligent as he chooses, and the company assumes no responsibility.

Mr. COCHRANE: If we take section by section, we shall get through the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: I am doing so.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, the hon. member is not.

Mr. CARVELL: I am just pointing out to the minister—

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, I am not objecting to that, but we are getting away from the subject.

Mr. CARVELL: I am on the subject; I am pointing out to the minister that if he leaves section 4 as it is, then all those sections providing for penalties are absolutely nugatory—they are eliminated from this Bill. I look upon section 4 as the most objectionable section of them all, and the minister should consider very carefully whether he wishes to force this section through, or whether he will not allow this Bill to stand and change the section in some way so that the provisions of the Railway Act will apply to the Intercolonial.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The hon. member has referred to the penalties imposed under this Bill on the company. That would mean His Majesty. Section 4 provides that no penalty shall be imposed on His Majesty. Therefore all such clauses are properly omitted. The imposition of penalties by summary proceedings would bring His Majesty into all the lower courts without a fiat.

Mr. CARVELL: If His Majesty is going to be a railway company, then His Majesty should be a railway company, and he should be subject to the laws of the land. That is what I am arguing. I do not know who has furnished that memorandum for my hon. friend, but it sounds to me as if it were furnished by the man who drafted the Bill. Why should not His Majesty, if he is to be a railway company, be subject to a penalty? If he is going to carry goods and run trains, and if he assumes all the privileges of a public utility corporation, why should he not assume all the responsibilities of it as well? I should like to see the government railways under the Railway Act, and I should like to see every section possible of the Railway Act made applicable to the operation of the Intercolonial.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps I appreciate as much as any person the difficulties of the situation. It took me a full year to get the Justice Department to consent to allowing men having claims for damages on the line to sue up to the amount of $200. There seems to be a sort of aristocracy in the Justice Department which sticks to the old saying, so far as railways are concerned, that the King can do no wrong. The King, if he is running a railway, can kill a cow just the same as if he were not a King, and he ought to be subject to the same laws so far as possible as Lord Shaughnessy is when he is running a railway. We ought to get away from that bit of mythology about the non-liability of the King when he goes into private enterprises.

I understand the legal difficulties the department has in drawing up a Bill to put this railway under the jurisdiction of the Railway Board, so long as the department insists that the King can do no wrong, even if he is running a railway. That is the proposition the Railway Department finds itself up against. Would there be a violation of the constitution, or of the divine right of kings—when they are running railways—if we put a clause in the Act reading: "For the purposes of this Act the management of the Canadian Government railways shall stand in the same position as if it were a private company." The hon. gentleman from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) said: But the money would be paid by the King and would go back to His Majesty. Still there would be this difference, that there would be a penalty that the management of the railway would fear—it would increase the cost of running the railway to that extent. I think, if something of that kind were placed in the Act, it would remove the difficulty and would, in the eyes of the public at least, place this railway in the same position as if it were a company railway. Would the Minister of Justice tell us what harm would be done it an amendment such as the one I suggested were placed in the Act, in legal phrase?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is a large question. What harm would be done would be difficult to say, but I think that what is asked for would be the complete revolution of a principle established and recognized in our form of government I fancy ever since it commenced, and probably much more absolute in the old days than it is to-day. It seems to me it would be a very incongruous thing to have His Majesty, even if he be running a railway, subject to be summoned before the sort of tribunal that would be imposing a penalty. I understand that this is a question of imposing penalties. I do not know why there should be any difference made with regard to the running of a railway more than with regard to any other matter, where a claim is made against Crown. I do not know that there is any greater reason for not enforcing a claim because it is connected with railway operation than there would be with regard to any similar claim resulting from the wrongdoing or negligence of an agent or employee of the Crown. The hon. gentleman asked me what harm would be done. Perhaps I might ask him, what great harm results from applying to the Crown the responsibility for what might happen in connection with anything else? The same argument that would apply to the case of the ordinary railway would apply to the responsibility of the Crown. With regard to claims arising out of the operation of this railway, precisely the same recourse would be open to a claimant which is open with regard to any other claim for which the Crown may be legally responsible; that is to say, a petition of right is open to everybody. The hon. member referred to a difficulty in obtaining consent from the Department of Justice—which is apparently held responsible for this principle of law—to have proceedings taken in ordinary form for damages up to $200. That is certainly a departure from the general practice. I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of the proposition that the Crown, at all events as regards civil liability, should be liable to be sued as other people are sued, without the formality of a petition of right. But, after all, I think that in actual practice the issue of a petition of right is, to-day at all events practically a formality; the cases in which petition of right is refused are certainly very few and very far between. I do not think there has been an instance for a long time past of the refusal to grant a petition of right where, upon the face of the contention, there was any colourable right that could be enforced. I occasionally hear my predecessor in my present office express a very liberal view—may I call it?—as to the manner in which these petitions should be granted, and I think, notwithstanding the change in the occupancy of the office, we have acted, in that regard in no less liberal manner. There is not any serious difficulty interposed in the way of any person who has a legal claim by this requirement, which is in accordance with what has been the rule and the law under our constitution from time immemorial—that there should be leave of the Crown in order that the Crown might be sued. As regards the civil liability resulting from the operation of the railway, that is the only obstacle that stands in the way of the enforcement of such legal liability. I am not absolutely familiar with the provisions of this Bill, and I have not had occasion to deal with it personally. I understand these provisions relieve the Crown from the responsibility for penalties simply.

Mr. CARVELL: That is it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister has introduced a Bill to place the government railways under the Railway Commission. A private corporation running a railway must obey the orders of the board or be subject to penalty. This clause we are discussing will exempt the government railways from any fines or penalties; in other words, the Board of Railway Commissioners can order us to do something, but if we do not do it, there is no way of enforcing the order.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the point.

Mr. DOHERTY: Is there any reason to apprehend that the Government, at whose instance this railway is placed under the direction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, will fail to comply with the orders that are made? With reference to any ordinary judgment that is rendered against the Crown, there does not seem to be any reason to apprehend that it will not be satisfied. I do not know it is contemplated that they should proceed to seize the public property in satisfaction of a judgment. I think the general assumption is that where there is that direction, that the Crown shall act under the direction of any particular body, it will be complied with; but I know of no cases where there is provision for penalties being imposed upon the Crown for disobedience to directions so made. After all, is this anything more than taking the direction of the government railway, in regard to certain matters out of the hands of the Government and placing it in the hands of the Railway Board? Instead of the minister, or the Department of Justice, or the Government itself, deciding what shall be done, it will be decided by the Railway Board. After we have that decision it is for the Government to carry it out, just as it would carry out the decision of the minister or of the Government itself. I do not think the idea is to make it compulsory on the Government to do these things which are right, but to have the decision of the question of what is right for the Government to do in the carrying on of the railway operations left to the same board that decides what it is right for the railway company to do.

You get the two bodies acting under the direction of the same body. The only difference is that the railway companies generally are subject to compulsion to act, whereas with regard to the administration of a government railway. as I understand it, you have the provision in effect that operations are to be carried on under the direction of the Railway Board. It seems to me it can hardly be assumed that the law providing for the direction of the operations of this railway, which is a government railway, shall be in the hands of the Railway Board, and that you must look to means of compulsion to be exercised upon the Government to carry out the direction of that body in whose hands the direction is placed by the law itself.

Mr. DEVLIN: May I ask the minister a question? The Railway Board being subservient to the Government, can the Railway Board order the Government, which is superior to it and which is its creator, to do an act which the Government may be unwilling to perform; and the Government, acting as His Majesty and being unable to do any wrong, can its servant, or His Majesty's servant, order His Majesty to perform an act against His Majesty's will?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is precisely the condition of affairs that my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) complains of. While there may be something to be said for instituting a system where you submit His Majesty—that is the country—to the same control and direction of courts or to a board of this kind as other people are subjected to, yet, until the principles to which the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) has referred are departed from in our constitutional system, I do not think we can arrive at a situation where a body appointed by the Government shall be given power to exercise compulsion on the Government.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is facing the thing pretty well, I think, but he is forgetting the fact that Canada is branching out to-day on a very much extended application of the principle of public ownership and public operation of railroads. I would not say as much as I have said on this Bill were it not for the fact that another Bill is before Parliament by which the Government proposes to take over and operate one of the great transcontinental systems of Canada. I know there is a great idea in the country that the people can operate a public utility better than a corporation can. If you take that in the sense of spending more money, multiplying officials, decreasing efficiency, and everything else that goes with government operation, I admit you may be correct. But if it means doing things on business principles, getting the best service you can out of your employees, and giving the cheapest and best service to the public, then everything that has taken place in the way of public ownership up to the present has been an absolute failure. I am trying to guard against that condition of affairs in the future, so far as the railway law is concerned. The minister says he is going to bring the Intercolonial under the control of the Railway Board. The road will then be in the same position as all other railway systems in Canada brought under government control and operation. My hon. friend says: "Can you give an instance of government-owned railways refusing to carry out the instructions or orders of the Railway Board? Of course we cannot, because they have never been under the Railway Board so far.

Mr. COCHRANE: Has any private road been fined?

Mr. CARVELL: I don't know.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think so.

Mr. CARVELL: I imagine if they have not it is because the law is there, and they know they will be fined. This club is held over their heads. My hon. friend asks: Can you conceive of a government refusing to obey the orders of the Railway Board? My answer is, I can conceive of it without any difficulty. I can conceive of an official failing to do what he should do, and some aggrieved patron of the road applying to the Railway Board and getting an order directing the railway to do a certain thing within a certain time. That is just where the politician will get in his work. You can quite understand that this may affect something political in the community, and the politician will go to the minister and say: Now, we are going to lose votes if this thing goes through; therefore it should not go through. It will be sent up to the council, and the council will be influenced by the same things as influenced the minister. Government officials are eternally shifting responsibility on to somebody else. I do not care who may be under the government control or in the government service, inside of six months he will be demanding more pay and less work. That is constitutional. I am not finding fault with any one official; it applies to the whole body of public officials—more pay and less work—that is the habit. You put a man in charge of a government railway, and for some reason or other he gets it into his head that he must not meet the demands of the people, and he is always warding them off. He feels that the man who makes an innovation is interfering in some way with his dignity, and he shifts it off and says, No, you cannot do that. I never had but one constituent on the Intercolonial in my life. I was thankful when we went out of office. There was only one to fire. They fired him, and I did not blame them. I could see a most wonderful change in that man inside of two years. When he went to the road he was a real active live wire; when he left it, he was a machine; his idea was—don't do anything—shift it up to the man next above—let it go on—get around your responsibility. If there was a penalty applicable to the railway, in the event of it failing to do its duty or carry out the instructions of the Board, these officials would become more like business men who run business corporations. Take the three great railways of Canada to-day, the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern; in my estimation you will find the best class of men Canada has ever produced in these companies—real live business men, who meet situations as they arise, men who make decisions, and see that those decisions are carried into effect. This is simply because the railway companies hold them responsible. The railway companies themselves are responsible for the carrying out of the directions of the board, and know full well that if they do not give the service, meet the wishes of the people, the Board of Railway Commissioners has power to compel them to do it. My contention is, if the Intercolonial were placed in the same position as a corporation is, then the railway company, as I choose to style it, will say to its employees: You must do business, and do it on business principles; if you do not, you are under the instructions of the board and you will be fined, or punished. The railway employee would then realize that he is part of this machine, and not a mere cog in the political wheel; he would appreciate the fact that he was there to help the railway, to exercise his thinking powers, and be a man of action. The country has to get service, which it does not get at the present time. After all it is a pyschological question, and it is from that point of view that I am opposed to public ownership and public operation. You never can get anything out of men who are simply government officials. They are merely waiting for four o'clock to come.

I am not blaming them at all, it is constitutional with them and they cannot help it. But surely, when we are passing laws affecting these people, we should try to frame our laws so as to get the best out of them.

When this country is about to launch into a great system of Government operation, I do hope that we will try to get what we can out of it. It will be a pretty poor service, and it will cost almost twice as much as it will under present conditions, but if we are going to have it let us see that it is efficient when we are starting. But there is a much greater principle at stake than the mere fact of taking some money out of the Crown, and that principle is that the men we have in charge of the Intercolonial shall have some spur to operate it as a business proposition. For that reason I contend that this clause 4 should be entirely changed; in fact, I think it should be eliminated altogether. I can see no reason for it.

Mr. GRAHAM: What harm would it be to leave it out?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and let the road be a real railway. If the King is going to run a railway, let him run it like any other man, and if he does not do it right let him pay the penalty. Why should we not extend this liability to the officials of the road and make them pay the penalty as well as the King? If you do you will get efficiency which you will not get unless there is some such drastic provision contained in this Bill.

Mr. NESBITT: I understood from the minister that he was going to amend section 4 and that he only wanted to exempt the Government railways from liability to fine and expropriation. But section 4 exempts them from everything. I should like to see the minister go very much farther than apparently this Bill intends to go with reference to bringing the railway under the Railway Board. I join with my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) in asking the minister to have this clause amended very materially.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I sympathize with the views of my hon. friend from Carleton, but I see great difficulties in the way of fining the King. My suggestion this afternoon as to that has not been satisfactorily answered. If you fine the King $500 it means that he pays the fine to himself and he is no worse off than before. It is probably a little annoyance to be fined, but he is no worse off—he has the money in the other pocket. I think there is something in the suggestion of the hon. member for Carleton about officials. Could we not fine the officials? This road is to be run by officials. If the Railway Board makes an order that it is the duty of an officer before he makes a change in the tariff to file it with the board, and he neglects to comply with that order, he should be made liable. If a railway company proposes to make a change in freight or passenger rates the new rates are to be filed so many days before they become effective and if the responsible official neglects to perform that duty and puts the rates in operation without filing the schedule he is fined. Why not deal with an official of the government railway in the same way? I think you would get somewhere if you decided to fine the officer of the railway if he refused to comply with the direction of the board. You would get farther than if you placed the fine on the King. No one suggests that we should put the King in jail if he refuses to pay, or that we should arrest the minister. I do not think there is anything to be gained by a step of that kind, but there is a great deal to be gained by fining the superintendent of that railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: The King will pay his fine.

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, he will not.

Mr. MACDONALD: The section under discussion is the fundamental section in regard to the whole Bill. While I personally do not agree with the principle of the Bill, I assume that we have passed that stage, and I would like to do what I can in the way of suggesting amendments to the minister so as to make this measure as workable as possible. Under section 4 the situation would be that practically any application made to the Board of Railway Commissioners would be nugatory if it were made by any other person than the Department of Railways and Canals itself. If the Railway Department choose to deal with a question, what will be the use following the provisions of the Act, of submitting it to the Board of Railway Commissioners without any certainty that the order made will go into effect? Suppose my hon. friend from Carleton, or myself, acting on behalf of a client who had some rights which he thought had been infringed by the Government—for instance, a right granted to him under any other clause of the Railway Act—went to the Railway Commission and asked them to decide upon the matter. Suppose that the board decides in favour of our application. But when they had decided, action, so far as the individual would be concerned, would be barred and we should simply be back to the point at which we started.

Mr. CARVELL: It is simply the opinion of the board.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is simply the opinion of the board. It may be a very fair and interesting document, but in so far as getting any relief for the party interested is concerned, it has no value whatever. I am at a loss to know what the situation would be if this clause were adopted. I do not think it would be possible for a party who had made a complaint to the board to get any relief whatever. But the minister comes in with section 4 and absolutely bars the way. Although there are penalities prescribed by the Railway Act, penalties shall not be exacted of His Majesty, or the Minister of Railways and Canals. I do not think they could have been exacted any way, and therefore I think the section is pure surplusage. I do not think there is under the common law, such a thing as collecting from the Crown unless by express Act of Parliament. This section takes away a right that really does not exist in common law no matter what the judges may say. I apprehend that the minister wants the statute to be of some practical good. With reference to the difficulty that the minister speaks about in connection with proceeding against His Majesty. I remember the occasion when my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) then Minister of Railways and Canals, was perfectly willing to accept enactment of the Small Claims Act, and I remember the greatest possible difficulties were suggested by Sir Allen Aylesworth, who was then Minister of Justice and who —with all the instincts of the great lawyer that he is—regarded with a sort of holy horror the idea of departing from the principle that when you are proceeding against the Crown you should proceed by petition of right. However, a system was inaugurated under which an ordinary party who desired to enforce a claim instead of being obliged under the law to go to the Exchequer Court, was permitted to proceed in the ordinary courts, not against His Majesty, but against the Government Railway Managing Board who are the parties who ought to be proceeded against. After all, as a matter of practical result, it is a pure fiction to speak of the Crown managing the Canadian Government railways. The persons who run the Canadian Government railways are the general manager and his officials, subject to the minister as a court of appeal. It is not to be assumed that the minister knows all the details of the operations which are carried on by the general manager. It is impossible to conceive that he would. The responsibility for the proper operation of the road in detail rests upon the man who has the confidence of the minister as general manager. The minister himself, in 1914, agreed that:

> In any action, suit or other proceeding, His Majesty shall not be cited as defendant, but the process shall be issued against the General Manager of Government railways, and such process may be served on him or any other person duly authorized by him to accept such service of, or be served with, processes in such cases—

Why should not the minister insert in this Bill a provision that where any right to a penalty accrues by reason of failure to carry out the orders of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the party who would be liable, mutatis mutandis, as compared with the railway company, would be the General Manager of the Canadian Government railways, or of the particular railway against which the order was made? I suggest to the minister that the difficulty could be remedied by striking out this section and simply providing in a short section by apt words that the party who should be proceeded against with the idea of enforcing the orders of the board should be the general manager of the railway from time to time. My desire in suggesting that is that both ministers may agree that we are here faced by an anomalous situation. I apprehend that the present minister is anxious in placing the government railways under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners, to place the people operating the railway in the same position as those operating the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern or any other railway, otherwise it is a work of supererogation. Why, therefore, if it is intended that the railway in its operation is to be on the same basis as a company railway, should not the provisions of the Small Claims Act be adopted so that the General Manager of the Canadian Government railways or the manager of the particular railway against whom the order is made would be responsible for the carrying out of the order?

Mr. DOHERTY: So far as this section is concerned, it does not seem to prevent what the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) was contending ought to be done.

Mr. CARVELL: Every section by which the officer or agent could possibly be held responsible for anything has been eliminated from this Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman referred to the Small Claims provisions. In cases where parties take their recourse before the ordinary courts as against the Crown, I do not understand that the judgment does more than determine that the Crown ought to pay the money. I doubt if in any court there is provision under which, if the Government did not provide the money to pay a claim awarded by a court, any process would issue against His Majesty to execute that judgment. Then you are in the same position with regard to an order of the Railway Board as His Majesty is with regard to the judgment of a court.

Mr. CARVELL: Parliament could take any property of the Government or of His Majesty to satisfy a judgment.

Mr. DOHERTY: Parliament could if it chose to.

Mr. GRAHAM: If a man sued His Majesty and got judgment for a small claim and His Majesty did not want to pay, how would you collect judgment?

Mr. DOHERTY: If you got your judgment under this Small Claims provision I do not think there is any means of enforcing payment; but you have a determination that you are entitled to the money, just as here you will have from the Railway Board a determination that a certain thing ought to be done.

The effect of this Act is to put into the hands of the Railway Board the determination of how tie Intercolonial railway shall be carried on and dealt with in respect of matters coming before that Board. The effect of it is not to enable the Railway Board to exercise compulsion upon His Majesty—at all events, any further than a court exercises compulsion upon His Majesty when it says that a certain sum is a proper amount for His Majesty to pay.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to discuss from a legal viewpoint the several clauses of the Bill under discussion, I will restrict my remarks to certain statements made by hon. gentlemen on the other side, in the course of the discussion, concerning the administration of the Intercolonial railway and the supposed political partisanship of the Minister of Railways.

It is not my privilege to be on the railway committee and so, I did not have the opportunity to study the Bill and much less to take part in the discussion before the committee. That is the reason why I am under the necessity of offering now those few remarks.

Hon. gentlemen from Ontario never let a session pass without raising protracted debates and indulging in recriminations against the administration of the Intercolonial railway. Should any hon. gentleman be expected to abstain from dealing with questions relating to the Intercolonial railway they are the hon. members coming from the province of Ontario, since that railway runs exclusively through Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. Yet, as I said before, at every session these hon. gentlemen are raising objections and complaining of the heavy expenditures incurred in the administration of the line. My hon. friends ought to keep in mind that we of the province of Quebec, do not begrudge them the expenditure in relation to the management of the canals or to the construction of a railway for which the country will probably never have any use—the Hudson Bay railway.

Neither do we begrudge them the millions upon millions spent by this country upon the construction of railways in the West, the advantages of which have accrued to Ontario, in a much larger measure than to the province of Quebec. As I said before, it seems to me that it would only be fair that these gentlemen should put an end to their continuous wrangles over the Intercolonial.

We are told that it stands to reason that the western interests are altogether different from the eastern interests. If, since 1867 until now, that is to say, after being confederated for fifty years, we have not been able to come to an understanding, then should it not be best to part amicably?

I heard the hon. member from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) say this afternoon that the Intercolonial railway employees would be pleased to come under the railway commission. I do not know where he got that information, but I think it is a wild statement, because I know a number of men upon that road—a great many personally—better than my hon. friend could know them, and I am sure that such is not their opinion.

I also remember that my hon. friend said that we, the members from Quebec and the Maritime provinces, ought not to fear any interference from the railway commission so far as the rates are concerned, adding that we would be well safeguarded against it. I shall take upon myself to ask the hon. member from Lambton who are the representatives of Quebec and the Maritime provinces upon the railway commission. It is true we have the hon. Mr. Nantel, but after all he belongs to the western part of the province of Quebec, he is not at all familiar with the conditions prevailing in the eastern part of the province, and much less, in the Maritime provinces.

We are somewhat unfairly treated on that score. We should have a representative upon the railway commission; it would only be fair. Among six representatives, we have but one who belongs to Quebec, but he comes from the western part of the province. Although there are three of them, the Maritime provinces are not represented upon the railway commission.

It seems that there is a discrimination in that respect. We cannot expect to get a fair treatment at the hands of people who are not familiar with our needs and who belong to another part of the Dominion of Canada.

The member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) this afternoon indulged in considerable criticism of the Intercolonial railway. He said that he preferred to travel by the Canadian Pacific. My hon. friend knows—because he has been in the House a good deal longer than I have—the conditions under which the Intercolonial is run. The Canadian Pacific runs a good deal further south, and across a country in which there is much less snow than in the country traversed by the Intercolonial. Consequently, it is not surprising that it sometimes makes better time in winter than the Intercolonial. The Intercolonial goes as far north as a railroad can go, and, having regard to the weather conditions in the country between Bathurst and Campbellton and Levis, it is sometimes difficult for the trains to run on time. But under favourable weather conditions, this road competes favourably with the Canadian Pacific. When we compare the time-tables of the two roads, we find that the advantage is with the Intercolonial. Of course, sometimes the trains are late because there being a good deal of traffic on the road and because of the fact that the Intercolonial tries to give the public as much accommodation as possible by stopping at places where, perhaps, the Canadian Pacific would not stop. I think that the Intercolonial runs about 35 miles an hour, while the Canadian Pacific runs about 32. Even though the trains are sometimes half an hour late in reaching Montreal, we should bear in mind the fact that the Intercolonial is our own road and that it should be encouraged in preference to the other. Some hon. gentlemen on the other side have said that political partisanship is practised in connection with the administration of the Intercolonial. Well, I know something about the administration of that road. During some years I have not been on the best of terms with the Minister of Railways; consequently my opinion should be accepted as that of a man well posted on matters connected with the administration of the railway. The difficulty between the Minister of Railways and myself occurred because he did not want to run the road from a partisan standpoint; he did not want to do what I wanted him to do.

Mr. CARVELL: That is an honest confession.

Mr. BOULAY: He did not want to follow exactly the methods followed by the Liberal party in 1896. I say that from an independent point of view, and if I have become so independent since I have been in this House—because I was quite a Conservative when I became a member—it is because the Minister of Railways has not been running his railway from a partisan standpoint. If there is any one who deserves praise for his non-partisanship it is the Minister of Railways.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister is all right personally.

Mr. BOULAY: Let me give my hon. friend an example of the way in which the Liberal party used to treat us. One day during the political campaign of 1904 I was in a station on the Intercolonial. One of the railway employees had left his station and come down on a handcar to the next station, at which I was, a distance of about fifteen miles. He amused himself for about half an hour in insulting me on the station platform, although I had my ticket in my pocket and was waiting for the train and was quite within my rights in being there. I reported the matter at the time to the Minister of Railways, who, of course, was a Liberal, and gave him all the facts. Did I receive any justice? No. No investigation was held. The superintendent wished to have an investigation because he thought it was only fair for a citizen to have one so that he could prove his charge. The Minister of Railways, however, acting differently from what a minister should do, forbade an investigation, and I did not have an opportunity of proving what I had stated. The result was that the man was retained in his position, and, of course, he was encouraged, and the other employees were encouraged, to insult poor fellows who happened to be Conservatives. That was the way in which we were used during the Liberal administration, but such a shameful thing has never happened on the Intercolonial since 1911.

We are satisfied with the administration of the Intercolonial. We do not expect it to do any better under the circumstances under which that road is run, and we do not wish any change. If I have said in this House anything against the administration it has not been against the way in which the road is administered, but it has always been in connection with the fact that the people of Quebec, on account of the lack of French employees, cannot get proper justice, and in what I have stated I am perfectly right. I am sure, however, it is impossible for the administration to do any better so far as the operation of the road is concerned.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) spoke this afternoon about sidings. I know something about the way in which sidings are obtained on the Intercolonial. The old method used to be satisfactory, but that has been changed during the last few years. I do not object to the way in which the matter is conducted so far as the big companies are concerned. The big companies have the means to pay the expenses in connection with the building of a siding, which runs into from $500 to $1,000, but in the case of poor settlers, who very often want sidings along the Intercolonial, I think the old method should be reverted to; that is, those sidings should be built by the railway and at the expense of the railway, because a poor farmer asking for a siding is not able to pay $500 or $1,000 to a railway to build a siding. The Government would, therefore, do well to make a distinction between a siding built for a big company and one built for a private party, such as a poor settler or farmer in my province.

I would like to make a suggestion to the minister in connection with the running of the big engines that we call Santa Fe and Mikado on that part of the line between Mont Joli and Campbellton. Those engines are too large to run over that part of the road. The men whom we engage as firemen cannot stand the work on those big engines; they have to shovel ten to twelve tons of coal every day, and that is too severe a strain for a man unless he is as strong as two ordinary men. I would prefer that smaller engines be used on that part of the road, because it is physically impossible for firemen to stand the work, the reason being that there are too many grades on that part of the road, and the grades are so heavy it takes a long time to run the 105 miles between Mont Joli and Campbellton. On other parts of the road east of Campbellton and west of Mont Joli, the runs are shorter, the road is more level, and the men are better able to stand the strain and fulfil their duties. I have heard complaints from firemen who have been working on those engines, and they all say they cannot stand the work they have to perform on account of the size of those engines.

In reference to section 302 of Bill 13, I see in the schedule of this Bill that this section is included—

The CHAIRMAN Order. I wish to remind the hon. member that we are discussing section 4 of Bill No. 118, and the hon. gentleman's remarks must be relevant to this section, and he is not in order in making a general speech.

Mr. BOULAY: I have no objection, but I will come back to it.

Mr. McKENZIE: The question of the Intercolonial and its management is so very, very important to myself and the people I represent, I am afraid I should be regarded as indifferent to their interests if I did not say anything about the very important question now before this committee. In dealing with the Intercolonial we are dealing with a term of Confederation as laid down in the constitution. I wish to refer to section 145 of the British North America Act:

> Inasmuch as the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have joined in a declaration that the construction of the Intercolonial Railway is essential to the consolidation of the Union of British North America, and to the assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and have consequently agreed that provision should be made for its immediate construction by the Government of Canada; therefore in order to give effect to that agreement, it shall be the duty of the Government and Parliament of Canada to provide for the commencement within six months after the union, of a railway connecting the River St. Lawrence with the city of Halifax in Nova Scotia, and for the construction thereof without intermission, and the completion thereof with all practicable speed.

The minister will observe that the Intercolonial is just as much a term of Confederation as the educational section in regard to the separate schools in the province of Quebec and the educational section relating to the province of Ontario. The building of it is one of the terms of Confederation.

Mr. COCHRANE: I thought it was the running of it.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is not much good in a railway, unless it is run, and the conception and the true meaning of this section is that the road shall be built, and that it shall always continue under the full and absolute control of the people as represented by the members in this House. It is not, and never was the intention of this term of Confederation that the road could be built and then passed over to some control over which this Parliament would have no supervision. I submit, therefore, that if we introduce a new element into the management of this road which lessens the power of the representatives of the people over this road, we are tampering with a term of Confederation, as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia would not have come into Confederation except for this bargain. That is laid down in the Act itself, and so important was it that this section was put in the Act.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is it any different from the terms on which British Columbia came into Confederation, when the Canadian Pacific was proposed to be built?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sure British Columbia insisted very strenuously on the terms of Confederation being carried out, and one of the great tasks which the late Sir John Macdonald had to perform, with great energy, and under very great difficulty, was to insist upon keeping good faith with British Columbia, and helping to build the Canadian Pacific Railway long before the people of this country were really in a financial position to do it. But that provision was in the terms of Confederation with British Columbia, and Sir John Macdonald was determined that no fault could be found with him, or his Government, that they did not keep faith with British Columbia; and the promise to British Columbia was fulfilled and absolutely and fully carried out, and we never heard any complaint.

Mr. COCHRANE: Were the same conditions not imposed as in the case of the Maritime Provinces? There was nothing about the road, or rates, or anything else.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is nothing in the British North America Act about British Columbia coming in or staying out. Confederation was an actuality, a complete thing, before British Columbia came in, and Confederation would have gone on as it was whether British Columbia came in or stayed out. The terms on which British Columbia and Prince Edward Island came in, and the province of Manitoba was created, were separate and distinct contracts. Each of those provinces came in with the body of Confederation. But the original Confederation and the basic principles of the compact of Confederation embodied in the British North America Act are the parent of the whole business, and are, therefore, different from any branches or extensions which came afterward. I submit, the contract of Confederation and the statute upon which the whole fabric is based is different from the contract which Confederation, as represented by the King, made with another province. There is that very fundamental difference between the terms of Confederation itself and any terms Confederation may have made with British Columbia, or Prince Edward Island, or any province coming into the union. I mention this to show that it is a very serious thing to interfere in any way with the rights which the people have under the terms of the union. I submit, further, that the Intercolonial railway, with its management, is a very old institution. Confederation is 50 years old, and I do not know how long after Confederation it was before we had the Intercolonial. They certainly commenced building the Intercolonial shortly after Confederation, and it has been running ever since. Taken all in all I think it has given fair satisfaction to the people, and if the purposes of this new legislation is to impose a greater tax upon the people of the Maritime Provinces, or those who have to deal with the road, I would have to protest against it. I have not the lack of faith in the management of the Intercolonial by the department that some people might have. No institution is perfect, every institution has its faults; but I think for the last 50 years this road has been running that fair satisfaction has been given to the people. It is a sort of home institution. The people can approach the management through their representatives, and, although ministers are sometimes a little domineering and high-and-mighty, after all they have their lucid moments, and we can approach them and put our views before them. We are afraid of them all the time, but sometimes they are afraid of us, and we get some things done. Fortunately they have to come down to the House with their estimates, and are called upon to give us some explanations, and the people in that way have an opportunity of getting close to the management of their own road.

I am afraid that so far as concerns the part of the country I come from, if another tyrant is introduced in the shape of this Railway Board, the people will complain that it is a new institution about which they do not know anything, and it will take them a great many years to learn how to approach it. I am sure the minister will understand that the distance between the operation of his road away down in Cape Breton and a court which sits in Ottawa, is very far, and a great drawback particularly for the people from the extreme eastern part of Nova Scotia. A man will put up with a great deal of inconvenience before he will come here to appear before the board. If it is the intention to raise the rates on the Intercolonial higher than they are, it will materially interfere with large industrial undertakings in our part of the country. Under war conditions, we should try to get along the best we can, and take mutual obligations and mutual burdens in order to keeps the wheels of industry going as well as possible. It is well known that we are largely dependent on the Intercolonial now to get our coal away. If the fact that we could not sell our coal was the only trouble it would not be so bad, but we have thousands of men, women and children dependent on the coal mines, and if the coal cannot be sold, the mines cannot be operated. I protest as vigorously as I can against raising the rate $1.40 a ton on coal in war times, when the King has taken our ships and put them in other places—where they are necessary of course, but they are taken away from the purposes for which our companies had them, that of carrying away our coal. This Government makes it practically impossible for us to sell coal to any advantage when they impose $1.40 per ton extra upon the carrying of the coal to the places where we have to sell it. I appeal to the minister through you, Sir, that this matter should be considered, and that the fuel inspector or fuel agent of the Government who is looking after it, should be consulted by the Government and the matter taken up seriously to see if there is not some way by which we can go back to the normal rates so that our people will be able to compete. I have it on the authority of our coal managers that with this extra rate of $1.40 a ton, competing with American coals at Montreal and other places is absolutely out of the question, and means the closing down of our mines, when we have no ships; and the closing down of our mines means that our men are out of work and cannot support their families.

Mr. COCHRANE: One of the mines in your section refused to sell us coal, because they have not any to spare.

Mr. McKENZIE: Which mine is that?

Mr. COCHRANE: One of the mines owned by the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps you would not pay them enough.

Mr. COCHRANE: That was not the reason they gave; they said they could not spare it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would be very glad to know they are so busy at their mines and with their sales that they cannot sell coal to the road. I am well acquainted with their shipping facilities, and they say they have no vessels. The Intercolonial is the only railroad there, and if they will not sell coal to the Intercolonial, and cannot get it to the great centres such as Montreal and Toronto, I do not know what they are doing with it. I am instructed by some of the managers that they are really up against a difficulty which they do not know how to overcome. I wish to put myself on record as saying that while there have been some complaints about the management of the road, it has been doing fairly well. It is the people's railway, and it must continue as the people's railway, and must be managed by the people. The Minister of Railways, and this committee, and this Government, may as well make up their minds once for all that while any property is the property of the people, the representatives of the people must have something to say about it, and that the management whether for good or ill, must be subject to this Parliament and subject to the voice of the people. If we are going to run railways, or have government ownership, we may as well make up our minds that we cannot admit any tyranny, any power about which we have nothing to say, into the ownership of our property. I think there will be less politics in the matter as we go along, but to shift it onto the shoulders of some board which we appoint ourselves and in regard to which we have nothing to say, is impossible.

Dealing with section 4, I would say as a lawyer that any talk of imposing penalties upon His Majesty is absolutely out of the question. Of course, it is His Majesty only in theory, but that theory is exceedingly important. All power, as far as our courts are concerned, is centered in the King, and it is in the name of the King that we have the courts. The humblest magistrate cannot bring a man before him under a summons or a warrant except in the name of the King. The King is the central power, and it is altogether out of the question that he will summon himself into his own court. The Parliament is a King's court, and as far as Canada is concerned, the King's highest court. We are sitting here by authority of the King. It is entirely out of the question that we shall constitute a court under this Act by which the King will be subject to penalty. Whatever other way it may be done, we must keep the source of power around which the whole machinery of justice revolves absolutely free from any entanglement of that kind, and if there is any punishment to be imposed under the operation of this Act it must be something separate, apart and distinct from the name of the King, so that any proceedings instituted can be instituted in the name of the King.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister not take into consideration the points brought forward by my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and myself on this section?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I had intended to move an amendment to section 4. Perhaps I might do it now. There is a good deal in the point raised by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and others, that there appears to be no penalty or no sanction for not doing what the board orders. I think perhaps if there were some sanction or penalty on the minister for not carrying out the orders of the board, he would be put more in the nature of a private corporation, and I think the officials of the company would be more likely to carry out the directions of the board. I think they should be subject to such penalty as the board may see fit to impose upon them in case they do not carry out its orders. For instance, section 34, subsection 3, the general Railway Act, says:

> The Board may by regulation or order provide penalties, when not already provided in this Act, to which every company or person who offends against any regulation or order made by the Board shall be liable.

Subsection 4 says:

> The imposition of any such penalty shall not lessen or affect any other liability which any company or person may have incurred.

That imposes on the minister the duty of carrying out the order which the board makes and in addition to that I think there should be some penalty for not doing so. I would therefore, with the consent of the minister, move:

> That clause 4 be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:
> "Notwithstanding anything contained herein, or in the Railway Act, His Majesty shall not, nor shall the Minister of Railways and Canals, be liable to any fine or penalty except such as may be imposed by the Board, and no order or judgment of the Board under or in consequence of which His Majesty would have to pay or expend any money shall have any force or effect until it has been approved by the Governor in Council.

The effect of that would be that if the board made an order against the Minister of Railways and Canals under this Act he would have to comply with that order and pay such fine as the board imposed.

Mr. CARVELL: The amendment suggested by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) may be all right but he has not touched the real gravamen of the latter part of the clause. The latter part of the clause does not provide for fines but it provides for carrying out the order of the board regarding the expenditure of money. The board may order that the Intercolonial shall construct a siding, perhaps costing $100, $200; we feel that there should be some power to compel the Intercolonial to carry out the instructions of the board. As the clause is drafted the minister is not compelled to carry out the instructions of the board, and I do not think the amendment proposed by my hon. friend meets that.

Mr. COCHRANE: The Government is in a different position from an individual. We have to have money voted by Parliament or go to the Governor in Council to get permission. A minister cannot spend money if it is not voted.

Mr. CARVELL: You have large sums of money voted for general purposes with regard to which you could exercise some discretion.

Mr. COCHRANE: Very little. The hon. gentleman knows that in passing the railway estimates we have to say what everything is for. We do not get a blanket vote.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend takes a large vote which is nothing more than a cross entry. He receives $15,000,000 from the railway in the year and when he comes to Parliament he takes a vote of practically what he anticipates will be the income of the railway for the year.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, we take a lump sum for operation. It is not at all available for improvements.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend makes a distinction between what he takes for capital and what he takes for operation.

Mr. CARVELL: At page 52 of the estimates my hon. friend takes $6,875,000 for Canadian Government railways chargeable to capital.

Mr. MACDONALD: He takes more than that.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, at page 54 he takes $23,000,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is for operation.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has taken a vote of $23,000,000 this year.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is for operation, not construction.

Mr. MACDONALD: He takes a special vote on capital account.

Mr. CARVELL: On page 52 there is for:

Construction and betterments, $6,500,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is for capital expenditure?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend takes that capital vote and he takes the ordinary vote which is nothing more than a cross entry. The board, save in most exceptional cases, would only require the fulfilment of an order dependent on the money being voted by Parliament. Therefore, that difficulty does not arise. The amendment of my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) does not offer any solution. If the Act is to be workable the party upon whom the onus must be thrown for carrying out the orders of the board is the general manager of the government railways.

Mr. COCHRANE: He is not allowed to spend money without orders.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the orders of the board are to be fulfilled he is the man who actually spends the money. My hon. friend does not think that he is the general manager?

Mr. COCHRANE: I authorize it.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman authorizes it. But, we are arguing in a circle and we get back to this, that you are going to have the board make orders and you are going to put parties to the expense of going before the board to get an order, when the whole thing will be nugatory. Why do you not put the onus on the general manager of carrying the order of the board into effect? Why should not the people who are operating the Intercolonial be in the same position as the people who are operating the Canadian Pacific, Grand Trunk or Canadian Northern? The amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Grey does not reach the situation at all.

Mr. COCHRANE: It certainly is admitting penalties.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is admitting penalties, but I doubt whether the language is sufficiently apt to expressly override the common law rule that there is no penalty. But it may be so.

Mr. COCHRANE: It takes out clause 4 and admits a penalty.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the objection to putting the onus on the general manager?

Mr. COCHRANE: Because he is not allowed to spend money without permission, nor is the minister. The minister may get an Order in Council passed, but if he does not do so the Auditor General will not permit the bills to be paid.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Auditor General would have sufficient authority under an order of the board?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know whether he would or not.

Mr. McKENZIE: I must protest against the amendment proposed to section 4, absolutely. The section was bad enough before. It suggested that a penalty might be imposed upon the King. But here we have a court created by the King, deriving its authority from the King, and it is authorized to impose a penalty upon the King. It is absolutely absurd, and I appeal to you and the committee that at least it should not be adopted until we have the opinion of the Justice Department about it. There is no such law anywhere in the Empire, nor has it ever been attempted to pass such a law. It is a glaring absurdity, and I would be ashamed to be a member of a legislature that would pass such an enactment in the twentieth century.

Mr. CARVELL: I understand the position taken by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), and I think it is right. It is absolutely illogical that you should start proceedings against the King, at the instigation of the King, in an ordinary court. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has given us a solution. We have been labouring under a great misapprehension about the uselessness and nonsense of taking money out of the treasury and putting it back into the other pocket. But that is not the case under the provisions of the Railway Act, because if a penalty is imposed upon a railway company it is treated as is any other fine. The Summary Convictions Act and the General Criminal Code provide for the disposition of the penalty. It does not go to the Dominion, but partly to the municipalities. Therefore there is no reason why the Intercolonial should not be fined.

Mr. COCHRANE: A fine imposed by the Railway Board does not go to the municipalities.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not speaking of such a fine as that but of the fine imposed upon a person who, for breach of an order of the board, comes under the general law of the land. While it is inconsistent to lay an information in the name of the King against the King, there will be no difficulty in laying information in the name of the King against the manager of the Canadian Government railways. If the manager is fined he pays the fine out of moneys in his hands belonging to the Government, and in that way justice is satisfied and it is hoped there will not be a repetition of the events. I quite agree with the hon. member for North Cape Breton, that the present situation would be absolutely illogical if you attempt to fine the King, but you could fine the railway company in the name of the general manager.

Mr. COCHRANE: Suppose we allow the clause to stand to-night.

Section stands.

On section 5—Rules for practice and procedure:

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. MACDONALD: I move to amend this section by adding at the end thereof the words "not inconsistent with the terms of the Railway Act".

Amendment agreed to and section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Sections of the Government Railways Act repealed:

Mr. COCHRANE: I beg leave to move:

That clause 6 of the Bill be struck out and the following clause be substiuted in lieu thereof:

"6. (1) The following sections of the Government Railways Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, Chapter thirty-six, are hereby repealed:

"Sections 7 to 9 both inclusive, 15 to 45 both inclusive, 58, 61 and 64 to 79 both inclusive.

"(2) In case of any inconsistency between the provisions of the Government Railways Act and the sections of the Railway Act, as set out in the schedule to this Act, the provisions of the said sections shall prevail."

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think the minister should ask us to adopt that amendment without our first having an opportunity of considering it. I imagine the minister will also make some changes in the schedule, and I would suggest that he give notice to-night of what changes he purposes to make. I have no doubt that they will be accepted, but we should have opportunity of examining them.

Mr. COCHRANE: The proposed new clause is considered to be in better legal form. Sections 7 to 9 of the Government Railways Act are repealed and are replaced by sections 245, 246 and 247 of the Railways Act, which appear in the schedule. They relate to bridges. Sections 46 to 49 are restored, as they constitute the authority of the Governor in Council to impose tolls. These will be subject to the approval of the board.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a rather large order for one to carry in one's head. I would suggest that the minister give notice of all the changes and then we shall have an opportunity of examining them.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I understand that that amendment covers practically all the objections which the hon. member for Carleton made this afternoon.

Mr. CARVELL: I must have referred to twenty or thirty clauses; this refers to only three or four.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have a list of the clauses that my hon. friend referred to.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not want to be unfair, but I really wish to make the Act as workable as possible—

Mr. COCHRANE: I will give notice of the proposed changes. I propose to add the following as section 6 A:

6a. Nothing in this Act or in the sections of the Railway Act as set out in the schedule to this Act, shall be deemed to take away any right or power of His Majesty or of the minister given by the Expropriation Act or the Exchequer Court Act or any other general public Act, or to confer upon any court or other tribunal other than the Exchequer Court, the Supreme Court of Canada, and the Board, any jurisdiction not vested in such court or tribunal at the time that this Act comes into force, and nothing in this Act or in the said sections of the Railway Act shall affect any pending litigation or be taken to impair or affect any agreement between His Majesty or the government railways and any person at the time of the coming into force of this Act; provided also that all bridges, fences, crossings, and other structures now existing on the government railways may lawfully be maintained in accordance with the provisions of the Government Railways Act heretofore in force until a duly approved order of the Board has been made directing that any such structure be changed or rebuilt in accordance with the requirements of the Railway Act as extended and applied to the government railways by this Act.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister not propose to make any changes in the schedule?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes. Before dinner my hon. friend mentioned sections 398, 399, 400, 403, 406 and 417 of the Railway Act. These have relation to the imposing of a penalty upon the company. Sections 371 to 373, both inclusive which my hon. friend referred to have reference to telegraphs and telephones. They might be inserted in the present Bill, but they are not apt at present, as the government railways are not putting up wires. I purpose also to make amendments to sections 381 and 387.

Mr. CARVELL: I had only partly finished my remarks this afternoon when the minister asked me to wait until we reached this section. I adopted his suggestion, but I could go on now and give him another list. One of the worst cases of all is that of section 394. I had not reached that section.

Mr. COCHRANE: The clauses that my hon. friend did mention all had relation to penalties, except that with regard to the putting up of wires.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The matter of penalties was covered by my amendment.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister, I think, wants to meet us in this matter. I know we shall get together perfectly satisfactorily, but I want to point out that I have not finished the list of the sections which were not included in this Bill.

Mr. COCHRANE: I know that, but the formal amendments bring in some of the sections the hon. member wants.

Mr. CARVELL: I would suggest, anyway, that the minister treat this as a notice. It will appear on Hansard, and he can go over it, and we will go over it to-morrow. I will agree that I will expedite as much as possible the passage of the Bill, and I hope we can put it through as quickly as possible. We shall in this way have an opportunity of comparing the amendments moved by the minister with the law, and we shall then know exactly where we stand.

Mr. COCHRANE: I beg to move:

That the Bill be amended by striking out the schedule and substituting in lieu thereof the following:

Schedule.

"Sections of the Railway Act made applicable to government railways.

"Sections 31 to 71 both inclusive, 185 (excepting subsection 7 thereof), 186 to 188 both inclusive, 194 to 198 both inclusive, 245 to 268 both inclusive, 269 (excepting the provision thereof for determining compensation by arbitration), 271 to 289 both inclusive, 298 to 322 both inclusive, 323 and 324, the word "by-law" where it occurs in these sections shall mean and include a regulation of the Governor in Council, 325 to 366 both inclusive, 382 to 389 both inclusive, 394, 395, 402, 404, 405, 409, 412, 414, 416, 418 to 427 both inclusive, 430, 431, 437 to 440 both inclusive, and 443 to 451 both inclusive."

Mr. BOULAY: I will now make a remark that I was going to make a few minutes ago. I see that this Bill is going to be in line with Bill No. 13, that is, that certain sections in Bill 13 are to be included in this Bill. Among them is section 302. The Minister of Railways is reported in Hansard of the 23rd of July last as having made these remarks:

Mr. Cochrane: On the 18th July I accepted an amendment prepared by my hon. friend from Rouville and proposed by the hon. gentleman from Rimouski, which read as follows:

"All railway employees on local passenger trains running in the province of Quebec, having to deal with the travelling public, shall be conversant with the English and French languages from and after January 1, 1919."

There has been strong objection to this amendment on the ground that it would cut men out of their seniority. For instance, a man running on a freight train to Prescott or Brockville would be prevented from being promoted, say, to a passenger train running to

Montreal, because he was not able to speak French. I feel that the amendment suggested by the member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) will meet the situation far better. I move that section 302 be amended by adding thereto the following as subsection 3:

"After the 1st day of January, 1919, the Board may from time to time make such orders and regulations as it may deem advisable to provide that all or any railway employee on local passenger trains running in the province of Quebec shall be conversant with the English and French languages."

I am sorry that the amendment thus moved has been changed. I see that I am the only member from Quebec now present. I wish we were all here, because I I know all the other hon. members from Quebec would approve what I am going to say on this subject, and of the amendment I am going to suggest to section 302 of Bill No. 118.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that we are not considering Bill No. 13; we are considering Bill No. 118.

Mr. BOULAY: I wish to move an amendment to the schedule of Bill 118 as regards section 302 of the Railway Act concerning the Government railways. I wish to add to section 302 practically the same words that I proposed on the 18th of July, as follows:

All employees of government railways in the province of Quebec that have to deal with the travelling public shall be conversant with the English and French languages, and this provision to be in force from the first of January, 1919.

As this affects only the Government railway employees, there should not be any such objection as that referred to by the Minister of Railways on the 23rd of July as regards other railroads. This would meet the approval of all the employees of the Government railways in Quebec, because I have here a statement signed by four of the presidents of their societies from Montreal to Campbellton. They all approve this amendment saying that it would be largely in the interest of the travelling public. The statement is dated 28th July, 1917, and reads:

The hon. member for Rimouski has caused to be inserted in the Bill No. 13 entitled: An Act for the consolidation of the railway laws of Canada, on the 18th instant, an amendment which reads as follows:

"All railway employees on local passenger trains running in the province of Quebec, having to deal with the travelling public, shall be conversant with the English and French languages from and after January 1, 1919."

Now, on Juy 23rd instant, this amendment, although it had been adopted by the House, was dropped and another one has been substituted to it which does not give any satisfaction. The reason given for dropping this amendment was that the railroad companies were opposed to it.

Now we, railway employees on the division of———and representing the International Association of railroad employees, do declare hereby that we have seen with pleasure the amendment proposed by the member for Rimouski, and fully and sincerely approve of it; in fact, we state that it will not entail any hardships to any one of the employees, but on the contrary, that it would be a notable improvement, which has been demanded for many years by the travelling public in the province of Quebec.

Therefore, we ask that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rimouski, should be fully reinserted in the Bill.

In witness thereof, we have signed:—

Phy. Tardif, C.G.R., conductor, president of Levis employees association.

Jos. Robin, president of the Montreal employees association.

J. B. Dubé, conductor, president of the Mont-Joli employees association.

E. H. Dionne, conductor C.G.R., president of the Transcontinental employees association.

Mr. COCHRANE: This does not apply in this case. This provision is in Bill 13, the General Railway Consolidation, and will be enforced by the Dominion Railway Board, under the Dominion Railway Act. The insertion of it in this measure was only repeating the words in the General Act. Therefore, it will become the law, unless the Senate throws out the Bill.

Mr. BOULAY: As I understand, the Railway Act applies to all railways.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Rimouski is not relevant. I find the following in Bourinot:

Amendments to Bills must strictly relate to the Bill which the House has by its order resolved upon considering.

So that I must rule that this amendment is not in order.

Mr. MURPHY: I assume that section 7 stands as it is.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: I suggest that the Bill be reprinted, with the amendments. It might facilitate the passage of the Bill.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think it will be in shape for reprinting, but when hon. members get Hansard in the morning they will see what amendments have been proposed.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Saturday, August 11, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock the Speaker in the Chair.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

NUMBER OF JURORS IN PANEL.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 97, to amend the Criminal Code respecting jurors.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, this matter was so thoroughly threshed out upon the second reading of the Bill and in the committee stage that I do not feel like going into it at length. I consider that the Government have decided to have this Bill passed and to take the responsibility for it. Having regard to the circumstances which were disclosed during the discussion, and which have not been denied, I wish to put myself upon record as being absolutely opposed to such a radical change in the criminal law at this time, a change made for no reason whatever. No case has been made to warrant the action of the Government in the matter, and the circumstances which have led to the introduction of this Bill indicate to the House that it is legislation that should not be proceeded with.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE.

House in Committee on bill No. 181, to amend the Government Railway Act—Hon. Mr. Cochrane.—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 6—Repeal of inconsistent provisions in Government Railways Act:

Mr. CARVELL: Since last evening I have had an opportunity of carefully going over the proposed amendments of the Minister of Railways with an officer of his department, and so far as I am concerned—and I am speaking only for myself—the minister has met all the objections which I thought were properly raised, excepting probably the question as to whether the government railways would be liable to the imposition of a fine in case they refuse to obey the orders of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I realize that there are difficulties in the way of imposing a fine upon His Majesty, and also that probably in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, if the Board of Railway Commissioners passed an order that the government railways should do or refrain from doing a certain thing, they would carry out the order of the board. That matter is left open, and I have no opinion to offer upon it now other than what I have already offered. With that one exception, as I understand the matter, the amendments moved by the Minister of Railways cover everything that was in dispute yesterday and bring the government railways practically under the control of the Dominion Railway Act.

Mr. MARCIL: What about expropriation of land?

Mr. CARVELL: It was understood, in all the discussion yesterday, that expropriation of land by the Government still remained under the Expropriation Act, and did not come under the purview of this Bill. I raised the discussion in regard to the right of a subject to sue the government railways in the ordinary courts of the land. When we come to examine the Railway Act, we find that no right is given by that Act to sue a railway company, and therefore if there is to be any change in the law as it stands to-day, it must be obtained by amending the Small Claims Act and not the Railway Act. A man sues a railway company by virtue of the common law of the land, but he receives, by virtue of the Railway Act of Canada, no authority nor assistance in bringing his action.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He does not need it.

Mr. CARVELL: No. The only thing the Railway Act of Canada does, so far as bringing an action is concerned, is to limit it within certain conditions, that is to limit the time within two years—up to the present time, the limit has been one year. A man can bring an action against the government railways by suing the manager—I think that is the way it stands now by virtue of the Small Claims Act of 1910 as afterwards amended. Therefore, if we wish to bring all these actions into the ordinary courts of the land, there would have to be an amendment of the Small Claims Act. Only this morning I received another evidence of the necessity of a change of that kind. I received a letter from a prominent solicitor in New Brunswick asking me to act as counsel for him to collect from the Government whatever the amount might be by reason of the death of two men killed on the Transcontinental railway through what he claims to be the negligence of the railway corporation. Those were poor men, and they have left families. If they had a right to bring their action in the ordinary courts of New Brunswick, there is no doubt they would go on and have speedy justice meted out. If they are driven to the Exchequer Court, they will, in all probability, never bring action. The Government might settle their claims, but we know from past experience that if they do settle, they will not pay what the real damages are. I merely mention that as an illustration of the necessity of permitting those actions to be brought in the ordinary courts of the land. I am satisfied with the amendments proposed by the Minister of Railways; the only question that might be left open to discussion is whether there should be a change so that the railway itself would be subject to penalties in case it refused to carry out the orders of the Railway Board.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The tendency of the age is certainly towards government ownership of railways and other public utilities. That is a principle in regard to which I, for my part, have very serious doubt, but there is no doubt that public opinion is verging in that direction, and there is much to commend the principle. I am satisfied that if the government management of railways or other public utilities could be kept free from political partisanship, that evil of our system of government, government ownership might be very desirable.

At all events, it might be very desirable in an old country, but I have my doubts whether a young country like ours can be better served by government railways than by railways that are run by companies. I think in a young country like this, a company railway has more elasticity of management and can better serve the public, than a railway under government ownership. But undoubtedly the younger element of the country—western Canada, for instance—is in favour of government ownership. If we adopt government ownership we must also be prepared to take the consequences of it; as in everything else, we must take the bad with the good. The public should have the same recourse against the management of the government railways as against the management of company railways. The company railways, under our Railway Act, are subject to the control of the Railway Board, which enacts the penalties and can enforce its decisions. It was not my privilege to be here yesterday evening, but I read this morning the discussion which took place, and I was struck by the objection which was made to subjecting the King to penalties. Of course, there is some anomaly in that, but it is an anomaly more in name than in anything else. If the King becomes a common carrier, he is entitled to all the advantages of that position—he can collect my fare—and he should also accept the responsibilities. We have provided already that he shall accept those responsibilities to a certain extent, but there is still the old doctrine that the King cannot be sued at law—you cannot bring the King against the King. Under our Small Claims Act, however, we have provided that the manager of the government railways can be sued for damages up to $500. There is no reason why he should not be sued, no matter what the amount of damages a subject may have suffered. What objection can there be to allowing a man to sue for $600? The public should have the same rights against the government railways as against the company railways, and there is no reason why all the penalties, and all the methods of enforcing the law, in the case of company railways, should not apply in the case of the government railways. I am quite satisfied that the minister is in earnest about this, and if his aim is, as I believe it always has been, to remove the railway from politics, I would commend that suggestion to him.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think they already have that under clause 439 of the Railway Act.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a pretty strong clause.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is a pretty strong clause so far as the companies are concerned, but this Bill does not deal with the companies; it deals with the Government.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is proposed to introduce such a clause in regard to the government railways.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The clause goes pretty far, I admit.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a pretty good start.

Mr. MACDONALD: One of the difficulties the minister pointed out last night was that if any order from the board involved the expenditure of an amount of money there was no way in which the money could be legally got. My attention has been called to the fact that under the Exchequer Court Act, if a judgment of the Exchequer Court involves the expenditure of an amount of money, it is paid out of the consolidated fund of the Dominion of Canada. Automatically, such a judgment of the Exchequer Court has that result without any action on the part of my hon. friend.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have gone into this matter with the law clerk, and he says that a judgment of the Railway Board would operate in the same way.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was going to suggest that as a solution. That provision in the Exchequer Court Act, if applied here, would bring about the desired result.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Repeal of inconsistent provisions in Government Railways Act R.S. 1906, c. 36:

Mr. CARVELL: The sections mentioned here, which refer to the present Government Railways Act, have been amended very considerably. I can assure the committee that I have compared the proposed amendments with the Railway Act itself, with the assistance of one of the officers of the department, and I am satisfied that what is left in the Government Railway Act, together with those portions of the general Railway Act, practically put the railway under the control of the board with the exception of the penalties.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Commencement of Act:

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: In accordance with the notice I gave yesterday, I beg to move that this section be amended by adding thereto the following:

but shall not apply to that part of the government system known as the Prince Edward Island Railway until the gauge of the same has been standardized.

The minister, speaking on this matter yesterday, appeared to be under the impression that the difficulties and disadvantages under which the people of Prince Edward Island laboured were chiefly due to the delays connected with the extra handling of freight at the terminal points, and the extra cost involved.

While there is some disadvantage in that regard, it is not the most serious one under which we labour. Our great disadvantage is in not being able to ship perishable products to the markets of the other provinces and of the United States, because we cannot ship in refrigerator cars. It is impossible to get refrigerator cars until the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway is standardized. We grow very large quantities of potatoes, and the time for digging those potatoes is the month of October. The people are then so busy that they can pay little attention to shipping. In the month of November there is such danger from frost that we are prevented from shipping unless we have cars that will protect the potatoes. Thus the season for shipping is so short that it is practically impossible to reach the market. I think until we become a real part of the Intercolonial, and until we get the privileges and the advantages enjoyed by those living on the mainland, we should not be asked to accept the responsibilities or burdens of additional freight rates. When we entered Confederation the great inducement held out to us was that we would be put in continuous communication with the Intercolonial railway and the railway system of the Dominion. That has never been carried out. There were, of course, great difficulties in the way. At the same time, it was one of the terms of Confederation. The present Government undertook to establish what will, perhaps, be a solution of our transportation difficulties, when it is completed, but until it is completed things are in a worse condition than they were before. When the present Government came into power, we had a very good summer service. Our winter service was fairly satisfactory, inasmuch as we had two excellent ice-breaking steamers, which maintained fairly regular winter communication. The Government undertook to improve matters by establishing what is known as the car-ferry system. Once this system is put into operation, the great advantage will be that it will be possible for us to ship right through from the point of production to the point of destination, and we can have cold storage cars to carry perishable products, particularly potatoes and fresh fish. I may say that in proportion to the size of the province of Prince Edward Island we have the best fishing grounds in the world. But we cannot reach the market until we get refrigerator cars. The Government of Canada being a party to this agreement, I would not like it to shift its responsibility to any board or any other party, until the agreement is carried out. We are very sensitive on this subject and we look forward to becoming a real part of the Intercolonial system some day. I therefore ask the Minister of Railways, and the committee, not to put the Prince Edward Island railway under the direction of this board until the terms of Confederation are carried out; that is, until the Government completes the system it has commenced. I do not think this is an unreasonable request, and I hope the minister will agree to it, and that the Government will retain the control and operation of the Prince Edward Island railway in its own hands until we are put in continuous communication with the Intercolonial railway and the railway system of the Dominion. Until that is done I hope that at no time will we be obliged to look to any other body for redress.

Mr. COCHRANE: My hon. friend from Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. J. J. Hughes) and several other hon. gentlemen from the lower provinces seem to think that putting the railway under the Railway Board is being done purely for the purpose of raising the rates. This is not the case at all. Before this Bill was introduced the raising of the rates lay with the Government, and the people had no recourse. The Government could raise the rates as it saw fit. Under the Railway Board this cannot be done, unless it is permitted by the board. With reference to the car ferry, and the possibility of shipping produce in refrigerator cars, we certainly have made progress, and as soon as we can get the car ferry repaired we hope to put it into immediate operation. It is very hard to get a vessel repaired now, but we hope to have it running by the first of the month. Then we can take our refrigerator cars over to Prince Edward Island and load them with perishable freight there, which is much better than having to tranship. I do not think the argument put forward by my hon. friend is fair, or one I can accept. I would therefore ask that it be voted down.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is a good deal of reason in the position taken by my hon. friend from Kings, Prince Edward Island, and I second his amendment. We must remember that Prince Edward Island is situated differently from almost any other part of the country. In the first place, it is a purely agricultural province.

Mr. COCHRANE: But, what harm are we going to do? I object to what my hon. friend from Kings says in regard to the raising of the rates. As a matter of fact, we have the right to raise the rates to any extent we wish.

Mr. MACDONALD: And you did raise them recently. For instance, you raised the rate on coal coming to Montreal.

Mr. COCHRANE: When this Bill goes into effect you will have a chance to appeal against the raise.

Mr. MACDONALD: Prince Edward Island has a population of about 90,000 persons, practically all of whom are engaged in agriculture. They have a narrow-gauge railway, which they built themselves before Confederation, entirely as a local work. They are not connected with the rest of the Dominion except by steamer. Whatever advantages there are in the application of this Act to the other parts of the Intercolonial, they do not apply to Prince Edward Island, because of its entirely different position. My hon. friend from Kings points out that some years ago this Government gave a definite and positive assurance that the Prince Edward Island railway should be widened to standard gauge and that continuous communication between the mainland and the island should be maintained, and he asks that pending the carrying out of these undertakings no other body should be introduced having any control over the operation of their purely local road. I think that proposition is a reasonable one, and I therefore second it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I wish to point out to the minister, what the business men of Prince Edward Island well know, that even although there may be some improvement over present conditions when the car ferry steamer begins to run between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, yet, until the road is standarized, and until standard cars can be used, there will be so much congestion at some points that it will be very difficult to handle all the traffic that offers. Then again the minister says that refrigerator cars can go over the Prince Edward Island railway just across the Straits. They can, but unless you have refrigeration from the shipping point to the consuming point, it will be no good. You would have to ship in these small cars without refrigeration for some distance, then unload the freight into a shed, and if there was any congestion, it would have to remain in the shed for some time. Under these circumstances perishable products would be injured. If fresh fish, for instance, is taken out of cold storage, within a very short time it suffers depreciation, in fact it sustains more injury and is of less value when it reaches the point of consumption than if it had never been in cold storage at all. The congestion at the shipping points in Prince Edward Island will certainly be very great.

Mr. COCHRANE: Putting the railway under the Railway Board will not hurt conditions?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The Government will be able to shift the responsibility to another body.

Mr. COCHRANE: The people will be able to shift responsibility to other people too.

Mr. HUGHES: What advantage will it be?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is no disadvantage and it is certainly a great advantage.

Mr. HUGHES: I am very much afraid there will be considerable disadvantage. The minister really wishes to shift part of the responsibility upon the shoulders of this board. Then he will have what is known as a "wicked partner." At any time he does not wish to make any change or to take any steps in the interest of the people, he can say that the board will not allow him, that he is circumscribed by the new conditions. There is no reason in the world why the amendment should not be accepted. I wish to impress upon the minister, the Government, and the members of Parliament, the very great disadvantage under which the province of Prince Edward Island labours in marketing its products. I mentioned a day or two ago that two prominent members of this Government, the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), last spring had advised the people, those of Prince Edward Island as well as others, to produce more. We acted upon that suggestion and we have an abundant crop this year in Prince Edward Island; but we shall not be able to market it. It is a sad thing to think that while food products are scarce perhaps in other parts of the world, and perhaps in some parts of Canada, crops will go to waste in Prince Edward Island simply because they cannot reach the market. I do not imagine that the present Government can do everything. They adopted this car ferry system but they have been very tardy in pushing it. Five years have passed and it was to have been finished in two years. Now the minister does not mention any date for the beginning of the work of standardizing the Prince Edward Island railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: Tell me when the war will be over.

Mr. HUGHES: The minister made a promise since the war began.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I do not.

Mr. HUGHES: The minister said that he was going on with his work.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I did not.

Mr. HUGHES: Standardizing the Prince Edward Island railway to enable food products where they are in abundance to reach the markets of the world, may fairly be classed as a war measure as well as a trade measure.

Amendment (Mr. J. J. Hughes) lost on division.

On the schedule—

Mr. COCHRANE: With regard to the motion to strike out the schedule and substitute an amended schedule, I desire to add to the amendment the following:

Sections 371 to 373, both inclusive, and 381 and also the following provision at the end of the schedule:

Provided that no prosecution for the imposition of any fine or penalty under section 439 of the Railway Act as applied to Government railways shall be brought except upon the consent of the Board

Schedule as amended, agreed to.

On the Preamble:

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand that the minister will not provide for permitting actions to be brought against the railway in the name of the general manager for fires and all the other claims which may arise? In other words, will he not remove the limitation of $500?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is another Act altogether. We shall have to consider that.

Mr. MACDONALD: The situation is that you have the Government Railway Act—

Mr. COCHRANE: That does not come under the Government Railways Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: But my hon. friend will never have a better opportunity for doing away with this isolated Act and amending the Government Railway Act by simply maintaining the right of action against the general manager. One of the great advantages in regard to this Act, which relates to the Railway Commission, is the fact that it extends the remedy of parties who have met losses or damages or have had business connection with the road; it enables them to invoke the aid of the court.

Mr. COCHRANE: They can do that now.

Mr. MACDONALD: No. On the Intercolonial railway you have to go to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. COCHRANE: Well?

Mr. MACDONALD: Why will not the minister agree? Why should he deal with the thing piecemeal? I know that the Department of Justice have always been slow in regard to this matter, why I do not know. If the minister is going to do this, he ought to do it right. It does not make any difference to him, but he is preventing the application of those sections of the Act which really are of advantage to the district through which the railway runs. There is no need for taking two bites of a cherry.

Mr. COCHRANE: You did not want any of the cherry yesterday.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is surely not complaining when, in the best possible humour, I am trying to help him make a good Act. He does not want to fight with me all the time. I am anxious only to get the best Bill we can, and I submit that it is no unreasonable request.

Bill reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—INSURANCE.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty, the House went into committee on Bill No. 54, to amend the Criminal Code respecting insurance.

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1, soliciting for insurance forbidden except as permitted in proviso.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the minister state the purport of this section?

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill is really complementary or supplementary to the Insurance Bill which has gone through the House. The Insurance Act imposes upon companies subject to Dominion jurisdiction the obligation of taking out licenses. That Bill provides no penalty for failure to take out a license. It is being dealt with as a matter of criminal law because there have been some difficulties with regard to the legislative competency of this Parliament over the carrying on of the business of insurance. It may be suggested that if the matter be dealt with otherwise than from the point of view of criminal law, objection may be taken to the competency of Parliament, which objection would disappear once it was quite clear that Parliament approached the matter looking at failure to comply with the obligations imposed as constituting public wrong. The obligation already exists under the Insurance Act; this is merely to provide a penalty in the event of non-fulfilment of the obligation.

Mr. CARVELL: While I entirely agree with the object of the present Bill, I should like to see another clause added to embody the principle of an amendment passed by the Banking and Commerce Committee when the insurance law was under consideration some three or four years ago—to make it a criminal offence for the agent of a bank to engage in the occupation of an insurance agent. I realize that I am raising an entirely new point, but I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without at least calling it to the attention of the committee. I do not know to what extent this has become a grievance in Canada as a whole, but I do know that in the province of New Brunswick we have at least one case that has become a public scandal. The agent of one of the big chartered banks of Canada carries on a private insurance business, and practically controls the entire insurance of a very large section of the province of New Brunswick. No man can do business with, or get accommodation from, this bank unless all his insurance, or that of the corporation to which he belongs, goes to the agent of the bank. It works out in two ways. In the first place, he drives everybody else out of business; no other insurance agent can thrive in that district. He may do a little business with some of his friends, but when it comes to the big business he is driven out. In the second place, to my personal knowledge—I am speaking now from knowledge which I have obtained as solicitor—people's properties are insured for a great deal more than they could be compelled to pay premiums upon, in order, according to my contention, that this particular insurance agent may receive more commissions on premiums.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is there only one bank in the place?

Mr. CARVELL: No, there are more banks. But this bank has control of practically all the lumber business, and that is the principal business of the community. I am speaking now with an absolute personal knowledge of what is going on. An estate which I have practically closed up, which I have been helping to manage for years—which, I am sorry to say, was not very flush financially—has paid insurance to make your head ache, if you had to help finance it, simply because we were in the hands of the bank, and the banker placed the insurance without asking our leave or anything else. We had not a word to say—we had to pay the premiums; he did not ask us to pay them, but simply took them out of our account. I brought the matter up and got an amendment made to the Act, by the Banking and Commerce Committee, and it came down to this House as part of the Bill, when it left the committee, but sufficient influence was brought to bear on the House to defeat it, I think, on the third reading.

Mr. DOHERTY: That was in connection with the Bank Act?

Mr. CARVELL: I think not.

Mr. DOHERTY: Was it in connection with the Insurance Act?

Mr. CARVELL: No, the minister is right. It was in connection with the Bank Act. The Insurance Act was codified in 1910, and this happened in 1912 or 1913. As the minister is dealing with the Insurance law as it refers to insurance companies, I thought it my duty to bring this matter before him. I do not propose an amendment, because if the hon. minister would not accept it it would not carry, but I call attention to the circumstance, and say that matters are getting worse instead of better, although there was a pledge given that this particular condition of things would cease to exist. I know, from talking with members, that this condition of affairs exists to some extent in very many parts of Canada. I do not think it is right for a man occupying the position of manager of the bank, who necessarily has certain direct or indirect control over very many people who do business or get accommodation from the bank, to have the right to say to them either directly or indirectly, or even by inference: If I give you the accommodation you require, I shall expect you to give me your insurance. It gives him a very great leverage over the agents of the other insurance companies, and insurance has become a great business in Canada. This is an unjust discrimination. I think the chartered banks of Canada pay their agents pretty good salaries, and if they do not, they should pay salaries large enough so that the agents could get along without depriving other people of a legitimate source of revenue. I think even if there were no cases as extreme as the one to which I have called the minister's attention, the principle is wrong to allow the manager of a bank to carry on an insurance business, and indirectly and surreptitiously take away from other men business which rightly belongs to them.

Mr. GLASS: The matter to which my hon. friend refers is not peculiar to the province of New Brunswick. That condition of affairs generally exists throughout Ontario. In my district it is quite a common thing for a bank manager, especially in the smaller places, to have the supervision and control over insurance, which may not only lead to an improper use of it, but which is an injustice to those engaged in that business. I should like to suggest here, also, that the same condition of affairs exists in relation to managers of loan companies. I think they should be debarred from engaging in insurance, as well as the men who are engaged in ordinary commercial banking. I will not say that these large loan companies receive a direct commission, or a division of the commission from the agent, but they arbitrarily direct that, providing a loan is given, the insurance shall be placed with a certain agent who is known to be closely allied with them. I think that when a man borrows from a loan company, any insurance company which is satisfactory to the Superintendent of Insurance should be considered satisfactory for the requirements and purposes of the individual obtaining the loan. I do not think even the lawyers themselves should have any control or power over individuals and say that they should take insurance with certain companies. If a company is financially sound and responsible, and satisfactory to the Department of Insurance in this country, it should be strong enough and good enough so that a client getting a loan should be permitted to take insurance in any company he chooses.

Mr. TURGEON: In reference to the authority of bank managers to take insurance, I was perhaps the author of that amendment to the Bank Act on behalf of the bank managers in rural districts who were not getting the salaries they should have from the banks. I remember that I was specially influenced by that consideration, and the Minister of Finance at the time, in accepting the amendment which I proposed, declared to this House that he would use all possible influence upon the banks to have them increase the salaries of their agents to a living wage to take away from them the business which, he admitted, was sometimes conductive to extortion. As I have seen no improvement on the part of the banks since that time, perhaps this might be the time to give effect to the advice of my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell). It would be a most influential lever to raise the salaries of bank agents to a fair minimum, and would do away with a practice, which might amount to extortion in some cases.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am very much impressed with what has been said. It appears, at all events on its face, to be a matter that might very well call for legislative action; but such legislation, of course, would affect not merely the business of insurance, but the business of banking. I understand that the question was up in connection with the renewal of the Bank Act; that a proposal similar to the present one, looking to the prohibition of the combination of the business of banking with that of carrying on insurance, was made, and was dealt with and finally dealt with in the sense of rejection. That leaves the position as regards the banking business determined at that time, at all events. We are now dealing with legislation with regard to insurance, and so far as the present measure is concerned, with a measure simply supplementary to the general Insurance Act. That measure has been through the Banking and Commerce Committee, together with this Bill as supplementary to it, and before that committee in connection with that Bill, the insurance people connected with and interested in the insurance business, who, as well as the bankers, would be affected by a provision such as suggested, were heard, and I am informed—I was not present at the sittings of the committee—that this matter was not brought to the attention of the committee at all nor to the attention of those interested. Under those conditions, I suggest it would hardly be a proper thing, in a Bill of this kind, to insert, without notice to any body concerned, a provision of the character suggested, which must very materially affect the carrying on both of the banking business—with which we are not concerned directly in connection with this legislation—and of the insurance business, those engaged in which had opportunity to present themselves and to make any representations with regard to any provisions contained in the Bill. With regard to a provision of this kind they would not have the same opportunity as they have had with regard to the provisions of the Bill in general. While, as I have said, it seems to me upon its face that there is a great deal to be said in support of this proposition, I would hardly like, and I could hardly be expected at this moment and without further examination and consideration, to assent to a proposition of this kind. It would certainly be very proper, when we have any further revision of the Insurance Act generally, and when there would be proper occasion to deal with the Bank Act, that this suggestion should receive consideration, but I would hardly feel justified in dealing with it in connection with the present Bill.

I wish to insert a little amendment in the first subsection of the section. It is simply to make the addition of "persons," a change which has already been made to the general Insurance Act. This is simply to make the two measures correspond. I move:

That subsection 1, section 508 C—which it is proposed to insert in the Criminal Code.

—be amended by inserting in line 14 of the present Bill, after the word "or" the words "of an association of persons."

This is merely to add to the exceptions contained in the Bill an exception for an association of persons formed for the purpose of inter-insurance.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move:

That the Bill be further amended by adding to section 1 the following provision, to be inserted in the Criminal Code as 508 D:

Any insurance company, or any officer, agent or representative thereof, who

(a) makes or permits any distinction or discrimination in favour of individuals between the insured of the same class and equal expectation of life in the amount of premiums charged or in the dividends payable upon any policy of life insurance issued by or on behalf of the company; or

(b) makes or assumes to make any stipulation or agreement which is intended to operate as a part of any insurance contract to which the company is or is to become a party, whether in respect of the amount, terms or conditions of the insurance, the premium to be paid or otherwise, except such as is plainly expressed in the policy issued in the case; or

(c) pays, allows or gives, or offers to pay, allow or give, directly or indirectly, as inducement to insure, any rebate of the premium stipulated by the policy to be payable, or any special favour or advantage in the dividends or other benefits to accrue thereon, or any advantage by way of local or advisory directorship unless for actual service bona fide performed, or any paid employment or contract for service of any kind or any inducement whatever intended to be in the nature of a rebate of premiums; or shall for a first offence be liable to a penalty of double the amount of the annual premium chargeable upon the application or policy in respect of which the offence is committed, such penalty not to be less than one hundred dollars, and for a second or subsequent offence to a penalty of double the amount of such annual premium, the latter penalty not to be less than two hundred and fifty dollars.

2. Moreover every director, manager or other officer of any insurance company who knowingly consents to or permits the violation of any of the provisions of this section by any agent, officer, employee or servant of the company shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars.

3. The penalties provided for in this section may be recovered either upon summary conviction under Part XV of the Criminal Code, or in any court of competent civil jurisdiction at the suit of any person suing therefor as well for His Majesty as for himself; one-half of any such penalty when recovered to be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and the other half to belong to the informer or person at whose suit the same is recovered.

4. No director, manager, agent, officer or servant of any insurance company shall be indemnified, either in whole or in part, from the funds of the company for any penalty or costs which he may be adjudged to pay on account of any offence committed against this section.

This is to make it a criminal offence to give a rebate of premium, or to effect any combination or arrangement whereby one individual will be able to get his insurance at a cheaper rate than another.

I may say that these provisions are contained in the general Insurance Act. The principle reason why it is necessary to insert them in the Crimial Code is that the Insurance Act as such may apply, and does apply, only to such insurance companies as the Parliament of Canada has legislative jurisdiction over, which, speaking generally, may be said to be companies incorporated by the Dominion, and foreign companies. But provincial companies, or the agents or officers of provincial companies, could not be reached by the general Insurance Act. I think the committee will agree that the different operations which are hereby prohibited, namely, the offering of rebates and undue advantages, discrimination between the insured, attempting on the part of the an agent to make undertakings which are not contained in the policy and which operate to the deception of the insured, and the giving of any inducement for the insurance in the way of direct benefit or advantage—all these things are just as objectionable and are just as detrimental to the public interests when done by a provincial company, or the officers or agents of a provincial company, as when done by a foreign or Dominion company. It is further to be pointed out that unless legislation of this kind be applicable to all companies carrying on the business of insurance, without distinction of their source of incorporation, you have a most unfair situation as regards the Dominion and foreign companies, in that they are subject to the present Insurance Act and are bound to comply with these requirements, whereas provincially-incorporated companies would entirely escape and would be enabled thereby to carry on a most unfair competition, and to resort to those practices which, I think it will be generally agreed, are most objectionable and most unfair.

Mr. CARVELL: I can quite understand the necessity of amending the Act so that an agent of a provincial company shall be under the same law and subject to the same penalties as the agent of a Dominion or foreign company. But I have never quite understood the reason for this law, anyhow. I do not see why an insurance agent should not be allowed to canvass business and sell insurance as cheaply as he likes; that is a matter between him and the purchaser. It seems to me we are drifting into—I do not know whether it is socialism; I think it is these public-ownership faddists getting their work in again. Why in the world should not an insurance company be allowed to sell me insurance for a price which I am willing to pay, regardless of the price they sell to any one else? You might just as well interfere with the man who sells sugar and pork, which are just as necessary to my family as insurance is. If you say that an insurance agent cannot sell me insurance except at such a price, you have just as much right to say that a grocer cannot sell me sugar or pork except at such a price. I was never able to understand the reason for these provisions at the time the Insurance Act went through. It seems to me we are simply drifting in the direction I have indicated, and unless a stop is put to it no man can tell what the end will be. After a while they will be telling us we cannot do anything except under the instructions of some public authority; individual action will be taken away entirely. If the Government would go a little further and say that the munition makers and profiteers could make only so much money, there would be some sense in that. They fight shy of touching these people, however, but when it comes down to the average man who is trying to get a living, they make legislation of this kind. I do not know that I can object to the amendment, because it makes the law uniform, but I object to the principle of the whole thing.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are not introducing these provisions now, because they have been the law since 1910, and are applicable now to all companies under the jurisdiction of this Dominion Parliament. Moreover, may I say this, as a reason for differentiating between selling insurance and selling sugar and pork and other things of that kind? The insurance business, of course, has to be carried on in such a way that the premium charged shall provide the means to make up the losses; perhaps that is especially true with regard to life insurance. Now, when you let one man contribute for the same risk less than another to the creation of that general fund that is to pay all the losses, you necessarily make the cost to that other man or men larger than it otherwise might be. The fact that you have given to one man insurance at a price less than it is necessary to charge in order that according to the actuarial calculations the business may be carried on so as to sustain itself, makes it necessary in order to make up that deficiency to charge some other man something extra. It creates an absolute inequality between people, who—this is the case referred to in the section—are absolutely in the same class of risk, and enables one man to get covered at a price less than he ought to be charged on a business basis, inevitably necessitating that some other man be charged more than he ought to be charged.

Mr. CARVELL: I can quite understand that argument. It is very plain, and I think it is perfectly logical. At the same time, this amendment goes a great deal further, and is aimed at the insurance agent who is willing to divide up his commission on the first premium with the insured. We all know, a very large proportion of the first premium goes to the agent as his commission. I do not think any one ever heard of the insurance companies charging anything except the uniform rate of insurance governed by the age, the mortality tables, and other considerations which enter into the fixing of the premium. The intention is to reach the insurance agent who, in order to do business, makes a little cut to the insured. That cut comes out of the agent, and does not impair the fund out of which the policy will ultimately be paid. It merely reduces the agent's profits by that much. This Bill simply prevents the agent from dickering, or doing business at all. It makes every insurance agent practically an automaton. So far as concerns the premium which goes to the company, of course that should be uniform, but why an ordinary insurance agent cannot make a discount of fifteen dollars, or twenty-five dollars, or fifty dollars, out of his commission on the first premium is something I cannot understand.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not profess to be an expert in the matter, or to be able to explain it absolutely. At first glance, it would certainly seem as if there might be something in what my hon. friend says. I understand, however, that in the carrying on of the insurance business it has been found that if the practice is allowed, the agent, in his zeal to get business, is exposed to do it very largely, and there is a great temptation to the companies to use that method of getting business, which leads them not impossibly—and I believe in practice it happens quite often—to give some compensation to the agent in lieu of that rebate. However that may be, I may tell my hon friend these practices are legislated against universally, throughout North America at all events, and so legislated against as the result of inquiries made in different countries at different times as to the abuses that might arise in connection with the insurance business. This having been our law since 1910 as we all understood applicable to all insurance companies, and being still our law unquestionably as applicable to insurance companies incorporated by this Dominion, I think we would be leaving the law in a very anomalous condition, and producing a most unfair state of things if we did not do as is sought to be done by this legislation, that is make it of general application.

Mr. GLASS: I do not see an analogy between the merchant doing business, who is allowed to sell his goods at any price he likes, and an insurance company doing business. According to the mortality tables, insurance companies are actually collecting a very much larger amount than is necessary from policyholders on the 3 per cent or 3½ per cent reserve generally prevailing. As is shown by the reports, in cases they are earning a great deal more than 7 per cent on the total amount of their investments, including bonds and everything else. The policyholder has a real live interest in the earnings of the company and the only way to compensate him adequately for what he has to contribute as exorbitant premiums, is to repay to him a division of the profits as they occur. My hon. friend has very rightly pointed out that in a very great many cases the agent receives his compensation as commission on the first premium. Many companies, however, have adopted the practice of paying their agents straight salaries, and this practice is becoming much more prevalent. Of course the salary a man gets is based on his power to produce business, and men vary in their ability in that respect. If an agent on salary gives a rebate to the insured, surely the money comes directly out of the funds of the company, and the earning power of the other participating policyholders, who are simply partners in the large business, must necessarily be impaired to the extent to which those rebates or commissions may be allowed. The matter of rebating in insurance has always been a serious evil, and I think has been an injury to the insurers themselves. It has always been understood that the old law did not apply to anything but life policies.

Mr. DOHERTY: Under this measure it will apply to all companies.

Mr. GLASS: In that respect it will better meet the needs for which it was created.

Mr. McKENZIE: To my mind, section 508 (c) is very badly drafted. I find it difficult to understand its meaning. It may be clear to an insurance man, but as an ordinary individual I regard it as very complicated and extremely difficult to understand. In view of the provisions of subsection (2) I cannot understand why this is made an indictable offence. The subsection provides a punishment which comes easily within the most ordinary summary conviction. Indictable offences are dealt with in a very elaborate, expensive and difficult way, as the minister knows. If the intention is merely to collect a fine ranging from $20 to $50, I do not understand why a man should have to go before the Grand Jury, the Petit Jury and the Supreme Court. It seems to me the machinery provided is altogether too cumbersome for the penalty.

Mr. DOHERTY: Speaking without the Criminal Code before me, unless I am mistaken—and I do not think I am—the fact that this is made an indictable offence does not make it impossible to be dealt with otherwise than by indictment. There are the provisions of the Criminal Code under which there may be option for summary trial, etc., so that no injustice is done to any one.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am very familiar with those terms.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps the hon. gentleman is more familiar with them than I am.

Mr. McKENZIE: Proceedings are commenced the same as for sending a man to the Supreme Court, but when he is before a stipendiary magistrate he has the right to elect to be tried before that magistrate.

Mr. CARVELL: But only in certain cases.

Mr. McKENZIE: Only in certain cases. This would have to be put in the list of cases that could be so tried before he could come under that category. I think it would be well worth while for the minister to consider it, because, certainly, it should be dealt with in the ordinary way, summarily before a magistrate.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill was drafted by the Deputy Minister of Justice and I understand that in putting it in this form he put it in the same form, and dealt with it in the same manner, as analogous offences are dealt with in the Criminal Code generally. With all respect, and while I am prepared to admit what may be the more accurate knowledge of my hon. friend, I entertain a pretty strong conviction that it is open to the accused in a matter of this kind to obtain a summary trial. In any event, should that not be true, there is no injustice done to the public, or done to the individual, and there is no evil, from the point of view of the public prosecution, arising from allowing it to stand as an indictable offence. All that is lost is that there would be no option on the part of the prosecution to proceed otherwise than one is bound to proceed upon an indictable offence. I am sorry that I did not anticipate the raising of this question, which is quite a proper question for the hon. gentleman to raise, and that, not being provided with the Criminal Code, I am not in a position to speak more positively than I do. But, I feel confident that no injury would be done to anybody liable to be prosecuted for this offence by reason of its being made an indictable offence.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand what the minister means but I can assure him that if he would look at the Code, and look more particularly into the procedure, he would see that there is liable to be a great injustice done to the party accused. If he is tried summarily, if he is not satisfied with the magistrate's decision he may appeal. That is a great satisfaction to anybody. If he is brought before a magistrate and he has to elect to be tried under indictment he has no appeal. I am sure the minister will understand that this is a very striking difference.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a difference; but on the other hand the party accused has an option as between the two methods of trial. He will not be dealt with on a summary prosecution without an appeal except as the result of the exercise of his own option.

Mr. McKENZIE: Under this Act there are two things that he can do. The magistrate before whom he comes will have to send him up for trial to the Supreme court. He will have to explain to him that on a certain day the Supreme court is going to sit where he can be tried before a judge and a jury. He will have to say: "You have the option to forego that and be tried before me now if you consent to it." The accused says: "I prefer to go to the jury," or, "I consent to be tried before you." If he says that he consents to be tried before the magistrate, he is tried and whatever the decision of the magistrate may be there is no appeal from it. But, if he is tried summarily before a magistrate on an ordinary information, he can appeal in the ordinary way and, of course, the procedure under which a man can appeal is a more popular and a better procedure in small cases of this kind.

Mr. DOHERTY: While I appreciate the value that may attach to an appeal, on the other hand, I think it deprives a man of trial by jury which is an inherent right. Then, to have him tried otherwise than by jury without regard to any consent of his own is perhaps a more serious thing. There should be a procedure which leaves it open to him to be tried by a jury or to have the trial before a magistrate without appeal. He has an opportunity and he has an option. If we make it a matter of summary trial simply, he will have to go before the magistrate. It is true, he will have an appeal to a judge of the higher court, but he will have to stand by the findings of the judge, he will be deprived of his trial by jury. While the penalties are not exceedingly heavy, the offence in itself is not in any way a minor one. It would be very undesirable to treat it as such. From the point of view of the class of people who will be liable to be charged with offences of this kind, people who may be in the very largest way engaged in this very important business of insurance, I do not think we should merely, because the penalty is not heavy, deprive them of the right to have a trial by jury if they so desire. I do not think it is much of a grievance that instead of being subjected absolutely, in the first instance, to the judgment of the magistrate—with the right of appeal, it is true—the accused is placed in a position where he may at his own option have the verdict of his peers or the judgment of the court but without an appeal.

Mr. McKENZIE: I see that the minister stands by the Act, but I wish to point out to him as a lawyer who has had a good deal of practice in matters of this kind, that to send a man up under an indictment is a very serious matter. If a man is brought up with a view to his being indicted under this Act he comes before the magistrate or he elects to take the privilege which the minister points out. Then the magistrate has to send him to jail. He applies for bail. The magistrate has no power to take bail. If he is brought before a magistrate under this Act and he says: "I will not agree to be tried summarily before you, I want to be tried by a jury," what must the magistrate do? He must send him to jail. If he is sent to jail he must get an order from a county court judge to get bail. It is true that there is a provision by which the magistrate is permitted to say: "The evidence is not strong, I will simply hold you over for trial, and I will take bail myself." The magistrate can say that, but if the evidence is strong and he commits for trial it is beyond his power absolutely to take bail and the man must go to jail and then apply to a supreme or county court judge for authority for some magistrate to give him bail. It is for this reason that I am bringing the matter to the notice of the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand the hon. gentleman does not question the power of the magistrate to grant bail?

Mr. McKENZIE: If the evidence is not strong enough to commit.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not the section before me, but as I recollect it, it is a matter for the magistrate to appreciate, and, if I am not mistaken, he is entitled to appreciate the nature of the evidence and the probability of the person disappearing rather than presenting himself for trial, in the exercise of his power to allow bail.

Mr. McKENZIE: It has no power at all, except as I have stated.

Mr. DOHERTY: I regret I have not the Criminal Code before me and I do not like to question the positive assertion of the hon. gentleman, but I do know that, in my own experience, it is only for the graver offences that a magistrate would refuse to admit a man to bail. Certainly he would not in the case of an offence of which the penal consequence is so light as in this case.

Mr. McKENZIE: We need not discuss it, because it is in the Code in plain words.

Mr. DOHERTY: We will take it that it is in the Code in plain words and will not discuss it further. But I adhere to what I said, that I do not think a man has a grievance because he has to submit himself to a magistrate, subject to appeal to the higher court, with the option of having his trial by jury. So far as the question of bail is concerned, if the magistrate cannot or will not admit him to bail, the accused has his recourse before a judge of a higher court.

Mr. McKENZIE: For a man living in a city, where judges are easily accessible, the consideration which the minister advances may be some consolation, but if a man lives twenty or forty miles away from a judge and is put in a lock-up by a magistrate it is not as easy as the minister might think to obtain authority for bail. However, the minister thinks it is all right. Every word of subsection 2 and all the procedure is of a summary character, the language of the Summary Convictions Act is used. Everything is summary in its nature and procedure except that this is made an indictable offence, with three months in jail if the fine is not paid.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SALE OR USE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

BILL IN AID OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION; THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty, Bill No. 121 to amend an Act in aid of provincial legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of intoxicating liquors was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Insertion of words "for beverage purposes":

Mr. MARCIL: Are these amendments being inserted at the request of any particular provincial government or temperance association, or as the result of experience gained during the past year? What is the raison d'être?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are different raisons d'être. Some have been suggested by representatives of the authorities for the administration of prohibitory legislation, as in Ontario by the commission appointed under their statute. Others have been asked for by persons interested in temperance in certain provinces, more particularly in New Brunswick, and for the purpose of meeting legislation, in New Brunswick in particular, and legislation that I understand it is within the power of the commission in Ontario to bring into effect, if it has not already done so, and to give to that legislation the support or aid that is given to general legislation upon the subject by the Act of last year. Then, one amendment is to correct an omission in one of the sections of the Act passed last year. The Senate last year struck out a clause inserted by the Commons, and in accepting the Senate amendment it was announced in this House that another effort would be made to re-insert this clause in the Bill. The clause providing for the right of seizure of liquor has been introduced on representation of the authorities engaged in the enforcement of the law in the provinces, who have pointed out that grave inconvenience has resulted from the fact that, while the liquor was liable to confiscation on conviction, there was no provision under which it could be seized and held pending prosecution. The first clause is to insert in paragraph (a) of section 3 of chapter 19 of the Statutes of 1916, after the word "liquor" the words for "beverage purposes."

As the section reads now, it makes it an offence for any person to ship intoxicating liquor into a province. The old section reads:

> (a) Shall send, ship, take, bring or carry or cause to be sent, shipped, taken, brought or carried to or into any province from or out of any other province, or import into any province from any place outside of Canada any intoxicating liquor, knowing or intending that such intoxicating liquor will or shall be thereafter dealt with in violation of the law of the province into which such intoxicating liquor is sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported as aforesaid;

This amendment is inserted upon the suggestion of the authorities in Ontario charged with the carrying out of the liquor law. They point out that their prohibition is against the sale of liquor for beverage purposes, and was not intended to interfere with the shipping of liquor for any other purpose not prohibited by law. It was a mere oversight in the legislation of last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How does the hon. minister distinguish between liquor sent for beverage purposes, and liquor sent for other purposes?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is necessary in order to bring the offence under the law, to establish that the liquor is being sold for beverage purposes. That is the offence, and this imposes no additional requirements. In order to constitute a violation of the law, it must be sent for the purposes of being sold for beverage purposes, because that is the only violation of the law; and this is intended to avoid making prohibition which nobody desires. Nobody wishes to prohibit the free circulation of liquor for the purposes for which no province prohibits its use. Of course, it would be incumbent on the prosecutor to prove the liquor is being sent in for the purposes of violating the law. I do not know that any occasion has arisen for this provision, The request for this enactment comes really from the authorities charged with the administration of the legislation in Ontario.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Would the quantity of liquor not very largely determine the use for which it was intended?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, and the question whether the liquor is really suitable for beverage purposes. You may have liquor that would be very intoxicating, if you drank it, but not in a condition to be used for beverage purposes. These are the matters which, in a prosecution for violating the provincial law, would have to be dealt with. We are not adding anything to the difficulty in dealing with cases in making our law correspond with the prohibitory law of the province. I do not think any harm would be done if the law stood as it is. It is only as our attention is called to the fact that there was an inaccuracy, and it was suggested we should correct that inaccuracy, that this amendment is proposed, because if you send in liquor not for beverage purposes, it could not be said that it was sent in for the purpose of being sold in violation of provincial law, inasmuch as the prohibition of the provincial laws deal with liquor for beverage purposes. Large quantities of alcohol are used in the manufacture of munitions. It would be unfortunate if, by the wording of this law, there should be any interference with the handling of liquor manifestly only used for purposes of that kind.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: When the Bill which passed last session was before the committee, it was thought by some that perhaps it was not intended to be very effective. I thought it would be a step in the right direction anyway, for pretty heavy penalties were attached to the carrying of liquor into provinces where the sale was prohibited. I think the minister read the clause in the Bill passed last year, and I desire to call his attention and that of the Government to the fact that the employees of the Government are the real offenders in this case, so far as the province of Prince Edward Island is concerned. I am quite safe in saying that nine-tenths of the liquor imported into the province is carried on the Government railways and steamships, and it could not be carried without the knowledge of the employees, if they have ordinary intelligence. A small portion of it is carried on the steamers subsidized by the Government, owned by private people, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), I think, intimated last year that he would notify the owners or managers of the steamers so subsidized that if they knowingly violated the law the payment of the subsidy might be withheld. I do not know that any notice was ever sent out. I rather think not. This traffic could not be carried on to any great extent if the government employees did not connive at it. If the government employees were determined that they would not be any party to it but would do the best they could to prevent it, and if the officers of the steamers subsidized by the Government would act in the same way, the traffic, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, would be practically stopped. I would like it very much if the Minister of Justice, and the Government generally, would take any action they could along that line. We are peculiarly situated in Prince Edward Island, because practically the whole traffic is carried on between that province and the mainland by government-owned railways and steamers, and the smaller portion is carried by the subsidized steamers. I think something ought to be done to prevent the traffic.

Mr. DOHERTY: Government employees and employees of the steamships are subject to penalties under the Act, as everybody else is, but quite apart from that, I quite recognize that anything that can be done to impress upon them the necessity of being law abiding citizens ought to be done, and I shall be glad to call attention to what the hon. gentleman has stated.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: At whose instance is this amendment introduced? Is it at the instance of the Provincial Governments, or any of them, or temperance societies?

Mr. DOHERTY: The suggestions come from different directions. The principal sections are concurred in by the commission in Ontario charged with the administration of the provincial law and by people very much interested in the enforcement of the prohibitory law, I might say in a special way, in New Brunswick.

Mr. MURPHY: What commission in Ontario is that to which the minister refers?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot give the official designation of it, but I understand that, in the operation of the provincial prohibitory law, large powers are entrusted to a body which I believe—I have had the pleasure of meeting the head of it—is called a commission.

Mr. MURPHY: The Ontario Government Liquor License Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: The authority constituted under the provincial Act to see to its administration. Representations have come from New Brunswick, and strong representations from different associations interested in the promotion of temperance, in support of such of the provisions as are new. As I have intimated, one of the provisions—and it is an important one—seeks to reintroduce and to replace in the Act of last session a section which the Senate struck out. That provision we are introducing now in fulfilment of a promise, made when the Bill came back from the Senate last year and was accepted with that clause struck out, that we would again ask the House to pass the section and send it back in order to afford the Senate an opportunity of reconsidering its action.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Act which we passed last year is to give effect to different temperance legislation passed in different provinces. So far so good. If this amendment in the first section is asked for by the temperance societies, I have nothing more to say. But it seems to me that it is opening the door to very severe abuse and not making the enforcement of the law easier. Drug stores are places in which such legislation may be violated, and it is a well known fact that in many sections drug stores supply liquor. Suppose a druggist imports a certain quantity of liquor. If you ask him what he is importing it for, he will say, with some appearance of reason, that he is not importing it for beverage purposes, but that he requires liquor in the preparation of his drugs. Drugs are frequently prepared with alcohol, and this provision is supplying a good reason for the druggist to say: I want it in my own business. The effect may be to break the law.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I said a few moments ago, this suggestion came from gentlemen representing the commission in Ontario, and was with a view to making our law strike at those things which the provincial laws prohibit. As our law stands at the present moment, it is too wide in this sense that it applies to all intoxicating liquor. As I have pointed out, it is well known that large quantities of alcohol are used for purposes that have nothing to do with beverages, and none of the provincial laws so far purport to prohibit the sale of liquor for such other purposes. We, therefore, find ourselves with a law which is intended to aid provincial legislation, which strikes at something at which provincial legislation does not strike at all. My attention was called to the matter solely in the way I mentioned, and it seemed to be desirable that the subject matter of the offence under our law should be described as is the subject matter of the offences under provincial legislation. I am disposed to think that, save in so far as there might be difficulties created and interferences with people dealing with liquor of a kind not intended to be covered at all from the temperance point of view, no evil would follow if our law remained as it was. But this amendment makes it more accurate, and as the suggestion came from the source I mentioned, I felt it would do no injury from the point of view of the enforcement of the provincial law.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Will this law make it easier for druggists to import liquor than the former Act did?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think the druggists will say it will.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not what the druggist is going to say that is going to settle the question. Whether those words are in or not, the man who institutes a prosecution under this measure will have to prove to the court that that liquor was sent in to be dealt with in violation of the provincial law. The first thing he will have to prove, whether the case is against a druggist or any other man, is that the liquor was to be used for beverage purposes, because unless it was for beverage purposes it could not be used in violation of a provincial law. Every man who seeks to prosecute under this law has to establish two things: first, the sending in of the liquor, and second, that it was sent in to be used in violation of a provincial prohibitory law. In order to prove that, he has to establish that the liquor was sent in for beverage purposes. It is not what the druggist is going to say; the man who is prosecuted for bringing in the liquor has to clear himself with regard to what his purposes were.

A section of the Act which we are amending reads:

> On any prosecution for the violation of section 1 of this Act the accused person shall be deemed to have known or intended that such intoxicating liquor would be thereafter dealt with in violation of the law of the province into which such intoxicating liquor was sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported, unless he proves that he had good reason for believing that the intoxicating liquor would only be dealt with in a lawful manner.

The burden of proof is on the accused to establish that there was no intent to use the liquor unlawfully. In the second place, the druggist, whom the hon. members have in mind, is the druggist who receives the liquor in the province. His offence is an offence under the provincial law, and we shall not affect what will have to be proved against him for dealing with that liquor in violation of the provincial law. This law deals with the man in the outside province who sends the liquor. What the druggist says is not going to make any difference in regard to the matter. This man has sent liquor in, he is charged with having sent it with knowledge that it was to be used for unlawful purposes, and it is for him to satisfy the court that he had no knowledge of any intent to use it for unlawful purposes.

Mr. CARVELL: In other words, there might be two offences for the same act.

Mr. DOHERTY: This is to cover the offence of the man outside the province who sends the liquor into that province. That man, of course, could not be reached by the provincial legislation, and it is to reach him that this legislation is enacted.

Mr. CARVELL: That does not affect the man who receives the liquor?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, the province takes care of him.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am sure the Minister of Justice is to be congratulated upon bringing forward this measure. It is a step in advance in the direction of total prohibition in our country. I should, of course, be very glad if total prohibition could be brought about in this country, but the minister assures me that it is not possible at the present time.

Mr. CARVELL: Do you believe him?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The subject of temperance legislation has engaged the attention of this Parliament and of the local legislatures for many years. The progress made in temperance reform in Canada has been most remarkable, and the end is not yet. I, for one, will welcome the day when national prohibition will be an assured fact in this country. I represent a district which is strongly in favour of temperance and Dominion-wide prohibition, but they did not send me here to legislate for one district or one province alone, but for the whole Dominion. They know that any province in the Dominion can have prohibition just as soon as the people of that province decide in favour of it, through their provincial legislature. In 1893 the Liberal party promised a plebiscite upon the question of prohibition, and in 1898 the plebiscite was taken and carried by a large majority. But the Government did not enforce it, leaving the matter to the provinces. The provinces then took it up, and while most of them to-day have advanced temperance legislation, none of them have come out for total prohibition.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is reading his speech.

Mr. MARCIL: Is that a war-time speech?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am merely giving the dates in connection with this matter. I should also like to call attention to the fact that on the 17th April, 1916, the Minister of Justice introduced a Bill in aid of provincial legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of intoxicating liquors. While this matter has been pretty fully discussed in many of the provinces, the provincial governments have hardly dealt fairly with the people in directing petitioners for total prohibition and their petitions to the Dominion Government, when the provincial governments themselves have power in their hands to bring that about. Let me read a portion of clause 1 of the Bill introduced on the 17th April, 1916:

> Any person who by himself, his clerk, servant or agent, and any person who as clerk, servant or agent, officer or employee of any other person, or of any government railway or steamship, whether Dominion or provincial,
> (a) shall send, ship, take, bring or carry or cause to be sent, shipped, taken, brought or carried to or into any province from or out of any other province, or import into any province from any place outside of Canada any intoxicating liquor, knowing or intending that such intoxicating liquor will or shall be thereafter dealt with in violation of the law of the province into which such intoxicating liquor is sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported as aforesaid; or
> (b) shall sell or cause to be sold any intoxicating liquor, knowing or intending that such intoxicating liquor will be sent, shipped, taken, brought or carried into any province from any other province, or from any place outside of Canada, and thereafter dealt with in violation of the law of the province into which such intoxicating liquor is sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported as aforesaid.

Then follow the penalties. There is no question in my mind that the provinces have the power to prohibit the importation and sale of liquors of any kind.

Mr. CARVELL: The importation?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: If the provincial governments will prohibit the sale or use of intoxicating liquor in the provinces, the Dominion Government will support them and not allow the liquor to be taken in.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the law absolutely in the province of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and, I think also, in Ontario.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: While it is true that the Dominion Government are prepared to assist the provinces in this matter, not one province has yet taken advantage of this law.

Mr. McKENZIE: In what way did my own province, for instance, fail to take advantage of the law?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Not a province in the Dominion has granted total prohibition within its borders.

Mr. McKENZIE: Nova Scotia has total prohibition.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: So has Prince Edward Island.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Why do they not prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors?

Mr. CARVELL: They can't.

Mr. McKENZIE: The question of the manufacture, the transportation, and the sale of liquor, excise, customs, and inland revenue, are all matters of Dominion jurisdiction, and the provinces have no authority to deal with them.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. member submit to the House the name of any reputable temperance organization which says that this legislation is satisfactory? Will the hon. member deny that what the temperance people, and, in fact, public opinion in Canada, have been demanding for the last two years is the total prohibition of the importation, sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors? When we have reached a time when it is necessary for the Food Controller to cut down the amount of meat we shall eat, I think it is surely time to let up on whisky.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I was calling attention to the fact that if any province will prohibit the sale and use of liquor within its borders, the Dominion Government will prohibit the importation of liquor into that province.

Mr. CARVELL: Under what conditions?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Under the conditions which I have just read.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not prohibition.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Then what is it? It is prohibition as far as the province is concerned.

Mr. CARVELL: I have forgotten the exact wording of the clause, but it is to the effect that the importation can be prohibited if the person who is sending it in believes it is to be used in violation of the law. Of course, a wholesale merchant in Montreal sending liquor to New Brunswick would have no hesitation in saying that he did not believe it was to be used in violation of the law, but it would be used in violation of the law just the same.

Mr. DOHERTY: The presumption is that he did, and he has to prove that he didn't.

Mr. McKENZIE: This Government grants licenses for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and the government railways collect freight for carrying it to places where the liquor is sold in violation of the law. If my hon. friend wants prohibition, let the Government stop the traffic at the fountain head. Do not let the current go into the province and then try to stop it.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am satisfied that the provinces have the power to prohibit so far as the manufacture, sale and use within the province is concerned; there is no question about that. The Minister of Justice supports me in that position, and with his consent I will place on record a few questions which I asked him on the subject only a few weeks ago.

Mr. ROSS: The late Provincial Secretary takes the opposite view entirely. He says that the provinces have no power to prohibit the manufacture and sale.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: There is no question that the provinces have power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor for use within the province.

Mr. ROSS: The late provincial secretary says not.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: My letter to the Minister of Justice was as follows:

Dear Mr. Doherty:—

I would greatly appreciate if you would advise me as to whether any province in the Dominion has the power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor within their boundaries.

Further, has any province of the Dominion the power to prohibit the circulation of literature or advertising which has the object of promoting the sale of liquor to its people?

Is the Dominion Government prepared to prohibit the importation of liquor into any province that has passed an Act prohibiting the manufacture, sale or use of liquor in that province?

The minister replied:

Ottawa, August 1, 1917.

Dear Mr. Armstrong:—

Replying to your letter of the 20th ultimo, I beg to say that in my opinion there is absolutely no question of the right of a province to prohibit the sale of liquor within its boundaries. As regards the manufacture, the Privy Council has never given a categorical answer to the question. This much, however, may safely be said, that it is within the power of a province to prohibit the manufacture when the conditions under which it is carried on are such as to make it a matter of local concern in the province.

In reply to your second question, in my opinion, the province has the power to prohibit the circulation within its limits, of literature or advertising which has the object of promoting the sale of liquor to its people.

In reply to your third question, the Dominion Parliament, at the instance of the Government, has already passed legislation prohibiting the importation of liquor into any province, to be therein used in violation of the law of that province. The effect of this is that it is a violation of the Dominion law to send liquor into a province to be sold therein in violation of the law of that province. And without further legislation on the part of the Dominion, if any province chooses to prohibit any other method of dealing with liquor than the sale thereof, as for instance, the use of it for beverage purposes, it will then be a violation of the existing Dominion law for any one to send liquor into that province, to be dealt with in violation of any such law.

The practical result is that any province that wants to prevent liquor being sent into it for use as a beverage, can attain that end by prohibiting the use in the province of liquor as a beverage. Such a prohibition on their part will produce the result that under the already adopted Dominion law, it will be an offence to send liquor into the province to be used as a beverage.

Yours sincerely,

Chas. J. Doherty.

J. E. Armstrong, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Surely the statement as made by the Minister of Justice is sufficiently plain.

Mr. CARVELL: Speaking with a cursory knowledge of the law of Ontario, I should say a man could keep a certain amount of liquor in his house for beverage purposes.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Any man?

Mr. CARVELL: There is no limitation at all. If a man in the city of Ottawa for instance wants to send over to Hull and get a case of whisky—

Mr. MARCIL: They do it every day.

Mr. CARVELL: Is there anything in this law to prohibit him from doing it? As long as he wants it for his own use?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The statement I have already placed on Hansard entirely bears out the argument I have made.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, there is nothing to prevent the importation of liquor from Quebec into Ontario so long as a man is going to consume it himself.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: So long as the province does not prohibit it.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am inclined to say the provinces are hardly dealing fairly with the Dominion on this question. They have absolute power to forbid the sale and use of liquor, and they can stop that liquor from coming into the province. Still, they will not do it. So far as I can learn no province has taken advantage of the legislation which the Dominion Government has placed on the statute books. Let me go a little further.

Mr. ROSS: Could not the Government effect the very same purpose by prohibiting the manufacture and importation of liquor in a province?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Then it would be interfering with the autonomy of the provinces, and my hon. friend would be one of the first to argue that that would be seriously interfering with provincial rights.

Mr. ROSS: Let the Government try it, and I will show you what I will do.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Not only did the minister, in 1916, advance temperance legislation in this regard, but he brought in a further Bill, No. 121, which has further restricted wholesale quantities to certain persons. I am glad to say he has been able to give the provinces the power to control the distribution by mail of advertisements for the sale of liquor. Section 3 (a) of the Bill says:

> 3a. Any person who by himself, his clerk, servant or agent, and any person who as clerk, servant, agent, officer or employee of any other person, sends or attempts to send, through His Majesty's mails, to, from or in any province, any advertisement, letter or document with respect to the sale, purchase or furnishing of intoxicating liquor, the publication or circulation of which is prohibited by the law of such province, is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty of not less than ten dollars and not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding thirty days, or to both fine and imprisonment.

In the district I have the honour to represent they have felt it has been a very great injustice to allow the Post Office Department to be used for the purpose of distributing advertisements for the sale of liquor. The same contention is made in different parts of the province of Ontario and I am sure I am voicing the sentiments of every member of the House when I say we appreciate the efforts of the minister in bringing about this legislation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am surprised that the mails of His Majesty are polluted by liquor. When I had the honour to be Postmaster General of Canada I issued directions to every mail carrier not to carry liquor with His Majesty's mail. I do not see how the next section can be made effective, because it prohibits the circulation of liquor literature or advertisements through His Majesty's mail. The Montreal Gazette is full of liquor advertisements. Many of the Montreal papers contain advertisements of the licensed victuallers, and include the names of the various port wines, Scotch whiskies and so on. They pass through the mails without anything to prevent them, and they circulate largely in other provinces.

Mr. DOHERTY: But, this law is to prevent that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend undertake to say that the Montreal Gazette, or La Patrie, or Le Canada, or Le Devoir, or any other Montreal newspaper containing liquor advertisements will be forbidden circulation in provinces where they have prohibition?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It is being done in the United States.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the province prohibits it. This has been done in many cases.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think that is a very drastic section. It means that if the Government of Ontario is sincere it will have to prevent the Montreal Star, the Montreal Gazette, La Patrie, Le Canada, and nearly every paper published in Montreal from circulating in Ontario. The only paper that does not publish any liquor advertisements is the Montreal Weekly Witness, which lives up to its professions, and has always been a temperance paper. But all the press of Montreal will be suppressed by the Ontario Government.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, the advertisements will be suppressed but not the papers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would be very much surprised if the Toronto Government would notify the Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Star that they will not be allowed to circulate in Ontario unless these liquor advertisements are omitted.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They have done it in the United States.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I confess that the section will prove very drastic if it is lived up to and if the Ontario Government is sincere. Immediately after this Bill is sanctioned we will have a test of its sincerity. If it is sincere it will prohibit these papers from circulating in Ontario.

Mr. MARCIL: I find in the Montreal Gazette of to-day two advertisements, one for "Molson's Extra Mild Ale" and another for "White Horse, the pride of the Army."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): We are not on clause 2 yet.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are on clause 1.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Mails not to be used for circulating liquor advertisements, etc., in province where such advertisements are prohibited:

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Last year I very strongly supported legislation of this character, and it is a matter of more than ordinary satisfaction to know that the province of Alberta, at the last session of the legislature, availed itself of the very provision of the statute that we then passed. I submitted at that time that any province might pass legislation limiting the quantity of intoxicating liquors that any of its citizens might have in his possession, and that once that limit was imposed by provincial legislation, it followed that by virtue of the legislation we then passed, any attempt on the part of any person either to ship or to import into that province a larger quantity than the quantity fixed by the law of the province would be a violation of the law and subject both the importer and the shipper to the penalties that are provided. So that, on the first day of July of this year, there came into force a statute passed by the legislature of Alberta which provides that if any individual has in his possession a greater quantity than one pint of intoxicants, he shall be subject to the pains and penalties provided by the statute.

Mr. CARVELL: Not even a "square-face."

Mr. R. B BENNETT: Not even a "square-face"—and a larger quantity of beer. It follows that in that province to-day, if the firm in Montreal to which my hon. friend has just referred, endeavoured to ship to the city of Calgary, consigned to me, a case of whisky, I should be liable under the terms of the Act of last session, and the shipper would also be liable because of the shipment into Alberta of a larger quantity than by the law of the province I could have in my possession. Therefore, this statute in actual practice is working out to the very end that was sought; and by and by, when public opinion has become educated, and there is behind the law that sanction of public opinion without which no statute can become effective, the legislature will declare that it is an offence for any of its citizens to have any quantity of intoxicants in his possession. When that moment arrives, as it will arrive, any shipment from Ontario or British Columbia into that province will be a violation of the provisions of the statute and prohibition will be an accomplished fact.

My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) referred to the fact that the Federal Government might have enacted a statute forbidding the manufacture of intoxicants. But I desire to point out to him that large investments have been made in this country for the manufacture of intoxicants, not necessarily for the use of the Canadian people, and for my part, while I am content to see placed upon the statute books of my country, province and Dominion alike, legislation which will bring about prohibition, I am not yet so ambitious as to desire to impose my views as to sumptuary legislation upon the minds of those who may desire to import Canadian whisky into their own country. The enactment of temperance legislation goes on in Canada and if we were to carry the laws on the statute books to their ultimate end these intoxicants could find a market only outside of Canada and in those countries that may desire to use them. That is the position. I do not believe that my hon. friend would think that it would be proper on the part of the Canadian Parliament and people to say: We will forbid you to manufacture for those people in South America who like Walker's whisky or a form of gin that is manufactured. If these people see fit to use these intoxicants they must be the best judges as to what they want. I would resent very keenly the people of South America undertaking to determine what I should eat or drink. If they desire to use intoxicants in that manner, I submit, we should not prevent them. If we so desire, legislation looking to the accomplishment of prohibition in Canada, can be made absolutely effective. The province of Alberta is now on the highroad to that end. As far as the carrying trade is concerned I am sure that my hon. friend will agree that a common carrier must accept freight. He who ships and he who receives must accept any consequences in so far as they involve a violation of the law, unless we treat the carriage of liquor as we do some form of high explosives and make the law absolutely prohibitive.

As far as this section is concerned, it aims to treat advertisements in public newspapers on the same basis as shipments of the liquor itself. If the province of Alberta, as it has, passes legislation forbidding advertisements within the province of intoxicants for sale, forbidding advertisements in newspapers in Alberta, this legislation makes it an offence for a newspaper publisher outside of Alberta to send into that province his papers with advertisements of intoxicating liquors offered for sale. What happened in the United States may happen here. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen are fully aware of the great struggle that took place in some of the western states to accomplish this very thing. One of the largest and most enterprising journals in the United States is publishing a special edition for circulation in those states where they have passed this law while its general edition circulates throughout other parts of the republic. I doubt not that many hon. gentlemen in this House have seen the editorial references that have been made by Life, one of the most interesting of American journals, with respect to the character of that legislation. Whether such legislation commends itself to every one or not is another question, but at least this Bill makes effective the Acts which have been passed by the provinces in the exercise of the legislative jurisdiction which they enjoy under the constitution. They having declared their mind this Parliament has supplemented their efforts by declaring that any endeavour on the part of a liquor seller or newspaper vendor to circumvent the law of the province and to nullify its effect shall be an offence punishable upon conviction under the statute. For that reason I congratulate the minister upon what he has done. I do believe that when we have carried this legislation to its finality we shall have accomplished, with the sanction of the great body of public opinion behind it, that measure of prohibition which only will be effective in a country such as this.

Mr. BURNHAM: I should hesitate to adopt the moral principle laid down by the hon. member for Calgary, namely, that because other people want a thing, therefore it will be right for us to manufacture or to provide it. If the people of the Fiji Islands wish to commit murder, therefore, under this principle, I have a right to ship them knives or explosives or anything of that kind, knowing exactly for what purpose they wish to have them. That is a doctrine to which I will not subscribe. Too much congratulation cannot be extended to the Minister of Justice for his fair and equitable handling of this question. There has been a great body of public opinion in Canada both for and against provincial rights. That is to say, they have been on some occasions very strongly for provincial independence, and those very same people, when other matters were under discussion, were very anxious that provincial rights should not be granted. Such an impossible position as that, of course, could not exist. It is in the face of that that the Minister of Justice, bearing in mind the essential principle of provincial rights, has endeavoured to make provincial rights what they were intended to be, namely, a source of independence and liberty on the part of the provinces so far as it is possible, for them to exist consistent with Confederation. He has observed that; he has carried it out; he has put in the hands of the different provinces the possibility of practising that degree of abstinence which they desire. It is well recognized, and must be recognized, that if a province does not desire to have prohibition, as, for example, British Columbia, it would be absolutely impossible for the Dominion to enforce it there. We know perfectly well, following what has been said by many members of the Opposition with regard to different railways, and so on, that if prosecutions did ensue it would be put down to politics, and if they did not it would also be put down to politics. So that, all things considered, there can be no question whatever that this method of dealing with the liquor question is beyond all peradventure the very best, and I am sure that the people of Canada will congratulate the Minister of Justice and the House upon having piloted through such a wholesome measure.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I was dealing with sumptuary legislation. Sumptuary legislation is a matter about which divers opinions are held by divers people, and I for one am not prepared to decide upon sumptuary legislation for anybody in South America.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the hon. member tell the House that he is in favour of continuing the manufacture of liquor and beer in this country with foodstuffs which are required at the present time? Does he consider that these are normal times in Canada, and that, in view of what Parliament has authorized by Order in Council, the time is opportune to deal with this question as he would have dealt with it ten or fifteen years ago?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am opposed to the use of grains for the manufacture of intoxicating liquors in war times, and always have been.

Mr. McKENZIE: Even for the people of South America?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Even for the people of Ontario.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would call attention to the fact that we are on a clause dealing with the question of sending liquor advertisement through the mails, and it seems to me that the discussion of the general question of prohibition is not relevant to this clause.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is unfortunate that these rules are discovered when the discussion drifts to this side of the House. The cyclone commenced in western Ontario and swept this way, taking in all the provinces; but only when it crossed the Table to this side of the House were there any rules at all. I am sorry, now it has crossed to this side, that prohibition and restriction have immediately come into force.

On section 4 B—Seizure of liquor pending conviction:

Mr. DOHERTY: This is a clause to make it possible to seize liquor so that it may be held until the conviction is had. Under the Act as it stands, if there is conviction of an offence against this Act the liquor which forms the corpus delicti is confiscated, but unless you provide for a method of seizure whereby it can be held, in most cases the liquor is not there when the conviction is obtained. I think the necessity of the clause is obvious. Attention has been called to this matter by different provincial officers engaged in the enforcement of the law.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I beg to suggest some slight amendments to this section, having in view the conditions in Prince Edward Island. Provision is made to have an officer search a government railway or vehicle or steamship. I should like to have the word "warehouse" inserted after "railway".

Mr. DOHERTY: Are there Government warehouses?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Yes, and liquor is stored in them.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be very glad to insert the word "warehouse".

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Liquor is imported in packages and every device is used to prevent officers knowing there is liquor in the package. It is imported in flour barrels, boot boxes and so on. I should like to see power given an officer to open a package that he thought might contain liquor, and to have it provided that he should not be liable to any penalty in consequence. I do not know whether that power could be given to him by this Act or by provincial legislation. You give the officer power to search premises and remove any intoxicating liquor in packages, and so on. I suggest that you add the following words:

And may open and examine the contents of any package or packages which he thinks may contain intoxicating liquor.

Mr. DOHERTY: He is enabled, under this section, to seize and remove any intoxicating liquor or any packages containing the same. I do not think there is any doubt about his power to open and examine packages. The section states that if he has reason to believe there is any liquor on any premises, he has power to enter and search such premises. I would have no doubt that a man entitled to search a place to find a particular thing is entitled to search every receptacle on the premises.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: And open the package?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: If he is mistaken, he is not liable to a penalty?

Mr. DOHERTY: No man is liable to a penalty for doing that which the law authorizes him to do.

Section adopted.

On section 4 (c)—Operation of Canada Temperance Act may be suspended upon petition:

Mr. CARVELL: Does this meet the condition of affairs in New Brunswick at the present time? Petitions have been sent to the Government from a great many counties in New Brunswick.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is at the instance of the people promoting those petitions that this legislation is proposed.

Mr. CARVELL: There are petitions asking for the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act, in order that the prohibitory Act of New Brunswick may come into force, and this Order in Council will make unnecessary the holding of an election in these respective counties, but we can have the Prohibition Act brought into force by means of passing this Order in Council.

Mr. DOHERTY: The petitions for this provision came from other provinces, but principally from New Brunswick, and I intend to move an amendment to this section, to make it quite clear that this applies not only to petitions which are received after this Bill becomes law, but also to pending petitions. I am not quite sure that it is necessary.

Mr. CARVELL: Make it as strong as possible.

Mr. DOHERTY: If it is good for a petition received to-morrow, it is good for a petition which came in last week. I move that we amend section 4 (c) of section 3, by adding the words:

The present subsection shall apply to petitions already made, and upon which no polling has as yet taken place.

Mr. CARVELL: That is all right.

Amendment agreed to, and subsection as amended agreed to.

On subsection 4 (d)—Penalty for selling alcoholic beverages as medicines not to affect liability under provincial laws:

Mr. DOHERTY: That is only to meet the complications that have arisen. We have provisions in the Proprietary Medicines Act imposing penalties where, under guise of proprietary medicines, decoctions containing more than a certain amount of alcohol are sold. There have been cases where such preparations were purely and simply alcoholic beverages, and some of the courts have held that because of the provisions in the Proprietary Medicines Act the party could not be prosecuted under the Prohibition Act of the province. Under the last-mentioned Act the penalty is heavier than under the Proprietary Medicines Act, and this enactment simply means that the penalties imposed under the Proprietary Medicines Act could not be treated as in substitution for penalties in cases where the same act constituted the violation of the provincial law; so that, where an act is a violation of the Proprietary Medicines Act and a violation of the Provincial Prohibitory Act, you may prosecute under the one Act or the other.

Section agreed to.

Bill as amended reported, and read the third time and passed.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

THE CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

INTERIM BALANCE SHEET AND OTHER STATEMENTS PRESENTED.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): On Friday last the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) asked for information as to payments made by the Canadian Northern Railway Company on interest account under section 29 of the Act of 1914. I beg to lay upon the Table a statement showing that the interest has been paid in full to March 1, 1917, and that the next payment of interest is due on September 1, 1917. I also beg to lay upon the Table the following statements in respect of the Canadian Northern railway:

1. Interim Condensed Balance Sheet as at April 30, 1917.

2. Statement of estimate of cost to complete lines and terminals under construction, and financial provision for same.

3. Statement of contractors' and other construction accounts outstanding, 30th June, 1917.

4. Memorandum re unsold lands.

5. Estimate of amount required for betterments and rolling stock for three years.

These statements were all enclosed in a letter from the assistant to vice-president Canadian Northern Railway system. I also lay this letter upon the Table.

THE MILITARY VOTERS' ACT, 1917.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 127, The Military Voters' Act, 1917. He said:

The purpose of this Bill is to make more adequate and complete provision for the taking of the votes of our soldiers during the present war than is found to exist under the present legislation for that purpose. The House will realize that, since the enactment of the legislation of 1915, conditions have very materially altered, and that what might have proved workable at that time is to-day difficult, at all events, of being so carried out as to afford full opportunity for the recording of the soldiers' votes while at the same time providing those safeguards which the conditions make possible. I have said that conditions have very materially altered. For instance, to-day in taking an overseas soldiers' vote, you are concerned with something like five or six times the number of votes that were in contemplation at the time of the passing of the legislation already on the statute book. In the second place conditions with regard to facilities and safety of communication between this country and the overseas countries have been very seriously modified. These changes in conditions make necessary very important modifications in the legislation as it exists, modifications so important that it has been thought better to remodel the Act entirely rather than to endeavour to proceed by way of amendments to particular sections. I do not think I need dwell upon those differences of conditions because they are perfectly obvious to everybody.

The Bill, apart from making changes to meet the altered conditions, makes some changes in the qualifications of the military voter. It is proposed to include all persons in the service, not only soldiers, but those in the naval service of Canada, and those who are in the Imperial service, but who have been enrolled therein in Canada and whose position with regard to the services they are rendering is such as to enable us to deal with them as groups. For instance, the Aviation Corps is the principal one.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not let the Canadian who has taken service in the Imperial Army also have the vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: That matter has had very careful consideration.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There are thousands of them.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not merely a matter of giving a vote, but one of providing the means for taking that vote. Where you are dealing with an individual who may be found somewhere in the Imperial forces, it would certainly not be easy to provide a method by which he could be sought out and dealt with here, there and elsewhere.

Sir SAM HUGHES: You might afford him an opportunity of voting.

Mr. DOHERTY: I might say, however, just at this stage, seeing that this suggestion has been made, that while I am putting this measure before the House, and while it has had very considerable thought and a very earnest endeavour has been made to provide a law that would afford opportunity for every Canadian who is serving in this war to record his vote, we —and I am speaking certainly for the Government—are quite open for any suggestion looking for the more perfect attainment of that end. If a method can be produced to work out that result, I think I can say even now that we would certainly be prepared to give every consideration to a suggested method of doing it. It is not lack of disposition to extend the vote to every Canadian who is serving, that stands in the way of every Canadian getting the vote. If there be any with regard to whom it may not be possible that they should exercise the franchise, it will be only by reason of that impossibility that they will fail to do so.

It is proposed to do away with any distinction between the soldier who is of age and the soldier who may be under 21. It is furthermore proposed to do away with any distinction of sex as regards persons engaged in the service of Canada. Nurses, for instance, will be included, even though they be, as they are in most cases, women. We have sought to make the measure applicable to everybody who is doing service for Canada and for the cause for which Canada is fighting in this war. By way of removing all doubts which seem to exist, we have specifically mentioned the fact that a person's being an Indian, if he be a soldier, will not exclude him from the vote. My own belief was that even under the statute as it stood, an Indian who was a soldier could vote, but there seems to have been some doubt on the subject, and that doubt is removed.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister considered the case of the reservists who enlisted in the French and Belgian armies?

Mr. DOHERTY: The question was considered in connection with a similar one in regard to Canadians in the Imperial army. The Bill, as it is presently drafted, does not provide for their vote. As I said in regard to the other question, this is not because I do not quite recognize the desirability of their being enabled to vote if it were practically possible, but because, notwithstanding consideration of different methods of getting at it, we were reluctantly forced to the conclusion that we could not find the machinery to carry it out, without creating machinery altogether out of proportion to the number of persons who would be in a position to avail themselves of it. With regard to that, as with regard to all details of the Bill, we shall be very glad of suggestions looking to improvement.

As to the method of proceeding to the election, the principal change is that this Bill proposes to provide a complete machinery overseas for the taking of the soldiers' vote, practically as though you were conducting an election over there. The results, of course, at the end of the proceeding will be communicated over here to the proper officers, and those results, combined with the results of the election as held under the ordinary provisions in Canada, will determine the result of the election. The reason for this is found, in the first place, in the increased magnitude of the work to be done over there, and in the second place, and perhaps principally, in the difficulties and the unsafety in many respects surrounding transportation between Canada and the Old Country. Under the law as it stood, for example, provision was made for the returning by each officer who took votes upon the other side to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in this country of the votes so taken, and the assorting of those votes as between constituencies by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery over here, and the forwarding of those votes to the returning officers of the different electoral districts to be counted. That might have been quite feasible in dealing with a relatively small number of votes, and if conditions with regard to transportation were such as they were at the time of the passing of the Act. Under present conditions, the carrying out of the Act would be attended with the serious objection that the ballots taken on the other side, before they could be counted at all, would be exposed to the risk of being lost in transit. In view of these considerations, we have provided for the carrying out of the election from the initial proceedings the providing and distribution of ballots and all necessary documents, down to the counting of the votes overseas. This will necessitate the provision of an officer whose tenure of office shall last for the election only, who shall exercise overseas the functions belonging in connection with an election to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. It is intended he shall be appointed as an Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and shall exercise overseas the powers exercised generally speaking by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in connection with a general election.

Sir SAM HUGHES. He will have independent powers?

Mr. DOHERTY: For the purposes of the election operations, he shall be the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery over there. This method of dealing with the subject also calls for provision for the counting of the ballots overseas. This is a matter which has had considerable thought. It is certainly very important that there should be provided competent and reliable officers with regard to whose impartiality we should have every guarantee. As meeting those requirements the proposal of the Bill is that there should be appointed a certain number of officers who are designated as "special returning officers," and that each of these special returning officers shall have a clerk assigned to him. After the ballots have been returned respectively to the Commissioner of Canada to France; and the secretary of the High Commissioner in London, and, in this country, to an officer to be known as the general returning officer; these special returning officers with their clerks shall proceed to the sorting of the envelopes and counting of the ballots, and shall furnish statements of the results to the commissioner to France and the secretary to the High Commissioner in London respectively. The latter shall communicate by telegraph the contents of the statements, and subsequently forward by registered mail the statements themselves to the general returning officer, who is to be appointed and act in this country to receive all returns and declare final results.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What am I to understand the Commissioner of Canada in Paris, and the Commissioner of Canada in England, to mean?

Mr. DOHERTY: They are to receive and transmit. It was necessary that we should have some central place in France and in England to which all of those boxes or receptacles could be forwarded for distribution to the special returning officers called upon to do the counting. We called them "ballot boxes" but by definition we make it clear that any suitable receptacle shall answer the requirement of a "ballot box."

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not send them to the Deputy Clerk of the Crown in Chancery?

Mr. DOHERTY: If my hon. friend will allow me, he will see it is merely to secure a proper location to which all the boxes can be sent. The secretary of the High Commissioner in London—because the High Commissioner himself does not figure in the matter at all—and the commissioner to France, have no function to perform with regard to the counting of the ballots. The provision is that the receptacles or boxes shall be forwarded to them closed and sealed in the best manner that can be found. Their function is limited to fixing a time and place after the expiry of a delay fixed in the Act, when they will hand those boxes over, unopened and still sealed, into the custody of the special returning officers who are to do the counting. When those special returning officers have done the counting, and the assortment also—because that would be an important part of the operation, inasmuch as the ballots will not come already assorted in boxes belonging to particular constituencies; and we have endeavoured to surround the operation of counting and assortment with every precaution that seems reasonably possible—they shall establish the result and communicate it to the commissioner in France and to the secretary of the commissioner in England for transmission to the General Returning Officer in Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The minister said that these would come in special ballot boxes by constituencies. How is it possible to have them by constituencies?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I pointed out that one very important operation would be necessary, namely, assortment, because returns could not possibly come by constituencies. The assorting as well as the counting would come within the duty of the special returning officers and their clerks. They would furnish statements of the results to the commissioner in Paris and to the commissioner in London for transmission to Canada. So far as the secretary of the High Commissioner, or the commissioner to Paris is used, he is used simply as affording a convenient method of gathering together at one point the result of the operation and transmitting it over here.

I have referred to an officer to be known as the general returning officer. This is an officer whose services are made necessary by the fact that we shall have going on an election overseas and an election upon this side of the Atlantic. It is necessary that somebody should gather together the results of those two different subdivisions of the election and, adding them together, ascertain and return the general result. For that purpose we provide for the appointment of a general returning officer to whom shall come all of the returns from overseas, from Bermuda, and from the military voting in Canada—because we have to make provision for the taking of the votes of military voters in Canada who may, in large numbers, be absent from their constituencies. This general returning officer shall receive the returns from all these sources, and it will be his duty, adding the returns so received to those of the general voting in Canada to annonce the result and proclaim therefrom the candidate elected in each constituency.

The provisions for the taking of the soldiers' vote obviously make it impossible for a returning officer in a particular constituency to make a return that a man has been elected, because he has before him only the votes of the people voting at home. We provide in the general returning officer an officer who shall receive these results and make return with regard to each constituency, after the information from all these different sources has come in to him.

Mr. MARCIL: What becomes of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery performs all his ordinary functions; but it is not part of the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to first determine who is elected for a particular constituency. Under the machinery as it exists at present, the returning officer of that constituency makes return that So-and-So is elected. That is now rendered impossible by the fact that the returning officer of that particular constituency has not the necessary information to determine who is returned. The only way that that information could be got to him would be by making the people on the other side in some way transmit all information with regard to each particular constituency to these 230 or 240 officers scattered all over the Dominion, and it would necessitate sending information to those officers for the mere purpose of having them send it back again. It seemed a more reasonable and practical method to provide some one to whom all of the results of these elections held in this way in different sections should be transmitted, and who should establish and announce the final result.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will it be made legal to transmit it by cable in case the document is lost in transmission?

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision is that as soon as the information is obtained, that is, as soon as the result is ascertained, the High Commissioner and the commissioner in Paris shall transmit the information by cable. Then there is provision that he shall follow that by written communication which is to be registered, and so forth, and the intention is that before officially declaring the result the written communication should be awaited, but in the meantime the information would be here, and if any accident should happen as to subsequent transmission, no doubt it would be available as a method of establishing the fact.

Mr. MARCIL: Do the ballots overseas contain the names of the candidates or only of the political parties?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not intended that the ballots overseas should contain the names of the candidates; the ballot as provided by the present Soldiers' Voting Act is retained. That is to say, a ballot upon which a man may vote for the Government or for the Opposition or for an independent candidate, if there be any, or may vote for a particular person, so that wherever the elector knows who the candidates in his constituency are he has an opportunity to vote for the particular candidate, and incidentally to that, I may say we have made very full provision for creating a condition wherein, so far as it is possible, opportunity will be afforded to the overseas soldiers to know who the candidates are. There is difficulty, apart from the knowledge of who the candidates are, in the way of providing just such a ballot as is had upon this side; that is, that, if you sought to do that, you would have to have printed upon the other side of the Atlantic, necessarily after the nomination and before the voting, ballots for each particular constituency, containing, of course, different names—ballots such as we have on this side of the Atlantic. By retaining the form of ballot provided for in the Soldiers' Voting Act, we enable preparation to be made upon the other side of the ocean of all ballots that are needed, because all of the ballots to be used, without regard to the constituency, will be in the same form. You get that advantage in preparation. Then you avoid what would be an obvious impossibility, you avoid the necessity of every presiding officer being provided with specific ballots for each constituency in the Dominion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the difficulty about doing that, by making the interval between nomination and election day two or three weeks longer?

Mr. DOHERTY: We propose to prolong the delay between nomination day and voting day, and we have made provision for communicating and disseminating the knowledge as to who the candidates are in each constituency by every possible method, and we do hope that the soldiers as a whole will know who the candidates are. But there is the other difficulty, that if you were to hand to the soldier a ballot for his constituency such as we have over here, then every officer—and, of course, the officer cannot take the votes by constituencies, but is taking the vote of a group of soldiers—every officer taking the vote would have to have with him ballots for each of the 230 constituencies in Canada. While that might be an extreme case, undoubtedly there would be in every group of soldiers men voting as for different constituencies.

It is to be borne in mind that this operation is to be carried on practically in the field and if you load up the people who are going to take the votes with an assortment of ballots for each of the 234 constituencies, you will have to send a man around loaded with a trunk. I do not see that any conceivable injury results from our having the one form of ballot applicable to every constituency so long as we take every possible means to let the soldier know who the candidates are in his constituency and to permit him to vote for a candidate by name. That, of course, also is a matter of detail with regard to which, if an improved system can be suggested, it certainly will be welcome. But, as a result of the best thought that we have been able to give to the matter, that latter objection seemed to be an insuperable objection to the providing of specific ballots available for each man for the particular constituency in which he is entitled to vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How would it be if the ballot papers were left blank so that a soldier might vote for any person for whom he saw fit to vote? I think the classification in the printed ballot may be very unfair to some hon. members now sitting in this House. As I understand, the ballot is printed, "for the Government," or "for the Opposition." I have no doubt that in the coming election there may be a serious question as to where some members of the present House will stand. They may be independent. Those who are considered to be party men, at a time when we are trying to break down party lines, are going to have an advantage. I would, as a suggestion to the minister, say that the ballots ought to be printed with blank spaces and let the soldier himself write in the name of the constituency wherein he votes and strike out, "for the Government," or "for the Opposition."

Mr. DOHERTY: That is in the ballot at present.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is that provision?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, the ballot provides four distinct spaces.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is too many.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DOHERTY: A man may vote for the Government, he may vote for the Opposition, he may vote for any independent candidate, and, finally, there is a space which says "I vote for and he can write in the name or names of the member or members that he votes for.

Mr. BRADBURY: It is all on one ballot?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. I appreciate the position of the man who wants to vote for an individual candidate and I think it is most desirable that he should have the opportunity. The Bill provides ample means for the man who knows his constituency and knows his candidate and who votes for a particular candidate. All that is done by the other spaces on the ballot is to enable a man to vote who may, for instance, be uncertain as regards his particular constituency, or who under the conditions which exist over there, may not have received the information which we intend to endeavour in every way to have conveyed to him as to who the particular candidates are. It would be a most unfortunate thing if a man in that position should be deprived of any opportunity to vote at all. The form of ballot that we are providing in the Bill has all the advantages of enabling a man to vote for a particular candidate where his knowledge both of the constituency where he is entitled to vote and of the candidate running enables him to do so.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would the voter not have to write in the name of the constituency himself and vote for, say, John Smith, Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, he does not require to write in the name of the constituency on the ballot.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it my duty to point out to hon. members that the motion before the House is for leave to introduce "The Military Voters Act, 1917," and it is not in order to proceed with a minute discussion of the details. On the second reading of the Bill the principle may be debated and in committee details may be discussed. It is neither in order, nor desirable, to go into minute details on the motion to introduce the Bill.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Whether that is the rule or not, I think that under the circumstances, I have a perfect right to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think I have a perfect right to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is another rule to which I must direct the hon. gentleman's attention and that is that when the Speaker is addressing the House an hon. member must take his seat.

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite understand the rule and I have no desire to overstep the bounds of the proper proceeding upon the introduction of a Bill. At the same time, I appreciate that this is a matter that members are very greatly interested in and I, subject to your authority, and with proper respect for the rules of the House, desire to say that if I can give any information I will be glad to do so. I was saying that the ballot, as we proposed, in my judgment, affords the most ample opportunity whatever may be the conditions for enabling the soldier to register his vote. When I was interrupted I was speaking of the general returning officer, and I think I have sufficiently pointed out what his functions are. They largely go into effect at the termination of the election for the purpose of getting the specific returns. With regard to the special returning officers, I think it will be found that the provision of the Bill has been drafted with a view to attaining as perfect impartiality as can be attained on the part of the officers charged with this very important work. In order to make two things possible—namely, first, that we should get the fullest vote of the soldiers that can be got, and, second, that the voting should be done before the termination of the voting on this side, and therefore before the possibility of knowledge being spread on the other side as to the results—it has been thought wise, and the Bill provides therefor, to extend the delay between nomination day and election day. In the Bill that is a period of four weeks. The best information that I have been able to gather rather leads me to the conclusion that that will be a sufficient delay, but that in particular is a matter upon which I shall be glad to receive any information that any hon. member may have with the view of considering whether perhaps it might not be desirable to make that period longer.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Delay after nomination day or after the general election in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, it is intended that the voting day in Canada shall be four weeks after the nomination day. Voting overseas is to begin on the day after nomination day and is to go on for the full period of four weeks until eight o'clock in the evening of the polling day in this country. Whereas the voter over here has one day in which he must poll his vote, the soldier has twenty-nine days. At any time during that period he may avail himself of the opportunity to register his vote. Provision is made for the most widespread possible establishment of polls; that is places where the soldiers may register their votes. It is in contemplation that these should be established at every place where there is a gathering of soldiers. In the Bill we speak of "every camp" with reference to polling places, but we have put in a definition clause to make the word "camp" cover every place, be it hospital or rest station, or whatever may be the nature of the place where there is a group of soldiers.

We have made a further provision, that where circumstances are such as to give rise to the belief that if a soldier is not allowed to vote immediately when and where he is he may be exposed to lose his vote—if conditions are such as to make it possible for the presiding officer to take his vote—that officer shall be empowered, even though he is not actually holding a poll to take the vote of that soldier. The desire is to do anything that can be done to assure to the soldier the exercise of his privilege, and to assure to Canada the advantage of having the expression of opinion of that soldier, the only limit being such as may be necessary to surround the voting with the greatest possible precautions against any irregularity or fraud, or anything of that sort, under the conditions as existing upon the other side. The military voter in Canada, save that he has to use the ballot as provided for the overseas soldiers, is, in the marking of his ballot, to conform to the requirements looking to secrecy, which are provided for the ordinary taking of votes over here. There are detailed provisions as to the manner of taking the vote. I do not think they are materially different—though in some respects I hope they are improved—from the provisions of the existing law.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose the votes can be gathered in the hospitals?

Mr. DOHERTY: Oh, yes. We intend to send to every place where we can conceive that soldiers will be found a deputy presiding officer to take the vote.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the provision in the old Act, requiring the appointment of a number of commissioners by the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, to provide the taking of the ballot overseas, to be retained?

Mr. DOHERTY: For the appointment of scrutineers?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, that is preserved, and there are further provisions with regard to the officers appointed, to assure us that they will be representatives of one party as much as another.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand this is an entirely new Bill. It is not an amending Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, it is a new Bill. The material changes in conditions seem to make necessary the remodelling rather than the amending of the law. There are provisions, the details of which I do not think it necessary to go into, as to the methods of counting the ballots and the reporting the results to us on this side of the ocean. The purpose behind these provisions has been to secure every care and precaution, looking to a fair count, and looking to the preservation of the secrecy of the ballot.

There are provisions also in regard to the re-count of the ballot. The same reason that makes it desirable that the ballot should not be sent over here before being counted at all, seems to make it desirable that, in case there should be need for a re-count of the ballots taken on the other side, the operation should be carried on over there. The suggestion is that it should be done by a judge or other person who may be designated by the Lord Chief Justice of England, if he will consent to do it. We want to place that matter in the hands of somebody who is quite beyond the suggestion that he in any way is influenced by cis-Atlantic considerations; and there are details as to procedure upon that subject, with which I need not worry the House at the present time. This Bill replaces the present Military Voters' Act, and repeals that Act. I may say further that this Bill, though it is intituled the Military Voters' Act, 1917, proceeds by adding its provisions to, and making them part 4 of the Dominion Elections Act. This was found convenient because, of course, save with regard to these exceptional dispositions, it is desirable that very many provisions of the Dominion Elections Act should apply wherever they are susceptible of application to the operations to be carried on under this Act. We think we have attained that result in a very effective, and at the same time most abbreviated manner by constituting the provisions of this Act part 4 of the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suggest to the Government that this Bill might be referred to a special committee after the second reading. The Prime Minister might consider that suggestion.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Sir SAM HUGHES: Do I understand the Prime Minister to assent to the proposal that the Bill introduced by the Minister of Justice shall be referred to a special committee?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I said that I would take that into consideration.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONTROL OF WHEAT CROP OF UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (West Kent): I desire to call the attention of the Government to a despatch from Washington dated August 12, which reads as follows:

> U.S. Wheat Crop to Be Controlled—Elevators and Mills Will Be Licensed—Keep Eye on Exchanges and Middlemen.
> Washington, Aug. 12.—The food administration announced to-night its plan for controlling wheat, flour and bread, revealing that the Government is prepared to take over the whole 1917 wheat harvest if necessary to conserve the supply, fighting forces and their allies, and reduce costs to the general public in the United States.
> Establishing of buying agencies at all the principal terminals, licensing of elevators and mills, fixing of a price to be considered fair, regulation of the middlemen, and of grain exchanges, with the elimination of trading in futures, are the chief features of the plan. The licensing will begin September 1.
> The minimum price of $2 for wheat fixed by Congress does not become effective until next year, but the administration proposes to exercise a very thorough control over this year's crop through powers conferred under the food and export control bills.

I ask the Government, in view of the fact that the wheat threshing throughout the province of Ontario is in progress at the present time, and the farmers and consumers, as well as the milling companies, are anxious to know if the Government purpose taking some similar action before the wheat crop is disposed of.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The extract from the paper which my hon. friend has read may be founded upon facts, or it may not. The legislation which has been held up so long in Congress has at last passed; the Bill has received the signature of the President, and is now in force; that is, power is given for the work of the Food Controller, who had been formerly appointed, and who now enters upon his labours. The grain supervisors who were appointed some ten days ago, and who have, in Canada, powers given them by the appointing Order in Council to fix the price of wheat, have already acted, in so far as fixing the maximum price of wheat for last year's crop is concerned. They have deferred action with reference to this year's crop until the United States authorities have had their powers defined. It is the intention of both countries and of these two bodies in each country to co-operate and work along parallel lines. No decision, however, has been come to as yet with reference to what will eventually be done.

ENFORCEMENT OF CONSCRIPTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask the Minister of Militia whether he is correctly reported in to-day's issues of Montreal and Ottawa papers as having said yesterday at Camp Borden:

We are going to put the Conscription Bill into force right away.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, that is correct.

PRIVATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Second reading of Bill No. 126, for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon.—Mr. Edwards.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

G. O. AIKEN.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Is G. O. Aiken in the employ of the Government in Kingston?
2. If so, what are his duties and his salary?
3. When was he retired from the position of guard, and why?
4. What was the date of his new appointment?
5. Who previously performed the duties of the position to which Mr. Aiken has now been appointed?
6. Why was not a returned soldier given this position?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will have an answer to this question on Wednesday.

ENLISTMENT OF ENEMY ALIENS.

Mr. MACNUTT:

Does the Government include the immediate descendants of naturalized persons of alien enemy birth who were born in Canada, in the policy of non-enlistment for combatant service, outlined by the Prime Minister of Wednesday, July 25, in reply to my question of Saturday, 21st of July, regarding enlistment of persons of foreign birth?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The persons designated were not included in the answer which I gave on a previous occasion. As a matter of fact, I understand that the descendants of naturalized persons of alien enemy birth have in some instances been accepted for military service under the voluntary system. So far as compulsory service is concerned, the circumstances of each case would, of course, have to be taken into consideration. I am speaking altogether of combatant service. For service other than combatant service, no question would arise.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS FIRE—INDEMNITIES FOR LOSSES.

Mr. BOULAY:

1. Does the Government intend to indemnify those persons who have suffered loss by the fire at the Parliament Buildings?
2. If so, will it be done during the present session?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No claim for which legal liability exists has been presented. Certain claims with regard to which action might be justified on equitable or compassionate grounds are receiving the consideration of a special committee.

2. It is expected decision will be reached during the present session.

THE FOOD CONTROLLER'S STAFF.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is there any regulation passed by the Government whereby the latter undertakes not to appoint any one in its service, who is of military age?
2. If so, why was W. A. Willison appointed on the staff of the Food Controller?
3. Is he of military age and has he offered to enlist?
4. If so, has he obtained a badge from the National Service Board, and on what grounds?
5. What is his salary, and what was his occupation and salary before he was appointed to the public service?
6. Is he the son of Sir John Willison, ex-editor of the Toronto News?

Mr. HUGH CLARK:

1. Yes, unless a badge has been issued him under Order in Council August 16, 1916.

2. Appointed because of his special qualifications, but being appointed to a temporary commission, he is not a member of the Civil Service.

3. Yes, married, two children; only brother killed in action. Was in Great Britain as accredited war correspondent from September 15, 1914, to November 29, 1916, in which capacity he visited the Canadian front lines repeatedly, the British front on the Somme, the French front at the invitation of the French Government, the British grand fleet and battle cruiser squadron. He was accepted as part of the military establishment and entitled to wear uniform while in the war zone.

4. No, and is prepared to do whatever further is required of him when his class is called.

5. See answers to questions asked by Mr. Kay and Mr. Ross. Previous salary upwards of $4,000.

6. Yes.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Has an assistant food controller been appointed?
2. If so, what is his name, place of residence and previous occupation?
3. What is his salary?
4. What was his previous salary?
5. What are his special qualifications which induced the Government to appoint him?

Mr. HUGH CLARK:

1. No.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is one Mr. Todd on the staff of the Food Controller?
2. If so, what is his salary, and what was his previous occupation and salary?
3. Is he of military age?
4. If so, did he offer to enlist?
5. If not, has he obtained a badge from the National Service Board, and on what ground were the regulations, if any, forbidding the employment by the Government of men of military age ignored?

Mr. HUGH CLARK:

1. Yes.

2. Present salary and previous occupation: See answers to questions asked by Mr. Kay and Mr. Ross. Previous salary, $2,900 per annum and travelling expenses.

3. Forty years of age and has nine immediate dependents.

4. In answer to a questionnaire sent by the Ontario Government to all employees, he stated his willingness to enlist at any time that it appeared desirable that he should do so, in his circumstances.

5. He has not obtained badge. As soon as his class is required for such service he is prepared to do whatever is desired of him. He was appointed because of his special qualifications, but being appointed to a temporary commission he is not a member of the Civil Service.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is one Mr. French, or Trench, on the staff of the Food Controller?
2. If so, what is his salary?
3. What was his previous salary and occupation?

[Mr. H. Clark.]

4. Is he of military age, and did he offer to enlist?
5. If not, has he obtained a badge from the National Service Board, and on what grounds were the regulations, if any, forbidding the employment by the Government of men of military age ignored?

Mr. HUGH CLARK:

1. Yes.

2. See answers to questions asked by Mr. Kay and Mr. Ross.

3. See answers to questions asked by Mr. Kay and Mr. Ross.

4. Yes, married. While engaged in recruiting work he was examined by the doctor appointed to examine recruits and declared to be physically unfit owing to severe attacks of rheumatism.

5. No. He is temporarily employed by the month to do special work for which his training particularly fitted him. He was appointed because of his special qualifications but being appointed to a temporary commission he is not a member of the Civil Service.

THE FOOD CONTROLLER'S OFFICES.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. How much floor space has been allowed to the Food Controller for his offices in Ottawa?
2. What is the cost of the rent of it?
3. What is the cost of alterations or repairs to the rooms?
4. What is the cost of the furniture bought for these offices, and what is the price paid for the carpets?

Mr. HUGH CLARK:

1. Rooms, 4,422 square feet. The offices provide for staff, stenographers, etc., Government employees transferred from other departments to take up special work for the food controller and for the many persons from different parts of Can-
4 p.m. ada doing voluntary work, such as chairman and members of committees dealing with special problems, and committee rooms for the Central Advisory Council and special committees.

2. Twenty-five hundred dollars per annum, lessor to pay all taxes, provide heating and elevator service; lessor also to clean and tint offices and make necessary repairs to floors, etc.

3. Alterations or repairs consist of the erection of one partition and the building of a cabinet around the telephone switchboard. This work is being done by the Department of Public Works and is not yet completed.

4. Furniture and carpets supplied by the Department of Public Works, a large portion being loaned from the Public Works store room.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is the Postmaster General still doing some recruiting in Montreal?
2. What is the amount of his travelling and living expenses since he started his work of recruiting?
3. What is the amount of the travelling and living expenses of his private secretary for the same period?
4. Has he also a military secretary?
5. Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to relinquish both his portfolio and salary when he goes overseas with his recruits?
6. When does he expect to go?
7. Is he furnished with an automobile, and by what department?
8. If so, what has been the cost to the country of the chauffeur and fuel since he has been using it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. Yes.
2. None.
3. None.
4. No.

5 and 6. Any necessary announcement will be made in due course.

7. No.
8. None.

MEDICAL OFFICERS IN MILITIA.

*Mr. PROULX:

1. How many medical men are employed by the Government or the Militia Department in and about Ottawa?
2. What are their names, duties and salaries?
3. Up to the present time, what amount has been paid to each?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The answers to the above questions, so far as the Department of Militia and Defence is concerned, are as follows:

CANADIANS OF ALIEN BIRTH.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. Will the Government say if the Allies will permit any Canadian of alien birth to take part in overseas military operations?
2. If not, does the Canadian Government propose to conscript such aliens?
3. Does the Government propose to take any measures looking to the prevention of said electors of alien birth from voting for the conscription or otherwise of Canadian citizens not of alien birth?
4. If so, will the Government call the attention of those of alien birth to the manifest unfairness of their voting for or against conscription?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1 and 2. The policy of the Government hitherto pursued has already been announced.

3 and 4. Any necessary announcement will be made in due course.

MAJOR MOXOM.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Is Major Moxom, of the 106th Battalion, on leave of absence in Canada?

2. What is the purpose for which each of these commissions have been appointed?
3. What are the names of the commissioners and other officers employed by each commission?
4. What salary has been given to each of these commissioners and officers?
5. How long have each of these commissions been employed for the special objects for which they have been appointed?

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What are the different amounts paid for commissions and expenses in connection with the flotation of the different loans made by Canada since 1914?
2. What are the respective amounts paid in connection with each loan?

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT.

THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. Frank Cochrane (Minister of Railways), Bill No. 118, to amend the Government Railways Act, was read the third time and passed.

LIVE STOCK EXCHANGE.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Burrell (Minister of Agriculture), Bill No. 123, respecting live stock, was read the second time, and was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

MINISTER OF OVERSEAS MILITARY FORCES AND PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES.

BILL REPORTED.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 122, respecting the Minister of the Overseas Military Forces, the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity of being in the House when this Bill was introduced last week, and I desire to say that the matters involved in this measure are very far-reaching in their character. The proposition that the military control of our forces overseas should be under the direction, not of a military officer but of a civil officer, who would be an overseas Minister of Militia, does not seem to me to be the proper method of dealing with the problem. If we look at the conditions that exist in the other overseas dominions with reference to the control of the men who have gone across the ocean, we find that the direction of their forces is administered by military officers. In Australia, which has sent a great number of men across the ocean, the General Officer Commanding the forces there before the war is the man who is in control of everything in connection with their disposition and management there in conjunction with the High Commissioner of Australia, who, I assume, looks after civil matters. The House and the country are aware of the fact that during the last year complaints of the most serious character have been made as to the methods of administration of the troops across the ocean. Every hon. gentleman who has been in touch with men who have returned from the other side know that complaints have been made by our men with reference to the way in which Sir George Perley, who is minister overseas, deals with these questions. Sir George Perley may be a very clever man, but the problem of dealing with men who are going to fight is of such a character that I do not care how clever a man may be whose training has been wholly in business and civil life, he cannot possibly, if he is the "last word" and final director of matters, be as good a person to deal with these questions as a man of military experience would be. Yet it has been found necessary by the Government to urge upon the House and the country that Sir George Perley, who knows nothing about military matters, and who, I presume, does not pretend to know anything about military matters, should be the man to direct all such matters overseas.

In connection with the direction of this war we in Canada are in a very peculiar position. I have frequently referred in this House to the fact that since the war began we have not had any General Officer Commanding who has had any distinctive position or military record, or who has been in such a position that the country and those interested in the boys who have gone overseas can feel that, so far as all our military dispositions are concerned, we have had that proper control which will give the best results. We all know of the several men who have been sent over by Great Britain, by arrangement with this Government and the previous Government, to fulfil the position of General Officer Commanding in Canada. We had General Mackenzie, who returned shortly before the war; we had General Lake, we had Lord Dundonald and various other men who had military training and experience in Great Britain, and who occupied this office and who were known throughout the country by every one connected with military matters as having special knowledge and fitness for the position. But in Canada to-day the man who is in charge of the whole military forces of the country is General Gwatkin, who was not a general at all until after the war began. We have in the person of our hon. friend the present Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kenp), a gentleman who, according to the rule of the statute, deals with the civil side—if the expression may be properly used—of the administration of military matters. But General Gwatkin, who was a Colonel employed simply in a subordinate position in the Militia Department when the war broke out, has, so far as any one in Canada who knows anything about military matters is concerned, not exercised any direction with reference to the mobilization of our forces, nor in regard to other military matters, nor has he appeared in any of the camps throughout the Dominion to deal with or control operations. He seems to have taken it for granted that what we can do in Canada is simply to take our boys with all their cleverness, ability and brightness, and with all the bravery that they have shown on the battlefield, and to assume that the science of war is a science that any one can master, and that there is no necessity for having their direction and control properly secured. In South Africa General Smuts and General Botha were men who had had experience in war, and whose judgment and direction controlled the forces of that country. In Canada we have never pretended in any way, so far as military control is concerned, to have any one in charge of the military forces of this country, except General Gwatkin.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT. He was Chief of the General Staff.

Mr. MACDONALD: Under whom?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Under the Minister of Militia.

Mr. MACDONALD: Before the war General Mackenzie was the General Officer Commanding until General Gwatkin was subsequently appointed. General Mackenzie retired and went to England. Up to that time General Gwatkin was employed in a certain position in the Militia Department—I think in regard to artillery or something of that kind.

Sir SAM HUGHES: General Gwatkin came out here some years ago as an officer under General Lake. When General Mackenzie retired, I was Minister of Militia, and the British Government objected to recommending General Gwatkin as being fit for the position as Chief of the General Staff, to which position I purposed appointing him. They stated that he was not competent for the position.

Mr. MACDONALD: They objected to it?

Sir SAM HUGHES: They objected to it. They stated he was not competent for the position. I informed them that was the reason I wanted him, and that I did not want any fellow there with their ideas; I wanted some man who did what he was told, and who did not profess to have those fancy notions of his own. I found I made a mistake. I was right in the fact that he did not know much, but I was wrong in thinking that he would not interfere.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for the information. The result is, we have now in charge of the military forces in Canada a man who, the British Government intimated, was not competent for the war office, and we find that the hon. the ex-Minister of Militia who, notwithstanding the position taken by the British Government thought he was competent, now admits his mistake. I dc not think my hon. friend the present Minister of Militia will claim he is possessed of any special military knowledge. Under the statute his duties relate to the civil side of the department. Why is it, if for over three years every other dominion has had men who knew their business, men of military training, actually directing their military affairs, this has not been the case in Canada? Our boys are directed and controlled by a man to whom the British Government objected as not being competent. They go overseas, and who is the general commanding them there? Who is the man in control of the military institutions of Canada on the other side?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: General Turner.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, not General Turner. The man in charge of everything military there is Sir George Perley. I understand that General Turner is under Sir George Perley. By this measure, it is proposed to create a Minister of Militia Overseas, who shall have directions of all matters with reference to our troops, and our boys there shall be under his dictum and direction.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is not the hon. gentleman aware that under a former Minister of Militia and Defence, General Dundonald was removed from his position because he undertook to deal with matters which it was said should be dealt with only by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia and Defence, and is not the hon. member aware that that policy has been followed since?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is speaking of the piping times of peace. We should have the direction and assistance of the best military aides we could get anywhere.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And we have it in General Turner, overseas.

Mr. MACDONALD: But, I am speaking of Canada. and my hon. friend was speaking of Canada. We have heard the admission of the ex-Minister of Militia that the man in charge is a man who, the British Government said, was incompetent. My hon. friend (Mr. R. B. Bennett) interrupts and says that General Turner was in charge overseas. The man whom it is proposed to put in charge under this Bill is Sir George Perley, who has, as a matter of fact, been in charge ever since General Carson retired. Under this Bill it is proposed to provide that so far as overseas affairs are concerned we are to have a separate department of the Government over there, and Sir George Perley is to be in control. I venture to say that with the admitted conditions we have in Canada, the military aid we can give to the Allies in this cause is not aid which will be enhanced by the direction of Sir George Perley and the coterie he has around him. I noticed in Hansard the other day a statement made by the ex-Minister of Militia in regard to the tremendous number of people gathered in and around London in connection with the administration of the office.

Mr. GRAHAM: Twelve hundred he said.

Mr. MACDONALD: Every one who has been interested in the boys over there, or who has had friends over there, or who has spoken to the men who have returned, knows that continuous complaints have been made in regard to the way in which matters have been administered under Sir George Perley. So far as concerns the direction and arrangement of our gallant sons is concerned, it is time Canada should have the best military control to be found anywhere. The country expects it, and will be disappointed if it is not given. Owing to the fact that the war is on, and means of communication are necessarily uncertain, and because of parliamentary rules with reference to what may be made public, we have not all the information we might have, but, so far as we know our condition will not be enhanced, and the interests of the boys in the fighting line will not be improved, if the administration is left in the hands of Sir George Perley. I object to the principle of the Bill and to the proposition that military control of our forces overseas should be perpetuated in the hands of Sir George Perley.

With reference to the appointment of under-secretaries, I noticed the other day an hon. gentleman on the other side took the position that when men are appointed to public places in this democratic country, it is not a justification of the appointment to say they are doing the work for nothing. If that were to be the rule, only men of wealth could render public service hereafter. If we are to be told that the man who is going to take the position will render the service for nothing, then we have reached a point where the poor man is to be proscribed. If the man of ability, energy and capacity who can render service is not to be employed, because, forsooth, there is another man prepared to perform the service for nothing, we have a condition of affairs which should not exist. I submit, this whole legislation is not in the interests of the country. I submit, if the Minister of Militia had a proper military head working in conjunction with him, he would not need any military under-secretary, and if the military organization of the country had been arranged properly, or is arranged properly now—and it is not too late to rearrange it—there would be no need for a military secretary. And it would be no justification for his appointment, to say that he was not going to accept any pay. The seriousness of the situation demands that we should have the very best brains and ability at the service of the country, and the fact alone that a man is willing to perform the service for nothing is no justification for his appointment, yet that is all that is put forward in support of this change. If Canada only knew the absolute impossibility of well-directed efforts along proper lines under the conditions we have to-day, so far as our military organization is concerned, she would rouse herself to see to it that a change is made. At this moment, with all the seriousness of the war before us, and facing the tremendous possibilities of death and carnage every day, we are in the position that we have as our military head a man whom the British Government declared to be incompetent, and we are putting in permanent charge of our military organization a man who knows nothing about military affairs.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, I would like to be permitted to renew the objection I made the other day, not so much to the creation of the office—I understand the course has been decided upon by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister—but to the acceptance of offices of emolument by the new overseas minister and the under-secretaries without going before their electors. I believe, notwithstanding the precedent cited by the right hon. gentleman the other day, that it does not exactly fit the situation in Canada. I think my right hon. friend should revise his opinion and that, if he decides to create these offices, the gentlemen who are going to be appointed, one the overseas minister, and the others under-secretaries, should follow the time-honoured practice and return to their electors for their endorsation. It is a leap in the dark; too great, too serious, a departure from the spirit of the British constitution and of British institutions for us to make. I do not see how it could prejudice the hon. gentlemen who are to be the appointees of the Government to take the course I propose. It is admitted that Parliament will soon be at an end by the effluxion of time; that dissolution is not far off, and therefore the hon. gentlemen who have served as under-secretaries and as the overseas minister could well afford to continue to serve without accepting emoluments until the election takes place. I quite understand it would be rather useless to hold a by-election at this time for these gentlemen, but the Government should not do away in such a light manner with the principle, so old and so wise, that any one receiving emoluments should seek re-election from his constituents. I do not know how any one would be injured if my suggestion were accepted.

We have had the statement from my right hon. friend that Sir George Perley is serving his country and accepting nothing for his services. We have it from my hon. friend from Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) that he will not accept any emolument. Under these circumstances it seems to me that no harm would be done if the offices are created, but if the principle of re-election in the case of the acceptance of emoluments is adhered to. I share the view expressed the other day by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), and by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), that no one should be appointed to such responsible positions as those referred to in the present Bill without accepting the emoluments attached to the position. As it has been stated since, it is not right that public offices should be given to the millionaire class only. A man who accepts a position under the Crown on these conditions is likely to regard himself as his own master, whilst the spirit of British institutions is that a public officer, a minister of the Crown, is not his own master but is the servant of the people and of the Crown. I most strenuously object to the appointment of millionaires who will refuse to accept the emoluments, not because I do not admire their magnanimity, but because it is against the best interests of the country that positions or offices should be given to the wealthy only—who sometimes may not be the best choice—and should not be given to the men of ordinary means who may have the desire and ambition to serve King and country.

These are my objections to this proposal. I am not at all criticising the measure with reference to personalities. The gentlemen who are being selected under the new Bill as overseas minister and as under secretaries are personal friends of mine. Although I do not believe that Sir George Perley was the best choice of the Government yet, personally, as he is a friend of mine, I am very glad to see him where he is. But we should not, because of personal friendship, depart from the principle of the British constitution, namely, that any one receiving emolument under the Crown, as a minister or under secretary, should meet his electors.

In the case of Sir George Perley, it is remarkable that he was elected in 1911 and was selected by my right hon. friend to be minister without portfolio representing the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. Immediately afterwards, upon the death of Lord Strathcona he went to England and assumed there the office of High Commissioner for Canada. Meanwhile he came back to Canada and on different occasions replaced the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) temporarily

We hardly see him in the House, and certainly his electors do not see him. Since that time he returned to England, where he discharged the duties of High Commissioner, and he has now been made Overseas Minister of Militia and Defence, and the country has seen absolutely nothing of him. Somebody must speak for his electors in this matter. I have had occasion to meet the electors of the county of Argenteuil within the last few months. An opponent has been selected in the person of Mr. McGibbon, a farmer of Argenteuil. The term of Parliament has expired, and we have given an extension of one year. Surely it is not during that year of extension that we shall give Sir George Perley an appointment with emoluments, and at the same time allow him to receive such emoluments without going before his electors. I say in all sincerity and in all earnestness that this is going too far and that the people of the country will resent that treatment. I do not see why, because we are at war, Sir George Perley should not come back to Canada and face his electors. What objection is there to that procedure? Further, he may not come back at all. The county may be opened to-morrow, and it would be as easy to proceed with an election there as it will be to proceed with the vote of the soldiers at the next general election.

I repeat that it is a great mistake, and it is an encroachment on the rights of the people to allow a new minister of the Crown or an under-secretary who will receive emoluments to accept such an office without appearing before his electors. As the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said the other day, it is true that in England, when the present Government was reorganized, for a certain determined period of time the old practice was suspended. But we have seen of late new ministers selected by the Prime Minister of England, men of great reputation and great prestige, like Mr. Churchill, obliged to return before their electors. A day or two ago Mr. Henderson resigned. No one will for a moment suggest that in England the affairs of State are not far more important than they are in Canada owing to the entanglement in which the whole British Empire is at present and the fact that everything is centralized in London from all parts of the world; and yet I contend that the successor of the Hon. Mr. Henderson will be obliged, in spite of the stress of time and circumstances to go before his electors, whether there is a big offensive in the East or whether there is a big offensive in the West. I appeal to the right hon. gentleman and ask him not to create that dangerous precedent in Canada.

Hon. Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): May I ask the Prime Minister for an interpretation of the words "by commission" in section 1, subsection 5a: "There shall be a Minister of the Overseas Military Affairs who shall be appointed by commission."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It places him in the same position as the other ministers. All ministers are appointed by commission under the Governor General's hand and the great seal of Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: When General Carson was appointed to this position he was not appointed by commission.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He was not a minister.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And why add the words "and shall be a minister of the Crown"?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Because the intention was to make him a minister of the Crown.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not let it be "there shall be a Minister of Overseas Military Affairs who shall be appointed and he shall be a minister of the Crown"? What would be the difference between that and the present reading?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There would be really no difference except that it is desirable to make it plain that he shall be appointed in the same way as other ministers are appointed.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Bill, as has been stated here, introduces a new principle. From time immemorial, or ever since the establishment of responsible government in Britain, any member of the popular Chamber accepting a position as minister of the Crown must go before his constituents for re-election. I might point out that to-day, with all the struggling that has gone on in the world's history against autocracy, there are but two free governments upwards of one hundred years old; one is the Government of the United States, and the other is the Government of Great Britain. Students of history who have examined this question find that the cause of the downfall of free governments and the establishment of autocratic governments is due to actions such as we are called upon to exercise here to-day, that is, the gradual relinquishing on the part of the people, members of Parliament and the people of the country behind them, of the rights and privileges that properly belong to the people. The tendency of the human race is to be governed, is to be passive. We have had instances of it in this House. We have had instances of it where both sides have relegated to their leaders the management of the affairs of the country without, as many maintain proper supervision of their actions.

So far as I am personally concerned, I have always been a firm believer in responsible Government, but I regret to say that, in my opinion, responsible Government in the Dominion of Canada has not had a fair chance.

A Minister of the Crown in Canada, on matters of policy, should be responsible to his colleagues in the Cabinet, and, of course, to his party in the House, but on the details of his own department he should be responsible to the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister alone. The policy of having all matters of detail brought before the Cabinet Council and discussed is undoubtedly detrimental to the best interests of the public. That has been found to be the case in England and in Canada in this war. That is the reason why people say: "Oh, in war times you must have autocratic government." I do not agree with any such doctrine in any sense at all. I believe in government by the people, through the people and for the people, and I firmly believe that, when a person aspiring to become a minister of the Crown wishes to be confirmed in that position it is his duty to go before the electorate. If he cannot go in one constituency, surely the Government is popular enough to find him a constituency where he can go before the electorate and seek re-election. Otherwise, we shall be governed by an autocracy, and we are fighting against autocracy—at least, I thought so from the outset of the war. The only reason that I have gone into the war, or encouraged any one else to go into it, was that I considered we were fighting for everything that is worth fighting for, namely, the downfall of autocracy and the preservation of human liberty. If we are gradually handing over to gentlemen, no matter how much confidence we have in them, the rights and powers which belong to the people, and these gentlemen do not wish to appear before their constituents and seek re-election, I fear we are following in the footsteps of those who laid the foundation in Germany of the condition which made it possible for the Kaiser to become the autocrat he is in that country.

Thousands of free governments have been established from time to time in the history of the world, yet, one by one they have disappeared until, as I have said, only two that have lived for a hundred years or over remain. This, I maintain, is due to such Acts as that which we are practically carrying out here to-day—the policy of surrendering the rights for which people have fought for generations to an autocracy. We are making an autocracy not merely in regard to matters overseas, but an autocracy to handle matters which properly belong to the people and for the people. I have met gentlemen representing certain forms of church, and gentlemen representing autocratic forms of government, who maintain that the people of any community are unfit for free government and will not take an interest in matters, and so they justify Parliament in handing over control of everything to two or three members of the Government. You might as well make the choice of those to control public affairs depend upon the result of a game of poker. I have pointed out that in the House of Commons we are not representatives of the people, and do not exercise our proper functions in this House, but trust to others to do the business of the country. People claim, therefore, that the only proper form of Government is autocracy in state or church as the case may be, and they proceed accordingly.

We have a great many lovers of constitutional liberty, who say that in times of peace the constitutional government is all right, but in time of war you must have autocratic government. In England Lloyd George and Bonar Law are managing the affairs of the nation to-day, and why? Not because of a union government or a coalition government, but because it was found that in the early days of the war action was what was wanted. The red tape was found to be a hindrance to a successful prosecution of affairs, so that at the beginning of the war Britain was found practically defenceless. She could not send her men and munitions to the front to meet the tremendous preparation made by Germany, and little was being done to meet that emergency, until Lloyd George Bonar Law, Lord Rothermere, Sir Edward Carson, F. E. Smith and others, Lord Northcliffe, and Sir Max Aitken, now Lord Beaverbrook, took action—not because they belonged to one party or the other, but because they were men of action and decision of character and had the interest of the Empire at heart. In a very short time Britain was able to send shell for shell, and in a short time she was able to send ten shells for one shell of the enemy; and now she can fire fifty shells for one. That was why they formed the union of different parties. And let me point out that before the union was formed, the members of both political parties were called together, and the matter was threshed out, and bitterly threshed out in some instances, between the members of each political party. With the full sanction of representatives in the House, elections were held in the country when vacancies occurred, in order to test the public feeling, and justify the action of Lloyd George in carrying on his splendid action, and showing the great energy he has shown in this war.

I go further, and I object also to a Minister Overseas, as I pointed out the other day, because it handicaps the Minister of Militia in Canada. He builds the foundation, the bottom story, and, as the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) pointed out the other night, another gentleman takes charge, and the result looks like the homeward tracks from a wake. There is no system or unison in the work of the two departments. If it is absolutely necessary for the Dominion of Canada to provide a place for the present occupant of the office of Minister of Militia Overseas, surely we can get some ornamental position for him, where he will not be a menace to the nation. I do not wish to go into these matters, but there are hundreds of positions to which he could be appointed. If it is necessary to have him there, why not do away with the provision that he is to be a minister, and let him take his salary by a vote of the House, without any such action as this, which is going back to the dark ages and establishing an autocracy by the simple dictum of the Cabinet of Canada? Appoint him to some position. If it is essential that a good officer should be appointed, let General Turner have the position. He is a good officer, and every one has confidence in him. Let him act as an officer under the present Minister of Militia in Canada, and you will find much more harmony and much more execution, the soldiers will be better looked after, and there will be much more satisfaction throughout. In reference to the question of "no pay", I do not wish to bring in the personal matter, but I may say I was more or less surprised at my good friend the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy), bringing up the matter in the House, and saying he was not going to take pay. Lord Strathcona represented the country for many years and did not accept pay, but he did not advertise it from the housetops.

Mr. BENNETT: The cheques for his salary were all paid after he died.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am glad to hear they were paid. His executors did the proper thing. There was no advertising done about it. I presume the cheques were lying around, and some one picked them up for him, but I want to point out that when matters are brought up concerning this office overseas, people will say, "Oh, well now, do not say anything about it, because Sir George Perley is not taking pay for his work". That has been placarded from one end of Canada to the other. The consequence is that people feel called upon to say, "This gentleman has done something great for Canada in refusing to take his pay". Supposing his salary is $10,000, a year, and he has been there five or six years, that would amount to $50,000 or $60,000.

I know a gentleman not far from the sound of my voice to-day, who is well informed in matters connected with this war, who will say that in one week this country lost ten times that amount through the maladministration of this gentleman. Yet we are debarred from exercising the control that we should exercise as members of this House and as followers of a party in power because, forsooth, he does not accept his salary. I hope that no gentleman in this House will ever make it a boast—I will not, at all events—that he is taking a job without salary, because if he did I should be somewhat suspicious that he was after a knighthood or something of that kind. Such gentlemen would be after something other than the welfare of the community.

An hon. gentleman says that I do not think much of the knighthood. I do think a good deal of knighthood when it is earned. I want to see the gentleman in Canada who has in greater degree earned his knighthood than your humble servant has. When the Prime Minister replies, will he tell me whether this condition will exist only during the period of the war, or is it to be for all time? In other words, are we to keep this distinguished gentleman there? Why not make it a job that he shall have by divine right, or something of that kind?

Mr. GRAHAM: Is it hereditary?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes—is it hereditary? I have had a good deal to do with the appointing of officers to responsible positions during this war, and I challenge any one to show where personal friendship has been allowed to come in. Where personal friendship was involved as against an enemy, the ability in each case being equal, the gentleman who was my personal friend got recognition; I have no hesitation in saying that. But where personal friendship was the only recommendation, I challenge any one to find out where any such officer was recognized. On the contrary, unfortunately, I can point to cases where personal friends and gentlemen seeking to exercise personal friendship fought for positions and were denied them, enmity being thereby incurred. If Sir George Perley is to be kept overseas in his present position, certainly he will not be kept there on account of his worth; certainly he will not be kept there on account of the respect in which he is held by the soldiers. If he is kept there, it will be on account of personal friendship; and as an advocate of representative government I protest against this law being passed in his interest. If it is determined that he shall remain there, let him give up the position of minister of the Crown. Let us not violate the constitution. Let him accept the position as an officer of this Government in order that he may perform whatever duties appertain to the office; then his salary can be paid him and it will not be necessary to deface the statute-book of our country by passing a law of this kind.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I had not intended to speak on the second reading of this Bill until I heard the speech of the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). In his statement, as well as in answers received from the Government and from hon. gentlemen on the other side who have knowledge concerning military matters, it was stated that the general officer commanding had never been under fire, and consequently did not have the experience necessary to the performance of the duties of such a high, onerous and responsible position. The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) has stated that when this officer was nominated by him for that very high position, the military authorities in England said that he was not fit for the office. The ex-minister further said that he overruled that advice and appointed this man to the position in question. This is a matter of great importance, demanding some explanation from the Prime Minister, the Minister of Militia and the Government generally.

If there is any time when we should have talent of the highest character for a position of that kind, certainly it is during a time of war. In time of peace the administration of the Militia Department is a matter of training, and, to a great extent, of outings, exercises and good times--I do not begrudge that to those who take upon themselves the responsibility of joining the militia. Under these conditions, the character of the officer commanding is not, perhaps, so very important. But when we are up against the cannon's mouth, when we are fighting enemies like Germany and Austria, our boys who go to the front should, in their training, be given the benefit of the very best talent and should be afforded every protection that can possibly be thrown about them. When we are told that the general officer commanding, responsible for the important duties to be discharged in connection with the work to which I have referred, was rejected by the military authorities in England, I can find no excuse for the Government's accepting him and holding him in the responsible position which he holds to-day and has held ever since the war broke out. The ex-Minister of Militia has just said that all members of the Government should not be generally responsible for administration of different departments, that the officers of each department should be responsible to the head, but that there should be no general responsibility on the part of the Government for the actions of each minister. That is not the constitution of this country, nor the practice of government in Great Britain; the whole Government are held responsible for the acts of one minister; the responsibility is general all around. I submit, therefore, that the Prime Minister and those who sit around him are responsible to the people and must share the blame for having accepted the recommendation of the Minister of Militia for the appointment of a man who was evidently unfit for the position.

Reason my be found in this for the many irregularities and difficulties that have been experienced in this country since the war broke out—in connection with which, as we know, the Prime Minister, at least in one case, took very drastic action. There have been irregularities; there has been maladministration; things have been going wrong. One glaring case was brought to the attention of the House to-day. On one occasion the second contingent was held up in Canada for four months for reasons that were never satisfactorily explained. It is possible that this functionary, who, not having knowledge of or qualification for his position, did not see to it that the contingent was immediately sent forward and was responsible for this delay. It is possible that his inefficiency and the fact that he was subservient to the wishes of other people—particularly to the wishes of those who appointed him though not qualified—were causes for the action which was taken in connection with the second contingent.

I do not desire to introduce any acrimonious debate by going over a list of the different shortcomings of the Government in connection with this matter.

But the people of this country will readily understand why things have gone wrong and matters have not been properly handled, when they learn that we have at the head of military affairs a man who does not know anything about his business, whom the British War Office refused to recommend for the position, but who was put into the position evidently over their heads. If we had a case in which we required a doctor, would we call in a man who was not a doctor? If we wanted a lawyer to plead a case of a serious character, would we engage a man who was not a lawyer? And the same is true of all the other classes of people who require qualifications of the highest character. But in a greater case than one requiring the services of a doctor or a lawyer, in a case requiring the services of a general officer commanding our army in the awful crisis which we have been facing for the last three years, we have, on the admission of the Government to-day, a man who evidently knew nothing whatever about the business, and who was turned down by the British War Office as not being fit for the position. Such a condition of affairs requires some explanation before we go any further in spending money in regard to the management of matters in the hands of people who evidently have not the proper knowledge or training to fulfil the functions of the important positions they hold. We have the statement made here to-day by the ex-Minister of Militia of $100,000 being lost, or ten times whatever might be his salary, through the maladministration of a man who was not very well qualified for his position. But if we had a man who was not qualified, even if he received no salary at all, his inefficiency might cost this country hundreds of thousands, aye, millions of dollars. That is what is going to be brought about by appointing to office men who are not fit for their positions. They may be good men for other lines of business, but war is a particular class of work which requires a particular class of training. The fact that a man may have a good business head so far as other affairs are concerned does not give one any guarantee that he is a good general or a good handler of soldiers.

So far as the general management of the Militia Department and the war is concerned, I, as an elector of this country and a member of this House, am not satisfied with the condition of things. We expect in a government the greatest confidence as between themselves. There may be frictions, but those frictions must give way, and the general action of the Government must be absolutely unanimous. There must be to the outside world evidences of conclusions reached by the unanimous judgment of the council before actions of the greatest importance are submitted to the country. Since the war broke out, the most important department of government has been the Militia Department, but we have had for some time before us the clearest evidence that that department was broken in two without the slightest consultation beforehand with the head of that department. We find the authority of the Minister of Militia in our overseas military affairs, all the arrangements which he had made for proper communication between his office at Ottawa and the management of the troops overseas smashed without any knowledge at all on his part. We have him lifted out of office, and his position made impossible by the appointment of a minister on the other side of the water and of a secretary here. We have, indeed, the ex-Minister of Militia put into the position of the rascally, disobedient and rebellious tenant, who refuses to give up his house. The doors are taken out; the windows are taken out; and the top is torn off the chimney, so that the place is made absolutely uninhabitable, and he must leave. That is the sort of structure that was gathered around the head of the ex-Minister of Militia, so that he had to go out. He was fumigated out and smoked out, without his consent. That seems to be the condition of things prevailing in this Government, and we have no explanation in regard to it. The ex-Minister of Militia has been throwing bricks and books and all sorts of things at the Government since he came out, but nobody replies at all, the Government evidently thinking that silence is golden, and that no matter what reply might be made, it is better to keep quiet. The way in which the Militia Department and the administration of the war is handled does not show unity of purpose. It is only fair to point out their faults to the Government, in a mild way, as I am doing now, and to hope, in the future, at all events for the little future they may have, that they will be careful and penitent and lead a better life.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to pose before this House as having any special knowledge with regard to military matters—

Mr. GRAHAM: Except the navy.

Mr. HAZEN: —or as being an expert with regard to land forces at all, but I have been somewhat surprised at the statement made this afternoon as to the capacity of General Gwatkin as Chief of the General Staff. There were two different periods when I was acting as Minister of Militia during the absence of the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes). I met at that time General Gwatkin, who, hon. gentlemen are aware, was in the Militia Department before this Government came into power, and who, when General Mackenzie retired, was promoted to the higher position on the recommendation of the Minister of Militia. I came into contact with General Gwatkin daily for a period covering several months at meetings of the Militia Council and in other ways. As Chief of the General Staff, General Gwatkin has charge of the mobilization and training of the men who belong to the Canadian forces preparatory to their going overseas. From my observations I came to the conclusion that General Gwatkin was an excellent officer. I found him extremely industrious, a most hardworking man who was in his office day and night. I further found him possessed, so far as I was capable of judging, of admirable knowledge with regard to all military matters, and I thought he was one of the most valuable officers in the employ of the Militia Department of this country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Granted all that, is it true that the British War Office refused to recommend him?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know whether that is true or not; I have heard that statement to-day for the first time. He was, as my hon. friends know, in the Militia Department when we came into power, and he was subsequently promoted. He has done admirable work; he has rendered good service to this country; he has discharged his duties with ability. He possesses the requisite knowledge, so far as the military end is concerned, and he has discharged those duties in a way which is satisfactory. He has given very valuable services to this country for any remuneration he has received.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think so, too.

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot understand the statement made that he was not recommended by the British Government because, at one period when I was acting as Minister of Militia, a despatch was received asking that General Gwatkin and the gentleman who was then Commandant of the Royal Military College at Kingston should both be returned, as their services were required on the other side by the British Government.

I took the opportunity at that time of notifying the British authorities that I thought it would be impossible for us to get along satisfactorily in the Militia Department without General Gwatkin's services, unless they were prepared to give us some one equally competent who would take his place, and who could discharge the duties of the position he was filling. The fact that the British War Office asked that he should be returned for the purpose of doing service on the other side in connection with the war, and that it was owing to our protest he was not returned, is, I think, strong evidence that he was held in high regard by the War Office and the British Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask my hon. friend at what period that was? Was it while I was minister, and where was I?

Mr. HAZEN: I was acting as Minister of Militia. I think it was during the time my hon. friend was on the other side. What I have said was my opinion at the time, and was an opinion formed after consulting men who knew far more about military matters than I do. I understand General Gwatkin was held in very high regard as a soldier by one of the best soldiers who ever was in Canada, I refer to His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, who was Governor General of this country for five years, and who fulfilled his functions so satisfactorily.

Reference was made to the large number employed on the other side in connection with military matters, as compared with the smaller number employed in the past. I hope before Parliament prorogues we shall have the exact figures, and know how many Canadians have been employed in connection with the military offices in London and on the other side generally. When I was in London on a recent trip to the Imperial Conference, I availed myself of every opportunity of visiting the different offices in which matters connected with the militia of Canada were being administered. There are a large number of officers and others employed, for instance, at the pay offices at Millbank, which is in charge of Colonel Ross. I went through the offices with Colonel Ross, and spoke to him about the number employed. I said, "There seem to be a great many people here, and they all appear to be very busy." His reply was, "Oh, yes, and there is not a man too many; we have to keep accounts of over 300,000 men; our correspondence is simply enormous. In the British War Office they do not pretend to answer the letters we answer here. Their letters are simply filed away. Here we make it a point to answer any letter written us in the interests of any Canadian, or with regard to any Canadian, or on any subject in which any Canadian is interested in this department. We could not get along with one man less." I think there were about 500 employed in the department. Colonel Ross added "As a matter of fact, we have great difficulty in keeping our work up to the mark, and if letters are unanswered for a day or two we are sure to have complaints." One of the difficulties was that the men were soldiers —men who had been discharged from the hospitals and who were able to do this work, but were not fit to go back to the front. By degrees these men got better, and gradually worked into what is called the "A" class, and were sent back to the trenches again, other men being brought from the hospitals to take their places. While this arrangement is desirable, it hampered the work to a considerable extent, as men having experience were taken away, and new men brought in who had to be trained for the work. I saw no men idling in the Government offices. It seemed to me they were all busy, and discharging their duties industriously, and doing hard work. I think any one who knows Sir George Perley and his business habits, and any one who knows General Turner's capacity, energy and industry, will appreciate that they would not desire to employ a man unless there is work for him to do. More men have been going over, and there will naturally be an increase in the work to be done. In order that we may discuss the matter intelligently, I hope we shall have a statement showing the figures of the people employed, before the House prorogues.

I did not rise to discuss this matter, but I felt it was only an act of fair play on my part to say a word in justice to General Gwatkin, because I believe he has given good value to the country, and is an admirable man for the position he occupies.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I do not believe any more unfair, unjust or ungenerous attack was ever made in this House upon a great, unselfish public servant than was made this afternoon against General Gwatkin. I did not know General Gwatkin when this war broke out. He is a distinguished British officer who served with the Manchester battalion, but so long as he was not prepared to bend his will to that of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes), he must needs be attacked. It reflects no great credit upon this country that so distinguished a citizen and so distinguished an officer should be made the subject of such a conspiracy of attack as that which has taken place this afternoon between the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I did not know except of the military attainments——

Mr. LEMIEUX: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman refers to a conspiracy between two hon. members against General Gwatkin. I think the expression is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) is in order in attributing motives of that nature, unless he has personal knowledge of the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I will put it this way—the very apparent conspiracy which has always been evidenced by the conduct of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and that of the hon. member for Victoria;—one asserts, then calls upon the other to support. This is the common practice, whether dealing with the Ross rifle, or General Gwatkin, or anything else. The people of the country are getting wise to this.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I rise to a point of order, and to ask you a question, Mr. Speaker. I went to you and I asked you if I would have an opportunity of replying to any statement that might be made after I spoke. I was informed by you that I would not have such an opportunity.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman put this question to me:—would he be in order in speaking after the Prime Minister? I said, no, inasmuch as the Prime Minister, in replying, closed the debate.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I rise to a question of privilege. I did not attack General Gwatkin. I shall give General Gwatkin's record at any time there is an opportunity to do so. If necessary, I am prepared to go into the whole matter. I may also say I have never been actuated by any animus. I have tolerated General Gwatkin when I should have dismissed him many a time.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: In 1915 General Gwatkin was referred to by one of the leading officers in the British army, in my presence in London, as being one of the most efficient soldiers of his time, having regard to the rank he held. Colonel Gwatkin came to this country with General Lake. He was promoted under the late Administration.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He was a major.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He was a major when he came here, but a colonel when the war broke out. It was then that the general staff of the British War Office desired him to return to England, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) said, but because his services were indispensable to this country, he remained here against his better judgment. Now, after giving exemplary and untiring service to Canada, he is made the object of attack in this House. To my knowledge General Gwatkin is the hardest working man in any department of the public service at Ottawa, bar none. He goes to his office early, and stays late. He is accommodating and obliging. He is one of those quiet, unobtrusive gentlemen who do their work without noise or bombast. He is one of those gentlemen who do their work without going from seaboard to seaboard for the purpose of making known their merits.

He is a quiet, unobtrusive gentleman who goes about the country doing the work which has been entrusted to him without advertising it from the housetops. When the history of this country is written with respect to the mobilization and training of the first contingent, the name of General Gwatkin will be the one which will receive a greater measure of appreciation than that of anyone else. I think it ill-becomes the hon. member for Pictou, who at least arrogates to himself the possession of some knowledge on military matters, to refer to General Gwatkin as he has done.

Mr. BRADBURY: He is a colonel.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He may be a colonel but I would judge he was a private from the observations he has made this afternoon in regard to General Gwatkin. I know what General Gwatkin has done in respect to mobilization and training in the province in which I live. He is not responsible for the system that moved others to cry from the housetops, or for making men colonels, they being civilians, as they walked along the street, but he went quietly and calmly about his duty. He laid down certain rules for the training of our forces, and I would say to the hon. member for Pictou that, as a colonel and a member of the militia, he knows that General Mackenzie's position in this country was general officer commanding the Canadian forces, and that General Gwatkin was not appointed to that position although he was recommended for it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: General Mackenzie was not general officer commanding in this country. He was chief of staff, the same as General Gwatkin.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He occupied the position formerly held by the general officer commanding, but owing to circumstances connected with the dismissal of Lord Dundonald that position was not filled. The hon. member for Pictou knows that the Government which he supported laid down the principle that the Minister of Militia, a civil officer, was the head of the forces in Canada, and that the military officer who was sent here, loaned to Canada, at request, by the British authorities, occupied a position subordinate to the minister. Therefore, because General Dundonald saw fit to arrogate to himself, as my hon. friends said, certain authority which, they said, he did not possess, he was removed from his position and a Minute was passed that in Canada the minister was head of the military organization and that whoever was chief of the general staff, or general officer commanding, occupied a subsidiary position to the minister. General Gwatkin was chief of the general staff and responsible for the mobilization and training of the troops. It is too bad that at a time of stress like this the people should be told that there should be a general in command of the forces in Canada when those responsible for this story know as well as I do that this gentleman to whom I have referred is the party who is responsible for training our forces and sending them to England to receive their final training at the hands of the British authorities, operating as part of the Imperial forces, and that their fitness is passed upon by General Turner now and ultimately by Lord French who is the Inspector General of the forces in England. Provided their fitness is satisfactorily determined, they are sent to France or to Flanders. My hon. friend knows that. He knows that no general in Canada has aught to do except to see that the forces are mobilized and trained until they are enabled to cross the seas as prospective first-class troops. Then they are passed upon by an officer who is eminently able to determine whether or not the troops are fitted for trench warfare on their arrival in France. An attempt is being made to create the belief that because there is no general in charge of the troops and that there is only a man who sits in his office and directs mobilization and training, not going out and inspecting himself, that the work is not being properly done. This gentleman does not himself go out and inspect because there are inspectors appointed for that purpose. General Hughes is the inspector of the forces west of the Great Lakes and for the troops east of the Great Lakes there are other inspectors. These inspectors go all over the country and determine whether the troops which are in training are fit to go overseas to undergo their supplementary training in England and become part of the Imperial forces. It is because there has been in this country, since this war began and up to the time Sir Edward Kemp succeeded as Minister of Militia, a man who arrogated to himself not only the authority of the Minister of Militia and Defence but of the Commander in Chief of the Forces as well, that this difficulty has arisen. It does not require a soldier to be Minister of Militia. It requires a business administrator such as we now have, while the duty of mobilizing and training the forces, of determining their fitness, of determining whether or not they should go overseas and become part of the fighting units, is a duty which should be delegated to men who by experience, training and fitness are qualified to discharge it. To assist in the training of our troops men have been sent from overseas; men who have had experience in trench warfare, men who have fought at Ypres and Vimy Ridge. These men are now training our forces under the direction of a man who went to the War Office to take charge of certain work there at the time when Lord Kitchener went to South Africa. This gentleman, although he was asked to take a position in the War Office, yielded to the earnest solicitations of the Government of Canada, who recognized that he was qualified by experience and training to take charge of the mobilization and training of our forces.

Now, as to the general character of the Bill providing for the appointment of a minister overseas, I have only a word to say. General Sir Sam Hughes sent General Carson over there to represent him and you know what an anomalous position General Carson was in—he who was not a member of this House, or a member of Parliament—went over there representing the Government and putting upon his letter paper the statement that he was "representing the Minister of Militia and Defence." It was necessary that some one representing the Government, Parliament, and people of the country should be resident minister overseas.

With regard to the Bill, I quite agree with what has been said with reference to the emoluments of the office, whatever they are as fixed by Parliament, being paid to the person discharging the duties. It is but fitting that those who have every qualification except wealth, those who have merit and ability, should have an opportunity of filling the most exalted office in the land. Were it not so the men who have taken a great and commanding position in the public life of England in the last five years would not have found an opportunity of giving the country the benefit of their services. I am quite in accord with what has been said with respect to this matter. But it does seem to me that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is right with regard to the obligations of these gentlemen to submit themselves to election. There is no necessity to submit men to by-elections having regard to the fact that the life of this Parliament expires in eight weeks from last Saturday night. Under these circumstances surely these gentlemen can go on discharging their duties without having to submit to a by-election. All the members of this Parliament who desire to be candidates will have to submit themselves to the verdict of the people within a very reasonable time.

Mr. GRAHAM: You could not tell us the date, could you?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I could not, but I am quite sure it will be too soon for my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all; do not worry about that.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The suggestion made by my hon. friend from Rouville is one that is worthy of consideration, and it does not in any sense depart from that old principle which, while it has been honoured in the breach once or twice recently in England, is now being honoured in the observance, in respect to the recent election of ministers, because in one or two instances there have been by-elections there.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege for the purpose of making a personal explanation. I desire to say that the statement, or the innuendo, that anything I said this afternoon was the result of any conspiracy or previous understanding between myself and the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) is absolutely untrue.

I did not know that the British Government had objected to General Gwatkin being appointed in Canada until the ex-minister made the statement this afternoon. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) is in the habit of retailing conversations with imaginary people, usually very important people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I rise—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is quite in order in making a personal explanation, but not in enlarging upon the subject.

Mr. PROULX: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Prescott—

Sir SAM HUGHES: I rise to a question of privilege. General Gwatkin had no more to do with the mobilization of the first contingent than that page boy who stands there.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Only one man did it.

Sir SAM HUGHES; Never mind, it got there.

Mr. PROULX: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) has said that we are going to have an election very soon. I submit that we should wait until after an election before considering this Bill. I do not see much necessity for passing this Bill now. Sir George Perley has been acting as minister overseas for about a year; the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) has been acting as parliamentary secretary of militia for about eight months, and the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark) has been acting as secretary for External Affairs for about the same time. There has been no legislation passed to confirm their positions. Sir George Perley and the member for Queens-Shelburne have said they would not accept the salaries which the Government proposed to attach to these positions. Then what is the necessity of passing this legislation? We are going to have an election in a few weeks. Probably there will be a change of Governmen and these gentlemen will not be in office after the next election. So far as the Secretary for External Affairs is concerned, compensation or an honorarium could be voted to him by Parliament without passing special legislation. I question whether we should vote to him $5,000 a year. I have even heard it said that part of his time is devoted to writing political campaign literature for the Conservative press. I do not know whether it is true, but the affirmation was made the other day by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and, although the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Clark) was in the House at the time, he has never denied it. I do not think the country should pay any salary to the secretary of any department who devotes his time or part of his time to working for the benefit of his party, preparing campaign literature or sending articles to the party press.

I submit that there is no necessity for this Bill. Sir George Perley and the member for Queens-Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) do not want to receive the salaries which the Government wants to attach to these positions. I intend to vote against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. HUGH CLARK (North Bruce): The charge has not been made directly, but it has been insinuated once or twice that my principal duty is to look after campaign literature. I am afraid that if that were the purpose of my appointment, and if that were the business I should be looking after, I have entirely neglected it, because the complaint I have heard on this side of the House is that while campaign literature is going out by the ton from the other side of the House, little or none is going out from this side. I cannot understand why hon. gentlemen opposite say that they do not make the charge, while at the same time they convey the insinuation that this is the principal business for which I have been appointed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I direct attention to the fact that the Prime Minister is replying.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I have never made any charge about the member for Bruce writing skits for Conservative papers or even contributing campaign literature, but you will notice he did not say he has not done so.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: Even if I did.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: Even if I did.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: —I am not in any different position from the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition, whom my hon. friend supports and who accepts a salary of $7,000 a year, and whose name floats at the masthead of the Canadian Liberal Monthly.

Mr. GRAHAM: Again the House will understand that the member for North Bruce (Mr. Clark) has practically admitted that he does—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have never taken that position concerning his work before, although many samples of it have been sent to me with the request that I should. I would never suggest that he did it; in fact, I did not think he did. I never dreamt that he did. But now he practically admits, or declines to deny, that, while the Government is asking us to vote him a salary of $5,000, he does dabble in preparing campaign literature. I think that will not be of assistance in helping this Bill through. I think if the people of the country believe what the member for Bruce really intimates they might believe, that is that he does prepare such literature, they will form their own opinions.

Mr. HUGH CLARK (North Bruce): May I repeat what I have already said, that if that was the principle business for which I was appointed, I have been neglecting my duty.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is left-handed.

Mr. GRAHAM: The House can take their own viewpoint. The hon. member declines to say that he has not prepared campaign literature or written articles since he became parliamentary secretary. That being the case, I ask the Prime Minister if he thinks it quite fair to ask us to pass a retroactive measure granting a salary from last October to a member who tacitly admits that he has been engaged since that time in preparing campaign literature. I leave it at that.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he would, on his word of honour, say that during his incumbency as Minister of Railways and Canals he never wrote anything for the Brockville Recorder or any other paper?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not for the world say that, and I would not question the propriety of the hon. member for Bruce writing anything for the Kincardine Review, for which he would be paid by the Kincardine Review, and not by the country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And you went before your electors when you were made minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: I went before my electors when I was appointed minister. I did not ask to be exempted by statute. This legislation does not say that from this time on gentlemen who are receiving emoluments from the Crown shall be exempt from the constitutional requirement of re-election, but in proposing it the Government asks the House to vote that these three gentlemen, having been appointed to office months ago, shall have salary paid to them, in violation of the constitution, dating back to October last. The Government is acting like an autocratic head of a railway who first decides what will be done and then asks the directors to sanction what the head has proposed. This Government takes a step in direct violation of our constitution and then, nearly a year afterwards, asks Parliament to approve of that violation. For the life of me, I do not see what justification the Government has for this position. The hon. gentleman from Calgary said: "What difference does it make, because there is shortly to be an election." It makes a difference of more than a year, because this Bill proposes that these gentlemen shall receive salary for a year before there will be a general election, and before Parliament has been asked to sanction this contract.

If the Government is going to propose, merely because there is a war on, that every vestige of responsible Government can be set aside whenever they wish to set it aside, I think it is a mistaken idea, and it was too bad we did not have a general election a year ago, instead of an extension of the parliamentary term. Had Parliament ever thought the Government would openly violate what has been the constitution of Canada for many years, I believe the extension would not have been granted. I think members on both sides of the House would have objected to it. I am not criticising the two parliamentary secretaries at all, because they are both competent for the position, but one of them spends some of his time in doing work for his party and the country is asked to pay for that time. The other gentleman says he will not take the salary. I do not believe in that kind of stuff at all. I am not reflecting on the hon. gentleman from Shelburne and Queens for an instant, because I believe he wishes to give his services and does not want remuneration, but in a country like ours you cannot make those distinctions. If men wish to come forward and perform some great duty for the State, all right, but where it is an appointment such as that under discussion, it merely puts a premium on a man's bank account, and I submit that it places other gentlemen in a position they should not be placed in, because they are not financially able to work without remuneration. While I admire any man who is willing to serve his country for nothing, still it places us in the position that we do not feel at liberty to criticise a man who works for nothing as we would a public servant who is taking his pay. Time after time, when we have discussed things which took place overseas, we have been met with the statement: Sir George Perley is giving his services for nothing. Without criticising Sir George Perley unduly, we know that a man might be giving his services for nothing, and still be costing the country hundreds of thousands of dollars more than if some other man were paid a fair salary for doing the work. All men cannot perform these services without remuneration and if that is to be the standard for selection for office then we may lose the services of some of the ablest Canadians. I strongly object to this retroactive legislation. I do not think it is in the interests of the country, or that there is any necessity for it. If these men were to be appointed a year ago, some provisions should have been made for them being paid, and for their salaries before their appointments took place. I submit that the Government acted unwisely in making those appointments, and a year afterwards saying: True, these members of Parliament had no right to sit in this House without going to their electorate after the date at which they were to receive salaries, but we are going to arrange all that, and provide that this law shall be retroactive. I think it is not safe to embark on such a course. We pretend to be one of the most democratic countries in the world and I believe the claim is well founded, but every time we depart from the democratic foundation of our constitution we depart from what I believe is the straight line towards that future greatness which is Canada's destiny.

It is a grave mistake to ask Parliament to declare by statute that we can give members of Parliament emolument without having them go before their electorate for re-election. By this Act we are providing that the Government of Canada shall be enlarged by three members. I am not going to argue whether that is wise or not, but I submit that all the work performed by any of these gentlemen could have been performed by them just as well without their being ministers. The work of parliamentary secretaries was discussed the other day, and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister took very strong grounds, and rightly so, I think, that the work of the parliamentary secretaries was not all confined to parliamentary work. That is true, but it must not be forgotten that they are called parliamentary secretaries for the very reason that they take the place of the minister in the House and give to the House details which the minister should not be burdened with. That is the object of parliamentary and under-secretaries, and, in order to be in a position to give that information to the House, they have to be in close touch with the business of the department. But when it is argued that the chief work of a parliamentary secretary is not performing parliamentary service in the way I have outlined I dissent. Here we are to have ministers of the Crown who are under other ministers and not under the Prime Minister.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend says no. I did not refer to the Overseas Minister being under the hon. Minister of Militia. Subsection 5 (b) of section 1 of the Bill reads:

> The Governor in Council may appoint a senator or a member of the House of Commons to be Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and such Parliamentary Secretary shall be a minister of the Crown, and shall have and perform such powers and duties as the minister may from time to time prescribe.

This is an anomoly. Here we have a minister under a minister. To the people of this country, and to members of Parliament, that will appear to be a peculiar situation for a minister to hold. Every member of the Government is directly responsible to the Prime Minister for his acts, his conduct, and the exercise of the powers given to him, but under this Bill the new parliamentary secretaries will be ministers of the Crown with all that that implies, but by statute they are going to be made subject to the minister who presides over a particular department. The minister has to prescribe their duties. The words of the section are: "And shall have and perform such powers and duties as the minister may from time to time prescribe." We have a member of the Government who is not acting directly under the Prime Minister, but under a minister who is head of a department.

For instance, the parliamentary secretary of the Department of Militia, although a minister of the Crown, is subject to and performs the work outlined by the Minister of Militia. Suppose these two ministers of the Crown should come to loggerheads? According to the principles of our constitution, of responsible government and of parliamentary practice, one minister of the Crown is as powerful as another. The parliamentary secretary having been made a minister of the Crown and receiving the emoluments pertaining to that office, may sit in council and say to the Minister of Militia: This is the way of doing it; I have a right to have it done my way, even though the statute says that I am subservient to you. Under this Act we now have three Ministers of Militia; we have the one overseas; we have the head of the Militia Department here and we have under statute a parliamentary secretary, who is a minister of the Crown, representing the Militia Department. I wonder if all this is necessary? In view of the fact that we are at war; in view of the fact that our people are bending all their energies, financial and otherwise, to the prosecution of our part in this struggle, I wonder if the Canadian electorate will think that there is any real necessity for all this machinery and intermachinery? Possibly this will happen next: An Act will be introduced to create the office of secretary to the overseas minister, the person holding that office to be also a minister of the Crown.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: At six o'clock I had almost concluded the few observations I was making on this Bill. As I am not a military expert, I cannot express any opinion as to the qualifications of General Gwatkin whom I have met only once or twice. What the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) said this afternoon struck me as a remarkable utterance. If I correctly caught what he said, he informed the House that the British Government would not recommend the appointment of General Gwatkin, then a colonel to the position he holds, and the ex-minister gave that as the reason why he did appoint General Gwatkin, because he believed he would not be interfered with. I will not attempt any criticism; it is a peculiar utterance from an ex-minister of the Crown, and it will require some explanation later.

In regard to the overseas management, it is generally conceded that there is lack of expedition in providing us with information which hon. members, and particularly those who have relatives in England or in France, are very anxious to receive. If fault there be, it is not the fault of the Militia Department here, because I want to bear testimony to the fact that the Minister of Militia, the parliamentary secretary, the deputy minister, and all the officials are, so far as I am concerned, most courteous and very prompt in affording information. It seems however, to take an interminable time to secure information from overseas. The Minister of Militia and some of the officials have once or twice undertaken to secure certain information for me, and perhaps the time required to get it may not seem long to the department overseas, but it seemed a very long time to me. If there were some way by which such information could be given to us more quickly, it would be a great convenience. When there was no minister overseas, I received information, very important to me, within 24 hours. The minister himself would cable direct to his representative overseas and back would come the answer, whereas now there seems to be any amount of red tape to prevent getting information expeditiously.

This House is asked to vote the second reading of a Bill which provides for the appointment and salary of an overseas minister who says he will not accept a salary, and for the appointment of a parliamentary secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence who also says he will not accept a salary, and for the appointment and salary of a parliamentary undersecretary of state for external affairs who tacitly admits that he has devoted part of his time to writing campaign literature. This requires some explanation which I trust will be forthcoming when the Bill is in committee.

Mr. O. TURGEON: (Gloucester): In making a few remarks on this Bill, I do not intend to indulge in personalities, or to make any reference to the hon. gentlemen affected by it. Personally, as far as those two gentlemen are concerned, they have always given me kind treatment, I can especially pay that tribute to the Parliamentary Secretary of Militia and Defence (Mr. McCurdy) in different transactions I have had with him. As to the Minister of Militia and Defence Overseas, his personal qualities will be commended by every one who knows him. I rise simply to enter my protest against the violation of the constitution which this Bill effects the moment it comes into operation. Practically every section of this Bill contains a contemplated violation of the constitution. By it we are appointing three new ministers. Section 5 B reads:

> The Governor in Council may appoint a senator or a member of the House of Commons to be Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and such Parliamentary Secretary shall be a minister of the Crown, and shall have and perform such powers and duties as the minister may from time to time prescribe.

Not only is the present Minister of Militia and Defence Overseas confirmed as a Minister of the Crown by this Bill, but these parliamentary secretaries will become ministers of the Crown, and thus the House undertakes the responsibility of appointing three ministers without their having to go back to the people for endorsation. That is a new state of affairs in this country. Our constitution has been so violated during the last few years, that this Parliament should call a halt for the short while this Parliament can possibly exist, so that the people may have an opportunity of expressing their will in the matter. I will read the section in the Bill in order that the people may know what is being done by this legislation. Section 4 says:

> Nothing in the Dominion Elections Act or in the Senate and House of Commons Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, chapters six and ten respectively, or in any other statute or law, shall render ineligible any person accepting or holding either of the said offices of Minister of Overseas Military Forces, Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, or Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him for sitting or voting therein.

It is plain that this section makes those three hon. members ministers of the Crown without the sanction of the people. Even though there may possibly have been a solitary precedent in the British Government, our position and that of the British Parliament are quite different. We are under a written constitution, every section of which must be preserved for the sake of the unity of the Dominion. One cannot possibly compare the position of this Parliament, since the expiration of its term on the 7th of October, 1916, with that of the Parliament of Great Britain, where ministers have been appointed by the score, and every one of them, except the one, has had to seek re-election. The position of the Parliament of Great Britain cannot be compared with that of this Parliament in another respect. During the war there was formed in Great Britain a national Government, representing every section of the people, which is not the case in this country. What I regret most is that this Parliament has been extended in a very unconstitutional way, and without taking the proper means to extend it. It has been stated by the Minister of Militia that these gentlemen would not accept any salary. I believe if any man in the Department of Militia and Defence has earned his salary, and has worked faithfully, the secretary for militia has performed his duty according to his conscience and worked very hard, and he deserves his salary just as much as does the Deputy Minister of Militia. Every word we hear in this country and in this House is in favour of democracy, extending democracy and saving democracy. That being so, we should not admit as a principle that a man should work without recompense. If he performs his duty he has a right to be paid. If we were to accept free the services of men who are favoured by fortune, we would soon come to the point that only men of wealth could possibly be had to administer the affairs of the country. This is against the principles of democracy and it is a dangerous principle to admit from every point of view. They say they will not accept remuneration for their services. If that be so, why present this Bill? The Bill is made retroactive so that they will have a right to their salaries from the time they have been in office, and it extends not only to the gentlemen who are to-day filling the offices, but to others who may take their places, and the guarantee we have from one or two of those hon. gentlemen that they will not accept any emolument, is not a guarantee against a future violation of the constitution. Should either Sir George Perley or Mr. McCurdy resign, other gentlemen will be appointed, and, naturally, unless you find other millionaires, these other gentlemen will have a right to their salaries. There is another feature in this Bill which appears to be even more serious. Clause 6 says:

> This Act shall continue in force during the continuance of the present war and until the end of the session of Parliament held next after the end of the said war, or, if Parliament is sitting when the war ends, then until the end of such session of Parliament.

Those hon. gentlemen will be appointed for an indefinite time—until the war is terminated. If the war should last two or three years more, their appointment will remain valid during that time. If new men come into the positions in virtue of the Act, they will remain in office for two or three years. This is against every principle of our constitution. In two months, or less, every member of this House will have to get the endorsation of the people. My right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) will himself have to go to the people for their decision as to whether he shall remain in office, yet those hon. gentlemen will be in office notwithstanding, until the end of the war and for a year or two after the war, without the people being consulted. This is not only a violation of the constitution, but the last clause particularly is simply murdering the constitution. As the term of this Parliament is very short, why put the country into this position? The hon. gentlemen in office say they do not want any salary. My suggestion would be to pay them. Parliament has the right to vote a sum of money for services rendered. Let the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance bring in a supplementary estimate for the services rendered by Sir George Perley and the Hon. Mr. McCurdy and we will vote the money gladly. It is to be regretted that the Government did not see fit to replace the High Commissionership in England immediately after the death of the last incumbent. The Government would have been in a much better position before the people if they had done so. According to my judgment, Sir George Perley would have been as good a High Commissioner as he has been a representative of the people, or, other members of the Cabinet could have been appointed to the office. So far as concerns the position of Minister of Militia Overseas, I am in thorough accord with what has been said by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I believe only one member can be appointed at the head of a department, and the minister should be in Canada, responsible to Parliament. The gentleman representing him overseas can only be there in the capacity of a deputy minister. A second deputy minister, who would be responsible to the head of the department, could have been appointed to look after the business of the department overseas. Under the circumstances and more particularly in view of clause 6, by which these gentlemen would remain in their positions notwithstanding the general election, I would strongly advise the Prime Minister that he should withdraw this Bill, and vote a sum in the supplementary estimates to recompense these hon. gentlemen for the services they have rendered.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would like to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Turgeon) that the construction he has placed upon the Act is entirely wrong. The gentlemen mentioned will, on the dissolution of Parliament, cease to be members of Parliament like the rest of us, and unless they are re-elected they naturally could not continue in their positions. It may be worth while to remind the House of the reasons why these offices were established. The Order in Council creating the ministry of the overseas service recited the unprecedented efforts that had to be made in this war; its unexpected length; the necessity for close co-operation with the British Government, and particularly the very great importance, and indeed, necessity of attaining the highest degree of efficiency with the most thorough and complete economy. Thorough co-operation with the British Government, a maximum of effort, and a maximum of economy, are the reasons set forth in the Order in Council as the considerations which led to the passing of the Order in Council establishing the overseas ministry.

[Mr. Turgeon..]

Further, it was pointed out if I remember correctly, at all events the fact was that under conditions as they existed before the overseas ministry was created, it had become necessary from time to time for the Minister of Militia and Defence to spend a considerable portion of his time in Great Britain. As a matter of fact, during the year 1916, I think the then Minister of Militia and Defence spent as much of his time in Great Britain as he did in this country. During the period in which he was attending to the affairs of his department in Great Britain, it was necessary to appoint some other minister to carry on the administration of the department in this country. The practice before the overseas minister was appointed was indeed not very different from that which has prevailed since; not very different at least in this respect that it was necessary for months at a time for the minister of the Crown charged with the responsibility for militia affairs to devote himself to duties on the other side of the Atlantic.

With respect to some of the matters to which I have alluded, the Order in Council proceeded to enact the following ordinances for the constitution of the ministry of the overseas military forces of Canada:

Ordinance for the Constitution of the Ministry of Overseas Military Forces of Canada.

1. There shall be, so long as the present European war continues and thereafter until otherwise directed by the Governor in Council, a Minister of Overseas Military Forces of Canada, who shall be charged with the control of and shall be responsible for the administration of the affairs of the military forces of Canada in the United Kingdom and on the Continent of Europe; the ordnance, arms, ammunition, armouries, stores, munitions and habiliments of war belonging to Canada in the United Kingdom and on the Continent of Europe appropriated for the use of the overseas military forces of Canada, and all expenditure incurred in the United Kingdom or elsewhere in Europe for or in respect of the overseas military forces of Canada; the aforesaid powers and duties of the administration to include without limiting their generality, all powers and duties in connection with the troops, property and expenditure aforesaid heretofore exercised by or charged upon the Minister of Militia and Defence

2. The minister shall for the convenience of administration, and in order to expedite the transaction of the business with which he is charged, ordinarily reside and discharge his duties in London, and in urgent matters of importance which would generally be subject to consideration and direction, upon the minister's report, by the Governor in Council, the minister may, if the time or means for communication do not admit of antecedent authority from the Governor in Council, sanction provisionally such measures as may seem to him advisable, subject, however, to report and the confirmation of the minister's action by the Governor in Council.

3. The minister shall moreover be charged with the negotiations on the part of the Government of Canada, as occasion may require, with His Majesty's Government, in all matters connected with the Government, command and disposition of the overseas forces of Canada, and such arrangements as may be advisable for co-ordinating their operations and services with those of His Majesty's troops, and generally for the purpose of utilizing the overseas forces of Canada in the most effective manner for the purpose of the war.

4. The minister shall moreover execute such further powers and perform such other duties as may be from time to time conferred upon or assigned to him by the Governor in Council.

5. The minister may for the purposes aforesaid establish such organization as may be found necessary and adequate, and he may, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, appoint such officers and clerks to assist in the work of ministry as he deems necessary, with such grades in the Civil Service of Canada as may be prescribed, and such officers and clerks shall not be subject to examination under the Civil Service Act.'

6. There may be an advisory council, consisting of such members as the Governor in Council may appoint, to advise the minister as to matters relating to the affairs and property hereby committed to his administration.

7. All recommendations of the minister for submission to the Governor in Council shall be transmitted through the President of the Privy Council.

8. Until Parliament otherwise provides the minister shall hold his office, commission or employment without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emolument or other profit of any kind attached thereto.

It will be observed, that the Minister of the Overseas Forces has no power of organization or appointment except with the approval of the Governor in Council, unless it be provisional, and then it must be finally approved and confirmed by Order in Council. Therefore, when it is suggested, as it was by the hon. member (Sir Sam Hughes) that the increase in the staff of the Overseas Ministry is anything like what he states, I can only say that he is absolutely misinformed, and I intend to establish that fact upon the official report of the Minister of Overseas Service. It would be impossible for that minister to so increase the staff without the approval of the Governor in Council, and the approval of the Governor in Council has not been given to any such condition as the hon. member (Sir Sam Hughes) represented.

The order in council which established the Ministry of the Overseas Forces was passed on the 28th day of October, 1916. The office of Parliamentary Under Secretary of the Militia Department had been previously established, on the 15th day of July, 1916. The order in council establishing that office recited the increased duties of the Minister of Militia and Defence owing to the war, that his duties frequently occasioned his absence from the seat of Government, and that during his absence it was necessary to appoint some other minister to discharge his duties. The conclusion was reached that it would be desirable to establish the office of Parliamentary Secretary who could assist the Minister of Militia and Defence and, within certain limits act for him during his absence. The Ordinance which established the office of Parliamentary Secretary is as follows:

1. During the continuance of the present war the Governor in Council may from time to time appoint a Senator or a Member of the House of Commons to be Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence;

2. The Parliamentary Secretary shall, with respect to the Department of Militia and Defence, perform such Parliamentary duties as may from time to time be assigned to him by the Governor in Council.

3. The Parliamentary Secretary shall ex officio be a member of the Militia Council and in the absence of the minister he shall act as chairman thereof.

4. In the absence of the minister from Ottawa, the Parliamentary Secretary shall preside over and administer the Department of Militia and Defence, but he shall not make any change in the policy of the department without the authority of the Governor in Council.

5. In the absence of the Minister of Militia and Defence, and subject to the approval of the Prime Minister, the Parliamentary Secretary shall have authority to report to and make recommendations to the Governor in Council through the Prime Minister;

6. The Parliamentary Secretary shall perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Governor in Council;

7. Until Parliament otherwise provide, the Parliamentary Secretary shall hold his office, commission or employment without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emolument or other profit of any kind attached thereto.

The ordinance establishing the office of Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs was approved on the 16th day of July, 1916, and it recited the increased demands upon the time and energies of the Prime Minister through the conditions created by the war.

It is as follows:

Regulations respecting the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for External Affairs.

1. During the continuance of the present war the Governor in Council may from time to time appoint a Senator or a member of the House of Commons to be Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for External Affairs.

2. The Parliamentary Under Secretary shall, with respect to the Department of External Affairs, perform such Parliamentary duties as may from time to time be assigned to him by the Governor in Council.

3. The Parliamentary Under Secretary shall, subject to such instructions as may from time to time be issued by competent authority assist the Prime Minister in administering the Department of External Affairs, and may, subject to the approval of the Prime Minister, conduct such official communications between the Government of Canada and the Government of any other country in connection with the external affairs of Canada, and perform such other duties in the said department as from time to time may be directed.

4. In the absence of the Prime Minister, the Parliamentary Under Secretary shall, subject to the direction and approval of the Acting Prime Minister for the time being, preside over and administer the Department of External Affairs; and in such case he shall have authority to report to and make recommendations to the Governor in Council through the Acting Prime Minister.

5. Until Parliament otherwise provide, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for External Affairs shall hold his office, commission or employment without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emolument or other profit of any kind attached thereto.

(Signed) Rololphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

In the discussion upon the resolution, I went pretty fully into the necessity for these offices, and I have very little to add. It is perfectly manifest that the affairs of the overseas forces require constant and unremitting care and attention. The very fact that the Minister of Militia and Defence was obliged every year to spend a considerable portion of his time in Great Britain is the best evidence that some system other than that which had prevailed in the past was absolutely necessary if we were to secure, first, perfect co-operation of effort with the British Government; second, the greatest possible efficiency of our troops, and, third, the most thorough economy in administration. That was the purpose of this appointment, which purpose, I think, fully justifies it.

The office of parliamentary secretary of Militia and Defence was established before the Overseas Ministry was created. It is, even since the establishment of that ministry, a very necessary office. The proper conduct of our military affairs, with more than 400,000 men enlisted, with 330,000 men or thereabouts, dispatched overseas, with need for the constant vigilance and attention of every one officially connected with the administration of military affairs, fully justifies the continuance of the office after the Overseas Ministry was established.

I have already said that the work of the Department of External Affairs increased beyond what any one could imagine who had not been closely in touch from day to day with it. I venture to say that the work of that department has increased twentyfold since the outbreak of war. I think that hon. gentlemen in this House will credit me with the desire to put all my time and energies into the discharge of the duties of my office; yet, I repeat what I said on the discussion of the resolution: that my only regret is that I did not establish that office a year or two ago.

We provided in those Orders in Council that none of these offices should have attached to it any salary or emolument until Parliament should determine that the proposed salary or emolument might properly attach. It is clear that the salary we are proposing is a reasonable one. The salary attached to the office of the Minister of Overseas Military Affairs is precisely the same as is fixed by statute for other ministers of the Crown. As far as the parliamentary secretaries, are concerned we had no precedent in this country, and we fixed upon $5,000 per annum, which is the salary payable to the permanent head of the department. I am entirely within the judgment of the House when I say that I do not think the salary thus fixed could be regarded as excessive.

My hon. friend (Mr. Graham), and I think also the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), spoke of the salary, and I could not gather precisely from the remarks of either gentleman just what he proposed. On the one hand, they said it was undesirable that an office should be established without having a salary attached to it, because they declared that otherwise only men of wealth could assume such an office. I entirely agree with that, and it is for that reason that we have attached salaries to these offices. But then, almost in the same breath, they go on to argue that the men who are holding these offices should not be entitled to a salary. Their arguments are thus absolutely inconsistent. I hold that it is proper that salaries should be attached to these offices, and for the very reason cited by the hon. member for Rouville and by the hon. member for South Renfrew, that the choice may not be restricted to those who are able to accept them without salary or emolument. As to the acceptance of the salary or emolument, and the disposition of it after it has been paid, that is not a matter for the House or for the public; it must rest with the judgment of the gentleman who holds the office.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) referred to the fact that in the sections of the Bill which establishes the office of Under Secretary of External Affairs, and the office of Parliamentary Secretary of Militia and Defence, the secretaries are spoken of as ministers of the Crown. That language is entirely the work of the Parliamentary Counsel, to whom I entrusted the duty of preparing the resolution and also of preparing the legislation based upon it. I have not had an opportunity since six o'clock of full discussion with him in regard to it, but he informs me that in using this language he followed British precedent; that parliamentary secretaries in Great Britain are technically ministers of the Crown, and that therefore he thought it desirable to employ that language.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Are they members of the Cabinet?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are not. My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) apparently thought that both parliamentary secretaries were members of the Privy Council, but that is not so, and they do not attend the deliberations of the Privy Council. I shall give my attention to the report which the parliamentary counsel will make to me, as to the advisability of using the expression "Minister of the Crown" in this legislation.

The only other point upon which I desire to say a word is the suggestion that those gentlemen should not retain their seats in Parliament after acceptance of office with the proposed salaries. I should like to submit to hon. gentlemen that it would have been folly for us to appoint a Minister of the Overseas Service to discharge the important duties which are set out in this order in council, and then to bring him at once to Canada for two, or perhaps three months, in order that he might engage in the delights of a contested election. It seems to me this is about the last course that any reasonable man would have expected the Government to take. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I never thought for one moment, of taking any such course. In the interests of this country, in the interests of our overseas forces, and especially in the interests of the men who are fighting at the front, is it not better that the Minister of the Overseas Forces should be discharging the duties of his office, where they could best be discharged, rather than that his time should be occupied in running an election in this country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is only one answer to that question, and I have no apology to make for the proposal that I am now placing before Parliament. It is not only a reasonable proposal, but the only proposal that I could or should make, and we have ample precedent for it on the other side of the water. When Mr. Asquith formed the first coalition government in the spring of 1915, not a single member accepting office in the Government was called upon to go to the people. I have in my hand the statute, passed on the 18th December, 1916. under which the ministers of the Crown in Great Britain to-day hold their seats in Parliament. It reads:

> 1. Notwithstanding anything in any Act, a member of the House of Commons shall not vacate his seat by reason only of his acceptance, at any time during the months of December, 1916, and January, 1917, of an office of profit, if that office is an office the holder of which is by law capable of being elected to, or sitting or voting in, that House.

So that in December, 1916, and January, 1917, in the exigencies of this war, and in order that the King's Government might be carried on without interruption, it was provided that some twenty-five or thirty gentlemen holding seats in the House of Commons, whose seats under ordinary circumstances would have been vacated by the acceptance of office, should not vacate those seats, although they accepted office. It is upon that principle (acted upon on these two occasions to an infinitely greater degree than anything that is proposed here) that I am asking the House to enact that, notwithstanding the fact that these gentlemen are members of the House of Commons, they may accept the salary which is now proposed, without its being held that they vacated their seats in this House, or that they thereby became ineligible for sitting or voting in the House of Commons. And when the hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) refers to the United States and Great Britain as the only two great democracies of the world that have existed for more than a hundred years, I should like to point out that he destroys his contention that the enactment of this legislation creates an autocracy. I cannot see anything in this legislation which tends, in the least, to the creation of an autocracy, but if the United States be one of the great free democracies of the world, as undoubtedly it is, every hon. gentleman who knows anything of the constitution of that country knows that the members of the Government of the United States do not sit in the Congress at all. They do not require to run an election, or to go to the people for a mandate. We are not departing from any principle of the constitution, because there is nothing in the British North America Act that touches this matter one way or the other, so far as I remember. We are departing, to this limited extent, from the provisions of chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, but we are following a very good precedent in British practice.

Sir SAM HUGHES: This arrangement continues only to the end of the present war?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes. The hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) went into a long story, in which he was very much astray in his facts, as to Sir George Perley. Sir George Perley went across the ocean to discharge the duties of High Commissioner in June, 1914. My hon. friend refers to his having travelled backward and forward several times since. He has been back only once since, and that was during last year. The rest of the time he has been discharging the duties of High Commissioner, and, during the past eight or ten months, the duties of Minister of the Overseas Service. Some other hon. gentleman took the ground that we should have, in the position of Minister Overseas, a man of military experience. The Minister of Militia and Defence here in Canada, or the Minister of Overseas Service in Great Britain does not require to be a man of military experience. It is a civil office, just like any other office in the Government. Lord Derby, Minister of War in Great Britain, is not a professional soldier, so far as I am aware, nor do I know that the Minister of Militia and Defence in any of the great dominions of the Empire is a man of military experience.

The discussion which has taken place with regard to General Gwatkin is very largely irrelevant, because he is not under the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Overseas Service, but under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Militia and Defence here. So far as I know anything of General Gwatkin, he is very capable and very industrious, and I certainly never heard until to-day that the British Government declined to recommend him for the position which he now holds. I know that in September or October of 1916 he was very anxious, indeed, to be returned for duty to Great Britain, and he practically insisted upon the acceptance of his resignation at that time. Moreover, it should be borne in mind that, as far as the training of troops in this country is concerned, we have had two inspectors-general: General Lessard and General John Hughes. Besides this, every training camp in Canada has been under the direction of the most experienced and competent officer we could find who is on the spot all the time. I cannot enumerate all, but I remember a few of them at the moment: General Wilson, who was at Valcartier; General Logie, whom I met at Niagara and who was afterwards, I think, at Camp Borden; General McLean, and others.

The overseas command is vested at present in General Turner, who commands all our troops in Great Britain. I am sure that no hon. gentleman in this House would think for a moment of questioning either the experience or the ability of General Turner. He has made a distinguished name for himself not only in this war but in South Africa as well. I am in a position to state, so far as all military matters are concerned, that Sir George Perley acts by the advice of General Turner, with whom he is in constant consultation.

There was some suggestion that Sir George Perley desired greatly to have the position of Minister of the Over-9 p.m. seas Service. I should like to disabuse the minds of every member of this House on that question. Sir George Perley did not desire that position; he accepted it only at my urgent request. It imposes upon him very onerous and severe duties; and those duties he has discharged, in my opinion, with great ability.

Some hon. gentleman suggested that if there was to be a Minister of Overseas Service we should appoint General Turner. General Turner has direction of all military affairs and he fills his office with very great ability indeed. But if we should appoint General Turner, then, according to the arguments to which we have listened this afternoon, we should immediately require General Turner to come back to Canada and spend two or three months here for the purpose of running an election, instead of attending to his duties overseas. The very suggestion seems to show the lack of force, to use a very mild term, in the argument which has been put forward in that respect.

Reference has been made, also to the fact that this statute is to be regarded as retroactive. I could not come to Parliament before Parliament was in session for the purpose of having this legislation enacted. When Parliament did assemble we advanced the date of the session for the reason that I had to leave on a very important mission for Great Britain. There was not time or opportunity to bring the resolution down at that time, but as soon as I returned in May last I had it placed on the Order paper. Under the circumstances it seems to me that the course which I took is not susceptible of the slightest criticism. I think, therefore, that the Bill is entitled to the support and approval of hon. members in this House, and that, in the conditions under which it is presented, there ought to be no criticism of the principle embodied in it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can my hon. friend give the dates of the respective appointments and the amounts of the emoluments?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The emoluments are at the rate of $7,000 a year in the one case and $5,000 a year in the other.

Mr. LEMIEUX: For how many years in the case of Sir George Perley?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Since he took office. In the case of the Minister of the Overseas Military Forces, from the 31st day of October, 1916; in the case of the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, from the 19th day of July, 1916; in the case of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, from the 21st day of October, 1916. These were the dates upon which these gentlemen were sworn into office.

Motion agreed to, on division, and Bill read the second time.

The House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Appointment of Minister of Overseas Military Forces.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Section 1 will stand until we see the report of the Parliamentary Counsel as to the use of the words "minister of the Crown."

Section stands.

On section 2—Appointment of Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This section also will stand, for the same reason.

Section stands.

On section 3—Salaries.

Mr. PROULX: The Prime Minister has said that the under-secretaries would not get the salary of the heads of departments. The under-secretary, however, gets sessional indemnity besides the salary here set forth.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: Evidently that was not taken into consideration.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Oh, yes, we took that into consideration.

Mr. PROULX: Then the amount of remuneration is more than the salary of the heads of the departments.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: For the performance of official duties, it is the same.

Mr. PROULX: If the two are added together, the amount of remuneration is $2,500 more than the salary of the heads of the department.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The $2,500 is supposed to be an indemnity, not a salary.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there to be any provision for the salaries of persons who may be necessary in connection with the organization of the ministry overseas? Is it intended to provide for any statutory officials to act in conjunction with the minister?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that my hon. friend refers, for instance, to a deputy minister. There is a deputy minister; Colonel Walter Gow, of Toronto, is appointed to that office. That is authorized by Order in Council. The ordinance which created this office permits the Minister of Overseas Service to make recommendation to the Governor in Council for the appointment of any persons necessary for the organization of his department. I am not aware at the moment of any new official in important position except Col. Walter Gow, Colonel McRae who was Quartermaster General, General Foster, who was head of the Army Medical Service, Colonel Thacker who was Adjutant General, and Colonel Ross of Montreal, who was made Paymaster General, were all acting at the time Sir George Perley was appointed.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Colonel Thacker was not appointed at the time Sir George Perley was appointed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Where was he?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Heaven knows. Neither was Colonel Gow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I explained that.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are creating a new department overseas, and we are leaving to the minister of that department, by Order in Council, through the Government of the day, to appoint such officials as are necessary in the department. I presume what has occurred is this: that since Sir George Perley was made Minister of Militia Overseas, last autumn, a number of officials have been appointed under his recommendation, who will go to make up the personnel of the official staff. It would be desirable if the Prime Minister, before the Bill comes back to committee, would give a statement showing exactly who those officials are. There are also a large number of people, whom the ex-minister spoke about last week when I was not here, who are employed in connection with the administration of affairs by Sir George Perley as Minister of Militia Overseas. It is desirable that the House and the country should know how many of those men attached to that department do purely civil work and how many of them do military work. I understand from the Prime Minister that General Turner is in command of the military side of the department, and there will, of course, be, just the same as there are here, a number of officials whose duties are purely civil, that is to say, who will look after certain matters which a man need not have military experience to look after. Then there are a large number of people who are attached to the department for military purposes. Where is the line drawn, and who are those who are attached to the department in connection with civil matters?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We can, without any difficulty, secure the information for which my hon. friend asks.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My right hon. friend is rather severe about a remark I made on this subject. He stated a moment ago that I had made a rash statement, but he will pardon me if I am under the impression that this is a breach of our Parliamentary constitution. I always understood that the moment a member of this House became interested in a contract or in receipt of emolument, from that very moment, according to time-honoured practice of British parliamentary institutions, he had to resign and seek re-election. It is true the right hon. gentleman states that, as we are at war, it would not be the proper thing to compel Sir George Perley, the new Minister of Militia Overseas, to spend three months running for election. Does the right hon. gentleman not think, after having spoken of my humble self as making rash statements, that he has been rather overreaching himself? I am quite sure it would not have been difficult for Sir George Perley to be re-elected, possibly by acclamation, as it is the practice with new ministers—with the exception of the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny) last winter. It is true the latter was not elected by acclamation, but the election campaign took only a month, and he was re-elected. All the other ministers, the late Mr. Casgrain, Mr. Patenaude, and the ministers who preceded them in the Cabinet went back before their electors, and there was no difficulty about their re-election. Most of them were elected by acclamation.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Was not the Minister of Militia in Canada (Sir Edward Kemp) also elected by acclamation?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly. My hon. friend (Sir Edward Kemp), who protested some months ago that there never was a truce in Canada since the war began, was elected by acclamation in the good old city of Toronto. Nobody thought, during the war, of opposing his election, and if an opposition was made to the election of the Minister of Inland Revenue, it was for good and just reasons. I am sincere in renewing my protest, because I believe that the right hon. gentleman is creating a dangerous precedent.

When the Hon. Timothy Anglin was Speaker of the House, because the paper with which he was connected had received a few dollars' worth of advertising, he was obliged to resign while he held the Speakership and to go before his electors. The late Senator Corby, if I mistake not—and my right hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong—who was a member of this House when I was elected in 1896, was obliged, because a few gallons of methylated spirits had been sold from his distillery to one of the departments to return to his electors. There are many other precedents. Yet here is Sir George Perley appointed Overseas Minister of Militia and voted a salary by this House, and he retains his seat in Parliament. It has been stated by my right hon. friend that Sir George Perley will refuse to accept the salary, and I am sure that will prove to be the case, but Parliament grants a salary to Sir George Perley and he should obey the constitutional rule. We are appointing two secretaries, one of whom it is true says he will not accept an emolument, and by a stroke of the pen we enact that they may not return to their electors. My right hon. friend may think I am rash; he may think I am simple; but in my opinion it is one of the precious privileges of the British constitution that no member of the House of Commons can take an office of emolument until he first seeks re-election.

This is a time-honoured practice, and I wish to protest most strenuously against the precedent now created.

Why make this legislation retroactive? It has been the practice of the House to frown upon retroactive legislation, because it is unjust, unfair, and against parliamentary precedent. In this case we are asked to ignore the usual practice. The other day I asked my right hon. friend if Sir George Perley, who is a minister of the Crown, but practically irresponsible to this Parliament, inasmuch as we never see him in the House of Commons, had made any reports, or written any letters, or made any recommendations and the right hon. gentleman answered in the affirmative. I asked that those reports, letters, and recommendations be laid on the table of the House, to this the right hon. gentleman did not make a rash answer, but he made an evasive answer—he would inquire, he would see, he would consider. As this is a new department, it seems to me Parliament is entitled to know the scheme of its organization; the number of its officials, their qualifications, and their jurisdiction. We ought to have a report of this minister, as we have from every responsible minister of the Crown. We are told the overseas Minister for Militia and Defence has been acting as such since 1916. It is now 1917, and we have no report from Sir George Perley, except the information that he has suppressed the second report of Dr. Bruce. We are entitled to know what have been the activities of the new minister overseas. My right hon. friend should bring before the committee the information asked by my hon. friend from Pictou, and at the same time the information I am now seeking. Meanwhile this clause should stand.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think the matters to which my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) alludes have any special relevancy to this clause or to any other. With respect to what he has said in regard to the statute being retroactive, I would like to point out that the English statute I quoted was retroactive in the same sense. It was passed on December 18th, 1916, but inasmuch as some of the ministers had accepted office in the meantime, and would therefore without this statute have vacated their seats in Parliament, it was provided in subsection 3 of section 1:

> This Act shall be deemed to have had effect as from the first day of December, 1916.

Because ministers had taken office in the meantime it was necessary to guard against the vacation of their seats, so the Act was made to relate not to the 18th day of December, when it was passed, but to the first day of December.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am sure the right hon. gentleman will not contend that there is a parity between the two cases. I have no recollection of the Asquith Government having made use of this new legislation, but in the case of the Lloyd George Government I know that the rule, or the practice, or the custom, was suspended, and the ministers were not obliged to seek re-election. Surely my right hon. friend will not say that the condition here is analogous. There was a crisis in England. The whole world was awaiting with anxiety the formation of that new government. For a few hours, or a few days, the affairs of the British Empire were paralyzed on account of that ministerial crisis. It was the climax of one of the greatest parliamentary crises that ever arose in the British Empire, and for that reason the common sense people of England understood perfectly well that they could depart from the time-honoured practice. I will not say there is not a crisis here, because we all know the Government is moving in troubled waters just now. At the same time there is no ministerial crisis in the sense I have just indicated. Sir George Perley has been in England since 1916, acting as Overseas Minister, and nothing to require this legislation has ruffled the surface of political events in Canada. The gentlemen who are to be under-secretaries have been in the House of Commons, and they have had repeated occasions to return to their electors if they were to be recipients of these emoluments. In the British case, it was by reason of a great Imperial crisis, but in this case I am afraid it is only the payment of a political debt. Without in any way disparaging the new appointees, I look around me and see many gentlemen who have been as faithful followers as good fighters, and as good parliamentarians as the three gentlemen who have been selected as advisors of His Majesty in the Borden Government. I see my good friend from Perth North (Mr. Morphy); I see my good friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards); I see my silent friend from Algoma (Mr. Boyce)—all old and tried members of the House. Why were they not selected? They were just as much entitled to that recognition as the three gentlemen who have been chosen. Sir George Perley is a millionaire. He would have been well satisfied with being a minister without portfolio.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy) and the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Clark) are comparatively new members of the House. There are old and tried members of the Conservative party who might as well be selected. The hon. member for Bruce admitted this afternoon that he was having a good time writing political pamphlets and preparing campaign literature.

Mr. GLASS: No, he did not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Surely the Prime Minister will not, under the very trying circumstances through which Canada is passing, vote out of the moneys of the people $5,000 to a gentleman who spends his time preparing political literature.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, I would not have put myself to the trouble of saying anything further on this question had it not been for the references made by speakers here to-day to General Gwatkin. I would not have brought up now any question with regard to General Gwatkin had it not been that during the recess of the House for the dinner hour I learned that for upwards of two years a systematic effort has been made in certain quarters to win credit for the work that I have done and to deprive me of my rights in regard to carrying on the important work in connection with the war.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Louder, please.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I beg pardon.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Louder.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know what you are saying.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Speak louder.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I wish to say, in regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) in his speech to-day that I never directly or indirectly conveyed to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) any statement in connection with General Gwatkin. I will not enter into the discussion of the General Gwatkin matter other than to say that his actions were such from the constitutional viewpoint that I had to submit a statement to the Prime Minister to prevent any of my officers, under pain of dismissal, from reporting, to any one, without my authority, matters that transpired in the Militia Council to any one, no matter how distinguished an officer he might be. That was accepted as a proper principle. I shall not refer to it further; the Prime Minister knows to what I am alluding. I found myself thwarted in very many ways. When General Mackenzie was there he arrogated to himself the absolute right to carry on the training of the troops in this country, to lay down the syllabus of the training course, and to adhere to it without reference to the Minister of Militia. The minister had nothing to say. That matter was very quickly rectified. I do not want to deprecate officers like General Mackenzie and General Gwatkin, but they have had opportunity of testing themselves on the level with our Canadian boys who have gone to the front and in every solitary instance the soldiers and officers who have been sent from Canada have measured up and have shown themselves to be infinitely superior to the men under whom they would have been serving overseas if it had not been that I insisted that we should have our own officers to carry on this work. Now, just a word in connection with General Gwatkin and the training of the troops. He had nothing to do with the training at Valcartier, or with the system, for that is something for which I myself claim credit. I gave the matter my personal attention. The first troops were trained entirely under my system and in almost every instance under my own personal supervision and by myself. They were the finest troops in the Empire, and they proved themselves to be the finest troops in the world.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) to my having taken trips backwards and forwards across the country. I am happy to say that I could name nearly every officer of the rank of captain and upwards and recognize him when I met him. I can do so even to-day. I assumed the responsibility of saying that when the lives of our fellows were being placed in the hands of others the men in charge should, as far as possible, be the best men obtainable for the jobs, and I took the responsibility of carrying that out. I challenge the world to show where, in any instance, I gave any reports to the press, or advertised myself. It is true I did some things that even the newspapers, subsidized as many of them are, recognized and noticed.

What about the hon. member for Calgary? I had the honour of visiting his city two or three years ago. I purposed visiting Lethbridge on this day. The storm had made it impossible to go to Lethbridge, and at Medicine Hat I changed route and went on to Calgary. I reached Calgary at twelve o'clock and I was met on the platform by an officer of the Canadian Club. He asked me if I would address the Canadian Club. Nobody knew I was coming, as I had not communicated with any one excepting Colonel Cruikshank. When I was asked to address the club I said that there was no time. Notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member for Calgary, being a friend, and all that sort of thing, and, I presume, desiring to assist me, had removed his person from any possibility of meeting me and was passing around the town asking his friends to absent themselves, I had the honour of addressing the largest Canadian Club meeting ever held in the city of Calgary and that after only two and a half hours' notice. That night in the hon. gentleman's own city I had the honour of addressing 5,000 people assembled in a large building with the thermometer at the zero point all evening. I have received thousands of invitations to advertise myself, if I wanted to. I have received upwards of 2,000 invitations to speak in Canada within the year and nearly as many to speak in the United States. I have not accepted them. But my good friend (Mr. R. B. Bennett) constituted himself the head of the National Service Commission and, with the Prime Minister perambulated through this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If I were in that hon. gentleman's place, I would never be found insulting the intelligence of the Dominion House of Commons by standing up in my place and addressing them on any subject. This is the gentleman who made such an exhibition of himself and who was such a failure as the head of the National Service Commission which has been wasting the country's money in thousands and tens of thousands of dollars perambulating up and down the country. He wound up with a meeting in the great Massey Hall in the city of Toronto. Not content with having that hall, he arranged for an overflow meeting in the great Metropolitan church and for another in the Orange hall adjoining. He is the hon. gentleman who has brought bad luck to every undertaking, every interest, every man with whom he has been associated. When the night came for the meeting in the great city of Toronto only two-thirds of Massey hall was filled and the meeting was carried out by rushing an order out to the barracks and rounding up 2,000 or 3,000 troops at the last minute to make a quorum. There was no meeting at all in the great Metropolitan church and the doors of the Orange hall were not even opened. This hon. gentleman stands as the head of a commission that for nine months held up the boys in the trenches. There never was an institution in Canada that had as loyal support from the people as had this gentleman and his commission. We were all doing our best for him. He stands as having been the head of the greatest failure that ever occurred in the public life of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The question seems to be largely one of salaries, that is as to the Bill being retroactive. The House and the country were informed, when these gentlemen took office, that they were not to receive any salary, and as a result of that the election was dispensed with. If they do not require the salary for the months that are past, then there can be no good reason why the well-known rule should not be observed now, and why they should not go to the country and be ratified by the electors in the usual way. It is altogether for the purpose of giving a salary to these hon. gentlemen for the past months that this retroactive feature is necessary in the Bill. If the Prime Minister would decide to dispense with the payment of salaries for the time that has passed, there would be no necessity of this feature to which so much objection is taken.

The point may be taken that an Overseas Minister will only create disputes and confusion. That has been the experience so far. The Department of Militia was running along smoothly, so far as I can learn, up to the time when the Overseas Minister was appointed. Then the position was divided into two and friction developed, and many of the troubles that have arisen in that department since that date were caused by there being two heads—and we are now proposing to have a third. The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) has pointed out more than once that the Minister Overseas has been a very expensive man, that he has appointed a very large number of officials, who were unnecessary, according to the statement of the ex-minister. He told us some days ago that a staff of 50 men were doing the work prior to Sir George Perley's appointment, and that that number has since been increased to 1,200. No explanation has been given of that enormous increase. We have had no explanation of the reckless character of this gentleman who is our Overseas Minister. Before the Bill passes we should have a full statement of the names of all the officials appointed by the Overseas Minister, with the salary paid to each. That makes the Bill a serious one.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not go into details of the matter, but by establishing a new ministry overseas all the offices here, such as that of deputy minister, Quartermaster General, and so on, have been duplicated, and so these extra people have been employed. That is owing to the existence of the office.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That means a very serious additional expense to the country. The duties of an officer overseas would seem to be of a military character; the direction of civil affairs in connection with the war comes from this side. The Prime Minister has told us that the Minister Overseas has not power to make appointments, and that anything of special importance is referred to the Government. The Prime Minister has not explained why he has decided to ignore the constitution. The fact that it is inconvenient for Sir George Perley to cross the Atlantic to run an election is not a sufficient reason. We have 14 or 15 other ministers who could represent Sir George Perley in his constituency. The candidate does not need to be present. The Prime Minister has not explained why the under-secretaries do not appeal to the electors for ratification. Even if it would be inconvenient for Sir George Perley, it would not be for the under-secretaries, and the House should have a fuller explanation when we are asked to take an important departure and to violate the usual election law and the constitution. The Prime Minister has given no reason for the under-secretaries not being re-elected.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Parliamentary Counsel informs me that in Great Britain the parliamentary secretaries do not have to go up for re-election. In this case, and especially during the war, I thought it desirable to insert this clause for greater precaution, particualrly as our statute is not in precisely the same language as the British statute.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do they get any salary in England?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are not ministers of the Crown, are they?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are. The distinction in Great Britain is that they are supposed to be appointed by the minister under whom they serve, and therefore, not being appointed by the Crown, they do not have to go back for re-election because they do not hold offices of emolument in the technical sense required by the British statute.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Our parliamentary secretaries are appointed by the Crown, and are made ministers of the Crown. It is a departure which I think is not a wise one, nor is it justified by the condition. I do not think the Prime Minister should be so frightened of the electors as to take such a course as this. I do not think it will be popular in the country. The fact that the under-secretary in Great Britain is appointed by the minister may be a reason why he should not have to appeal to the electors. But we are here introducing a new system, and I do not say it is a bad system. Both sides have on various occasions discussed this question, and it has met with a good deal of approval. But, now that we are embarking on it, I think we should follow the constitution, and require under-secretaries, appointed by the Crown to hold the position of minister of the Crown, to go to their electors.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are making a temporary arrangement, to last only during the war, and I thought, under war conditions, it was a very proper proposal to lay before Parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As a corollary of this, the Solicitor General was obliged to go before the electors, and he was not then a member of the Cabinet. He was in receipt of the same emolument as the under-secretaries will receive, and yet he was obliged to seek re-election.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The statute requires it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why not in this case?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have explained that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that, before the House is asked to pass the section providing for the salaries of overseas ministers, the Prime Minister owes it to the committee to make some inquiry in regard to the statement which has been made by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). He has made the statement, which I am sure, will surprise the country very greatly: that the Militia Department in England at the present time has upwards of 1,200 people in its employ, whereas, previous to the overseas minister being appointed, General Carson did just as effective and thorough work, and rendered just as much service to the country, with a staff of fifty or sixty.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Just as much work?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just as much necessary work, yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The same work?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That, I take it, is the statement.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does the hon. gentleman believe that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have that statement. It is an extraordinary increase from fifty or sixty people, doing all necessary work under General Carson, in England, for a period of upwards of two years, efficiently, without any complaint so far as I have ever heard, and the statement will startle the country that the number of employees has been increased under Sir George Perley up to 1,200. It may be necessary. I do not know enough about the details to know whether it is necessary or not, but it strikes me as very extraordinary, and if the statement can be explained, I think we should have the explanation. The Prime Minister should inform the committee as to whether or not there are to-day, in the employ of the Militia Department under Sir George Perley, in the vicinity of 1,200 people. If there has been an increase, we are entitled to know the reasons for it.

With regard to the provision in the Bill that those gentlemen who are to be appointed under-secretaries, as well as the gentleman who is to be appointed Minister of Overseas Service, should not be required to get an expression of confidence from the electorate, I think it is very desirable to consider why the requirement was placed in the Elections Act. It is in order that the people in this democracy shall be afforded an opportunity of expressing their approval, or otherwise, of the appointment which has been made. The theory is that whenever any person is appointed a minister of the Crown, or appointed to any office where he is in receipt of a salary, he cannot be permitted to continue a member of the House of Commons without going to the people for approval of the choice which the Government has made in his case. Why should there be any difference in the case of these three gentlemen? I am unable to see why there should be a distinction. I was surprised that my right hon. friend rather invoked the United States constitution as a justification for his course. He said: The members of the Government in the United States do not occupy seats in the Congress at all. It has long been the boast of the people of this country that, although we have a Sovereign reigning over the Empire, and although the Governor General is the representative of the Sovereign, yet Canada is very much more democratic than the United States, and one evidence of the fact is that our law provides that when a man receives an appointment, he shall go back to the people, get in touch with the people, and be approved by them before he can take his seat in Parliament. I see no reason why that democratic principle should be violated, and I think the provision doing away with the necessity of these gentlemen resigning their seats and going to the people should be struck out of the Bill. We have in the law relating to the independence of Parliament the provision that if a man takes any minor office, if he becomes even a country postmaster, he must at once resign his seat. He cannot continue to sit in Parliament, if he holds any office and is in receipt of any emolument. The same law provides that he shall not be allowed to take his seat in the House of Commons, unless his appointment receives the approval of the people. I quite agree with the hon. members who have argued, on these grounds, that the Bill is exceedingly objectionable, and that these provisions doing away with the ordinary law bearing upon the subject, in reference to the right of the people to pass upon these appointments, should not be adopted by the committee.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What my hon. friend has said in regard to the information respecting the alleged employment of a very large number of persons in England beyond the number previously employed is quite reasonable. I shall be prepared with an explanation before the Bill receives its third reading. In fact, I should have asked for specific and definite information by cable before this, but I have been very much engaged in other matters, and it passed from my mind. I gave instructions this morning to cable to Sir George Perley, and I expect soon to obtain the information the hon. gentleman asks for. I do not know whether the hon. member was here when I referred to the Order in Council creating this office?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That Order in Council requires the authority of council for the purpose mentioned; and based on that consideration, and knowing what has been done in that regard, I reached the conclusion, which I still entertain, that my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) was misinformed as to the alleged excess of employees which he mentions. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) misunderstood my allusion to the United States. The United States was spoken of by the hon. member (Sir Sam Hughes) as one of the two great free democracies which had survived for over one hundred years, and, in the same breath, he said that the Bill created an autocracy, because these three ministers were not required to go back, during the war, for re-election. I merely pointed out in passing, by way of illustration, that United States ministers are not required to go to the country for election at all, and, therefore, it does not seem to be a necessary condition, if we grant the premises as laid down, namely, that they are one of the two great free nations, and an exemplar of the highest form of democracy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend, perhaps, heard the Minister of Militia also state that Sir George Perley is occupying in the city of London some five or six buildings. The statement is very specific. I remember when my right hon. friend used to inform the House that there was no man whose statements were more to be relied upon than the ex-Minister of Militia.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think I have heard my hon. friend say the same thing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have heard my right hon. friend say that the ex-Minister of Militia, when he was performing the duties of Minister of Militia, was one of the great military geniuses of the country, a gentleman whose word could always be relied upon. Well, the Minister of Militia, as a responsible member of this Parliament, has made the statement that five or six buildings in the city of London to-day are occupied by the enormous staff with which Sir George Perley has surrounded himself. My right hon. friend says Sir George Perley could not have done that. The ex-Minister of Militia says that he has done it. It is not the first time that things have been done on the other side with which the Government have not been entirely familiar. Perhaps the want of information on the part of the Government results from the overseas minister being so busy that he has not communicated with my right hon. friend on the subject. At all events, I am disposed to rely on that positive statement until it is authoratively denied.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I move that section 3 of the Bill be struck out.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: For what reason?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Because it is a departure from the principles of parliamentary government, and because it is creating a very dangerous precedent. I believe that at least one of the two secretaries. the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs—as was impliedly admitted this afternoon—instead of doing the work of that office, is preparing campaign literature. I am informed that one of the statements which appeared in the press this evening was issued by him yesterday—a very vicious statement, I must say, an appeal to the prejudices and passions of the people, in view of the next general election. On the whole, the right hon. gentleman has not given the committee and the country sufficient reason for this departure from a time-honoured constitutional principle.

Mr. MACDONALD: We must not forget that the statement was made to the Government press throughout this country when the announcement of the appointment of the under-secretaries was made that these gentlemen would serve without any compensation. To provide now for salaries seems to be a breach of faith with the public. In regard to Sir George Perley, I assume that he is drawing a salary as High Commissioner for Canada in London.

10 p.m.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Sir George Perley has never received any salary as High Commissioner for Canada in London. I have stated that in the hearing of my hon. friend at least half a dozen times in the last three or four years.

Mr. MACDONALD: We vote the money every year.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not speaking of what we voted; I am speaking of the fact that Sir George Perley has not received any salary, though he has been discharging the duties of High Commissioner. I gave this information two years ago in answer to an inquiry made by the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), who then said that the fact should be made known throughout the country. He expressed appreciation of the fact that the duties of this office were being discharged without remuneration.

Mr. PROULX: If the gentlemen who occupy these positions will not accept the salaries now being attached to them, why make the Bill retroactive—especially in view of the fact that it was announced in the party press that no salaries would be accepted? These gentlemen get the benefit of that announcement; they are credited with being very great patriots, doing the country certain service without remuneration. Now the Government wants the House to vote money to pay them for their services from the time they took office. As far as the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs is concerned, I agree with the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) that his time has been chiefly occupied in the writing of political literature and of articles for the Conservative press. He did that before he accepted the position for which a salary is now being provided. He used to write letters to the Toronto News— letters from an M.P.—abusing the Liberal party; he sent articles to the party press detrimental to the Liberal party and in favour of the Conservative party. If he is to be given a salary for his services, that salary should be paid not by the country, but by the Conservative party.

I have already explained to my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) that salaries are attached to the offices for the reason that they might be filled by persons other than those who now occupy them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why make the Bill retroactive?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it is desirable that the salary should be attached to the office from the time the office was established.

Amendment (Mr. Lemieux) lost on division: yeas, 25; nays, 37.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I call your attention Mr. Chairman, to the fact that two hon. gentlemen directly interested in this matter have voted, the member for Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark) and the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy). That is, to say the least, contrary to the rules of the House and grossly imprudent on their part.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is not my hon. friend interested, too?

Mr. MACDONALD: Who is head of the medical services in the Old Country?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: General Foster.

Mr. MACDONALD: What position does General Jones occupy?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not sure what position he occupies at present.

Mr. MACDONALD: It was understood the last time we discussed the matter in the House that the Prime Minister would communicate with Sir George Perley as to the publication of Dr. Bruce's answer to the Babtie report. Has any communication been received from Sir George Perley?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already said that Sir George Perley has sent forward a statement which has not yet been received.

On section 4—Holders of certain offices not ineligible to be members of or sit in House of Commons:

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 5—Salaries to be paid from first appointment:

Mr. McKENZIE: I think, from the disclosure made by the parliamentary undersecretary of state for External Affairs (Mr. Hugh Clark) this afternoon, this section should not be allowed to pass without protest. It is a most extraordinary thing that a minister of the Crown, as he is now by this retroactive legislation, should be obliged to admit here that instead of attending to the affairs of the country for which he is paid a fairly high salary of $5,000 a year, together with his indemnity, he is devoting his time to preparing literature in the interest of the Conservative party and of the Government. It is not a fair, square deal that, while I myself and other hon members on this side of the House have to do our own work in election matters or otherwise and sustain our cause the best way we can, with our own efforts and our own little money, we should be called upon to pay the salary of a man on the other side of the House who is doing the Tory work. A couple of years ago I was in the county of Victoria helping to conduct a local election. I found in that county—and the fact has never been denied by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) or any other minister who had to do with the matter—that the whole system of telegraph lines with all its official staff was turned into a huge machinery for the conducting of the election on behalf of the Tory candidate. The matter was brought to the notice of the minister; it was admitted it was bad, but he never called upon the man in charge of the system to return the moneys that had been collected. That is a case exactly similar to this, where the money of the country, money that every one, Grit and Tory alike, contribute is being used for election purposes. That is not fair. They had in that election a steamer, not only subsidized, but hired by the Government. The full cost of hiring the steamer and the full salaries of every officer aboard were paid by the Government of my right hon. friend. The steamboat, the officers and the whole outfit were used for at least a month, for the purpose of this election. I brought the matter to the notice of the Government and they said they were going to do something about it, but they never did anything. The officials received their pay; there was not even a reprimand given; it was regarded as just the proper thing to do. We are now going a step further. We are giving the dignity of the position of a minister of the Crown to a member of this House, and he has to acknowledge that, instead of doing anything that would be commensurate with the dignity of a minister of the Crown, he is grovelling down and muckraking for the purpose of slandering the Liberal party. That is the position for which we are voting him money. This purchasing of assistance of the press and otherwise with the public money is but a system and a policy adopted by this Government. The Government have bought the Halifax Herald. Does any one for a moment think that the gentleman who owned the Halifax Herald would have been made a senator and his paper bought were it not for the fact that he owned that paper? Nobody in the world would ever think so, or would accuse the Prime Minister of making such an appointment, were it not for the fact that, by buying the Herald, he had to take this appendage with it. The same thing happened in the county of Cape Breton, a part of which I represent. In the city of Sydney we have the Post, a good Tory paper. It had to be bought.

Mr. GLASS: There are some good Tory papers?

Mr. McKENZIE: Good of their kind. It had to be brought into line. It was deeply in debt. It was stated on the authority of the gentleman who was bought with it that it was $95,000 behind in working up the interest of the Tory party. The paper, however, was bought and with it the same sort of appendage as in the case of the Halifax Herald. Right in line comes the Bill that is before us to-night. It is said that the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) wanted to be Speaker. Two men could not be Speaker at the same time, and when the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) was made Speaker, of course something had to be done for the hon. member (Mr. McCurdy), and so he was appointed Parliamentary Secretary to the Department of Militia and Defence with a salary of $5,000. It is a well known fact that the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark) was going around his county saying that he had the promise of the Prime Minister that he would be appointed Minister of Militia. He was not appointed Minister of Militia, but over his head, when the time came and the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) went out, the hon. member for East Toronto (Sir Edward Kemp), the present holder, was appointed. The hon. member for North Bruce, of course, to whom this offer, according to himself, was promised, was very much disgruntled and disappointed, and something had to be done for him, and so he was appointed Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. The country has to stand the brunt and pay the money.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He voted for himself.

Mr. McKENZIE: Charity begins at home, and for that reason I do not want to blame him very much for voting for himself. He is the only real democrat in the crowd, and I sympathize with him. He is willing to take the money openly and above board, the others want to get it by some circuitous route, but they will get it all the same.

Mr. McCURDY: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to apply that remark to me? Does he say the other parliamentary secretaries want to take the money by some circuitous route?

Mr. McKENZIE: A guilty conscience needs no accuser.

Mr. McCURDY: I rise to a point of order, and I ask that the insinuation be withdrawn. I have no intention of taking remuneration for this office in any shape or form, and I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw.

Mr. McKENZIE: I said nothing to withdraw.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why did my hon. friend vote for it?

Mr. EDWARDS: Did my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) vote for an increase in the parliamentary indemnity? it is the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) is an old parliamentarian, and should take the word of the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne—

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say a word to him, not a word. There is an old story about a man who was in a court house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. McKENZIE: I see that Rome is saved once more by cackle of the same old class.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. McKENZIE: Withdraw what? I was simply going to refer to a gentleman who was pointed out as a man with a fly on his nose. Of course, there was no fly on his nose, but he thought there was. If the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) is the man with the fly on his nose—I cannot help it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McCURDY: I rise to a point of order. If I understood the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) aright, he insinuated that I wished to take this money by a circuitous route. I regard these words as entirely objectionable, and I would ask that they be withdrawn.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say at all that the hon. member was taking the money. There are thousands of such cases in Canada, and I say others take it by a circuitous route, as well as the hon. member.

An hon. MEMBER: Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. McKENZIE: What am I going to withdraw? I stand by the point that when people get money in an indirect way, it would be very much more honest and becoming for them to take it straight as it is voted for them. I have seen hundreds of them saying they were doing work for nothing, and when the accounts came in afterwards they amounted to ten times more than they would have if they were taking the money straight. If people are so very sensitive, it would be better for them not to be voting money to themselves, which they are not going to take. That is the question before the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will not withdraw anything. I have nothing to withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member should, I think, withdraw the insinuation that the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne would draw his money in an indirect way. The hon. member (Mr. McCurdy) has denied it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was speaking of the principle.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know what the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) intended to convey, but he certainly did convey to the members of the committee the direct insinuation that the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy), while pretending he would not accept this money, intended to get it by some indirect way. He either meant that or he meant nothing, and I believe the hon. gentleman cannot get out of it. I think he knows perfectly well he did mean that. It seems to me a very unworthy thing for the hon. gentleman to state. He has either said too much or too little. If he has anything upon which he can found an insinuation of that kind he should state it, if he has nothing upon which to found it then he should withdraw.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not mean that the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne would get the money in any dishonest way, but it is my belief, whether it is proper or not, that he is not going to serve the country for nothing, and that directly or indirectly he will be paid for any services he gives the country. If there is anything unparliamentary in what I said before, I regret it and I take it back, but I believe we are not getting any services from anybody for nothing

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think the committee is very much edified by the observations my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has seen fit to make. He has charged the Parliamentary Secretary for External Affairs with devoting his time altogether to preparing campaign literature, and has distorted what was said this afternoon into a supposed admission of that. It would be just as fair for me to distort what the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) said this afternoon into a supposed admission that when he was Minister of Railways and Canals he spent the whole of his time in writing editorials for Liberal newspapers. I would not for a moment suggest anything of that kind, and no hon. member would suggest anything of the kind, yet it would be absolutely on a par with what my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has suggested with regard to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for External Affairs. Where does my hon. friend draw the line? Does he censure the hon. member for South Renfrew for writing editorials for his newspaper when he was Minister of Railways and Canals? Would he censure the hon. gentleman for writing a letter to a newspaper upon a political question? Would he censure him for making a speech—

Mr. McKENZIE: If the Prime Minister expects me to give him any answer, I would say I certainly would not find fault with any one who runs a newspaper writing articles for his paper, but I would find fault if he was receiving a salary from the country and doing other work than that for which he was paid by the Crown.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It strikes me my hon. friend is drawing an exceedingly fine distinction when he says that a gentleman can occupy a position in the public service as Minister of Railways and Canals, and can without censure or criticism devote his time to writing partisan editorials, but that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for External Affairs is to be condemned because he writes letters either for his own newspaper or to some other newspaper defending the Administration and perhaps having a partisan tinge. I must confess I do not understand the distinction my hon. friend is making, and I do not think he has edified the committee very much by the observations with which he has favoured it. This is simply a clause which provides that those gentlemen shall be entitled to a certain salary for the period during which they have held certain offices and discharged certain duties. It places the moneys at their disposal. If they decline to accept, it is their own affair. If they accept the salary and devote it to some public or patriotic purpose, that is a matter for their own judgment. If they accept and devote it to their own personal purposes, it is their right under the legislation. That also is a matter for themselves. This is all the section means.

Mr. PROULX: How long will they have to accept? Will they be governed by the Statute of Limitations?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think that that is of very much interest.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend is rather to be pitied than otherwise, if he is unable to draw a distinction between a gentleman who is now being appointed to an office at a salary of $5,000 a year, and for whom the office is being created, who is devoting his time to the preparation of campaign literature in the interests of his political party, and the case of a man who, being a minister simply writes editorials for a newspaper which happens to be his own private property.

I am very sorry to hear it practically admitted by the Prime Minister that the gentleman who has been appointed Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs is really engaged in preparing campaign literature in order to promote the interests of the Government and the Conservative party in the coming election. I have noticed that during the election that the hon. gentleman has never apparently given any evidence that he is doing any work in connection with his department. We have had no evidence of it since the session began, and it has been explained that apparently his time and attention have been taken up with the preparation of party literature.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I made no such statement and no such admission. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs has been very active and diligent in the discharge of his duties. At to-day's session he answered at least half a dozen questions with respect to matters that came under his personal direction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am very glad indeed that at last to-day that hon. gentleman has answered some questions pertaining to his department. Perhaps he has been inspired to that by reason of some criticism which was made a few days ago. But previous to that he had not given any evidence that he was engaged on duties in connection with his department. I am even glad that he is even answering a few questions. I was not here to-day, or, perhaps, I would have recognized the importance of that. We do know that many answers are prepared even by minor clerks of the departments. Whether the answers given to-day were of that character or not I do not know.

Mr. PROULX: I do not like this clause 5. In view of the fact that Sir George Perley and the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) have expressed their intention to not accept any salary, and in view of the fact that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs has been writing articles for the Conservative press, I move that clause 5 be struck out.

Amendment (Mr. Proulx) negatived. Yeas, 27; nays, 40.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice that the two hon. parliamentary secretaries did not vote this time. Would it not be better if their previous votes were struck out?

The CHAIRMAN: I have nothing to do with that.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is an absolutely ridiculous statement to be made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). He has attempted to give expression to indignation and horror at the idea that these two hon. gentlemen should vote for the salaries in which they are interested, something the hon. gentleman did for fifteen years for himself. During all the time that he was a minister of the Crown, when the estimate came up for his salary of $7,000 there was recorded in favour of that $7,000 the vote of one Mr. Lemieux.

Mr. GAUVREAU: What about your own salary?

Mr. EDWARDS: Keep quiet. Hold yourself down; you are out of order.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You are out of order yourself. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is your point of order?

Mr. GAUVREAU: You are not the boss.

Son. hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I rise to a point of order Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Frontenac has no right to impute motives to the hon. ex-Postmaster General.

The Chairman (Mr. Rainville): That is no point of order.

Mr. EDWARDS: As a medical man I have noticed that some people are subject to dyspepsia and indigestion. The hon. member who has just sat down is troubled with political or mental indigestion; otherwise he would not have raised such a silly point.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): I hope that hon. members—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair, chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): I hope the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) will confine himself to the clause under discussion.

Mr. EDWARDS: I shall be most happy to do so. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) have always kept so close to the discussion and have shown such a respect for the rules that I shall not violate them for a moment. I do not profess to know what the clause is that is under discussion, but I rose for the purpose of pointing out that the hon. member for Rouville in taking exception to the vote of the parliamentary secretaries on their salaries was taking exception to something which he had done repeatedly while a minister of the Crown in voting in favour of his own salary—

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is fixed by statute.

Mr. EDWARDS: But the principle is the same.

Mr. COPP: If the salaries voted for the overseas minister and the parliamentary secretaries are not taken by these gentlemen what becomes of the money? Does it still remain to the credit of these gentlemen or does it revert to the revenues of the country?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It falls under the head of consolidated revenue fund if it is not accepted.

Mr. COPP: I understood it remained to the credit of these gentleman until they drew it or spent it on some other way.

Section agreed to.

On section 1—Appointment of Overseas Minister and Parliamentary Secretary of Militia and Defence:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall read the concluding part of this section:

5 (b) The Governor in Council may appoint a Senator or member of the House of Commons to be Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence and such Parliamentary Secretary shall be a minister of the Crown and shall have and perform such powers and duties as the minister may from time to time prescribe.

As I explained before six o'clock, I gave the Resolution and the Bill to be founded thereon to the Parliamentary Counsel, and I really did not observe until it was brought to my attention this afternoon by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) that these words "shall be a minister of the Crown" had been inserted. I have asked the Parliamentary Counsel for a memorandum as to the reason for their insertion, and he has given it to me. I do not think that, on the whole, there is any necessity or that they ought to be inserted. Therefore, I move to amend this section by striking out the words "shall be a minister of the Crown" and also by substituting for the word "minister" in the last line the words "Governor in Council," so that the clause will read:

The Governor in Council may appoint a Senator or a member of the House of Commons to be Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and such Parliamentary Secretary shall have and perform such powers and duties as the Governor in Council shall from time to time prescribe.

Mr. MACDONALD: The powers given to the Minister of Militia under the Militia Act are very wide, and include the responsibility for the administration of the militia forces of Canada and a number of other duties such as the care of military stores, armament, and so on, and the initiative in all matters involving the expenditure of money. All that is assigned to the Overseas Minister is contained in the first clause of section 5 of the original Act. Under this Bill the Minister of the Overseas Military Forces is charged with the administration of the military affairs of Canada overseas, and such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Governor in Council. Who is responsible for the ammunitions, arms, stores and habiliments of war, on the other side, for which the Minister of Militia is responsible in Canada?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Overseas Minister is charged with those duties under the Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not by the statute.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, he is charged with such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Governor in Council, and those duties have already been assigned to him.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then it should be "such other duties as have been or may be assigned to him."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The objection to that would be that if we say "have been" then we might fix it by statute so that we could not change it by Order in Council.

Mr. MACDONALD: In other words, the Order in Council would not only assign the duties but would become incorporated in the law by virtue of the statute.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That may not be a formidable objection and I would accept "have been or may be." I would move to insert in clause 2 after the word "as" which immediately follows the word "duties," the words "have been or".

Mr. LEMIEUX: The under secretaries are not to be ministers of the Crown?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, that has been changed so that they will not be.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will they attend sessions of the Cabinet?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, they will not.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 2—"Appointment of Parliamentary Secretary of State for External Affairs."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move to make the same amendment to this section as has been made to the section providing for the appointment of the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, that is, to strike out the words "shall be a minister of the Crown and" and to substitute for the words "Secretary of State for External Affairs" the words "Governor in Council." The clause will then correspond to the one relating to the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

DRY DOCK SUBSIDY.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House went into committee on the following proposed resolutions; Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Dry Docks Subsidies Act, 1910, be amended by increasing the subsidy on first-class dry docks to four and one-half per cent of the cost of the work, payable half-yearly during a period not exceeding thirty-five years after the work has been completed, but half-yearly payments on account of the subsidy at the rate of four and one-half per cent on seventy-five per cent of the cost of the work done and materials provided at the time of such payment may be made during the construction of the dock, no such payment to be made until the work done and materials provided shall have cost the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, and no such payments on account to be made unless the chief engineer reports that the work is being proceeded with to his satisfaction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is one provision in the resolution which I am very glad the hon. minister is asking the House to agree to; that is increasing the rate of interest from four to four and a half per cent. As a reason for this, it might perhaps be desirable to refer for a few minutes to the history of the aid to dry docks. My first knowledge of the matter was in 1882, when the Government asked Parliament to grant aid, somewhat along these lines, not in the way of an Act to provide for a subsidy to be paid in cash, like the subsidies to railways, but in the nature of a subsidy extending over a period of years. From that time to the present very little of an effective character, so far as relates to the country at large, has been accomplished by the legislation. My experience has rather been that all the Governments from that time down to the present—and I am disposed to include the Government of which I was a member—while improving a little upon the previous legislation, were just a little behind the requirements of the investor, to enable anything practicable to result from the resolution. First, the rate of interest was three per cent, then three and a half, and then four, and now it is proposed to make it four and a half, but to-day four and a half per cent is not very much better than three and a half per cent was some few years ago, because the interest rate is higher. We know that even the Government cannot borrow to-day at less than six per cent, and many exceedingly good municipal securities are being sold on the market at six per cent. This class of aid is not very attractive security for the investor, because there is no security for the principal. It merely secures the interest at what, to-day, is a low rate, four and a half per cent for thirty-five years, but the investor has no guarantee that his principal will ever be paid. I suppose that is why the investor has not taken very kindly to the securities of drydocks companies. However, the increasing of the rate to four and a half may lead to something practical. I think, in regard to the aid which may be given in respect of the work while construction is going on, that the payment should be limited to an expenditure of, at least, a million dollars. I suggest that we should make it a million dollars, instead of $500,000, and make the half-yearly payments on seventy-five per cent of that amount. I think that, if that is provided for, and the Engineering Department is satisfied, whatever subsidy is given upon the expenditure should continue for the thirty-five years. Of course, it might be said, in answer to that, that possibly the drydock might be started, and might not be completed, and the Government would have the work on its hands. That is true, but that applies also to railways. We know that Parliament for many years has been granting aid during construction, I think after ten miles have been constructed, or after forty per cent of the work has been completed, the department will take progress estimates, and make payments on account. I do not see why the same provision should not be made applicable to drydocks, provided they are, as this resolution stipulates, of the first class, and if they are in parts of the country where a drydock of the first class is needed in the public interest. I think the building of drydocks, and the construction of ships in connection with them, which can be very greatly encouraged by reason of the plant for repair work that is necessary in connection with docks, is of enormous importance. There never was a time, and perhaps there never will be, in the history of the country, when it is more desirable, in the public interest, to secure the early establishment of shipyards in Canada. My hon. friend will agree with me when I say the war may last for some years yet, and the question of shipbuilding appeals to every man in the country as being of very vital importance. I suggest to the hon. minister that after the word "may," in the seventh line of the resolution, we insert the words "in respect to work done." I also suggest that we fix the amount at $1,000,000, so that the money invested will be so large as to be a pretty good assurance that the whole of the work will be completed, and if, for any reason, there were any stoppage, the Government would have a margin of $250,000. I would provide in the Bill that, in case of any default, the Government take charge and become the owner of any work done. I suggest, for the minister's favourable consideration, that we should strike out of the resolution the following words:

> And no such payments on account to be made unless the chief engineer reports that the work is being proceeded with to his satisfaction.

In connection with securing money for a dry dock costing $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, and for the necessary repair plant and shipbuilding plant—I should like to see the latter established in connection with every dry dock that is constructed—in these days when the rate of interest is high and many favoured investments are offering, a banker would not look with very much favour upon bonds issued during construction unless in respect to those bonds the subsidy was to run for the period specified in the Bill. There is no use in passing legislation that is not going to procure results. As I say, I speak from having been interested in St. John in securing the building of a dry dock; that interest began thirty-five years ago, and there is no dry dock yet. Parliament always did pretty nearly what the investor wanted—but not quite. There is no use in putting legislation on the statute book unless it is of such a character as reasonably to encourage investors. I would suggest that the lowest amount upon which subsidy shall be paid during construction be made $1,000,000. With the margin of 25 per cent, that would be $250,000 in respect to each payment.

Mr. ROGERS: I agree with my hon. friend as to the importance of such legislation as will ensure the construction of dry docks wherever they are necessary and wherever their construction is feasible. It is true that at present there is greater need for dry docks than there has been hitherto, and it is true that the Dry Docks Subsidies Act, which has been on our statute books for some years, has not accomplished the purposes for which it was intended. That is due largely to the fact that the subsidies offered have not been sufficiently attractive. In bringing this resolution before Parliament, I thought that I was going a long way to remedy that condition. First of all, I propose to increase the interest rate to four and a half per cent. I propose also to remedy the complaint that has been made whenever the matter of the construction of dry docks was discussed in my department: that in connection with what are called progress Estimates. Under the old Dry Docks Subsidies Act, no estimate was given until the the dock was completed. I propose under this Bill to remedy that condition and to provide that we shall pay the subsidy on 75 per cent of the money spent. In other words, when $500,000 is spent, we shall provide a subsidy half-yearly on $375,000 of the $500,000; and so on until the dock is completed. In this respect the Bill is a great improvement upon the previous legislation. Such an undertaking as the construction of a large dry dock of the first class is not usually promoted by contractors who are interested simply in the operation of a dry dock. I do not think the Act is workable except in cases where a corporation have in mind the establishing of a shipbuilding plant in connection with the dry dock; otherwise, I doubt whether the proposal, even under this legislation, would be sufficiently attractive to encourage the investment of so large an amount of money. But this legislation is certainly a great encouragement to any firm or company which has in mind the building of a shipbuilding plant and the carrying on of work of this kind. In St. John there is pressing necessity for the construction of a dry dock, especially at this time, when so many ships are coming into that port. The same applies to Halifax. While there is at Halifax a dock that has done splendid service, having regard to its capacity, yet in my judgment the accommodation is insufficient to meet the requirements of the trade. In the near future it will be necessary, under any legislation that we may enact, or in some other way, to provide a dry dock at that port. This is necessary not only because of the present requirements, but because of urgent requests made by the Admiralty and those interested in the shipping trade of our country. I do not know that I have great objection to the suggestion made by the member for St. John, because in introducing this resolution I had in view the one purpose of trying to present a measure that would be sufficiently attractive to produce some results under our Dry Docks Subsidy legislation. My hon. friend has suggested that the amount upon which subsidy should be paid should be made $1,000,000 instead of $500,000. I think my hon. friend is in error in what he says with regard to railway subsidies. As I understand it, when a railway subsidy is granted and approved by Parliament it is understood that a certain number of miles of railway have to be constructed and that if that work is not carried out, the full subsidy is not paid.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But they get paid through the progress estimates.

Mr. ROGERS: We are proposing to pay them on progress estimate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Only the interest.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much does the minister estimate a complete first-class dry dock will cost?

Mr. ROGERS: A first-class dry dock would probably cost something like $3,500,000 or perhaps $4,000,000. The Subsidy Act provides that we can grant a subsidy on a dry dock costing $5,000,000 a subsidy of $500,000, but that includes a subsidy on a shipbuilding plant connected with the dry dock. In respect to the change of the form of the subsidies to be granted, it has also been suggested that the subsidy should terminate at any time, so far as the contractors are concerned, should they fail to carry out their contract; but the suggestion is made that our Act should provide that supposing $1,000,000 has been expended on the construction of a dock, and the contractor fails after he has spent that amount and after we have paid him under the proposed arrangements, say, $750,000, all that should be exacted from him would be the loss of that $250,000 together with his deposit of $250,000 together as a guarantee of good faith that he would carry out the contract, and that we should continue to pay the subsidy of 4½ per cent upon the amount of money so put into the dock by the contractor.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose that is if the dock is completed.

Mr. ROGERS: No, it is suggested that we should pay the subsidy provided the dock has not been completed. Even if the contractor had gone on to the extent of spending $1,000,000, if he failed to carry the work on to completion, we would be able to exact from him the $250,000 of the hold-back and the $250,000 of the deposit which he had put up as a guarantee of good faith that he would carry the work to completion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand that the Government will pay the interest on that amount?

Mr. ROGERS: Not on that amount. We would pay the interest on the $750,000, because the contractor would in all probability borrow from some innocent investor the money to carry on the work up to this point. I am pointing out to the committee only what has been suggested.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister say that we would continue to pay the interest on $750,000 for 35 years in the case of a dock that was not completed?

Mr. ROGERS: No, but supposing a contractor had taken a contract and had borrowed $1,000,000, and under our Act we were obliged to pay a subsidy of $750,000 all told, and we had in addition his deposit of $250,000, and he fell down on his work, the suggestion is that we should pay the subsidy of the $750,000, and we should retain the other $500,000 and see that the contract is carried out by some other person and that the dock is completed and put into shape for the purpose for which it is intended. Although I am not clear as to the desirability of going as far as that, the suggestion deserves some consideration. In view of this, and in view of the fact that we are to have amendments to the resolution before the committee, it will be necessary for me to withdraw the resolution and bring in another one in keeping with the views of the committee. I would like, therefore, to get the judgment of members of the committee in order that I may know exactly their views on the subject. I am not wedded to any particular form or arrangement, but I am anxious that under this resolution we shall be able to get results and accomplish some good, because there is undoubtedly pressing necessity for the construction of at least two or three first-class dry docks at different ports in Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where is it proposed to build these docks?

Mr. ROGERS: One is needed at St. John, one at Halifax, one at Vancouver and one at Esquimalt.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When I was Minister of Public Works there were in the department plans for one at Sydney.

Mr. ROGERS: That is not a first-class dock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I might mention this fact as showing the difficulty of securing capital for the building of a dry dock based simply upon a subsidy that expires at a certain time, where the principal is not guaranteed. For a good many years the law provided that if there was any cessation of operation of a dry dock, the subsidy should cease. I remember a gentleman from Halifax came to see me, and Mr. George Robertson, President of the Company dry dock at St. John came to see me a good many times, and he was also over to England many times, in connection with the project. They stated that the bonds might go into the hands of estates, widows and children, and they asked: What do they know about operating a dry dock? They said that unless the matter was made absolutely unconditional, those parties would not invest. The Hon. Mr. Fielding, when Minister of Finance, saw the possibility of that, and he introduced a Bill changing the law so as to make it absolutely unconditional, that whether the dry dock was operated or not, the subsidy should run on for 35 years.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That was after it was finished.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, but the Government might take charge of the dry dock and operate it, and charge up the company with the expenses and credit them with the receipts. Even with that change there has been very little result. What I have heard from people who have been speaking about investing is that in financing an enterprise which would run to about $500,000 and perhaps a larger amount, if a shipbuilding plant were established they would certainly want to issue their bonds during construction. What they have said to me—and I can see the reasonableness of it—is that providing a subsidy does not really aid very much the raising of money because they say that after the contractor or the company has put a million dollars into the work, if construction should cease and the subsidy should cease, the bonds would be of no value and the investor would be deprived of any security. They say that no bonds could be floated under those circumstances. My honourable friend will see how weak a security that would be. No. investor would take the bonds unless he was absolutely assured, beyond all possible question, that the dock would be completed. It would be in the public interest that some of these first-class dry docks should be constructed, and it would not be unreasonable to agree unconditionally to pay the subsidy up to 75 per cent, of the work during construction, particularly when a million dollars had actually been expended.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Then the Government would have the security of the $250,000. and also of whatever amount was taken as security from the contractor that the dock would be completed. With the site of the dock, the plant, and what was invested, there would not be very much likelihood of the public suffering to any extent. Of course, all my observations are based upon the idea that it is in the public interest that the docks should be constructed in places where the minister might decide it is desirable they should be constructed. With regard to railway subsidies there is a cash bonus of $6,400 per mile, but if the railroads were to stop in the forest after ten, twenty, or thirty miles were built, whatever money was put in would, to a certain extent be jeopardized. Still it is good policy. If you are going to assist a public work, like a dry-dock, by a subsidy during construction, you must give something substantial. You are not giving them the principal, according to my idea; you are only giving them the interest for thirty-five years, and if by any misfortune the contractor should not be able to go on, the investor who has taken the bonds up to seventy-five per cent of what has actually been invested would have no security whatever. He would lose his interest for all the remaining thirty-five years. I would think that, particularly in those days, no investor would look at bonds for a moment unless the company actually had the money. I think in changing the law now and under these circumstances Parliament should be a little generous, and run some little risk, particularly where there would be a large margin which would be provided if the security was only given up to seventy-five per cent of construction. My fear is that nothing will be accomplished if the Bill goes through as the minister now proposes, and I speak from my experience as a minister, and my knowledge as a solicitor of a company some years ago, knowing how wary investors are in regard to a security of this nature. In the first place, they say, that the principal is not secured, that all they get is interest, and not a high rate of interest. Everybody will admit that four and a half per cent is a low rate of interest to-day. Then they say: "If for any reason the dock should not be operated, our security is gone." We know Mr. George Robertson went to England and to the United States, and got promises everywhere, but when they came to look into the question, they said "It was defective, that it did not afford a security that was attractive and they would have nothing to do with it."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You mean if they get the principal and the interest guaranteed, it would be possible to find people to take up the investment?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, they never had the principal guaranteed and they will not, under my proposal. All they would have would be the interest guaranteed for thirty-five years.

Mr. SINCLAIR: On three-quarters of the principal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On three-quarters of the principal, that is all. I remember years ago the minister used to say to George Robertson, then mayor of St. John: any man will lend money at three per cent; always forgetting the principal was never guaranteed, and was always in jeopardy.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This resolution provides for thirty-five years' interest.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It does, and the minister evidently has the view that it will be likely to make it easier for the investor or for the company if when $500,000 has been expended the minister may give a subsidy upon seventy-five per cent of that amount during construction. The difficulty is that under the resolution as it is, if the company issues its bonds for seventy-five per cent of the $500,000, and if for any reason it is not able to go ahead, the man who has taken the bonds loses his security absolutely. He might get his interest for two years, or three years possibly, but if at any time the company should fail to go ahead, the security becomes waste paper, and therefore the investor would not have anything to do with it. I am satisfied it will be found that is the obstacle which will confront any company. I would like very much to see legislation which would bring results. There is no use putting legislation on the statute books and thinking you are going to accomplish something, if, as a matter of fact, nothing will be accomplished. I have pointed out to the minister the difficulty which appears to me, and I hope that the minister and the committee may see their way clear to make some change and give more security to the investor for bonds issued under construction.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would not undertake to say that the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John is not quite substantial, but at the same time it does not strike me as being a forcible one. There should not be any such thing as failure in the construction of a dry dock where there is a guarantee of four and a half per cent interest for thirty-five years. Such a thing should not be possible. I say this for the reason that before the Government enters into an agreement it should be absolutely certain that the agreement is with a company or a person who cannot fail to carry it out. There should be deposited with the Minister of Public Works one-quarter of the estimated cost of the undertaking. If it is to cost $3,000,000, there should be a deposit of $750,000, and the contractor should be able to put up that amount before he gets the contract. The member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) says it is difficult to get men to put money into dry docks. That is perfectly true, but it is not because the Government does not offer sufficient assistance. The difficulty is that it is a risky undertaking. None of the dry docks in the United States ever made a cent until recent years. The great trouble is that many dry docks have been built which should not have been built, and in places where they should not have been built. I do not believe that you could find a dry dock on the Atlantic seaboard which had earned any interest whatever until five years ago. Great care should be exercised in entering into any contract for the construction of a dry dock anywhere. It does not follow that because the citizens of a place want a dry dock, they should get it, or because the Government is approached by contractors who want to construct a dry dock, they should receive a contract. That is one of the troubles with our Dry Dock Act.

The statute makes an offer to the public to pay four and a half per cent interest on three-quarters of the cost of the work for a limited period. This is an inducement to promoters to organize companies to construct dry docks whether they can or cannot possibly pay. I quite agree that there should be some dry docks in Canada. I do not know how the Pacific coast is provided at the present moment. I would not think it would be desirable to put a dry dock at Esquimalt and one at Vancouver. It would seem like a great waste of public money as probably the enterprises would hardly pay interest on the construction cost. It would not be fair to Vancouver, say, to erect another dry dock at Esquimalt because there is not enough business for two unless one was supported by the British Admiralty for naval purposes. I think the British Admiralty might very well be asked to do something with respect to a dry dock on the Pacific coast and also one on the Atlantic coast. I think it is quite apparent that there should be a dry dock somewhere on the Atlantic cost with a capacity sufficient to meet the maximum demand on the Atlantic seaboard. Whether a dry dock will pay on the Atlantic coast is a debatable question. Whether a dry dock is an aid or encouragement to a shipbuilding plant is also another debatable question. Many ship builders say that they would not have a $3,000,000 dry dock if it were given to them for nothing. They say it is a separate industry altogether and that one does not help the other but that one is rather a disadvantage to the other. Therefore, I say in the interest of Canada that great care should be exercised by the minister in granting aid under this Bill when it becomes law. A first class dock is necessary, I would say, in the port of Halifax. It would be quite natural that I should suggest that. I would make that statement anyway whether I was representing the constituency of Halifax or not. Before the minister enters into a contract with anybody he should make sure that it is a reputable firm and he should not have in his mind the possibility of the company failing. I would not enter into a contract with any person who could possibly fail. He should give security to the Government for a quarter of the cost and the minister should provide that he is amply secured beyond all peradventure. Therefore, I do not take very kindly to the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), namely, that we should undertake to pay interest upon a portion of the investment made in partial construction of a dry dock when the company has failed to complete its contract. The Government or somebody else, must come in and produce the requisite capital to complete the undertaking. I think that could be provided against by making sure that no contract should ever be made with any company that could possibly fail and which was not in a position to carry out its contract.

I quite agree with the purpose of the resolution in increasing the rate of interest. It is quite true that private capital will hardly embark in a drydock to-day of any size without some assistance. The rate of interest has risen during the war to such a height, and it is likely it will continue so for many years afterwards, that the Government is amply justified in increasing the rate from four to four and a half per cent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My idea is exactly like that of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that the Government should, and no doubt would, take ample security to ensure the completion of the drydock. There would be a margin of 25 per cent and there would be security put up in addition. The idea of giving a subsidy during construction is that the company could issue bonds against that which would be placed with its bankers. The bankers in turn want to put their bonds out amongst their clientele. They do not want to know the relationship between the company and the Government, or what security the Government has taken, but what they want to know is that beyond peradventure they can get their interest for a certain definite period. That is necessary, and that has been found necessary, in order to float these securities. It was a fact that for a number of years the subsidy might cease if the company ceased to operate the drydock. That prevented capital being raised. In view of the fact that a drydock can not be constructed in any place where it is not found by the minister, from the report of the officers of his department, to be in the public interest that it should be built, in view of the fact that the minister could always get this margin of 25 per cent and could have security which would be ample to ensure the construction of the dock, I would not think it would be unreasonable to allow the payment of interest upon 75 per cent of the expenditure during construction, provided, of course, that in each case the expenditure must reach at least $1,000,000. That in itself would be evidence of the financial ability of the company. Before it would get any subsidy at all it must expend $1,000,000 and so on practically through the construction.

Mr. ROGERS: Is that the only amendment the hon. gentleman would make?

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is an amendment which occurs to me to be necessary because I have understood that there is a question even now under the present law as to whether in the case of a dock that is completed, passed by the engineers and accepted by the Government, and should cease, to receive its subsidy—

Mr. ROGERS: That is after it is completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes. A change was made when Mr. Fielding was Minister of Finance with the intention of making the payment of the subsidy absolute. The moment the dock was completed, passed by the engineers, approved by the minister and adopted by the Governor in Council, no matter what happened after that the subsidy would be continuous and indefeasible for the period of the subsidy under the contract. I have been told that some question has been raised. Indeed, I was informed that a sub-committee of council had expressed the opinion that notwithstanding the legislation intended to bring about that result, it was not clear from the statute that it was brought about. I would like if the minister would look into that and see that the spirit and intention of the legislation introduced by Mr. Fielding is absolutely carried out; so that, when a dock is once accepted as being built in accordance with the specifications, there should be no question of the payment. It is absolutely essential that any doubt should be removed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the minister finds it necessary to redraft the clause, I should like to see something inserted to provide a guarantee that the work will be completed.

Mr. ROGERS: That is provided in the Bill founded upon the resolution. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) does not appreciate the difficulties we have had in securing much, if any, result from the Dry Docks Subsidies Act apart from the floating dock at Montreal and the small dock at Port Arthur, and his suggestion that parties intending to construct dry docks should be obliged to put up as a guarantee of good faith $750,000 would undoubtedly place such a barrier in the way that it would be impossible for us to get any results, even under the amended Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All I meant was that such companies should be in a position to make it clear to the Government that they can supply the capital required above the proceeds of the bonds guaranteed by the Government to meet the total cost of the undertaking.

Mr. STEVENS: That is in the existing Act.

Mr. ROGERS: It goes without saying that the Government will guard against that. My hon. friend suggests that we should be careful not to have constructed in various parts of Canada dry docks under this Act unless they are absolutely necessary. I can assure my hon. friend that there is not much danger of the Act being abused in that way. There is little chance of having dry docks constructed unless there are very strong hopes of their being paying investments and being necessary, not alone in the public interest, but in the interest of the corporations or companies undertaking their construction. The Dry Docks Act has been in force for some years, but its terms have not been sufficiently inviting to induce investors to undertake the construction of dry docks. My hon. friend suggested that he did not believe that there was necessity for a dry dock at Vancouver and also one at Esquimalt. My hon. friend does not realize the importance of our great western outlet through Vancouver and Esquimalt. Vancouver is probably the third largest port in Canada, and it has been greatly handicapped owing to the absence of a dry dock.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not suggest that there should not be a dry dock at Vancouver. I understood it was suggested that there should be two first-class dry-docks on the western coast, one at Vancouver and one at Esquimalt. All I did was to suggest doubt as to the advisability of constructing two first-class dry-docks on the Pacific coast.

Mr. ROGERS: In my humble judgment there is necessity for two, one at Vancouver and one at Esquimalt. Esquimalt is a very important port in that the Admiralty land all their ships there, and have been pressing for years for the construction of a dry dock. The Government have already taken up the question of securing the necessary land and preparing to carry out such construction if application should be made under the Dry Dock Subsidy Act. When I was in England I had occasion to take this matter up with Sir Edward Carson, who was then the head of the Admiralty, and the matter was gone into very fully by that department. I was at that time urging upon the Admiralty that it was their duty to build dry docks, not only at Esquimalt but also at Halifax, and I am glad to tell the committee that my proposals met with some favour, in fact, with a very great deal of favour, at the hands of Sir Edward Carson, who gave the matter very serious and thoughtful consideration.

We had some correspondence in the matter and the difficulty with Sir Edward Carson apparently was to be able to secure the necessary money from the Treasury Department, otherwise he would have been satisfied, upon the recommendation of the department, to carry out the construction of the docks at Halifax and Esquimalt. Hon. gentlemen can see the special interest the Admiralty appears to have in the necessity for docks at these two points.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Was it intended that the Admiralty should pay any part of the expense at Esquimalt or Halifax, or was Canada to pay it all?

Mr. ROGERS: My request of the Admiralty was that they should bear all the expense.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did they agree?

Mr. ROGERS: I cannot say that they directly agreed, but I pressed that point strongly.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand the Government have taken over the docks at Halifax and Esquimalt and we now own them?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At Halifax a company owns the docks and the dock at Esquimalt is owned by the Government.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Canadian Government owns whatever dock we have at Esquimalt?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And we have owned it for some time. Does the Government mean to go back to the old system of making it an Imperial dock, owned by the Imperial Government, instead of making it a Canadian dock?

Mr. ROGERS: The dock at Esquimalt is not sufficient to meet the requirements of the large ships which pass in and out at that point, and we have had the fact presented to us, times without number, that British vessels go to Seattle to have repairs made in dry dock at that American port. This has been the subject of discussion between us and the Admiralty for some time. When I was in London, I pressed upon the Admiralty that it was their duty to see that dry docks should be built at Esquimalt, and Halifax, and I am glad to say that I made an impression upon the department, represented by Sir Edward Carson, to the extent that he was willing to undertake the work, provided he could secure the money from the treasury, and it was referred to Mr. Bonar Law. I had two or three interviews with Mr. Bonar Law, and I pressed on him very strongly the necessity for providing funds for the carrying out of the construction of these two docks. I have not yet received a definite answer from him as to whether it will be possible to carry out the proposal which the Admiralty made, and to provide the necessary money.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If they carry it out, would the docks be open to the public, or would the use of them be confined to the Admiralty?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. ROGERS: The Admiralty would naturally have first call, and no doubt they would be very glad to admit ships that would pay for the repairs and help reduce the expense. My argument with the Admiralty was that we had already started, and had under construction, a dry dock at Quebec; and also had one started at St. John; that we had given a subsidy for and secured a floating dock at Montreal, and another at Port Arthur; or, in other words, that we were providing the necessary dry docks for the ships that were doing the carrying trade of our country, and that it was the duty of the Admiralty to provide dry docks at points like Halifax and Esquimalt. That was the ground on which I based my argument, in endeavouring to secure approval of the proposition that the work should be undertaken by the British Admiralty, instead of the Canadian Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think both the Admiralty and the Dominion Government gave aid to the company which owns the dry dock at Halifax.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, but it was a very small amount. My object in bringing this resolution before the committee was simply with a view to providing such subsidy as would secure the construction of first class dry docks wherever they are necessary. In respect to Halifax, we had a proposal from a very strong English company, a short time ago, and, in order to give the committee an idea of what the building of drydocks means, I may mention their estimate of the work incident upon the building of the dock itself, and the necessary shipbuilding plant that should go along with it, in order to make the dock a paying and profitable concern. The committee will appreciate that for years to come the great business, in my opinion, of this country will be that of building ships to carry the trade of our country. I had presented to me the estimates of this English company, to build a drydock and shipbuilding plant at Halifax, and their estimate amounted to something over $8,000,000. It runs into very, very large figures. I am satisfied that whoever comes forward to take advantage of whatever subsidy this Parliament decides upon will undoubtedly represent strong interests, and I do not anticipate any difficulty, or any failure on the part of any company that would come forward in putting up the security necessary for the purpose of carrying such contracts to completion.

I am desirous to do whatever is best in the public interest, and I will not ask the committee to consider the resolution any further to-night, but to think it over to-morrow or next day, and see whether any useful amendment can be made. Our effort will be to secure some result from the legislation and the amendments which may be adopted. As no hon. gentleman desires to say anything further, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. McKENZIE: As the Government, of which the hon. minister (Mr. Rogers) is so prominent a member, is now launching upon the doctrine and policy of public ownership, if we are going to own all the railroads in the country, what is the matter with owning the dry docks as well? I think the day will come—and it appears not far distant—when the Government of Canada will own the railroads; and they will naturally own the ocean steamships as well. When they own ships in connection with their railways, they will certainly find dry docks very convenient, and if the doctrine of public ownership is to prevail in the country, we might as well own the dry docks. After the war, I do not think the Government would have any difficulty in getting money at four or four and a half per cent, perhaps cheaper, and if they could get it at three and a half or four per cent, it would be just as well for this House to own the dry docks, as to give four and a half per cent to somebody else, and not own the property.

The annual interest upon a dry dock costing $3,000,000 would be $135,000. For the thirty-five years, the interest would amount to $5,725,000. I suppose that we would need not less than five of them in Canada, two on the Pacific and three on the Atlantic. The interest upon these works for the thirty-five years would be $38,625,000. That is a very large amount of money to spend in connection with property that we do not own. I would suggest to the minister that if we are going to launch upon a policy of public ownership—ownership of railroads and all public utilities—we might as well own the dry docks with the rest.

Progress reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 124 to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Making evidence of wife admissible in prosecution for non-support.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the effect of the amendment to the Canada Evidence Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: The amendment is to add, in subsection 2 of section 4 of the Canada Evidence Act, after the words "thirty-nine" in the fifth line thereof, the words "two hundred and forty-two A." Section 242A deals with the offence of non-support. By adding this section the effect of the provision is that the wife becomes a competent witness against her husband on a prosecution for non-support. The original section provides certain cases where the wife may be a competent witness against her husband. The present amendment simply adds to the existing cases of that kind the case of prosecution for non-support.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Cases of prosecution under the Criminal Code for non-support?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

On section 2—Penalty extended to foster parent.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is provision in the Criminal Code making seduction by masters or proprietors of factories—people in authority generally over the individual seduced— an offence without regard to the limitations of age that are made in ordinary cases. This is to include in this provision cases where there is seduction by the step-parent of the step child, the foster parent of the foster-child or the guardian of his ward. The position is thought to be analogous to the case of a person availing himself of a position of authority over a female child.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The section is very desirable indeed.

On section 3—definition enlarged to include place where indecencies are practised:

Mr. DOHERTY: The effect of this amendment is to add to the present definition of a bawdy house the words:

> Or for the practice of acts of indecency, or occupied or resorted to by one or more persons for such purposes.

At present such a place is described as a house, room, set of rooms or place of any kind kept for the purpose of prostitution. It has been represented to us by different police authorities that there has unfortunately grown up in different cities under the guise of legitimate places of business —such as massage, etc.—establishments which are resorted to not for purpose of prostitution, but for the purpose of the commission of acts of indecency. It has been thought proper that they should be put on the same footing as the bawdy house.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At the beginning of the session I brought to my honourable friend's attention a matter germane to that now under consideration. Some good ladies in Montreal have been trying to save young girls from the perils to which they are subjected. When such cases come before the Recorder's Court, the young girls are sent to an institution, under the direction of the nuns, and everybody knows that the young girls who come under the direction of the nuns are on their way to salvation. The trouble is that sometimes, when their term is up, they are met at the gate of the institution by the men or the women who have led them into their life of shame. If the minister could devise means further to protect those young girls by an amendment to the Criminal Code, that would certainly meet with the approval of the society.

Another point which has engrossed the attention of the good people in Montreal who take a special interest in the welfare of those poor creatures is that there should be an enactment whereby those cases could not be settled out of court, and also that the appeals should be restricted, especially in cases where the men or the women found in those institutions have previously been punished. In large cities like Montreal—and I suppose the case applies to all large cities—it is appalling to realize how many young women and especially young girls are taken away from their parents and become the victims of the white slave traffic. I do not know if my hon. friend as Minister of Justice has taken into consideration the remarks I have made to him from time time, but it seems to me, if not at this session, at the next session, he should confer with those in authority at those large institutions and enact pretty drastic amendments to the Criminal Code. I have visited the Montreal institution on two occasions; I know some good ladies who have given their services to the protection of young girls, and they are very anxious that the work should not fail by any laxity in the criminal court, or in the regulations, or in the procedure which takes place either in the Recorder's Court, or before the Appeal Court. I simply wish to remind the minister that it would be the part of wisdom for him some day to review the legislation on this subject and to meet the views of the public.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would remind my hon. friend that it is not easy to find an adequate remedy for that state of affairs. The prisons and reformatories of this kind are not under the jurisdiction of this Parliament; they fall under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. It was suggested to me at one time that some remedy could be brought about by providing for longer sentences for young women offending in the manner referred to, it being pointed out that the stay of a longer period would be more likely to bring about reform. At that time I did make some effort in the direction of endeavouring to feel my way towards the imposition of more severe punishment. I found that there was a very strong reaction against that because it was suggested that by increasing the term of imprisonment, whereas where you had a properly constituted institution where a real work of reform was carried on, the effects would be good, on the other hand, the power being limited to providing for longer sentence of imprisonment, we would not be able to discriminate between different institutions, and it might be unduly harsh to impose upon a young woman, who had made her first slip or started in the wrong path, a very long period of punishment. The objection was not conclusive to myself; but at the same time, at that time at all events, it did not seem possible to hope to put through legislation looking for a remedy by greater severity. No doubt if we could extend more widely the establishment of purely reformatory institutions, that would be of great advantage to the country.

With regard to those younger women falling into the hands of those who had formerly led them into vicious courses, it is very difficult to deal with that from the point of view of criminal law. We have already upon the Statute Book very severe provisions with regard to anything in the way of white slavery or traffic of that kind, and we have in the last few years strengthened the law. There is no doubt that the whole subject of how to deal with offenders of that class and how to surround them with the protection that ought to be afforded to them is one that should call for more consideration, for a real study and a remodelling of our provisions dealing with the matter. When opportunity occurs, if I should be in a position to deal with the matter, I certainly would approach in a most sympathetic way the examination of the question. At present I am afraid I cannot say more. I quite appreciate and sympathize with the suggestion the hon. member has made, and I believe the time will come when we shall be able to deal more satisfactorily with that most unfortunate class. In the meantime certainly every one must appreciate the work of the good ladies to whom the hon. gentleman has referred, who certainly deserve well of the country for the devotion they have shown for a long period to the good work of endeavouring to encourage those young women to improve. It is also fair to express a tribute of appreciation of the work of the good religious who are in charge of the institution to which the hon. member has referred. If the section is taken as carried, we might revert to the one about which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) spoke.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Penalty extended to foster parents:

Mr. DOHERTY: The intention was to add the step-parent or foster parent to the cases provided for. The law already provides for the case of the guardian who seduces his ward, and that is the reason why we repeal subsection (a) and replace it by the present subsection which includes, with the guardian who is already provided for, the step-parent or foster parent.

Mr. McKENZIE: The old section is continued with this added. Is that what the minister means?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, with the addition of foster parent or step-parent. The guardian is already in subsection (a).

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Paragraph penalizing traders for not keeping books redrawn.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the present section?

Mr. DOHERTY: The present section contains a provision just as it is here, save as regards the proviso that a man is not to be convicted if the period for which he failed to keep his books is more than five years anterior to the charge. The present section has been interpreted as providing that if at any time within the last five years he kept any books, he could not be convicted. What was in view under the old section, though it was unfortunately expressed, was that if he had at any time during the last five years failed to keep such books of account he might be convicted. In view of the wording, it was interpreted to mean that only if, as as a matter of fact, for the whole period of five years he kept no books he might be convicted. The proviso here carries out the intention that he is not to be convicted if his offence of not keeping books is more than five years old.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Constables' fees revised.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Speaking generally, what is the percentage of increase?

Mr. DOHERTY: I could not give the exact percentage but it is not very large.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose from ten cents per mile to thirteen cents per mile.

Mr. DOHERTY: The increases are not very large. This proposed tariff has been submitted to the different provincial authorities who are also interested in the question. There has been a suggestion, of some question whether we ought to deal with the tariff of the constables. Whatever there may be in it, the present Criminal Code deals with the tariff, and there has been no serious objection taken.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the purpose of section 8.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is not an unusual section in regard to modifications made to criminal law, because a person should not find himself convicted possibly of a crime newly created until there has been ample opportunity for his being aware of the existence of the law.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand the minister to say that there shall be a uniformity of constables' fees, that is, the provincial governments will enact or amend their scale of fees so as to have uniformity throughout the Dominion?

Mr. DOHERTY: Whether we are really the constitutional authority to fix the tariff or not it has been the practice in the past under our law to fix the tariff for the services of constables in connection with criminal proceedings. It may perhaps be open to the question that being part of the administration of justice it would be more proper that the province should do it. As a matter of fact one of the provinces to which we submitted these changes did suggest that view. The tariff as established by the present Criminal Code has been accepted and acted upon, and the constables have made representations to us, and the provincial authorities in some portions of the country at all events—Ontario notably—have acquiesced in the representation that the fees paid those constables for services in connection with criminal matters were inadequate. The fees, of course, are not paid by the Dominion. In many cases they are paid by the parties. I think a glance at the fees will show they are not unduly large.

Bill reported, read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 12.25 a.m. (Tuesday).

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRICE OF BRAN—SHIPMENTS TO THE UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has had any notices from farmers' clubs or otherwise about the millers selling bran on the other side of the line cheaper than they are selling here. I have a letter from the secretary of the Kintore Farmers' Club, of Ontario, enclosing a clipping from Farm and Dairy to the effect that the Montreal millers had sold three hundred car loads of bran to go to the United States at $25 a ton, and more recent inquiries revealed that the millers generally are shipping immense quantities of bran to the United States at prices ranging from $25 to $27.50 a ton. At the same time, prices in Canada have ranged from $30 to $32 a ton, and are going higher. Has the minister heard anything of the kind, and has he taken any steps to correct the trouble, if the statement is true?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not officially any information with reference to the matter. I have seen statements in the newspapers. The market in the United States is open for the sale of such products and the millers appear to be simply availing themselves of a market which is open to them. They are selling at such prices as they choose to sell.

[Mr. Doherty.]

RECRUITING FOR CANADIAN AND BRITISH FORCES IN THE UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): I would direct the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) to this despatch from New York, dated August 11th, which appeared in the Montreal Gazette:

> More than 5,000 men for Canadian and British forces have been recruited in this country by the British recruiting commission, it was announced here to-day. About 4,400 of these have already gone forward to the depots in Canada, it was stated, the other 600 having been granted time to arrange their affairs.

I desire to ask my hon. friend if the numbers mentioned in this despatch were included in the statement given by him to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) a few days ago.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I could not say whether that would agree with the report I gave the member for Halifax. I have not had the United States returns for a week or so. I asked for them this morning. I have not the figures in my mind at the moment.

RUMOURED PEACE PROPOSALS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? There is a rumour current to the effect that proposals for peace have been made to all the belligerent countries. Has any such proposal come to this Government?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not heard of anything of the kind.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

CHANGES IN THE MEDICAL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: In view of the delay attending the publication of Colonel Bruce's report on the Babtie commission, I would like to ask the First Minister if he will be good enough to tell us what changes have been made in general in the Medical Service in England and at the front within the last twelve months, and whether any further changes are in contemplation, and if so, what is their nature? I do not want the data to-day. I would like to give the Prime Minister an opportunity to make a statement on the question. The reason I ask is while we are aware that certain changes have been made along the lines recommended by Colonel Bruce, nevertheless there are other matters of very serious import. I want to give the Government an opportunity of taking charge of the question without any inquiry, but if it does not do so there will have to be some statement in justice to the soldiers and in justice to all concerned, and I will ask for a day to discuss the question. I would like to let the Prime Minister prepare a statement on it at some convenient time.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will see that the information is available.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

He said: In introducing this legislation to the House, I made so complete a statement as to the reasons actuating the Government to acquire the whole of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, that I deem it unnecessary to say anything further in that connection. I shall, therefore, confine my remarks upon this, the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, to the principal features of the criticism that was offered to the resolution in committee. The criticism was mainly along three lines. First, it was suggested by certain hon. gentlemen opposite that the Dominion Government, instead of acquiring the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, should expropriate the physical undertaking of the company and of the constituent and subsidiary companies constituting the system. Under the legislation which we are adopting, the Dominion Government, by acquiring the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, preserves the entities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and of the constituent and subsidiary companies. If we adopted the suggestion that was made that we should acquire the physical properties of the several companies in the system, we should own the assets of all those companies as the Government now owns the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg.

In passing, I may say that such a policy would be in direct contravention of the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report, and of the report of the chairman of the commission, Mr. Smith, president of the New York Central Railway Company. Apart, however, from that consideration, there is a great and manifest advantage in maintaining the corporate identity of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and of its subsidiary and constituent companies. Particularly is this so with reference to the question of the financing of these companies. I pointed out to the House, when we were in committee upon the resolution, that the Canadian Northern Railway Company had in addition to a large funded debt a considerable short term and floating indebtedness, amounting to about $98,000,000. If the Dominion Government acquired by expropriation the physical assets of the Canadian Northern and the other railways in the system, it would be obliged to find the money to take care of the short date and other indebtedness I have mentioned, or if it failed to find the money to take care of that indebtedness, it would follow that the creditors of the company in respect of the short term and floating indebtedness, would be in a position to appoint a receiver, with the result that the funded indebtedness would at once become due, as to the principal owing under several trust mortgages securing it. The result would be chaos so far as the financial condition of the system is concerned.

I point out to the House that the short term and floating indebtedness is such as to be of some concern to the Government, if it had to be provided for forthwith even in ordinary times; but by reason of the fact that we have entered on the fourth year of the war, with the enormous expenditures which we have in connection therewith, it would be a most serious matter for us to take over the physical properties and assets of this system and find the money to meet not only the floating and short-term indebtedness, but other indebtedness if it should become due by reason of litigation affecting these companies. We take over the system by acquiring its common stock. That will enable the companies, as companies, to continue to finance. So far as concerns the short-term obligations of the company, the Canadian Northern can, in the future, as it has in the past, endeavoured to extend these obligations as they mature, or make fresh issues under its corporate powers in that behalf. The result is that the Dominion Government should not be called upon to any considerable extent to immediately pledge its credit in the raising of loans for the Canadian Northern system. The same remark will apply to the financing of the purchase of rolling stock which may, and will, be required for the Canadian Northern system and its subsidiary companies. There is great need of rolling stock on the part of all the railways of Canada with the exception possibly of the Canadian Pacific. Taking over the Canadian Northern Railway Company as we do by acquiring its stock and preserving as we do the corporate entity of the company, there is no reason why the Canadian Northern should not continue to issue rolling-stock bonds as it has in the past. I think the House is quite familiar with the character of those securities. If the Dominion Government took over the physical properties of the system it would be obliged not only to take care of the large indebtedness which of necessity would become due, but also would be obliged to find the money to purchase equipment, because I cannot conceive of the Dominion Government issuing debentures secured by the pledge of rolling stock.

So much for that phase of the criticism which was offered to the resolution in the committee stage. The other criticisms were, first, that on account of the findings of the Drayton-Acworth report, there was no value in the common stock which we proposed to submit to arbitration, and, secondly, it was suggested that instead of arbitration there should be a reference to the Exchequer Court. I shall deal briefly with these two features of the criticism to which the legislation has been subjected. It has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Drayton-Acworth report expressly finds that there is no value in the property of the shareholders of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. On page 44 of the report they reached this conclusion.

> We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite, resting upon that finding, have submitted that there is no value in the common stock which could be submitted to the decision of arbitrators. Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, in reaching their conclusion, deal, first, with the question of the cash investment, page 41 of the report, and their finding under that heading is that $370,000,000 is the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern system as at present existing. They deal, secondly, and this is one of the most important portions of their report, with the physical basis. At page 43 of their report they say:

> But money cost is not all. We decided also to ascertain the approximate value, on the basis of reproduction cost, of the property as it exists to-day. And we rely on Professor Swain's valuation for this purpose.

After adverting to his valuation they find that the value on the basis of reproducing the entire physical Canadian Northern system in its present condition is $402,749,663. They go on to say:

> Now the outstanding liabilities (bonds, debentures, notes, and bank and other loans) of the company exceed $400,000,000.

On page 44 they refer to the valuation upon the basis of the company as a going concern and they state that:

> Calculating on this basis, in the light of the figures set out above, it is evident that no purchaser would offer for the property a sum amounting to the total of its liabilities.

Upon this finding some hon. gentlemen opposite have argued that there should be no submission to arbitration because of the calculations of the commissioners as to the value of the assets, the amount of the liabilities of the company and their opinion of its value as a going concern. But, I would point out to the House that there are certain important omissions in the Drayton-Acworth report. Professor Swain himself overlooked in his valuation the land owned by the company amounting to 3,000,000 acres, of which 2,000,000 are in the province of Ontario, 400,000 in the province of Quebec, and, speaking from memory, about 800,000 in the West. He also overlooked the deferred payments on lands sold amounting, according to the statement of the company, to $7,000,000 and cash in land sales trust account of $2,400,000.

The position then is that Professor Swain, in his valuation of the undertaking, overlooked a substantial body of assets. In his report, on page 43, he calls attention to the working capital and cash on hand, his statement being:

> In an estimate of physical valuation on the cost of reproduction basis, it is usual to add to the value of physical elements a certain sum for working capital, for the reason that a company beginning operations with only the physical elements in its possession, and no working capital, would be unable to do business. For this reason, the addition of a certain sum for working capital has been frequently approved by courts and commissions. Cash on hand, is, of course, a physical asset.

He goes on to say—and when he says "your attention" he means the attention of the commissioners:

> Your attention is called to these two matters for the reason that neither have been included in the present valuation, and it may be desirable for you to inquire as to the cash on hand and to take account of it as well as of a proper allowance for working capital, in whatever use you may wish to make of the results of this valuation.

Messrs. Drayton and Acworth, in their report, inadvertently overlooked that recommendation of Professor Swain's.

Mr. MURPHY: Was Prof. Swain's attention brought to these omissions and did he admit that he made them?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am unable to make a statement about that. It is clear the omissions were made; there seems no doubt that Messrs. Drayton and Acworth inadvertently overlooked this recommendation of Prof. Swain that they should consider cash and working capital, and, as a result, cash to the amount of $25,000,000, and current accounts to the amount of $8,700,000 were not included in their valuation of the assets of the Canadian Northern system. On the other side of the account, the commissioners overlooked the income charged convertible bonds amounting to about $25,000,000, so that the findings of the Acworth-Drayton Commission, namely that the outstanding liabilities of the company exceed $400,000,000 and that the assets are represented by the sum of $402,000,000, is not quite accurate. I do not mean to say for a moment that this common stock is worth the difference between the liabilities and the assets of the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the statement of liabilities which Prof. Swain has found to be $400,000,000, are the land debenture bonds included?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They are included. So that while the liabilities were included on the one side the asset held in respect of the liability was not included upon the other. I do not at all admit that the difference between the assets and liabilities is at all determinative of the value of the common stock. We do not admit that the common stock is at all worth the difference between the assets and the liabilities of the company, and in that connection I wish to read an expression of an opinion of Prof. Swain with reference to the elements which should enter into a determination of the value. On page 4 of his report, Prof. Swain deals with the principles of physical valuation, and, in passing, he says:

> The word "value" is one of the most uncertain in the dictionary of economics and several distinct meanings are given in treaties on that subject.

He goes on to elaborate that point, and says:

> There is no sentiment about a commercial property like a railroad. The real value of such a property is measured by its earning power and by nothing else. No matter how costly or how inexpensive it may have been originally, its value in exchange will be measured by its earning power. Prospective earning power, perhaps under altered conditions, must of course be considered. Some properties, therefore, have a so-called "strategic" value, because, while they may earn nothing by themselves, they may be combined with other properties in a way to produce or enhance earnings.

Then with regard to the question of the value of the physical properties of a railway company, he makes the following interesting and illuminating statement:

> The valuation of a property is generally for the purpose of ascertaining what the courts have termed "the present value," or "fair present value." Just what the present value, or the fair present value may be, is not easy to state, and probably cannot be stated. The courts, however, have frequently stated what it is not. They have again and again laid down the principle that it is not original cost. In some instances they have stated that it is not the cost of the reproduction new, but it is generally admitted, I think, that both the original cost and cost of reproduction new, and also the depreciation, depending upon circumstances, are all elements which may affect the judgment as to the "fair value."

In other words, none of these things are conclusive; they are only elements in the question of what is the fair value in connection with a system such as this, which would, I think, be proper for arbitrators to take into consideration in valuing the assets and liabilities—not as determining factors but as elements in the determination of what is a fair value.

There will also be the question of the earnings of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, present earnings and prospective earnings. At present the Canadian Northern Railway Company is not earning sufficient over its operating expenses to quite pay its fixed charges. There is a further fact which I am sure the arbitrators would take into consideration, and that is the serious financial position of the company at this time. There are no doubt other factors, but the arbitrators, taking into consideration all the elements which I have mentioned, would undoubtedly be able to reach a fair conclusion as to what was the equitable or reasonable value to place upon the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company which we propose to acquire. Therefore, in so far as criticism of the arbitration proposals is founded upon the statement in the Drayton-Acworth report, it would seem to me not to be conclusive. Such a considerable body of assets has been overlooked on the one hand, and such a considerable amount of liability on the other hand, that undoubtedly the findings of the commission, through inadvertent mistake, are not entitled to be regarded as conclusive.

Another objection which was made by some members was that the value of this stock should be determined by the Exchequer Court. I may say that the Government concluded against this course for the reason which I think I indicated when we were considering the resolutions in committee, namely on account of the time which would be taken in litigation of this kind before a Court of Record—a court bound by hard and fast rules of procedure and by the technical laws of evidence. I think any lawyer in the House will agree with me that, having regard to the magnitude of this system, the expert evidence which could be called on both sides, the determination by accountants of liability, and generally the litigation of so large a question, the determination of this issue before a court of record, which has other business to transact might take two years, and I am sustained in that view by the opinion of the Department of Justice. On the other hand, it occurred to us—and this was the principal reason for determining upon arbitration—which, I might say in passing, was recommended by the Drayton-Acworth report as a mode of settling the differences between the Canadian Northern Railway Company shareholders and the Dominion Railway Company—that arbitrators could proceed in summary fashion. They will not be bound to the same extent, under the language of this legislation, by the hard and fast rules of evidence, but can proceed expeditiously to the determination of the question of what is the fair value of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. We therefore thought it would be fair to all parties concerned if the value of this stock which we are about to acquire was determined by a Board of Arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Dominion Government, one by the owners and pledgees of the stock, and the third to be agreed upon by those two, or, failing agreement, to be appointed by the senior judge of the Exchequer Court. For the information of the House I might say that the arbitrator whom we have had in view, and whom I am able to say will act for the Dominion Government, is Sir William Meredith, Chief Justice of Ontario. I am sure all members of the House will agree with me that the interests of the people of Canada in so important a transaction as this could not be confided to more capable or more trustworthy hands.

Mr. DEVLIN: What experience in railway matters has Sir William Meredith had? This matter is not to be referred to the Exchequer Court but to arbitrators—arbitrators, presumably, who have some knowledge of railway matters. What knowledge of railway affairs has Sir William Meredith?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The judicial experience of Sir William Meredith, Chief Justice of Ontario, to say nothing of his long experience as a lawyer of the highest standing, is such as to eminently qualify him for a position such as this, in which he will represent the Dominion Government in determining the value of this stock.

Mr. MURPHY: That is hardly an answer to the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin).

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would appear to me to be a very complete answer. My hon. friend says: Why not refer the matter to the Exchequer Court? If I used the same argument as my hon. friend I might ask what experience has the judge of the Exchequer Court had in practical railway matters? Judges are men who acquire an immense amount of information in connection with their judicial duties. Apart from that, evidence will be submitted to these arbitrators by the Dominion Government and by the owners and pledgees of the stock as to its value. It would appear to me, therefore, that the interests of the people of Canada could not be entrusted to more capable or more trustworthy hands than to those of the Chief Justice of the province of Ontario.

Mr. MURPHY: Has my hon. friend determined on counsel, as well as an arbitrator, to represent the Dominion Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, we have not considered that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Section 4 says that the arbitrators, in determining the value of the shares, may apply their own judgment. Does the minister think there would be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the exercise of that judgment?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think there would, because we have been careful in the wording of that section to provide that there shall be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada on questions not only of law, but of facts. I do not desire to elaborate, but I do not think it would be possible to secure as arbitrator for the Dominion Government in this important transaction a man having actual railway experience who would have the qualifications possessed by the gentleman whom I have mentioned.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the Bill now before the Senate should pass, would it be possible for Sir William Meredith to act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have the consent of Sir William Meredith to act for the Dominion Government as arbitrator, and I anticipate no difficulty in connection with the legislation my hon friend mentions or any other legislation.

It is not my intention to take up further the time of the House because, as I stated at the outset, this matter was very fully discussed during the committee stage. In concluding, I just wish to say further that by acquiring all the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company the Government obtains the ownership and control of the entire system—a system of 9,500 miles of railway, with the appurtenances of telegraph, express, steamship, elevator, storage and other facilities. The system cannot render the service which it should to the people of Canada unless it is financially able, not only to pay its fixed charges and provide for betterments and improvements, but also to provide for needed extensions. If we brought down, as was suggested by some hon. gentlemen opposite, legislation providing assistance of a temporary character this year, such as was brought down last year, that would only be postponing the problem. Next year there would be the same application for assistance and the same need of relief. The same may be said of the following year; in fact, it is not too much to state that for the next three or four or five years, the Dominion Government would be compelled each year to make provisions for further assistance to the Canadian Northern Railway Company if we proceeded upon the basis of our action of last year. But that, as I stated last year, is not to be thought of. We appointed a commission for the purpose of finding if possible a permanent solution of the question, and with regard to the assistance which the Dominion Government will be called upon now to furnish to the Canadian Northern Railway system, we can say this: The benefit of the expenditure from the funds so granted by way of assistance, whether employed for the purpose of providing betterments and improvements or acquiring rolling stock or making extensions, will inure to the new owners, the people of Canada, who will own the entire $100,000,000 of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway, and thus control the entire system.

I move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, we are in a somewhat peculiar position regarding this Bill; it cannot be said that the situation is absolutely clear. Three parties seem to be concerned in this proposal: first, the Government of Canada; second, a group of financiers, bondholders and others; and, third, Mackenzie and Mann. From the information so far brought down we have no documentary evidence that the Canadian Northern Railway Company has asked for this legislation; neither have we any documentary evidence that Mackenzie and Mann have asked for aid. On the contrary, the statements presented to the House by the Canadian Northern Railway Company rather indicate that Mackenzie and Mann believe that they could swing this enterprise without legislation. It looks as if the financiers behind the owners, not the owners themselves, have asked the Government to pass this legislation and to take over the enterprise.

It can readily be seen that to the bondholders Government ownership of the Canadian Northern would be much more attractive than private ownership of the system under existing conditions. Should this Bill become an Act of Parliament, at once the holders of those securities will find themselves the possessors of a value that they never anticipated and never would have realized had this legislation not been introduced. To them it will be a wonderful and a very profitable piece of financing. However, this Parliament has to do what is best for the country rather than what is best for private individuals. Regard for the interests of the financial group or for the interests of Mackenzie and Mann must, in the minds and acts of members of Parliament, take a secondary place to what is considered to be in the best interests of the people as a whole.

My hon. friend has discussed the arbitration provision and the proposal to have a reference to the Exchequer Court. It is unnecessary for me to reply to this portion of my hon. friend's argument, because I propose to move an amendment that will require neither arbitration nor Exchequer Court proceedings.

The Minister of Finance has rather repudiated the Drayton-Acworth report. I am not going to argue whether that report be correct or incorrect. A great deal of work was done in connection with it and a great deal of industry was displayed; but I am going to brush that to one side; I am not going to ask the House to consider whether the Drayton-Acworth report is reliable or unreliable. It does seem peculiar, though, that a report made by such eminent gentlemen, appointed by the Government, should contain a mistake of so many millions and that that mistake should be discovered only to-day. I do not say that the mistake did not occur; but if it did occur—then the Lord deliver us from the findings of commissions. After all, though we may read reports and statements, we have to come back to our own judgment and take the responsibility of what we do, regardless of what commissioners may find. I am sure that the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Robert Rogers) agrees with me in that respect.

My hon. friend has referred to the short term liabilities. If my memory serves me correctly, these short term liabilities carry with them collateral of Government securities. As a matter of fact, if the Canadian Northern were able to renew its short term notes, the Government of Canada would find the securities which it had guaranteed put up as collateral for these short term notes. So that the situation in reference to these short term notes remains practically the same whether the Government owns the road or whether it is left in the hands of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

I suggested a few moments ago that it was the group of financiers interested, not Mackenzie and Mann, who were urging the Government to take over this enterprise. The Finance Minister has brought down to the House a statement made by his own department which indicates that, at least in certain respects, Mackenzie and Mann have not defaulted. I refer to the provision in the statute of 1914, under which the Government agreed to advance the interest on the $45,000,000 guarantee for three years, divided into six semi-annual payments. This interest was to become part of the capital loan to the Canadian Northern, and was to be repaid when the $45,000,000 were repaid, but the company agreed to pay regularly the interest on this advanced interest. The statement brought down by the Finance Minister shows that the Government has advanced to the Canadian Northern under this section of the statute $2,634,500.01, and that the Canadian Northern has paid interest on this interest to the amount of $35,952.04. The next payment of interest becomes due on September 1; therefore they cannot be said to be in default.

I have intimated that the statement presented to the Government and by the Government to the House rather lead one to the conclusion that Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern Railway Company believe that the enterprise could get along without any legislation by this Parliament at this time. I have before me a statement made by the assistant to the vice-president, Mr. Mitchell; it is an interim condensed general balance sheet of the Canadian Northern Railway system at April 30, 1917.

Mr. CURRIE: Has that been tabled?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. This includes a statement of estimate of cost to complete lines and terminals under construction and financial provision for the same; statement of contractors' and other construction accounts outstanding, June 30, 1917; memorandum re unsold lands; estimate of amount required for betterments and rolling stock for three years. This would seem, although it is an interim report up to April 30, 1917, to cover everything in connection with the Canadian Northern. I will not weary the House by reading this statement. but I will merely point out that, in the statement of assets and liabilities, Mackenzie and Mann claim a surplus of $37,494,870.71.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: What value is placed upon the lands?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is over and above the common stock of $100,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is another statement showing the estimate of cost to complete terminals and lines under construction and financial provision for same, June 30, 1917. In fairness I should add that the statement from which I have just quoted is made up only to April 30, 1917; it is impossible to get the detailed returns up to June 30, 1917, but the estimate I am now reading and the other facts in this statement are all of June 30, 1917. That would be a year later than the date of the statement in the blue-book now in our possession. I might give some of the details:

Western lines	$1,612,005
Eastern lines	110,000
Total	$1,722,005

Estimate cost to complete terminals already under construction:

Montreal terminal	$ 578,000
Toronto terminal	338,094
Pacific Coast terminals	1,500,000
Total	$2,466,094

or an estimate of the total requirements for construction of $4,188,099.

Mr. GLASS: Are those the estimates of the company's engineers?

Mr. GRAHAM: Those are the estimates presented to the Government by the company and presented to the House by the Government. The company claim to have made financial provision for all this construction as follows:

Cash in Trust Accounts applicable to above construction	$3,683,831
Government Guaranteed Securities	217,160
Canadian Northern 4 per cent Debenture Stock	287,108
Total	$4,188,099

In other words, the company presents to us a statement showing that they have made ample provision, without any further aid from this Government, for the completion of the construction now undertaken, and for the lines that they consider ought to be constructed during the war. It is only fair to say that this does not include all the construction work or all the proposed construction work of the Canadian Northern, but only that portion of it which the company deems necessary should be undertaken and completed even if war be in progress. I will read the note at the bottom of this statement so that there will be no misunderstanding:

4 p.m.

The above does not represent the complete construction programme of the company, but only that portion of same which it is desirable should be proceeded with. Arrangements could be made to defer the balance till after the war, when same will be subject to such changes as conditions may necessitate.

It will be observed that for the present, and for the term during which the war is likely to last, the Canadian Northern submit to the Government a statement showing that they desire no aid for this purpose, as they have made complete provision for it in the manner outlined in the statement I have read. Then we have a statement of outstanding accounts. I will not give the entire statement, but will intimate to the House that the outstanding accounts amount to $999,566.95, or about $1,000,000. My hon. friend (Mr. R. B. Bennett) asks me what value the company places upon the land. So that there may be no error, I will read the whole statement.

Lands unsold.	Acres.	Price per Acre	Amount
Manitoba and Saskatchewan	843,127	$15	$12,646,905
Ontario	2,000,000	3	6,000,000
Quebec	402,860	3	1,208,580

or a total value placed on the unsold lands in these four provinces of	$19,855,485
Deferred payments, payments receivable with accrued interest to date	$ 7,140,996 59
Cash in hand, National Trust Company, Ltd., 1899 and 1909 bonds	2,408,683 57
Or a total of	$29,405,165 16
Mortgages outstanding—
4 per cent Land Grant Bonds, 1899	$ 2,000,000 00
4 per cent Land Grant Bonds, 1909	2,217,740 00
5 per cent Land Mortgage Debentures, 1913	17,033,333 33
Total	$21,251,073 33

Or a credit balance, if this statement be correct—and it is presented by the company—of something over $8,000,000. There is a note here which I will read:

1913, selling price western lands, average, $15.36 per acre; 1914, $15.23; 1915, $15.53, and 1916, $16.37.

Hon. gentlemen will see from that that the company itself, in its statement presented to the House, indicates that it is not in a bad financial position; that it has money to carry on its undertakings. That forces the conclusion, at least upon me, that it is not the company that is pressing for this legislation, but it is some people behind the company who advanced money to the company and who feel that not only would their investment be more secure were this railway in the possession of the Government, but its value would be enhanced by millions upon millions of dollars.

I have here another statement—estimate of amount required for betterments and rolling stock:

1918..	$6,590,000
1919..	8,355,000
1920..	8,317,500

I have read those statements by the company to prove what I have stated once or twice before, namely, that there seems to be three distinct parties to this proposal—the Government, the group of financiers, and the bondholders of the Canadian Northern Railway.

I am not sure that these lands will bring the value the company places upon them, but, apparently the company thinks they will.

I am rather going to take the viewpoint of the Minister of Finance that something should be done. What is it? I am of the opinion that the time has come when the people demand that we cease giving further annual or semi-annual aid to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. There are only two ways by which this can be obviated, one would be the purchase of the Canadian Northern by some other corporation. This has not been discussed at length in the House, and I will not intrude it. The other way is for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the people, to get possession of the Canadian Northern in a manner that will be equitable. The Government proposes to take over the road to become the possessor of the $60,000,000 remaining common stock, leaving the value of that stock to be fixed by arbitration. I shall not hark back to the Drayton-Acworth report again, because the Government has rather put it out of business. I shall endeavour to prove my contention as to what should be done, without reference to the Drayton-Acworth report, or to the report made by Mr. Smith, president of the New York Central Railway.

There is a method provided for the taking over of the road under the statute of 1914, and such a step was fully contemplated by the Government, and by Parliament, and its decision only three years ago was embalmed in a statute. This Parliament made a contract with the Canadian Northern Railway, and under that contract, and based upon its terms, we in this House were induced to vote further aid in the way of a guarantee of $45,000,000 of bonds. I contend that if there be default—and that is the condition under which this statute can be made operative—then not by new legislation, not by expropriation, not by the purchase of stock, should this property be acquired, but it should be acquired under the contract made between the parties in 1914.

Let me read one of the clauses in the statute. It will be found in Chapter 20, George V, section 24:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises, and every part thereof, shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

That is the basis on which we in this House consented to give Mackenzie and Mann a further assistance to the extent of the guarantee on $45,000,000 bonds, in the year 1914. Now, I ask you, Sir, and I ask the members of this House, and I ask the country, what has happened that would justify a deviation from that plain contract made with the company? Is there any reason? If there be, it has not been presented to the House. I will quote from the Minister of Finance, to see if under that statute we are now in a position to take over the property as indicated in the section I have just read. Has the condition arisen by which this section can become operative? In other words, is there default, present, or premeditated, or anticipated? It may be remembered that in 1914 the Finance Minister, and, I think, the Solicitor General, spoke very strongly concerning the stringent terms of this statute, and assured the House that they could take over the road without any process of law, by Order in Council, and left us with the impression, at least, that when we were assenting to the passage of that statute, if default should arise they would act under statute. That was the real reason the House consented to the passage of the Act.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is not that the very weakness of the hon. gentleman's argument? There has to be a smash-up, or a break-down, before this comes into effect?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not like to say a "smash-up" or a "break-down," but I think I know what the hon. gentleman means. I will refer him to the Minister of Finance to show that the conditions have arisen which were provided for in this statute.

Mr. BURNHAM: But "premeditated" and "actual" are two different things.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will probably have it "actual" before I am through. When the Minister of Finance introduced the measure in 1914, he assured us that this statute was so framed that in the event of any default the road would practically automatically come into the hands of the Government. On August 1, 1917, the minister said —and it is evidence that the conditions have arisen when this Act should come into force, or if they have not arisen why the legislation now before the House?

Mr. BURNHAM: That is easily answered.

Mr. GRAHAM: It may be for people who are not particular about the answer. Let me read what the minister said:

> The position of the Canadian Northern today is this: The company has a certain amount of net earnings. Its revenues are such that, after paying all fixed charges, it has a surplus. On that statement one might ask: Why should the Canadian Northern require any aid from the Government of Canada? The answer is very simple. Any railway system requires continually to make expenditures of a capital nature, not only on needed extensions—and I believe very few of these are being made at the present time—but on betterments, and requires to expend vast sums in the purchase of rolling stock in order that the public may be served and that the business may be carried on profitably. The essence of the situation, in so far as the Canadian Northern is concerned, is that, although the company makes net earnings, any surplus cash it has on that account it requires to pay for betterments and rolling stock.
> The result is that the company is short of cash for the purpose of paying interest upon its underlying securities. If the cash is used for betterments and for the purchase of rolling stock, it is obvious that it is not available for the payment of the underlying interest charges. Put it the other way. If it is used for the payment of underlying interest charges, the necessary betterments to the road cannot be made nor can rolling stock be purchased. It is not possible for the company, as it would be if the war was not on, to issue further securities for the purpose of paying for these betterments and acquiring rolling stock. That is what a company does in peace times when conditions are such that it can float its securities, but the prolongation of the war has made it impossible for the Canadian Northern to float any additional securities, to issue any further debenture stock, and consequently it has to take its earnings to pay for betterments and the purchase of rolling stock and to meet the instalment payments on account of principal maturing on rolling stock. It is therefore unable to pay its underlying interest charges.

That would seem to be default.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is so declared; that is different.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I had my hon. friend's powers of reasoning I would be delighted with myself.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There is a section in the 1914 statute which declares what default is.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am going to refer to that in a moment. Then the minister goes on to say:

> In addition to this, the company has had to do a great deal of short date financing. There is outstanding, secured, for the most part, by Dominion or provincial guaranteed bonds or debentures, short-term loans floated in New York or London. The amount of that ordinary, short-term liability is about $100,000,000, extending over a period of two years or more. It is not possible for the company, by the issue of permanent securities, to fund that debt. Therefore, it is obliged from time to time to renew these short-term securities, and to carry on as best it may from year to year. The company have, in the past, come to the Government and asked us, as they did last year, to make them a loan of a sufficient amount to take care of the underlying interest charges and to meet the maturing instalments of principal upon rolling stock.

The minister states clearly that the company cannot pay interest on its underlying securities. Let us see if it is in default. I have read the minister's statement in the House to show that the Canadian Northern has not been able, and is not now able, to pay interest on its underlying securities. Section 21 of the statute of 1914 tells us what default means. It says:

> 21. The following shall be events of default within the meaning of this Act, viz:—
> (a) If the Canadian Northern shall make default in payment of the principal or interest of the guaranteed securities or any part thereof, or default in observing or performing any of the provisions of the New Trust Deed, and the security constituted by the New Trust Deed shall thereby become enforceable;
> (b) If while any of the guaranteed securities are outstanding in the Canadian Northern or any Constituent or Subsidiary Company shall make default in the payment of the principal or interest or any other part thereof, of any securities heretofore or hereafter created or issued under the existing trust deed or mortgage securing the same, or under any future trust deed securing securities having priority to the guaranteed securities, or default in observing or performing any of the terms of any such existing or future trust deed or mortgage, and the security constituted by any such trust deed or mortgage shall thereby become enforceable;

(c) If, while any of the guaranteed securities are outstanding, an order be made by any court against any company in the Canadian Northern System for the appointment of a receiver or for possession, or if a receiver be otherwise appointed or possession be otherwise lawfully taken of the whole or part of the undertaking.

That indicates clearly that if they at any time default in the payment of interest or principal then this section 21 becomes enforceable and we surely should not run away from the enforcement of our own statute passed only three years ago to cover the case that arises to-day and the existence of which was contemplated when we passed the statute.

Mr. BURNHAM: That has not been so found.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, my hon. friend does not accept the minister's statement.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There was a default in addition to that because of the non-payment of a demand loan last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend from Calgary says there was a default because of the non-payment of a demand loan last year. But, let me point this out: I see what is in the mind of my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham), or I think I do. He says there is a statement showing that the interest has been paid and that certain other interest has been paid. But, who paid it? Did the Canadian Northern? They made default, or they would have made default, if the Government had not come to the rescue, and it will have to do the same thing again. The Minister of Finance said so plainly in his remarks. I think there can be no question that—unless my hon. friend is revolving his ideas around a technicality—the Canadian Northern is in default in so far as the company itself is concerned, and that it will only be saved from a second default by the action of the Government and by another payment to it.

Mr. BURNHAM: What is the difference between this case and ordinary foreclosure proceedings to enforce the payment of a debt?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a particular statute covering this case. This is not an ordinary foreclosure case, but a summary foreclosure by Order in Council. Let me give the statement made by the Finance Minister. It is patent, for the reason stated by the Finance Minister, that in order to save the company from a real default last year we advanced $15,000,000 with which to pay interest. Now we are asked again to do something else. I want to refer to what the Finance Minister said a moment ago. He said that if we were to take expropriation proceedings it might be possible that the whole system would be thrown into the hands of a receiver by the action even of a subsidiary company, and that would possibly necessitate the Government taking up all the outstanding securities for the payment of which demand was made, and would involve the payment of six per cent interest on these securities which were running at three and a half and four per cent, and which, under the proposal made by the Government, would not have to be taken up until maturity. I am assured on high authority that under the proposal outlined in this statute there would be no such situation arising as that which has been suggested by the Finance Minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If you foreclosed under the statute, would you not have to take the equity of redemption in the physical property of the Canadian Northern?

Mr. GRAHAM: If you foreclosed under this Order in Council the Government would become the proprietor of the Canadian Northern in place of the present proprietors.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And would own all the physical properties of the Canadian Northern?

Mr. GRAHAM: Would own everything in connection with it except the $60,000,000 of shares and these would not have any value.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: You would acquire the physical property?

Mr. GRAHAM: You would acquire the ownership of the Canadian Northern under the statute. When we passed that statute in 1914 we surely understood what we were doing and what it will do to-day is the same thing that we knew it would do when the Government asked us to pass it in 1914. I see no reason why the Government should not act upon that statute by Order in Council. That would do away with the trouble about the common stock.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, the section provides that that has to be paid for.

Mr. GRAHAM: Section 24?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: On such terms and conditions as may be fixed by Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If any.

Mr. GRAHAM: If any. I had better read section 24 again?

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment, or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is that not exactly what Parliament is now doing—providing for an arbitration by which the terms to be paid for the stock will be settled.

Mr. GRAHAM: This present legislation contemplates paying a certain amount for the common stock.

Mr. BENNETT: If any.

Mr. GRAHAM: It contemplates it or makes provision for it because it gives tacitly a value to the common stock by saying that we are going to appoint arbitrators to ascertain what it is worth. I submit that the statute of 1914 never contemplated the legislation we have before us now. It contemplated taking over this property by Order in Council and it so stated. I can see no reason under all the circumstances why the Canadian Northern should have any exceptional treatment.

Mr. LALOR: Is it not a fact that in the former case the Parliament of Canada were to be the arbitrators and now we are appointing arbitrators in place of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: I said the other day that if the Government proposed to give them money for their common stock, let them have the courage to say so and let Parliament have the courage to carry out this statute and say what, if anything, we will give them. Then we will discuss it. But the Government is getting around it by the appointment of another commission, and I am not sure but that the Finance Minister, when the findings of that commission come in, will say: We do not believe in our commission; they made some errors.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: You said that Parliament should have courage to say what amount if any the Canadian Northern Railway are entitled to. Would that not be assuming, in the same way as this, that they are entitled to some consideration?

Mr. GRAHAM: Parliament might say that they had no equity, or that the equity was worthless; and, if the Government think they have some equity, why not put it in the statute and not send the question to arbitrators?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: We did not want to commit ourselves as was done in 1914.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is learning by experience. He does not want to commit himself. That is a safe course to take before an election. He does not want to commit himself as Parliament did in 1914 to $45,000,000, out of the conditions of which commitment the Government is now trying to squirm. I am not going to be driven from this, even if I am questioned by every member in the House. We made a contract with the Canadian Northern Railway in 1914. They made a distinct contract with us. That contract provided that if that company defaulted, then, automatically, this property would become the property of the Dominion of Canada. Now we are trying to get around that by new legislation to buy the stock. The Minister of Finance says that the country does not take the property but becomes the possessor of $60,000,000 of stock and leaves it to arbitration, not to say, under this agreement, that the property is ours but to say what we shall pay as the value of its common stock, over and above the value of the property itself. Believing that, if this property is to be taken over, I think we ought to take it over—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: I move the following amendment, seconded by Mr. Nesbitt:

That all the words of the question after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"Whereas in the year 1914 this Parliament was induced to guarantee the securities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company for $45,000,000 on the representation that with that amount the said railway could be completed and operated without further aid from Parliament, which arrangement is contained in Chapter 20 of 4-5 George V.

And whereas by section 24 of the said Act it is enacted as follows:

"If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding."

And whereas the Minister of Finance in introducing this measure stated that the company is unable to pay its underlying interest charges and continue the proper operation of the road;

And whereas the report of the Commissioners appointed by the present Government to investigate and report upon the condition of the Canadian Northern Railway states that there is no value either actual or potential attaching to the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company: It is therefore resolved that in the opinion of this House Parliament should proceed to take over the said railway for the benefit of the people of Canada under the said provision of the said Act and that the capital stock of the said Canadian Northern Railway Company should be considered in the said foreclosure order as possessing no value and that nothing should be paid therefor.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has a habit of crediting every one in the world except himself with lack of courage and he was not free from that habit to-day, because he said that if the Government had courage they would come down to Parliament and state an amount which they regarded as the fair value of the $60,000,000 common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and propose to Parliament that such amount should be paid. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to imagine what a shout would have gone up from the hon. member for South Renfrew if we had done anything of the kind. He knows perfectly well the attitude he would have taken with regard to such a proposal coming from the Government. He knows perfectly well, in speaking of courage, that no hon. gentleman in this House has had more courage in the proposal of inconsistent policies with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway than he has had. I shall come to that in a moment, after making a few observations respecting his criticism of the proposals of the Government, and respecting the proposal which he himself has put forward.

In the first place, he finds fault with our proposals because the Canadian Northern Railway, he says, do not want this legislation, and they do not want any aid at all. Almost in the same breath with which he announced that conclusion, he informed the House and the country that the Canadian Northern Railway Company is actualy or potentially in default. Which statement shall we take—the statement at the commencement of my hon. friend's observations, or the statement at the conclusion) Is he able to say now on which ground he stands? I do not think my hon. friend has yet reached a conclusion as to that.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh yes, he has, and he stated it distinctly.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He stated distinctly the two inconsistent propositions I have just mentioned. I am simply asking which of these two inconsistent propositions he will eventually stand for.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have made my statement.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: More than that, he has made two statements, and more than that, he has made two inconsistent statements, and I have asked him which of these two he intends to stand for.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend must have been nervous, or he did not hear me for some reason or another. I first stated the Canadian Northern attitude and quoted their statement as presented by the Government, to show their view point. Then I expressly stated that I agreed with the attitude of the Minister of Finance who said in his speech, that the company were in default.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The attitude of the Canadian Northern in regard to the matter does not support my hon. friend's position at all, and he knows that perfectly well. The attitude of the Canadian Northern is precisely that which the Minister of Finance has described, namely, that they have a great railway system built up in Canada but which is not yet completed, which has not yet had a fair opportunity to demonstrate what its earnings may be. In order to carry that road on to completion, and, more particularly, for the purpose of operating it, for providing betterments, and rolling stock, and everything else that is necessary, and besides all that, meeting fixed charges, it is necessary for the company to have a certain capital which they are unable to procure without the aid of the Government.

The Government came to the aid of this road in 1914, and again in 1916. It also came to the aid of the Grand Trunk Pacific (an enterprise for which it was not responsible) in 1914, and again in 1916. So far as the Canadian Northern Railway is concerned, the Government has reached the conclusion that if, in order to prevent receivership or liquidation, further aid is necessary, that aid ought to be given to a road, the whole of whose capital stock is vested in the people of Canada, so that the people of this country may receive any benefit and advantage which would be derived from the aid thus given. That is a very plain statement of the Government's proposal on this occasion. It is perfectly obvious the Canadian Northern Railway cannot carry on and must face receivership or liquidation unless something is done. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have said that we should come to the aid of the road in 1917 as we did in 1916 and in 1914. We have reached the conclusion that further aid to the road ought not to be provided by this country unless the entire ownership of the road is vested in the people of Canada through the acquisition of the balance of the stock.

My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) went further and said not only that the Canadian Northern did not want aid, but that the aid had been asked for by financiers behind the road. I take absolute exception to that remark, for which there is no foundation whatever.

My hon. friend said further that the holders of securities would find this transaction a very profitable thing as far as they were concerned. Will my hon. friend inform me whether they will find it more profitable than they would have found it under the proposals which he supported in 1914, looking to the acquisition of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company by this country at a valuation as high as $30,000,000? I think that proposal would have delighted the holders of these securities much more than the very modest proposals that the Government of the day is now putting forward. I would also point this out. In any event, the amount which must come out of the road, if it does not go into liquidation or into the hands of a receiver, is the amount of the securities with the added interest from year to year. In either the one case or the other, that is all that the holders of the securities can get, and therefore I am unable to appreciate my hon. friend's argument in the sense in which he placed it before the House.

He stated further that the Minister of Finance has repudiated the Drayton-Acworth report. According to my understanding of what the Minister of Finance said, he did nothing of the kind. He pointed out that in Professor Swain's report, certain elements of value which would have to be taken into account by arbitrators determining either the value of the road or the value of the capital stock, had been inadvertently overlooked by Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth.

I do not propose to accept the valuation of the Canadian Northern Railway Company as to the lands. I do not propose in this House to build up any argument which could be used by the Canadian Northern Railway Company before the arbitrators. But it is perfectly proper to point out, when it is set up by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, that there is absolutely no value in this stock or in the road, that these items were inadvertently omitted, and that the company itself puts forward certain claims in respect of other items which it alleges have been omitted, and as to which they are at least entitled to a hearing. The Drayton-Acworth Commission was not appointed for the purpose of determining the value of the Canadian Northern Railway system, nor for the purpose of determining the value of the stock of that road. Would any hon. gentleman in this House say that the interests of this country would be advanced by any action in this Parliament that would take away from any man or any group of men in this or any other country, his property against his will without giving him a reasonable hearing for the purpose of determining its value? We cannot do that, and I shall come in a moment to the statute of 1914 and shall demonstrate very clearly, if not to my hon. friend, to any reasonable man in this House, that the proposal which we are placing before Parliament is based on precisely the same principle that Parliament would have been obliged to follow under the legislation of 1914.

My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) read certain statements which have been tabled by the Minister of Finance, and he spoke of the needs of the company as to rolling stock and other requirements. He agreed that something must be done at this stage, and he agreed also, if I understood him correctly, that no more annual applications for aid should be entertained. Then he came down to the legislation of 1914, upon which he bases his chief argument. He endeavoured in the first place to distort the statements of the Minister of Finance into a declaration that default has actually occurred. The statements of the Minister of Finance bear no such construction, and if my hon. friend examines them carefully I am sure he will agree with that. His principal allusion was to sections 21 and 24 of the Act of 1914. Let us look once more at section 24, and ascertain whether or not the necessary procedure under that section would be different from that which we are now proposing to Parliament. Section 24 is as follows:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the first place, I invite the attention of the House to this: sections 22 and 23 provide that in certain events the Governor in Council may declare to be vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern and of any of the constituent or subsidiary companies and that the Governor in Council may thereupon appoint directors to the offices so vacated and proceed to assume the management of the Canadian Northern railway system. Then comes section 24, which provides that if any such default has taken place, the Governor in Council, upon such terms and conditions as Parliament may prescribe, shall declare the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed. The effect of that would be to take out of the ownership of the Canadian Northern Railway Company the physical properties now vested in that company and to transfer them to the Crown in the right of the people of Canada. The Canadian Northern Railway Company would cease to own the physical properties that were vested in it. The Canadian Northern Railway Company would cease to be the holder of the stock of the subsidiary and constituent companies; and the physical properties to which I have referred, as well as the stock in the constituent and subsidiary companies, would be vested in the Crown, in the right of the people of Canada. The road then being vested in the Crown, its operations would have to be provided for. We should either have to bring it under the administration of a department of the Government, under a minister of the Crown, or provide some machinery by which the operation of the road could be carried on on behalf of the people. But the member for South Renfrew seems to take it for granted that all this can be done by Order in Council. It cannot be done by Order in Council until the authority of the Parliament of Canada shall have first been obtained. Let me emphasize the language of section 24 in that regard:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, etc.

What would be the duty of a government in this or in any other country if it came to Parliament with a proposal that certain property subject to a mortgage should be foreclosed, and that the title to that property should be vested absolutely in the mortgagee? Would it be a proper course for the Government to invite Parliament to confiscate that property without regard to the claims of the owners that the equity of redemption had some value? Even if the Government or Parliament were absolutely convinced that the property had no value, would it be according to the ordinary dictates of justice as administered in this country at all times in the past—and as it will, I hope, be administered in the future—that the right of hearing as to the value of the property should be denied to the persons in whom that property was vested? I venture to say that neither this Government nor any Government that could be formed on the other side of the House would come to Parliament and say: Although this claim as to value is put forward, we shall disregard it; we shall pass a resolution of this Parliament vesting in the Crown without compensation the equity of redemption which is now held by the persons who own this property subject to the mortgage. What, therefore, would be the proposal that a government, having reasonable regard to these considerations, should make to Parliament? It would ask Parliament to establish and define some tribunal before which the persons in whom the equity of redemption was vested should have reasonable opportunity of putting forward their claim, if any, and of supporting it by such evidence as might be available. That, it seems to me, would be the result if we proceeded under the statute of 1914, and that is precisely the method which we are adopting in presenting to the House the proposals that are now under consideration. The only distinction, therefore, between the procedure under the Act of 1914 and the procedure proposed by the Government at this time is simply this: in the one case we acquire absolutely the ownership of the road by foreclosing the mortgage and vesting the title to the physical properties in the Government; in the other case we vest the ownership in the Government by the absolute acquisition of all the stock, maintaining the corporation as an entity and using the corporate machinery for the purpose of operating the road in order that it may not be brought under the direct administration of the Government itself. That is the difference between the one proposal and the other. I will repeat that in order that I may make my remarks perfectly clear to the House and to the country. In the one case, we should acquire, by arbitration or by reference to some similar tribunal, the equity of redemption in these properties, and having acquired that equity of redemption we should either have to administer those properties under the direction of the Government itself, or provide some machinery by which they could be administered without the direct intervention of the Government. In the other case, we do not take away from the company the ownership of the physical properties; we leave them in the company as they are at present, but we proceed to acquire the entire balance of the capital stock so that the road, to all intents and purposes, is vested and will remain vested in the ownership of the people of this country. To my mind, the advantage of that is obvious. By acquiring the stock without taking the property out of the ownership of the company we still use the corporate machinery, the staff of employees, all the organization that has been built up during fifteen or twenty years; we utilize all that; we operate the road by means of that; we avoid the evils and dangers which would attend the administration and operation of this road under a department of the Government. That is the difference between what is possible under the legislation of 1914, and under the legislation of to-day. The only distinction of any importance is one that I am prepared to maintain and support as obviously in the interests of this country; that is, in the operation of this road and in the administration of its affairs we shall use the corporate machinery; we shall not bring the road directly under the administration of a Government department.

Having regard to what I have said and the explanation I have made, what remains of the amendment of my hon. friend? I have shown, that, so far as principle is concerned, we have acted absolutely in accord with the statute of 1914, but we have modified it in this respect, that, under this proposal, we can use the powers of the corporation, the organization which it has built up and the machinery at its disposal, and we could not have done that if we had pursued in every respect the method embodied in the legislation of 1914. Therefore, when my hon. friend, with something of a flourish at the commencement of his speech, said that he had a method that would avoid any inquiry, any arbitration, and any delay, he was speaking without his book, unless he is prepared to say that he will support legislation which will deny to any man or any group of men in this country the right to come forward and support by evidence, if they can, the reasonable value of property taken from them. I do not think it would be in the interest of this country, which for many years to come must be a great borrowing country, if its resources are to be developed, that the Parliament of Canada should adopt any such method as that. It would be exceedingly unfortunate that it should go abroad to the United States of America, to Great Britain, or to any of the other great lending countries of the world, that the people of Canada are represented in Parliament by men who are disposed, on occasion, for one purpose or another, to deny to those whose property is taken against their will, the right and the opportunity to make good their claim as to its value before an impartial and properly constituted tribunal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What did the Government mean by asking Parliament to enact by section 24 that the Government may by Order in Council bar and foreclose the equity of redemption without any condition?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It says: if authorized by Parliament.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the first place, the Government did not ask Parliament to do anything of the kind, and in the second place the Government meant precisely what the statute sets forth. The section reads:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe.

I will repeat my statement, for the information of my hon. friend, if he did not understand me before: No Government of whatever political party would, as I believe, ask Parliament to confiscate any man's property without giving him the right to put forward and support his claim as to its value. In the Expropriation Act of this country, it is provided that when any man's property is taken, he shall have the right to make good his claim in the court.

5 p.m. Suppose we expropriated property of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), and suppose the Government had reached the firm conclusion that that property was really of no value; that it was not being used by the hon. member for St. John; would he consider that he was being fairly treated or justly dealt with if the Government of this country, in pursuance of a power obtained from Parliament, should take his property away from him and at the same time deny him the right to make good his claim as to its value?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, if we had so agreed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In this case there has been no such agreement, because the section of the statute reads:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe.

My hon. friend realizes, I am sure, that if some such procedure as that to which I have alluded had not been in the minds of members of Parliament, they would not have alluded to terms and conditions as a condition precedent before this property should be foreclosed. Does my hon. friend place importance upon the words "if any"?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend places importance upon the words "if any," and he apparently construes them as if the section had read:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may, without any term or condition whatever, . . . declare the property to be foreclosed.

If my hon. friend is prepared to say that the language which appears in the statute is the equivalent of that which I have just described as his interpretation of it, then I cannot agree with him at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What effect does the Prime Minister give to the words "if any"?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Precisely the meaning which they have, namely, that if it were perfectly apparent and admitted by the owners of the property that the equity of redemption had no value whatever, then Parliament need not establish any tribunal. That is the meaning of the words "if any". If that were perfectly apparent, and admitted by the owners of the property, it would be an idle thing for Parliament to fix any terms and conditions. Does the hon. gentleman deduce from that the argument that, when the owners of the properties claim vehemently and persistently that their equity of redemption has a value, we should by reason of the words "if any" deprive them of the right to appeal to any properly constituted tribunal in this country? If my hon. friend is prepared to take that view, then all I have to say——

Mr. GRAHAM: Will the Prime Minister allow me to suggest——

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Will my hon. friend allow me to finish my sentence? Then, all I have to say is that, if my hon. friend from St. John has reached that conclusion, he has reached a very advanced stage in his political development. There may be circumstances in which Parliament need not prescribe any terms or conditions, because the matter would be so obvious. But I ask any reasonable man in this House or in this country whether we are to deduce from the words "if any" the conclusion that persons, who claim, with some show of reason, that their equity of redemption has a certain value, shall be debarred from putting that claim forward and supporting it by any evidence that may be available for that purpose.

Mr. GERMAN: Can the Prime Minister suggest any reason, if there be an equity of redemption, why the senior Judge of the Exchequer Court should not settle what the equity of redemption is?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is coming to a different point altogether from that which I was discussing. The hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) says: There should be no inquiry. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) says: There should be an inquiry, but it should be before the Exchequer Court. As I will show in a moment, this is very much along the line of what we encountered in dealing with this matter in 1914.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You put in section 24 which apparently is of no value.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say that it was of no value.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We are not acting upon it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are not acting directly upon it for reasons I have stated. If my reasons have not yet reached the inner consciousness of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that is my misfortune, but certainly not my fault.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is certainly not your fault.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. Let us look for a moment at the constitution of the tribunal, because that is the point to which the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) has directed my attention.

What was the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite who put forward views on this question in 1914? All the leading men among them who spoke, said that the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company could not be allowed to go into liquidation. I have their statements under my hand, but I will not trouble the House to quote them. If my statement is challenged I can give the date and the page of Hansard where such utterances appear. They said the road should not be allowed to go into liquidation and then they proceeded to show their sincere belief in that declaration by voting for a proposal to have the measure of the Government postponed for six months, which meant it would not be acted upon during that sesion and that liquidation would ensue. First they said: "We must give aid." Then they said "We must not give aid." That is the literal meaning of the two positions they took. Then they asked Parliament to declare that there was not sufficient or reasonable information on which to base aid, and they proceeded to declare, although they said they had no such reasonable or sufficient information, that the road was bankrupt. They then advocated the acquisition of the whole of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway, by arbitration, at a value not exceeding $30,000,000. I think it might be worth while for me to refer my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) to these passages, in order that he may reach a conclusion as to why in 1914 arbitration was proposed instead of a reference to the judge of the Exchequer Court, because it is as fair for me to put that question to him as it is for him to put the question which he has just now proposed to me. Let us look at the record. On May 28, 1914, as reported at page 4391 of Hansard, my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) put forward this proposal:

> (e) To provide that the Governor in Council shall have the option at any time within such period of five years to acquire the absolute ownership of the said stock and of the said Canadian Northern Railway system, and of all the constituent and subsidiary companies mentioned in the said resolution or proposed agreement, subject to existing encumbrances and to said arrangements regarding the conversion of said income charge convertible debenture stock, for a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed the sum of $30,000,000, being the par value of such stock so to be reduced as above provided.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my hon. friend think it fair to read only one clause of a resolution which contains four clauses?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am explaining the other clauses. In the previous clauses my hon. friend had proposed that the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company should be reduced to $30,000,000, and he proposed to secure that $30,000,000 of capital stock at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed $30,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my right hon. friend allow me to correct him. That was not the resolution. The resolution was that the whole of the stock should be reduced to $30,000,000, that it should be transferred to trustees, to be held for His Majesty, to become the property of His Majesty, and if the company should pull through for a period of five years, if Parliament decided to take the stock, we should have the right to take it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will come to something more direct later on. My hon. friend did not propose that the stock should be owned by His Majesty but that it should be held by His Majesty, so that His Majesty should have control over the affairs of the road in the meantime. So far as the actual acquisition of the stock is concerned, I repeat what my hon. friend proposed on that occasion, and on another occasion as well, was to acquire the capital stock of the entire Canadian Northern Railway at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed $30,000,000, and he succeeded in inducing his leader to adopt that view. On the second day of June, 1914, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition made this proposal, seconded by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who supported it in a strong speech—perhaps I had better read the concluding portion of the remarks of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), because he stated that in what I am about to quote he summarized the whole argument from the standpoint of his supporters in the House. At page 4634 of Hansard my right hon. friend said:

I said a moment ago that my intention was simply to summarize the views and the policy which we have laid before the people on this question, and summarize them in a few words. We must carry on this enterprise; we cannot allow it to go by default; we cannot allow anybody or anything to come in which would imply anything detrimental to our credit in England; this enterprise has to be carried out; but instead of carrying it out in the way proposed, we propose that we should carry it out by other means—that we should take absolute control of the enterprise; and for that purpose I beg to move, seconded by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley):

'That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that under existing circumstances no assistance should be given to the Canadian Northern Railway Company unless at the same time it is provided that the Government have power, within a reasonable time, to acquire the ownership of the entire stock of the company at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed thirty million dollars.'

My hon. friend the member for Welland (Mr. German) voted for that resolution. I see his name recorded in the division. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) was not here, I believe, but he was paired as voting in favour of that resolution. My hon. friend, the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), in speaking on the subject—

Mr. GRAHAM: Did not the Prime Minister vote against it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes. We did not propose to vote for it with the suggestion contained in the resolution that the stock was worth $30,000,000. My hon. friend the member for South Renfrew in the course of his speech to-day criticised us because in proposing a reference to arbitration he declared we were attributing a certain value to the equity of redemption in this property or in this stock. What does he think of the effect of the motion which he supported in 1914—a motion moved by his leader, which attributed a possible value of $30,000,000 to the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) has usually a pretty fair memory but I am afraid that his attitude on this question in 1914 must have escaped his recollection when he made the remark which I have just quoted.

But my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) emphasized the exceedingly fair nature of the proposal made by his leader. He said it was fair to the proprietors of the Canadian Northern; it was fair to the people of this country; it was fair to the Government; it was fair to Parliament; it was fair to everybody. Here is his language as found on page 4641:

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moves as an amendment that as a condition of granting this aid the Government shall be allowed to take control of this stock and control of the enterprise until it is completed, and that the country shall have leave to take over the entire stock of the Canadian Northern railway within a reasonable time at a price to be fixed by arbitration but not to exceed the sum of $30,000,000. Is not that a reasonable proposition? Is not that a proposition which is fair to the people of this country who are called upon to assume this enormous liability? Is it not fair to Mackenzie, Mann, and Company who are asking this country, for the fourth time, to help to complete this enterprise? It is fair to Mackenzie, Mann and Company, and it is a fair and reasonable proposition on behalf of the people of this country.

Yet my hon. friend to-day is horrified at the idea of giving any hearing to the proprietors of the Canadian Northern stock or any hearing to the company in which is vested the equity of redemption subject to the mortgages which have been placed upon the property for the purpose of constructing the railway. I do not think that my hon. friends, in view of the attitude which they took in 1914, can expect that the country will give a great deal of weight to their affected horror at the very reasonable proposals of the Government.

I would like to say further in conclusion, that I expected hon. genlemen on the other side of the House to adopt a somewhat different attitude from that which they have assumed, because, after all, it is perfectly plain and clear, not only to this Parliament but to the people of this country, that it is they who are responsible for the existing conditions.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition brought down his proposals for the construction of the National Transcontinental Railway in 1903 and he modified them in 1904. He introduced those proposals by a preamble which read:

"Whereas, having regard to the growth of population and the rapid development of the production and trade of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and to the great area of fertile and productive land in all the provinces and territories as yet without railway facilities, and to the rapidly expanding trade and commerce of the Dominion, it is in the interest of Canada that a line of railway, designed to secure the most direct and economical interchange of traffic between Eastern Canada and the provinces and territories west of the great lakes, to open up and develop the northern zone of the Dominion, to promote the internal and foreign trade of Canada, and to develop commerce through Canadian ports, should be constructed and operated as a common railway highway across the Dominion, from ocean to ocean, and wholly within Canadian territory."

That was the preamble to the schedule of the agreement ratified by the Transcontinental Railway Act, 1903. The preamble of the Act itself is:

"Whereas by reason of the growth in population and the rapid development in the productiveness and trade of Canada, and especially of the western part thereof, and with a view to the opening up of new territory available for settlement, both in the eastern provinces and in the West, and the affording of transportation facilities for such territory, and for other reasons the necessity has arisen for the construction of a National Transcontinental railway to be operated as a common railway highway across the Dominion of Canada from ocean to ocean and wholly within Canadian territory."

I will come back in a moment or two to the consideration of the conditions, as to information and otherwise, which were before my right hon. friend when he embarked on this scheme. What I want to call attention to at the moment is that in the Act of 1911, under the administration of my hon. friend (Mr. Graham), then Minister of Railways, almost identical language—practically identical language—was used in regard to the Canadian Northern as a great transcontinental system. Here is the preamble to the Canadian Northern Railway statute of 1911, which provided for subsidies and assistance to that road:

"Whereas having regard to the growth of population and the rapid development of the production and trade of that portion of Canada lying west of the Great Lakes, and to the rapidly expanding trade and commerce of Canada generally, it is in the interests of Canada as a whole, that another line of railway designed to assist in the direct and economic interchange of traffic between the eastern and western portions of Canada, to open up and develop portions as yet without railway facilities, to promote the internal and foreign trade of Canada, to develop commerce through Canadian ports, and to afford the Government system of railways in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island an interchange of through traffic, should be constructed from the Pacific ocean to the city of Montreal."

Let hon. gentlemen consider the position in which the present Administration found itself when we came into power in October, 1911. We found two transcontinental railway systems under construction, both of them declared by Parliament, under the administration of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to be great national trans-continental railway systems and both supplied with subsidies and guarantees to the end that their construction might be assured. What did we do when we came into power and when it had become evident that the arrangements made by hon. gentlemen opposite when they held the seals of office were not adequate for the purpose of carrying through these two projects which they had initiated?

What position confronted us? Two possible courses were open to us: either to let those national highways of Canada go to the wall, go into liquidation, to the discredit of Canada, to the great detriment of the public interest, as we thought, or, to implement the legislation that had been passed under the administration of my right hon. friend by such further aid and such further provisions as, having regard to the interest of the people of this country, might be necessary to ensure the completion of these roads. And so we have come to Parliament from time to time as it seemed necessary and asked Parliament to deal with the situation.

So far as the Canadian Northern Railway is concerned, we are now coming to Parliament for the last time, because we have reached the conclusion that it is imperatively necessary, in the interests of the people of this country, that that road should not be allowed to go to the wall, but that, if further aid is to be granted by the people of Canada, such aid should be for the benefit and advantage of Canada as a whole and not for the benefit and advantage of the proprietors of the road.

I should like to point out to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that he has a considerable responsibility for the situation that has thus developed, because I think that his best friends will admit, and he himself should be disposed to admit, that he embarked upon the project of the National Transcontinental railway without adequate information as to its cost or its possibilities. If he is not prepared to make that admission to-day, I do not know how he can square himself with the facts as they have since developed. There was a very simple course open to my right hon. friend in 1903 and 1904. What was the position at that time? There was an old and strongly established road in the east of Canada, the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which has afforded great service to the people and deserves consideration for the service so rendered; and what was its position? It was gathering up traffic in Eastern Canada to be carried to the West, and it had no western connections. As Mr. Hays pointed out, in one of his addresses to his shareholders, the road was in an extraordinary situation. It had the best means of gathering up traffic in Eastern Canada that any railway possessed, and it was gathering up that traffic for the benefit and advantage of another system. What was the position in the West. Besides the Canadian Pacific railway, there was another railway possessing a position of great advantage in the western provinces, the Canadian Northern Railway Company, getting access to the best territory there, reaching out to rapidly developing communities, and possessing in Western Canada the exact complement of the Grand Trunk in Eastern Canada. Here was the Grand Trunk Railway in Eastern Canada with no western connections; here was the Canadian Northern Railway in Western Canada with no eastern connections, each gathering up traffic in its territory and handing it over to a rival system. What should have been the obvious course to be pursued by my right hon. friend under those circumstances? It seems to me that he should have insisted that the Grand Trunk Railway Company in Eastern Canada, and the Canadian Northern Railway Company in Western Canada, each possessing facilities that were the complement of the other, should join forces, and that he should have created out of those two companies one railway system. I venture to say that if he had done that, instead of these companies coming, both of them, year after year, and asking the Government of Canada for aid to prevent their going into liquidation or into the hands of a receiver, we would have had a railway undertaking in Canada that would have been strong beyond question and would have been able, if necessary, to lend money to the people of Canada in this time of emergency instead of asking for aid. So that my right hon. friend has great responsibility; he has, indeed, the chief responsibility, for the existing railway situation in this country.

I do not for one moment repudiate the responsibility which the present Administration has in this matter. We had before us just two alternatives: One was to let these roads go to the wall, to injure the credit of this country beyond measure, to bring about grave detriment to the public interest, to discourage the public sentiment of Canada, to make it appear to the world that all this development in this country rested on no sure foundation, and to put Canada back a quarter of a century. That was one alternative.

The other alternative was to go forward, and, having regard to the lack of information evidenced by my right hon. friend when he undertook these proposals, having regard to his lack of foresight, to sustain these undertakings as best we could, in the hope and, more than that, in the belief, that they would eventually become self-sustaining. That is our responsibility in the matter. That is a responsibility which I unhesitatingly accept.

I believe that the proposals which we now submit to Parliament are thoroughly in the interest of the people of this country, and that, in the years to come, when that assured development which awaits Canada shall have had its fulfilment, the Canadian Northern Railway system, acquired by the people of Canada under these proposals, will be one of the greatest assets in the ownership of our people.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I think that if we required any evidence of the fact that the Prime Minister recognizes the weakness of the proposal which is now before this House, it would be found in the endeavour he has made to create, in some way, a prejudice against the Liberal party, by reason of its action in connection with the construction of the Canadian Northern Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. It is quite characteristic of my right hon. friend, when he cannot defend or justify what is presently before Parliament, to go back to ancient history and trust to throwing dust in the eyes of the people by, in some way, creating a prejudice against his political opponents. He talks about everything but the subject which is immediately under consideration, which is, whether it is in the interests of the country to pass the Bill which is now before Parliament. What does it matter as to the responsibility for what occurred fourteen years ago in connection with the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway? What has that to do with the consideration which is to be given to this Bill? Nothing in the world. Yet my right hon. friend has sought, in connection with the discussion of this Bill, to throw responsibility upon my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) for the arrangement which was made some years ago. If I were to follow the example of my right hon. friend, I might challenge the wisdom of this Government in granting aid for the building of the Canadian Northern Railway through the canyons of the Rocky Mountains, where a road was not needed, an enterprise which has proved and which will continue to prove a great burden. I might have said that it was by reason of the encouragement which was given by this Government to the construction of the line through the Rocky Mountains, that the Government of British Columbia, led by the late Sir Richard McBride, involved that province also in an enormous expenditure. I might call attention to that, but what would be the good of it? What has it to do with the consideration of the Bill, the second reading of which is asked, and of the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham)? What I think we ought to do is to endeavour to consider the Bill upon its merits, consider it in the light of circumstances to-day, and consider whether or not it is desirable to pass the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Renfrew. That is the question to which I propose to direct my attention, and it is a question that will be of most interest to the people of this country at the present time.

My right hon. friend says: Oh, there would be great objection to acting upon the provisions of the statute of 1914. He refers to section 24 and says that if that were acted upon an injustice would in some way be done to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, to the present shareholders in that company, and to those to whom the stock is pledged. He says it would also result in the necessity of the Government becoming the owners of the physical system of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and operating the road under Government ownership and control.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not want to be understood as acquiescing in my hon. friend's statement. I did not argue that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understood my right hon. friend to say that if section 24 were acted upon, the Government would be obliged to become the owners of the system and to operate it under Government control by a department of the Government, and he pointed out the very great advantage it would be to preserve the entity of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. Well, Sir, what does the Commission appointed by this Government say with regard to that? As I understand it, they do not recommend that the Canadian Northern Railway corporation should be preserved especially, but that a company should operate the road, and that it should not be done directly by the Government as a Government; that is, that there should not be direct Government operation as in the case of the Intercolonial. Where would be the objection or the difficulty if the Government acted under section 24 and foreclosed the equity of redemption? Where would be the difficulty or the inconvenience in asking this Parliament to incorporate a company, or to give the Governor in Council power by Letters Patent to incorporate a company, to take over the actual title from the Crown and issue stock to be held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, the road being carried on and operated by the company so organized. You will remember, Sir, that when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was organized, it was incorporated by Letters Patent. The charter is contained in Letters Patent issued by the Governor in Council. This Government could have asked Parliament to give it authority on the very day the equity was foreclosed to have a company incorporated under Letters Patent which would take over the title and the operation of the road. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument that my right hon. friend has made, that there would be some great advantage from the standpoint of the public in preserving the entity of the Canadian Northern Railway, falls to the ground.

But if it would be undesirable to act to-day under section 24, was it not equally undesirable when the legislation was passed? If the Government did not intend to act upon the section, if they thought it would be inconvenient and injurious to the public interest to act upon it, why did they put it in the statute? When they asked the authority of this Parliament to enable them to pledge the credit of Canada to the enormous sum of $45,000,000, why did they tell this Parliament and the people of this country that under section 24 the interests of the people were thoroughly safeguarded, and that this Parliament, in case any default should be made, had the power immediately to take possession of the road free from all conditions if Parliament should so desire? And why did they tell the people of this country that the Canadian Northern had agreed to this as a condition of receiving this enormous aid? Why did they embody this section in the statute if they knew that it would be against the public interest to act upon it should occasion for action arise?

My right hon. friend says that if an individual—and he instanced my unworthy self—was the owner of property upon which the Government had a mortgage I might seriously object if my equity of redemption were to be taken away without some provision for having its value arbitrated upon. But, that would entirely depend upon what the agreement was. If I had been coming to the Crown year after year for aid, first getting my bonds or notes guaranteed by the Government, and afterwards saying to the Government, "I misled you, I cannot get on as I told you I could, I want you to lend me some more money; I have already induced the Government to give me a lot of money, but I agreed that in case I made default in the payment of interest or in any other respect set out in my agreement, the Government should have the power to foreclose my equity and take over the property and become its absolute owner"—if I had done that, what right should I have to complain? If that was the bond which I gave, if that was the agreement which I solemnly entered into, it would not lie in my mouth to raise my voice against the Government acting upon the agreement which I had made. All that my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) asks by this amendment is that the agreement shall be carried out as made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The section referred to says that Parliament shall previously fix the terms and conditions, if any. Under what circumstances would the hon. gentleman say that Parliament should fix terms and conditions, and under what circumstances should Parliament not fix any terms and conditions?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would say that my hon. friend can explain those conditions, as his leader has utterly failed to explain what was meant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am asking my hon. friend to state his opinion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will state my opinion of the case where no conditions should be fixed—

Mr. MEIGHEN: State the other case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will state the case we have to-day. This company came to Parliament in 1914 and said—and the Minister of Finance pledged his word to this House as to the truthfulness of their statement and asked this Parliament to act upon it—that if they could get their bonds guaranteed to the extent of $45,000,000, they had ample resources beyond that to complete the road and put it in operation, and they would not be obliged to come back to Parliament for any further assistance. Upon that understanding, Parliament entered into this vast obligation on the part of the people of Canada. But the company came back again in 1916 and got $15,000,000 more of the money of the people of this country. I would say that conditions had arisen to-day under which Parliament has a right, without attaching any conditions whatever to it, to act upon the authority vested in it by section 24 of the statute of 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why will not the hon. gentleman describe the conditions under which we were to be justified in fixing terms and conditions?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I cannot tell why the Government put that in. I assume they put it in, in order to remove the objections which Parliament and the people of this country might otherwise have towards granting this enormous aid. I presume they had some reason for putting it in; I presume they intended to act upon it. But the Government did not leave it alone to the statute. When the Bill was introduced, my hon. friend the Solicitor General took a very active part in urging the legislation upon the favourable consideration of the House, and on page 3693 of Hansard, he said:

> We know we have the ordinary right which any mortgagee has, and the right which any guarantor of a mortgage has, the right by subrogation of getting into the shoes of the lender and in the event of default exercising the rights of a mortgagee and taking possession of the road as a receiver; we know we have that right, but we have the additional summary remedy of proceeding by mere Act of Parliament to take over the road as the property of the people of this country and eliminate once and for all, all other parties interested in that railway. And we have not only so arranged it that the interests of the Canadian Northern and all other persons whatsoever in the Canadian Northern system shall be eliminated, and that in the event of default all shall be the property of the Canadian people.

That, Sir, was what my hon. friend sought to induce this House and the people to believe was the splendid arrangement that was being made for the security of the people. He said: We all know that under the law His Majesty in case of default would be able to go into the courts of the country and foreclose the mortgage, but we are not going to ask the Crown to incur that delay; we are not going to ask the Crown to undertake that expense; we are not going to ask that ordinary foreclosure proceedings be taken; we provide by this Bill a summary mode of foreclosure under which if the Canadian Northern Railway Company fails to fulfil its obligations, an Order in Council may be passed with the authority of Parliament declaring the equity of redemption foreclosed and vesting the absolute title in His Majesty on behalf of the people of Canada. That, Sir, is all we ask the Government to do to-day; we ask them to carry out the solemn agreement which they made and which is embodied in an Act of Parliament. The Canadian Northern having received the aid provided by that Act, are bound by its terms, and if it is acted upon they have no reason to complain.

We should do this without any condition, for another reason. It appears from the report of this commission that the stock is of no value; therefore we shall be doing the Canadian Northern Railway people no harm if we simply carry out the arrangement which was made in 1914.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, before recess, I had been referring to the provision of section 24 in the Act of 1914, which provides that, in case of default the Governor in Council may, if authorized by Parliament, and upon such terms and conditions, if any, as Parliament may prescribe, declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern Railway company and of all other persons to be absolutely foreclosed, notwithstanding any rule of law or equity to the contrary. I regard that as a very important provision. It created a new relation between the company and the Crown. Upon the one side the company said in effect: If you will give us the aid for which we are now asking, that is, if you will guarantee our bonds to the extent of $45,000,000, we shall be able to get along without any further assistance. As hon. members are aware, there was very strong opposition on the part of many hon. gentlemen to burdening the country further in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway company. That company had received large grants of public money in the past; it had been aided by guaranteed bonds, and, in addition, the various provinces had been contributing very extensively to the construction of the road. It was, therefore, universally recognized that no money from any private source had been put into the construction of the railway. This House knew as well then as it knows to-day, after the reports of the Government commission that the road had been constructed entirely out of public moneys. In order to remove as far as possible any objection to the bonds of the company to the extent of $45,000,000 being then guaranteed, the Government asked Parliament to provide certain safeguards, amongst which was this provision in section 24 to which I have referred. The company, when it consented to accept that aid was a party to the contract contained in the statute. The company received its aid upon that condition, and it is bound just as much as if a separate agreement had been entered into under which it had stipulated that in case it should make default in the future the Government and Parliament would not be bound to recognize that there was any value whatever in its equity of redemption, but could at once take steps by Order in Council to foreclose. We are here under circumstances very different from those that existed prior to 1914. We are here in the face of a certain condition created by that statute. We are here as trustees of the people, as guardians of the rights of the people, and we should be acting contrary to our duty if we in any way attempted to alter those rights, or if we refused to recognize the rights and obligations upon the part of the Canadian Northern, and Mackenzie and Mann Limited and the other holders of the stock in the Canadian Northern and the subsidiary companies. I am, therefore, unable to see any excuse whatever for the Government not taking advantage of the powers which Parliament granted to them under the Act of 1914.

At first it was stated by one or two hon. gentlemen opposite, that the course the Government intends pursuing is the same thing as acting under section 24. In fact, however, it is an entirely different thing. If section 24 were acted upon, the Government, on the authority of Parliament, would have the right, without the payment of a single dollar more of the people's money, to become the owners of this entire railway system. But it is proposed by this arrangement to treat this company as a solvent concern, and to appoint arbitrators for the purpose of valuing the common stock of the company. I very much mistake the meaning of figures and of statements if I do not see in the statement, which has been submitted to the Government by the Canadian Northern Railway Company and laid before this House by the Government as containing reliable information, a deliberate laying, upon the part of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, of a foundation for an enormous valuation of the stock of this company.

The Minister of Finance has said that this company require a large amount of money to carry on their work. He has not offered to this House any request in writing from the Canadian Northern nor from Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. He has not presented a single statement from them showing what they require or that they require any amount. He has stated that it will take some $20,000,000 to meet, in the immediate future, their interest indebtedness and to provide for necessary rolling stock, and that it will require great financial effort in order to wipe off those short-term obligations which have been incurred against securities, largely in the city of New York. But there is not the scratch of a pen from Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, or the Canadian Northern Railway Company corroborating the statement of the Minister of Finance. It is, therefore, open to those gentlemen, when they come before the arbitrators to say: We are not bound by the opinion expressed by the Minister of Finance; we presented to the Government a statement showing our financial position; we showed that we had a surplus of $37,000,000 after making provision for our common stock at its face value; the Minister of Finance presented that statement to the House of Commons as a statement that could be relied upon; surely, therefore, we are and can be bound only by the statement which we have presented to the Government and which the Government has presented to Parliament. They will be able to say to the arbitrators: So far from our requiring any large amount of money, all that we owe in the way of outstanding accounts with construction is $999.566.95, and they can well show that before the arbitrators in black and white among the statements laid by the Minister of Finance before this House. Then if it is said: Oh, thirty million dollars is required immediately to purchase rolling stock and put the road in good condition, before the arbitration, they will say: In the statement we submitted all that is required up to the 30th June, 1918, for rolling stock and for betterments, as we showed in black and white, is the sum of $6,950,000 instead $20,000,000. Will it not be open to them to say: This stock has been represented by absolutely valuable assets at $100,000,000 and our statement shows a surplus of $37,000,000 above that, and who will dare to say we are bankrupt? Who will dare to say we cannot go on? The opinion of the Minister of Finance will not be evidence. It will be upon the statements of the accountants such as we have before us, that these arbitrators must act, because they will be sworn to discharge their duty in accordance with the evidence which will be presented before them. This statement was prepared evidently with the intention of showing that the company is solvent and perfectly able to go ahead. If you take it as true, it shows they are not insolvent, and shows they do not require any financial aid from the Government. It lays the foundation for them to submit to the arbitrators that they have a most valuable property. With a surplus of $11,000,000 of revenue over and above operating expenses, and with the prospective earnings—which always will be taken into consideration by arbitrators unless they are expressly excluded from their consideration—Mackenzie and Mann, by these statements which they have submitted to this Parliament through the Minister of Finance will be in a position to urge before the arbitrators that they should receive full par value for the stock issued by the company. Will not that be a condition of affairs to which the people of the country will look forward with a great deal of anxiety? As I have said, this road was built with the money of the people of this country. The commission has declared that the common stock has no present value, nor is it of any potential value. Since the year 1914, when this bargain was made, as set out in section 24 of this statute, the Government has been compelled to give Mackenzie and Mann an additional sum of $15,000,000. Last year when that amount was given, the Minister of Finance stated it was given for the purpose of preventing the company from making default. And we are faced to-day with the extraordinary condition that this Government is actually endeavouring to prevent the conditions under which the provisions of section 24 can be invoked. They have, by giving money to Mackenzie and Mann, prevented the default taking place, which would enable the Government, with the authority of Parliament, to take over this entire system without putting any more money into the enterprise. Whether that Act on the part of the Government can be defended or not, I leave it to the House to say. I do not think it can be defended, and I do not think the people of this country will be disposed to tolerate such a condition of affairs. It is proposed now that arbitrators should value this property, in the face of the fact that the Minister of Finance tells us that the Company is bound to become bankrupt if it is not assisted; in the face of the fact that the Prime Minister stated this afternoon in effect that it is perfectly evident that unless further aid is given the company cannot carry on, and a receiver must be appointed. If that condition of affairs exists to-day, all the Government has to do, and all it has to ask Parliament to do, is to invoke the powers contained in section 24, and take over the road, foreclose the equity of redemption absolutely, without the payment of a dollar.

My right hon. friend says that would be contrary to one's sense of justice. If that be so, I would like to know why it was put in the statute. Was it put in to deceive the members of this House? Did the Government not know what it meant when it was put in? Did they not intend it to be acted upon? They said if default should be made Parliament would have the right, without any terms or conditions whatsoever and without providing for a single dollar to be paid, to foreclose the equity of redemption without resorting to a court of law. Will any member of the Government explain why that was put there if it was not intended to be acted upon? Why it was put there if it meant nothing? Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for any one to suggest that it was not intended by the Government, and was not taken seriously by this House. I have already called attention to the great weight that was placed upon that provision by my hon. friend the Solicitor General, who made a very able and forcible speech in presenting the matter to the House. I well remember how strongly, and with what force and eloquence, he dwelt upon the provisions of section 24. They were new legislation, he said;—ordinarily, the holder of a mortgage would be compelled to resort to a court of law, and go through the proceedings of foreclosure, but he spoke with pride and very great gratification of the fact that the Government had been able to evolve a scheme original with itself and containing powers which would be most beneficial to the country in case any default were made. That statement impressed many members of the House. My hon. friend from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), a very thoughtful gentleman, took the view, as many gentlemen upon the other side of the House did, that almost too great aid had already been granted to the Canadian Northern, and accepted the proposal of the Government with great reluctance. Let us see what that hon. gentleman said in regard to this proposal. His remarks will be found at page 3733 of Hansard:

> There is another feature of this matter which, I think, is well worthy of consideration. What is to happen in case of default? We have hitherto been dealing with the situation in case of success; the Government has very carefully looked ahead in regard to what might happen in case of failure.

And, Sir, when the time comes that the Prime Minister says that, notwithstanding the $15,000,000 we granted last year, failure looms right ahead, the Government draws back, and refuses to act upon this wonderful section, the preparation of which must have taxed its ingenuity to the utmost, and which appealed to the favourable consideration of members on the other side of the House at all events. The Government draws back and says: We will not allow default to take place.

We have given over $15,000,000 to prevent default, and before the time shall come when the company must make default, we will pass this Act, we will buy out the common stock from the company as a going concern, treat it as perfectly solvent and pay to these gentlemen whatever the arbitrators may choose to determine, whose judgment will be final, over whose judgment this Parliament can exercise no supervision, no control, and from which it will have no appeal. The Government will be bound to pay out of the public funds whatever amount these gentlemen may find this stock to be worth, without any appeal to this Parliament or to any court, even to the Supreme Court of Canada. That is acting upon the provisions of this wonderful section with a vengeance. Let me proceed with the remarks of my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine. He said:

> The Government has very carefully looked ahead in regard to what might happen in case of failure. Ordinarily it is a very slow process to foreclose a railroad and for the bondholders gradually to take possession of the physical assets thereof. The Government in this case, however, has supplied a method of quick procedure whereby the axe drops instantly and whereby there can be no coming back for further assistance. It is definitely stipulated in this undertaking what shall constitute any event of default; it is so clearly defined that there can be no possible misunderstanding. Should the Canadian Northern railway fail to pay interest on the securities which are to be issued in connection with the guarantee which we are now authorizing, or should they fail to carry out any of the conditions contained in the trust deed as accompanying that guarantee, they would commit an event of default.

Just as my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) stated this afternoon. Then my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, proceeds:

> Should the Canadian Northern on any of the previously guaranteed securities or hereafter guaranteed securities fail to pay the interest, they would commit an event of default. If any part of the system goes into the hands of a receiver; if any branch of the whole tree shows signs of decay, that is an event of default and in any of these events the Government can drop the axe without delay. I have heard this agreement described somewhat as a case where the culprit has confessed judgment and has been let out on suspended sentence. Some elements of the agreement certainly can be compared with such a case. The trial is over.

Mark the words, Mr. Speaker. All this in the face of the facts that the arbitrators are to value this equity of redemption, that lawyers, witnesses and expert accountants are to be heard, and that Mackenzie and Mann are to be allowed to prove that because of the prospective earnings this common stock has an enormous value even although the company to-day, as the Prime Minister says, is actually upon the eve of bankruptcy. The hon. member for St Antoine says:

> The trial is over. The applicants for aid admit that without our help they cannot complete the road. We have undertaken to give them a last chance—

We have undertaken to give them a last chance.

> —and it will never be necessary for them again to come here, nor will it be necessary for this Parliament to listen to another discussion such as is taking place this session. They have been tried; I may almost say they have been found guilty and let out on suspended sentence. If there is an event of default; if they fail to perform the obligations that by this new trust deed are placed upon them, the axe drops and that is all there is to it.

How my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) must have laughed in his sleeve at the innocence of the hon. member for St. Antoine when he took his word in 1914 as to the effect and intention of this section and when he said that it would be acted upon when the time arrived!

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman read the words that he took from my speech in 1914?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I cannot conceive that the hon. member for St. Antoine misinterpreted the speech of the Solicitor General. At all events, I read the speech of the Solitor General. It will appear in Hansard tomorrow and I think it entirely justified the hon. member for St. Antoine in believing that in case of default the axe would fall—that the trial was over—that the last chance had been given, and that if default was made automatically Parliament would be asked to agree that the equity of redemption in the Canadian Northern Railway Company and all other persons interested should be foreclosed summarily by Order in Council. Just let me read this last sentence over again:

> If there is an event of default; if they fail to perform the obligations that by this new trust deed are placed upon them, the axe drops and that is all there is to it.

That is the interpretation that the hon. member for St. Antoine places upon it, that is the interpretation that any reasonable man would place upon it, or else why put it in the statute book in such clear, unmistakable language? The hon. member for St. Antoine proceeds to say:

> There is a summary method, therefore, by which the Government steps in and takes possession of the whole enterprise. The Government can replace the directors by Order in Council; the new board of directors will have all the rights that would be given by a board of directors elected by the shareholders, and they can deal with the physical property as they see fit. Then, the Government can declare the mortgage foreclosed and can enter into the benefit of the equities, subject, of course, to the consent of Parliament. If the Government, in such an event, enters into control, it may become the owner of the system by assuming the responsibilities and powers as provided by this proposed legislation. The Government could then arrange the whole financial system involved so as to protect all concerned. The Government can operate; the Government can lease, or the Government can create a new railway company to manage the road and enter into ownership, if so desired.

Using, in regard to the organization of a new railway company, almost the very language which I used in the early portion of my remarks. The Solicitor General, from whom I might quote, did not use the very language which was used by the hon. member for St. Antoine. Perhaps not the very language, but members of the Government sat in their places and heard that hon. gentleman give that as the interpretation of the statute and what could be done under it. No one ventured to say that he had not interpreted the meaning of the statute correctly; no one suggested any idea of that kind. When the Government got that legislation through and induced this House to impose that enormous obligation upon the people of the country they knew that the members of this House and the people believed that, in case this company could not carry on its business with the guarantee which was then given, it would have no right to make any claim for this equity of redemption in the road and that Parliament should have the right to become the owners of the entire system and then carry it on either as a Government work or through a company which the Government could be given power by Parliament to create, and with respect to which they might appoint the necessary officers and managers.

In some remarks which the Minister of Finance made when the resolution was before the House, he objected to expropriation because he said that if the system were expropriated the Government might have to pay, under the circumstances which would then arise, cash for all the outstanding obligations, and he rather intimated that, even although they might be acquired at their present market value, which, in a great many cases, amounting to many, many millions of dollars, is not over fifty per cent of their par value, it would be an advantage to allow the securities to run on for their full term because they had been placed at a comparatively low rate of interest.

Well, Sir, under the provisions of section 24, as the Government well knows to-day and as they knew when they presented the section for the approval of this House, that same result would follow. The Government would not be obliged to pay off these securities until their due date; they would simply foreclose the equity of redemption and all outstanding securities would remain just as they were, subject to the payment of the interest upon them and subject to the payment of the principal when the date of maturity arrived. Therefore, there is every advantage, from the public standpoint in carrying out the provisions of section 24, while no disadvantage can be suggested. And as I have said, these are the rights which the people of Canada have to-day. They have the right, through this Parliament, to foreclose the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and everybody else upon these securities in case of default occurring. This Government is committing a crime against the people of this country if they further assist this company financially in order to prevent default. It is the duty of the Government to the people of Canada to let the company carry on as best it can. If it can meet its interest, if it can avoid default through its own efforts and those of the financial men interested in the enterprise, well and good; this Government and Parliament have nothing further to say about it. But if they cannot carry on, if they must make default, then let them make default; and I would say that this Parliament should be ready with its legislation, and this Government should be ready through the authority of this Parliament, to exercise immediately the powers given to them by section 24 to foreclose the equity of redemption, take possession of the property, organize, if they should think it better to do so, a new company, appoint the board of directors, and carry on all the operations of the Canadian Northern system. They would be able to carry them on without any delay, without disorganizing the system and without running the risk, as they are doing to-day, of involving the people of this country in an enormous liability, the amount of which no man can foresee, but the amount of which depends on the arbitrary will of three gentlemen who may be appointed to arbitrate the value of the common stock as between the Government and the gentlemen interested in the securities.

I should like to answer the statement of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) this afternoon that it did not lie in our mouths to object to this system of taking over the stock on a valuation by arbitrators. My right hon. friend quoted from a resolution which I moved in 1914. But surely, Sir, it scarcely lies in the mouth of the Prime Minister to claim that arbitration is the right thing to do in regard to taking over this stock when he himself voted against arbitration in 1914, even with the limitations which my resolution placed upon that mode of procedure. My right hon. friend voted against it and called upon all his supporters to stand with him in voting against arbitration, and they did all manfully and loyally standing up as one man and denounce this method of taking over stock on valuation by arbitration. Let us see what I proposed and what hon. members voted against. I moved

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following words be inserted in lieu thereof: "That said resolution be not now concurred in but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same in the following particulars:

(a) To provide for the reduction of the issued capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company to $30,000,000 par value, subject to the right to make provision for an addition thereto of an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 if it should at any time become necessary for the purpose of exchange of the income charge convertible debenture stock mentioned in paragraph 12 of the said resolution.

(b) To provide for the transfer of such stock (with the exception of sufficient shares to qualify the directors) to the Receiver General to be held by him in trust for His Majesty.

(c) For the holding of the said stock by His Majesty for the period of five years.

(d) To provide that in case no default is made by the company in the payment of interest on the bonds of the company to be guaranteed by His Majesty as provided by said resolution, and in case the conditions of the said resolution and the agreement therein provided for shall be in all other respects carried out during such period of five years, the said stock shall be transferred to Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, or their nominees, unless His Majesty through the Governor in Council should exercise the option hereinafter mentioned.

(e) To provide that the Governor in Council shall have the option at any time within such period of five years to acquire the absolute ownership of the said stock and of the said Canadian Northern Railway system, and of all the constituent and subsidiary companies mentioned in the said resolution or proposed agreement, subject to existing encumbrances and to said arrangements regarding the conversion of said income charge convertible debenture stock, for a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed the sum of $30,000,000, being the par value of such stock so to be reduced as above provided.

Now, what did that provide for? It made no provision whatever, and did not contemplate; that the stock should be taken if there was any default. It provided that if the company should be able to carry on for five years successfully, if it made no default, paid its interest, these, at any time before the expiration of these five years, the Government would have the right to take over the stock by arbitration. That would be in the case of a concern that was able to meet all its obligations, not of a concern that was bankrupt, not of a concern that had to come back in 1916 and get $15,000,000 more; not of a concern of which the Prime Minister says to-day that it is unable to go on, that unless it gets aid it must stop, must make default and go into the hands of a receiver. The proposition which I made contemplated an entirely different condition. It provided only that the Government might act and take over the stock by arbitration in case the company should prove successful and should be able to demonstrate its ability to be successful by being able to look after its interest for the full period of five years. In the meantime, as a condition of granting this aid, the stock was to be reduced to $30,000,000, and was to be handed over and held in trust under the control of His Majesty until such time as the company demonstrated its ability to carry on and perform its obligations. That resolution was voted down by a party vote. Then, later on, I think when the Bill came up for third reading, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the resolution to which also the Prime Minister has referred. But it must be borne in mind that in interpreting that resolution reference must be had to the previous resolution which had been moved by myself and had been voted down by a majority of this House. Under the rules of the House the same resolution could not be moved a second time, and that is why the language of the second resolution, in amendment to the third reading of the Bill, was changed; it was necessary to do it in order to comply with the rules of the House. But it must be interpreted in the spirit of the resolution which had been moved previously and voted down, and when the word "reasonable" was used by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, it must be regarded as having reference to what is set forth, namely five years, in the resolution which was previously before the House.

There is one other matter I wish to refer to briefly, and that is the question of the lands. I said the other day—and my argument has not been answered—that whatever may be said with reference to the railway system, it seems to me utterly unpardonable for the Government to ask this country to assume the vast obligation involved in these land debentures. We have a statement before the House that the lands remaining unsold consist of 2,000,000 acres in the province of Ontario, about 400,000 acres in the province of Quebec, and something like 1,000,000 acres in the three western provinces. There are also some sales agreements. The Government is asking Parliament to stand behind these land debentures, just as they are asking Parliament to stand behind and give a par value to all these underlying securities which to-day are not selling upon the markets of the world at over fifty, sixty, or seventy per cent of their face value, and the Government is asking Parliament to do that without giving us any information by experts as to the value of these lands. Taking, first, the 2,000,000 acres in Ontario, I would ask my hon. friend if these are covered by the land debentures? I do not think they are.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Offhand, I think not, but they are an asset to the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think they are covered, because if they were covered they would not be put up as security for short-term obligations, and we find on page 10 of the statement brought down by the Finance Minister that these 2,000,000 acres of lands unsold in Ontario, as well as the land grant in the province of Quebec, are both pledged as collateral for obligations of the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend is incorrect. If he will look at page 10 he will see that the first part says: "Securities pledged as collateral," then "Guaranteed securities," and then "Unguaranteed securities." It is possible these are pledged, but I do not think so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend will look again he will see that page 10 is intended to give a statement of all securities pledged as collateral, and it gives, first, "Guaranteed securities," then "Unguaranteed securities," and then "Land grants." All of these are pledged as collateral.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will inquire into that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Outside of that, my information is that the land grant in Ontario is not worth a dollar an acre; it would not sell for a dollar an acre. Wilderness land in Ontario, whenever sales have been made, has been sold at as low a price as one dollar an acre. One dollar an acre, in fact, is too high a value to put on that land, and the same remark applies to the land in the province of Quebec. That leaves only the 800,000 acres in the western provinces, and it is only the land in the West, if one can judge from this statement, that is security for these land debentures. That land is the leavings of the company; that is to say, it is what has been left by gentlemen who for a number of years were actively disposing of these lands. I do not know what the value is, but it is certainly the duty of the Government to know, by the opinion of experts, before it asks this country to assume the enormous obligation of $21,000,000 in respect of these lands. Surely it is their duty to find out through independent and disinterested experts what the quality of the land is, speaking generally, and what it is worth, in order that this Parliament and the people may have some reliable information as to its value. But without any evidence or knowledge of that kind, the Government simply takes the value placed upon these lands by the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and coolly—I venture to use that word, and it only half expresses the assurance of hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches—ask this Parliament to involve the people of this country in the enormous liability of $21,000,000 in respect of a property which has nothing whatever to do with the railway, the holding of which is not necessary in any way in connection with the railway, and which might be given up without doing any injustice to anybody, which, if given up, would leave to the holders of those debentures the security upon the lands, a security which they relied upon, I suppose, when they took the debentures, although whether they paid par for the debentures or a very much lower rate I do not know. I venture the opinion, however, that they paid far and away below par, because I cannot conceive it possible that debentures to the extent of $21,000,000 could have been issued upon these land grants and sold to investors at anything like par. The thing is utterly beyond reason, because not many years ago when the construction of the Canadian Northern had got under way, as late as 1902, their best land in the garden of the great province of Saskatchewan could be bought at $2.50 an acre. Yet these gentlemen are putting in these unsold lands at a valuation of $15 an acre, and they have induced a confiding Government to accept their word and to propose that the people of Canada shall assume an obligation of $21,000,000 in respect thereof. Is this the time to involve the country in these enormous obligations? Go down to our own province of New Brunswick, ably represented, as things go, by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, (Mr. Hazen) and you will see there going to decay, railroad after railroad connected with the Intercolonial, and which ought to give to the people accommodation such as they are entitled to have from railways which the public moneys have built. Business is hampered and the people are enormously inconvenienced because this Government says: We have not the money to take over these branch lines; we are not able to give any relief to the thousands of people in that province who have been clamouring for years for assistance from the Government. The Government forgets, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows full well, the solemn pledge which they made to the people of New Brunswick, through the present Prime Minister, before the elections of 1911, when they in effect pledged themselves to take over those branch lines and make them a part of the Intercolonial system, building them up to a proper standard to give reasonable accommodation to the people. In the very constituency which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries represents, I know and he knows,—because he has had petitions in respect to it—that a very important railroad which serves many thousands of people and contributes a very large business, is upon the eve of being dismantled because this Government will not come to the rescue and take it over and make it a part of the Intercolonial system. These people, suffering all these inconveniences, obliged to face the breach of pledge upon the part of this Government, are told by the Minister of Railways and Canals that no matter how deplorable their position may be he can do nothing for them because there is no money in the treasury to take over and repair these roads. These people, compelled as they will be to suffer hardships by reason of going back to the condition of affairs of twenty, or thirty or forty years ago, when they had no railroad accommodation, are obliged to look on and see millions upon millions of their money as well as the money of the rest of Canada, paid over to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann —millions and millions which these gentlemen have never earned, and to which they are in no way entitled.

They are obliged in this time of stress to put their hands into their pockets, pay taxes, make various contributions, do their bit towards carrying on the war. They see the Government plunging the country into an obligation to the extent of unknown millions to meet the views of Mackenzie and Mann and of the financial magnates of Toronto who are standing behind them and who are pressing the Government to put through this most iniquitous measure —a measure iniquitous at any time, but a thousandfold more iniquitous when brought forward in such a time of stress as that through which we are now passing. The people, as I have said, are compelled to bear very heavy burden in order to do their part in carrying on the war. They see this measure being pushed through at a time when the credit of this country is strained to the utmost. The Minister of Finance, the head of a department which not many years ago could go into the markets of the world and borrow money at two and a half or three per cent, is compelled to-day, by reason of the fact that the financial men of Canada are not able to assist him, to go to the financial centres of the country to the south and pay the enormous rate of interest of six per cent upon direct Government obligations. Is this the time to engage in such an undertaking as is now proposed? Is this the time to involve our country in obligations which may run into $10,000,000, perhaps $20,000,000, perhaps $50,000,000, perhaps $60,000,000 when the result of this arbitration is known?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) this afternoon must have anticipated the remarks of the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in the first part of his speech. They so completely answered his remarks that it would be folly for me to take up any more time by entering into a discussion of them.

My hon. friend, however, has called attention to a statement with regard to the value of the lands in Northern Ontario, especially those along the line of the Canadian Northern railway. It was my privilege to spend some fifteen days in a tour of inspection of the Canadian Northern railway some two years ago, in company with a number of members from both sides of the House. We passed through hundreds of miles of valuable pulp lands right alongside the Canadian Northern railway in the northern part of Ontario. I was informed by the officials of that road that the bulk of these limits were owned by the Canadian Northern Railway company. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble of going over that splendid railway he would come to a very different conclusion in regard to this matter; he would not talk about $1 an acre when speaking of such valuable lands as these.

We have been listening to a discussion of the legal and financial sides of this question; let us discuss it for a few moments from the business standpoint. This is the largest undertaking excluding matters pertaining to the war, that this Parliament has had to deal with since Confederation, and it is necessary that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House should give it their most careful attention. It is the greatest public ownership proposal ever presented to the people of Canada, and its success or failure will mean either life or death to public ownership in Canada, so far as the Dominion Government is concerned.

Some few days ago half a dozen hon. gentlemen opposite suggested five or six different methods of dealing with this question. They emphasized especially the fact that we should not allow politics to creep into the administration of this enterprise. I am satisfied, from the statements made by the Finance Minister, the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Railways (Hon. Frank Cochrane) that no political interference will creep into the management. It certainly would be a most serious state of affairs if politics should in any way interfere. The member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the other day asserted that politics would interfere in this case as they did in connection with the administration of the Intercolonial railway. I think that he did not deal fairly with the Minister of Railways. To my mind, no Minister of Railways has ever more carefully guarded his department in that respect. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) has been most careful not to allow politics to interfere with the management of the government railways.

9 p.m.

Government ownership operation and control are to receive a serious test. Every man, woman and child in Canada is interested in this proposal. This will be the people's railroad; they will own and control it. All our people recognize the importance of transportation. One of the greatest elements in the price of food and manufactured products is transportation. Railway rates are in effect public taxes, and we should see to it that the management of this road, as well as the management of all the other transportation facilities of our country, is carried on in such manner as to secure to the people the greatest possible benefit at the lowest possible cost.

Hon. gentlemen opposite argue that we are not going to receive value for the money to be invested in this enterprise. I wonder if they have taken into consideration the actual cost of this road. If they will add to the actual cost of the enterprise the additional cost of the rolling stock, rails, and everything connected with it, they will find that this proposal is a most advantageous one for the people of Canada. Take, for example, the rolling stock. It is estimated that $56,000,000 has been paid for the rolling stock on the Canadian Northern railway system. They have taken off $11,000,000 for depreciation, leaving $45,000,000 as the present value of the rolling stock. I have made inquiries of men who are thoroughly acquainted with the handling of railway equipment and its value, and they inform me that the Canadian Northern Railway rolling stock is to-day worth well over $60,000,000.

Further, let us compare the investment in road and equipment in respect of the Canadian Northern railway system with that of other railroads in Canada. It is important that the people should know what this road has actually cost and how it compares in certain respects with other railroads in this country. At the close of the year ending June 30, 1916, the investment in road and equipment as carried on the books of the companies or of the Government was as follows:

Canadian Pacific railway, $68,233 per mile.

Canadian Northern railway, $54,961 per mile.

Grand Trunk, $127,340 per mile.

Grand Trunk Pacific, $98,018 per mile.

Transcontinental, $88,332 per mile.

Intercolonial, $76,733 per mile.

The actual average cost per mile of the Canadian Northern was nearly one-third less than the average cost per mile of these other railroads. The average cost of all the railroads was $75,524 per mile, while the actual cost of the Canadian Northern amounted to $54,961 per mile.

Another advantage in taking over this road is that the Intercolonial will through it be connected up with the West. Up to the present time the Intercolonial has been up against a very stiff proposition as to its connections at Montreal and Quebec, but under this proposal it will become part of a great transcontinental railway system.

Let us look at the enormous value of the different terminals owned, controlled and operated by the Canadian Northern Railway company at Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Edmonton, and the 300 acres it owns in the heart of the city of Vancouver, and we shall be able to realize what tremendous terminal advantages this company possesses in those great cities.

This is a most opportune time to take over the road, as hon. members will see if they investigate the financial statements which have been submitted. I congratulate the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways upon placing in the hands of members of this House such complete statements bearing on the finances and the general management of the road. This railway has borrowed enormous sums of money at 3½ and 4 per cent, whereas if we had to go into the market for money to-day we would be compelled to pay over 6 per cent. In addition to that, the securities run for ten, twenty, thirty and forty years, and at the end of those periods I am sure the people of Canada will be in a position to meet the obligations of the road, which will then, I believe, be one of the greatest assets of our Dominion.

There is no question that this railroad has developed Canada as no other great enterprise has done within the last fifteen years. No enterprise has developed the natural resources and the great mining interests and industries of our country to anything like the extent that the Canadian Northern railway has. It was my privilege to spend fifteen days on that railway on a tour of inspection, and it was of great advantage to me to have the opportunity to investigate the enormous resources along its right of way. If one takes into consideration, not only the thousands and thousands of homesteads, but the many manufactories located along its main line and branches in the Northwest, one can readily understand the enormous benefits this road confers on the people of Canada. On the train I travelled a 35 per cent engine drew twelve or fourteen pullman cars from Montreal all the way to Vancouver. I will give to the members of this House a statement in regard to the grades on that road so that the people of Canada may know what a valuable asset they have in this great railway.

The Canadian Northern Railway Company's transcontinental line is superior in grades and alignment to any of its competitors, having been built to five-tenths of one per cent westbound grades and to four-tenths of one per cent eastbound grades, with the exception of 28 miles of seven-tenths of one per cent eastbound grade on the western slope of the Rocky mountains, and with the further exceptions of about 327 miles of short momentum or pusher grades which can be reduced later on when necessary. Of this 327 miles of grades in excess of five-tenths of one per cent westbound and four-tenths of one per cent eastbound, there are only six miles of one per cent grade and less than one mile of 1.15 per cent grade. All other temporary grades are less than one per cent. This places the Canadian Northern Railway Company in a very strong position. At the present time it is handling about one-third of the total grain moved in Western Canada, and with the opening up of Vancouver as a grain shipping port, it will have the advantage of being able to handle grain equally as well to the Pacific coast as to Port Arthur. In other words, it can handle from the prairies an equal tonnage with one engine for delivery at Vancouver or at Port Arthur. The Canadian Northern Railway Company has handled a 16-car passenger train through the mountains with one engine.

This merely goes to show the splendid grades and curves on that line of railway. There are also enormous possibilities in water-powers along its right of way in Ontario and in British Columbia. Cities, towns and villages, have sprung up along its line. For the last two years it has been able to handle, for several months in the year, over 45 per cent of the grain coming out of that western country, and it has 6,000 miles of branches serving the most productive districts in the western provinces.

The policy now proposed by the Government is progressive and businesslike. By it, the people will own, control and operate 9,648 miles of railway including branches in all the provinces except New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Not only is this railway connected up with the most important cities, but there are many other advantages in connection with it. I have here a small plan showing that if a short branch line were constructed between Fort William and Titania on the Transcontinental by way of Long lake, a distance of sixteen miles, it would shorten the distance on the Canadian Northern between Fort William and Montreal by over 100 miles. That would be of enormous advantage during the winter months in connection with the back haul of the grain by way of lake Superior Junction down to Montreal and the back haul of the coal for the operation of the road by way of Superior Junction along the Transcontinental east of Titania. The proposed link would make a composite line composed of the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Titania, a proposed line to the Canadian Northern at Long lake and thence by the Canadian Northern to Montreal, a total distance of 1,347.7 miles as against the present routes; Canadian Pacific railway, 1,411.6 miles; Canadian Northern railway, 1,455.7 miles; the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and National Transcontinental railway, 1,425 miles Then it would keep the traffic east and west, instead of north and south.

Let us look at the mileage of some of the government railways in this country, when you connect up the Canadian Northern with this proposition. The Intercolonial, 1,514 miles; the Prince Edward Island Railway, 275 miles; the Transcontinental, now operating, 1,810 miles, making a total mileage of 13,247 miles, when you include the Canadian Northern. The mileage of the Canadian Pacific is only 12,900; that of the Grand Trunk Pacific, 1,964; that of the Grand Trunk, 3,556, and the other roads, such as the Pere Marquette, the Great Northern, the Michigan Central, and so on, make the balance, until we have in Canada about 40,000 miles of railway. After this proposition is finally closed the people of Canada will own, control and operate practically one-third of the railway mileage of the Dominion.

What other advantages are to be derived from taking over this road? To-day we have government-owned telegraph lines to the extent of 11,792 miles, 330 miles of which are cables. Add to that the telegraph system of the Great North Western, taken over by the Canadian Northern, together with the lines along the Canadian Northern, and you have 55,364 miles of single wire, of government-owned telegraph, telephone, and cable lines in this country. This proposition includes the Canadian Northern Telegraph Company's lines, and the telegraph system operated by the Great North Western Telegraph company, having 1,570 offices in Canada. An exclusive traffic agreement, renewable from time to time, exists with the Western Union Telegraph Company, and under it the Great North Western company have connection with the thousands of offices of the Western Union in the United States, and also with the Atlantic and other cable lines owned or controlled by that company. Those of us who in years gone by strongly advocated an Atlantic cable between Canada and the Motherland will find in this a very favourable outlook, because the Great North Western Telegraph system is connected up with the cable system, and for a very small expenditure a government cable could be connected up with the Motherland.

Then let us take into consideration the advantage we shall derive from a government-owned express company in this country. I have been strongly advocating that on the Government lines of railway we should have a government-owned express company. This we will have when the Canadian Northern Express company is connected up with the Intercolonial and the government-owned railways. I hope when this proposition is consummated the Minister of Railways will see that the Canadian Express company, and the American Express company remove their agents and offices from the Government lines of railway, and that the Canadian Northern Express company will extend its business throughout the government railways.

What else do we find in connection with this scheme? There are six Canadian Northern steamships running from Montreal to Port Arthur on the Great Lakes. These steamships are estimated to be worth double the figure at which they appear on the books of the railway company. I have been advocating that vessels on our inland waters should come under the control of the Railway Commission. We are starting out, under this proposition, with six government-owned boats. They will be an enormous advantage in investigating the needs of the shippers, both east and west. Then we have the government elevators. We have to-day one government-owned elevator at Moosejaw, with a capacity of 3,500,000 bushels; one at Saskatoon with a capacity of 3,500,000 bushels; one at Calgary with a capacity of 2,500,000 bushels; one at Vancouver with a capacity of 1,250,000 bushels; one at Port Arthur with a capacity of 3,250,000 bushels; one at Port Colborne with a capacity of 2,000,000; one at Montreal with a capacity of 4,000,000 and another with a capacity of 2,600,000 bushels; one at Quebec with a capacity of 1,000,000, and one at Halifax, on the Intercolonial railway, with a capacity of 500,000 bushels—making a total of ten government-owned elevators, with a capacity of 24,100,000 bushels. Take the five Canadian Northern elevators that will now be government-owned, with a capacity of ten million bushels, and you have fifteen government-owned elevators with a capacity of 34,100,000 bushels.

To impress upon the House the enormous possibilities of this road, especially in the West, let me show the number of elevators located along the rights of way of this system, first licensed elevators and warehouses in the province of Alberta on the Canadian Northern, 70 stations, 154 elevators, capacity 4,946,000 bushels; second licensed warehouses and elevators in Saskatchewan, 239 stations, 593 elevators, capacity 17,790,000 bushels; third, licensed warehouses and elevators in Manitoba, 136 stations, 237 elevators, capacity 6,474,000 bushels, making a total of 999 elevators with a capacity of 63,310,000 bushels, which will be located along the rights of way of the Government-owned roads. If you take out the government-owned elevators, you still have a capacity of 29,210,000 bushels in the elevators located along the rights of way of this road. The total capacity therefore of the elevators located along the rights of way of this road in the western provinces will be over 60,000,000 bushels.

Surely this is worthy of consideration in the taking over of this enterprise. Then, we must remember that in taking over this railway the Government is not assuming any responsibility that they are not compelled to assume in the public interest. The interest on the securities must be met. Receivership is impossible. The public will surely suffer if the roads go into liquidation. Our credit would be impaired. Betterments are needed. Rolling stock is needed. The company cannot possibly meet the interest charges, and keep up and improve the roadbed and the rolling stock. The Government must either advance money or take over the road. The Finance Minister has placed before the House so much information in regard to the finances of the company that it would serve no purpose for me to enlarge upon what he has said.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the hon. member, as a railway expert, permit me a question?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is not very generous on the part of my hon. friend.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am in good faith. Beyond doubt the hon. gentleman is quite an expert, in the theory of it anyway.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is saying that with rather a cynical smile on his face.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all. The hon. gentleman is not one of those with whom I am cynical. He has described a magnificent property. What explanation does he give for the fact that it is not paying its way? He explains a magnificent heritage which is evidently on the verge of bankruptcy. Can it not pay its way?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is one way of putting it. There is no question that so far as finances are concerned the company is in need of money to pay the interest on its debts, and to pay for rolling stock in connection with the operation of the road. It may be well for me to call attention to the fact that the business of the company has shown a remarkable increase during the last three years, and that the gross earnings of the company for these years were as follows:

1915	$25,900,000
1916	35,476,000
1917	42,319,000

For the same years the net earnings were:

1915	$ 6,623,000
1916	9,373,000
1917	11,525,000

The hon. gentleman may say that while it is true that the road is making a wonderful advance in regard to finances and income it ought to pay interest on its bonds and in addition provide money for betterments, rolling stock, and the running of the road. But every person knows that this is a new road and that it is practically a colonization road. If that hon. gentleman will go into the western provinces he will see that this is one of the best colonization roads that Canada ever had. It has 6,000 miles of branches in the West and it has done an enormous work in promoting the development of this country. We cannot hope to appreciate what Mackenzie and Mann have done in this regard. While a great deal of severe criticism has been heaped upon them in connection with the building of the Canadian Northern, I believe that in years to come the people of Canada will appreciate the enormous energy and wonderful ability which they have put into the development of this enterprise.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said: Give this road another loan; give it another $20,000,000 if necessary, to carry it over the present year. But the people of Canada will not stand for the granting of another loan to this undertaking. The people of Canada, if I understand them correctly, demand that we deal with this question and take the road over as a government proposition. That is what the Government are attempting to do at the present time. Hon. members talk about the nationalization of all the roads. That cannot possibly be considered at the present time. The hon. member for Edmonton said that the stock of the Canadian Northern was not worth anything. The arbitrators who are to be appointed by the Government, and by the Canadian Northern, will decide as to whether the stock has any value or not. The hon. gentleman declared that the party in power had run this country into debt to the extent of $500,000,000 in this proposition. That is not a fair statement to make in regard to this enterprise. He knows full well that the Federal Government have put into this property in securities and guarantees money to the extent of $104,000,000, and that the provinces have invested in this enterprise $107,000,000. The Government of the Dominion and the provinces have guaranteed the securities of the company to that extent. The sum of $211,000,000 of the money and securities of the people is already invested in the enterprise. It would be folly for us to say that we would allow it to go by default.

Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be opposed to government ownership. The constant claim of private companies is that they are more efficient than governments. Why should a group of men organized for a certain purpose be less efficient than a larger group of men organized for the same purpose such as a government? Look at the government ownership of the post office. Is it a corrupt hotbed of inefficiency? No. It is a department of transportation. It transports intelligence, letters, papers, money, goods, light freight and small parcels. Hon. gentlemen know that it does business in opposition to the express companies. It is a department whose honesty of purpose, whose administration for the public good is seldom or never questioned. Who would dare to propose to hand over the Post Office Department to a private individual or company? Yet the postal service in all countries was once farmed out to contractors and others. To-day not a civilized country in the world places the post office in private hands. Take many other departments of this Government, such as customs, inland revenue and agriculture; who would dare to say that they could be run by individuals or companies?

Ontario is often mentioned as the home of public ownership. I do not want to take up the time of the House in calling attention to the way in which they have developed public ownership in that great province, but I might mention the Hydro-Electric, in which $50,000,000 of the people's money is invested and which is being successfully carried on. There is no such thing as political manipulation or inefficiency in the management of that great enterprise. If you take other publicly-owned enterprises such as gas companies, street railways and waterworks in the large towns and cities of the province, you will find that they are all being successfully operated and managed free from party politics, and that they are being carried on as business enterprises for the benefit of the people who are being served by these public utilities and who appreciate the enormous advantages which they are deriving from public ownership.

Just a word in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific and Grand Trunk. They will eventually come under government control. It is unwise for the Government to assume financial responsibility at the present time in connection with these undertakings. We should not look upon this as a party question. Politics should be eliminated from it altogether. All these great public questions, such as the one with which we are dealing, should be considered without any party feeling. Party politics in this land of ours is receiving a very severe jolt at the present time, and the next election will prove that men and measures will count instead of party. This Government must grapple with this problem. It is not a question for experts; it is a question for the Government and for the people's representatives to deal with, and it is up to us to make the very best kind of proposition out of it. The Government have shown that they are not afraid to undertake the responsibility of this question, and they have presented the best possible solution of it. It is the only safe, sound, sane, business-like proposition that has been presented to our consideration, and I am very glad to give it my hearty support.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in seconding the amendment of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), to the motion for the second reading of the Bill, I wish to assure you that I did not do it with a view of confiscating any value that the Canadian Northern directors or owners may have in the property.

I would be the last one in the world to confiscate anybody's property, no matter in what form it was, without giving him value. I have no hesitation in agreeing with my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Armstrong) in all his premises, practically speaking, that is, that the road has a considerable property value, that it has been an influence in opening up the country, that it has subsidiaries connected with it that are valuable, and that it is a good proposition for the Government to assume control. I absolutely agree that the Government should take over the control in place of extending more loans to the company. I do not know that, as a general rule, I am in favour of government operation of anything, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, when he introduced this Bill, in answer to a question by myself, said that this railway would be operated by a corporation or company that would be entirely independent of the Governor in Council, that is to say, it would be operated by a company answerable only to Parliament. I see nothing in the Bill as introduced that would show that to be the case, but the Bill as introduced simply contains a provision to take over the stock now owned by the company. Therefore, I have not any hesitation in taking the word of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that when he assumes control of the stock he will operate the railway through an independent company, not on the same basis as that on which the Intercolonial is operated at the present time, and again—not that I doubt the ability of the present Minister of Railways to do what it is possible to do under such circumstances—I have to say that the government operation of railways, so far as the history of this country has gone, has not tended to encourage us in taking over more operations of the same kind.

The question now is not as to the value of the physical properties of the road; the question is whether it would be better to refer the value of the $60,000,000 worth of stock to arbitration or to foreclose under the statute of 1914, by which we loaned $45,000,000 under our guarantee of bonds to the Canadian Northern. That, I understand, is the question now before the House.

There is one thing in which I do not agree with my hon. friend from East Lambton, and that is that the physical properties of the road are worth what we are paying for them. So far as I can make out, we are paying about $540,000,000—that is, we are assuming about $540,000,000 of indebtedness—for the physical properties of the road. Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, who, together with Mr. Smith, were given authority to investigate the best means of operating the railways of Canada, have arrived at certain conclusions as to the value of this property. The Prime Minister said this afternoon that this commission was not appointed for the purpose of arriving at a valuation of the road. I do not see how the Prime Minister can justify this statement, because, as a matter of fact, they were appointed to find out what would be the best means for the Government to take to operate the railways of Canada, and in doing so, if they were going to recommend government control, they would necessarily have to find out what it should cost the Government to obtain that control; so that I cannot appreciate why the Prime Minister should say that it was not within the jurisdiction of the commission to find the values of these roads. The majority of that commission, Messrs. Drayton and Acworth, find that there had been expended on the Canadian Northern, of actual money, $383,302,451.33. They deducted certain amounts, about $13,000,000 net, for advances to controlled companies to pay indebtedness for interest subsequent to construction and operating deficits capitalized when the system was put together not less than $10,000,000; and interest during 1916 overcharged to construction, not less than $3,000,000; and placed the amount at $370,302,451. They employed a professor in the United States, Professor Swain, for the purpose of arriving at the physical value of the road. Professor Swain goes at it in two different ways. He places the value, as has been stated before, at about $400,000,000. That is a replacement value. He deducts a certain amount from that for depreciation. My hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) eulogized very highly the value of the rolling stock. I think he said it cost $56,000,000 and would be worth $80,000,000. It is well known that last winter the Canadian Northern engines were not capable of doing their work. The hon. member is the first man I ever heard who increased the value of any plant in the form of machinery after it had been in use for some years.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: The experts informed me that rolling stock such as is used on the Canadian Northern railway is worth double to-day what it was worth previous to the war. That is, if you should go out and attempt to buy cars or engines or anything in the way of rolling stock you would pay more than double.

Mr. NESBITT: I imagined that was what the hon. member meant, that if the same material had to be purchased at the present day it would cost probably $80,000,000. But he must remember that it was not purchased at the present day and depreciation must be allowed for, and the depreciation would amount to a great deal more than the increase in value would amount to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I deducted $11,000,000 for depreciation.

Mr. NESBITT: Professor Swain finds in the summing up that the property in its present condition would be worth $357,409,678. This, however, does not include equipment, and he adds $56,000,000 to that, which comes to four hundred and two millions odd, and he puts it roughly at $400,000,000. We are assuming a liability of more than that amount for the physical value of the property. The Minister of Finance this afternoon said that Professor Swain in valuing the property had forgotten to put in the value of the realty, and he placed the value of the realty at $28,000,000 or $29,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I placed no value upon it. I mentioned the fact that the lands had been omitted.

Mr. NESBITT: Somebody mentioned the amount, and said that altogether $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 had been omitted.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Cash assets on hand to the amount of $23,000,000 were omitted.

Mr. NESBITT: They value their "cash on hand, accounts receivable, material, supplies, etc.," at $14,446,152. The items are all put together, and we cannot tell what each separate item amounts to. Accounts receivable, for instance, may be very poor. Material and supplies is simply a matter of stock taking. I would not like to say that these items would be worth altogether $14,000,000 in cash. However, Professor Swain, I understand, left out the lands. My own idea is that Professor Swain meant to say he left out the equity in the lands; that is, the amount over and above the mortgages against the lands, and not that he left out the total value of the lands. As the company themselves value the land at $28,000,000 or $29,000,000, with mortgages against it of $21,000,000, it is very questionable whether there would be much equity left in the land. It all depends, of course, upon when and how they were sold. At a forced sale, for instance, I have no doubt that there would be no equity in the lands at all, judging by how lands depreciate on such an occasion.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister this afternoon said that if we were to acquire the equity in the stock under foreclosure proceedings we would take over the physical property. My hon. friends say that under their proposition, leaving the value of the stock to arbitration, the company would be left in its entity and would operate the road and still be responsible for its liabilities. Now, that is the first time in my life that I ever heard of a company acquiring the stock of a corporation and not acquiring the property of the corporation. I must confess that I am learning something every day—and I have learned a good deal to-day if it is possible for me, for instance, to take over the entire stock of a company and not acquire the company and not be responsible for all its liabilities. I think the Minister of Finance in discussing this matter the other day told us that we would be liable for all the liabilities of the road. In taking over the stock, no matter how it is taken over, I certainly think we shall assume all the liabilities of the Canadian Northern. Surely then, when we are taking over the liabilities, my hon. friend would not say that we were not taking over the assets as well. When we take over the stock we acquire the property just as much as if we acquired it under foreclosure proceedings. I may be wrong, I frequently am; but it would take a great deal of effort to prove to me that when we acquire the stock of a company we do not acquire the physical assets and the liabilities of the company also.

As to whether the company is in default or not, the Minister of Finance this afternoon did not claim that they were not in default. He did say that unless the Government took over the property in the way that he proposed, the company would have to come to the Government for advances again next year, and, to use his own words, "for the next two or three or four or five years to come." Since 1914, when the guarantee was made and the Government were authorized under section 24 to take over the road in case of default, the company have applied for assistance again, and if the Government had not loaned them $15,000,000 in 1916 to help them meet their liabilities, the road would certainly have defaulted.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister stated this afternoon that surely nobody in this House would confiscate the property. He used a very harsh word when he talked about confiscation. When we take over the equity in the stock, if there is any, by foreclosure proceedings, we certainly are not confiscating anything that the managers of the Canadian Northern have at the present time. Had it not been for our loan of 1916 they would have defaulted. They could not possibly have carried on until now without somebody taking foreclosure proceedings. Supposing they had borrowed this money from a trust corporation or a bank and given the same security that they gave to the Government, and put the same clauses in an agreement that were contained in the statute of 1914—would anybody say that if the trust company or the bank took over the corporation it was confiscating the property in the interests of the trust company or bank? I do not think so; nobody would find any fault with that. Suppose I mortgage my property and cannot pay the interest on the mortgage, nobody would ever dream of saying that the mortgagee confiscated the property because he foreclosed. I had the opportunity of carrying out my agreement and I failed.

A great many people do that under certain circumstances. Nobody finds fault with the mortgagee for foreclosing; neither should the owners of the Canadian Northern do so. I have nothing to say against the enterprise of Mackenzie and Mann; indeed, I have much pride in the enterprise they have shown as Canadians in building this road. The building of a great deal of it, however, was a great mistake. For that matter, a great deal of the railway construction work that has been done throughout Canada has been far in advance of the time. Roads are even now being built that, I think, are horrible mistakes; I have spoken about that in the House on frequent occasions. However, these people proceeded with the work, and they were encouraged in it not only by the Dominion Government but by practically all the Provincial Governments as well. They acquired a great property, but I am sorry to say that they have lost out. If I invest some money in a stock margin and the stock goes down, nobody comes to my assistance; I lose out. If I mortgage my property and cannot pay the principal or interest upon the mortgage, I lose the property; nobody says that my property has been confiscated. "Confiscation" is a rather harsh word to use in referring to foreclosure of the stock of this company and the taking over of the railway system. They have had every opportunity; we lent them $15,000,000 more than we promised to lend them when the statute to which I have referred was passed. Moreover, we have paid some three or four million dollars by way of interest upon the guarantee made in 1914 besides the $15,000,000 loan. It is hardly right, therefore, to say that we have treated them unfairly.

I do not see any reason why the stock should not be taken over under foreclosure proceedings. If under this amendment we should take it over, the Government could appoint a commission or a committee to manage the road just as it proposes to do now. An independent commission could be appointed to deal with the matter—I hope that any commission that is appointed will be really independent. I do not see why this could not be done.

I am not going to discuss the merits or the demerits of the corporation, or its value any more than to say—and this is why I am supporting the amendment—that it is proposed to give the company more than the road is worth. I do not think we should take into consideration what the company may earn ten, fifteen, or twenty years from now if the country is prosperous. Many things may tend to cause our country to prosper in the future. The whole energy of the people, not particularly the work of the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, or any other Canadian railway, tends to increase the prosperity of this road and of every other road in Canada. Why, then, the people should pay in advance for what they are going to do themselves is more than I can understand. As a matter of fact, the present owners of the Canadian Northern should be grateful to the Government for taking over the road and releasing them from their liabilities without payment in respect of the prospective value of the stock. The Government appointed a commission to find out what would be the best system to adopt in connection with the operation of the various railways in Canada. That Commission took upon itself to value this particular road. They have valued it in two or three different ways and in each case they have arrived at the conclusion that there is no equity in the stock. Take the other side of it: suppose we did not lend them the $15,000,000 in 1916; they certainly would have had no equity in the stock by this time because some of the mortgagees or bondholders would have foreclosed. For the life of me, therefore, I cannot see that we should be doing anything unfair in taking over the stock under foreclosure proceedings as provided in the agreement and in the statute of 1914 when we guaranteed their bonds to the extent of $45,000,000.

As to the general principle of the Government's taking over the road, I cannot see that they could do anything else which would be equitable and in the interests of the country. I am sorry that they did not go further and take over the Grand Trunk Pacific as well. I think I understood the Minister of Finance, however, when he introduced the resolution upon which the Bill was to be founded, to say that eventually the Grand Trunk Pacific would be taken over. The Grand Trunk should be very much pleased to hand over the Grand Trunk Pacific, even though they may lose what money they have invested in it. They should also be very glad to make running or feeding arrangements with the Government if they are relieved of the Grand Trunk Pacific, because this $7,500,000 that it is proposed to lend them now is already used up in losses in operation and interest on bonds. There is no probability that in other years the road will be in any better position. Although it is a dead horse, therefore, a great deal of money would be saved in the way of duplications and terminals if this road were taken over. Perhaps we might break even in the whole transaction.

However, that is not the question before the House at the moment; we can discuss that when we come to it. The simple question now before the House is not what this road has done for Canada or what Canada has done for it; the question is, what is the better way of acquiring the stock, by submitting the matter of valuation to an arbitration as is proposed, or by foreclosure proceedings? There is no doubt that no matter who the arbitrators are they will take it for granted that Parliament has presumed that there is a value in the stock; otherwise Parliament would not have referred the matter to them for arbitration. That is one good reason why the matter should not be referred to a board of arbitration, and it is a good reason in favour of foreclosure proceedings so far as the equity of the stock is concerned. I am strongly in favour of foreclosure proceedings.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I understood it was arranged that a speaker on the other side was to follow my hon. friend for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), but if not, I desire to make some remarks in this connection. I agree with my hon. friend from North Oxford that the question before the House relates to the taking over of $60,000,000 of Canadian Northern stock which has been declared on good authority to have no value. I have not had the privilege of listening to the arguments brought forward by the Government in behalf of what I may characterize as a most remarkable transaction, but, it does not appear to me that any argument can be evolved in support of taking an unstated amount of money, which may be $60,000,000 or thereabouts, out of the treasury of Canada, at the present time, under the circumstances in which we find ourselves and handing that over except for value received. I cannot understand how the Government of the day, charged with the financial and other responsibilities that rest upon it, can come before Parliament and the country with a proposition to pay an indefinite amount, which may be $60,000,000 or thereabouts, for something that is on record as having no value, and which, if it has a value, already belongs by statute to the Dominion of Canada. It would be impossible to express in suitable terms that disregard for the public interest for the financial situation of the country, that is involved in such a proposal. It is to me unthinkable that such a proposal should be made. The worst enemy that this Government has in this country, I am sure, never would have accused the Government of being willing to bring such a proposal forward.

It has been said that the opposition to the Bill before the House involves a suggested confiscation of the property of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. My hon. friend from North Oxford has already dealt with that question. He has shown, in terms that cannot be controverted, that there is no right and that, therefore, there can be no confiscation. But let us assume if you please, that there is a right and a value in this stock. Surely, in that case, it was the business of the Government to come before Parliament with a definite proposal as to how much should be paid by the country for that stock if it were desired to acquire the ownership of this road. On what pretense can the Government come before Parliament and the country with a proposal that, in the terms of this Bill, binds Parliament to pay money of an unknown amount? The Minister of Finance has a high reputation as a business man; he had a successful business career before he gave his talents to the service of his country. But I venture to say that, in all his long and successful business career, he never made such a proposal as a business proposition on behalf of any business interest with which he was connected. I certainly say, with all due respect to the Minister of Finance, that he is not, in this transaction, showing due regard to the welfare of Canada and to the interest of its people when he comes before Parliament with an indefinite proposition such as this involving the possibility of the payment of so many millions of dollars. I do not wish to use harsh language in this connection. I am and have always been willing to give the Minister of Finance credit for the highest motives, for using his best endeavours in the interest of his country as he sees that interest, although he and I do not see the interest of the country in the same light; but I cannot give him or the Government credit on this occasion for honesty of purpose in bringing before Parliament this proposal as it has been brought. If that stock be worth money, there are means of coming to a conclusion as to what amount of money it is worth, and it is the business of the Government first to arrive at that estimate and then to present it to Parliament. If it be a just estimate, it will be supported by Parliament and no one will find fault; but if it be a fact that this Government cannot come to a conclusion as to what is a fair value for that stock, then when the Government comes with a proposition such as this, it is evidence of anything but good intent.

We are staggering under financial burdens which are increasing from day to day because of circumstances not under our control. We must bear those burdens, and if this Government has any duty to perform in the interest of the cause for which these burdens are being borne, its duty is to see that not a dollar goes out of the treasury of Canada except for good value. By this Bill, we are made subject to the possibility of having to pay out of the public treasury a sum aggregating $60,000,000 for the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, which stock already belongs to us because of the default of the company under the statute. And if it did not so belong to us, the Government still should not come to Parliament except with a definite proposition as to how much we should pay for that stock.

But that is only a small part of the liability that is being assumed by the country under this Bill. Section 3 says:

—the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system, in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company, or postponing the payment thereof, on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, may guarantee payment in whole or in part, and may give the obligations, or securities of the Government in connection therewith.

It may be that the Government has already informed the House as to the extent and nature of the obligations that will be assumed under this section of the Bill. I have not heard any such statement, and I do not think it has been made. If it is wrong to ask the country to become committed to the payment of an unknown amount for stock that is of no value, it is an outrage to commit the country to an absolutely unknown and indefinite amount in payment of obligations incurred or to be incurred, and that responsibility to be imposed upon the country, not by Act of Parliament, but simply by order of the Governor in Council. Canada never saw such legislation before. There never was such a proposal in kind or in amount ever brought before the Parliament of this country. I cannot believe that such an extraordinary and remarkable proposition—involving so many hundreds of millions of dollars—can be brought forward with good intentions. It has not the appearance and it has not the character of a measure with good intentions. I claim the right to condemn the Government for their proposal because of its terms, but even more because of the lack of good intent as evidenced by those terms.

There is involved in this the general question of railway policy of our country. I alluded to that policy when the resolutions were before the House, and I will again give my views in regard to it. Possibly my views may not agree with those already expressed by others. If that be so I am sorry, but I think the responsibilities are so great that it is only right I should give the views which I hold and hold very strongly. I have stated that judged by the experience of Canada this Government, under the most favourable circumstances, cannot operate the Canadian Northern Railway system either as efficiently or as economically as does the company now operating it. There is no evidence to lead us to believe for an instant that the Government can do so. There is no evidence to lead us to believe that they want to do it, or that it is any part of their intention to do it, or that they could do it, if it was their intention to do it—and I say this with all due respect to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane). I am not here as a champion of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, either in its inception or in its management, but if the people of Canada have to make a choice between government operation of this railway and its operation by the company, the interests of the Dominion of Canada demand that the present company shall continue to operate it. We have government operation of the Intercolonial and we have government operation of the Transcontinental. There is nothing in the operation of these roads to show either superior economy or superior efficiency over the operation of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. I am not blaming my hon. friend in the matter. It is a condition he has to deal with. There is a condition surrounding the government operation of railways in this country which makes their efficient and economic operation impossible. In taking over and operating 9,000 miles of railroad, we are assuming a responsibility so terrific in its magnitude that I think very few of us understand it or realize it.

There are the three points—the payment of possibly $60,000,000 for stock that is of no value; the payment of an unknown and uncalculated amount of indebtedness of the company, on the authority of the Governor in Council; and the management of a vast system of transportation, comprising 9,000 miles of railway, by the Government, which has proven itself not as efficient as the company in railway management. Surely these are conditions that should cause us to look much more carefully than we have yet done on this transaction which we are facing so light-heartedly.

It has been said here and elsewhere that Canada has a railway problem on her hands, and the problem is that she has too many railways, and because she has too many railways we are to reduce the number by combining the systems. I absolutely take issue with that view. I maintain that Canada has not too many railways; that she needs the railways she has; that she will need more railways in the future, and that she can get better service and better value from these railways under competitive management than she can in any other way. It is true that the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern were just completed at the outbreak of the war, and the outbreak of the war prevented that further development of the country along their lines which would have brought them traffic and would probably have made them financial successes before now. Still, we did not create the war, and they did not create it; it is a condition which has overtaken us all, and it is childish to speak of either the country or the railways being discredited because of conditions having arisen which no wisdom could have foreseen, and which in the nature of things cannot last much longer.

When those conditions have passed away the railways will be needed for the development of the country. The Canadian Northern is supposed to be a failure as a business proposition because it is not able to pay the interest on its securities. I find from the statement placed before the House that it had the following net earnings:

1917	11,500,000

These were net earnings available for the payment of interest on bonds, betterments, etc. I submit that a railway showing such progress in net earnings under present conditions ought not to be written down as a failure. It is true it is not able to meet its obligations; it is true it is in default; it is true we are entitled to foreclose it tomorrow if we so desire and that we have no right to pay a cent of money for the common stock; but it is also true, as shown by the statement which has been laid before the House, that so far from its being ill-advised and foredoomed to failure, with the assured growth of our country and of our railways it cannot help but be an abounding success in due time. But, of course, it will have to be carried until that time arrives. Speaking for myself individually, and only individually, I would be strongly in favour of dealing with the Canadian Northern exactly as we are dealing with the Grand Trunk Pacific. So long as we are satisfied that the railways are being economically and efficiently managed, and that the money they earn is going where it should go, the country would be justified in carrying these railway companies over the difficulties of the present time by loans, well secured and at interest, as is being done in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific. No reason has been placed before the House why the same should not be done in the case of the Canadian Northern.

If this action proposed to be taken is taken in the belief that the people are crazy on the subject of the government ownership of railways, and that any sort of a proposition that will put into their hands 9,000 miles of railway is going to be pleasing to them, I am one to take the view that the people are not fools and that the Government which makes its calculations on the basis that the people do not realize what is in their own interest is making a huge mistake. There is no charm in government ownership unless government ownership means economy and efficiency. A government ownership that means extravagance and inefficiency is surely not a business proposition which will appeal to the people. When, in addition to that, we eliminate the principle of energetic individual competition in our railway services, and in addition that again, we are paying an unknown and vast amount of money for something for which there is no value, I think I am warranted in saying that this is the most unjustifiable transaction that was ever brought before the Parliament of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Middlebro the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Wednesday, August 15, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

MR. G. O. AIKEN.

Mr. GRAHAM:

July 25—1. Is G. O. Aiken in the employ of the Government in Kingston?
2. If so, what are his duties and his salary?
3. When was he retired from the position of guard, and why?
4. What was the date of his new appointment?
5. Who previously performed the duties of the position to which Mr. Aiken has now been appointed
6. Why was not a returned soldier given this position?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

1. Yes.
2. Sanitary Inspector of Military Buildings in Kingston at a salary of $100 per month.
3. October 30th, 1916, by voluntary resignation.
4. October 19, 1916, and took up his duties on November 1, 1916.
5. No one.
6. Not known.

MR. E. BRYDON JACK.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

July 28—1. Has a Mr. Brydon Jack, of Winnipeg, been recently appointed superintending engineer for the West, in the Public Works Department?
2. If so, was he recommended by the Civil Service Commission?
3. What is his salary?

Mr. REID (for Minister of Public Works.)

1. Yes, Mr. E. Brydon Jack has been appointed, on 3rd July, 1917, superintending engineer for the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, with headquarters at Winnipeg.
2. The Civil Service Commission has no jurisdiction over appointments to outside staff of Public Works Department.
3. $3,000 per annum

FARMERS' BANK.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

July 28—1. Is any action being contemplated by the Government with a view to reimburse the shareholders of the defunct Farmers' Bank?
2. Has any petition been received during this session by any member of the Government concerning this matter?
3. If so, by whom?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

Finance Department: 1. Answered on January 31, 1917, as follows:

It is not the intention of the Government to introduce legislation for the purpose during the present session.

2. No.
3. Answered by No. 2.

ÆTNA EXPLOSIVE COMPANY.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the Ætna Explosive Company of Drummondville has closed its doors?
2. Is the Government aware as to how many men this company employed?
3. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the said establishment was closed in consequence of any action of the Imperial Munitions Board?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. The Government is informed that the Aetna Chemical Company, of Drummondville, is in the hands of a receiver.
2. The Government is informed that the said company employed in the neighbourhood of 1,500 people.
3. The Government is informed that the above-mentioned company failed to make deliveries of nitrocelluose powder according to its contract with the Imperial Munitions Board and finally advised the board that owing to financial difficulties, operations would have to be suspended unless the contract price was materially increased.

The Ministry of Munitions was unwilling to amend the contract and pay an increased price. Meanwhile the company went into the hands of a receiver and the Imperial Munitions Board arranged to take from it such powder as it could produce from the raw material it had on hand and to release it from the unfinished portion of the contract.

(The above information has been received from the Imperial Munitions Board.)

CAPT. G. H. CAMPBELL.

*Mr. J. J. HUGHES:

1. How long has Captain G. H. Campbell been engaged in recruiting or other work of a like military character in Prince Edward Island?
2. How long has Major T. F. Fullerton been engaged in recruiting or other work of a like military character in Prince Edward Island?
3. How long has Lieutenant W. A. McQueen been engaged in recruiting or other work of a like military character in Prince Edward Island?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Captain G. H. Campbell, a returned officer, was employed from 9th February, 1917, to 31st July, 1917.

2. Major (Rev.) T. F. Fullerton has been employed since 21st November, 1916.

3. Lieutenant W. A. McQueen, D.C.M., has been employed since 20th October, 1916.

LIEUT. M. R. HARDY.

*Mr. J. J. HUGHES:

1. Is Lieutenant M. R. Hardy employed in recruiting or other work of a like military character in Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, how long has he been so employed, and what pay or remuneration is he receiving?

3. How much has he received up to the present time?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. and 2. Lieut. M. R. Hardy was employed as recruiting sergeant from March 28 to May 31, 1917, at $1.50 per day.

3. $97.50.

ST. LAWRENCE FLOUR MILLS CO.

*Mr. CARDIN:

1. What are the various contracts, if any, and their respective amounts and dates, between the St. Lawrence Flour Mills Company and the Government?

2. What are the names of the president and general manager of the said company?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is undesirable in the public interest to give information on such matters at the present time.

FORESTRY BATTALIONS.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. How many Forestry Battalions were formed in Canada, and how many of them went overseas?

2. What rate of wages is paid to the men of the Forestry Battalions?

3. Are they all paid at the same rate?

4. If any of them are paid extra, what is that extra for, and what is the nature of the work which entitles one to the extra pay?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. List of Forestry Battalions formed in Canada and which have proceeded overseas:

Battalion.	Officers.	Ranks.
224th Forestry Battalion....	47	1,536
230th Forestry Battalion....	30	1,038
238th Forestry Battalion....	44	1,084
242nd Forestry Battalion....	44	1,006
Total	165	4,664
		4,829
Drafts
Drafts from the various districts	109	3,567
Drafts from 230th Forestry Battalion Depot and not included in 230th Battalion..	40	913
122nd Battalion (converted upon arrival in England).	26	686
Total	175	5,166
		5,341
		10,170

In addition to the above, a large number of men already overseas were formed into Forestry Companies.

2. $1.10 per day in Canada.

3. No.

4. The following special rates of pay are given specially qualified men, after arrival overseas; these rates include regimental pay and field pay of $1.10 per day:

	Consolidated rate of pay.

MEDICAL OFFICERS AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Are medical officers on duty at the port of Rimouski, and are they paid by the Government?

2. If so what are their names and respective salaries?

3. Upon whose recommendation were said medical officers appointed?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

Department of Agriculture.

1. Yes.

2. Dr. L. F. Lepage, $1,200 per annum; Dr. Philip Lord, $1,200 per annum.

3. Minister of Agriculture.

Department of Marine and Fisheries.

1, 2 and 3. In the event of sick mariners, entitled to relief, arriving at the port of Rimouski, the Collector of Customs is authorized by the Department of Marine to employ a medical doctor, who is paid for each individual case treated.

KENTVILLE ARMOURY—CARETAKER.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What is the name of the caretaker of the armoury at Kentville, N.S.?

2. When was he appointed?

3. How much is he paid?

4. How much pay has he received since the date of his appointment?

5. What are his duties?

6. How much time does he devote to care of the armoury or contents?

7. Has he ever had any militia training?

8. What is his civil occupation?

9. Will the Government appoint a returned soldier caretaker of the armoury at Kentville, N.S.?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. William Shupe.

2. 4th May, 1912.

3. $1 per day.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Care of arms, clothing, equipment, building and grounds.

6. Whatever time is necessary.

7. Not known to have had military training.

8. Teamster.

9. Returned soldiers are appointed, if suitable and available, to vacancies.

KENTVILLE ARMOURY—MILITIA STORES.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Are there any militia stores in the armoury at Kentville, N.S., in addition to stores belonging to No. 8 Company, C.A.S.C.?

2. What amount was formerly paid to the officer commanding No. 8 Company, C.A.S.C., annually for care of stores and arms belonging to that unit?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. The clothing and stores of "B" Squadron, 14th Hussars, are stored in the armoury at Kentville, in addition to those of No. 8 Company, C.A.S.C.

2. $80 per annum before the arms, etc., were kept in a government-owned armoury. These arms, etc., are now cared for by the caretaker of the Kentville armoury, who, in addition to these duties, is in charge of the clothing, etc., of "B" Squadron, 14th Hussars, and responsible for the care of the armoury building and grounds.

MR. I. GOLDMAN.

Mr. TURGEON:

1. Is the Minister of Militia and Defence aware that since the outbreak of the war, members of the overseas battalions organized in Montreal have availed themselves of the services of Mr. I Goldman, surgeon-chiropodist of that city?

2. Is the Minister of Militia and Defence aware that Mr. Goldman has been treating returned soldiers who are inmates of the different convalescent homes in Montreal during the past three years?

3. Is the Minister of Militia and Defence aware that at no time since the outbreak of the war, and notwithstanding several thousand treatments, has Mr. I. Goldman asked for or accepted payment for the valuable services he rendered?

4. Is the Minister of Militia and Defence aware that it has been suggested that in recognition of the very valuable services rendered by Mr. I Goldman, and his refusal to demand or accept payment, an honourary commission in the Canadian Militia be extended to him, in order that he may still continue to give those urgently in need of same, the benefit of his services and skill?

5. Is it the intention of the Minister to extend Mr. I. Goldman such honourary commission?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Mr. I. Goldman, chiropodist, has performed services in chiropody for the soldiers in Montreal.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Mr. I. Goldman has rendered an account for his services.

4. Mr. I. Goldman was desirous of being granted an honorary commission. The Director General of Medical Services states that:

There is no precedent that he is aware of for granting commissioned or honorary rank to chiropodists, and that officers who join the Army Medical Corps require a University degree, and that there would be serious objection to giving those not qualified as officers in the Army Medical Corps commissions.

5. Answered by No. 4.

MR. HORMISDAS LAPORTE.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is Hormisdas Laporte, wholesale grocery merchant, of Montreal, in receipt of a salary as a member of the War Purchasing Commission?

2. If so, what is the amount of such salary?

3. What amount has he received since his appointment for living and travelling expenses respectively?

4. Has he a private secretary? If so, who is he and what is his salary?

5. How many clerks has he working immediately under him?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Since his appointment in May, 1915, he has drawn $3,810 on account of living expenses and $752.90 on account of travelling expenses.

4. No.

5. None. All clerks are subject to the direction of the commission.

DESPATCH FROM GENERAL CURRIE.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has the Government taken cognizance of the following despatch addressed, on the occasion of the third anniversary of the war, by Windermere, from London, in the Montreal Star newspaper?

KEEP UNITED IN CANADA.

From Lieutenant-General A. M. Currie.

"Editor of The Star:

"London, August 4—General Currie, who is now well-established in command of the Canadian Corps, tells me he feels diffidence in sending a message to Canada at this particular moment, for as a soldier, he takes no part in matters of possible political controversy, but my intercourse with General Currie since his advent here with the 1st Canadian Division justifies me in saying that if he felt free to express his views at this critical juncture his message would read as follows:—

"It is my job to fight the troops placed at my disposal to the very best advantage. It is the duty of others to supply me with the necessary troops. I hope the successes of this corps, only possible on account of the united efforts of every officer and man in it, will serve as an inspiration to those at home.

"I hope that, appreciating what we do in the field through uniting all our efforts, they will do their utmost to remain united in Canada. News from there does not make pleasant reading to men in the field here. Orangemen and Catholics, Anglo-Saxon and French-Canadian, Whig and Tory, fight side by side, and dying are laid side by side in the same grave fully satisfied to give their lives for the cause they know to be just."

Windermere.

2. Was that despatch passed by the Government censor?

3. Did the Government inquire of General Currie about the breach of confidence or of faith committed and admitted in the above publication?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to instruct its Censor Bureau to forbid the publication of any official or public message from overseas military officers or from correspondents stating they represent the views of the latter on matters of possible political controversy?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1 and 2. No telegraphic despatch is permitted to leave the British Isles without the permission of the British censor. Presumably, therefore, the despatch in question was passed by that censor.

3. No. The Government do not consider that any such inquiry is called for.

4. The Government are not aware of any circumstances which render it necessary or desirable to issue special instructions as to the subject alluded to.

SENATOR L'ESPERANCE.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has Mr. D. O. L'Esperance, of Quebec, been appointed a Senator?

2. If so, what division does he represent?

3. Is he qualified in the division for which he has been appointed according to Section 23 of the British North America Act, 1867?

4. If so, on what property is he qualified?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. Yes.

2. Gulf.

3. Mr. L'Esperance has made and subscribed a declaration of qualification in accordance with section 23 of the British North America Act.

4. Section 23 of the British North America Act does not require a senator to designate the property upon which he qualifies.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. FORTIER:

1. Has a Rev. Dr. Burke been appointed a Chaplain in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, and did he at any time since his appointment go to Rome?

2. If so, when, and for what purpose?

3. How many trans-Atlantic trips has the said Dr. Burke made since the Government appointed him a Chaplain?

4. Is the Government aware as to whether or not he spent much of his time in England discussing politics in clubs and hotels?

5. If so, were any complaints made to the Government in this respect?

6. Is Dr. Burke at present in Canada, and do his duties necessitate his presence at Ottawa or Murray Bay or elsewhere in the Dominion?

7. Has the Government received any representation or complaint regarding Rev. Dr. Burke's expenses?

8. Since his appointment as Chaplain in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, did Dr. Burke visit Chicago?

9. What amount has Dr. Burke received for pay and how much for expenses?

10. Is he still under pay? If so, at what rate per diem?

11. What duties are performed in Canada by Rev. Dr. Burke at the present time?

12. How much longer does the Government intend to keep Rev. Dr. Burke on the pay-roll?

*Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Was Rev. Dr. Burke, Editor of the Catholic Register of Toronto, appointed a Chaplain in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces with the rank of Colonel?

2. Did any Bishop or Bishops ask for his appointment? If so, who?

3. Did Rev. Dr. Burke officiate at the front in France or Flanders as a Chaplain? If so, where, and for what length of time?

4. Did the Government or any member thereof receive any complaints about Rev. Dr. Burke, or requests for his removal?

5. Was he removed from the position first assigned him and replaced by Father Workman or Father French?

6. If so, since his removal has he continued in uniform and in receipt of pay?

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LANCTOT (translation): On the 7th instant, I asked the Government to lay on the Table a return in connection with the losses which some members of this House might have met with when the Parliamentary buildings were burnt down.

I should like to know when the Government will bring down that information, I have no doubt that the acting Secretary of State (Mr. Sévigny) has had this report in his hands for many days past and I want to know why he should defer laying it down on the Table.

I would further say that in May last, I had a question on the Orders of the Day as to pure-bred stock being distributed by the Minister of Agriculture in the county of Dorchester, upon the Minister's own recommendation, the question was put down as an order for a return. As for the preceding question, I must suppose these documents are now with the Secretary of State, I should like to have these documents as early as possible.

Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): In reply to the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville, I may inform him that there is no report as to the two questions referred to in the Secretary of State department. As soon as these papers have been sent, they will be duly submitted to the House.

Mr. LANCTOT (translation): It take a long time to get those papers. The reason might be that the acting Secretary of State is personally interested in the matter.

WHEAT REGULATIONS.

TELEGRAM FROM NON-PARTISAN LEAGUE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I desire to ask a question of the Government and in order to do so I shall read a telegram dated Calgary, August 14. This is a copy of a wire which was sent to the Prime Minister:

> We, the Alberta executive of the non-partisan league strongly resent order Board Grain Supervisors in prohibiting Canadian farmer selling his wheat in United States market, particularly in face of the fact that your Government was good enough to remove the duty so that he might have the advantage of that market. We further seriously question the wisdom and fairness of having a predominating number of grain men on the Board and insufficient representation of the producing farmer class. Further resolved that we are convinced of the injustice of fixing a price on a staple commodity as wheat unless there is a corresponding fixed price on flour, bacon, machinery for productive purposes, and other staple articles of food and manufacture.
> (Sgd.) H. L. Wilson, Chairman.
> J. H. Ford, Secretary.

In view of the fact that cash wheat is quoted in Winnipeg to-day at $2.40 for No. 1 Northern, in Minneapolis at $2.85 to $2.90, and in Duluth at $2.83 to $2.90, is it the intention to maintain the present maximum price and at the same time to maintain the prohibition of export?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A telegram similar to that was sent to the Prime Minister, as stated. The Prime Minister referred that to my department, and I am now dealing with it. If it is considered best I will make a short statement in the House in reference to the whole matter, probably not later than to-morrow.

UNITED STATES LABOUR FOR CANADIAN HARVEST.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD: I see by the morning papers that Canada has accepted reciprocity in regard to labour with the United States. The article reads that the immigration regulations may be suspended to permit labour to be sent across the border. I would ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) if any person living in Canada and desiring to go to the United States will have to report to the immigration agent as in the past?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: A statement in regard to the arrangement entered into was made in the House several weeks ago, when negotiations with the United States Government resulting in an agreement were completed. Nothing new has developed since that time as far as I am aware. The Minister of the Interior is not in his place at the moment. I shall direct his attention to the question of my hon. friend.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL.

The House resumed debate from Tuesday, August 14, on the motion of Sir Thomas White for the second reading of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, may I premise my remarks by saying that any theoretic or academic discussion as to the wisdom or folly of government ownership of railways at the present time can help but very little in the solution of the great problem which is now before the House, because we are confronted with a condition and a state of fact, and not a theory, and were it not that this Government is involved so very heavily financially behind the Canadian Northern Railway, and were it not that we are in the midst of a great war, I doubt not that many members of this House would vote somewhat differently from what they will on the present motion. The railway, it appears, was born in the province of Manitoba, a quarter of a century ago, and there, and in the other western provinces, it received its early education. Had it remained there I have no doubt it would have been known to-day as one of the most successful railroads, financially, in the Dominion of Canada. But, unfortunately, it became ambitious, it spread out and desired to become a national railway, and by that means it has involved itself to such an extent that to-day we are compelled to take some action in order to save the situation. After it was born, in 1896, apparently it got along all right for about three years, because it was not until the year 1899 that it first came to the late Administration and asked for assistance in order to extend its lines to the head of lake Superior. It came back in 1903 and the late Government guaranteed its bonds for $13,000 a mile for the line from Winnipeg to Edmonton. Back again it came in 1908, and the Government again guaranteed its bonds in order that it might extend branch lines throughout the western provinces. Then, in 1911, it came back once more and asked for a guarantee of bonds of $35,000 a mile in order to extend the line from Montreal to Port Arthur, a distance of 1,000 miles, and the Government agreed to guarantee its bonds to the extent of $35,000,000. Upon that occasion it is only right to say that the Government stamped upon that enterprise its character as a national highway, because in the debate of 1911, and indeed in the preamble of the very Act itself by which we proposed to give a guarantee of $35,000 per mile for the 1,000 miles, the railway is thenceforward spoken of as a transcontinental road. I cull from the preamble of the Act: "It is in the interest of Canada as a whole that another line of railway should be constructed from the Pacific ocean to the city of Montreal." What we say is that by that legislation of 1911 the late Government stamped upon that enterprise the character of a national railway, and it was entitled to be treated as such from that time forth. In the debate of 1914, when the company came back to the Conservative Administration for further assistance and asked for a guarantee of $45,000,000 for their bonds, the following statement was made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not quoting this so much in criticism of what has been done by the hon. members opposite, because I think that in a great crisis like the present we should not unduly criticise the actions of our opponents, but should make these matters subservient to the great issue of winning the war. We refer to these matters not so much in criticism of them as in justification of ourselves and of the measure now before the House. In that debate Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at page 3672 of Hansard of 1914, said:

> I may confess at once that I have long believed that this country requires three transcontinental railways and although this theory has been sometimes controverted, in this House and out of it, I have never seen any reason to change my opinion. I have always favoured the efforts of our two fellow citizens whose names have been mentioned several times by my right hon. friend, and who have applied themselves for many years to the task of binding the continent with another band of steel. The late Government were not slow to interest themselves in the enterprise and to favour it as much as they could.

And so we have the railway before us today, impressed with that character, in a country with seven and one-half millions of population, a country with a total railway mileage of something like 40,000 miles. Canada has the greatest railway mileage per capita of any country in the world, so far as I know. In Canada we have one mile of railway for every 185 of our population. In the United States they have only one mile for every 400 of their population. In Great Britain they have one mile for every 2,000 of their population; in Russia, one mile for every 4,000, and in Australia, one mile for every 274. In addition to this, it must be taken into consideration that the Dominion of Canada has transportation facilities such as are possessed by no other country in the world in our great line of inland waterways, extending 2,000 miles from the coast inland, a line of waterways which I believe is not sufficiently appreciated by the people of this country. How water communication with the sea is valued in other places is shown by the fact that the city of Manchester, in order to get water connection with the highways of the sea, has paid hundreds of millions of dollars for the construction of the Manchester ship canal, and the city of Edinburgh and the city of Glasgow and the city of Belfast have done the same. So that our position as the country in the world with the greatest railway mileage according to population is made even more striking by the fact that we have this great inland waterway in addition, so that we really do not require such a great railway mileage as a country not enjoying this great natural advantage.

The Government of Canada now own and operate a very considerable railway system. If the proposed Bill goes through and we take over the Canadian Northern Railway, we will add to the mileage of government-owned railways in Canada, in round numbers, 10,000 miles. We already have the Intercolonial with 1,500 miles, the National Transcontinental Railway with 1,800 miles, and the Prince Edward Island Railway with 275 miles. In other words, if this proposition goes through, the Government of Canada will be the owner of something like 13,600 miles of railway. Thus Canada will own one-third of the total railway mileage of the country. Then we shall be able to see whether or not government ownership can be made to pay and is in the interest of the people of the country. Our ability to make the railway pay is very doubtful, nor is it certain that we can operate it as cheaply and efficiently as it can be operated by private enterprise. But we are in a position where we can scarcely help ourselves, and though we have come to the conclusion that we should pass this Bill, to a certain extent, we are not free agents. Canada has given to the Canadian Northern Railway system vast sums in subsidies and guarantees. The Dominion Government has given to the Canadian Northern Railway $31,000,000 in subsidies. In addition to that we have guaranteed their bonds to the extent of $104,000,000; in addition to that we have given them a loan of $15,000,000, making a total aid to the Canadian Northern by the Dominion of Canada in subsidies, in guarantees, and in cash, of something like $151,000,000. But that is not all. The provinces and the municipalities have given cash subsidies to the extent of $7,000,000, and guarantees have been given by various provinces of $107,000,000 more. In addition to that the railway has received provincial land grants, the value of which is somewhat uncertain, but some of which they have sold for $16,000,000 and on others of which they have raised, by way of mortgage, some $17,000,000. Thus the Canadian Northern Railway has to-day received by cash, by subsidies, by guarantees from the Dominion and Provincial Governments, and by land grants, total aid to the extent of $301,000,000. I believe that this is two or three million dollars more than the amount set out in the Drayton-Acworth report, but that difference is accounted for by the fact that the Commission put down as a liability of the Government only the $10,000,000 which they loaned the Canadian Northern Railway upon $12,500,000 of bonds guaranteed by the Dominion Government. And they put that in as one of the liabilities, instead of putting in the $12,500,000, because we are really liable for the amount of the guaranteed bonds, and not merely the amount of the loan. So that I am safe in saying that public aid has been given to the Canadian Northern by the public, either by Dominion, provinces or municipalities, in subsidies and guarantees and land grants to the extent of $301,000,000. The question as to what the road is worth is a very vexed question, and I will venture to say that there is no man in this House who can say what it is worth. I know that I, sitting here, with the little knowledge I have acquired, am not prepared to say what it is worth, and I am not prepared to say that Mackenzie and Mann have not a certain interest in that road. I do not think any man in this House can estimate with any degree of certainty what the road is worth, and if we cannot do that, we cannot arbitrarily fix the price of the equity of redemption which the Canadian Northern shareholders have in that railway. The Drayton-Acworth report says that the maximum cost of the road is $370,000,000. I suppose that means the actual money put into the road, but that does not tell us the value of the road. It may have cost too much, or may have been very economically built, and may be worth more than it cost. They take another method and say, "We will take the reproduction cost," they find what it would cost to reproduce that road, and they take off so much for depreciation, and they give us, as a reproduction cost, $392,000,000. But that is not necessarily the value of the road. The value may be more than that. It depends on how it is doing, what it can earn, what its potentialities are, what dividends it is paying, or what it may be expected to pay in the future. Is there a man in this House who is prepared upon his own knowledge to say—and he would have to do that if we came to the conclusion to fix an arbitrary price for the railroad—that the stock is worth so much, and not one dollar more or less. I do not think any man can take that stand. There is a rumour current in this country that another large railway corporation has offered a very substantial sum for the equity of redemption over and above all encumbrances. It may be that they would give a larger price than our estimate because if they got the road they would eliminate competition. I do not for one moment think this Government, or any other Government, would consent to the acquisition of that road by one of the great railway corporations of Canada, and thus create a railway monopoly in that respect, but looking at it from Mackenzie and Mann's standpoint in that respect, it has some value to them if that rumour is true.

Now, then, what are the outstanding obligations against it? We have got what the Government have given in the way of aid, we have got what it has cost, and what would be the cost of reproduction. What is there against the road? The Drayton-

Acworth report says there is something like $400,000,000 outstanding against the road in bonds, debentures, notes, bank and other loans. Assume that statement is true, the company come back to us now and say: "We cannot go on further and meet our obligations, unless we are assisted." They told us the same thing in 1914, when they came to us for the guarantee of $45,000,000, and they said, if I remember rightly: "It requires $100,000,000 to complete this road, and to put us in a fair way of operating, and send us on the road to success, and if we get that we will never come back again." We took them at their word. We pretty nearly had to, because we were behind them. If we had not done so we would have forfeited what this Government and the previous Government had loaned them. They say that, notwithstanding that assistance, they are not able to go on, and they give us some reasons. They say that when that Act was passed there was no war. That is quite true. We granted them the loan before the war was declared. They said then that they had securities out of which they expected to realize $58,000,000. In consequence of the war they were unable to realize anything like that amount, and a great many of those securities they were not able to sell at all. It was expected the $45,000,000 of bonds which we guaranteed would sell for $42,000,000, and, as a matter of fact, they only sold for $36,000,000 odd. In addition to that, the cost of completing the road was very much more excessive than they had anticipated, owing to the war, and, in addition to that, in the early days, the war itself had a very disastrous effect on the receipts of the company. So that, while they may have thought at that time, when no war was on, that they would have been able to carry on operation of the road with no further assistance, there is some show of reason for them coming back for further assistance. At any rate, we are in this position, that they must have assistance, or go to the wall. We cannot allow them to go to the wall, unless we are prepared to forfeit all the assistance we have given them, and let the road go into bankruptcy. The Drayton-Acworth report says they require $70,000,000 to provide them with sufficient rolling stock and betterments during the next five years. A railway is no good to the country, unless it has proper equipment. They say the Canadian Northern has only two cars for every mile of its road, as compared with seven cars per mile on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: Three, is it not?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Yes, three cars. I ask hon. gentlemen of this House, in what position is a railway desiring to compete with a company like the Canadian Pacific Railway, with cars in proportion of seven to three? I think it goes without saying that something must be done, in order to provide the Canadian Northern with further rolling stock, in order that it may, at least, compete and give proper service to the people of the country, and, after all, it is the people of this country in whose interests we are acting. It was for the benefit of the people of the country, that we gave assistance, and only for their benefit, and if it were not for the benefit of the people of the country, we had no justification in advancing the money. Having loaned the money which we did for the benefit of the people of this country, it is our duty to see that that benefit is preserved to them, even if it costs more than we anticipated.

As to the question of receivership, I do not know that any man in this House has directly said that he is in favour of the company going into receivership. I do not think any man will say that, but the idea seems to be abhorrent to pretty nearly every one I have met. The Drayton-Acworth report sums up the question of receivership in this way:

> Under a receivership the holders of the junior securities have to submit to compound their claim, and the fixed charges are reduced to an amount that the net revenue from operation suffices to meet. Ought this drastic course to be adopted here? We think not. We think the security holders of the companies have to some extent a moral claim on the Government. Their schemes of extension have been matters of public knowledge for many years. So far from discouraging them, the governments, both of Dominion and of the Provinces, have by subsidy and by guarantee, by loans and cash advances, encouraged them to go on.
> But there is more than this. The bonds and debentures of the Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern have been placed in the main through London with non-Canadian holders. And these holders in subscribing have unquestionably been influenced by the fact that the companies were backed by the Canadian Government. Technically, of course, the Government has no responsibility beyond that of meeting its own guarantees. But if the two companies went into the hands of receivers, we cannot doubt that investors outside Canada would believe, however erroneously, that the Dominion Government had treated them badly, and that the result would be serious injury to the credit of the Canadian Government, and indeed of all Canadian enterprises. And this result is one that, putting it on pecuniary grounds alone, the Canadian people should in their own interest spend a good deal of money to avoid. We therefore consider that Canada should assume the responsibility of seeing that the interest on these securities is met.

And then my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, speaking in this House, in reply to the Premier, at page 3677 of the Hansard of 1914, said:

My right hon. friend said, and I altogether agree with him, that we cannot allow this enterprise to fail. We have too much money in it—not only the money of the country, but of the provinces and of the bond-holders themselves.

Later on he says:

We require this railway. My right hon. friend said he would not let it go into liquidation. It must not go into liquidation, but we should have the control of it. Since we must go into partnership with the Canadian Northern Railway, let us see that we are the master, not the servant.

Under this measure we propose to be the master, not the servant. As I have said, we have assisted to the extent of $151,000,000, and the provinces to the extent of $107,000,000, in the way of guarantees. We are the last mortgagees; our claim comes last, and we must either come to the rescue of this system or let it go by default and thereby forfeit what interest we have in it. What does the Drayton-Acworth report say in summing up the situation with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway system? This is the opinion of the commissioners?

We sum up the Canadian Northern situation as follows: The company is not at present able, and will not for some years to come be able, to meet its fixed charges. It will, we doubt not, increase its net earnings as the years go by. But the increased net earnings will be fully absorbed for some years to come by the interest on new capital, which must be put in, if the system is to render efficient service. The company has not now, and as far as we can see will not have in the near future, such credit as to enable it to raise the necessary capital. As we have already shown, the public investment, direct and indirect, in the Canadian Northern system amounts to $298,000,000. We do not recommend further public investment in the system, as at present constituted.

The people of Canada do not want this Government or any other Government to grant further assistance to the Canadian Northern Railway system while the owners are either Mackenzie or Mann or any other private interest. The Finance Minister very neatly summed up the situation in the following words:

The true policy would seem to be that which will ensure not only the best public service but a substantial degree of public ownership in order that the benefit of the large financial assistance granted from the public exchequer during the critical period of the development of these roads shall enure to the benefit of the public when the enterprises reach a period of fruition. If the public does the financing, the public should enjoy the ultimate reward.

That is a sound summing up of existing conditions, and which are amply provided for in the Bill now before the House.

I now come to the question of the value of the equity. The member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) introduced an amendment which, apparently, he thought was something new; something not contained in the Bill before the House. But if he will examine his amendment closely he will find that to all intents and purposes we have acted under section 24 of the Act of 1914, although we have eliminated its objectionable features. This section says:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe—

The whole section rests upon that sentence.

—at any time while any event or default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment, or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

There seems to be a great divergence of opinion on the other side of the House in regard to what action we should now take in this matter. For instance, the member for Welland (Mr. German) does not deny that Mackenzie and Mann have some interest in the stock of this company. He goes so far as to say that he is willing that the judge of the Exchequer Court should determine the value, if any, to be placed upon the equity of Mackenzie and Mann in the $60,000,000 worth of stock. Well, we are with him in that respect. He says that some court should determine the value of that stock. The only difference, therefore, between our opinion and his is whether the matter should be decided by a judge of the Exchequer Court or by a board of arbitration, as proposed in this measure. But a judge is an arbitrator; if the matter were submitted to a judge he would be the sole arbitrator in respect of the value of the equity in the Canadian Northern stock. Personally, I would rather trust to the judgment of three gentlemen than to the judgment of one. Under the method proposed, one arbitrator is to be appointed by the railway company, one by the Government, and the third by the two arbitrators so appointed. If the arbitrator appointed by the Dominion Government comes to the conclusion that the other two are, to use a vulgar expression, trying to "put it over" him, he may, under the provisions of this proposed measure, refuse to agree to the arbitration and then an appeal may be had to the Supreme Court of Canada. If the Government cannot trust such a matter to the Supreme Court of Canada, why should it be willing to trust to that court cases in which any other persons are interested? It seems to me that that argument cannot be refuted.

Then we come to the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). I do not say that these hon. gentlemen have not come honestly to these conclusions, but the fact that they differ emphasizes the difficulty of the problem with which we are dealing. If I interpreted aright the remarks of the member for Carleton, he took the ground that we should not take this road over; that we should give the Canadian Northern Railway Company another loan; that we should continue the plan that we have hitherto been following. He believed that in a short time the Canadian Northern would be able to finance successfully its own operations. He expressed himself as not being in favour of public ownership. Here we have another difference of opinion.

Then we come to the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). If I interpreted his remarks aright, he is in favour of foreclosing under section 24 of the Act of 1914, but as to the value of McKenzie and Mann's stock says: Let us have the courage to state definitely what the stock is worth. Well, if we had taken that stand if we had said that the Canadian Northern stock was worth $100,000, $5,000,000 or $10,000,000, the member for South Renfrew would have said: why did you not leave this matter to arbitration? You have come to some sinister understanding with Mackenzie and Mann as to the value of the stock, knowing that a board of arbitration would not find the stock to have that value. I think we took the proper course when we provided that the matter of value should be referred to a tribunal for determination.

What does the member for St. John say? Give them nothing at all; foreclose under the mortgage and deny them the right to have any value that may be in the stock determined by any tribunal. It seems to me that that would be a sort of star chamber proceeding. We should be saying to them: you are guilty; we condemn you; we give you no opportunity of saying whether the stock is worth one dollar or ten million dollars. We will just take it and there is nothing coming to you. I do not think anybody would support such a proceeding as that.

Then, what does the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) say?

He says: Let the road go on as it is; let it continue to be operated by the present management, and I have no doubt that in time it will be able to finance itself. We cannot follow the advice of all these hon. gentlemen because of the diversity of their views. We must act on our own views. We are, in effect, acting under section 24, in that we are taking advantage of those features of section 24 which are favourable to ourselves, and following the Drayton-Acworth report as to the balance. Is not the effect of what we are doing to-day this? We are asking Parliament to authorize us to become the owners of the stock and the road upon the prescribed condition that the value of the stock or equity, if any, shall be determined by arbitration. That is practically following the wording of section 24. That is the first thing we are doing. We are, however, eliminating certain features of that section of the Act. If we acted altogether under section 24, we would become the owners of the physical property of the Canadian Northern, and when one becomes the owner of any physical property, one immediately has to control and operate it. If we acted according to the provisions of section 24 exactly as it stands to-day, the Minister of Railways would have to operate the Canadian Northern railway. I have already had an application from a man for an appointment as trainmaster on the Canadian Northern, and my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) has had a similar application. That shows that if we carried out the provisions of section 24 and became the owners of the physical property of the Canadian Northern, every hon. member would be hounded by applicants for positions on that road, and I for one will not consent to any such course being adopted. By the course we purpose adopting, we preserve the entity of the Canadian Northern as a corporation. We become the owners of the stock of the Canadian Northern, and as owners of that stock we consequently become the owners of the railway, but we leave the operation, control and management in a body still called the Canadian Northern, but operated by directors appointed by this Government. I hope, in their operation, they will be as entirely free from political control and party patronage as is the Board of Railway Commissioners for the Dominion of Canada.

In addition to that, by the course we purpose adopting, we eliminate the possibility of having to renew all those bonds and agreements outstanding against the Canadian Northern. We eliminate anything in the nature of a financial crisis, because the Canadian Northern, so far as its operations are concerned, goes on just as it is to-day, but under our direction and ownership. We follow the Drayton-Acworth report in this respect. If we acted under section 24, we would become the owners of the physical property of the Canadian Northern railway. The Drayton-Acworth report says that this country should not become the owners of the physical property of that road, and in order to avoid that, they recommend a scheme of a Dominion Railway company, the stock of which should be owned by the Dominion of Canada, but the physical property of which should belong to the Dominion Railway Company. In that way they endeavour to divorce the operation of the railway from politics and political control. We follow that recommendation by means of the present Bill, because we simply buy the stock, and in that way become the owners of the road.

I do not know whether we are very much concerned with the question as to whether or not the stock has any value, because the Bill purposes leaving that question to arbitration. As, however, allegations have been made in this House that the stock has no value and that therefore we should not appoint arbitrators and thereby give the company an opportunity to claim any value, I will read what the Drayton-Acworth report says on the matter. It did not occur to me that it was within the jurisdiction or the province of the Drayton-Acworth Commission finally to fix and determine the value of the equity of the railway or of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway. I read from the commission appointing them. They were to inquire into:

2. The status of each of the three transcontinental railway systems, that is having special reference to the following considerations:—

(a) The territories served by each system and the service which it is capable of performing in the general scheme of transportation;

(b) Physical conditions, equipment and capacity for handling business;

(c) Methods of operation;

(d) Branch lines, feeders and connections in Canada;

(e) Connections in United States;

(f) Steamship connections on both oceans;

(g) Capitalization, fixed charges and net earnings having regard to (i) present conditions, and (ii) probable future development with increase of population.

3. The reorganization of any of the said railway systems, or the acquisition thereof by the State; and in the latter case, the most effective system of operation, whether in connection with the Intercolonial railway or otherwise.

4. Generally speaking, all matters which the members of the Board may consider pertinent or relevant to the general scope of the inquiry.

Mr. ROSS: How would the hon. member interpret what is submitted to the commissioners under paragraph (g) of section 2, and under section 4?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I would admit that paragraph (g) of section 2 comes nearest to the question of determining the value of the equity, but it says "capitalization."

Mr. ROSS: How about section 4?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: That is a general clause. If the Drayton-Acworth Commission were arbitrating for the purpose of determining between the Government and Mackenzie and Mann as to the value of the equity of the latter, surely Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann would have the right to appoint one of the arbitrators on the board to determine the value of the stock. I mean that, as between the Government and Mackenzie and Mann and the Canadian Northern, we surely would not have the right to appoint all three arbitrators, giving Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern no voice in the appointment of one of them, and to say: Now this absolutely fixes and determines the value of your stock.

Mr. ROSS: How does my hon. friend account for the fact that so much of the report on the Canadian Northern relates to this question? Does he suppose that the commissioners were not able to judge as to the scope of their commission?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I do not suppose that Messrs. Drayton and Acworth assumed that whatever value they put on the stock of the Canadian Northern would be the final determination of the value. I might just as well appoint three members on this side of the House as a commission to determine the value at which my hon. friend should sell his farm to me. It was never intended by this House that the Government should have that power. The only thing intended by this commission was to give this House some general information upon which it might base future action, and then it was for the House to act upon it or not as they saw fit. It is true that Messrs. Drayton and Acworth in their report say that they do not think the common stock is of very much value, but nevertheless they say this:

We think that, on the whole, the equity of the case would be met, if the Canadian Northern shareholders were permitted to retain a moderate portion of the $60,000,000 of shares which they now hold.

Then under the heading of "arbitration recommended," they go on to say:

But under the scheme we propose, the Trustees will operate the Canadian Northern lines as part of a combined system. It will be impossible, therefore, for the Canadian Northern Company, as such, ever to earn a dividend on its separate stock. We suggest that, if it is decided to permit the present shareholders to retain a portion of their holding, the Act of Parliament constituting the Board of Trustees, shall contain a provision for arbitration between the Trustees and the Canadian Northern Company establishing an arbitration board to act forthwith. The Trustees should appoint one arbitrator and the Canadian Northern shareholders the other, and the two arbitrators should agree on the appointment of an umpire; failing agreement, an umpire should be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court; and the decision of the board should be final.

The arbitrators should be empowered to decide two questions:

(1) What proportion of the Canadian Northern common stock may fairly remain the property of the present holders?

(2) What proportion of the earnings of the Dominion Railway Company may fairly be regarded as attributable to the Canadian Northern lines?

To illustrate our meaning, we will assume that the arbitrators decide that 5 per cent of the Canadian Northern shares shall remain the property of the existing holders, and further decide that one-half of the total earnings of the Dominion Railway Company will be fairly attributable to the Canadian Northern lines. Then their decision will mean that, out of any dividend declared in future by the Dominion Railway Company, 2½ per cent (one-half of 5 per cent) will be payable to the existing Canadian Northern shareholders or their transferees.

What I want to point out is this. The commissioners themselves confess that Mackenzie and Mann had some interest at least in that equity of $600,000,000—I do not care whether it is $1 or $1,000,000—and they recommended arbitration for determining the value. That is exactly what we are proposing to do. We do not want to commit ourselves as my hon. friend from South Renfrew and his followers did in 1914, by setting a maximum price upon the stock of the Canadian Northern, because to do that suggests that you are willing to pay any amount up to that maximum, and it might induce the arbitrators to come to the conclusion that the stock is worth more than what it is. So we say that the arbitrators shall determine the value of the stock, whatever it may be.

Then there is this other point—and I am sure my hon. friends will admit the justice of this. It has been proved by the Minister of Finance that when the Drayton-Acworth Commission came to the conclusion that the stock of the Canadian Northern might not be worth anything, or that its liabilities were practically equal to its assets, they omitted to take into consideration some very valuable assets of the company. For instance, they omitted 3,000,000 acres of land the value of which I think was put at $3 an acre; that would give $9,000,000. They also omitted $7,000,000 of deferred payments on lands which have been actually sold.

In my humble opinion that would be the best kind of an asset, because if the lands have been sold no doubt a very substantial payment has been made on account, and the balance would therefore be properly secured. The commissioners also omitted $2,400,000 in trust account in respect of lands sold. That gives something like $18,000,000 of assets that the commissioners apparently did not take into consideration when they stated that the stock was not worth anything. I do not want to suggest for one moment that the Canadian Northern Railway are entitled to any such sum as $18,000,000, because that mistake was made. I do not want them to get one dollar more than the stock is worth, but I am not prepared to stand up here and approve of any Star Chamber method of taking a man's property for the benefit of the Crown and saying that he shall not have the right to prove that it is worth something. What would hon. gentlemen think of a municipal council that went to a man and said: "We want your land for the purpose of a park. We find there are $4,500 encumbrances against it. We do not think your property is worth more than such a figure, and we are not going to give you anything for it. You shall have no opportunity of going before a court and proving that your property is worth more than the figure we set." That is the position hon. gentlemen opposite take, because section 24, under which my hon. friend moved his amendment, expressly states that it shall be upon such terms as Parliament may prescribe. Now Parliament may do anything. Parliament may prescribe that they may take my property and not give me a cent. Parliament is all-powerful. But this Parliament says: "We are going to take your property, but its value shall be determined by arbitration."

4 p.m.

The most remarkable thing about this whole discussion is that in 1914 hon. gentlemen opposite were in favour of this very principle of arbitration. When we were proposing to guarantee the bonds of the company to the amount of $45,000,000, the hon. member for St. John seconded, and the right hon. leader of the Opposition moved, the following resolution:

> That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that under existing circumstances no assistance should be given to the Canadian Northern Railway unless at the same time it is provided that the Government have power within a reasonable time to acquire the ownership and the entire stock of the company at a price to be fixed by arbitration but not to exceed $30,000,000.

When we were proposing to guarantee the bonds hon. gentlemen opposite said: "No, you should not do that. You should do what we propose in that resolution." That is the resolution they voted for in 1914. Now the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway is worth just as much to-day as it was worth in 1914, if not more, because every dollar of the $45,000,000 has gone into the road, and the net earnings of the railway are increasing from time to time. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite in 1914 were willing to give as high as $30,000,000, provided the arbitrators decided upon that amount. Among those who voted for that resolution were Messrs. German, Lemieux, Macdonald, Maclean (Halifax), McKenzie, Murphy, Nesbitt, Oliver, Pugsley, and Sinclair. The very fact of fixing a maximum price of $30,000,000 for the stock presupposes that you think it might be worth $30,000,000; otherwise you would have no right to fix that maximum price. A day or two after that resolution was moved, we got $40,000,000 of that same stock for nothing, or as part of the terms of the 45 million loan. Therefore, we got $12,000,000 of a possible value in that stock immediately the Act went through, as the 40 million is two-fifths of the whole stock.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the hon. member still regard that $45,000,000 as a loan, or as money which Mackenzie and Mann got, and which we will never get back.

[Mr. Middlebro.]

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: It does not matter whether it is a loan, or a mortgage, or a subsidy, or a grant, or anything else. Whatever it was, it went into the road. Every dollar of that $45,000,000 was expended under the Government's supervision, and everything that went into the road we are now getting back, because we are taking the road over. My hon. friend from St. John, who seconded the resolution I have just read, to-day takes this position: "Not a dollar. No arbitration at all. Foreclose them out. Give them no hearing whatever." Why did not hon. gentlemen opposite not move this amendment in 1916, after default had been made and when the company asked the Government for a loan of $15,000,000 more? There was one gentleman who so moved in 1916, but he forgot it in his speech the other day, and that was the hon. member for St. John. As late as 1916 I find that the hon. member for St. John was still in favour of paying the Canadian Northern Railway Company something for their stock. When the loan for $15,000,000 to the Canadian Northern Railway was proposed in 1916 he moved the following amendment:

> Before making any such loan the Governor in Council shall require the company to give to His Majesty the King an option to acquire at any time within 5 years from the date thereof the railway's other properties included in the Canadian Northern Railway System at such price as to the Governor in Council may seem reasonable under existing circumstances.

In speaking on this motion he said (Hansard, 1916, page 3582):

> If I remember rightly, I moved a resolution at that time fixing the amount at which the country would be entitled to take over the road, at a maximum of $30,000,000, and that resolution was put to a vote of the House.

Further on he said:

> Are we going to advance this at present bankrupt concern $15,000,000 in addition to the $45,000,000 guaranteed in 1914 and to the other assistance which has been given, so as to tide it over until a day when prosperity again may come to it, and then be obliged, in order to acquire the system and to nationalize the railway, to give Mackenzie and Mann, not $30,000,000, but practically whatsoever they choose to ask?
> Does not the Minister of Finance think this is the time to fix the terms upon which this country may take over the Canadian Northern railway should we decide to do so? I submit this for the consideration of my hon. friend. While it is true he does not give us a very great opportunity to present amendments, yet I think that is an amendment which he himself ought to propose, so that if the country should decide to take over this system, it may know that the system will be taken over on reasonable terms.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said that?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The hon. member for St. John. A little later on, speaking of the Minister of Finance, he said:

> I do not charge him with deliberately treating the House unfairly, but he should have submitted to us a statement of the earnings and operating expenses of the different railroads that go to make up the entire Canadian Northern Railway System, and he should have acquired from these companies an agreement under which at any time within the next three years or the next five years, if the country desires to take over the system, the Government shall have the right to do so at a stated maximum price.

It is only last year that the hon. member for St. John was willing to take the Canadian Northern railway over at a stated maximum price and he did not ask that the price should be left to arbitration or any thing else. But that is not all. Further on in the same debate he said:

> Now, does it not seem that the company having been obliged to come again to the Government for an additional $15,000,000, the Government ought to take an option from the company, on reasonable terms, for a reasonable amount, which option could be exercised or not as Parliament in the future might determine. I would not suggest that any injustice whatever should be done to the company. I should think that it ought to be recognized that these two gentlemen, Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann, notwithstanding what may be said by their critics, are deserving of a large measure of praise, a large degree of credit, for the enterprise and foresight they have shown.
> In 1914 I moved a resolution, the effect of which would have been that the Government would have the right to take over the equity of Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, which means Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann, at a sum not exceeding $30,000,000.
> But the time has arrived when with the company coming back again for assistance, for the enormous sum of $15,000,000, the Government should come to an understanding with Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann, and have it clearly understood that if, within a reasonable period, say within five years, the Government and Parliament should, in the interests of the people of Canada, take over this road they will affix to it as a condition a reasonable sum at which the equity of these gentlemen should be acquired for the country.

Even as late as last year the hon. gentleman was willing to enter into an agreement with the Canadian Northern to buy the stock of the company, because the equity in the stock, at a reasonable sum provided it should not exceed $30,000,000. Yet to-day he objects to arbitration for any amount. In conclusion, let me say that I think the measure before the House is the only solution of one of the most difficult and complex problems that has presented itself for the consideration of Parliament in the railway and financial history of Canada. I have looked at the matter in many ways and I cannot see any better solution. As far as I am personally concerned, I would vote against any solution that was not in the interest of Canada at the present time. I claim that the proposal as contained in the Bill should receive our support because:

1. We become the owners of the road.
2. We become the masters and not the servants of the Canadian Northern railway.
3. The arrangement preserves the entity of the company and avoids physical ownership and consequently political partisanship in the operation of the road and the appointment of the servants and agents thereof.
4. It does not disturb existing securities.
5. It avoids further loans to private owners.
6. It prevents receivership and financial panic at a critical period.
7. Any benefit or increase in the value of the road in future, due to our efforts and assistance will enure to the public benefit and not of Mackenzie and Mann.
8. It will permit operation and control by an independent board of directors free of political control.
9. It will enable a better public service to be given through proper provision for adequate rolling stock and betterments.
10. So far as the Canadian Northern Railway is concerned, it is in line with the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report in that it avoids receivership, assumes liabilities, avoids further aid under old conditions, and gets the ownership of the road through the ownership of the common stock. All these considerations have been recommended by the Drayton-Acworth report.
11. If this suggestion is any good, it carries out Sir Wilfrid Laurier's resolution of 1914 which proposed that we should become the owners of the stock, and be the masters of the situation, and which was supported by his followers.

As far as I can see this is the only reasonable solution during these strenuous times and the only one that is fair not only to the people of Canada but to the Canadian Northern Railway as well.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the address of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro). As far as history of this enterprise is concerned, I have no fault to find with the way in which he put the different steps in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway before the House. But I do say the usual results will follow from his speech; that is that when one starts with wrong data, and takes for granted certain premises that are wrong, he is bound to reach a wrong conclusion. The hon. member has argued throughout as if the agreement of 1914 had not been made at all and as if it were open to us to make an altogether new agreement to-day. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to prove to you, and to any reasonable man in this House, before I get through that an agreement was made in 1914 with the Canadian Northern Railway Company and that all those who had anything to do with it directly and indirectly know that it vested in this House, in the country and in the Crown, absolutely, every vestige of property belonging to the company and that we have nothing to do under that agreement with any further considerations if we follow the text as properly interpreted of the agreement we made on that day. That being absolutely the case, I submit, Sir, that the premises upon which my hon. friend from North Grey argued are defective and that his conclusions must be of the same character.

It was rather strange that the hon. member should start out to make evidence and argument for those who hold the stock. He is certainly not counsel at present for the people who hold the stock, but if I would gather anything from his argument, it is that he was making out a case for those who will eventually go before the arbitrators and say that this stock has some money, some intrinsic value in it. That was the trend and drift of his argument. The hon. gentleman gave several reasons why the road owned by this company had not paid during the past two years. He said that the war is on. Unfortunately, the war is on and we all deeply feel and regret that fact, but as far as the West is concerned, I think it will be admitted that the war, instead of decreasing prices, instead of financially crippling that country, has put prices to heights which they never before reached. It will not be said that the staple products of the West will soar up to 200 and 300 per cent more than they were before, and that at the same time the people who own the transportation facilities in that country will not be in a position to make earnings commensurate with the advance in the price of the products which they carry. That may be so, but ordinary men like myself would not think so. I do not believe that the war has been of any disadvantage to the railways of Canada, but rather the contrary.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

They have made money out of the war, more than they would have made if it had not broken out and become the sad reality that it is. I therefore submit that the argument that the war has prevented this company from making money is not well founded.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is not the great product which they handle in the West grain, for hauling which the railways have received no more since the outbreak of the war, while wages and expenses have arisen?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not in a position to speak on that, but the ordinary course would be for the railways to charge more for the hauling of the grain when the farmers receive higher prices while the railways have to pay higher wages. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Middlebro) was trying to make a point against this side of the House, that when the company was before Parliament asking for a loan, which turned out to be a gift or a grant to them of $45,000,000, we on this side said: No, we will not give you $45,000,000 but we will take over the property absolutely and we are willing to ascertain the value that you should get for it, that value not to exceed $30,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not accept that proposition, but gave the Canadian Northern Railway that $45,000,000. Now they pride themselves on saying that we were willing to give $30,000,000. Suppose we did give $30,000,000, would not that have been a better bargain than giving $45,000,000? If they had accepted our proposition they would have paid something less than $30,000,000, but they would have owned the property and there would have been an end to the matter. I submit that we are not subject to any criticism because we made that proposition at that time for the taking over absolutely of the property in this road.

We are also criticised because we were willing to leave it open to ascertain the value of the road up to an amount not exceeding $30,000,000. Are we in the same position to-day as we were then? Surely not. A commission was appointed by the Government, consisting of three of the most capable men they could get in Canada, Great Britain, and the United States. These men were experts in all matters relating to railways, and they had the assistance of all the engineers they required. After due consideration and investigation, that commission brought in a report in which they put certain values on the physical assets of this road, such as rolling stock, terminals, rails, etc. But these three men, representing the wisdom of three countries, say: Whatever the value of the physical assets, the $60,000,000 of stock has absolutely no value and is worth nothing. That is the evidence before the House to-day; that is what we are dealing with, and what is the sense of men, members of this House, representing the ordinary, every-day man of this country, saying here: Oh, before the case was tried, before you heard the evidence, before the jury brought in the verdict, you were willing to do a certain thing; why do you not do it now? We say in answer, and say logically and clearly: It does not matter in the world what we said before this case was tried, before your great commission or court investigated this case. We say now that we base our position on the facts as found by that commission and those facts are that this stock has no value at all.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. member say that the statement which they made some years ago was not made upon evidence at all and that if they had had the information contained in this report they would have taken a different course?

Mr. McKENZIE: When the people of this country are dealing with the verdict of a court or of a jury they do not go through the evidence, but take the verdict as given by a competent court. This commission was a competent court. It went up and down the land and all over the road with an army of engineers and experts, all the assistance it wanted, and it got all the evidence that a competent court might require. They arrived at their decision and handed it to the Government. The Government laid their report on the Table, and it was printed and published and given to the members of the House. That is the position and if the hon. gentleman from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) wants to adopt any procedure that is different from that, in order to ascertain the value of the railway, he must be wiser than the Government. We have the fact, in the most conclusive way, that the $60,000,000 of stock has absolutely no intrinsic value of any kind whatever. That should be the end of it, so far as this Government is concerned.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My learned and hon. friend will agree that the fact that Sir Henry Drayton left out the land grant values would add, at least, some little value to the stock, however little it may be. That was overlooked, as the hon. gentleman will observe. He cannot get away from that fact.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: I am not a second commission to try Sir Henry Drayton. My learned friend, who is the subdued, converted, proselyte of this Government—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Wait till you hear him.

Mr. McKENZIE: —has been sitting meekly at the foot of Gamaliel since this discussion took place, and I congratulate him on his conversion since the previous discusion on this great subject.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: You have not heard him yet.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope I will hear him in the same strain, and in the same mood as I did with some interest three years ago, but so far he has not shown any great anxiety to be seen around in connection with this matter. I would not, for one moment, pretend to raise my own puny voice to criticise the findings of these three great men, representing the railway wisdom of three nations. If I did, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. gentleman from Calgary came after me, I would expect to be fed to the crows.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: You are in a good humour to-day, anyhow.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am putting this forward as the sound position which we, on this side of the House, occupy. Whilst it is true that the same old avenue and the same old back door of another commission is open to the Government, yet, so far, the evidence we have is fixed, determined and final, and until the Government appoint another royal commission to investigate Sir Henry Drayton and those who sat with him, we must accept their findings, and those findings are that the stock is of no value whatever. That should be the end of the stock question.

My observations so far have been in the direction of a reply to the hon. gentleman from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro). I did think, and I still think, that I should give some attention to what was said yesterday and last night in connection with this bargain. I approach this question, Mr. Speaker, not as a novice, but as an old lawyer, dealing with material in which the training of a lawyer comes to one's help. We have to deal with statutes and with bargains, and with the interpretation of speeches and evidence in connection with this whole matter. For that reason, Sir, before I sit down I propose to deal, as briefly as I can, with the salient points of this transaction from 1914 down. I take it that it is logical and proper for me to take for granted that the bargain of 1914 gathers up and crystalizes all the dealings between the Government and the road up to that time, and that with that, and that only, we have to deal. But there it is an agreement reached, confirmed and solemnized by a statute of this House. Whatever took place before that we may be concerned about, but there is no use talking about it, because the conclusion was reached then, and we might as well begin there. Before I deal with that, I wish to call attention to the observations which the Prime Minister addressed to this House yesterday. He was replying to the hon. member for South Renfrew, and although the hon. member for South Renfrew is not entitled to wear a gown, and although he does not profess to be a lawyer, it was to me, at all events, a great satisfaction to hear the masterful argument that he put forward yesterday, and the masterful way in which he put the salient points of this agreement. No man in this House or in Canada better appreciates a legal argument than the Prime Minister. I would be very sorry indeed to say anything that would tend to detract from his ability as a lawyer, but he realized, as a good lawyer would, that the argument that was advanced, and the points that were arranged and marshalled before him by the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew, were unanswerable. There was no use trying to controvert that argument and so the Prime Minister devoted his talents to trying to be funny, and trying to play the role of a comedian, which a big lawyer does not often do well. The right hon. gentleman is not a comedian, and he did not make a success of his comedy yesterday in trying to draw the attention of his followers from the great question that was before the House, in order to get them to laugh and to forget what we were really dealing with. We were dealing with a question involving, according to the figures of those who looked it up, $620,000,000. To the ordinary man that is a very large amount. The ordinary man that we have to deal with among our electors finds $620,000,000 a little larger amount than he can really comprehend, but when you come to define it, and say that $620,000,000 means $77.50 for every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada, and that it means $387.50 for every family of five in this country, putting our population at 8,000,000 people, he may realize what it means. The hon. gentleman from North Grey placed our population at 7,500,000. For the purposes of being absolutely fair in this calculation, I put the population at 8,000,000, and that is what it figures out. That is the kind of proposition we are dealing with, and the Prime Minister should have dealt with the proposition seriously, and in a businesslike way, and should have endeavoured to answer the hon. member for South Simcoe—

Mr. GRAHAM: South Renfrew.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sure the hon. gentleman for South Renfrew should be representing more than one county. He would do honour to any county in Ontario which he might represent.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Even Nova Scotia.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, even Nova Scotia. Perhaps it would not be out of the way to say Calgary. We could not do better than have the member for South Renfrew represent Calgary—it is in the air that the hon. gentleman who now represents that constituency is disgusted with politics—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There is a very considerable measure of truth in that.

Mr. McKENZIE: —and that he is disgusted with the party to which he belongs. I was dealing with the observations of the Prime Minister yesterday. The right hon. gentleman made quite a detour into ancient history. Going back to the establishment of these railway lines, he criticised severely the railway policy of the right hon. gentleman who is now leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister should not forget—he will have reason for not forgetting it—the people's approval of the railway policy adopted in 1903 by the then Prime Minister. In that year, the policy was, in the main, put before the people in this Parliament. In 1904 the Prime Minister went to the country upon his railway policy and the then leader of the Opposition opposed it. What happened is generally known; that railway policy was almost unanimously ratified by the people from the Atlantic to the Pacific. What happened in Nova Scotia, from which province the distinguished Prime Minister comes? Every constituency in that province, by overwhelming majorities, favoured the railway policy of the then Administration. At that time the leader of the Opposition, like Noah's dove, could not find a place to rest, politically speaking, in Nova Scotia. Indeed, he was poorer than those foxes and fowls to which reference is made in sacred history. Accordingly, he was obliged to take refuge in Ontario, where they opened the door and kindly took him in. He had no part or place in his own province, because the people were overwhelmingly in favour of the railway policy of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition. Four years afterwards the people had an opportunity of passing judgment upon the railway policy of the then Administration, but very little was said about it. I ran the election in 1904 and in 1908. In 1904 the railway question was the great issue, but in 1908 nothing was said about it, because the people accepted as the proper one the policy which had been laid down, and set themselves to work to carry it out. The Prime Minister said that when he took office he was obliged to take over certain burdens and difficulties. There were no complaints about burdens and difficulties while we were in power and while a competent government was administering the affairs of this country. We had burdens, but we had backbone, talent, and ability to bear them. The Government of to-day seems to feel keenly the weight of burdens; but it has no capacity, no backbone, or anything else which would enable them properly to bear those burdens. To-day, plenty of burdens and no backbone; when the present leader of the Opposition was in charge of affairs, some burdens, with much backbone and great ability. When we were in power we did not find it difficult to deal with these matters, but when men unequal to the task came into office—men who did not know the ropes, who did not know how to deal with the burdens imposed upon them; who did not know how to handle properly the finances of this country—the country went sadly adrift. I shall refer later to the financial conditions that prevailed when this Government came into power, as set forth by gentlemen who were members of this Government for quite a number of years. The position in which we left the country—

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH: With a broken back.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all. I will give my hon. friend evidence concerning the anatomy of the former Administration—evidence which he will not be able to treat lightly. I shall read part of a speech made by the Minister of Finance who, I suppose, is just as capable of handling financial matters as the member for South Ontario. I shall always, with pride, carry this speech with me. It was the first speech made by the minister in the House, and it was listened to with great interest. He was a new man in a new role of great importance. The speech was one delivered by a man of whom much was expected; the man among the millions behind the Tory Prime Minister who was selected as the only man to whom with any degree of safety the keys of the treasury could be entrusted. I suppose the Tories believed that if you trained a man early in the way he should go, when he was old he would not depart from it. The minister looked for trouble, diligently, earnestly and energetically, from the time he took office until February, 1912. Then he said: there is no use putting this thing off any longer; I might as well bring down my Budget. He found things all right. This is the closing part of a very eloquent speech:

> It will, as I have said before, be gratifying to all that the material prosperity with which we have been so highly favoured still continues to be our portion. Despite the serious vicissitudes through which the western wheat crop has passed and the unusual heat experienced in the province of Ontario during the past summer, the field crops of Canada show a bountiful yield and with the high prices prevailing for practically all its produces the great basic industry of agriculture continues in a flourishing condition. Almost every department of trade and commerce shows expansion. Our mines are wonderfully productive. Our coast fisheries, notably the Atlantic, have enjoyed a good catch and high prices. Our manufacturers are thriving and new industries are springing up throughout the whole Dominion. Railway construction—

I wish to direct this to the attention of the member for South Ontario to this further from the Minister of Finance:

> Railway construction, especially in the West, proceeds apace, preparing a way for settlement in districts not yet opened up and for trade with other markets than we now enjoy. Our increased bank deposits, clearings and circulation, the amount of public and private building evidenced in municipal and business structures, extensions to manufacturing plants and residences in almost every part of the country, all attest that the general prosperity of Canada at the present time is very great.
> Our Dominion continues to be the land of hope and promise to the home seeker. During the last year, as before shown, our immigration from Europe and the United States reached an average of nearly a thousand a day, bringing their capital, their intelligence and their energy to assist in the great task of developing the resources of Canada and building up her nationality. Much has been said in the past with which I am in accord as to the selection of immigration as far as possible with an eye to the quality and character of our future citizenship. Notwithstanding the large stream of immigration, labour conditions are good and extreme poverty, from any reason other than incapacity or direct misfortune, is hardly known.

Under the favourable conditions which I have described, and with every prospect for their continuance, the future of Canada looks bright indeed. In the enjoyment of peace, plenty and prosperity her energetic, loyal and patriotic people look forward with hope and expectation to an ever great and greater future.

To my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith), I would point out that condition of the anatomy of the finances and business conditions of the country when they were placed in the hands of my worthy friend the Minister of Finance, and I would ask him if that is the condition of a country with its back broken, would it not be well for it always to have a broken back?

I am now going to depict the other side of the shield, calling the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to it. In this case I will give the House the evidence of that Tory of Tories, Lieutenant-General Sir Sam Hughes. No one will question his fidelity to the Tory party and his desire to tell the truth about them and to put them on the highest pinnacle on which he can possibly place them. But, speaking in this House (not speaking elsewhere), on the 9th day of July, 1917, only a short time ago, he was obliged to tell the truth. His speech may be found on pages 3268 and 3269 of Hansard. He is dealing with the financial conditions as they existed three years after my hon. friends came into power, after, I suppose, they had tried to mend the back of the country. This is what he says:

I need make no apology here, or elsewhere regarding my loyalty to the business interests of Canada. When the hon. the Finance Minister had Canada on the verge of financial ruin, at the beginning of the war, my loyalty to their cause was then shown by my actions in establishing industries in Canada which resulted in placing her industries of every class on a sound financial basis; but I have never made any pretence of placing anything on a par with the soldiers in the trenches. They stand first in the heart of every honest Canadian. The Finance Minister's letter in every reference places them secondary.

Considerable interest is evidently manifesting itself on the general aspect of this case.

The rest of this speech has in it references which are rather of a personal character in a way, attacking the Minister of Finance, and I am not going to read it. The evidence, however, given here at least according to a gentleman who was for a long time a minister, and who is to-day a strong follower of the Conservative party, is that the Minister of Finance has brought the country to the verge of ruin. I have read to the House a glowing picture of the condition of this country in February, 1912, and the quotation which I have just read is from a speech delivered this year but having reference to conditions existing during the year 1914, at all events, up to the time of the breaking out of the war, because the remedy which the ex-Minister of Militia suggests for conditions then existing is to start industries in connection with the war. That was the condition in which the country was found and into which it was brought by hon. gentlemen opposite, according to the testimony delivered in this House on the responsibility of an ex-minister and member of the party now in power. I am, therefore, accepting as the truth the statement made by that hon. gentleman. Such extreme conditions as the hon. gentleman has described did not exist in the days when my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was in power, and I believe they would not have come into existence had the people thought proper to continue my right hon. leader in office.

I wish to deal as briefly as possible with the main question now before the House, that is: What shall we do in connection with this railway? There is not much doubt now as to what will be done. The Government of the day have their majority. I suppose they held a caucus on this question, and that after that they drafted this measure, and this measure is now before us with, I presume, the understanding that it will receive a majority support from the friends of the Government. Consequently, we have before us in crystallized form in this Bill what the Government purposes doing. I criticise the Government for the opportunity they are giving to the holders of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway to give that stock a fictitious value. If it has any value at all, it should have the value it had on the date the Government received that report from Sir Henry Drayton and his associates. What do the Government do? They say in this Bill that the value of the stock is to be as of the date of an agreement to be made after this measure becomes law, after it is fixed and irrevocable that we are to take over this stock, and when the whole world knows that. Is that reasonable? If you are going to expropriate land for a railway, the value fixed by the arbitrators is not the value it may have after the railway goes through it; it is the value that it had before the railway was constructed at all, because, if it has a higher value after the railway goes through it, that is due to the railway and not to the intrinsic value of the land itself.

They have taken the most extraordinary course of saying: "We are going to take over this property by Act of Parliament. We must have it. Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann may be worth nothing, and their property behind this stock may be worth nothing, but we are taking it over and the Dominion of Canada is now behind it." I ask the Minister of Finance and the business men on the other side of the House if that is good business. I submit that it is not. They have given this stock a fictitious value by placing themselves in the position where they are going to buy it themselves. Everybody knows that this Bill is going to pass, and I suppose now that some of this stock is being sold to establish a value. Everybody will be willing to pay a big price for it, and evidence will be established as to the value of the stock. I say it is poor business the way this thing has been handled.

But I go back to my first proposition, that there was not the slightest occasion for dealing with the company in this way at all. It may be said that I have no business to be talking about this matter, and that I am simply taking up the time of the House, as hon. gentlemen to whom millions mean nothing—evidently $600,000,000 means nothing to them—have made up their minds in the caucus that they are going to vote for this Bill, and that is the end of it. But, Sir, if any measure ever came before Parliament that deserved careful thought and consideration, it is this proposition involving the expenditure of this vast amount of money. Therefore, I make no apology for taking up a little of the time of the House in setting forth my views and quoting from the records. The carrying out of the agreement that was solemnly entered into in 1914 should be the confession of faith of every honest man in this House; it is the basic principle of the action that should be taken here. I submit that under the agreement of 1914 we absolutely own this property, and there is no need of saying another word about it. The Government cannot say that this company is not in default; they are estopped from saying that. The company must be in default under the agreement of 1914 or they would not be here, and I base my argument upon that assumption. The Government would not be presenting these proposals to Parliament if the Company had not made default. Section 21 of the Act of 1914 for giving assistance to the Canadian Northern Railway system says:

> The following shall be events of default within the meaning of this Act, viz,—
> (a) if the Canadian Northern shall make default in payment of the principal or interest of the guaranteed securities or any part thereof, or default in observing or performing any of the provisions of the New Trust Deed, and the security constituted by the New Trust Deed shall thereby become enforceable;
>
> (b) if while any of the guaranteed securities are outstanding the Canadian Northern or any Constituent or Subsidiary Company shall make default in the payment of the principal or interest or any part thereof, or any securities heretofore or hereafter created or issued under the existing trust deed or mortgage securing the same, or under any future trust deed securing securities having priority to the guaranteed securities, or default in observing of performing any of the terms of any such existing or future trust deed or mortgage, and the security constituted by any such trust deed or mortgage shall thereby become enforceable;
> (c) if, while any of the guaranteed securities are outstanding, an order be made by any court against any company in the Canadian Northern System for the appointment of a receiver or for possession, or if a receiver be otherwise appointed or possession be otherwise lawfully taken of the whole or part of the undertaking—

In the event of any one of those conditions arising, the Government could step in and take possession of the property. Section 22 says:

> Upon the happening of any event of default and at any time or times while the same shall continue, it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council after such notice to the Canadian Northern as the Governor in Council may direct, to declare to be vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern and of any of the Constituent or Subsidiary Companies which may he subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, and to appoint a board or boards of directors in lieu thereof respectively (any former director being eligible for appointment).
> 2. The power of appointment herein conferred upon the Governor in Council shall be a continuous power and shall be exercisable from time to time and so often as any event of default may exist and be continuing.
> 23. The directors so appointed by the Governor in Council shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor in Council, and any such director may be removed and another appointed in his place. Vacancies occurring from time to time may be filled by the Governor in Council. The said boards respectively shall have all the powers of a board of directors elected by the shareholders; and acts of the board requiring the authority and approval of the shareholders shall if authorized or approved by the Gorvernor in Council be as valid and effectual as if authorized or approved by the shareholders.
> 24. If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed ,and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

Those are the powers which this Parliament took to itself in 1914, and I submit that they are absolute and conclusive. I am not going to read section 25, as it is rather long, but it provides for the appointment of directors—an absolute board without any representation of Mackenzie and Mann, and empowered to do the very thing that has been held up as a bugaboo by the Minister of Finance in this House. Under this Act they have power to avoid those very difficulties. The Minister of Finance frightened us the other day by saying that if we took over the physical assets and the whole material property of the road we should have to pay off the securities and should have to borrow money at six per cent to pay the interest on bonds that may run for a number of years at a very much lower rate of interest. Now, under section 25, the Government is empowered to take over those securities. The Government is authorized to take the place of Mackenzie and Mann in every way, and to continue the securities just as they are now. What is the good of the Minister of Finance or anybody else trying to frighten this House into a bad bargain by saying that we may be obliged to pay off all those securities and borrow money in the markets of the world at a high rate of interest to pay off the low rate of interest on these bonds that may run for many years to come, when, in 1914, some good man on the Government side had the prescience to incorporate in the statute a provision by which we could take over all these bonds and not disturb them in the slightest degree, but go on paying the interest on them just as the company is doing now, or would do if it had the means.

5 p.m.

I am sure that I can appeal to the business men of this House and of the country and that they will all say that they would be glad to take the credit of the Canadian people instead of that of Mackenzie and Mann or of any private individual or concern. That is what will happen under the provisions of section 25. Mackenzie and Mann go out, we take the property and the credit of Canada goes, in their place, behind those bonds. Will anybody say that those who will hold those securities—doubtful securities, many of them—will force them to foreclosure and sale if they have the backing of the Canadian people behind them? That is what has been held out to us as the bugaboo reason why we should jump at the course of action which this Government is taking. Those are the terms of the agreement that we made in 1914.

I am now going to give you an explanation of how the bargain was understood by the Government of that time, and I am going to give you the way in which my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) understod the statute. If anybody understood that statute or ought to have understood it, it was the Solicitor General. He drafted it or helped to draft it. He had the full responsibility of preparing that measure, of getting it through Council and of bringing it before this House. When it was before this House he gave an explanation of it which will be found at page 3687 of Hansard, May 13, 1914. I seriously invite the attention of hon. gentlemen in this House, and particularly of hon. gentlemen on the other side, to the language of the Solicitor General and I would ask them to say if they can find any loophole for Mackenzie and Mann, or anybody else, to come here for consideration after they had made default. He makes it as clear and distinct as the English language can make it that the moment they make default that is the end of it. He says further that everybody is made a party to this agreement who has any interest whatever in the company. All persons who hold stock in the company are, according to the Solicitor General, made parties to the agreement. The agreement is binding and conclusive and these men cannot find fault if they do not keep their part of it and we keep ours. This is what the hon. gentleman said:

Under the present Bill—

That is the Bill which is now the twentieth chapter of the Acts of 1914.

—we have a summary method of taking over the road, a summary method which in effect gives us as security the other sixty per cent of stock.

That is the 60 per cent that we were talking about buying. The Solicitor General tells us that it is under the mortgage and that we have it. He continues:

We know we have the ordinary right which any mortgagee has, and the right which any guarantor of a mortgage has, the right by subrogation of getting into the shoes of the lender and in the event of default exercising the rights of a mortgagee and taking possession of the road as a receiver; we know we have that right, but we have the additional summary remedy of proceeding by mere Act of Parliament to take over the road as the property of the people of this country and eliminate once and for all, all other parties interested in that railway. And we have not only so arranged it that the interests of the Canadian Northern and all other persons whatsoever in the Canadian Northern system shall be eliminated, and that in the event of default all shall be the property of the Canadian people, but furthermore, the ten million dollars of stock in the townsite and the ten million dollars bonds are put into hotchpotch, although they are the property of Mackenzie and Mann, and although Mackenzie and Mann alone made investment in them, and in the event of our foreclosing and taking over the enterprise we ourselves get the whole benefit of the townsite. That summary method is given us. It is true Parliament has to act. The Government did not think it wise to in any way tie the hands of Parliament in days to come. We provide though that Parliament in days to come, should there be default, shall have in its own hands the power to put in directors of the road, and we clothe the directors so appointed with full power to sell that road to any corporation established by the Parliament of this country for the purpose of taking over the road. Or, if we choose, we can ourselves, by Act of Parliament, legislate that that road is the property of the people of this country and that the interests of all persons whatsoever outside of the people of Canada are eliminated, the idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all the stockholders, parties to this contract, and we say to them—

I wish to point out that all the parties who are interested are made parties to the statute and that, to use a vulgar expression, they will have no kick coming if they are ruled out.

The idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all stockholders parties to this contract, and we say to them: We now and here bind you that should the day of default come you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever, but you here and now leave the Parliament of this country free from any such question and untrammelled in every way to deal with the property of the Canadian Northern as it may be advised in the interests of the people of this country. That is the summary procedure outlined here for taking over the road.

I want to ask where any loophole is left in this for anybody to look for any consideration. Mackenzie and Mann had given several mortgages and entered into several obligations before which it was hoped they would redeem. They came at last to 1914 and the Government said to them: You have come often enough, you have come again, but if we are going to give you any money now there must not be any talk of foreclosure or any round-about methods of that kind; you must sign a bond, which shall be embodied in a statute, providing that if you make default the Canadian people shall be entitled to take the whole thing over. I can not conceive of any stronger language that a learned counsel like the Solicitor General could use to make it clearer or more distinct than he used in that speech. Taking his speech, with the language of the statute, and taking the circumstances of the case, can there be any question that at that time we had the right to believe that we were getting everything that this company had under the agreement of 1914 and that if they made default they could not complain if we should take over the whole thing?

Now, we find that there is to be another deal altogether. This stock has value, the Government say. The Solicitor General says in his speech and the Act says in its language that whether it has value or not it belongs to the people of this country. Whose business is it whether it has value or not? It belongs to us absolutely and conclusively. But now it turns out that this stock is in the hands of some friends of the Government influential millionaires who have taken it as security for money advanced to Mackenzie and Mann, I suppose, and now they say: Whatever else may be forfeited, do not forfeit this stock, because the money for it will go into our pockets. The hon. member for North Grey told us that the $45,000,000 we gave them went into the road. If they get the par value for this stock, how much of it will go into the road? Not one farthing; it will go into the pockets of the millionaires who now hold the stock. I object to the line of procedure in picking out this stock any more than anything else, and I object to disturbing the agreement which, taken together with the speech of the Hon. Mr. Meighen, makes it clear beyond controversy that the property belongs absolutely and conclusively to the people of Canada once the company has made default. This effort to find value in this stock, or to direct the blood currents once more into the reins of this stock and give it life, is simply for the purpose of gratifying and paying off the holders of the stock, whoever they may be.

I am not in favour of public ownership; I am against it. But if we are down to the position when we have to take over the ownership of this road, let us take it clean-cut, let us take everything in connection with it that will be of benefit and service to the people. It has been found by a court, representing, as I said, the wisdom of three nations in railway matters, that the common stock which we are taking over has no value, yet we are going to over-rule their judgment and say it has got value, and we are making an agreement under which it will be possible for the owners of this stock to say it has more value than it ever had before. The whole course in trying to give value to this stock is absolutely wrong. It would be in every way better to refer this matter to a judge of the Exchequer Court, a man of vast experience and known skill in dealing with matters of this kind, than to refer it to three arbitrators, who may or may not be experienced in dealing with matters of this kind. In entering upon any arbitration you have, in practice, although not in theory, one-third of the court against you, and if he can persuade the other two members of the court to his way of thinking, he is able to obtain a verdict against you. It is much better to leave it in the hands of one experienced, skilled and just man than to a court of three arbitrators. If a man had to undergo a surgical operation, he would place himself in the hands of an eminent and experienced surgeon rather than in the hands of a clinic of three doctors, one of whom he knew would not desire to do anything to save his life, but would be glad to kill him if he could.

Mr. MORPHY: Did not the hon. member, in 1914, vote for a resolution moved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Pugsley, advocating the principle of appointing arbitrators to fix the value which should be handed over for this very road?

Mr. McKENZIE: There are cases where a man is not doing justice to himself by saying yes or no to any question. I did vote for that proposition, but in the early part of my speeeh to-day I explained the position and circumstances, and if the hon. gentleman cares to know my attitude and position he will see my remarks in Hansard and I shall not need to go over the same ground again. In brief, I say that we were willing perhaps to pay an amount at that time not exceeding $30,000,000 for the whole thing.

But the Government at that time, instead of paying something less than $30,000,000, paid $45,000,000, and are willing to pay more now. They are taking chances on having to pay $60,000,000 more. We were willing to pay something ranging under $30,000,000. That is a very much better bargain than paying $45,000,000, and taking chances of paying $60,000,000 more. I explained that matter before, and I think the hon. gentleman understands my position. I certainly did vote for that resolution, and I have nothing to apologize for, or take back, because we did not even have the advantage of the conclusive evidence that is now before us in the report of that commission, that that stock is worth nothing. I am sure if in 1914 we had had the report of such eminent men as those three gentlemen who have gone over this matter and reported to us that this stock has no value, the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) would not have moved that resolution, and if he did he would never have got anybody on our side of the House to support it. We had not the evidence then, but we have it now.

Mr. LALOR: The hon. gentleman was in favour of the principle of arbitration.

Mr. McKENZIE: I really forget. It is three years ago. Supposing we were in favour of arbitration three years ago, as dealing with something we thought had value, it is a different proposition to-day. Now we have discovered that the subject matter of our deliberation at that time has no value at all. It is a dead horse.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Does that change the principle of arbitration any?

Mr. McKENZIE: It does not matter what my opinion is. Hon. gentlemen opposite would not follow it if they could help. We have the opinion of a court in this country appointed for the express purpose of doing this kind of work, absolutely unbiased, a third of which is not against us at the start. Even if I did ask for an arbitration, why should hon. gentlemen follow my advice, inasmuch as they voted against it before?

Hon. gentlemen opposite then thought that arbitration was wrong and they voted it down, and now we say there is only one other course open to them, namely, to go to the Exchequer Court. A year ago this spring we discussed a similar question in this House in connection with the values of railways. What did hon. gentlemen opposite do? They passed an Act of this Parliament to ascertain the value of the Quebec Central Railway. Did they appoint an arbitration? No; they selected the Exchequer Court, the very tribunal which we suggest in this instance. What is the difference between ascertaining the value of stock and railway equipment in Quebec and ascertaining the value of stock and railway equipment in the West? Why not get the benefit of the experience of that very learned court as to the value of this Canadian Northern Railway? I will point out to hon. gentlemen opposite what may be the reason for their changed course. I have had the honour of reading the reasons for judgment of the judge of the Exchequer Court in the Quebec-Saguenay Railway valuation. I find he did not live up to the expectations of those who expected to make a carcass for the delectation of the prairie birds of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway. He did not fall into their ways of thinking. He was a clean-cut business man, and I would commend any lawyer or any layman in this House to read his decision and see the masterful way in which he dealt with that question. They will find that one item alone which he rejected consisted of a million and a quarter dollars. The Government, represented by a lawyer, said it was all right to let the million and a quarter go through, but the judge of the Exchequer Court said: It is not right; it is all wrong, and I will not allow it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: A claim for a million and a quarter of money in one transaction was disallowed by the judge. If we want a man in this country to deal with a like subject, do hon. gentlemen not think it is a recommendation for him, that he should take that view in the very same sort of case? It commends itself to me, and I think it would commend itself to any ordinary man. I submit, therefore, that if we must have arbitration, we should take the very best kind of arbitration we can get, refer it to the judge of the Exchequer Court, and let him deal with this matter. I am willing to refer to any unbiased lawyer that agreement of 1914, interpreted in the light of the speeches made in explaining it to the House by the Solicitor-General, and I am convinced that any unbiased judge or lawyer will reach the conclusion that there should never be a word said about any further consideration of values in this business, and that we should take the railway over and do the best we can with it. I submit there is no reason for any consideration of the value of the stock. If it is to be considered, it is because there is some power behind the throne, holding this stock, which has some sinister influence with this Government, and which is trying to put life and value into a dead horse. We have paid enough for the road, and it should be ours. The commissioners say the property is not worth more than about $400,000,000. We are taking over with it obligations to the extent of $620,000,000, and why should we pay more? For these reasons I will vote for the amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) and against this Bill, if an opportunity be given me to vote against it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I have listened to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), and I do not say that I am in a position, from a legal point of view, to answer his arguments. He said that, as a member of this House, he did not believe in public ownership. I am a believer in public ownership of railways, and I intend to justify that belief, as well as I can, on this occasion. I may be, to use an old phrase, a lone pine in this House in favour of public ownership, although I do not admit even that. But though I should be, I am not ashamed to declare myself in favour of public ownership. I have been in this House a good many years, and for many years I have favoured that policy, and have advocated legislation to carry it into effect. I have addressed the people all over this country on this subject, and, as an ordinary, everyday journalist, I have discussed the question in print, and I am convinced, not only that public ownership is right and in the public interest, but that the people of all countries are already believers in it, or are rapidly becoming such. The thing that marks this century more than anything else is the progress made by the doctrine of public ownership, which has had more to do with the recovery of public rights and the promotion of public welfare than any other factor. The regeneration of Canada and other countries, after this war, will depend almost absolutely on carrying out this principle.

Public ownership is not a new thing; it prevails all over Europe. In every country in Europe, with the exception of Great Britain, they have had public ownership of railways. Germany, all-powerful in this war, has public ownership of railways and she overran Belgium, and got into France, and her allies got into Turkey, all of which was accomplished because of their organization of railways under state control, first for purposes of defence, and, second, for the development of trade and industries. Germany is all-powerful in this contest, largely because she has had public ownership of railways. The railways of France are under state control; the same may be said of Russia and of Italy. Russian trade to-day can reach the Pacific only through a national railway; the mission that went to Russia from the United States went by a national Russian railway that had reached out to the Pacific coast through a territory where no private company would build. Australian and New Zealand have public ownership of railways; so has India, a dependency of the British Crown. Sixty or seventy years ago England made the mistake of deciding that the steel rails which up to that time had been owned by the public should not be kept as the King's highway. So great a man as Gladstone allowed to slip by the opportunity then afforded of nationalizing the railways and of retaining them as the King's highway. Rivers and canals have always been kept as the King's highways, though their administration has been changed to some extent by the interposition of private corporations. The doctrine, however, in England was that the King's highway should be public property and that principle prevailed in connection with everything but the railways. After the declaration of war the first thing that England did was to take possession of the eighteen or more private companies engaged in railway transportation; to consolidate them; to put them under the control and direction of the State. The moment that was done, a splendid service was afforded, not only in transportation connected with the army, but in the promotion of trade generally. Only yesterday I picked up a copy of that great enemy of public ownership. the Railway Age, published in New York, the editor of which came to Canada to speak as an opponent of public ownership, but in his paper last week he has an article which shows how England consolidated her railways with the distribution of coal to the great benefit of the whole country. This, then, is what happened in England since the war began; with a view to the welfare of the Empire and to the winning of the war, the railways of England were mobilized and put in a position to render the greatest possible service to the state. The war has been on for three years, and no complaint has been made in England against this nationalization of the railways. But something else happened in England: they mobilized the coal mines also. These works are now controlled absolutely by the state, for two purposes: the winning of the war, and the promotion of trade and industries. In order to get the best service at a minimum cost, it is provided that coal may be ordered through a national board, and that national board designates the mine from which the coal shall come and the railway over which it must be transported. The result is a maximum of co-operation and co-ordination between the coal mines and the railways. The handling of the coal is, as a consequence, much more economically accomplished. If you live in the north of England your coal must be obtained from the nearest mine and must be transported over the railroad that runs nearest the mine. In this way you get the cheapest, the shortest, the quickest, and, therefore, the best service. In other words, these public utilities have been pooled in the public interest and for the welfare of the state; they are not being used for the benefit of shareholders who try to get as much as they possibly can out of the enterprises in which they are interested.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it not true that those people who oppose public ownership must necessarily oppose public control?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I would think so.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it not true that in the matter of public ownership a great deal depends upon the manner in which public affairs are administered in the country concerned? Does it necessarily follow that in Canada the administration of public utilities would be as honest or as efficient as it is in England?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: As a Canadian, I say yes. I am not afraid to trust the Canadian Parliament; I am not afraid to trust my fellow-men in the constituency of South York, in regard to this matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the experience in connection with the Intercolonial railway brought the hon. gentleman to that conclusion?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: No. I am not afraid of public ownership in respect to the Intercolonial, nor do I apologize for the application of the principle to that public utility. Public ownership of the Intercolonial has been a good thing. True, it can be made better—and that it has not been better in the past hon. gentlemen on both sides may be more or less responsible for. What can be done in other countries can be done in Canada, and what is good for any other country is good for Canada. Public ownership has vindicated itself the world over. If any hon. gentlemen will show where public ownership has failed, or give reasons of its having failed, he may be able to make out a case against the adoption of that policy. But I believe in public ownership, though I may be almost alone in that belief; perhaps not many representatives of the people believe in public ownership.

Mr. McKENZIE: The great chief of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald, was opposed to public ownership.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: No, he was not; I know as much about Sir John A. Macdonald's views as my hon. friend does.

Mr. McKENZIE: He is on record as being opposed to it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Granted that he was; he lived fifty years ago; we are in the twentieth century. We are living; Sir John A. Macdonald is dead. We have to deal with this matter not from the viewpoint of what Sir John Macdonald thought fifty years ago, but from the viewpoint of the real value of public ownership to-day. Twisting and turning may have been practiced in the past—indeed, I saw a good deal of twisting and turning here to-day that rather surprised me. But I still say that the experience of nations the world over is favourable to public ownership.

I now come to the United States, which is going to be a great factor in the settlement of this war. Immediately upon war being declared by the United States, the railways of the country were mobilized, and the people who, as shareholders and bondholders, have their money in those railways to-day, would like to see that mobilization go forward still further. The United States will, I believe, embark on a policy of public ownership of railways, especially after they see that Canada has decided that public ownership is to obtain in this country. The United States have adopted a policy of public ownership of railways in Alaska, because they are constructing there a national railway to make connection with our railways in British Columbia. They have come to the conclusion that there the principle of public ownership ought to be adopted. They are mobilizing and nationalizing their railways to-day in order to handle their troops, to ship their munitions, to send supplies to their army, which is in France now, and which will be there for a long time to come. They are doing that because it is good public policy, and they are, in that respect, simply following the example of the rest of the world.

I desire to state two or three reasons why I believe in public ownership of railways. I believe in it, not because other nations have adopted that policy, but because of the advantages and economies that it brings about. Where you have a number of privately-owned roads, you have much unnecessary duplication of stations, terminals, sidings, and so on, and that means a great deal of unnecessary expense. With public ownership—and we are on the way to it now in Canada—all this unnecessary duplication ceases. In Montreal, the Canadian Northern Company has most expensive terminals, a tunnel, a station, sidings. If there was public ownership, there would be no need of that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are three railway stations in Montreal.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: My hon. friend's statement makes my argument three times as strong as I made it. You have all this waste and unnecessary expense, and you do not get the service; you do not get co-ordination, and co-operation. By public ownership you get co-ordination of the system, you do away with unnecessary duplication; you get co-operation; you have fewer terminals and sidings, and every siding is available for every citizen of the country. I know siding after siding on which you can put a freight car only by the pressure of the Board of Railway Commissioners, but with public ownership, every man will be able to use every siding and every terminal. He will form part of the ownership; the railway will be his, and he will not have to ask the permission of any railway magnate or company to use a siding. The railway will be for the service of the country.

Mr. KNOWLES: In Australia there is public ownership of railways. Does the hon. gentleman think the condition of things in Australia, where there is a multiplicity of gauges, where the same car cannot be used on different railways, is better than the system in Canada where there is one gauge?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: That, of course, is a great mistake.

Mr. KNOWLES: Still, the hon. gentleman says that public ownership brings about co-ordination.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Yes, it does. I remember when the Grand Trunk and the Great Western had different gauges, and they had a third rail on those railways. We have an instance of that in Toronto where the street railway has what is called a bastard gauge. But when you have public ownership of railways, you can standardize everything in connection with them; you can bring about great economies, and you can give a better service.

In America and in England, railways have been constructed by private companies, ostensibly for the purpose of giving good service, but the real object in most cases has been to make profits for the shareholders. The difference between public ownership and private ownership is that the former seeks to give service and the latter to make profits for the owners, and service and profit do not go together; they have never gone together in this country. No railway in this country has been constructed wholly with the idea of giving service; the men who operate it devote all their energies to meeting the fixed charges and earning profits for the shareholders. That is their duty. They always think of profit first and service second. With public ownership good service is the main thing to be considered, and the orders to those who administer the road should be to see how good a service they can give to the public without regard to the profits. Of course, the fixed charges in connection with the road must be provided for. Public ownership will put an end to this idea of running a railway to make magnates. We have had some of them in this country and they have had them in the United States, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds and the Hills. The late Mr. J. J. Hill gave an excellent service in the north-western states and in some portions of Canada, but he had in mind one thing more than anything else, and that was to make J. J. Hill a great railway magnate and to leave his sons great railway magnates, and the service they gave to the people was a secondary consideration.

We are not going to make any more railway magnates in this country; we are going to build the railroads by the people, for the people, and with the people's money, on the principle of giving service and not making money for any one, or making great families and consolidating wealth and putting it into the hands of the few. It will not be permitted in future to any body of men or any company or any board of directors to discriminate, as they have done in the past, against individuals or localities. The view that the welfare of the nation is of more importance than the wealth of individuals is in the direction of public ownership. That view is spreading throughout the minds of the people of this country, and go where you will in Canada, you will see that the people are in favour of public ownership. That is especially true of the West. The farmers of the West, at their conventions, and in particular, at a convention of a political party that met at Winnipeg the other day, voiced the views of the people of the West, declaring in favour of public ownership. I say, therefore, that the verdict of the people of this country is in favour of public ownership, because that is based on the principle of service and not of profit—on the principle of the welfare of all and not of the wealth of a few. They have before them the fact that public ownership has vindicated itself in Europe. Great Britain resorted to public ownership when she found herself at war. The United States resorted to it in the development of Alaska and in the mobilization of railways and in connection with the war. Japan, China, Australia, New Zealand—the whole world to-day, with the exception of England and the United States, is in favour of public ownership, and these two countries are also accepting it in a measure. We, too, are accepting it, and I thank God I am living in this year 1917 when 9,000 or 10,000 miles of railway actually pass out of private ownership into the hands of the people, and will be ultimately joined up in creating a great national system of railways owned by the people and devoted to the development and welfare of the nation, and not to the profits of individuals.

I just wish to say a word on the question of discrimination, which public ownership overcomes. Instance after instance can be found in the history of the United States where roads have discriminated against an individual or an interest—the farming interest, for instance—or even against a state. Certain places have been ruined because railway magnates of private-owned roads have discriminated against a certain town or locality, or against a certain interest. Public ownership, on the other hand, is based on the principle of no discrimination; equality of treatment for all. You cannot find a private-owned road that is not open to the charge that they have unjustly discriminated. We have created a railway commission in this country, as they have in the United States, to prevent this discrimination and unfair treatment. The other point in this connection which I wish to emphasize is this: My father often told me, when talking over political questions, that the great mistake the people made in England many years ago in connection with railways and other matters was in thinking that the least government was the best. Now the teaching of this country and of this day, with the advance of civilization in all its complexity, is that the duty of doing something and protecting the public interest rest more and more upon the State. Therefore, with the complexities of civilization as we know it to-day, and with the questions that are now before us as to the reorganization of our country, there is nothing ahead of us but public ownership of railways in order to fully protect the welfare and the interests of the nation.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, the next point I want to make in favour of the public ownership of railways is that it will help to solve the problem of the motive power with which our railways are to be run. There is a great scarcity of coal in various portion of Canada. In my own province of Ontario we have no coal, and there is no coal in Quebec. There is a large store of coal in the Maritime Provinces, but you have to go pretty far west before you come to any large deposits of coal. Therefore, we are largely dependent on distant coal beds, situated in a foreign country, for the coal supply for our railways. The public ownership of railways removes one great difficulty in connection with transportation in this country, namely that if we have not the coal, we have the greatest water powers in the world, and the modern thing in railroading to-day is to get your motive power for transportation from the streams. We have rivers that will produce enough hydro-electric energy to give us an unlimited supply of motive power to operate all our railways and make us independent of the coal companies in foreign countries who ship coal to us. These water powers, if properly controlled, will provide us with motive power which will probably give Canada the finest transportation system in the world. They are largely owned and controlled by the provinces and the Dominion. It is not too late for this Parliament, by its own action and co-operation with the provinces, to declare that every water power in this country must be conserved, kept, owned and controlled by the State. If we are foolish enough to allow our water powers and rivers to pass into the control of private corporations, as the coal beds in the United States have passed into the hands of corporations, then the question of coal becomes of supreme importance to the people of Canada and to those who have charge of transportation.

There are water powers enough in Canada to draw every train and every car we shall ever have. If we nationalize the railways, which I favour, and if we nationalize our water powers, as we ought to, and use them for the solution of the transportation problem, Canada will have the best railway system in the world. So far, we have made great headway in nationalizing our water powers. In Ontario to-day the work is largely done. We have the Hydro-Electric Commission, publicly owned and controlled by the municipalities of Ontario in conjunction with the Provincial Government, and we are steadily moving in the direction of the nationalization of all these water powers and the development of power for manufacturing industries as well as for transportation. What is being done in Ontario can be done in every part of the country. What we have done with the Niagara river can be done in connection with the St. Lawrence. There is enough power on the Niagara river, and enough power can be generated on the St. Lawrence, to drive every car and every train, to run every factory and every industry, and to light all the factories and all the cities and towns and houses in the country.

Right at Cornwall, at the Long Sault, there is an immense quantity of power, and it nearly passed out of the hands of the people of Canada. It was proposed in this very Parliament, since I have been a member of it, to alienate that great water power at Cornwall and to turn it over to a company partly American and partly Canadian in its organization, which would have monopolized the power and sold it to the people and to the railways at the highest price. The railways to-day have to pay the coal owners in the United States a high price for the coal which is used as motive power to run the railways. The two Governments controlling the two sides of the river, could develop the water power on the St. Lawrence, as our Government is developing it on the Niagara, and with these two rivers alone we would have control of the motive power in Ontario and Quebec, and run every train on the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific and Canadian Northern.

Then, back in the province of Quebec, they have immense, unlimited, water power which can be developed. By reason of the improved system of transmission, no trouble is experienced in sending power to a distance of 400 or 500 miles without any great percentage of loss, and that power can be used for driving trains.

The only way to develop this water-power to the greatest public advantage is by State ownership of railways and of water-powers. In that way alone can we provide for the farmer the cheapest and best possible transportation for his products. That idea is spreading in my own province of Ontario where, largely through the development of water-powers on the Niagara river, we are moving our street cars in Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford and London by power transmitted over long distances. The Canadian Pacific has a great scheme for the development of local traffic in Ontario if it can get the power. Some of the railroads have not the capital necessary to develop power in this direction. The Canadian Pacific may have it, but the Grand Trunk has not the money necessary to develop water-powers in Ontario and on the St. Lawrence to operate its trains. Once such a system is installed we shall for all time be secure as to our motive power for the operation of our railroads. There is enough water-power in Northern Ontario, in the drainage basin that goes to Hudson bay, coupled with the power that could be developed in Southern Ontario and on the St. Lawrence and in the valleys of Quebec, to drive every train that carries grain from Winnipeg to the seaboard. Upon the great rivers in the West power can be developed, with a proper system of storage, to make our western railroads absolutely independent of coal fuel. Thus the whole country will be independent of American coal and the owners of mines in Canada.

To show how this idea of State ownership of railways and of power supply is spreading, let me quote an item I clipped the other day referring to the proposed national railroad to be built for the development of Alaska. One of the first things the United States Government did was to acquire coal beds in that country. They realized that in order to have a first-class, cheap system of transportation for Alaska they must not only build a national railroad, but must buy coal beds. The item reads:

> The commission will develop the property without delay. Sumner S. Smith, inspector for the Federal Bureau of Mines, will be in immediate charge of operations, and Geo. W. Evans, district mine engineer of the Bureau of Mines, will act as consulting engineer. Mr. Evans is now in Seattle, arranging for the purchase and shipment of the necessary machinery and equipment.
>
> The purpose of the commission in purchasing the mine is to secure an adequate supply of coal for the construction and operation of the Government railroad. This object was attainable only through the operation of the mine on a larger scale and by the installation of proper facilities. A washer for cleaning the product will be erected, and other modern equipment added to the plant, to insure the necessary tonnage and the economical handling of the output.
>
> The commission will also take steps at once to open a mine at another point.

The American nation thus finds it necessary, in building a great national road, to acquire a supply of motive power.

Mr. CURRIE: Are they going to pay the Canadian bondholders of that road, who built it?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am unable to answer that question. I know that the United States Government are building that road themselves.

Mr. CURRIE: Freezing out the Canadian bondholders.

Mr. MACLEAN: I am not speaking about the Canadian bondholders, but about the transportation problem. The United States are to-day building this great railroad, and they are getting control of coal that will supply the motive power.

When the Bill now before this House passes, the people of Canada will own sixteen thousand or seventeen thousand miles of railroad. And if we are faced with the problem of motive power, as we are to-day in Quebec and Ontario, in order to satisfactorily solve that problem we must not only own the railroads, but also control the motive power and the rivers that supply it. If we do that we shall have the best and cheapest transportation system of any country in the world. Our people see it now in Ontario, where we have a splendid system of radials, and we have already arranged for public ownership of water-powers and the control of the rivers. We are going to develop that power and transmit it throughout the province, and the same system should be extended to the whole Dominion. Privately-owned companies should not be permitted to control these water-powers, and those who believe in public ownership should endeavour now to secure the development of these water-powers for the public good so that we shall be absolutely independent for all time in respect to motive power to operate our railroads.

That is why there is a good deal of opposition to public ownership to-day—they see it coming. There is often a danger that there will be a coal famine through shortage of railway equipment, but there is no way that I see of getting cheaper rates on railways other than by public ownership of the railways to begin with, public ownership of the waterways thereafter, and by mobolizing both together the people of Canada will have better and cheaper transportation than they ever had. Compared with other countries, it will give them the best transportation in the world.

I will give another reason why public ownership commends itself to me. A modern word in economics is "valorization," and you can, perhaps, valorize railway rates. That statement may surprise members of this House, but it does not surprise many thinking men. The great question in Canada should be what is best for the farmers. We yet do not know the possible resources of that great Peace River district. All that great western country is engaged, and will be engaged for many years, in the production of grain for the use of our own people, and for export, and one of the standing objections to settlement in the farthest west is that the freight rates are higher, that they have to pay more in Alberta to get a bushel of wheat to the seaboard than they have to pay in Manitoba, and still more than they have to pay in Ontario. The day is coming in the new order of economics, I hope, when the freight rates on a bushel of wheat to the seaboard will be valorized; that is, that in order to give equality to the producers it ought to cost no more to ship a bushel of wheat from Alberta to Pacific or the Atlantic seaboard than it costs to ship that same bushel of wheat, say, from Ontario. That is rather a far-fetched idea, and many people would not believe in it, but if you can show the people of the West that by public ownership of railways you can valorize the freight rate on a bushel of wheat so that it will be the same all over the country, then you have a great argument for public ownership. I know that this argument will be met with a great deal of objection, but the valorization of freight rates must come some day, and the country that adopts it first will give the best and fairest transportation to its people.

Mr. MORPHY: Would you apply the same argument to electric power?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I do not know why you should not. The great argument against the Hydro Electric Commission in Ontario was that while the people owned that power those who lived further away from it had to use it—

Mr. HANNA: And pay bigger rates for it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I see no way of valorizing freight rates except by public ownership, so that the man who lives a long distance from the centres of population would at least have the advantage that he would not be under the disability of excessive freight rates, as compared with other localities nearer to the consuming centres. But whether we can valorize freight rates or not, I say that public ownership will give the best possible rates, and absolutely fair rates without any discrimination. You cannot attain that in any other way than by public ownership of the railways. We have made some headway in Ontario in public ownership of energy distributed for water-power. If you have public ownership of railways, you will have public ownership of express business, of telegraph business, and, perhaps, some day of the telephone system. That will do more than anything else to uplift the people all over this country. If you have public ownership of railways, telephone, telegraph, express and parcel post, the post office, and the money order system in connection with it, you can extend them all in the smallest village of Canada, and night and day, every day in the year, the people of that smallest community will have access, in one public office, where you can arrange your business, make inquiries about railways, send telegrams, arrange for parcel post and get express service. You will have all these great public utilities which ought to be for the service of the public and not for the profit of private companies, concentrated in every community, be it large or small. By this acquisition of the Canadian Northern System we get a telegraph system to-day, and that, I hope, will soon be turned over to the post office of this country, and will be expanded and extended. It will be the beginning of the naturalization of our telegraph system as they have it in every other country in Europe. Even Great Britain, although she has not nationalized railways, by reason of her experience of nationalization of telegraph and telephone, will come to a nationalization of her railways, if, for no other reason.

Public ownership of railroads will be absolutely necessary in those countries that have not it when the problem of reconstruction after the war—a problem that is even now before us—comes up for determination. The problem is now being considered in Europe: how are the countries affected by the war to be reconstructed?

To them it is an immense problem, and it will be equally vital in this country. If we mobilize our wealth—a great many gentlemen in this House have committed themselves to the principle of the mobilization of wealth, of industries, of everything that goes to make our nation strong and great—then we have to nationalize the railroads too. The best possible reconstruction cannot be secured in this country or in the United States unless the railroads are taken over. The world has to be rebuilt and reorganized after this great war, and to my mind nothing will contribute so much to speedy reconstruction and readjustment as public ownership of railroads.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. gentleman apply his argument to the shipment of industrial manufactures from Ontario to the West, having in mind the lower cost of shipment from Winnipeg?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: That has to be worked out. I am not going into the details; I am setting forth the general principle that, in my opinion, should be adopted. It ought to be worked out so that the western farmer shall not pay a higher freight rate upon his plough than the Ontario farmer does. It may be alleged that that is visionary; I do not think that it is. I see the truth of it; I think that a great many people see it.

It has been charged against me that I am ahead of my time in some of the principles that I advocate. But I have not advocated anything this afternoon that is in advance of the times, or anything, with the single exception of the valorization of freight rates, that has not already been adopted and successfully worked out in other countries.

What shall we get if we take over the Canadian Northern Railway system? We have over 2,000 miles in the Intercolonial and over 2,000 miles in the Transcontinental. We shall get about 9,000 miles in the Canadian Northern. We shall be starting public ownership, therefore, with about 14,000 miles of railway. At the beginning you cannot line them all up under one organization. We are to keep—so I gather from the Bill—the present company organization of the Canadian Northern. But it is going to be owned by the people, and in a very short time it will be co-ordinated with the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental. The Intercolonial railway will run its cars into Toronto. Sidings will be available there for the purpose of loading and receiving freight moved between Ontario and the country served by the Intercolonial. The Intercolonial will get a new stimulus from this connection with Ontario and the West; freight will, as a matter of course, go over the Intercolonial. The Transcontinental will be worked into the system, and, with the Canadian Northern, we shall have a great system of 15,000 or 16,000 miles. Great economies can be effected. The Canadian Northern will be helped, because all the freight that goes to Toronto can go over the Canadian Northern, a government-owned road. Through this co-ordination and co-operation there will be great reduction in expenses. Of course, that will not come at the start, because of circumstances which I cannot explain here to-night.

We ought to have acquired the Grand Trunk under this measure. Now that we have the Canadian Northern, the Transcontinental, and the Intercolonial, we ought to take over the Grand Trunk. The Government have given reasons why they have not taken it over; they say that the financial commitments would be too great, having regard to present conditions. But I would be prepared to-day to support any measure for the acquiring of the Grand Trunk Railway system, because, when you get the Grand Trunk you get the real benefit of national ownership. Between Toronto and Montreal the Canadian Pacific runs three or four express trains a day. The Grand Trunk runs the same number. The Canadian Northern has two running to Ottawa; they purpose to go on to Montreal. If we had public ownership, with the co-ordination and co-operation that would result, we could reduce the number of these trains running between Montreal and Toronto, get a better service and save a lot of money. That could be done all over the country. Almost immediately there can be consolidation between the Grand Trunk in the West and the Canadian Northern. Out of Toronto every week three trains now go to the West over the Transcontinental line and three over the Canadian Northern. As soon as these two systems are linked up it will be possible to have a daily service over the better line. If you ask me what would be the national line from Halifax to Vancouver, I would say: Take the Intercolonial at Halifax, the Canadian Northern at Montreal, the Canadian Northern to Sudbury, the Canadian Northern to a place called Long Lake, near lake Nipigon, which is 25 miles from the Transcontinental; then take the Transcontinental to Winnipeg, and the Canadian Northern from Winnipeg to Vancouver. That would give a line superior to any line operating to-day. If, some day, we get the Canadian Pacific Railway—it may come—the suggestions which I have made could be adopted in respect to it and its connections with the other lines.

As I pointed out this afternoon, by public ownership and control of the railways and mines in England, the shortest and most economical service has been secured. Public ownership will give you less haulage; it will give you the best grades for the moving of freight. There are all kinds of grades in different parts of this country that obstruct freight. Where I live, near Toronto, I am on a one per cent grade—a grade that is an obstruction to traffic for all time. That grade is called the Scarboro grade on the Grand Trunk, and the Wexford grade on the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Northern have a grade between the two, a half per cent grade. We should get rid of all these expensive one per cent grades that are found all over the country. One of the merits of the Canadian Northern Railway system is the splendid grades that they have in many parts of the country. It has excellent grades between Toronto and Sudbury and thence to the West. It has very good grades in the West, but with public ownership those grades could be standardized and used in such a way as to give the best possible service. In sections where those good grades are to be found, an engine can haul a larger number of cars, and with public ownership you get the best grades and no money is wasted on unnecessary competition. Public ownership will ensure cheap motive power, and in every way public ownership does more than anything else I know of towards the solution of the transportation problems of this country.

Many people are opposed to public ownership. Two hon. members who spoke to-day said that they did not believe in it. Missionaries from the United States have come into my own city to tell the people that public ownership is a curse, that political corruption will bedevil it, and that it can never be worked out successfully. When men, who believe in democracy and who come from a democratic country say that they are afraid to trust the people in the operation of a railway, and that corruption will creep in, my answer is that I will look into that question very carefully. When there is corruption in a country—and there has been a good deal of corruption in one way or another in Canada—it comes mainly from public utility corporations which exert their influences in the political affairs of the country. When you remove that private ownership and have public ownership, you go a long way towards remedying the situation. As a Canadian, I have every confidence in my fellow-citizens; I do not say that they are corrupt; I am in favour of removing the source of corruption, and I believe the Canadian people are capable of owning the railroads and of handing them over to non-partisan boards to operate. When you take politics out of the administration of those roads you will get good service. We have public ownership in Ontario in connection with the distribution of power, and there is not a better example of public ownership than the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission in its methods of administration. There is no corruption in the operation of that commission, and the people of Ontario are satisfied with its administration. If the people of Ontario are capable of handling that public service, why cannot the people of Canada carry on public ownership successfully? I have every faith in my fellow-countrymen; I believe they are competent to see that the railroads of this country are administered without corruption, and that political influence is kept out of their administration. Public ownership of railways has been carried on in different countries throughout the world. Australia, New Zealand, France, Russia and Japan have public ownership, and surely what they can do, we can do; what is good for them is good for us. I, therefore, disagree with those who say that, with public ownership, you run the danger of getting poor administration and political corruption. The post office of this country is well managed, although the criticism is made that there is some political interference in its administration. I am willing to vote at any time in favour of politics and political influence being done away with in connection with appointments in the post office. I am in favour of all appointments being made after competitive examination; and after a man has been appointed to a position in the post office, he should be permitted to rise on his merits, without any politician interfering in the matter. That system is being carried on in England and in the United States, and it is being carried on here in Canada. I do not like to hear a public man in Canada—to whatever party he may belong—say on a public platform that the people are corrupt; that they cannot manage their own affairs, and that politics will creep into the administration of great public services such as our railways. I take no stock in such an argument. I believe that the members of this Parliament, when this railway and the railways we now have are consolidated, will evolve a method by which we shall have a businesslike and sound administration through a commission appointed by Parliament or by a responsible Government, and that the necessary legislation for protecting the public interest will be passed. If the doctrine that the people are corrupt and that we cannot get rid of political influence is true, then why does it not follow that you cannot get justice in this country from the courts? If under our present parliamentary institution you can pick out good judges who will administer law impartially, you can surely get good men who will operate the railroads in the same manner. I regret that the nation to-day has not in its service men like Lord Shaughnessy, Sir William Mackenzie, Mr. Hanna, or Sir George Bury. If the people gave any one of these men charge of a government railway, does any one mean to say that he would not operate it just as well as he operates the railway of which he has charge at the present time? These are splendid men; they are trained now to serve their shareholders, and they would be just as willing to serve the nation. When we have public ownership we shall have the pick of the best men of the country to run our railways. In a very short time we shall get the nucleus of a high-minded board of men who will be glad to devote their lives to the administration of the publicly-owned railways. We can secure them. All we want to do is to say that there shall be no interference with them. And we are gradually eliminating political interference in connection with the administration of certain public affairs. There is no political influence in connection with the administration of justice, and there is none in connection with the administration of the Hydro-Electric Commission, and they are giving good results. The people are capable of carrying on public ownership successfully, and they are able to judge as to the men who shall have control of publicly-owned services. This great system of 16,000 miles of railway that we shall have will gradually be put under one commission, and we shall soon have the Grand Trunk and later on the Canadian Pacific. When we get those railways, we shall have a great public service linked up with it and co-ordinated and consecrated to service and not to profit. That is my argument—that all these public utilities should be consecrated to service and not to profit.

Can you ever, as things are now, get a privately-owned company to extend its lines, unless it receives a bonus and a profit on construction? When there is public ownership, the telegraph lines, the telephones, the express business, and the railway lines will be extended as they are required, and fair treatment will be meted out. District after district in the Canadian West cannot get a railroad service to-day for one reason or another. A truly impartial board intrusted with the administration of our railways would see to it that railway lines were constructed where they were required, and that there was no unnecessary duplication. Is it not a shame to see the duplication that exists between Montreal and Toronto, railways paralleling each other for mile after mile? The same thing is to be seen in the West. That duplication is unnecessary.

Is it not a shame that the Grand Trunk Pacific should run so close to the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific? Yet that is what we have got under private ownership. The greatest waste that was ever permitted in this country by unnecessary duplication of lines, of bridges, of officials, and all the other paraphernalia that goes with private ownership, will be got rid of under public ownership, when all the roads are brought under one organization. That may not come in a year or two, but we are making a start and the people of this country see that the thing can be done. This question is being discussed in political gatherings wherever the people see the advantage of political organization. Out in the West the grain growers and the farmers see the importance of political organization, and the importance of acquiring, through political organizations, control of all these public utilities, and to-day they are demanding that there shall be public ownership of the railways. They are sick and tired of this unnecessary duplication of lines, sick and tired of not being able to get railways where they ought to get them. They know that public ownership will prevent this unnecessary waste and get the railways where they are wanted. It is true that public ownership will not come in a day, but it is making headway, and the longest step in the direction of public ownership that has ever been taken in this country is the introduction of the measure we are discussing here to-day. It may have its defects; holes could no doubt be bored into the arguments that all the lawyers in the House have made on both sides of this question. But I am not at all influenced by these appeals. I am only concerned with this: that no more than a fair price should be paid for what is taken over.

I have listened to the argument that it would be rather an expensive proposition. I am not going to argue to the contrary, but I say that in Sir William Meredith, the arbitrator who is to represent the Dominion, we have a man who has given the best portion of his life to public ownership in Ontario, and it is largely to his assistance and to that of the politicians associated with him that we owe the Hydro Electric movement in Ontario to-day, which some people seem to be so sore on, but of which so many of us in the province of Ontario are justly proud. I remember when public ownership first came up in the province of Ontario. I was a little identified with it myself. I remember the first resolution that was passed in favour of public ownership of the water-powers and the development of power at Niagara falls. I was one of two or three who drafted the short resolution in that direction, which we managed to get one of the private members to move at the tail-end of the session. The Conservatives happened to take it up, and the resolution was put through the House as a party measure, but not one member got up and made a speech in favour of it; the resolution just slipped through. That was the beginning of the public ownership movement in Ontario. From that day to this the people of that province have daily become more strongly in favour of public ownership. They see that by public ownership of power, for light, heat and energy, by public ownership of radial roads, and now of steam roads, they can make Ontario the greatest manufacturing province in all Canada. The nationalization of the railways, together with the other benefits that go with it—the consolidation of the express business with the telegraph, parcel post, and perhaps the money order business connected with the post office—will facilitate the development of industry and of transportation, and make this country great. You can make the provinces in the West great if you give the farmer the lowest possible freight rate, instead of following the practice of privately-owned roads of making the traffic pay the highest rate it can bear,— and this is the only rule that has guided the owners of privately-owned roads up to to-day. Public ownership will get rid of all that, and will build up our great public services both here and in the West. It will improve farming in the West and manufacturing in the East, and improve the life of the people all over the country. Public ownership is coming, and the proposals now before the House, while they may have their defects, are on the whole a move in the right direction. They are, in fact, the greatest move that has yet been made in the direction of public ownership.

I hope we shall soon follow up our taking over of the Canadian Northern by taking over the Grand Trunk, which is the necessary complement of the Canadian Northern in the West. We want feeders in the East for the Canadian Northern in the West, just as much as we want feeders in the West to bring freight down to the Atlantic seaboard. We have not got the Grand Trunk yet, but I hope we shall have it next year. I hope the proposals for giving relief to the Grand Trunk in its present emergency will ensure our getting control of the road in the public interest. Somebody may say: If you are in favour of public ownership, why don't you acquire the Canadian Pacific and take over the whole system? Some newspapers have made quite an argument out of that, contending that if we got the Canadian Pacific the problem would be much easier of solution. So it would. The Canadian Pacific revenue to-day is such that if that road were consolidated with the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Transcontinental, it could take care of all the fixed charges and operating expenses, give a far better service to the people, and still have a large surplus for improvements and betterments. But we cannot do that just yet; it may be harder to get the Canadian Pacific than any other road. But the Canadian Northern has come into our hands, and we shall soon get control of the Grand Trunk, and I shall never be satisfied until we do get it. We shall have a fair chance of getting the Canadian Pacific on better terms when we have a well-established system of our own. I believe the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific would be glad to be guaranteed 7 per cent on their stock if the country took over the road. When the Canadian Pacific was here as a suppliant some years ago, on four or five different occasions asking for authorization to increase its stock, I opposed it on every occasion and was laughed at in this House.

I said that if the Canadian Pacific wanted more money it should get it by the issue of 4 per cent bonds, and it could have got the money, for it is paying 10 per cent on that stock now. I said that the greatest danger in authorizing the company to increase its stock issue was that when we came to take over the road we should have $300,000,000 of capital stock to take over, on which they would want 10 per cent. I was laughed at for making that statement, but now it has come true. If we want to get the Canadian Pacific to-day and consolidate it with the other railways, using the earnings of them all—and the earnings of them all will maintain the roads if they are consolidated—we shall have to take over this great amount of stock. We are getting wise to that, and hereafter we shall exercise greater control and supervision over stock issues which railroads may make. If there is any difficulty to-day in acquiring the Canadian Pacific, which is an excellent road and would help to carry all the others, it is because we have been improvident in the past in allowing it to make the stock issues it has made. But in spite of that, we shall some day be able to take over the road and then we shall have what the people of this country want—a publicly-owned system.

I notice that the people of the Maritime Provinces do not wish to give up their publicly-owned road, for that road, the Intercolonial, has been of great service to them. I listened with a great deal of interest the other day to the argument that that road should not come under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. Now, if public ownership is good for the Maritime Provinces it is good enough for Ontario and the West, and we have seen that for a long while. We have helped in paying the interest on the construction of the Intercolonial, but have never objected to doing that; we are glad the road has been kept independent and the autonomy preserved. It is now to be linked up with the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern, and in this way we are making a beginning with a great transcontinental service owned by the people of this country and passing from Victoria, on the West, through the different provinces right down to the Atlantic seaboard.

The only portion of the country, I am sorry to say, that has not the benefit of public ownership is that part of Ontario that lies west of Toronto. The Canadian Northern, at present, only goes to Toronto and runs from there northwesterly to Winnipeg. We have not public ownership of railways in Ontario. That is the reason why the present proposition, without the inclusion of the Grand Trunk Pacific, is rather a hard thing for us to justify in Ontario. But we accept it in the hope that in a short time we shall have the Grand Trunk Pacific taken into this national system. When we have that, we shall have every city and town, almost, of any account from ocean to ocean on a publicly owned railway, and we hope that these railways will be so administered for the welfare of the people that the Canadian Pacific will be wise enough, in the interest of its shareholders, to come in and join us. We shall have no trouble in getting men to administer this publicly owned railway. We can get the pick of the railway men of this country. Whoever has the administration of this new departure in connection with the Canadian Northern is bound to take the best men, and there are some good men on the Canadian Northern. Take them over and give them a free hand. Put them under a board of directors and they will give real service.

Without referring at all to political criticism, I want to recognize what the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) have been doing in the direction of public ownership. The mind of the people has been moving in the direction of public ownership. You can see it. It is on the way; it is coming. We are getting 10,000 miles of road and this, joined up with the others that I have mentioned, will give us 15,000 miles. I came into this House an advocate of public ownership. I never thought I should live to see the day when it would become a reality. I have been laughed at and jeered at in the last few years when I proposed public ownership in this House, and in my own city of Toronto as well, but notwithstanding the laughs and jeers, the idea is taking firm hold of the minds of the people. They see what it can do and they are backing it up in the province of Ontario to-day. Every man in the Government of Ontario who is administering these publicly-owned services is a believer in public ownership. We have not got it here yet in Ottawa. The man who believes in public ownership is thought to be an enthusiast or a madman who should be in the asylum. The late Sir James Whitney made a great reputation for himself by his advocacy of public ownership in connection with the Hydro-Electric power scheme. But he was at times afraid of it, and he thought that probably some of his colleagues were going too far. We remember the attitude of Sir John A. Macdonald in connection with the National Policy. He thought it was something that we should not go too fast with and he was always checking up those who advocated it. But, nevertheless, it swept the country. The principle of a National Policy in connection with the tariff swept the country then, and the question of a National Policy in connection with industry and with the nationalization of our railways is sweeping the country to-day. The people of Ontario believe in it and the people of Quebec have their own Intercolonial railway and they do not want to surrender it. I have seen assaults made on that road in this House since I have been a member of it, and plots of all kinds to turn it over—at one time to the Canadian Pacific, at another time to the Grand Trunk, and at another time to some other company. But, they have not been able to carry out those schemes. The whole trend of thought in this country is in the direction of public ownership, and it is going ahead.

There are impediments and obstructions, in the way. Some people say that they do not believe in it; that it has been a failure; that our people cannot work it out; that there will be political corruption. And yet the mind of the people of Canada is consolidating, forming, mobilizing, if I may use a modern expression, in the direction of public ownership. It is coming; it is here to-day; it is before us in this measure. With public ownership under the Hydro-Electric Commission you get good service, there is no loss, there are no unnecessary bonds that have to be protected and no dividends to pay on unnecessary issues. You find that in Ontario to-day under the public ownership of hydro-electric energy. What can be done there can be done in connection with the railways.

For these reasons I have no hesitation in saying that the measure, with any weaknesses it may have, is in the very best direction and I think the people would approve of it. As to the commission that is to fix the value, it is open to discussion as to how this should be done. Probably there ought to be a limitation of the finding, but I believe that the Government is in the way of obtaining a commission which will arrive at a fair valuation for the stock. It may not be worth a great deal. Various opinions have been expressed by members of this House as to what that value ought to be, and the parties have more or less committed themselves to it. Certainly these people have some kind of an equity in the proposition and a reasonable amount might be fixed by the board of arbitration. I think there is no doubt that with a commission composed of men like Sir William Meredith a fair price will be fixed. Then, we shall have the beginning of a great national system of railways, taking in 15,000 miles of road, and which will soon include the Grand Trunk and in a few years may include the Canadian Pacific. If we can get that we will have the best transcontinental railway that any country has. It will be publicly owned and administered. There will be no waste due to unnecessary duplication, and no unnecessary overhead charges. And at the proper time, probably after the war, a system of refunding of the whole outstanding liabilities can be worked out. Any way, we are making headway, and we are making it in the right direction. I compliment the Government on taking over the road, irrespective of whether there may be some question in connection with settling the value. It is a step in the right direction, it is for public ownership, for public service, for the welfare of the people; it is not for making wealth or profits for private individuals; it is to put the railway magnate out of existence, and it is putting before the youth of this country the splendid idea that the best thing they can do is to make a reputation in the administration of some public service and to work for the public welfare. That is a new thing to aspire to. Hitherto men like Sir William Mackenzie, Sir Donald Mann and Sir William van Horne, unfortunately, have given their best energies to the service of corporations. We still have the same kind of men in this country.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it not true that the great argument in favour of public ownership of the Canadian Northern is the fact that private ownership has proved a complete failure?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: That may be. Private ownership may have built a lot of unnecessary lines, may have caused any amount of duplication; they may have come to grief owing to that fact. Public ownership would not have come to grief in the same way. Any way, the bulk of the arguments are in favour of public ownership, and I stand here to-night, for myself, for my province, for the people I represent, for the thinking men of this country and for the farmers, to say that they are in favour of public ownership of the railroads of this country, and the sooner it comes the better it will be for the nation, for the people, and for the welfare of all.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow my hon. friend along the lines on which he has just spoken so ably and at such length. I assume that he is to be congratulated and that he should be pardoned for having claimed for himself the honour and distinction of having had his views adopted by the Government. I would not pretend to enter upon all of the lines of discussion which my hon. friend has taken up, but I may point out that there is a delightful absence all through his discussion of any such material and important matter as the question of what all these things are going to cost. My hon. friend has entirely eliminated, both from the consideration of the proposition before the House and everything he has mentioned in the course of his speech, any such thing as money. Money is a very important thing, it is a very essential thing. And now, when the credit of this country is at the lowest ebb it has ever been, with demands for commitments greater than at any time previously, we have submitted to us a proposition by which the Government undertake to commit themselves and the country to a liability which is totally unnecessary. This proposition involves the payment of at least $100,000,000 on the lines laid down by the Minister of Finance. I say that at this moment the one serious thing for the Canadian people to consider is whether or not this Government is doing right in paying out $100,000,000—or rather committing themselves to the payment of that amount—when they do not have to pay a single cent, and when all that my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) claimed as ideal and proper could be obtained for the country by this Government simply taking advantage of their own bargain made three years ago and incorporated in a statute.

The Minister of Finance, when he presented his resolution, instead of intituling it "An Act to provide for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company" should have intituled it "An Act to reform the statute passed in 1914 with reference to the Canadian Northern Railway Company and to amend section 24 of that Act so as to destroy its full effect and operation." That is exactly the effect of this Bill.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

I should like to ask the minister, either at the conclusion of this debate or when the Bill goes into committee, to inform the House who the real owners and pledgees of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway are. My hon. friend has that information but has not yet given it to the House. In other words, this House and the country do not know with whom this arbitration is to be carried on. We have been discussing it as if Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, whose names are well known throughout the country, are the people who are to get this money. I do not know if that is so. No one knows whether it is so. The other parties to the arbitration have not been disclosed to the House or to the country. I ask the minister to let us know whether Mackenzie and Mann own the five-sixths of this stock, and if they are the parties with whom this agreement is made. If not, who are the parties, and with whom has this stock been pledged, and for how much has it been pledged? It would be absurd, ridiculous, for Parliament to consider seriously the passing of a measure involving the purchase of a large quantity of stock which we do not have to purchase, involving the pledging of the credit of the country to an amount in the vicinity of $100,000,000, for the purpose of getting stock from certain people whose names are known to the Government but are not given to the House. My hon. friend should also tell us who are the owners of the one-sixth of the stock in regard to whom special provisions are made in the latter part of the Bill. This information is essential if the House is to pass upon this measure with any degree of intelligence.

My hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) in his enthusiasm for government ownership, evidently has not taken the trouble to read this Bill, because if he did so he would not find a single provision how this road is to be operated after it is obtained—not a line. All we have here is authority given to the Government to purchase a certain quantity of stock from some person or persons unknown, without a line of declaration of policy as to how that railway is to be operated. The Bill might well be called "An Act to reform Chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914, and to amend the agreement and stipulations in that Act which provide for the people of Canada getting the Canadian Northern Railway and all its belongings without their costing the Canadian people a cent"—and I propose to prove that beyond the shadow of a doubt. There is but one issue before this House in regard to this measure, that is whether the amendment of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is one which rightly states the previous law and the facts in this case. If it does, there is no justification for this measure, for the creation of a board of arbitrators or for the provisions under which the country is to be committed to a large payment of money. Are the statements in the amendment of my hon. friend true? Every one has assumed in this discussion that the Canadian Northern Railway is in default in its payments. What does that mean? In 1914, after a previous grant had been made to the Canadian Northern Railway the year before of fifteen millions, my hon. friend came to this House with a proposition that there should be loaned to the Canadian Northern the sum of $45,000,000. And there was submitted to the House for ratification an agreement which was made and entered into between the Canadian Northern Railway and Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann who were described as the contractors, and the Government of Canada. It was represented that when the country provided for its guarantee of $45,000,000, the whole railway question, so far as the Canadian Northern Railway was concerned, would be solved, and we would not be called upon for any more money.

We all remember how, when that proposal was made, the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) attacked the proposition in the most aggresive and energetic way. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), discussing the question at that time, declared that every dollar of the so-called stock of the Canadian Northern was watered stock and that the whole was not worth a cent. The energetic opposition of these gentlemen did not avail with the Government, and they proceeded to ratify that proposition and put through the arrangement. What was the attitude of hon. gentlemen on this side? I had the honour of moving, on behalf of the opposition, the six months' hoist to the whole measure. Later on, in the discussion upon the question, my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Ross) moved what was a reasonable proposition—that before Canada should commit herself to any such arrangement as proposed, there should be a complete and full investigation into the affairs of the Canadian Northern. That was voted down by hon. gentlemen on the other side. Supplementary to that, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) proposed to amend the proposition, so that, in addition to taking over the portion of the stock which the Government were taking at that time, which was only 40 per cent of that stock, the whole stock should be taken over, and become the property of the Dominion, the matter to be determined by arbitration. That was voted down. What answer did my hon. friends opposite make in regard to that proposition of the hon. member for St. John? Every one of them went on record, the Prime Minister and all the others, to the effect that the provisions of the statute contained in sections 22, 23 and 24 were so apt, so definite and certain that, if the Canadian Northern ever were in default, automatically, under the provisions of section 24, the title to all the assets and property of the Canadian Northern could simply by this Parliament passing legislation declaring that it was done, become the property of the Canadian people without it costing them a single cent. If that statement is true, then this legislation is entirely unnecessary. Section 22 provides as follows:

> Upon the happening of any event of default, and at any time or times while the same shall continue, it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council after such notice to the Canadian Northern as the Governor in Council may direct, to declare to be vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern.

My hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) told us, when he moved this resolution, that a very important advantage in getting this stock was that we would be able to turn out the present directors and get new ones. But he forgot to inform the House on one very important point—and were it not for the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) dealing with this question, and pointing out what the law was in 1914, the House and the country might have forgotten that the Government of Canada has greater power under the statute of 1914 than it will have under this proposed measure. In the event of default this Government can at once declare to be vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern and of any of the constituent or subsidiary companies. That power existed beyond all question. Why was it not exercised in the interests of the Canadian people? I ask the hon. Minister of Finance, or any other hon. gentleman on that side of the House, to tell me why it was not exercised last year when they gave the Canadian Northern $15,000,000 more? Why was it not exercised this year, when my hon. friend has to go to New York and pay the highest rate for money, and sell his securities at the lowest rate at which securities have been sold?

Why should my hon. friend ignore that provision, and ask the Canadian people and this Parliament to provide for the payment of money when they need not do so? Section 23 provides:

> The directors so appointed by the Governor in Council shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor in Council, and any such director may be removed and another appointed in his place. Vacancies occurring from time to time may be filled by the Governor in Council.

My hon. friend from South York could have sung his pæans of joy just as well without cost to the country, if the powers conferred upon us by chapter 20 of 1914 were exercised. But further let me call attention to section 24, which has been read to the House. The marginal note, epitomizing what the effect of the section was, reads as follows:

> Equity of redemption foreclosed on default and vested in His Majesty.

The section provides that, on default, the equity of redemption in the Canadian Northern Railway is automatically foreclosed by order of this Parliament and becomes vested in His Majesty. That is the law. I venture to say that no hon. gentleman in this House who has any regard for his status as a lawyer will venture to declare that, under the provisions of section 24, ample power of the most radical kind was not conferred on the Government by which automatically, and simply by resolution of Parliament, the whole property of the Canadian Northern would become vested in the Canadian people, without costing them a single cent. That that was the meaning of the law hon. gentlemen have shown by some of the statements made by various hon. gentlemen at that time. In the light of the rather casuistic argument made by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), I want to refer particularly to what he said that clause meant in 1914. I quote from page 3674 of Hansard:

> It is also provided by clause 24 that, if authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may, in case of default, declare that the interest of Mackenzie and Mann in the Canadian Northern Railway system is absolutely barred and foreclosed, and that all the properties and assets thereof, subject to any outstanding obligation, shall thereupon vest in the Crown, in the right of the people of Canada.

Either that meant what the right hon. gentleman said it meant, and what every hon. gentleman who reads it knows it meant, or it did not. If it meant what the Premier said at that time, then the Minister of Finance knows, as does every hon. gentleman that this legislation is totally and absolutely unnecessary, and it is intended to divert from the treasury of Canada at least $100,000,000 which ought to be there in this time of stress and war. My hon. friend from Calgary ventured to question the effect of that, and in an able speech which he delivered at that time this is what he said about it:

> They talk about the slow machinery of the courts, but look at this: "That if authorized by the Parliament of Canada," you have to come back to Parliament to foreclose. To foreclose what? About $60,000,000 of stock outstanding in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann. Our $40,000,000 is there too, and the $25,000,000 of convertible securities which may not be converted, are there also. We are going to foreclose our interest, but we have to come back to Parliament to do it. Mr. Speaker, those loyal devoted Canadians who believe that democracy's mission is not fulfilled, and that popular government is upon trial, know what that means—a long protracted lobby as to how much we are going to pay to get rid of Mackenzie and Mann.

Now, what was going to happen? We have not had the lobby with members of Parliament, but there has been some influence working from the owners of that stock, whom the people of Canada do not know, upon this Government, as the result of which they have been induced to forego the effect of section 24 of this Act, and to bring down this measure, taking from the treasury of Canada $100,000,000 which ought to be left there.

What did the Minister of Finance say in reply to the member for Calgary when he raised that very question? The minister pointed out the ridiculousness of dealing with the stock of the company. I need not delay the House by setting forth the long argument made by my hon. friend to show that the stock was no good. He said that we were getting a better thing—the assets—something that really belonged to the company. He went on to say:

> If I have a mortgage on a company's undertaking I do not care very much for the stock as security except that it is advisable to have the stock in order that I can take possession of the company, put in my own receiver, and operate the company with my own board of directors. That is the only advantage. The stock does not give any higher security, but it makes the realization of the security a little more convenient. What security have we? I have seen a good deal of financing in my time, and I know something of law although my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) does not think so, and I want to say this: I have never seen as effectual a means of entering into possession of a property upon which a mortgage is held as has been devised by the Solicitor General in connection with this transaction.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said that?

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Finance, speaking in the House on May 18, 1914, after the member for Calgary had spoken. He said further:

> I take off my hat to the Solicitor General for the way in which he has performed the legal work in connection with this transaction. . . .
> I was dealing with the question of remedy upon default, and was pointing out that we have a much better control than would be afforded by the security of a majority or all the stock of the Canadian Northern.

Although he wants to commit the Canadian people to-day to the paying of $100,000,000 for the purchase of $60,000,000 of par value stock of the Canadian Northern, he said two or three years ago that he then had a better security than could be afforded by the security of a majority of or all the stock of the Canadian Northern.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not follow my hon. friend in his reference to the $100,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: In introducing the Bill and in moving its second reading, my hon. friend elaborated the theory that the board of arbitration to be constituted would not be confined to determining the present value of the stock; that they could take into consideration the prospective value also. He indicated that he objected to the judge of the Exchequer Court dealing with this matter, suggesting that Judge Cassels was not as competent as Sir William Meredith. My hon. friend has forgotten what he said. He will permit me to call his attention to what he said on that point:

> My hon. friend says: Why not refer the matter to the Exchequer Court? If I used the same argument as my hon. friend I might ask what experience has the judge of the Exchequer Court had in practical railway matters? Judges are men who acquire an immense amount of information in connection with their judicial duties. Apart from that, evidence will be submitted to these arbitrators by the Dominion Government and by the owners and pledgees of the stock.

My hon. friend intimated that the judge of the Exchequer Court did not have any special qualifications for dealing with questions of valuation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will pardon me; I do not wish him to misquote me on a matter of that kind.

Mr. MACDONALD: I quoted what my hon. friend said.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) asked me what special qualifications Sir William Meredith had for the position of arbitrator. I said that he had had long judicial experience; that he had been in high standing as counsel; that he was eminently qualified for the position. I stated further that if the argument was to prevail that a judge was not qualified—which I did not admit—it would apply also to the judge of the Exchequer Court. I am the first to admit that any judge, whether of the Exchequer Court or of the High Court of Justice, would be a suitable arbitrator in this case.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend put it in interrogative form; he wanted to know from the House what experience the Judge of the Exchequer Court had had in practical railway matters that would fit him for the performance of this task. I mention that to point out that the Judge of the Exchequer Court is far better qualified than Sir William Meredith to act in this matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I instituted no comparison.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am instituting a comparison. I am pointing out that my hon. friend was wrong when he put these two gentlemen on a parity. Every man who has had any practice in the Exchequer Court knows that the senior judge of the Exchequer Court, during his years of experience, has passed upon the value of property of various kinds, railway property included, in connection with cases that have come before him for determination. The rules that obtain in determining the methods of appraising values are the rules that have been laid down by the Exchequer Court. An hon. gentleman mentions the fact that the matter of the Quebec and Saguenay was referred to Judge Cassels. However, I do not want to stray too far from my argument. With all due deference to Sir William Meredith, those of us who have come from other provinces can speak rather freely in regard to him. In view of the statement made by a minister of the Crown in regard to judges sitting upon commissions, we should not forget that Sir William Meredith has been engaged in all kinds of commissions. Moreover, he seems to be the favoured associate of the Ontario Government, as well as of this Administration. Nor do we forget that during the sitting of a certain commission last year, Sir William Meredith took one course with regard to compensation and the other judge took another. Although my hon. friend puts Sir William Meredith on a parity with Judge Cassels, in the estimation of the Bar of this country they are not on a parity.

The one is a man whose daily occupation has been that of determining the fair valuation of property of all kinds; the other is not. If any criticism is to be made in regard to the employment of judges upon commissions, that criticism can be directed with the greatest possible force against the gentleman whom my hon. friend puts forward as being, par excellence, the one who should deal with this matter.

In answering the member for Calgary, my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) said:

Upon default, the Order in Council at once becomes a rule of court, and is absolutely beyond question so far as its authority is concerned. We can displace the board of directors of any or all of the companies by directors of our own choice, who are given power to carry on the road as provided in the resolutions, and it is open to the Government through Parliament to deal with that road by way of sale or otherwise, as may be expedient and in the public interests.

My hon. friend declared that there was nothing in the suggestion of the member for Calgary that there might be some question about that mode of foreclosure. He expressed his admiration for the Solicitor General, who had introduced a clause that would have such a wonderful effect. Such a provision was better, he said, than if the Government had the whole of the stock of the company. Nothing further needed to be done to complete the transaction, except that Parliament should act upon the intimation of the Government whenever default occurred.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), who was quoted by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) this afternoon, spoke along practically the same lines. We have, therefore, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Solicitor General, all declaring that beyond the shadow of a doubt section 24 of the statutes of 1914 was so definite and positive in its character that all that was needed to be done in case of default was to pass an Act and automatically everything in connection with the Canadian Northern passed into the hands of the people of Canada, without any arbitration at all. My hon. friend's speech upon that point was so emphatic that my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) was carried away completely. He spoke after the Minister of Finance, and for the edification of the House, I will read the remarks he made. He said:

I venture to say that if Mackenzie and Mann and the Canadian Northern come back here next year seeking anything further, if they are not given the foreclosure—

This wonderful weapon of the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

—but are given any further assistance, there will be not a riot but a revolution in this country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There has been a war since then.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend sees what his change of front has produced.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was the Kaiser.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend does not require to shelter behind the Kaiser. He must admit he is up against the fact that automatic foreclosure, after direction of this Parliament on default of the company, would give to the Canadian people the title to this railway and all that belongs to it without costing Canada one cent. The minister need not shake his head. He need not make any specious argument to-day about the matter. He told us that the Solicitor General had performed a wonderful feat in creating this section and producing that result—and in the belief that that would be the result, his friends behind him supported him, in spite of what was stated by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) on the best of authority——

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What does the clause mean, "upon such terms as Parliament may prescribe," in the section which my hon. friend has just read? Why was that put in, if not because the equity of redemption must be considered?

Mr. MACDONALD: It was put in because Parliament would have to be satisfied that there was default, and they could then decide that the road should be foreclosed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Why was the phrase "upon such terms" inserted?

Mr. MACDONALD: That is in regard to the sale or otherwise. It was open to Parliament to hand the road over to some other railway. The discretion of Parliament was not fettered in any way; Parliament could impose any terms or conditions in regard to the whole thing. The minister cannot escape from the position he took at that time, when he emphatically declared to the House that, when Parliament spoke, everything was wiped out. That is the position of the Prime Minister, of the Solicitor General, of all hon. gentlemen opposite who discussed the legal phase of the question.

There is another phase of this matter. There appears in the Schedule of the Act an agreement entered into between Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann and His Majesty the King, under which certain covenants were made by Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann as contractors. This is one of the covenants:

> That the contractors will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim for contractors' profits, commissions or otherwise against the Canadian Northern, or against any of the constituent or subsidiary companies upon or in respect of any express or implied contract, understanding, agreement, or stipulation of any kind, heretofore or hereafter made, whereby or whereunder they, or any one or more of them, may now or hereafter be entitled to receive from the Canadian Northern, or from any of the constituent or subsidiary companies any construction profits, in respect of work heretofore undertaken, or as consideration for transfers of properties, rights or franchises, already transferred, or to be transferred under sub-clauses (a) and (b) of this clause, or for commission or remuneration for services in financing, or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released.

The importance of that release on the part of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, made jointly and severally, must be remembered at this time in the light of the fact that so far the Government have not told us who are the owners or pledgees of this stock. When the Government have given that information to the House, and stated whether those gentlemen are the owners who, in 1914, absolutely released all their claims of any kind whatever—in addition to which the abolition of their equity of redemption by this Parliament is provided for by section 24 of the statute of 1914—then we can discuss, as we shall at greater length in committee, what the full significance of section 24 is.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It is perfectly obvious, I think, from the statute that, in view of what was said in 1914, Mackenzie and Mann and Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, were the owners of this stock, and anybody who takes it, whether by pledge or contract, must have taken it subject to those covenants, and, therefore, they are in no better case than are Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was simply deferring any comment in regard to that until we were able to obtain from the Government definite information as to who are the owners of the stock. At that time Mackenzie and Mann were the owners of the stock. They disposed of forty per cent of the stock to the Government. They made the bargain for the transfer of it. If the stock is not now in their hands, the parties who hold the stock now are subject to the same conditions as those to which Mackenzie and Mann are subject and have no more rights than they had. Hon. gentlemen opposite fail to appreciate the full significance of the point I make in regard to this matter, and the result and effect of the legislation of 1914, which, in plain words, is this—that when the Canadian Northern Railway, being in default, as it is conceded they are in default, come to Parliament, Parliament can pass a statute declaring that the equity of redemption in all the property franchises and rights of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and of all their subsidary companies is absolutely debarred and forever foreclosed and become forfeit to the Crown. There is no manner of doubt about that. The Minister of Finance declared in 1914 that the Government had a better remedy than they would have if they owned the whole of the stock.

In the light of that, what do the Government do to-day? They say to Parliament: Although that is a fact, yet because the words "upon such terms and conditions, if any" are in the statute, although we said in 1914 that they did not mean anything, and that they did not affect the right of Parliament to bar the equity of redemption, yet the door is left open. And the door being left open, the lobby of which my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) has spoken, has taken place—not with hon. members in this House, but with the Government. Mackenzie and Mann have succeeded in getting the Government to introduce this legislation under which the country is committed to an arbitration with the owners and pledgees of the stock, the effect of which arbitration, according to the statement by the Minister of Finance as to the lines upon which it should be conducted, will, in my judgment, cost this country a hundred million dollars. I say, therefore, that this legislation is absolutely unnecessary. It is a crime, under existing conditions, during the war, when taxation is being levied on sources that have never been touched before, to ask this Parliament to create new conditions amending the solemn compact entered into in 1914 and declared to be the last and final contract, opening the door to arbitration, wide in its extent and ramifications, which will commit this country to the payment of such a huge amount.

What apology is made for it? The Prime Minister took the very curious ground that the Drayton-Acworth report was not to be considered, because, he said, they had no authority to make an investigation as to the value of the property. I was dumbfounded to hear him make that statement. Even supposing the Order in Council appointing these gentlemen did not contain that authority, there is not a man in this House but knows that the commission could not make an investigation on which they might base a report that would be of any value to this House and country unless they procured some data in regard to the value of the property involved. That was the very essence of the whole inquiry. The reference expressly states that the commission were to make full inquiry as to the status of each of the three transcontinental railway systems. Now could any commission make an inquiry into the status of the Canadian Northern Railway Company that would be worthy of the slightest possible consideration by this Parliament without ascertaining whether or not the assets of the company had a value equal to the liabilities? How else could you determine the status of the company? In addition to that, the commissioners were directed to have special reference to "capitalization, fixed charges and net earnings . . . and generally speaking, all matters which the members of the board may consider pertinent or relevant to the general scope of the inquiry." That was the power conferred upon the commission by the Order in Council, and I think the Prime Minister was drawing greatly upon our credulity when he ventured to ask this House to believe that we should not attach full weight to the statements of the Drayton-Acworth report in regard to value, as they were not authorized to inquire into that matter. I was astounded also at the attitude of the Minister of Finance who never mentioned this matter in speaking to the resolution or on the first reading of the Bill, but told us on the second reading that on looking over Professor Swain's report, he discovered that Messrs. Drayton and Acworth had omitted in their report some items in regard to assets and liabilities. With all deference, I would say that the House and the country ought to hear from the commissioners, Messrs. Drayton, Acworth and Smith as to whether or not the items that were omitted would seriously affect the value of property. I think we are entitled to know whether they agree with the view that their report is incorrect and misleading in that respect, and whether this House and the country should not therefore have regard to their recommendations as to the value of the property.

The commission discussed seriatim the various bases that might be considered. They say:

> A purchaser would not consider either original cost or reproduction cost as of much importance. The price he would pay would be based on earning power, present and potential. On this basis he would consider how far the Canadian Northern is at present short of covering its fixed charges, how long it will take to reach equilibrium, how much new capital will have to be spent, how soon a dividend may be expected and at what rate. Calculating on this basis, in the light of the figures set out above it is evident that no purchaser would offer for the property a sum amounting to the total of its liabilities.

In other words, the commissioners, disregarding altogether the question of the physical value, say that no purchaser of the railway would pay except upon the basis of the road's earning power, present or potential. They say further:

> We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern. If, then, the people of Canada have already found, or assumed responsibility for, the bulk of the capital; if they must needs find what further capital is required; and if they must make up for some years to come considerable deficits in net earnings, it seems logically to follow that the people of Canada should assume control of the property.

The ground upon which these gentlemen suggest arbitration was not that there was any potential value in the road. They said: These people who were originally connected with the Canadian Northern have done a lot of work and you might take into consideration the question of giving them something ex misericordia. As far as paying the stockholders for the value of the road, the commissioners say that there was no value to be paid for.

Now where do we stand? We have the statute of 1914. We have the declarations of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and the Solicitor General, that that statute provided for this Government taking over the equity of redemption in the property automatically—there would be no question of confiscation. As the hon. member for St. Antoine said in discussing the efficacy of this provision, "the axe would drop." Now why does not the "axe" "drop"? We have in addition to that, the report of Messrs. Drayton and Acworth, who declared there is nothing to arbitrate about, apart entirely from the question as to the right of Parliament to deal with this matter under the equity of redemption. Notwithstanding that, my hon. friend provides for the constitution of this tribunal. And he quoted from Professor Swain's report which dealt academically with questions of value, and said that these were elements which it would be proper for the arbitrators to take into consideration in determining the value. Further on he said:

10 p.m.

> They will not be bound to the same extent, under the language of this legislation, by the hard and fast rules of evidence, but can proceed expeditiously to the determination of the question of what is the fair value of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

It is simply another case of a commission on a commission. The history of this Government in dealing with all matters of public responsibility is simply being repeated. Instead of taking the initiative, instead of the Government dealing with the problems that come before them with force and courage, a commission is appointed, and if it makes a report that does not suit them, they appoint another commission to investigate the commission. And so, in spite of the statute, in spite of their statements, and in spite of the Drayton-Acworth report, we are to have a new commission which is not to be bound by rules of evidence, and which can decide as it pleases. There is to be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the Board of Arbitration on questions both of law and of fact. I would submit this question: How is the Supreme Court of Canada to be permitted to set aside the findings of a board of arbitrators who are not to be bound by the laws of evidence in coming to conclusions? How is the Supreme Court of Canada to determine whether or not the findings of the arbitrators in the first instance is one that can be sustained? The arbitrators would be able to say in regard to the admissibility of evidence here, and its exclusion there, "We were not bound by the rules of evidence and could listen to anything we wanted to." Of what use is an appeal made under those conditions?

Our situation is this: This Government, notwithstanding our financial position, notwithstanding all the commitments of this country in connection with the war, coolly comes to this Parliament and to the Canadian people and proposes to open the door, which was closed by themselves. The Minister of Finance initiates this proceeding and, to some people whom we do not know, says: I will give you an arbitration which will not be bound by the rules of evidence. And he puts this burden on the Canadian people in the face of the conditions I have shown. I believe that when the people of Canada know the full effect of this measure—and I trust they will learn it—they will realize that the proposition of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is one worthy of their support. We, on this side of the House, would be recreant to our duty to the people if we did not insist upon its being presented to this Parliament. Every hon. gentleman who has the best interests of Canada at heart will support that proposition when the vote comes.

Mr. FRANCIS N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, the question that is now engaging the attention of the House appears to me to be one of very great importance. It is a question that requires more information than we have to enable us to deal with it properly. A question involving some $620,000,000 appears to be treated by the Government about as I, when a boy at school would trade jack knives with a companion. They do not seem to think it is serious enough to give the people the necessary information. Local and federal governments combined, representing the people of Canada, have contributed to the construction of this road, and what the obligations are that we are now supposed to assume in addition to the money already advanced is something that it would be interesting to know. It appears to me that it would require a very complete and thorough accounting to show what we have already expended, what we are expected to expend further, and what we are going to get for it. If my information is right, we are not getting all the terminals and everything else connected with the Canadian Northern. The model city, the tunnel through Montreal mountain and the terminals on Dorchester street, I understand are not included.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The terminals are included.

Mr. McCREA: Two years ago the Canadian Northern ran a special train from Quebec to Vancouver and invited all the members, senators and others to join in the excursion for the purpose of examining the road and the country. I considered it my duty to myself and to the country to take that trip, not for my own pleasure, but for the information I might get out of it. I am bound to say, the Canadian Northern is a well built road with extremely easy grades and good curves. But I am also bound to say that whoever are responsible for two transcontinental railways being built, east of Port Arthur and west of Edmonton, were very much lacking in judgment. It is not to their credit. Whilst the road was well constructed, and with very easy grades, for the life of me I cannot see where the traffic is coming from to maintain three transcontinental railways in this country for some time to come. I think that the promoters of this road, Mackenzie and Mann, were too bright and too intelligent to have constructed a road paralleling two other roads in the hope that it was going to be a paying proposition. If the effort of Mackenzie and Mann had been confined to the prairie country, and if one transcontinental railway had been built in addition to the Canadian Pacific, I think there would have been business for two. But I do not think there is business for three. However, the three roads are built and the question is now: what is to be done with them? The Canadian Northern Railway company came to this Parliament on three different occasions since 1911. On the first occasion they got $7,000,000, the next time $15,000,000, and the next time $45,000,000. The understanding was when they got the last assistance, or guarantee, of bonds to the extent of $45,000,000, that that would be sufficient and that they would never come back. They were to be satisfied for the rest of their lives and were to carry on the road. I was talking with some representatives of Mackenzie and Mann and they still say that they are prepared to carry on the road, and that this Government are doing them a great injustice in taking it over. I do not know whether they are sincere when the say that. I doubt it myself.

We have reached a point where the Canadian Northern Railway Company cannot finance the road themselves and where they must have more money. It is proposed that instead of taking over the system under legislation passed in 1914, there shall be submitted to arbitration the question of the value of stock that has no value and never cost anything. It is water, and water is pretty cheap. I do not believe the system is right. The people believe that the country has put all the money into the road that it is worth. We have the report of gentlemen who were appointed to inquire into the matter that the road is not worth the amount of money that the country has spent on it. It has been stated on both sides of the House that all the money voted by the Governments of Canada has not gone into the construction of the road, but has, in many cases, been diverted. The gentlemen who constructed the Canadian Northern own a fishing outfit on the Pacific coast, coal mines, copper mines, and other things. Where did the money come from that went into these things outside the railway?

I am not here to accuse those gentlemen of dishonesty. I have great admiration for any men who have the energy and ability that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann have shown in the construction of this road and other things. But I am not terribly taken with all their methods of doing this business. I think that when any man or corporation or company goes to the Government of this country, either local or federal, and seeks aid, if that aid is granted the Government should see to it, and the applicants should be in honour bound to see to it, that every dollar voted is put into the road and not diverted to other uses.

The question before us is what the road will cost the country and what the country is getting for its money. There is not a man on the other side of the House who will not say that the country has spent as much money as it is worth. The wise and proper way to deal with it is to allow it to go into the hands of a receiver, and then, if there is any value in the stock, let the men who hold the stock get their value after the Government have got part of their money back. Outside of the stock there is about $100,000,000 of outstanding liabilities which this country will be expected to become responsible for when they take this road over. I ask any fair-minded man if it is reasonable for this Government to legislate for the people of Canada to become responsible for debts owed by this road, when the promoters of the road have already got more money from the Government than the road is worth. If a banker had loaned to a man or a combination of men all the money the banker was justified in letting them have, and if the banker then found that the assets of that man or company were not worth the money already advanced, would the bank undertake to pay the stockholders for their common stock, practically all water, and, furthermore, would they undertake to pay the oustanding liabilities of the borrower? No banker would act in that way. Yet, that is just what the Government are doing. Although they have advanced all the money that this road is worth or ever cost, they are prepared to arbitrate the value of its stock, which, it is a pretty well-known fact, has never cost anything.

It is said by the Government that if we were to allow the road to go into the hands of a receiver it would be detrimental to the credit of Canada. I do not know why that should affect the taxpayers of Canada so much. This would not be the first road on this continent to go into the hands of a receiver. There is scarcely one of them that has not gone into the hands of a receiver at some time, and if the present owners of this one, the promoters, are unable to carry it on and cannot find financial means to carry it on, I do not see why, especially at this particular time when the people are being taxed and doubly taxed to carry on the war and to meet other expenses, they should be asked to contribute further to the carrying on of a railroad that cannot pay its own way. The financial statement prepared by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, whether it is correct or not, shows that their earnings are more than sufficient to pay their running expenses, but they claim that there is not enough to purchase the necessary rolling stock and equipment and at the same time do the necessary repairs. Let me tell the minister that if he had millions of dollars to spend for rolling stock, he could not get it just now anywhere, and at this time of storm and stress, when the Government has difficulty in raising the necessary money to meet its obligations, I do not see any logical or sound reason why we should be asked to take over a road and to arbitrate the value of its stock. It is admitted by this report that the stock has no value. The very fact of the Government consenting to arbitrate for that stock is an admission that it has a value. They invite a value in the face of a report made by competent men who say there is no value. The Government say: We shall arbitrate and find out. The moment you admit that you will arbitrate, you admit there is a value.

As to public ownership, I do not quite agree with the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), and I think the experience of this country will go to show that it is useless to tell what foreign countries are doing. The experience of this country shows that government ownership of railways is not very desirable. The Government own a road that should be a good road and a paying one, and it would pay a good rate of profit if it were handled on business principles. If the Minister of Railways had the right to handle the road unmolested and not interfered with, and if he handled it on business principles, it would be a paying investment and he would have much less trouble. But when members of Parliament can tell him whom he should employ and whom he should discharge, when appointments are made through members of this House who want to get jobs for their friends, it is impossible to secure economical operation. If the Minister of Railways were asked he would say that he had more trouble from political interference than he has with the legitimate operation of his roads—and I do not imagine that the taking over of the Canadian Northern Railway will detract from his troubles in that respect. If such roads as the Government control could be placed under a commission, not of politicians, but of gentlemen appointed for their ability, who would be held responsible for the good management of the road, it would be possible to make that road pay, and to operate it as it should be operated—but there will have to be a very material change from anything that has taken place in the past.

But I do not understand how this Government are going to get away from the legislation passed in 1914, which appears to be plain and explicit. The terms specify just what is to be done in case of default, which has now taken place. I cannot see any reason for the legislation in the interest of the people of Canada, and that is what we are supposed to be here for—the Government is not supposed to be legislating for personal ends or for their friends. I want to say there is not a man in this House or in Canada who can sit down and calmly read over this legislation passed in 1914 and get away from the fact that we have no right to arbitrate or anything else, but only to take over this road according to the terms of the agreement if default has been made. I notice the minister questions one of the articles in connection with taking over this road. Though he made it very plain in 1914, not only in the Act, but in the explanation to the House, now he appears to put an interpretation on it entirely different from his previous statement. I should like to know whether the minister was trying to deceive the people of this country in 1914, or whether he is trying to deceive them now. It must be either one or the other. I am absolutely opposed to government ownership of anything handled as the present railway system of Canada is handled, and I am also absolutely opposed either to arbitration, or to reference to the exchequer Counrt to put any value on this stock. It has no value, and if the people who hold consider the stock has any value let them pay off the Government and they will own the road and the stock both.

It is not up to the Government of Canada, who have advanced the cash and taken proper security, to throw aside their security and take care of the people who are not secured. There appears to be about $100,000,000 of outstanding liability, but the creditors of this road did not have any guarantee from the Government of this country that they would be protected; neither did the stockholders. They have taken the common stock as collateral, I presume. The Government did not guarantee that the stock was worth a cent.

The people who hold that stock took it, probably, because they could not get anything else, and, if they can get the Government to take over the road and become responsible for all the debts, undoubtedly they have made a good trade. But what kind of trade has the country made? A very bad bargain, and the Government of the day will be responsible for it. I trust that the good sense of the Government will induce them to reconsider what they are doing. If the Canadian Northern have reached the limit, where they cannot finance their own business, let them turn the road into the hands of a receiver, and let him take care of it. If the outstanding debts and stock are worth anything, all right, but if not, the taxpayer of Canada should not be called upon to contribute any further to a matter of this kind. We have enough to take care of without that.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): After the very able speech which has been delivered by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea), and the cogent arguments which have been advanced by the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), I do not know that I should delay the House any longer. Yet, Mr. Speaker, as one representing a constituency, composed of a large majority of farmers, who will be called upon to pay further taxes in order to meet the added liabilities which this transaction brings on the people of Canada, I feel that I cannot let this legislation pass without protesting against it. First of all, I think I should characterize this transaction as a most extraordinary if not indefensible one, and I cannot do otherwise than blame my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) for having introduced this legislation at the close of a long session, and at the end of a long Parliament. This legislation will involve the country in millions, in fact in hundreds of millions, and it is thereby impairing the credit of the country, when the credit of the country is so essential to enable it to face the present crisis. I am surprised that the Minister of Finance should countenance such a piece of legislation in the midst of the greatest war which humanity has ever seen or will ever see, when Canada is involved in that war, and when all the resources of the country are needed to meet the exigencies of the war. The least we might have expected from the hon. gentleman, if he was in such a rush was that he would wait until the election had taken place, when new legislators had been elected with a fresh mandate, taking into consideration the fact that this House is far from being complete, as at least one-fourth of its membership is not here, and in the next Parliament there will be fourteen new seats in this House. Of course, we have had many instances where the Government, in the course of its administration, has paid little respect to the people of Canada. In the present instance, I do not hesitate to say that Parliament is being treated with contempt by the Government. First of all, we have presented to us the biggest transaction since the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk Pacific contracts, that has ever been brought before the House, involving the credit of the country to the extent of six hundred millions of dollars.

Yet, Sir, in answer to the inquiry whether they would lay on the table of the House the correspondence exchanged between the Government and the parties who are to profit by this transaction, the right hon. leader of this House (Sir Robert Borden) and the Minister of Finance answered, with a bland smile: "There is no such correspondence." Who in this House or in the country will believe that no correspondence has been exchanged in regard to this matter between the Government and the Canadian Northern Railway Company? You can fool some of the people all of the time; you can fool all of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all the time. There is a limit to the credulity of the people. The first documents to be laid on the Table should have been the correspondence exchanged between Mackenzie and Mann—or, if you please, the Canadian Northern Railway Company—and the Government.

Not later than yesterday—this legislation not having been fully examined, passed upon, or disposed of—my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) announced to Parliament and to the country that he had already appointed the arbitrator who was to act on behalf of the Government I have the honour of knowing Sir William Meredith, the Chief Justice of the province of Ontario. I have nothing to say against the character, the integrity or the ability of that eminent jurist. But it was stated this afternoon by the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) that one-third of the board of arbitrators was committed to value being given to the $60,000,000 worth of stock. The member for North Cape Breton should have said that more than one-third was so committed. The Canadian Northern Railway Company will appoint one arbitrator; surely that arbitrator will be for the Canadian Northern Railway Company. The Government has already appointed Sir William Meredith and instructed him through the Minister of Finance that there is value in that stock, which, however, according to the report of Messrs. Drayton and Acworth, is valueless. Therefore, two-thirds of the commission is already committed to the declaring of a value in respect of stock so referred to in the Drayton-Acworth report.

On each occasion upon which the Canadian Northern Railway Company came to Parliament for subsidies, financial aid, or Government guarantee, we were told that they were coming to Parliament for the last time. But many times they have been here for the last time; now they are again before us. I followed with some interest the remarks made by the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) yesterday. He is somewhat of an expert in railway matters, having presided for several years over the Department of Railways. According to his statement, the Canadian Northern has a credit balance of $8,000,000. Mackenzie and Mann, or the Canadian Northern Railway Company, therefore, do not require aid from the Government at this time. I believe that the member for South Renfrew was right in his remarks; I do not believe that the real claimants or the petitioners in the present instance are Mackenzie and Mann. As was stated by the member for South Renfrew—and the circumstantial evidence, in my judgment, proves it conclusively—the proposal which is being considered by the House, and which will be passed to-morrow, has been cleverly devised by bondholders, pledgees and financiers who wish to make secure their investments in an enterprise which, perhaps on account of the circumstances connected with the war, might not be altogether safe. Is it the function of Parliament to come to the rescue of financiers, bondholders and pledgees who have staked their all on a private enterprise? Is that the duty of the hour? I appeal to my hon. friends who claim to be the only loyalists in this country, is there not something more pressing than this legislation? Every morning I read in the press about meetings that are being held from one end of the country to the other, especially in those highly imperialistic centres, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, and elsewhere, where the Round Table is so predominant. I read about win-the-war meetings, at which resolutions are being vociferously passed demanding of the Government that a win-the-war cabinet be formed and that a union Government be established in order to carry us through the present dire emergency. I notice that when those meetings are held in Toronto they are generally presided over by the pledgees, financiers and bondholders of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. They are the Warwicks of the present Government; they are the makers and maybe the unmakers of this Administration, and this explains, perhaps, why the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and their majority behind them, are so anxious to obey their dictates.

When I see men playing with patriotism, with Imperialism, as the financiers and backers of the Canadian Northern Railway Company are doing, I am reminded of that little episode in the French revolution. When the famous Madame Roland was approaching the scaffold she saw the statue of Liberty, and she exclaimed as she was passing by: "O, Liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" I say, Mr. Speaker: O, Great War of 1917, O, Imperialism, O, Patriotism, how many crimes are committed in thy name in Canada! Whilst the financiers, the bondholders and the pledgees of the Canadian Northern Railway Company are agitating the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in order, as they say, to win the war, whilst they are thus diverting the attention of the public from the real facts of the case, I regret to say that the press of Canada is unfaithful to its great traditions. I stated the other day, when this resolution was introduced into the House, that the press of Canada appeared to be chloroformed on this question. I repeat that statement. The press of Canada is being chloroformed on this question; it does not rise in its might to protest against the greatest piece of villainy that was ever perpetrated by a Canadian Government.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I rise to a point of order.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Davidson): Order.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I should think the expression "villainy" is out of order, having regard to a remark made by me yesterday, and the point of order then raised by my hon. friend. My hon. friend should abide by the rules of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I accept the correction of my hon. friend, but if I had time to delve into the language used in the memorable speech delivered by my hon. friend in this House a few years ago against the Canadian Northern Railway Company, I should possibly find an expression even more severe than the one I have just used. Did not my hon. friend say, in 1914, that Parliament was legislating in order to make richer the wealthiest man in Canada, Sir William Mackenzie? I remember how my hon. friend branded him on that occasion, and his speech, which, in some respects, is a classic, inspired me at that time, and if I spoke and voted as I did in 1914, I give my hon. friend credit for convincing me, I will not say of the villainy, but of the audacity of the Government thus to give to men who had already received millions of dollars from the various governments an additional subsidy of 45 millions. The press of the country is silent on this transaction. I listened some days ago to the speech delivered by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), and he hinted that the Minister of Finance had sweetened the press for a certain purpose. That was denied, it is true, by the Minister of Finance. We have the word of denial, but we have also the accusation as between two compeers who sat in the same council. I have so far found only one paper which has dared to express its opinion on the present transaction. It is an old paper, and I do not hesitate to state this evening that in my judgment it is the most sound of all papers. I refer to the Montreal Weekly Witness, edited by Mr. J. R. Dougall, a man who, for the last fifty years, has closely followed political events in Canada. Speaking of the Canadian Northern and referring to the Minister of Finance, he says:

> Sir Thomas White has announced that he is going to buy for the country the Canadian Northern Railway, and make it a government railway, but keep it separate from the other government railways. We would like to have a great deal more information than we have about this railway and its history, so as to be able to judge of the fairness of the bargain which Sir Thomas White proposes. There are signs that it needs very careful consideration, and that Sir Thomas White himself has not given it the kind of consideration that the country would like to give it if the information was accessible. In the purchase of the railway Sir Thomas White is acting as financial agent for the people of Canada, and only a day or two after he has committed the people to the purchase of a railway worth a few hundred million, he stands up and admits in the House of Commons, without a blush, that he does not know whether the Model City Company is a part of the Canadian Northern Railway or whether it is not. Now the Model City near Montreal is representative of a very great deal in this transaction. There are subsidiary properties everywhere. In fact the enterprise is a vast network of subsidiary properties. This particular property became so valuable that it sold for a price equal to many times the cost of the tunnel under Mount Royal, owing to the magnificent entrance made possible by it to the heart of the city. Here is a company worth millions of dollars and our financial agent does not know whether it is included in the deal which he has completed or not. We might ask for instance whether Sir Thomas White knows whether the Tunnel Company is part of the purchase or whether we must pay toll to it also forever. If any individual had such a financial agent working for him, would that financial agent not lose his position the moment he acknowledged such singular inadvertence. If Sir Thomas White does not know whether the Model City property belongs to the Canadian Northern Railway or not we have no reason to suppose he knows whether a hundred and one other subsidiary companies of the system, which are really the cream of the whole business, belong to the company bought out or not. It looks very much like as if he might be allowing Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann to get away with all the cream and leave the country with an appalling—

There is something missing here.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Skimmed-milk.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, skimmed-milk. (Reading)

> The Canadian Northern was constructed, not by money supplied by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, but by grants of land and money, by provincial and Dominion legislatures, by municipal aid, and by guarantees of interest on bonds. It was built at the expense of the people of Canada who trusted the builders to use the opportunity they were giving them to make a great highway of it. What did the builders do? So far as we know—though we must confess to a great lack of knowledge which is not our fault, but which should be supplied us by the Government, for the railway itself will not supply it—so far as we are permitted to know, these men built the railway, letting the contracts for its construction to themselves, so that they might profit largely by the work, and calling it the Canadian Northern wherever it was thus overtaxed, while wherever there were signs of certain profit to be made, they formed subsidiary companies, which they kept apart from the main line, so that these profits might go into their pockets, no matter whether the main line was wrecked or not. It is generally understood that in this way these two men have made enormous personal wealth out of town sites, branch lines, and contracts let at great prices. The impression throughout the whole country is that they have in this manner milked the Canadian Northern for their own fattening and left it a gigantic failure that the country cannot see go bankrupt because provincial and Dominion guarantees are so heavily involved. Were the Canadian Northern to fail and the provinces to be called on to make good their guarantees, there is at least one province that would probably find itself bankrupt. So we must save the Northern to save British Columbia. But why should we pay Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann anything at all to secure it? Why should we not rather force them to hand over to the Government the subsidiary companies whose wealth and success was only made possible by the Dominion and provincial grants, subsidies, and guarantees? Unless the country is given a very clear statement of the whole history of the Canadian Northern finance the Government that pays anything for that railway will lose credit.

I have quoted the Montreal Witness because it is the only paper which has had the courage to present to its readers the suspicions which are permeating the public mind in regard to this transaction. I notice also that there was a meeting held the other day in the city of Toronto at which were present such firm friends of the Government as Mayor Church, Mr. T. J. Hannigan, secretary of the Hydro Electric Railway Association, Mayor H. A. Stevenson of London, and Mayor Burgoyne of St. Catharines, the latter of whom submitted the following resolution protesting against this transaction:

> Be it therefore resolved that the municipalities, members of this Hydro Electric Railway Association, representing the majority of the electors of the province of Ontario, vitally interested in transportation problems, strongly protest against the method of taking over the Canadian Northern Railway, believing that the provisions of the mortgage given by the Canadian Northern Railway in 1914 should be enforced; and that the present management should be divorced completely from further control or management of the system under whatever name it may be taken over.

So, although meetings are being held, presided over by financiers, bondholders and pledgees of the Canadian Northern Railway, such meetings being held to divert the attention of the public and ostensibly to win the war and to form a Win-the-War government, there are some innocent people in the province of Ontario, as there is an honest journalist in the city of Montreal—the editor of the Witness—to call the attention of the public to the impropriety of this huge transaction. I have stated already, and I repeat again, that that group of financiers are the masters of the present Government. They have made this Government, and have guided it since 1911. They have chosen their day and hour, and have staged the transaction to fit in well. At the end of a long and protracted session, at the close of a moribund parliament, when the country is thinking only of war, when every nerve is strained in order to win the war, they come to Parliament and press this legislation, the concomitant of the Conscription Bill. Yes, Sir, while the financiers are talking conscription and are urging its immediate application against that disloyal Quebec, their agents are here rushing through this other legislation, by which they will saddle the country with the liabilities of the company amounting to nearly $600,000,000—a little less than the war debt of Canada and at the same time the Government will by a legerdemain hand out to the company through its arbitrators possibly $60,000,000, perhaps less than that, but fortunately not more, for stock which has been declared valueless by the very commission which hon. gentlemen opposite appointed. The whole comedy has been well staged indeed. No voice is lifted up on the other side of the House to denounce the deal; they are too well chloroformed to speak. This transaction has indeed been well staged at a time when the public is absorbed by matters to which this war has given rise, when the country thinks only of war measures. It reminds me of the saying of that old Tory of Tories, the witty Dr. Johnson, that "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel."

The group of financiers who are behind this transaction are afraid of the future, and well they might be. By this measure they will get full value for their investments in a private enterprise. In a private enterprise there is always an element of risk, but under public ownership their investments are made secure for all time to come.

I listened with pleasure to the speech of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) this afternoon. I know he is sincere in his advocacy of public ownership. He has preached it during the last twenty-one years I have sat in this Parliament. But let me tell him that if he believes that public ownership as applied in this case will be of benefit to the people of this country he is believing in the unbelievable. Public ownership in the present instance is only a blind, or if he chooses a name which is being desecrated in order to help a few buccaneers. The railway situation in Canada has been acute not merely since yesterday, but for many years past. It has engrossed the attention of the Parliament of Canada ever since I came here.

There are people who believe that we have overreached ourselves, that we have built too many railways. But I am one of those who believe with my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), that the transportation necessities of this country require as many and perhaps more railways than we already have. At all events, the Government thought it wise last year to appoint a commission composed of the best men in Canada, the United States and Great Britain. They selected three experts, Sir Henry Drayton, Mr. Smith and Mr. Acworth. For weeks and months, accompanied by engineers, they travelled from one end of the country to the other. They delved into the books of the various railway systems and they were helped in that task by auditors of ability. They made a report as a result of their long and painstaking investigation. Now, this report is discarded. The Government knows that report created an impression on public opinion and that Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth have some weight with the thinking people of this country. For a few months we were told that the Government might perhaps accept the recommendations of the majority report. Then there was silence in the press and mystery in the Government councils. After this session had been called, and when the people had nearly forgotten the Drayton-Acworth report, the Government all of a sudden boldly discards it and now propose to take a step in another direction.

It is strange, Mr. Speaker, how the Government takes little stock in its own commissioners. Some years ago it appointed a judge in Winnipeg on the recommendation of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). The appointee had had a long and brilliant career at the Bar and was a man of legal acumen. This judge was appointed by the Manitoba Government to preside over an investigation concerning some of the activities of the ex-ministers in Winnipeg. He made his report and immediately the Government, knowing full well that the conclusions of that report were damaging, if not mortal, to one of the Cabinet ministers, appoints another commission to revise the report of Mr. Justice Galt. Later on a gentleman appointed by the Prime Minister in the Department of Justice, Mr. O'Connor, K.C., of Halifax, is entrusted with another mission. He is asked to report on the cold storage system of Canada. Innocently, I must say, but honestly—you will notice, Mr. Speaker, that innocence is always honest—he reports the most damaging conclusions against some of the financiers, some of the trusted friends of the Administration. The Government hastens to appoint another commission to revise the damaging report of its nominee.

As I stated a moment ago, it appointed a commission to report on the railway situation of Canada. The report has been published, and it is one which carries weight. But the Government suddenly finds that the report will not come to the rescue of those who, in 1911, formed a league to defeat the late Government and install in office the gentlemen who are now at the head of affairs. I should compare the Government to Saturn devouring his own children. Nearly every report ordered by the Government has been discarded, thrown into the waste basket; and with regard to the railway situation we are now to expect fuller information from another commission. I remember that in the old Parliament, when the Grand Trunk Pacific project was being considered by the House, the slogan invented by the late Mr. Blair against the late Mr. Cox was: "Cox cannot wait." That slogan created considerable merriment. The Tories repeated it from one end of the country to the other. Yet the late Mr. Cox, then a member of the Senate, offered on many occasions, and his offer was not accepted, to adduce proof of the untruthfulness of the slogan. But, Mr. Speaker, if it was true then that Cox could not wait, it seems ten times truer that certain buccaneers cannot wait to-day in the year of our Lord 1917. In these days of stress, when even the national credit of Canada is imperilled by the dire necessities of war, they must secure at the expense of the treasury the investments which they have made in a private enterprise. This war, with all its sorrows, has made in Canada a crop of millionaires. That explains to a certain degree the unrest of the country. The O'Connor report has lifted a veil from certain profits which in my judgment are of a nature to sow the seeds of rebellion in any country. You will remember that the French Revolution started at the bakeries in Paris. There were in those days some Flavelles who kept the corn which came from the fields of France and who allowed that corn to come in only in small quantities and by night into Paris in order to maintain high prices.

The poor people understood that there were men mean enough to speculate on the hunger of the consumers. They invaded the streets of Paris, they broke loose, and that was the beginning of the revolution. If you read the recent history of the Russian revolution, you will find that it started at the bakeries of Petrograd and Moscow. The millionaires and profiteers of this war in Canada are also, I make bold to say, sowing the seeds of revolution. The Government in this present transaction propose to arbitrate the valuation of a stock which has been declared valueless. Shall I read again, for the information of the House, the conclusions arrived at by the commissioners:

A third basis of estimate is the value of the property for sale as a going concern. A purchaser would not consider either original cost or reproduction cost as of much importance. The price he would pay would be based on earning power, present and potential. On this basis he would consider how far the Canadian Northern is at present short of covering its fixed charges, how long it will take to reach equilibrium, how much new capital will have to be spent, how soon a dividend may be expected and at what rate. Calculating on this basis, in the light of the figures set out above, it is evident that no purchaser would offer for the property a sum amounting to the total of its liabilities.

We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern.

If then the people of Canada have already found or assumed responsibility for the bulk of the capital; if they must needs find what further capital is required; and if they must make up for some years to come considerable deficits in net earnings, it seems logically to follow that the people of Canada should assume control of the property. We return later to the Canadian Northern Company in order to set out our recommendations as to its ownership and management in the future and as to the returns to be offered to the existing shareholders.

Can there be any question as to the conclusions of the commissioners? They declare here that the Canadian Northern Railway have no equity whatever and, in their recommendations, they state further:

We do not recommend that further public aid be given to the Canadian Northern as at present constituted.

The Canadian Northern common stock represents no cash investment, and has no present value, either on the basis of the cost of reproduction of the property, or on the basis of its earning power.

So, basing myself on the report of the majority of the commission, I say that the Canadian Northern Railway has no claim to have any value put on its stock or to have an arbitration to fix a value. The Minister of Finance has already discredited completely that report. He has ignored its contents. Indeed he has given to Sir William Meredith his brief, because in the speech which he delivered only yesterday he showed Sir William Meredith how value could be given to the common stock. First of all he does what the Minister of Public Works did with the Galt report, he begins by abusing the men he has appointed. He says:

Upon this finding some hon. gentlemen opposite have argued that there should be no submission to arbitration because of the calculations of the commissioners as to the value of the assets, the amount of the liabilities of the company and their opinion of its value as a going concern. But, I would point out to the House that there are certain important omissions in the Drayton-Acworth report.

Here is a report which has been prepared after long elaboration and searching investigation and my hon. friend, finding that this report goes against his friends, proclaims that very important omissions have been made. It is a pretty strong hint given to Sir William Meredith that he must find out those omissions, and he adds:

In other words, none of these things are conclusive; they are only elements in the question of what is the fair value in connection with a system such as this, which would, I think, be proper for arbitrators to take into consideration in valuing the assets and liabilities—not as determining factors but as elements in the determination of what is a fair value.

There will also be the question of the earnings of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, present earnings and prospective earnings.

Mr. Speaker, with such a brief given to Sir William Meredith, I say that two-thirds of the commission are already committed in favour of the Canadian Northern Company.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The difficulty I experience with relation to the matter is that neither the Canadian Northern Railway nor Mackenzie and Mann were heard, and if those omissions were made, is it fair that they should be given no chance to be heard in person or by counsel before the Drayton-Acworth Commission?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will refer my friend to the legislation passed by this House in 1914, which he eloquently, and myself modestly, opposed. In 1914, when the bargain was made with Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern Railway, Parliament agreed to aid it to the extent of $45,- 000,000 On what conditions? A covenant was made between the people of Canada, as represented by the Government, and the Canadian Northern Railway system. I want the Government to live up to that covenant, and I want the Canadian Northern to be made to live up to it. It was agreed that $45,000,000 of common stock should be handed to the Government. It was further agreed that the Government was to have the right to take over the road in event of default. It was set out by section 21 what would be a case of default by the Canadian Northern system. And if there was default, a certain summary procedure was to be taken and the agreement was thereby to be carried out. What does section 21 of the statute say? It reads as follows.

> The following shall be events of default within the meaning of this Act, viz.:
> (a) If the Canadian Northern shall make default in payment of the principal or interest of the guaranteed securities or any part thereof, or default in observing or performing any of the provisions of the new Trust Deed and the security constituted by the new Trust Deed shall thereby become enforceable.

I shall not proceed further. I will take the admission that I find in the speech delivered the other day by the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). He is my witness. He declared, when he introduced the resolution, that the company is not financially able to meet its liabilities. He said:

> The result is that the company is short of cash for the purpose of paying interest upon its underlying securities.

And further on he repeats:

> It is therefore unable to pay its underlying interest charges.

A little further on he says:

> In addition to this, the company has had to do a great deal of short date financing. There is outstanding, secured, for the most part, by Dominion or provincial guaranteed bonds or debentures, short term loans floated in New York or London. The amount of that ordinary, short term liability is about $100,000,000, extending over a period of two years or more. It is not possible for the company, by the issue of permanent securities, to fund that debt. Therefore, it is obliged from time to time to renew these short-term securities, and to carry on as best it may from year to year. The company have, in the past, come to the Government and asked us, as they did last year, to make them a loan of a sufficient amount to take care of the underlying interest charges and to meet the maturing instalments of principal upon rolling stock.

Sir, my best witness that the Canadian Northern Railway is to the wall at the present time, and unable to meet its liabilities, is the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). Therefore I say, according to section 21 of the Act passed in 1914, the company is in default, and if the company is in default foreclosure follows, by section 24. The marginal note of that section reads as follows:

> Equity of redemption foreclosed on default and vested in His Majesty.

And section 24 itself reads:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may, on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

Is it possible to find a sanction so clear, so precise and so much to the point as the one which is enacted by section 24? I repeat again, if there were a free press in Canada to-day the people would revolt, because the people would know what plot is being hatched at the present moment. Hon. gentlemen in this House have been quibbling, when discussing whether the company is in default or not. First, I have the definition given by the statute. Then I have the corroboration given by the very words uttered by the Finance Minister. But, Mr. Speaker, we have the description of the nature of the sanction enacted by section 24, in the speech delivered in 1914 by my hon. friend the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames). That hon. gentleman enjoys the respect of this House and of the community. I do not share his views on all political matters; I find him rather narrow in many things. But let us be frank; the hon. member from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) enjoys the respect and the confidence of the business community. He himself, is a business man. He is one of the captains of industry in the city of Montreal. When the Government are in a quandary, when they are in a bad corner, as in 1914, when they were being assailed by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), they go to the member for St. Antoine, and he generally finds the plausible explanation to save them. In 1914, after the speeches delivered by the two hon. members to whom I have alluded, the Government appealed to the member for St. Antoine to placate public opinion in Canada, because the business men were rather struck by the audacity of the Government when they came forward with a legislation by which the Canadian Northern Railway Company was again receiving such a large amount of public money. The hon. member for St. Antoine undertook to explain how easy it would be to get control of the Canadian Northern Railway system, and to brush away all pretenses they might have, if, perchance they should attempt to exact some value for their stock. Let me quote the language of my hon. friend from St. Antoine. I think it is very important that we should hear it. He said:

> What is to happen in case of default?

We were discussing then section 24. He continues:

> We have hitherto been dealing with the situation in case of success. The Government has very carefully looked ahead in regard to what might happen in case of failure.

Failure was not prophesied, but failure haunted the minds of many, and, therefore, the member for St. Antoine said:

> The Government has very carefully looked ahead to what might happen in case of failure. Ordinarily, it is a very slow process to foreclose a railroad and for the bondholders gradually to take possession of the physical assets thereof. The Government in this case, however, has supplied a method of quick procedure whereby the axe drops instantly and whereby there can be no coming back for further assistance. It is definitely stipulated in this undertaking what shall constitute any event of default. It is so clearly defined that there can be no possible misunderstanding. Should the Canadian Northern Railway fail to pay interest on the securities which are to be issued in connection with the guarantee which we are now authorizing, or should they fail to carry out any of the conditions contained in the trust deed as accompanying that guarantee, they would commit an event of default. Should the Canadian Northern, on any of the previously guaranteed securities or hereafter guaranteed securities fail to pay the interest, they would commit an event of default.

Then, comparing the action that could be taken under this section to the axe that chopped off the head of Charles I, the member for St. Antoine declared that in case of default the axe would fall upon the necks of Mackenzie and Mann. I do not see the member for St. Antoine in the House; I suppose we shall not see him during the course of this debate. I hope he will not appear to register his vote in favour of this proposal.

Our clear duty is to foreclose forthwith; to act under section 24 of the statute of 1914. We have a right to take possession of that property which the Government of Canada created with moneys out of the public treasury. The Canadian Northern Railway Company have mortgaged their property; they cannot meet the interest charges; under section 24 the Canadian people have the right to exercise foreclosure.

We should take over the road; the Government should appoint a commission to administer it. I see the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) in his seat. Speaking for myself personally, I should not be averse to the hon. gentleman's taking charge of the administration of the Canadian Northern as he has taken charge of the administration of the Intercolonial railway. Some people have found fault with him, but on the whole, although he has a blunt way of speaking, his dealings with the people of the country have been generally fair, and, as I say, I would not be opposed to entrusting to him the administration of the Canadian Northern. At any rate, that would be a lesser evil than that which is proposed under this measure.

You can describe this transaction in one sentence: Canada will be burdened with the liabilities of Mackenzie and Mann, and Mackenzie and Mann will continue to run the road. Enough assistance has been given to that system; enough millions have been handed to it. I say in all sincerity and earnestness that the financial condition of the country should make the Minister of Finance, the watch-dog of the Treasury, pause and think. We are staggering under the burdens of the war. I am surprised that some hon. gentlemen opposite smile when I make that assertion. Is it not a fact that this country is staggering under the burdens of the war? Is it not a fact this burden is felt by every man, woman and child of this generation, and that many other generations will feel it? Yet hon. gentlemen smile when I speak of the burden under which we are staggering. It is a national crime at this moment to increase the financial burden of Canada. The Minister of Finance knows that the increase of that financial burden amounts in round figures to $600,000,000. In the course of his Budget speech the minister said:

> While our national saving during the war has been gratifyingly large, it is not so great as it should have been and to-day no better advice can be offered to the public than to exercise the strictest thrift and economy.

What example is the Minister of Finance giving to the people? He preaches one doctrine and practises another. He preaches thrift and economy to the people who are overburdened by the war, and yet he spends lavishly. The Government of which he forms a part has appointed a Food Controller who, very wisely preaches economy and thrift. The Government should set the example. Speaking of the financial conditions of Canada and of our war expenditure, my hon. friend said:

> Coming next to the question of our direct war expenditure, we find that with our increasing military effort it also is continually increasing. Since the beginning of hostilities our total war outlay, including estimated and unadjusted liability to Great Britain for the maintenance of our troops at the front and inclusive of withheld pay, totals, so far as we can calculate, about $600,000,000. As the result of this large war expenditure, the net national debt of Canada, which was $336,000,000 before the outbreak of war, has risen to over $900,000,000.

And if I were to ask my hon. friend this evening what the total war debt of Canada is at this date, I am sure he would have to admit that it has passed the billion-dollar mark. Speaking further, he said:

> During the recess we successfully floated the third Canadian War Loan, an issue of $150,000,000 five per cent, twenty year bonds at 96. . . . . It is my present intention to arrange then for an issue of notes or treasury bills and if conditions are favourable offer another war loan in the early fall.
> Since the outbreak of the war we have floated in Canada domestic loans aggregating $350,000,000 and have in addition furnished $150,000,000 through our chartered banks to the Imperial Treasury to meet its commitments for munitions and supplies purchased in Canada.

Sir, we have a war debt of over $1,000,000,000, to meet which for the present we have issued war loans. For the first time—and I wish I could say for the only time in the financial history of Canada—we find the Minister of Finance, hat in hand, going to Washington to ask the American authorities to give him a slice of the Liberty Loan. Canada is paying a usurious rate of six per cent. with our bonds selling at 98. Is not my hon. friend afraid of the financial status of our country? Is he not staggered at the position we occupy to-day on this continent? When the republics of the South can borrow at par; when the Government of the United States is lending money to the warring nations of Europe, which are already restless and who have proportionately much greater loans to carry than Canada; when those loans are being issued at low rates, is the Minister of Finance not afraid of the financial position of our country? Is he not at times affrighted when he thinks of the financial obligations of the future? I will not say that such transactions as those which are being considered by the House at the present time spell bankruptcy, but they bring us very near to the verge of bankruptcy. When the Minister of Finance contemplates adding to our war debt liabilities which he could well ignore to the amount of $600,000,000, he is living in a fool's paradise. Our war debt is huge. Our expenditures are increasing every day; our taxation bills are becoming more and more exacting; yet the ordinary expenditures are still on the increase. The Minister of Finance has been brought up in a school of financiers who do not seem to know where to stop in their financial vagaries. The expenditures on Consolidated Fund Account amounted, in round figures, in 1910, to $79,000,000; in 1911, to $87,000,000; in 1912, to $98,000,000, and in 1916, after deducting interest charges caused by pensions and war necessities, to $107,000,000. I have already stated, in the course of another debate, that the Minister of Finance should, during the war, reduce the ordinary expenditures of this country by 50 per cent. If he cannot or will not do that, I beseech him to come back to the figure of our times of prosperity of 1911 or 1912 when we were not exceeding $98,000,000 of ordinary expenditure. I am sorry that I have spoken at such length—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear

Mr. LEMIEUX: More sorry however for the vote that will be given by the superloyalists who say: "Hear, hear," by the "win-the-war" members, who exploit the sentiments of the people at the present juncture in order to make it easy for Mackenzie and Mann to raid the Canadian treasury.

It was stated a moment ago that the Minister of Finance might, at least, have referred the whole matter to the Exchequer Court. I will not enlarge on that subject, but the reason why the matter is not referred to Sir Walter Cassels is no doubt, because, during recess, a matter quite similar to the present one was referred to him by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane). Every one will remember the raid made on the public treasury by the Quebec and Saguenay Railway. The matter, fortunately, for Canada, went before Sir Walter Cassels, the senior judge of the Exchequer Court, and what happened there? Although a limit had been fixed by the present Government as to the amount that should be paid to the Quebec and Saguenay, the Lotbinière and Megantic, and the Quebec and Montmorency railways, although the attorney appointed by the Government was ready to let go, Sir Walter Cassels—and I have his judgment in my hand—refused to let go and did not accept the conclusions of the Government attorney. He took the law into his own hands and declared what was the value of the Quebec and Saguenay and of the Quebec and Montmorency railways, and, with one stroke of the pen, he saved millions of dollars for the country. That explains why the same people are coming again with implementing legislation to get, by other means, what they could not get before honest Sir Walter Cassels. Sir, let it be known that the people who are to-day raiding the Canadian treasury in this transaction are the very same people who are interested in the Quebec and Saguenay railway and who will, in a few days ask the Parliament of Canada to pay them whatever money they have invested in that losing concern. The very same people were also the pledgees, the bondholders, the financiers of the Quebec and Saguenay, and it is to them that the Minister of Finance will shortly ask this Parliament to hand over another large sum of money out of the public treasury.

I repeat, if we had a free press in this country the people would know of these damnable transactions and would rise in revolt against a Government which is ruining them whilst playing on their noblest sentiments. Conscription! Win the war! Union Government!—those are but a ruse to facilitate the conspiracy of the buccaneers and rovers who are anxious to once more lay their hands on the Canadian treasury.

On the motion of Mr. R. B. Bennett, the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11.58 p.m.

Thursday, August 16, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks).

MEDICAL OFFICERS, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES:

1. What are the names and addresses of the medical men employed by the Government or the Militia Department in connection with recruiting in Prince Edward Island?

2. What pay or allowance does each of these medical men receive?

3. What is the total amount paid to each of these medical men since the beginning of the war to the present time?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Lieutenant-Colonel S. R. Jenkins, senior medical officer at Charlottetown, whose duties include the examination of recruits.

2. $4 a day.

3. $2,753.56. This sum includes the pay received by Lieutenant-Colonel Jenkins while officer in charge of the Rockhead hospital, Halifax.

THE STEAMER GRILSE.

Mr. PROULX:

Who is the officer in command of the Grilse, in the Naval Service Department, and what was his previous occupation?

Mr. HAZEN: The officer in command of H.M.C.S. Grilse is Lieutenant Commander W. Walker, R.C.N. He was formerly first lieutenant of H.M.C.S. Niobe.

LIEUT. WEBB.

Mr. PROULX:

What was the previous occupation of Lieutenant Webb, who is now in command of one of the steamers of the Naval Service?

Mr. HAZEN: This officer is not in command of any vessel. He performs the duties of naval ordnance officer at Halifax. He is a retired lieutenant, Royal Navy.

LIEUT. WOOD.

Mr. PROULX:

What was the previous occupation of Lieutenant Wood, who is now in the Naval Service Department in charge of the Acadia?

Mr. HAZEN: Was formerly a sub-lieutenant, Royal Navy Reserve, and a duly certificated officer of the mercantile marine.

THE STEAMER LAURENTIAN.

Mr. PROULX:

1. From whom did the Department of the Naval Service purchase the steamer Laurentian?

2. What was the price paid for her?

3. Was this steamer ever the property of the Government under any other name?

4. What was the price at which she was sold by the Government?

5. To whom was she sold by the Government?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd.

2. $50,000.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Answered by No. 3.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN.

Mr. GIRARD:

1. What are the names of the officers who have done recruiting duty in the district of Saguenay during the year 1916-17?
2. What were their respective ranks?
3. During what period were they on recruiting duty?
4. What were the respective salaries of these officers?
5. What amount has been paid to each of them on account of salary and expenses respectively?

Mr. GIRARD:

1. How many soldiers have been enlisted in the district of Saguenay during the year 1916?
2. How many have been discharged?
3. How many of these soldiers are now in the military service?
4. How many of them are in England or at the front?
5. How many of them are yet in this country?

Mr. FORTIER:

1. In connection with the employment of Rev. Colonel Dr. A. E. Burke by the Government as a chaplain, was he furnished with a book, or a number, of Railway Transportation Warrants such as are used by those in military service?
2. Did Rev. Dr. Burke have several of these warrants filled out in the C.P.R. office at Toronto, whereby he and some friends were routed to Winnipeg, via Chicago?
3. Did the Government pay for these trips represented by these warrants? If so, how much?
4. Has Rev. Dr. Burke been commissioned, instructed, or authorized in any way by the Government to work among the Ruthenians in Canada?
5. If so, what work is he doing, and what amount is he to receive therefor?
6. Is Rev. Dr. Burke engaged in any secret service work for the Government, or is he to be so engaged?
7. Has the Government knowledge of the presence and movements in Canada of a certain count or nobleman whose mission from abroad has to do with certain foreign-born citizens in western Canada?
8. Is Rev. Dr. Burke in any way associated with this count, or nobleman, and his work, and if so, is such association with the knowledge and approval of the Government, and are public funds to be paid therefor?

THE NATIONALIST PARTY OF QUEBEC.

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER REPUDIATING CONNECTION OR COLLUSION WITH IT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, My attention has been drawn to the statement that the Nationalist party of the province of Quebec is about to put candidates in the field on its own behalf against Liberal and Conservative candidates, and I am told the suggestion is being made that there is some collusion between the Nationalist party of the province of Quebec and my government or the friends of my government in regard to this campaign of the Nationalist party. The suggestion is also made that because the friends of the present Government and the Nationalist party both opposed Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the election of 1911 that there is now some connection or collusion and that my supporters and friends are in fact encouraging the Nationalist party of Quebec in the course which they are adopting.

I desire to make a most emphatic, unreserved, and comprehensive denial of this statement. There is not and never will be any conection or collusion whatever between my friends and supporters and those of the Nationalist party of Quebec.

I regard the attitude of the Nationalist party of Quebec in this war as unpatriotic, and I consider that it is the first duty of myself and my friends to assist in defeating that party and to prevent it, so far as we are able, from being in a position to exercise any political power in Canada.

WESTERN COAL SUPPLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): May I ask the Minister of Labour if he can give us any information as to the prospect of getting anything like the usual supply of Pennsylvania coal in the West during the coming winter. Perhaps he could make a statement later on. I have lately been in the West, and the matter is looked upon with great gravity. The people are by no means convinced that Mr. Magrath is competent to take the Government's place in this matter, and would like the minister to act up to his responsibility.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Fuel Controller reports to my department or to me as minister, and whilst not wishing to take away any prestige from my colleague as a source of information, I am quite willing to place what information I have at the disposal of my hon. friend and the House. I received this morning a report from the Fuel Controller, and to-morrow I will make a short statement of how the matter stands.

WHEAT REGULATIONS.

TELEGRAM FROM THE NON PARTISAN LEAGUE—STATEMENT BY SIR GEORGE FOSTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon.

member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) asked me a question yesterday and I replied to him that I would make a statement in the House as quickly as possible with reference to what was involved in the telegram which he read and the question which he put. I am obliged to do that in a little fuller way than simply an oral and categorical answer, in order to give the information which I think is necessary, and to give the status of the case in point.

The Non-Partisan League protest against the action of the Board of Grain Supervisors in fixing a maximum price of $2.40 for No. 1 Northern at Fort William and affirm that, as admission duty free to the United States, was made possible by Act of the Government, the advantage of the higher price in the United States should not be denied.

In normal times this position would be justifiable. But these are abnormal times and the conditions imposed by the war introduce and give force to other considerations. The British and Allied Governments are in urgent need of supplies of wheat and are appealing to Canada and the United States for their total available surplus. That appeal is accentuated by the practical impossibility of readily getting supplies from Australia, India, and Argentina on account of the difficulties of transport. To carry supplies from Atlantic ports to Great Britain and the Allies, ships have been diverted from Oriental, Australian, and Mediterranean services, and the Royal Wheat Commission are loading a large number of vessels simultaneously at Atlantic ports. An even flow of grain is necessary in order to prevent ruinous delay in the despatch of these vessels and to keep up the supply for the Allied needs.

Canada was therefore urgently pressed to forward for shipment all its surplus of the crop of 1916-17, for August delivery. This surplus was lying mainly in storage in the elevators and held for highest possible prices, and sales at greatly advanced offers were not forthcoming. The Board of Grain Supervisors, appointed to secure and facilitate the movement of this grain, faced this situation.

The United States Government had no authority for fixing prices on their side of the line pending the passage by Congress of necessary legislation, and any attempts by the Allies to purchase for present pressing needs would have unduly promoted speculative prices in that country. If no maximum price had been fixed in Canada, the attempt to purchase for pressing August delivery would have sky-rocketted wheat prices, flour would have followed wheat and bread would have followed flour, and the Allies and all consumers in Canada would have suffered for the benefit of a limited number of holders of grain in store, bought at much lower prices.

The board herefore decided to fix what many considered the high price of $2.40 for No. 1 Northern at Fort William and to stop dealing in futures on the Exchange. That action has aided in securing the required supply of wheat for the Allies and has prevented a large speculative rise in wheat, which would have been closely followed by a corresponding increase in flour and breadstuffs in Canada, which would have greatly enhanced the present high cost of living.

It appears to be a case in which the general and public interests of the vast majority must be considered paramount to the gaining by a few of a temporary higher speculative price. The board has not stopped the export of wheat by individual farmers, but has only required information of quantities and grades shipped.

The board has fixed no prices for the crop of 1917-18.

Now that the required legislation has been passed at Washington, and the Controller of Food Prices appointed, co-operation between the two countries may be expected to control and equalize the prices of wheat in both. The immediate effect of the completion of this legislation in the United States and the organization founded thereon has been to cause a rapid fall in wheat prices in that country, and to-day's transactions are below the fixed Canadian price.

As to the composition of the Board of Grain Supervisors, the Government gave the most careful consideration to that matter. The intricacies and the involved character of the business under supervision and the complex and widely extended mechanism connected therewith made it necessary to have some men intimately acquainted with the trade as members of the board, and an endeavour was made to represent fairly the consuming and producing interests. Mr. Wood, as President of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, Mr. Rathwell, as a prominent farmer of Saskatchewan, and Mr. Crerar, who is an influential member of the Grain Growers' Association, specially represent the producers' interest.

It is admitted that the fixing of a maximum price for wheat carries logically the regulation of the price of flour and other staple food products. These matters are now under consideration, and the completion of United States control legislation will render co-operation possible in the operations of the Canadian Food Controller.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. minister (Sir George Foster) has not answered the question I asked.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What was the question?

Mr. OLIVER: The question was: Is it intended to maintain the present fixed maximum price of wheat, while the price of grain in the United States is as it is, and, to continue the prohibition of export?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not intended to interfere with the orders of the Board of Control as already issued, and $2.40 is the fixed maximum price for the balance of the 1916-17 crop in store. At the present moment the price of grain, grade for grade, is less at Minneapolis than it is at Winnipeg. I think that answers my hon. friend's question.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry to say that it does not answer it yet. I want to know if the prohibition of the export of grain from Canada to the United States is to be continued.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will see that the action of the board would be absolutely nugatory, if they fixed a price of $2.40 for the wheat in storage with the purpose of getting it to the Allies, and then allowed those who held that wheat in storage to skite it off to the United States or some other country.

Mr. OLIVER: If I may be allowed to say a word on a very important question—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) had placed his question on the Order Paper in the first instance, this discussion would have been obviated.

Mr. OLIVER: Was the British Government not buying American wheat at the same time it was buying Canadian wheat? Was the price of American wheat not fifty cents higher a bushel than the fixed price on the Canadian side? If the British Government was paying that rate to the United States dealer, why should they not pay it to the Canadian dealer?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I was not aware that they were paying $2.40 for wheat in the United States. I have no information on that subject.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. OLIVER: They must have been paying it, because that was the price in the United States.

Mr. KNOWLES: With regard to the 1917-18 crop, the statement referred to the co-operation between our authorities and the United States authorities. Is it meant by that, that unless the United States fix a price, our people will not fix a price?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think we can make any statement as to what will take place contingent on something else occurring.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL.

The House resumed the debate from Wednesday, August 15, on the motion of Sir Thomas White for the second reading of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every member of this House—for that matter every citizen of Canada—has the most profound sympathy with the Prime Minister and the members of the Administration who are charged with the responsibility of carrying on the Government during the greatest conflict of all the ages, but, while our main purpose in Parliament must be to carry forward this war to a successful termination, nevertheless, side by side with that purpose there are large domestic problems which must be dealt with. The economic and financial stability of the country must be maintained, our production must be increased, and we must make every effort in our power to endeavour to at least maintain the credit of our country, and enable it to meet the demands that must be made upon it financially.

The largest domestic problem that must engage the attention of the people of this country is that connected with transportation. The war was not an inherited legacy of this Administration. It came since this Administration was called into existence, but the transportation problem, in its present acuteness, was the legacy that was inherited when this Government came into power in 1911. Any thoughtful man, reviewing the history of the past in this country, must be convinced of that fact, and my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) last night very properly put his finger upon the weak spot of the legislation that has been passed in Canada during the past fifteen or twenty years. It serves no useful purpose, Mr. Speaker, to dwell upon the past. It serves no useful purpose to endeavour to allocate blame. It is a condition, and not a theory, that confronts this country. We have four systems of rail transportation. We have the Government system, the Grand Trunk system, the Canadian Northern system and the Canadian Pacific system. We cannot, by any thought or act change those facts as they exist. They are with us, and with them are the responsibilities arising out of the legislation that called them into being. There is just this that might be said on behalf of those of us who, in the years that are past, have supported Conservative policies and programmes: that there has not been placed upon the statute books of this country, by this Government, a single Act passed by this Parliament that has had to do with the initiation of any one of those enterprises. It is true this Government had something to do with respect to the enterprises to which I have referred, but the one enterprise that the Conservative Government must be responsible for is that system known as the Canadian Pacific railway. The other two enterprises were fathered by the Liberal party in their entirety, and that party must take all the glory and blame that attach to such fatherhood. These are the facts, and it is idle at this time to discuss that question, and it serves no useful purpose to endeavour to blame one party or to approve of the action of the other party. I do not purpose to endeavour to review the legislation which has led up to the existing condition. We have spent millions of dollars in establishing terminals at Halifax, Fort William, St. John and Vancouver, and in providing rail facilities for the handling of traffic that we hope will one day come into being.

All this we have done in faith, faith being the evidence of things not seen and the substance of things hoped for. If at times our faith far outran any warrant that there might have been for it; if at times our optimism was somewhat stronger than that which our sense of caution should have induced, at least we recognize the fact: that we have provided transportation facilities in this country to meet the needs of a population at least three times greater than we now have. How to take care of that condition until the population of 7,500,000 shall have been expanded into 30,000,000 is a question that must receive careful consideration on the part of every thoughtful man in this country.

It is an elementary rule of transportation that he who uses the transportation facilities should pay for them. It is a rule of transportation that the man who travels or transports his freight or traffic should pay for that service. Unfortunately, however, the service provided far exceeds the demands made upon it and if the credit of the country is locked up behind the enterprises then the taxpayers as a whole must be called upon to pay that which, according to the principles that govern transportation, should be paid only by those who use the facilities. That is the reason why the farmer of the West must continue for many years to pay directly for the upkeep of two transportation systems that do not earn sufficient money to meet the fixed charges upon their outstanding indebtedness. That is a fixed and definite charge which, because of the creating of facilities beyond the demands of the community, must be met by the taxation of all classes, rich and poor, the farmer and the artisan. That measure of taxation is large, and it is increasing. It is something that we must meet, in every sense of the term, frankly and honestly. There is no use glossing it over; we must look it fairly in the eye.

I want to show to-day that the maintaining of the credit of the two roads to which I have referred involves a charge on the taxpayers of Canada of not less than $1,500,000 a month or $18,000,000 per annum. That enormous sum, which must be met by general taxes upon the people, should, according to every fixed rule governing transportation, be met only by those who use the facilities. It will not be. That means a direct tax upon the grain producer of the West; it means a direct tax upon the steel producer and the manufacturer of the East. Moreover—I make this observation in passing—when we placed wheat upon the free list and allowed it by reason of our Order in Council free access into the markets of the United States, at one stroke of the pen we increased the obligation that must be borne by the taxpayers of Canada as a whole. Why? Because last year the Canadian Northern alone handled 138,000,000 bushels of wheat which it moved east. If my hon. friends opposite are correct in saying that wheat will move no longer east, but south, the revenues of these transportation companies will be lessened to the extent that the hauling of that wheat east would earn. The result is an added tax upon the wheat producer—and I am not sure that he will not have to bear an added burden in the form of taxation to meet the deficit in connection with our transportation facilities to an amount equal to, if not exceeding, the benefits that will accrue to him by reason of the increased prices. That is an economic consideration that should be steadily kept in view in the discussion of matters affecting transportation.

I have in days past—in fact, at almost every session since this Parliament met—discussed at some length the history of our transportation facilities. I shall not weary the House to-day by again going over that discussion. The condition that confronts the Government, this Parliament, and the people of this country, has arisen under the circumstances to which I have alluded. I should like to correct the false impression of the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) who indicated the other evening that the war had lessened the traffic of the railways. This war had added tremendously to the revenues of the railways. When you look at the Trade and Commerce returns of Canada and observe that there has been a great expansion in our exports and a great increase in our imports, you will realize that the demands made upon our transportation facilities have accordingly increased. Hence it is that the operating revenues of the Canadian Pacific are larger this year than ever before in its history; that the operating revenues of the Canadian Northern are larger this year than ever before in its history. I regret, however, to say that last year the operating revenues of the Grand Trunk Pacific were less than the amount of money received for hire of its equipment. The surplus equipment rented produced more net revenue last year to the Grand Trunk Pacific than its operating revenue. Perhaps its location had something to do with that. The two roads in question have operated, notwithstanding the conditions of trade and commerce in this country, at a loss. The net revenue of the Canadian Northern for the year ended June 30, 1917, was something like $11,500,000, but the fixed charges against its revenues—fixed charges for interest upon its bonds, for rental of properties leased, and for equipment—amounted to the very large sum of over $15,000,000. If you add to that the interest which is not added in the blue book submitted to the House—interest upon the $15,000,000 that was loaned by the people to that road and which absorbs an additional $900,000 per annum—you will observe that the total fixed charges of the road will amount to nearly $20,000,000 per annum. If you look at page 7 of the blue book you will find the statement that there is an annual interest charge of $14,405,643.13; to that is to be added equipment obligations payable under the scheme by which a certain sum per annum of principal and interest is paid for equipment, absorbing a further sum of $3,735,000. $3,735,000 plus $14,405,000 makes $18,000,000, and to that is to be added the interest upon the loan referred to at page 11 of the blue book, $15,000,000 at six per cent per annum, making $900,000 more. So that the total sum exceeds $19,000,000 of fixed charges to maintain that system when it is completed. In the meantime its capital is being depleted by the payment of interest out of the proceeds of bonds. The delay in the completion of construction is absorbing day by day large sums by way of interest beyond what was contemplated when the terminals, for instance, at Montreal were conceived. Just that much less money, therefore, is available for construction, and the burden that must be borne by the people is greater to that extent. This $20,000,000 in round figures is the sum per annum that the Canadian Northern must earn as a surplus out of its operations to meet its fixed charges. I am advised—my judgment may not be worth very much, but my estimate of the earnings of the system was, at least, more nearly correct than that made by the Third Vice-President of the Canadian Northern railway three years ago—that we cannot hope in less than five or seven years to earn $20,000,000 of surplus in the operating of that road when it is completed, even under the very best conditions we can conceive of. $20,000,000 is a very large sum to earn by way of surplus. It means an operating revenue of nearer $80,000,000 than any other figure I can name, having regard to the newness of the system. A ratio of 100 to 25 as between gross earnings and operating expenses would not be unfair, having regard to the character of the system and the difficulties that must be experienced in the operation of a new venture.

Under these conditions, with this system in this condition, with its bonds guaranteed by the provinces and by the Dominion, with the guarantees underlying the fourth mortgage that we made in 1914, and with the additional obligation resting upon this road by reason of the outstanding securities in England being treated as being partially guaranteed by this country because of our fourth mortgage which ranks after those securities, we have to do one of three things, and there is, it seems to m , no getting away from that. We have to determine, first of all, whether or not we shall let that property go into the hands of a receiver; second, whether we shall give it financial aid, and third, whether we shall acquire the road and the stock by one of three methods:

(a) By negotiation, agreement and purchase;

(b) By expropriation;

(c) By virtue of the Statute of 1914.

So far as the question of a receivership is concerned, the Drayton-Acworth report found against it; the Minister of Finance said that it was impossible to think of a receivership in this country at this time. For my part, I have never been afraid of this bogey of a receivership. I said in 1914 that if I had my own way (which I did not have, perhaps fortunately for this country), that road would have been put into the hands of a statutory receiver; Mackenzie and Mann would have been replaced, and qualified receivers, appointed by this Parliament and subject to this Parliament, would have administered that property as a trust for the purpose of completing it, when we could have determined what we should do with it. That was the course advocated by me at that time. A receivership need not be such a bogey as it appears to be in the minds of some persons; 75 per cent of all the roads in the United States have passed through the hands of receivers, and the result of a receivership could be only one thing: It would remove from the control of the property the Mackenzie and Mann interests; it would conserve it for the people whose money built it, and it would enable the people of Canada to acquire some first hand knowledge of the whole venture, which knowledge we do not yet possess. I am, however, in the position of one who is told by men who occupy official positions—and whose opinions, by virtue of their office, are entitled to a consideration that must be denied to mine—that a receivership cannot be thought of. Some hon. gentlemen opposite agree with that view; gentlemen who have held high office hold that view, and the best consensus of opinion on this side is the same. I will, therefore, subordinate my opinion to theirs, and we shall dismiss the question of a receivership. But were I in a position of authority to-day, instead of the legislation which is now being submitted to the House, I would preserve the identity of the Canadian Northern by the appointment of a statutory receiver or statutory receivers, occupying the position that Mackenzie and Mann occupy, and I would advance such moneys as might be necessary to place the undertaking on its feet as was done in the case of the Wabash, the Rock Island, and the Chicago Great Western railways, and, those receivers' certificates would have prior claim over the interest on the 4 per cent perpetual debenture stock of the Canadian Northern and over every other security except those guaranteed by the provinces and the Dominion. Fortunately, perhaps, for this country, I have no power, but no gentleman residing outside of Canada and occupying first-class business positions, positions of the very highest importance, see any difficulty in carrying that out as a business proposition. But it will not be done, so we will dismiss it from consideration.

As to the second point, namely, giving financial aid to this road, the Canadian people are not disposed to make further loans to Mackenzie and Mann. The consensus of opinion in this Parliament and outside of it is that we have lent all the money we should lend and made all the advances we should make to those gentlemen, and that the time has come when those with whose credit and money the road has been constructed, should have, at least, a dominant voice in its administration. We must remember that the men in charge of that corporation, whether we like them or dislike them, have control, in this country, of traffic facilities measuring 9,500 miles and are in charge of annual revenues of over $40,000,000. They are but trustees. It is admitted that, although they have given some time and attention to the financing of the road and that they have done that work admirably, they have no cash investment in it; and that being the case, they occupy the position of trustees of a great enterprise for the Canadian people. As they are unable to finance it, I submit that, if the collective credit of Canada must finance the enterprise, then the people of Canada must direct how that enterprise shall be completed; how its facilities shall be used; how the traffic shall be regulated, and what shall be the character of the service it shall give to the people who have financed it. I, therefore, without further elaboration, dismiss the question of additional financial aid to the road.

I pass on to the consideration of the third alternative that presents itself to Government or to Parliament, and that is the acquisition of the property, whether it be the physical property or the stock. There were open to the Government three methods by which they could acquire the road:

(a) By agreement, negotiation and purchase;

(b) By expropriation;

(c) By the exercise of the powers conferred by Parliament upon the Government in 1914.

The Government have chosen (a) with a combination of (c). They purpose acquiring this property, or the shares that represent it, by negotiation, agreement and purchase, together with a submission to arbitration of the question as to what shall be paid for those shares and that property. I will not take up the time of the House at this moment to discuss the question of expropriation. It was open for this country to expropriate the property without reference to the statute of 1914 to which I shall presently refer. It is fair, however, to say that that method was eliminated. Let us now proceed to consider the other methods of acquiring the property. I take it that it is the common sense of Parliament that the property should be acquired; in fact, the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) contemplates an approval of the principle of the acquisition of the system. There is no doubt as to that, and my hon. friend very properly nods assent. We may, therefore, say that this House is a unit in assuming that we shall acquire control of the Canadian Northern system. That involves two questions:

1. How shall that be done?

2. How shall the price, if any, that is to be paid, be determined?

I am not in accord with the Government's legislation upon the first point, and I shall show that, upon the second point, there must be very important amendments made or this country is going to suffer enormously. That is my position with relation to those two questions.

Perhaps it might be well for me to discuss for a moment the legislation of 1914, merely for the purpose of enabling us to have a clear appreciation of the circumstances under which it was enacted.

You will remember, Sir, that at that time the owners came to Parliament and said they required $100,000,000, and if we would raise $45,000,000 they would raise $58,000,000—the proceeds of the $45,000,000 bonds we guaranteed plus the $58,000,000 being equivalent to $100,000,000. We guaranteed the $45,000,000, and as compensation for that guarantee we obtained certain benefits, and these must always be kept in mind in the consideration of the problem as it now presents itself. First, we took as security for the $45,000,000 a first specific mortgage or charge upon certain properties which are set out in the schedule to the Act. But before we did that, we created the Canadian Northern Railway system, which system was made up of a large number of companies, the names of which are set out in that schedule. In addition to that, we took a further charge upon securities that were already hypothecated for the purpose of providing for the payment of the consolidated perpetual debenture stock of the system. For instance, the telegraph system is mortgaged to the hilt, but we took the capital stock of the telegraph company and a mortgage, subsequent in point of time, of course, to the mortgage on the securities with respect to the telegraph system. And so with respect to many other matters. I will not waste the time of the House nor trespass upon the patience of hon. gentlemen except to point these things out shortly. Then we determined the capital stock of the road. We fixed it at $100,000,000. We already owned $7,000,000, and we got $33,000,000 more, which made $40,000,000 of stock in our possession in 1914. By a stroke of the legislative pen we created $23,000,000 more of stock, and that $23,000,000 of new stock added to the stock that was then held by the proprietors, made $60,000,000 of stock that remained in their hands. That $60,000,000 of stock, if the House follows me, represented $23,000,000 of new stock called into being by a stroke of the legislative pen, and our stock represented $33,000,000 which was given to us in addition to the $7,000,000 we already possessed, and the $7,000.000 we already possessed was created by the company merely passing a resolution to say that there should be $7,000,000 more. It was felt that $100,000,000 was a fair capitalization of the system. Sixty million dollars remained in the hands, as it was then said, of Mackenzie and Mann or their interests —and this is important in view of what I am to say later. That is to say, it was represented to this Parliament in 1914 that Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann, and Mackenzie, Mann and Company owned or controlled $60,000,000, being the difference between $100,000,000 and the $40,000,000 we obtained. We guaranteed bonds and issued them. Part of them were sold and part of them we took hypothecation of and gave Dominion notes on account. In other words, we advanced $10,000,000 of legal tender of Canada against $12,500,000 of those bonds to enable them to carry on their undertaking.

But that did not finish it. They came back to us again last year, and we made a demand loan of $15,000,000 at 6 per cent—and this is important in view of what I am to say later. In view of these facts, the Government has concluded— and in my judgment properly concluded—that the time had come to acquire control of the Canadian Northern company, its physical assets and properties, as well as its shares, if they could be obtained; it is not important whether we have them or not in view of the legislation. What transpired was that the Minister of Finance advised the House that the president and vice-president of the road told him they could not continue further to finance the road without assistance. That is taken for granted in view of what I have shown with respect to their fixed charges; they could not meet them, as their revenues were insufficient. It was felt by the Government in 1914 that if Canada was to give its credit to this enterprise in the manner indicated, some provision should be made whereby, in event of default being made, the Canadian people could get possession of the property into which they had put their money. I suppose some hon. gentlemen may remember my observations with respect to that. I observed that it was provided that default under section 31 arose under that trust deed in the event of there being failure to pay any charge under trust deeds or mortgages thereafter created. Now whether or not there is default on the $45,000,000 mortgage or on any other mortgage is a matter of absolute indifference to this House, for we loaned the company $15,000,000 on demand last year, and they have not paid it back. All we have to do is to ask them for it, and default is there, and that is an end of it. So we need not argue the question of default. I do not suppose any hon. gentleman would waste the time of the House asking whether or not there is default, for it is so apparent that it need not be argued.

So we have default, and there being default, there arises in the mind of this Parliament—because it is Parliament and not the Government that is charged with the responsibility—the question: What action shall we take in view of that default? The ordinary remedy for default is foreclosure. It is always open for the mortgagee to take possession, but a mortgagee's possession is always a serious matter, and in 1914 I pointed out that I objected to the terms of the clause now under consideration, for the reason that if we exercised those powers we became mortgagees in possession, and as mortgagees in possession we were liable for a strictness of accounting that in my judgment no Government and no Parliament should undertake. I made a further criticism, and it was this, that inasmuch as it is provided that in the event of default we may take possession of the physical property, there was no ready method available by which, having taken possession, we could foreclose the equity of redemption. I urged against section 24 the criticism that it could only be made effective if Parliament was in session, because it did not give to the Governor in Council any power to foreclose the equity of redemption, but vested that power in this Parliament, and every member of this House has an equal responsibility for the exercise of that power. If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions, if any, as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing foreclose the equity of redemption.

Let us for a moment ask ourselves what the foreclosure of the equity of redemption means. It merely means the wiping out of the stock; it merely means the destruction of it so far as value is concerned. Having wiped out that stock, it would only be necessary to reorganize the company in the hands of the administration, and issue capital stock to the extent that might be necessary to represent the new investment the Government was putting into it. That is what is done in every reorganization plan. Some hon. gentlemen no doubt remember the reorganization plan of the Wabash last year and of the Rock Island system and of the Chicago Great Western and, more recently, within the last few weeks, the reorganization of the Missouri Pacific. What was done in these cases was that a great financial house like Morgan's, or Kahn, Loeb & Company make the necessary cash advance, make the necessary assessment on the old capital stock, and then reorganized with a new capitalization, sometimes with no change of name for the purpose of enabling the company to continue its corporate existence and carry on its business.

That section contemplated dealing with the determination of the compensation to be paid on the foreclosure of the equity of redemption. Of course, behind that, there is the very sound principle that this is the high court of Parliament; this is the supreme court of this Dominion, and it is but in keeping with the theory of our constitution and of our institutions that when this Parliament deals with a matter, as a high court, it has the right to determine what compensation shall be paid for the foreclosure of the equity of redemption which may belong to any person with relation to any property. This high court of Parliament, sitting as the court of last resort—the tribunal of paramount importance—has the right to determine what sum shall be paid for the foreclosure of that equity. Parliament does not necessarily act by all its members sitting together and hearing the evidence. It is not necessary that we all have to sit here and hear the witnesses, to determine what value, if any, attaches to the equity of redemption. We can designate a committee, whose report we may or may not accept, or we may determine that this high court will appoint certain referees for the purpose of taking evidence and determining what value rests upon that equity.

I cannot agree with my hon. friends opposite in saying that without hearing testimony we should decide that no value attaches to that equity of redemption. To quote the words of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, we have not yet reached that "Prussian state of affairs," but we well might say: "Is this Prussia?" if we denied to any man whose property is being taken from him the right to establish that it had some value. I put it to hon. gentlemen opposite, is it consistent with the ideas of British justice and British fair play that Mackenzie and Mann, or anybody else—and I love them not—should be deprived of their property without having an opportunity to establish its value, if it has any? What would hon. gentlemen opposite like to have done to themselves? Is there a single gentleman who would like to have the equity of redemption of his farm for instance, taken from him without having an opportunity of being heard before the tribunal that takes it? Not long ago there was a case decided in the Supreme Court, from the province of Manitoba, in which the holding was that notwithstanding the fact that the equity of redemption had been barred and taken from a farmer years before, he was still permitted to come in, pay off his mortgage, and get back his property. It is somewhat dangerous—I emphasize the word—for a body of responsible gentlemen sitting in this Parliament at this time to say to the people of Canada that we deny to any person the right to establish, if he can, that there is a value to that which you take from him. There is a great feeling of unrest in this country at the present moment. Sometimes I wonder if it will find manifestation in socialism, or anarchy, or something worse. I entreat hon. gentlemen to pause before they say to the body of excited and disturbed public opinion in this country at this time, that you are going to take property from individuals, without affording them an opportunity to present their case before those referees who have been appointed or who will be appointed by this Parliament to determine the value attaching to the equity of redemption in the property foreclosed.

There is another feature I would like to mention, because it appears to me to be rather important. I wonder if any honourable gentlemen have thought, as I am sure many of you have in days gone by, upon what rests that right of every man to have presented before any tribunal to which he may be directed the value of property that may be taken from him. Let us see what the Magna Charta said about it. It is a long time ago since John met the barons at Runnymede. By article 38, of the famous document, it was enacted and declared that no man should be dispossessed of his property except by due process of law. Upon this has been laid the foundation of the Constitution of the United States, and upon this it has always been open to the poorest citizen of this realm to go to any properly constituted tribunal and ask that his rights be respected.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the Habeas Corpus?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Habeas Corpus has sometimes been suspended, but up to the present moment there has been no statutory suspension of the Magna Charta. Probably Habeas Corpus was a little later in point of time, but it is one of the great charters of the liberty of the subject.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Bill of Rights.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Bill of Rights, and all these other charters upon which rest the foundation of our liberty and our freedom——

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT—the first being Magna Charta, why should it be lightly disregarded by Parliament? The late Mr.

Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court of the United States, in dealing with a case something like this, said:

> "The equal protection of the laws—the spirit of common justice—forbids that one class should by law be compelled to suffer loss that another may gain. If the state were to seek to acquire title to these roads, under its power of eminent domain, is there any doubt that constitutional provisions would require the payment to the corporation of just compensation, that compensation being the value of the property as it stood in the markets of the world, and not as prescribed by an Act of the legislature? Is it any less a departure from the obligations of justice to seek to take not the title, but the use for the public benefit at less than its market value?"
> "Property invested in railroads is as much protected from public appropriation as any other. If taken for public uses, its value must be paid for. Constitutional guarantees, to this extent, are explicit: and in such condemnation proceedings no inquiry is permitted as to how the owners have acquired the property, provided only it be legally held by them.

And I invoke that principle, which is as old as Magna Charta, which has found application in the statutes of this country from time immemorial, and which is the fundamental basis upon which the rights of all mortgagors have been based, in favour of a just and fair opportunity being given to the Canadian Northern railway to establish their value before referees.

Unless this Bill is amended in essential provisions, in my judgment it does injustice to the Canadian people, and a most serious and violent injustice, and works a wrong the extent of which cannot be measured in dollars. Let me present the case. What is the principle of the Bill now before the House? First of all it provides for the acquisition of shares in the Canadian Northern railway. That principle is sound. The Bill, however, says that His Majesty in Council is to enter into an agreement, and that agreement is between the owners and the pledgees of not less than five-sixths of the capital stock, for a price to be determined by arbitration. Since when were pledges introduced into this Parliament? If the hon. minister makes an agreement, he can only make it with the men who own the shares, and as the owners of the shares have pledged them he is going to make the pledgees a party to this agreement, instead of utilizing the power given him under the statute to which I have just directed attention.

Why should a third party be introduced in this transaction? Why should any pledgee, however eminent, be introduced into this transaction? What do I care who may advance money in respect to these shares or what sum he may advance? This House was told in 1914 that Mackenzie, Mann & Company and Mackenzie and Mann controlled these shares or owned them, and any man who took a pledge of them took it in knowledge of the statute and of that fact, and therefore it follows that this House should exercise the power given to it to take these shares and this property without regard to the rights of pledgees whose rights have arisen only since that statute, if the facts were as stated in 1914.

Let me go further. Are these pledgees to have anything to say in fixing the value before the referees? Let me put this illustration. Suppose that in 1915 I had gone to the bank to borrow $100,000, and suppose that I had put up as collateral 800 shares of Winnipeg Street railway. That stock was then worth $209 a share; to-day it is worth $36. Suppose I supplemented my collateral in 1915 by putting up some Canadian Northern stock. Obviously, since the Street Railway shares have fallen to a lesser sum than the amount of the loan, suppose some value now attaches to the Canadian Northern Railway collateral, are the pledgees to fix the value of the shares by indicating the sum advanced upon them? Is that to be a factor in fixing the value of the stock? I submit not. I submit that the very moment that we untertake to acquire these shares by agreement with pledgees that very moment we undertook to deal with a third party with whom we should not deal. Nothing would drive me from that position. You may argue that these men are like second mortgagees, and have a right to be heard before the referee. The only right they have is the right to be paid off, so far as that is concerned. The position is clear. If we are to acquire these shares by purchase we have no right to acquire them by an agreement with a third party, and Mackenzie and Mann who may have pledged them. Let us deal with the men who are the ostensible, registered owners of the shares. It is hardly necessary to say to the Finance Minister that unless the share register shows these men as owners of shares, they have no right under the law. The only right they have is the right to register, and if they do not register, the only person to deal with is the registered owner, and no one else. That is so elementary, that no bank taking collateral ever hesitates to place upon the register the name of its manager or of the bank itself as the owner of the shares held as collateral. I object, I strenuously object, I file my objection against any effort being made to introduce before these referees who are to arbitrate values, men who are not the registered owners of shares. If somebody becomes the registered owner of shares we will deal with him and buy the shares from him. If they are pledged to somebody let these pledgees register and become owners, but do not let us introduce a third party to this transaction. That is what I have to say with reference to that first principle.

And then, why do we say we are going to acquire five-sixths of these shares? We do not need to have five-sixths of them to get control of this enterprise; to acquire control all we need to have is 51 per cent of the stock. I am going to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the income bond securities, whereby an increase of $25,000,000 of stock is provided. When this country acquires this enterprise and becomes owner of its shares, the $25,000,000 stock will acquire some value, and under the legislation of 1914 it was provided that these shares might be exchanged for income bond securities up to the 1st day of January 1919. I put this to the House in al seriousness: If we exercise the power under the statute of 1914, we destroy those shares and that right; but if, on the other hand, we buy shares, we leave that right intact, and some people with $25,000,000 of income bond certificates, are going to be able to exchange them for Canadian Northern stock for $25,000,000. Let us look at the section. Section 12, of the statute of 1914 says:

> Provided that for the purpose of exchange of Income Charge Convertible Debenture Stock, secured by trust deed made to the British Empire Trust Company, Limited, and the National Trust Company, Limited, dated 6th May, 1910, not exceeding twenty-five million dollars in all, there may, during the period of the option of exchange given by said Trust Deed to the holders of said debenture stock, viz.: The years from January 1, 1916, to January 1, 1919, inclusive, and during any extension of that period, be issued to such holders who may exercise said option, such amounts of capital stock, over and above one hundred million dollars as may be required for the purposes of such exchange, not exceeding one hundred ($100), of capital stock for one hundred dollars ($100) of debenture stock and not exceeding in all twenty-five million dollars.

This legislation does not wipe out that $25,000,000, that has not been issued, because the rights conferred by that statute still continue, and after this Government gets in its whole $60,000,000 of shares and becomes owner of $100,000,000 of shares, income bond holders scattered throughout the world, on the 31st December, 1918, can come to this country and exchange them for capital stock in the Canadian Northern railway, thereby creating a second partner in the enterprise. But if my learned and hon. friend had exercised the power given him by the statute of 1914, and taken possession of the physical property of the road as he should have done, and had exercised the power to foreclose the equity of redemption, as I submit he should have done, then, of course, that would have abolished the stock, and on a re-organization which the minister would make under the powers given by the statute that right would have been destroyed. That is as clear as anything in the world. That is the next point in the legislation.

Now I come to the third point in the legislation. We expropriate the balance of the shares beyond the five-sixths. If we can expropriate with relation to one-sixth, what difficulty is there in expropriating in relation to all? That naturally strikes any man. And if the power is given under the statute as it is, to expropriate with relation to all, why should we not exercise it instead of resorting to this new method?

The next provision is in relation to the appointment of directors, and the next principle of the Act is that no assistance shall be given until this stock is lodged by the pledgees and owners. Well, I am sure that this House has been awaiting, as I have, for some assurance that the people who are now in control of the property are not going to be continued. If we are going to advance money, and are to have power to name directors, there is nothing yet to indicate that we are going to exercise that power for the purpose of putting the present people out of business.

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And, of course, to my learned friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) and myself that is the most important thing in the world.

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the one thing we should like an assurance on. and I doubt not that before the Bill is through the House we shall have some such assurance.

Let us go a step further to the next principle that this Bill declares for. The next principle in the Bill is that the Governor in Council, without recourse to Parliament, is authorized and empowered to pay any sum of money whatever on behalf of the Canadian Northern. I submit that is not right, and not in accordance with constitutional principles, not with the great principle that we should know what we vote supplies for. The people's money should not be left in the hands of any Government, to be dealt with as they may see fit, without regard to Parliament. Parliament is responsible, and not the Government. Section 3 of the Bill reads as follows:

3. (1) So soon as the said five-sixths of the said shares have been transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway System, in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, may guarantee payment in whole or in part, and may give the obligations or securities of the Government in connection therewith.

As a matter of principle, we should have added to the section the following words: "For the year 1917-1918 not exceeding —— dollars." I make this suggestion because it is in accordance with constitutional precedent. It is not a sound doctrine that Parliament should give a blank cheque to any man, no matter how eminent he may be, with respect to domestic enterprises of a character such as this. In war time conditions differ, and it may be necessary to depart from ordinary rules, for war purposes. But the power and supervision of this Parliament must be always exercised. If Parliament is true to its traditions, and to the functions for which it is created, it should see that money is voted for a specific purpose, and that we should limit the extent to which aid must be given. That is a small point, but it is essential to consider it, as part of the principle of the Bill.

Then we come to the next principle, that of arbitration, and with regard to that question I should like to make rather extended remarks. Personally, I believe it would be better to submit this matter to arbitration than to a single judge, for a reason which I will mention to this House. A judge, under his oath of office, dealing with evidence strictly as evidence, and hearing testimony, would probably arrive at conclusions, having regard to the conditions of the law with respect to compensation (to which I shall presently refer), that might bring about results which, in my judgment, would involve very far-reaching consequences. The proposition is to appoint a tribunal composed of three men, one to be selected by Parliament, because Parliament must give its approval in general terms. The Government admits that. The railway is to appoint another member of the tribunal, and then an umpire is to be selected. That enables those arbitrators, in the very terms of the reference, to consider the whole situation, not only from the standpoint of evidence, but from their own judgment with relation to it. My hon. friend from Pictou raised a question which seemed to me to be of some importance, because he said: "How can these arbitrators arrive at conclusions based upon their own judgment?" I remembered, then, a case in which I had been interested that came from Edmonton, McKinnon vs. the Calgary and Edmonton railway. That case was carried to the Supreme Court of Canada, and is reported in 43 Supreme Court Reports, page 379. I will read a short summary of the judgments.

In expropriation proceedings under the Railway Act, the arbitrators in making their award stated that they had not found the expert evidence a valuable factor in assisting them in their conclusions, and that, after viewing the property in question they had reached their conclusion—

These were their words:

"Reasoning from their own judgment, and a few actual facts in evidence."

Hon. gentlemen will observe that this Bill uses the words "their own judgment". Those are the exact words the Supreme Court of Canada had to deal with. In the first instance, the Supreme Court of Alberta set aside the award, and increased the compensation, but the Supreme Court of Canada held that the award should be sustained, as it was not apparent from the language that the arbitrators proceeded without proper consideration of the evidence adduced, or upon what was not properly evidence. Therefore, they sustained the award. I, therefore, take it that the creation of such a tribunal of referees as I have stated would better safeguard the interests of the Canadian people, because there are few men that could be selected in Canada that, in the exercise of their own judgment, have not some knowledge of the operations of the gentlemen who own this system. I say that, under those circumstances, the selection of a tribunal to arbitrate value, rather than submission to a court, will bring about a result that, in my judgment, will be better in keeping with the desire of the Canadian people.

But let us go a step further. There is provision for an appeal, and the appeal is subject to there being a difference of opin-tion among the arbitrators. Well, why appoint an umpire, if you are going to appeal in case of disagreement? Usually, the right of appeal is not dependent upon there being a lack of unanimity, but in this case the right of appeal has been said to be subject to there being a lack of unanimity on the part of the referees or arbitrators. I am not disposed to question that. It seems to me that is a very excellent provision, but if you are going to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada upon a question of law and fact, it is also proper that the interests of this country should be very well safeguarded with respect to those three words "their own judgment." To that extent, exceeding care must be exercised before the tribunal with reference to that phase of it. If an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is granted, in my judgment there should be the right of the Crown—which I believe was the subject of a paragraph in an international arbitration on one occasion—that if the amount of the award is, in the opinion of the Crown, too large, it may repudiate the award. Some such safeguard might well be thrown about this matter, in order to fix a maximum, to give to the Crown the right, in the event of there being a difference of opinion, of declining to take up the award. It is always open to a party to say whether or not he shall take up an award; people refuse very frequently to take up awards and pay the costs. There is no reason why such a provision should not be inserted in this Bill.

These are minor matters, but I submit there is one matter which is the crux of this whole section, with relation to arbitration. What is to be arbitrated? If the House will be good enough to observe the words of the section, they are as follows:

> The said arbitrators shall determine the value of the 600,000 shares.

That raises a question of paramount importance. How is "value" to be determined? I listened to the remarks of my hon. friends opposite, and I listened to the arguments of the hon. members on this side of the House, but I received little or no light with reference to it. I read the statement of Professor Swain, in the findings of the Drayton-Acworth Commission, but with little assistance. Now, what is to be determined is the value of the shares. Let us ask ourselves first of all, what legal principles guide and determine value? The first valuation of a railway line on the American continent was in the state of Michigan, with respect to taxation matters. The state of Wisconsin then took up the question and, as this House knows, the Congress of the United States provided for the creation of a tribunal to determine the physical value of the railways of the U ited States, and they fixed how that work should be done. The State of Kansas provided how the work should be done with relation to the railways in that state, and I am going to direct the attention of this House, for a moment, to the particular observation quoted from the report of Professor Swain, by the hon. Minister of Finance. The other day that hon. minister referred to Professor Swain's report, and pointed out the difficulties that eminent gentleman mentioned in determining what constituted value. Value is one of the most difficult things in the world to determine with relation to a railway, and if this Bill goes through this House as it now stands, there is no reason, indeed, why the expectations of my hon. friend from Pictou should not be realized, and that the owners of the Canadian Northern should not get $100,000,000. Sir William Mackenzie stated the other day that the stock was worth par, and I have no hesitation in saying that, in the language of this section as it reads without limitation or restriction, I can show in fifteen minutes that they could get $100,000,000. Let us turn to what Professor Swain said with respect to value. On page 5 of his report, he says:

> To determine this physical value there are two, and only two, available bases:—
> (1) The original cost, or original cost less depreciation, according to circumstances;
> (2) The cost of reproducing the property at or about the time the valuation is made, or, the cost of reproduction new less depreciation, according to circumstances.

There are the two methods: Which one of them is to be adopted in this case? Wil' the basis of the valuation be the reproductive cost now less depreciation, or will it be the initial cost? The authorities in England and in the United States, and the authorities who have written on the subject are conclusive that what Professor Swain says on this point is absolutely correct in law. There are only two bases upon which the value should be determined: the original cost less depreciation, according to the circumstances, and the cost of reproducing the property at or about the time the valuation is made. If the eminent counsel representing the owners and pledgees of the stock appear before that tribunal, they will contend that valuation should be made upon the basis of the reproductive cost of the road to-day, less depreciation. Does this House, does the minister, for one single moment realize what that would mean? The reproductive cost of the road in war time, having regard to present values, would be a sum that would stagger the House. To safeguard the interests of the people, a clause should be placed in this legislation fixing the principle upon which this arbitration shall be held. I protest most vigorously against leaving the words of the clauses as they are, and open to such a construction. It cannot be denied that Professor Swain speaks with authority. These gentlemen, therefore, representing the owners and pledgees of the stock would come before the tribunal and pile up, day after day, evidence respecting the present reproductive cost of the property, showing the cost of structures, grades, fencing, bridges, cars and power. Let me give the House some little evidence with respect to that. I am told by authorities that no man in this House would question that the cost of labour in connection with putting in the dump alone—the grade—would be from 18 to 40 p.c. more in the year of grace 1917 than it was in pre-war times. It may be suggested that 40 per cent is an extreme figure, but those who have to do with the matter tell me that in some sections of the country labour is so scarce that it would cost 40 per cent more to get the necessary labour than it would have cost in 1913-14.

Now let us come to the question of equipment. After all what is a railroad? A railroad supplies, first, a road upon which vehicles travel; second, the vehicles upon or in which passengers and traffic are handled, and, third, an organization for the collection of the traffic and for the administration of the company's affairs. Upon the first point, the question of the road itself, my information leads me to believe that it would cost from 18 to 40 per cent more to lay a grade now than it did in pre-war times; and the cost of steel structures would be twice as much now as it was then.

Let us come to the facilities provided for the carrying of passengers by rail. I have taken the trouble to get figures as to actual cost. A passenger Pacific type engine in 1914 cost $23,350; last March the cost was $47,300. The Mikado type increased in cost from $39,250 to $48,750 in one year, from 1916 to 1917. The cost of the Santa Fe locomotive, freight type, has increased in one year $5,000. A shunting engine in June 1914 cost $16,600; to-day the cost is $30,000. A freight consolidated engine in 1914 cost $22,500; now the price is $40,000. An ordinary day coach in October, 1914, under a pre-war contract, cost $16,250; the present cost is $30,000. In 1914 the cost of steel under-frame dining cars and sleeping cars was $30,000; to-day the cost is $45,000. A steel frame box car in 1914 cost only $1,095; to-day the cost is $2,417. The following are prices paid before the war for the type of cars named:

	Each.
Wooden flat	$ 900
Wooden box	1,070
Steel platform cars	850
Steel tank cars	2,695
Van	1,880
Refrigerator	2,000
Steel pump gondolas	1,346
Otis dump coal car	1,530
Hart convertible steel car	1,200

To-day the prices are substantially from 50 to 100 per cent greater; in most cases the cost has doubled. For instance, for a 100-ton wrecking crane, such as is used on big roads, the cost in 1914 was $18,905; to-day the price is $30,130.

Now we come to rails. In 1914, 80-lb. rails cost $31.25 a ton; to-day the price is $60—if you can get them at all. In 1914, ties, No. 1, cost 52 cents; now they cost 65; ties, No. 2, cost 44 cents in 1914; now they cost 55. Angle bars, 100-lb., that cost $1.94 in 1914, now cost $3.75. So that if evidence is laid before the tribunal of the reproductive cost new of that property, the gentlemen representing the owners and pledgees will build up a cost of perhaps $600,000,000 or $700,000,000, and according to the arguments now being adduced, the difference between that sum and the bonded debt will represent the equity in these shares. It is no wonder that Sir William Mackenzie, with that Bill before him, is talking about one hundred cents on the dollar for his shares. I submit in the utmost seriousness to the Minister of Finance that he ought to provide that present reproductive cost shall not be the basis of the arbitration in respect of this property. If it is to be reproductive value, then the value must be taken upon pre-war prices, as Professor Swain says in his report. Here is a singular circumstance: A man devotes a great deal of time to a certain matter; he makes a report; he says: I have arrived at certain conclusions as to the value of this property; I have made calculations upon pre-war prices. Here are the names of my engineers; here are my values. Upon that Messrs. Drayton and Acworth make a majority report and Mr. Smith makes a minority report. But they overlook one of the paragraphs in Professor Swain's report; certain land values are not taken into consideration at all. That is very much to be regretted, for it throws doubt upon the authority of the whole report. But Professor Swain's report is valuable to the extent that he uses pre-war prices in fixing the reproductive value. Unless this legislation restricts the fixing of the value to pre-war prices on a reproductive value basis, in my judgment the door will be left open to almost any kind of decision in the world. Hon. gentlemen know that the $56,000,000 of equipment, after allowing for depreciation, could be sold to-day for much more than that amount. But that is all Professor Swain says it is worth, making allowance for pre-war prices and for depreciation.

I have some very interesting figures in regard to this matter, but I am sure that hon. gentlemen do not want me to take up the time of the House by reading them all. In 1912 the State of Kansas valued, for taxation purposes, the Union Pacific line running through that state. I have here the figures of every item with respect to it, and it may surprise the House to know how much that magnificently equipped Union Pacific line with splendid turn-outs, signals, 85-pound rails, first class ties and ballast, had taken from it for the purpose of determining the value. They took the cost of reproduction new and deducted from that the depreciation, and in that case the allowance was 75 per cent of the reproductive value as being the present value of that road. In another state lower figures were arrived at. I have here two sets of figures, but as no doubt this House does not want to listen to them, I will not read them; but every item, bridges, equipment, and so on, are carefully considered, just as those items were considered by Professor Swain in his report. It is essential, if the rights of the Canadian people are to be protected—and those rights, by virtue of the Statute of 1914, were given, not to a Government, although a Government must, under the constitution, initiate action, but to Parliament—that the Minister of Finance should leave the widest discretion to the committee so that we may surround this legislation with such safeguards as may be necessary to indicate the will of this Parliament and to prevent the will of the people being thwarted by cunningly-devised legislation—and Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann are past masters in securing by cunningly-devised words what will suit them.

[Mr. R. B. Bennett.]

I appeal to the Minister of Finance to prevent this wrong being done to the Canadian people, to prevent the cost now less the depreciation being taken, for the Canadian Northern Railway company is, as we all know, owing to its limited resources, under an enormous deferred maintenance charge, and is not kept up to the same standard of efficiency as is to be found on the Canadian Pacific to-day. I believe the Railway Commission estimated that the relative cost upon the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific, with relation to ordinary maintenance, is about one to three; but every time you neglect to supply a new rail for one that is worn and a new tie for one that is broken, my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) knows that you have an accumulation of deferred maintenance charges, and those deferred maintenance charges upon the Canadian Northern have become exceedingly large. I therefore, urge that this Parliament be permitted to exercise the widest possible latitude in surrounding this legislation with those safeguards which will ensure that the referees, in determining the value, will not have themselves confronted with a point of law which will go to the Supreme Court of Canada or to the Privy Council and be decided adversely to the people of Canada.

Anyway, this House has not yet been told what it is buying. There lies the difficulty that I am experiencing. Last year, as hon. members will remember, I asked that a report be made that would enable us to determine, with some degree of certainty, what we were buying. This last statement that has been put on the Table by the Minister of Finance is a most illuminating document. I go out to the province of British Columbia and I find some constructed lines and some lines the bonds for which are sold, and yet in regard to which nothing has been done except to buy the right of way. Has this House been told what our obligations are in British Columbia? We have assumed these obligations. The Canadian Northern is the owner of Canadian Northern Pacific stock. That will now belong to us. If you take the line from Kamloops to the Okanagan valley, a large quantity of property has been acquired. As regards British Columbia we find that there is $4,725,945.51 in the banks, and the total liabilities with respect to western lines uncompleted is only $1.612,000, so that there must be in the banks of British Columbia a large sum of money arising from the sale of securities that has to be used for the construction of terminals and lines which we are bound to construct. I should like to see before this House a statement with respect to every province of this Confederation in regard to the obligations of the Canadian Northern, a full statement, not so much of the liabilities in money, because those can be easily measured, but of the construction obligations, so that we might know what we are buying when we are acquiring the ownership of this system. The commission, however, did not deal with that. In the province of Alberta, we find that, for seven years or more, there has been lying in the banks money from the proceeds of the sale of securities for the construction of lines that are not yet built. Where are they? This House should know that. It does not know that, it knows, only in the most general way, what sums of money are lying in the bank that may be utilized for the purpose of constructing those roads. We must remember that the Privy Council has decided that that money, once it is raised on those bonds for the construction of a specific piece of road, cannot possibly be diverted to the construction of another piece. It must be used for those specific lines, and in some cases, existing facilities will be duplicated because, as the manager has told me, the pressure by the politicians was so strong that the company had to construct duplicate lines. The money is there; the lines must be constructed; we must assume the obligations. Those facts must be brought to the attention of the arbitrators when the matter is being dealt with. There must, therefore, be added to this measure a restriction and a limitation as to the method that is to be pursued with relation to the arbitration, and that the whole matter must be made subject to the legislation of 1914. My hon. friend asks: Why subject to the legislation of 1914? My answer is this: It will be remembered that the Canadian Northern Railway Company, Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann entered into a binding agreement with His Majesty the King which is set out on pages 17, 18, 19 and 20 of chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914. One of the provisions of that agreement is:

That the contractors—

That is Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited.

—will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim for contractors' profits, commissions or otherwise, against the Canadian Northern, or against any of the constituent or subsidiary companies upon or in respect of any express or implied contract—

And so on.

—or for commission or remuneration for services in financing, or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released.

That is a vital thing to consider in the arbitration, because there is nothing laid down more clearly in the books than that the cost of financing, the cost of promotion, brokers' commission, traffic development, are all matters that have to be considered in determining what the value of a property may be. This legislation which we are about to pass must be made subject in every respect to the terms and provisions of chapter 20 of the statute of 1914, so as to prevent the possibility of the difficulty arising to which I have alluded.

There are just two or three further observations I have to make, and I will then resume my seat because I have trespassed too much upon the time of the House. My submission is as follows:

1. We should not enter upon the project of acquiring shares by the method mentioned in the Bill which involves the introduction into the transaction of third parties who may be pledgees of stock, and therefore,

2. We should utilize the machinery provided by chapter 20 of the statute of 1914 at once and take possession of the physical assets or property as mortgagees in possession.

3. Parliament in the exercise of the powers given should, in appropriate terms, refer to arbitration the determination of the value of the equity of redemption represented by the balance of the capital stock of $100,000,000.

4. We should provide that in making the award regard should be had, if reproduction costs are considered, to pre-war prices only, and the submission should be made subject to the legislation of 1914.

There are other matters to which I might direct attention, but I have already trespassed entirely too long on the time of the House. In conclusion, I would entreat my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to safeguard this legislation by eliminating the pledgees and the third parties, and provide for the utilization of existing machinery and for the prevention of a wrong being done to the Canadian people by paying money to these men that should not be paid to them.

There are three things these men have done to this country. First, they have exploited the credit of the provinces to their detriment and, in some cases, to their ruin. Second, they have brought about an inflation of values by the interests they have created in places like the Model City and Port Mann, which has brought about the financial ruin of many a small holder in the old land and in this. And lastly, they have corrupted the public life of this country. They have corrupted it alike in the provinces and in the Dominion, and if the members on both sides of the House were to tell the tale of contributions that have been made to party funds, it would indeed be an enlightening and a revealing story. But I hope this will put an end to all that sort of thing. Even before the ink was dry upon the certificate of character that Sir Henry Drayton wrote for these men, one of the directors of this very road was seducing a noble young man who had gone out to do service for his country by a gift of $15,000—and that man is destroyed. That is what happened in British Columbia, and what happened in that province in relation to this system was happening also in relation to the Pacific Great Eastern. It is true that all the money went into the cost of the road; it can all be charged up to items in the ledger. But even if it cost us millions of dollars to be rid of these men in the public life of this country, I say it would be cheap for the sake of the public life of this Dominion in the midst of this great war.

But I do submit that, however great may be the millions that may accrue to the body politic, there is no excuse or reason why we should not utilize to our utmost extent the powers that we have to circumscribe and limit to the best of our ability the sums of money that may be paid to these men. I again appeal to the Opposition to once more agree that these men shall have an opportunity of presenting their case to these referees, and I appeal at the same time to the Minister of Finance to permit in committee these restrictions to be imposed on this legislation so as to prevent this country from ever again becoming, as it has been too frequently in times past, the victim of the rapacity and greed of these men.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, some three years ago I had to do intimately with legislation which concerned the subject now before the House. That legislation has had the effect of making the problem with which we are now faced perhaps not a less comprehensive but a much less intricate one. By that legislation, what formerly was a heterogeneous and more or less disconnected system was gathered together into one definite entity, and the relations of the Government of Canada to that system were once and for all clearly defined. The problem that now confronts us is of equal magnitude with that which faced us then. Its magnitude, however, we do not grasp as we did in those days, because we are now in the presence of events which infinitely transcend the difficulties of that time in relation to railways or anything else. The problem now before us is great all the same. While I have been able to give some attention to the solution of the question, I regret that I have not been able to attend the sittings of the House and to follow the debate as it has proceeded, so as to enable me to reply to all that has been urged against the policy enunciated in this Bill. I have, however, had the pleasure of listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett). With much of what he has stated I am in cordial agreement, and if he will permit me, I compliment him that in the main he has approached the subject fairly. In so far as I shall place my views in conflict with his, it will be in an endeavour to show that the objections he urges against this course, as opposed to the course that he advises, are objections that apply not with great force to the Bill that is before the House, but that would apply in an infinitely greater degree to the course which he himself recommends.

He has made complaint because we include among those who are to be made parties to the agreement, and who will consequently be bound by its provisions—the agreement which is to follow this Bill and detail the conditions upon which both parties are to proceed to the arbitration—the pledgees as well as the owners of the stock. The pledgees were included simply because they are, in an equitable sense, partial owners of the stock. The legal owners of the stock are those who are concerned with its value, and although the pledgees are only concerned to the extent of what they have in the stock, they nevertheless have an ownership in it. They have an interest in it, perhaps an interest beyond its value. I do not see any peril in including the pledgees, because for the life of me I cannot understand how the mere extent of any interest they may have in the stock has anything at all to do with the determination of the value of the stock.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I agree that it should not, but I say that it will.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am willing to trust to the arbitrators, and particularly to the Government arbitrator, the Chief Justice of Ontario. But apart from that, no matter what any bank or pledgee may have loaned against the stock, that is no element in the determination of the value of the stock. But it was thought well that inasmuch as they had an interest in the stock, they should be made, with the owners, parties to the agreement, so that all would go before the arbitration board on an equal footing and have a right to be heard. The pledgees may have advanced $1,000,000, $10,000,000, $20,000,000 or $100,000,000. That may have been their idea of a proper security at the time they advanced the money, but it has no relation whatever at this stage as to what the actual value of the stock may be. I agree with the hon. member for Calgary that an agreement with the owners of the stock would be an agreement whereby we might determine the value of the stock without reference to anybody else. But it seems to me that it is a little better and a little fairer that all who are interested in this matter should become parties to this agreement, and have the opportunity of going before the Arbitration Board and presenting such evidence that is evidence, not evidence that is no evidence at all; evidence that goes to show value, not evidence that goes to show what they at one time thought they might safely loan against the stock.

The hon. member for Calgary proceeded to refer to some income convertible bonds which occupy a relationship to this company different from the other debentures held against the road.

It is a fact, as the hon. member for Calgary says, that there exists outstanding $25,000,000 of bonds which are a charge upon the road, and that the holders of those $25,000,000 of bonds are entitled to interest on their bonds only if the earnings of the road warrant it. It is further provided in the body of the mortgage deed which secures these bonds, that the holders thereof may within a limited time exchange the bonds for common stock of the company, dollar for dollar. It is quite true that if this transaction goes through our becoming owners instead of Mackenzie and Mann does not in any way affect the position of the holders of the income convertible bonds. They occupy exactly the same relationship to the company before this transaction, as they will occupy when the transaction is completed. Consequently, they would be entitled before the first day of January, 1919, if my hon. friend's date is correct, to go to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, which will still exist, and say: "We want shares of stock in lieu of our income convertible bonds." It may be wise to take into consideration in committee whether or not that right should be abolished. I do not consider it a very substantial right. I do not think there is the faintest possibility of their exercising it. What they have now is a bond against the railway, in preference to all the stock, and I do not think they will consider that under government ownership and operation, no matter what the Government may be, that stock is going to be of greater value than $25,000,000 of bonds before the first day of January, 1919. I do not think any man in this country, or in any country on earth, will before the first day of January, 1919, exchange $25,000,000 bonds of that road for $25,000.000 of the common stock.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It is not $25,000,000 of bonds of the road; it is $25,000,000 of claim against income as earned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, it is secured on the assets of the road. They can only get dividends if the dividends are earned. The bonds are secured on the assets of the road in this way: If the road should ever go into liquidation, or be sold, they would be entitled to rank in their proper order against the proceeds of the sale. That is the security they would lose in the event of a change, so that I would regard the possibility of such an exchange within a year and a quarter as being probably non-existent.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I hope my hon. friend realizes my objection was two-fold. My second point was that it makes these men partners with us in the enterprise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there were such a possibility, it might be well for us to consider in committee the wisdom of abolishing that right, but I do not think there is any likely, or even imaginable, possibility of an exchange taking place.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Would not that be an element which would go to decrease the value of the stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be an element which would go before the board of arbitration in regard to the value of the stock. However, it seems to me there are phases worthy of much more consideration than the possibility of the holders of the mortgage bonds of the Canadian Northern exchanging them for common stock within the next year and four months.

My hon. friend also referred to the wisdom of giving the Crown the right to refuse to take up the award, by way of a precaution against the possibility of an award that the Crown in its wisdom, or as advised, would deem to be extortionate. I have the most profound respect for my hon. friend's legal opinion, and I understood him to say that it is a common law right of the Crown so to refuse. Whether that be so or not, I think, speaking individually, there is something in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary. It may be a wise precaution that the Crown should reserve the right to refuse to take up an award, should it prove extortionate. Of course, this is surrounded by some difficulties. At the same time, it seems to be worthy of consideration when we come to review the Bill in committee.

My hon. friend from Calgary proceeded to discuss the whole question of value as it would come before the board of arbitrators, and he seemed to feel that in the determination of value which will come before the board, the principles that will obtain before the tribunal to enable them to fix the value are such that there is grave possibility of a disproportionately large amount being allowed under the exceptional conditions existing at this time. He argues that the two principles upon which they can act are as stated by Professor Swain in his report, first, the actual cost of the property to be taken, less the liabilities against it, and, secondly, its reproduction cost, less what may be the liability against it. My hon. friend goes on to show that the reproduction of the physical properties of the company to-day would cost from 50 per cent to 100 per cent more than they cost before the war, and more than they would cost in normal times, and that if that principle is followed we are going to be condemned to a disproportionate price under the submission to arbitration. He also says that if the cost is to be taken it would be unfair to the country, because the cost of the road as built might far transcend what we ought to pay. I want to draw the attention of the hon. member for Calgary to the fact that we are not expropriating this road at all—let me repeat that—we are not expropriating the road. If we were expropriating it, as recommended by the hon. member for St. John, and as urged upon us by the hon. member for Welland a few days ago—I do not know whether he has changed his opinion since—if we were to expropriate this road, in my judgment the hon. member for Calgary would be quite right, and we would be bound by the principles laid down by Professor Swain in his report. That, however, is just the course we are not pursuing. We are taking the common stock of the company. Would my hon. friend from Calgary say, if the first principle is applied, that the Government of Canada or the people of Canada have anything to fear?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Since my hon. friend has asked me, I say, yes. The stock having no value as a commercial enterprise, we must have reference back to the physical assets it represents, and I fear the trouble to which I directed attention will arise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend sees the point now. We are taking the stock. We are not taking the physical assets of the company at all. If the first principle, namely, that what is paid for that stock is one of the determining principles of value, then of all the hon. gentlemen in this House, the hon. member for Calgary should be the last to fear, because he assured the House three years ago that these gentlemen paid nothing at all for the stock. If that principle is to prevail, we will get the stock for nothing, and the Government will be in possession of the $60,000,000 of stock free and without price.

Let us proceed to the second principle, the application of which he fears—that the reproduction cost, less liabilities, ought to be a determining factor. That principle has little or no application, when we are expropriating no physical property. No matter what may have been its application in regard to physical property it can have no direct application at all in relation to the common stock. That is why we take the common stock, and that is why we do not expropriate as recommended by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German).

If we were to proceed in that way, as I think was countenanced in some measure by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) himself, in his later remarks, then these very principles would redound against us and would result in a tremendous payment by this country over and above what there is any possibility of our paying by the method pursued. What the hon.

member for Calgary argued is a forcible and destructive argument against the whole principle of expropriation as advocated by certain hon. gentlemen opposite. It closes the door against following any such course as they adopt, and it shows plainly to the House that the proper course is to take the stock and not the physical assets, because the value of the stock is determined by other factors altogether, outside and above the factors which the hon. member for Calgary has explained this afternoon. It may be, as I am just reminded by the hon. member for Calgary, that in determining the value of the stock, the reproduction value of the road may be considered, that the value of the road as it stands to-day or as it would cost to reproduce it to-day, may be an element that may be of assistance to the arbitration board. No one would suggest that that should be a determining element or that the value that we should pay for that stock should be what it would cost to reproduce the Canadian Northern Railway, less the liabilities against it. Why, there are companies in Canada to-day, as there have always been, and as there are in every country, who have a surplus of assets over liabilities in huge amounts, but who, by virtue of conditions which confront them, cannot pay a dividend on their stock, and could not sell their stock for anything at all. If we expropriate the stock we expropriate the stock, and every element of value and everything that goes to reduce the value of that stock must be considered by the arbitration board that is to determine what we shall pay.

My remarks or those of any hon. member in this regard will in no way bind the tribunal. I apprehend that, at all events, the Government representative on that tribunal will know the principles by which he will be bound, without dictation from us. But it would seem very apparent to me that while what is suggested by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) may be taken into account, there must also be taken into account the fact that there is no earning power in this stock, at the present time at least, and that when stock is put on the market it is the earning power that counts rather than the surplus of assets over liabilities. Furthermore, I should expect that the board of arbitration would take into account the fact that considerable financial difficulties are likely to surround this company before the stock can have an earning power, and while no doubt it would appear that the prospective earning power would be a factor, the present earning power would be the great factor in determining the value. Indeed everything would be a factor which would be in the mind of an ordinarily shrewd investor who himself desired to buy the stock. Everything that would weigh in the market as to the value of the stock would weigh in the minds of the arbitrators in determining what the country should pay.

If there is one principle which is common to all arbitrations, if there is one principle that, better than another, expresses what is before an arbitration board or an expropriation tribunal, it is that the value of what is to be condemned is the value of that property in a fair and normal market. Consequently the proper way to approach this thing is for us to establish a tribunal which will take the value, not of the physical assets and deduct from that the liabilities, as would be the case in expropriation, but to take the stock itself and to decide what, in a fair and normal market, all things considered the potential earning power, the present earning power, the assets behind the road, the liabilities behind the road, all things considered, would be fair and reasonable for this country to pay. That is the course we are pursuing at the present time.

It appears to me that if we were to take the very course recommended by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) at the close of his address, then the arguments that he urges against this Bill, which are entirely ineffective as applied to it, would come back on his own programme with an utterly destructive force, and would put it completely out of consideration.

The chief contention against this measure on the part of some hon. gentlemen opposite is that we are not following the legislation of 1914, and that if we pursued and followed that legislation, we should now simply extinguish the equity of redemption by our own arbitrary act and come into the possession of the road. I propose to address myself to that contention for a moment. In the first place, it is generally conceded that we must deal with the stock or deal with the equity of redemption. It is very generally conceded that we cannot permit liquidation at this time, and I do not want to labour that point any longer. It is further conceded, although, in this some hon. members opposite do not concur, that we should not continue the giving out of loans as we did in previous years. I am certainly interested to hear the hon. members, especially the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), at this stage. He has never been known to agree with the Government on any course whatsoever. No matter what course we pursue he is always able to come immediately to the conclusion that it is the worse possible course to adopt; not only that, but that it is the most outrageous which we ever adopted in the whole course of our history, and each one is worse than the one before. That superlative language he applies to this Bill, and he says that, speaking for himself, he would not take over this company but would continue the loans that we made last year. He would do with the Canadian Northern railway to-day exactly what we are doing with the Grand Trunk Pacific, namely make another loan. It was only a year ago, the last time that we pursued the course to which he now has reverted, that he told us it was the diametrically wrong course to take, that we were throwing $23,000,000 at what he called broken backed companies, and that the time had come then to take over the road and for the Government to come into possession.

What is to be done in the face of an opposition that converts its policy, on a few days' or weeks' or months' notice, simply to be opposed to whatever may be the policy of the Government at the time?

I was amused also at the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). It was shown to him that only three years ago there was moved by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and seconded by himself, a resolution that the proper course to take then, before we gave any aid whatever, was to make it a condition that we might take this stock and arbitrate on its value, and that there should be a maximum of $30,000,000 fixed. When that was brought home to him in direct contradiction to the policy he advocated to-day he said: Yes, but three or four days before that, on the second reading, I moved something else altogether; I moved a long amendment to the second reading providing for a great many conditions, and this motion on the third reading should be read in the light of the motion on the second reading. And the reason he gave for the change in the motion as moved by the leader of the Opposition and seconded by himself was that it had to be changed in order to comply with the rules of Parliament; in a word, that he could not move the old amendment to the third reading as it would be ruled out of order, and the reason they changed their policy was that they had to change it to keep straight with the rules of the House. That is the newest argument I ever heard, and I commend the ingenuity of the hon. member for St. John. I invite him to apply to all these changing attitudes on the part of the Opposition, the explanation that they have to change their policy in order to comply with the rules of the House of Commons.

We had first, three years ago, a motion by the hon. gentleman from Middlesex to wait until the following session, though he admitted that that meant liquidation. Next we had a motion to refer it to arbitration. Then, immediately this Bill was brought down in this House, we had the pronouncement by three or four hon. gentlemen opposite that it should be dealt with by expropriation before the Exchequer Court, and we now have the amendment by the hon. gentleman from Renfrew (Mr. Graham) that we should abandon the first, second and third propositions, and resort to confiscation. First, procrastination, then, arbitration, then expropriation, and lastly confiscation. Such have been the policies of the hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to this railway: We did not provide for confiscation in 1914, and I hope the Parliament of Canada will never provide for confiscation, so long as Canada is a country. We provided in 1914, as one condition of the assistance we gave to the Canadian Northern, that they should place themselves within the power of this Parliament, and should submit their equity of redemption to the disposition of this Parliament. The clearly expressed meaning of section 24 of this Bill is that the equity of redemption, by consent of the company, is disposable by the Parliament of Canada, on such terms and conditions as Parliament should see fit. Now, we have to determine what these terms and conditions shall be.

It is true we have power to confiscate, but I ask, what principle should govern this Government? I answer that the principles that should govern us in disposing of the equity of redemption are the clear principles of equity and honour, and not the principle of confiscation.

It has been argued that, by the legislation of 1914, as interpreted on behalf of the Government in this House, automatically, upon default, the equity of redemption vanished by Order in Council. Where is such a provision to be found in that legislation, and who said it on the floor of the House? Certainly I never said it. I invite hon.

gentlemen, and particularly the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), to point to any sentence I uttered on that occasion which, by any possibility, could be so interpreted.

We took no such power. We made no contract to automatically extinguish the equity of redemption. Is that done in ordinary life? When payment on a mortgage is in default, is the mortgagee given power to say that the equity of redemption is at an end, and that he can extinguish it or appropriate it to himself? Is that Common Law? No, the mortgagee is compelled, by the courts and legislation of our country, to determine the value of the equity of redemption, and to see that the mortgagor gets that value. How is the value determined? It is determined by compelling the mortgagee to put the equity of redemption up for public auction, and the highest bidder becomes the owner of the equity of redemption. In ordinary life that is determined in a fair and reasonable way, by so disposing of the equity of redemption. Is that method available to us to-day? Should we have applied the method ordinarily applied in disposing of real and personal property? Will anybody suggest that we should have done it? It might have been done, and if it were what would be the result? Who in all probability would have been the highest bidder for this stock, which represents the equity of redemption of this company, if the Government had put it up for sale at public auction in the open markets of the world, even under conditions such as the present? I do not hear any answer, but I know what is in the back of the head of the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). The answer would be: the Canadian Pacific Railway. And why? Because the Canadian Pacific has more to gain by the purchase of that stock and the stock would have been worth more to them than to any other individual or company upon earth. The fair and inevitable presumption is that a resort to the method suggested would have landed that stock in the possession of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Could this Government ever have pursued that course? Would that have been in the interest of Canada? Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that should have been done? We had the power to dispose of that stock and equity of redemption as we liked by the legislation of 1914. That course was closed to us by the ordinary principles of national prudence, because this country would not now be a party to the amalgamation of the Canadian Northern with the Canadian Pacific. Consequently, some other method had to be adopted, and I appeal to the fairness of hon. gentlemen everywhere in this House and out of it, and I ask would it have been right, or decent, or honest, for this country to have stood between the holders of that stock and the purchasers of that stock, denied them a sale, and said to them: Your stock is of no value and we will appropriate it. That is confiscation, and that is the policy—and I hope the last policy—of hon. gentlemen opposite. "Oh," they say, "you have a commission, and that commission says the value of the stock is non-existant." That is the Drayton-Acworth Commission, which was appointed to investigate the whole of the affairs of three railways in this country, and to recommend to the Government what they deemed to be the better course to pursue in regard to those roads. It was not a commission appointed to determine the value of anything for purposes of appropriation. It was not a commission before whom the owners of that stock could be heard. Who ever heard, in any Parliament in any country on earth, of the value of property being determined without the owners being heard at all? Who ever heard of resorting to the report of an ex parte commission to determine the value of property in this or any other land? But the hon. gentleman from Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is in a most remarkable position. He says: I do not care whether this Drayton-Acworth report is right or wrong; it is contended by the Canadian Northern—and that has been referred to by the Minister of Finance—that there are errors in the estimation of the assets and of the liabilities of the company, but I do not know whether the Canadian Northern is right or wrong, or whether the Drayton-Acworth report is false or true. He says furthermore: I do not care, because the amendment which I have moved does not depend on the truth or falsity of the Drayton-Acworth report. But the fact is that his amendment asks this House to decide that because the Drayton-Acworth report declares the equity non-existent, therefore it has no value, and we should confiscate it. So the hon. gentleman from Renfrew is in the position before this House and the country of saying, "On the face of that report, which may be true or false—and I do not care which—I ask this country to confiscate the property, and, without compensating them in any way, make it the property of this Government."

That is not the course that tells in the end for the advantage of a nation. We are to be a borrowing country for years to come. We will require to borrow immediately after the war, and from the present time until the war ends. Are we going to make this a borrowing country by confiscating property? This property is not all held by Mackenzie and Mann, and never was, so far as I know. I am not on record as ever saying that Mackenzie and Mann owned all this stock at any time. I do not know exactly what they owned in 1914, nor exactly what they own now, but in 1914 they controlled the stock, and they control the stock to-day. They have, I understand, approximately 51 per cent of the stock, and the Government of Canada has 40 per cent of the stock, so that approximately 9 per cent of the stock is held outside. In many cases considerable sums were paid for the stock; I do not know what has been paid for it. I do know, however, that a substantial portion of the nine per cent is held overseas; is held by persons over whom Mackenzie and Mann have no control whatever. Are we, in view of the report of a commission before whom neither Mackenzie and Mann nor any of these stockholders were heard as to the value; before whom these men overseas never appeared and never could appear; are we ruthlessly to gather in their property and make it our own without paying a dollar for it? That is the amendment to which the leader of the Opposition, I suppose, presumes to commit his party. I do not know what he will have to say for himself in the presence of the people of Canada. Did he ever in the course of his administration—to his honour, be it said, he never did— on the report of any ex parte commission, confiscate the property of any man? Why does he offer to do so to-day? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what is really at the bottom of this resolution. Illogical it is; confiscatory it is; damaging it is to this country; utterly indefensible it is from every point of view. It is introduced into this House simply because a certain convention in the city of Winnipeg—a convention by no means of happy memory; a convention that many hon. gentlemen in this House will have reason to be glad to forget—in the haste of the moment decided that this was the course to take; that this was one of the ways to line the convention up against the Government. That is why this amendment is introduced and this Parliament solemnly asked to vote for it. I should like to see the communications that passed between the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and the leader of the Opposition with regard to this matter—perhaps they would account for the remarkable attitude of the member for Edmonton in respect to this amendment. A year ago he said: We ought to take over the property; to-day he says that we ought to continue to make loans, that we ought not to take over the property at all. Now he is going to vote for an amendment which says: We must take over the property and confiscate the value of the shares. Three positions in twelve months, in order to get in line with this historic convention that has done dishonour to the part of Canada from which I come. Certain hon. gentlemen opposite will be sorry that they ever were within the four walls of that convention hall.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I assert here, upon my word, that not a communication passed between the member for Edmonton and myself during that convention, except what was published in the papers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Except the famous telegram?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Except that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the right hon. gentleman's telegram, which expressed the view that the resolutions were highly satisfactory, cover this resolution with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway stock?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I had not seen the resolution at that time; I must say. It referred not to that resolution, but to another.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have been in doubt whether the words "highly satisfactory" referred to that illustrious war resolution, or whether they had general application. However, that point is cleared up at last. As there has been no request from the hon. member for Edmonton or from that convention that the leader of the Opposition depart from the principles of his own political life; that he depart from all the many policies that he has enunciated with regard to the Canadian Northern and resort at last to confiscation as the policy of his party, I hope that he himself will be found voting against this amendment. If it is not found in party necessity, certainly there is no reason for the amendment, either in justice or in common sense.

The terms of the agreement which will follow this measure will be entirely within the jurisdiction of and may be dictated by the Government; the shareholders, if they do not adhere to the terms stipulated in the agreement, will have to submit to the other alternative. Under the agreement the Government and the people of Canada will become, in effect, the owners of some 9,500 miles of railway and of about twenty-nine different companies operating various national utilities in every part of Canada. In proportion to our population, we become I think, the owners and operators of the largest system in any country in the world. We are entering upon a tremendous undertaking, an undertaking that will demand the energy, the co-operation and the strength of the Canadian people; an undertaking that will be difficult, but which, if it fairly succeeds, will redound to the honour of this country. I know that there are objections to government ownership and to government operation. I believe that those objections are largely removed by retaining the corporate entity instead of providing for direct government ownership and operation. That is a fundamental requirement of the Drayton-Acworth report and of the Smith report; and that is why in the main, we adopt this method of disposing of the equity of redemption. If we followed specifically the Act of 1914, the Canadian Northern Railway Company would still continue to exist but it would not own the Canadian Northern Railway; that would be owned directly by the Government of Canada and would require to be operated by the Government or be subjected to the control of a new company created for the purpose. The method we follow under this Bill is in principle and in substantial effect the method devised and outlined by section 24 of the legislation of 1914. If we followed it literally rather than in this parallel way, we would for all practical purposes abolish the company; we would become directly the owners of the road. Furthermore, if in disposing of the equity in that way we had resort to arbitration, it would be the physical value that would count; we would not get the advantage that we get by bringing the matter before an arbitration board in the form of stock rather than in the form of an equity. We get an advantage by taking the stock instead of taking the physical road. Therefore, while in principle and in effect we follow precisely the line of section 24 of the Act of 1914, we do not follow it literally. In this way we meet the fundamentally important and essential condition laid down by the Drayton-Acworth report and we avoid the disasters pictured this afternoon by the member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett).

I invite the House, therefore, to the consideration of this Bill as it is, and to the adoption of the motion for the second reading. When we get into committee the subjects brought to our attention by the member for Calgary can be fully and in detail considered. In my humble judgment, we are indebted to him for directing our attention to some of the points to which he referred, which may well receive favourable consideration at the hands of the committee. In the main, however, the principle of this Bill is sound. It is better to take this step rather than to continue making advances to the road. There will be disadvantages, but rather than continue as we have been doing we had better take this step. The public, I believe, demand that we do so. The public have a right to say whether we should allow the private management to continue, or whether we should enter upon public ownership of this road. That is what the second reading of this Bill means.

The passing of this Bill will mark a tremendous advance in the domestic affairs of Canada. It will put this country in a position of advance, perhaps, of any other country in the world, outside of Germany, in respect of government ownership of utilities. It will enable us to show, once and for all, whether government ownership of a tremendous enterprise like this is or is not a sound principle

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, my views on the principle of the Bill before the House are so well known that probably little would be gained by my taking up the time of the House this afternoon in enlarging upon them. As I realize that it is desired that a vote should be taken before six o'clock, I shall occupy the attention of the House for only a few minutes.

In 1914 I directed some attention to the subject now under discussion, as to whether or not it was advisable that Canada should take a first step in the acquisition of her railroads, or whether it was advisable that we should go on as we have been doing for many years, that is, subsidizing the railroads in this country. At the time I spoke in 1914, I had given some consideration and research to the problem of public ownership of railways in Canada, and I was not unaware of the divergence of views there had been in the past as to whether or not government ownership was a wise thing in this country. I quite appreciate the fact that, in the early days, Papineau, the great French leader, was opposed to public ownership. I realize also what a struggle there was in the 50's and 60's in Canada as to whether the Government should themselves construct or whether they should permit private capital to construct those great new highways of steam that were coming into existence. Any one who has read the history of Nova Scotia cannot be blind to the fact that Joseph Howe, that brilliant statesman, put up a magnificent fight that the railroads should belong to the people; that they should control those highways, and he felt that otherwise, in the days to come, they would be a source of corruption and irregularities in the public life of Canada. Sir Francis Hincks, the Inspector General of Upper Canada, seems to have held very divergent views on the subject. In the early days he was in favour of public ownership of railroads, but after coming into contact with a great contracting firm in England, he seems to have changed his views, and when the project of the Grand Trunk railway was launched in Upper Canada he leaned to the view that it should be constructed by private enterprise rather than by the Government. It is, however, of very little avail to discuss to-day the question as to which of those men were right or wrong. When one compares the history of the 60's with that of 1917, one must be impressed by the fact that the men of the former generation had exactly the same problems to face that confront us here to-day. Subsequently to the construction of the Grand Trunk railway, Canada was confronted with the problem whether she should take over the railroad or whether she should give aid. She guaranteed bonds; she gave subsidies; she assisted in every way possible the needs of the railway, but the lessons of those days seem to have been forgotten in the later period of our history, and we have plunged into an orgy of giving cash subsidies and guaranteeing bonds that has brought us for solution the problem which the men of the sixties had to face.

To give the House some idea of the progress Government ownership and operation of railroads has made, I might direct the attention of the House to the fact that in 1880 there were in the world only 10,000 miles of railways under Government operation and ownership, whereas at the present time there are 225,000 miles of railways under Government operation and ownership. Sweden, Germany, Italy—practically all—in all 55—the great countries of the world now own or operate their railways. I would be wrong if I were to say that they all do, because I would leave out the two great countries of the world that have not yet adopted a policy of government ownership. I refer to Great Britain and the United States, and yet the trend in that direction is so strong that it was but a year ago, when I was at a lunch given by Sir John Hadfield's firm to certain visiting parliamentary delegates in England, that I heard Sir John Hadfield say that, if England were to maintain her position in the industrial world after the termination of this war, it was absolutely necessary that she should control and operate her railroads. The war has demonstrated that this is practical and possible, because when the war broke out and England realized that she must control her transportation, she took over and put under the control of the managers of the railways, representative business men and representatives of the War Office, the entire railway undertaking of Great Britain, and I do not believe any man will deny that that course has worked satisfactorily and well. The United States still maintains a system of private ownership and operation. That system is well entrenched there, and the railway interests have a great hold on the legislative bodies of the United States. I cannot say how soon that hold will be loosened. My good friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) this afternoon drew the attention of the House to the fact that many of the American railroads had gone through the hands of the receivers, and that would seem to indicate that private ownership in the United States has not been the success that might be desired for it. We in Canada, in taking over this railway, are taking a great step forward, and if I understand aright the purport of the Bill, there are two great principles in it. The first is that Canada should assume the ownership of this railway, and indirectly, through a board of directors, operate it, the object being to have the advantage of public ownership without the disadvantages, to free the railroad as far as possible from political influence or interference. The other great underlying principle of the Bill is that, if the stock has any value, the men who own the stock should be paid for their property.

As to the first principle, I think I have made it abundantly clear that I approve it, and as to the second principle, I wish to take the same position as I took in this House in 1914, and that is, if Mackenzie and Mann—I do not think there is any gentleman here who is carried away with the belief that I have any serious love for them—can prove that this stock has any value, they should be paid for it. That is my position here this afternoon.

I am opposed to the amendment as offered by the Opposition, because I think it enunciates the principle that, because a tribunal, on ex parte evidence that did not represent the views of all interested, reached the conclusion that a man's property was worth nothing, the State, by the inherent power that it has, should deprive that man of his property, without a hearing and an opportunity to prove its value. That is not sound, and it is not a wise doctrine to promulgate in this country. Whether this matter should be referred to the Exchequer Court or whether the value of this road should be determined by arbitration is a question on which much might be said on either side. That is a matter of detail. But if a tribunal is properly constituted—and that is indicated by the fact that Sir William Meredith is to represent the Government on it—the matter will be fairly investigated and a fair price reached for the stock of the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. PROULX: May I ask a question?

Mr. NICKLE: If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed, I will answer questions after I have finished my remarks. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) stated that we should not enter upon the project of acquiring shares by the method mentioned in the Bill which, involved the introduction into the transaction of third parties, pledgees of stock. His point does not impress me, and I am not influenced by the same fear with which he is seized. The mere fact of making the pledgees parties to the agreement in no way enunciates the principle that, because the pledgees have advanced money on a stock, ipso facto that stock has a value. In my judgment, it makes no difference in the world as to the value of a stock whether, if it is handed over to me as collateral security, I advance 75 per cent on it, or whether I advance 10 per cent. If the stock is to be taken over by arbitration, the inherent value of the stock, not the amount of money I advanced on it, is the determining factor, and if I understand aright the principle of the Bill, that is what the Minister of Finance understands by the second paragraph of section 4. In fairness to the pledgees, he further says: if you wish to appear before the tribunal and be heard, that is your privilege. You have advanced money on this security and you have certain rights. I do not purpose taking those rights away from you arbitrarily and without your being heard, but the value of the stock is in no way determined or influenced by what you advanced, its value is what it is worth to-day in the markets of the world as a stock.

I am not so confident, however, as to whether or not the hon. member for Calgary is not right in his second position, namely, that the cost of reconstruction is not something that might well be directed to the attention of the arbitrators in determining the value. You will observe, Sir, that subsection 2 of paragraph 4 says:

> The said arbitrators shall determine the value of the said six hundred thousand shares as of the date of the said agreement, and the said arbitrators shall proceed in a summary way and may apply their own judgment in determining such value, and may receive with respect thereto such reports and statements authenticated in such way as they may decide and such evidence as they may deem necessary or helpful, examine witnesses under oath and hear parties by counsel or representatives, and the unanimous determination of the arbitrators shall be final.

It seems to me it might be advocated before the arbitrators on the part of the company that this stock has a potential value, that it has a potential earning power; and that, as the great bulk of the money that had gone into the undertaking had gone into it when the materials were less valuable than they are to-day, in determining the value of the stock, the present value of the physical assets as such should be considered as well as the potentialities of the road. It seems to me, therefore, that that is a matter that might have the attention of the Solicitor General and the Minister of Finance, so that when the measure comes before the House in committee they might be in a position to advise us as to what the best legal advisors of the Government think in reference to this contention.

The five minutes that I promised to take have more than run, but I would again like to aver that my vote shall be cast in favour of the Bill, because I think it declares for a very long step in the advancement of Canada's policy in reference to her railway construction, maintenance and operation.

Mr. PROULX: Would not the hon. gentleman have as much confidence in a judge of the Exchequer Court as in Sir William Meredith?

Mr. NICKLE: I think each man is first-class, and it is a matter of indifference to me which is appointed.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Graham.

The amendment moved by Mr. Graham was declared lost on the following division:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I did not rise to record my vote, Mr. Speaker, because I did not see my pair, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) present in the House, but as I saw him afterwards voting, I asked the clerk to record my vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. NESBITT: I was paired with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I was paired with the hon. member for Grenville (Hon. J. D. Reid). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McLEOD: I was paired with the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

The motion of Sir Thomas White for the second reading of the Bill was declared carried on the same division reversed:

Bill No. 125 was thereupon read a second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—His Majesty may acquire 600,000 shares of common stock.

Mr. GRAHAM: Before His Majesty acquires these shares of capital stock, I think we ought to have some assurance from the Government that contractors who have just claims against Mackenzie and Mann, either as contractors or as owners of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway should be paid. Mackenzie, Mann & Company as contractors construct the road for Mackenzie and Mann as owners. There are various subsidiary companies making up the Canadian Northern Railway system. In the different provinces the road, main line and branches, has been constructed under charters with different names. In Ontario it is called the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway, in Quebec the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway. In British Columbia the road was constructed under a provincial charter, called the Canadian Northern Pacific Railway. These several companies make up the Canadian Northern Railway system. Mackenzie, Mann & Company as contractors constructed most of these lines for Mackenzie and Mann as owners of the railway. My contention is that the Government, in taking over all this property, takes the place of Mackenzie, Mann & Company, contractors, or Mackenzie and Mann, owners of the road, and should become responsible for all their just liabilities. I pointed out on the second reading that, of necessity, the Government will have to assume these liabilities. Several contractors who have performed work in this connection claim that they have not received their pay and have not been able to make any progress during the last two or three years towards getting their money. I know the Government could say in taking over the Canadian Northern Railway system that technically it is not responsible for the liabilities of Mackenzie and Mann as contractors or of any of their sub-contractors. But this is the situation: If the Government is taking over, under a statute, property which has not been paid for, it certainly should pay for that property; buying the capital stock from the holders of the capital stock does not at all relieve the Government but rather involves the Government in the payment of these accounts. I do not pretend to say that every hatched-up account or every account that can be hatched up should be paid by the Government, but I do say that where a contractor proves a legitimate claim this Government cannot in equity refuse to pay that contractor for work done on the highway that the government is taking over under statute. If these same men had built a house, as mechanics, they would have taken liens on the house, and no matter who purchased the house the liens would be enforceable. So I say, that although as railway contractors they cannot take liens on this property; in equity the Government ought to pay to these contractors every just claim.

Mr. MORPHY: Would not such items as the hon. gentleman refers to be deducted from the value of the stock in the ultimate analysis? In that case the money, if paid to the creditors, would really come out of what would be going to Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. GRAHAM: I care not particularly where it comes from so long as it goes to the man who did the work and cannot get his pay.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman not think it would be so actually?

Mr. GRAHAM: Technically and legally I suppose that would be the way to do it. In other words, the account might be treated as if it were garnisheed by the contractor, and the amount payable for the capital stock be reduced to that extent and the money paid to the contractors.

Mr. WEBSTER: How about the contractors from Brockville to Westport?

Mr. GRAHAM: That was settled years ago.

Mr. WEBSTER: They never got paid.

Mr. GRAHAM: That road was sold under mortgage and would hardly come under this proposition. I may say, in response to the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), that if the arbitration would say that the capital stock had no value, then, unless, the Government were prepared to assume this liability for property that they are taking possession of, that had not been paid for, the contractors would not get their money.

There is more than one account of this kind. For several years contractors have been placing their claims before me and asking me if I could get a settlement from Mackenzie and Mann. I have no power to get a settlement of their claims, but I have presented some of them to the company. I have in mind one claim of a firm that built some 23 miles of railway between March and Arnprior. The Government has all the particulars of this claim. An effort has been made for the last four years to get payment of this claim. There was some $18,000 of a hold-back kept until recently when $5,000 was paid. The contractor has been unable to get a settlement although the work has been completed and he has been asking for payment of his whole account.

He has not been paid for his work at all. Much of this work has never been placed in any estimate over which there could be a dispute by the Canadian Northern or Mackenzie and Mann. There has been no estimate made for it; they just declined to make the estimate. The firm of contractors claim $37,000 of a balance due them. I shall read one statement of this claim to the House, and I think it is a strong claim —at least it ought to be settled. Procrastination of a claim of this kind, without refusal to settle, but holding out hopes that it would be settled in some way, is the most exasperating thing in the world. The statement reads as follows:

> In reference to statement of claims herewith we would point out that since the fall of 1913, when the work in question was completed, we have made many appeals to the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company, both direct and through J. P. Mullarkey, for a settlement of our account and an adjustment of our claims. Not only have they shown no disposition at any time to investigate and consider our claims for shortages in the estimates returned for the work done, but for three years they have withheld payment of over $18,000 of a ten per cent hold-back, which was due and payable thirty days after the completion of this work. About a year ago, however, we received an advance of $5,000 on account of this hold-back, leaving a balance still of $13,679.87 as per statement herewith.
> As to amount of $20,289.73 additionally claimed for work done and for payment of which no provision has been made, we have from time to time particularly urged that they send an engineer over the work for the purpose of conscientiously checking up our claims at the various points. The only advance that was made towards this end, however, was a flying trip made over the road by Division Engineer L. E. Rowley, on a motor car, and we have absolute proof that no more serious attempt than that was made to verify the legitimacy of our claim.
> Early this spring, then, we decided to employ an engineer ourselves, to re-measure the work and having advised both J. P. Mullarkey and the C. N. O. Railway Company of our action, invited them to send one of their own engineers along with ours and at the same time requested that they supply us with their engineer's cross-sections of the work, but no notice was taken of either invitation or request; so that it was necessary for us to go ahead with our re-measurement without their co-operation or assistance. This we did, and the enclosed statement of account and claims is compiled from our own engineer's notes and cross-sections conscientiously and conservatively made.

This inspection work, re-inspection, and re-measurement, was made by the contractors themselves, the Canadian Northern declining, though requested, to send an engineer along to check it up, and see if the statements were correct. I have another statement, which says:

> We would like to call your particular attention to the fact that there are a number of items that constitute work done for which there is absolutely nothing in the estimates to cover.

That is, work performed by this contractor for which no account has even been paid, but the work stands there, being taken over by the Government now. There is no question as to the amount. They have never received a cent for this part of the work, and nothing has ever been put in the estimates. In this statement, from which I have just quoted, I find the following:

> These include about six different sections of side barrow excavation, among which a section of 1,300 feet, station 955-968, might be particularly referred to; 71 cubic yards concrete pedestals for trestle at station 799; 20 cubic yards dry masonry for culvert at station 1189; 13 cubic yards dry paving in culvert at station 926, not to speak of the many sections of clearing and grubbing noted.

I have a further statement here which shows amount due on ten per cent hold-back, $13,679.87. As a matter of fact, this company had this much cash in their hands belonging to this firm of contractors, and although the work has been completed, the contractors assert they have not been able to get the company to say whether it has been completed or not, but they still keep the hold-back, and there the matter rests.

Mr. NESBITT: Were these gentlemen sub-contractors of Mackenzie and Mann or of the railway?

Mr. GRAHAM: The contract was through Mr. Mullarkey, who is the chief engineer of Mackenzie and Mann, the main contractors.

Mr. NESBITT: Were they second sub-contractors?

Mr. GRAHAM : The way Mackenzie and Mann operated was this: They took the contract as contractors; J. P. Mullarkey is the chief contractor of Mackenzie and Mann, and, to all intents and purposes, is Mackenzie and Mann. I think he took the contract for the line between Ottawa and Toronto.

Mr. OLIVER: Was Mr. Mullarkey sub-contractor under Mackenzie and Mann?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know whether he would be a sub-contractor. He does the work for Mackenzie and Mann, under their contract. In the statement of moneys claimed by these contractors I find the following:

Claims for under allowances in prices, etc.	$3,155.60
Claims for shortages in quantities returned in estimates	20,289.73

The total claim amounts to $37,125.20. I am not going to read the details of each of these items, or put them on Hansard. They include clearing of lands and other items. To my mind, this claim seems to be absolutely right, but, if it is not right, the Government, having taken possession of the road, should at once ascertain whether this is a correct statement of claim or not, and the matter should be settled. It is an outrage, when a man has to put up a certain amount of money for carrying out a contract, and when he claims it is all completed, and wants the engineers of the company for whom he has done the work to go over it with him, see if it is completed, and have a settlement, to be told that he must stand to one side, and get no satisfaction. To my mind, the Government cannot escape the responsibility of paying any just claim that may be made for the construction of the road, either against Mackenzie and Mann as contractors, or against them as owners of the capital stock, because, to all intents and purposes, so far as the public is concerned they are one and the same thing. I do not know that I can say anything more, but I think that, in order that there may be satisfaction among the men to whom Mackenzie and Mann owe money, or who have claims against them, the Government should announce that it will be their policy to pay any just claims that are found to exist against Mackenzie and Mann as contractors or against them as owners of the capital stock.

Mr. MURPHY: Up to the time my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) spoke this afternoon, the Government, as I recall their attitude since this discussion opened, did not manifest any disposition to accept suggestions by way of improvement of the method or the details of carrying out the transaction to which the Bill now before the committee relates. However, after the hon. gentleman from Calgary had spoken, and had delivered what I think, in the opinion of this House, was one of the most incisive, complete and masterly analyses of any measure ever submitted to Parliament, the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), who followed him, realized the position in which the Government and its Bill had been placed by that speech. The Solicitor General proceeded to indicate that in regard to certain matters of principle, and in regard to other matters of detail, the suggestions made by the member for Calgary would probably receive consideration. The Minister of Finance will recall that a complaint, voiced, perhaps, with more effectiveness by the member for Calgary than by any other speaker in this discussion—although he was not by any means the only one who voiced it—was made as to the incompleteness of the information laid before the House with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. The member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has dealt with one branch of that aspect of the discussion. He has pointed out that there are a number of unsettled contractors' claims. He has argued that these contractors, having built the road which is to be taken over by the Government, having put up some of their own money in connection with that work, should be paid for their services and that the Government should assume responsibility for the debts so owed these contractors. I have knowledge of some of those claims. I recall some claims that were submitted to me by contractors who did work on the Sudbury-Port Arthur line, a branch of the Canadian Northern system which was constructed by the Mackenzie and Mann company. So far as I know, these claims have not yet been settled. One claim at least in connection with the construction of the telegraph line along that system has not yet been settled; there may be others. I could give the details and verify these before the Bill goes out of committee. But if the minister will admit the principle that the Government should pay these men, who have given value to the company, then we could postpone the discussion of the details.

Another very important matter was touched upon by the member for Calgary, to which allusion had not previously been made, and which the hon. Solicitor General found it convenient to overlook in what he described as his reply. I refer to the member for Calgary's enumeration of the existing liabilities in connection with unfinished contracts for which the Government will become liable under the terms of their proposed legislation. Let me direct the attention of the minister and of the committee to the situation in that regard as it exists in British Columbia in connection with the Canadian Northern Pacific Railway. A news item in the Vancouver Sun of August 11, 1917, is as follows:

Victoria, Aug. 10.—The following telegram sent by Hon. John Oliver, minister of railways, to Sir R. L. Borden to-day:

"British Columbia has guaranteed the principal and interest on forty-seven million nine hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars of Canadian Northern Pacific railway company bonds and has contracts obligating the railway company to expend twenty-two to twenty-five millions to complete. Are the province's interests being protected? Please reply quickly.

The under-mentioned reply from Sir R. L. Borden has been received:

"The Government proposes to acquire all the capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway company which owns all the stock of the Canadian Northern Pacific railway company. Copy of the bill now before Parliament is forwarded to-day for your consideration. The company's obligations will remain as they were before such acquirement."

The newspaper item proceeds:

By Sir Robert Borden's telegram it will be seen that the Dominion Government assumes all the Canadian Northern railway's obligations in respect to the Canadian Northern Pacific railway, both financial and as to the completion by the latter railway of its existing contracts.

If the statement of the Premier of British Columbia be correct, there is an obligation of between $22,000,000 and $25,000,000. I submit that this committee is entitled to full information, not only in regard to this particular outstanding obligation, but also in regard to all other obligations coming within that category. That is information which, I think, should have been regarded as included in the general request for information made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. That is the second point upon which I should like the hon. minister to furnish the committee with details before we proceed to a consideration of the Bill.

I wish to refer to another matter in connection with which the committee is entitled to the fullest information. We have had discussion as to the pledgees of the stock, the holders of bonds and other individuals or interests who will be affected by or who are bound to become beneficiaries under this legislation. Information was asked from the minister as to the identity of these individuals and interests, but so far as I am aware that information has not yet been given to the committee. I wish to recall the incident through which the Minister of Finance was brought into public life. I refer to the letter that was signed by the eighteen gentlemen in Toronto in the spring of 1911 against reciprocity. The minister was one of those eighteen gentlemen. The complete list of the eighteen is given in the Canadian Annual Review for 1911.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So-called Liberals?

Mr. MURPHY: I am not prepared to vouch for the politics of the gentlemen who signed that letter, nor am I at the moment concerned about that. On page 48 of the Canadian Annual Review for 1911 I read this:

The signers of the manifesto mentioned, and in the order given, were Sir Edmund Walker—

Who, as everybody knows, is general manager of the Canadian Bank of Commerce.

—John L. Blaikie, President of the Canada Landed & National Investment Co.; W. D. Matthews, ex-President of the Toronto Board of Trade and Vice-President of the Dominion Bank; W. K. George, ex-President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association and of the Toronto Industrial Exhibition, and Vice-President of the Sterling Bank of Canada; Z. A. Lash, K.C., an eminent lawyer and capitalist; W. T. White, Vice-President and General-Manager of the National Trust Company; George T. Somers, Vice-President of the Board of Trade and President of the Sterling Bank of Canada; R. S. Gourlay, President of the Toronto Board of Trade and a piano manufacturer; Sir W. Mortimer Clark, K.C., LL.D., ex-Lieut.-Governor of Ontario; R. J. Christie, President of Christie, Brown & Co., and a prominent manufacturer; Hugh Blain of Eby, Blain & Co., and leading wholesale merchant and director of The Globe, the chief Ontario organ of the Liberal party; H. S. Strathy, a director and for many years General-Manager of the Traders Bank of Canada; L. Goldman, Managing-Director of the North American Life Assurance Co., and G. A. Somerville who held the same position in the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company—both well-known insurance men; Wellington Francis, a prominent lawyer and Director of the Standard Bank and several companies in Toronto; J. D. Allan, ex-President of the Board of Trade; E. R. Wood Vice-President of the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company, a director on many concerns and one of the leading financiers in Canada; John C. Eaton, President of the T. Eaton Company, Limited, and said to have 17,000 employees in his service.

Those are the names of the gentlemen who signed the anti-reciprocity manifesto in 1911. I would ask the minister to state to the committee whether, excluding himself, the gentlemen named, or the executors or the representatives of the estates of those who have died, hold any of this stock, or are the pledgees of this stock, or are the holders of any of those Canadian Northern bonds, and whether Sir Clifford Sifton is the owner or holder of stock or the pledgee of any of those bonds. The committee should have that information in order properly to appreciate the legislation before the House. I, therefore, invite my hon. friend to give to the committee the information under the three heads I have enumerated.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has considerable imagination to link up a letter signed by eighteen Liberals in Toronto against reciprocity with the question now before the committee. My hon. friend has read the names of eighteen very distinguished citizens of Toronto. He will admit that the names are all good, and that they were quite within their rights in signing the letter they did in regard to the issue of reciprocity, just as hon. gentlemen opposite have been quite within their rights in voting against their leader on the question of compulsory military service. My hon. friend asks me if I know whether any of those gentlemen whose names he has mentioned are in any way interested in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway company. As a matter of knowledge, I do not know any shareholder or bondholder to-day of the Canadian Northern Railway company, and the only information I have is this, that I believe that Mackenzie, Mann & company, Limited, are the owners of 51 per cent of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company. It would be a matter of surprise to me if the gentlemen mentioned, Sir John Eaton, Mr. Allan, Mr. George, Mr. ——

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Lash.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Lash is second vice-president of the Canadian Northern; Mr. Woods is vice-president or director of the Canadian Northern; as to the others, so far as I am aware they are not in any way connected with the Canadian Northern as stockholders or bondholders. The Solicitor General points out to me that Mr. George is a director on the Canadian Northern, representing the Dominion Government under the action taken last session. I should be surprised to learn that he had any personal interest in the enterprise. I do not know any of the bondholders of the Canadian Northern, and, as I say, the only stockholders of whom I am aware are first, the Minister of Finance and Receiver General who owns $40,000,000 worth of stock, and, secondly, Messrs. Mackenzie, Mann & company, Limited, who are the owners of about 51 per cent, that is, they have a controlling interest in the Canadian Northern Railway company.

Mr. MURPHY: Can the minister say as to Sir Edmund Walker and Mr. Lash?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Lash is second vice-president of the Canadian Northern. Whether Mr. Lash holds any shares, and if so to what extent he is a shareholder, I am not aware. The bondholders are largely in Great Britain. The Canadian Northern has always been known as a close corporation, the principal stock being held by Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited. I have no further information with regard to the others, and I should be much surprised to learn that any considerable number of them, if any of them other than those who are officially connected with the company, are bondholders or stockholders in the Canadian Northern Railway company.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister get that information? I can quite understand he might not have it himself, but the information ought to be obtained and placed before the committee. We ought also to know, in the same connection the indebtedness of the Canadian Northern Railway company to the Canadian Bank of Commerce.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not the information as to the indebtedness of the Canadian Northern to the Canadian Bank of Commerce nor to any other bank. The statements laid upon the Table show the floating indebtedness of the Canadian Northern railway.

With regard to the claims mentioned by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), the position is this: The Dominion Government is acquiring the shares of the Canadian Northern Railway Company; that is to say, instead of the present shareholders, the Dominion Government will be the sole shareholders. The corporate organizations of the company as well as the organizations of the subsidiary and constituent companies will remain as at present, the intention being to administer them as corporations, that is to say as they are being administered at present. The claims against those companies can be filed with the Department of Railways precisely as they are being filed to-day. The financial controller of railways, who is here to-night, tells me there are comparatively few claims against Mackenzie, Mann & company, Limited, in connection with the Montreal to Port Arthur section. I have the details of them here. There are five altogether, and there is in the department $72,000, or nearly enough to cover those claims, the amount involved being approximately $80,000. The department takes up those claims and looks into them carefully. The case referred to by the hon. member for South Renfrew has been under the most careful consideration of the Railway Department.

Mr. MURPHY: It has been outstanding for four years.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The claim is contested, and, in the opinion of the Railway Department, justly contested. The Department of Railways offered a mode of settling the question by having a re-measurement. The contractors agreed to that.

Mr. COPP: When was that offer made?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Three or four weeks ago, and I understand the mode of determination suggested has not been adopted by the gentlemen in question. The Dominion Government could not undertake to pay claims which are usually filed for the largest possible amount. The Dominion Government takes over the Canadian Northern Railway company, and that company continues just as it has in the past. Any claims which in the past could have been filed can now be filed. The Department of Railways, as my hon. friend knows, retains moneys from subsidies and from the proceeds of guaranteed securities for the purpose of covering those claims.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the claim of which I have spoken is found to be a just claim, will it be paid?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, the Department of Railways says so. The money is in the Department of Railways for that purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM: The difficulty has been this: the claim has been outstanding for years, and the contractors could never get the company to say whether the claim was a just one or not. The company would not go into particulars, but stood the contractor off, by saying they would send the engineer to look over the work. They never did so, however, except that a man once went over it in a motor truck, which goes at 25 miles an hour, and he could not see anything. I know something about this claim, because I attempted to get it settled, not months but years ago. The engineer did not make any examination at all of the work, I am informed, and the company have always refused to get down to close quarters in considering it. I would not ask the Government to pay a claim that was not just for this contractor or anybody else, but now that the Government has taken over the road I should like to be assured that if this is a just claim the Government will see that it is paid.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There will be no different procedure from that of the past, because the Department of Railways will still be the Department of Railways and will still investigate these claims. The Department of Railways, which is a department of the Dominion Government, has the money to pay these claims, provided they are just. My hon. friend does not suggest that the department should pay unjust claims?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I made that clear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The point I make with regard to the stock we are purchasing is that it does not affect these claims at all. As the department has the money to pay the claims, no question arises as to funds, and, therefore, it is only a question of the contractors or the sub-contractors establishing their claim to the satisfaction of the department. With all due respect to my hon. friend, I do not see that we should hold up the consideration of this Bill on any such consideration as he has put forward, because, as I have said, the money is in the department to pay the claims if they are just.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the minister tell us just what he means by saying that the Department of Railways have the money?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The department holds a drawback. The subcontractor who has a claim against the contractor files his claim in the Department of Railways, which has moneys belonging to the company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Subsidy money?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, or proceeds of guaranteed bonds which it holds back. So the fact of the Government becoming the owner of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company does not alter the situation in the least degree. The subcontractor with a just claim can still file his claim with the Department of Railways against the railway. The claims that have been mentioned are under investigation by the department, and there is no doubt that it has the money to pay the claims if they are established. The financial comptroller of the Department of Railways informs me that in the first case drawn to our attention by the hon. member for South Renfrew, a reasonable proposal has been made to the subcontractor, but it has not been accepted, I believe.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know what it was.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend asked me with reference to the bondholders and stockholders of the Canadian Northern Railway company. I have no information whatever, nor do I believe it could be obtained, with regard to the bonds, because they pass from hand to hand. With regard to the stock, I understand that Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited, are the owners of about 51 per cent of the stock, which is sufficient to make operative the agreement referred to in section 1 of the Bill. As to who the other stockholders are, representing one-sixth of the capital stock, I have no information. Some are in England. I understand that the Government of British Columbia is also a shareholder. But Mackenzie, Mann & Company, being the owners of 51 per cent of the stock, are in the position to lodge stock and make operative the agreement under section 1. Then it is open to others to bring in their shares, and if they do not bring in their shares the Governor in Council may declare that those remaining shares are vested in His Majesty subject to the terms of this legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know the modus operandi of the Railway Department pretty well and I know that in the case I have referred to the chief contractor can put obstacles in the way of the adjustment of the claim and postpone settlement year after year. He may say, for instance, that the road is in a state of semi-completion. That happened with me time and again. I have often had to call in the chief contractor and say: "If you won't say something about this claim one way or the other, I am going to pay this subcontractor." I have done that on several occasions. Now that the Government is becoming owner of the road, it is in a position to act in unison with the Railway Department and act more promptly than the former owners of the stock. What I am trying to draw from the Government is a statement that they will take these claims up and have them adjusted, and not act as the former railway company did, which postponed the claims year after year. All I ask is that if a just claim is established it will be paid. I understand that there are only some $72,000 worth of claims to pay.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Some of these claims are too high.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some may have to be reduced. The point I am making is that when the Government takes over the road it ought to see that these men who have done work for the company shall be settled with, and should it happen that the arbitrators find that the common stock has a value the Government would be in a position absolutely to recoup itself for any expenditures it might make in this way.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have the money anyway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have made inquiry of the comptroller as to the specific claim mentioned by my hon. friend from South Renfrew. I believe it is the claim of Macdonald and Lynn, who were subcontractors under Mullarkey, who himself was a subcontractor. It appears that the claim has been standing for some time, but the comptroller tells me that it is only within very recent months that it has come before the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is true, I think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It came before the department in this form. Macdonald and Lynn claim that the measurements were wrong. They had been paid the full apportionment coming to them, providing the measurements of the Canadian Northern railway under which Mullarkey himself took his money were correct. They claim, however, that these measurements were too small, and consequently there was more money coming to them. The proposal made to them by the Department of Railways and Canals was that a new measurement should be made, under which Mullarkey would take a readjustment, if necessary, of his moneys, and consequently, Macdonald and Lynn a readjustment of theirs. The condition of the remeasurement was to be that if the first measurement was right Macdonald and Lynn would stand the cost of the remeasuring; if it was not right, the Canadian Northern would stand the cost. That proposal seems eminently fair, but Macdonald and Lynn have not yet acceded to it, and that is why the claim is standing. It is a matter of perfect indifference to the department, except that they would like to see the claim settled. That is the proposal that has been made, I am informed, and the ones who have not accepted it are Macdonald and Lynn.

Mr. GRAHAM: This may seem a small thing, but it is a big thing to Macdonald and Lynn, because it means practically the profit on their work. Macdonald and Lynn have begged of the Canadian Northern, or of Mr. Mullarkey, who is technically a subcontractor but really Mackenzie and Mann's contractor, to send a man to have these measurements taken.

They declined to send the man. Macdonald and Lynn said: "Then, we will get an engineer up and you go with him." This they also declined. Macdonald and Lynn then went to the expense of making all the measurements themselves. The Canadian Northern declined to send a man over with them to check up the measurements. Now the proposal is made that they shall have the same thing done now which the company refused to do a few weeks or a few months ago. Of course, that was before it came before the Railway Department. I would ask the Solicitor General if the work is completed, and as I understand him to say the Canadian Northern admit that it is completed, why do they keep this $13,600 as a drawback?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The controller informs me that there are some outstanding claims in respect of sub-contractors' work, and that is the reason why the drawback is held. Does it not come down to about this—there is money to pay just claims, and if a claim is established as legitimate, it will be paid? There is no question as to the money.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All my hon. friend suggests is greater activity than has existed in the past. He says that by reason of the ownership of the road being in private hands there has been delay, and that it has been under the Railway Department for investigation, and he suggests that now when the Government becomes proprietor of the road there might be greater activity with a view to having this settled. But it cannot be settled until the Railway Department determines that the claim is just. I am sure no hon. gentleman would ask the Department of Railways to pay out money in settlement of an unjust claim. I do not think we can advance the matter further than that. If the claim is legitimate, there is money to pay it, and it will be paid.

9 p.m.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend has become accustomed to deal in such large figures and such huge amounts of money, that he has forgotten this trifling matter of $25,000,000 in connection with the Canadian Northern Pacific.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What $25,000,000 is that?

Mr. MURPHY: The $25,000,000 which the Premier of British Columbia says is necessary to complete the contracts of the Canadian Northern in that province. I asked the hon. gentleman if it was one of the obligations the Government was taking over, and how many obligations of a like character there were.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That obligation is not affected at all by what is being done here. The Canadian Northern Pacific, as my hon. friend knows, is a company whose stock is held by the Canadian Northern Railway company. After the Government acquires the capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway, the stock of the underlying company will still be held just as it is to-day, and the company will be carried on, and be responsible for such obligations as it has, just as is the case to-day. The status of the Canadian Northern Pacific, or, indeed, of any of the subsidiary or constituent companies, or of the Canadian Northern Railway company itself, is not changed. They are the same companies, with the same liabilities, and the same obligations. I am unable to pronounce offhand as to the merits of this matter. My hon. friend quotes a telegram, or a letter, from the Premier of British Columbia which is, of course, entitled to consideration.

Mr. MURPHY: I also quoted the reply of the Prime Minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When the Government secures the ownership of this stock, the system will be run as it is being run to-day. The obligation will not be lost. From the standpoint of the government of British Columbia it may be a rather fortunate thing that this Government is taking over the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company. Whatever the obligations of the Canadian Northern Pacific may be, they would be more likely to be carried out with the control of the Canadian Northern Railway system in the strong hands of the Government than if it were in the hands of any private owners, especially in times like these. I am quite unable to give any definite answer to my hon. friend, but I may say, it does not appear to me that the point he mentions really touches what we are doing, the status of all these companies being maintained.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend is very patient and very courteous—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Why should I not be?

Mr. MURPHY: —but he will pardon me if I do not enter into the discussion into which he wishes to lead me, or to lead the committee. I am not concerned particularly with the position of British Columbia in regard to this matter. I simply point out a specific instance of a class of claims mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary this afternoon. I have asked the Minister of Finance how many claims of that character there are, and what is the total amount; so that we may know what we are talking over, or what we are getting in this bargain, if it be a bargain; in other words, what obligations the Dominion of Canada is assuming in connection with this matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Department of Railways has only three claims on file in respect of the Canadian Northern Pacific, aggregating $170,000. Against these claims, they have $300,000 of subsidy moneys in their hands. The particular obligation to which my hon. friend refers no doubt arises out of an agreement with the Government of British Columbia. Whatever that obligation may be, it will still remain. I do not think it is possible to give definite information with regard to the extent of claims, except indebtedness, of such a system as this— a railway system extending throughout the whole of Canada, with branch lines which have been projected, where bonds have been sold and the proceeds deposited against construction. It would take months, or more, to make any statement with regard to a matter of that kind. All we are doing is acquiring a great transcontinental system. There may be cases in which lines have been projected, where the company, through inability to finance, has not been able to make the extensions.

Mr. NESBITT: But, if they have sold the bonds on those projected extensions?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The proceeds would be waiting for the construction to be made.

Mr. NESBITT: In all cases?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In all cases.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does not the minister think it reasonable that we should find out what this will cost? Before we embark on a transaction of this kind, we ought to know what the ultimate cost will be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It must be clear to the hon. gentleman that a transfer of stock of any company in no way affects the obligations, whatever they may be. By this transaction the Government of Canada does not become pledged to pay any debt whatsoever. All it pays for is the stock it is getting. I did not hear the first wire read, but I understand it is in regard to some claims in respect of construction still to go on.

Mr. MURPHY: No. It is a telegram from the Premier of British Columbia referring to a contract between the Canadian Northern Pacific Railway company and the Government of British Columbia, for the construction of some line or lines, and stating that it would require from $22,000,000 to $25,000,000 to complete that contract. The Premier of British Columbia inquired if the obligation was being taken over by the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That obligation would not be taken over by the Government at all, and the reply of the Prime Minister would so indicate. I remember the reply, although I cannot recall its exact wording. The Government does not take over any obligation of the Canadian Northern Railway company. We take over certain stock of the company.

The obligations of the company will remain exactly the same as before. As to what the Government will do, or rather as to what the Canadian Northern will do after it is controlled by the Government, with respect to obligations, I would say that, generally speaking, the disposition would be to carry out any honest obligations entered into in respect of construction. If there is a contract by the Canadian Northern Pacific in respect of construction, it will probably be found that there are moneys against that contract, the proceeds of securities guaranteed by the province of British Columbia; in other words, that the financing practically is already provided for by virtue of provincial legislation and contracts. Consequently while if there is a contract the obligation of the company to carry it out will be the same as before, it will not be an obligation involving net expenditure by the company because there will be moneys against it, the proceeds of guaranteed securities perhaps already realized. There is no reason for the company changing its policy in respect to these roads.

Mr. NESBITT: If they had the money there would be no excuse for not going on with the contract.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the moneys that are there are not sufficient to complete the work. Generally speaking, the company would assume the same attitude afterwards as before. It would go on with such contracts as the financial conditions permitted, and I presume the contracts read in such a manner that the option to proceed or not to proceed is open to the company; at all events, whatever was open to it before will be open to it still, and I know of no reason why the policy of the company should be changed.

Mr. NESBITT: What would be the policy of the Government in case contracts had been entered into to build roads that very closely duplicate other roads?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would depend on the outlook, on the alternative courses open. I do not know of any such obligation binding on the company, and if there was an obligation for the expenditure of money that was not wise I should be very much surprised.

Mr. NESBITT: If the money was given them for a certain purpose it could not be used for another purpose?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has said that what we were doing at present was taking over that stock, which is quite true. But is it not also true that we are embarking on the nationalization of a great transcontinental railway which has certain liabilities scattered over the country very generally, and that when we complete the work we are starting to do we shall own the road free from all encumbrances, and all of these things will have to be paid? I should be surprised if there were not scores of claims of which the Government has not yet heard. While we are only purchasing the stock to-day, is it not reasonable for us to ask the Solicitor General to give a statement of what he expects to pay in the end, what the ultimate liability of the country will be when we secure the road from end to end?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all before the House. The responsibilities of the company are shown on the balance sheet, and there is no reason to doubt its correctness. These liabilities are shown on the balance sheet as of the 30th June, 1916. Another balance sheet was taken off on the 30th April, 1917, and another is in course of preparation showing all liabilities of every kind up to the 30th June, 1917.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister give the gross liabilities of record now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The liabilities will be $578,000,000 less $139,000,000, about $439,000,000. I understand the total indebtedness of the company is under $425,000,000. That is liabilities of every kind and description. There are certain items that appear on both sides of the account, and in this way the total liabilities are reduced to less than $425,000,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Do Mackenzie and Mann own 51 per cent of the $60,000,000, or of the $100,000,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is 51 per cent of the $100,000,000. That is $51,000,000 of the $60,000,000 outstanding.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister has given the total amount of liabilities that Canada is assuming by this transaction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not assuming these liabilities at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The company controlled by the Government will have to assume these liabilities. The Government is at the back of those liabilities and will have to make them good. Did the Minister of Finance, when this matter came to a head, convene any financiers, men of high financial ability in Canada, and tell them that the Government was committing themselves to this huge transaction, as he consulted financial experts before issuing his domestic loan? The other day when it was rumoured that the minister would issue another domestic loan, I met some of the bankers on the train from Montreal to Ottawa and I learned that they were called by my hon. friend into consultation upon that loan. I do not disapprove of that; on the contrary, I think it is wise on the part of the Minister of Finance, before embarking upon any such large transaction, to consult, outside of Parliament, the best minds of Canada.

I should like to know whether, when he and his colleagues decided to bring this legislation before Parliament, he consulted outside of Parliament, men like the president of the Bank of Montreal, the largest institution in Canada, which in this country is something like the Bank of England in the Old Country, or whether he consulted men of the ability of Sir Frederick Taylor and other financiers of mark in Canada, before committing the country to this transaction. I should like my hon. friend to answer the point raised by my hon. friend the ex-Secretary of State (Mr.

Murphy). The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has dismissed, with a wave of the hand, the question which was put by that hon. gentleman. He asked for a list of the shareholders, bondholders and pledgees of the road, and the Minister of Finance simply answered that he did not know, and, as regards the shares of the Canadian Northern, that he understood 51 per cent were controlled by the company. We are supposed to be business men in this House. We are elected to represent the seven or eight million people who compose the population of Canada. We are committing the country to the extent of nearly half a billion dollars. We are now on the eve of making an agreement with the Canadian Northern, with a view to control the balance of the stock. I understand the hon. gentleman says that 51 per cent of that stock belongs to the Canadian Northern. It seems to me that we ought to know with whom we are going to make this bargain. If that stock is really in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann, or the Canadian Northern, or, as was reported this afternoon, partly in the hands of Sir Clifford Sifton, to the amount of $750,000, we ought to know the names of the shareholders of the Canadian Northern. My hon. friend will say, "What does it matter whether A, B or C holds a few hundred shares? You have the agreement before you. Is it a good or bad agreement?" It is important, indeed it is essential, in a transaction of that magnitude, that we should know with whom we are trading, and with whom we are trucking. There is a rumour in reference to the holding of the stock of the Canadian Northern, and my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) will forgive me if I refer to it here. I do not impugn his personal honour at all in this matter, because the hon. gentleman stated some time ago, and I accepted his word, that he had no longer any connection with the institution which has been mentioned in connection with this transaction but it is rumoured, and repeated in the press—in subdued tones, because the press is chloroformed—and in the clubs, that the men who are behind this transaction, the big shareholders of the Canadian Northern, are effectively controlling the Government. I do not say it is true, but I suspect it might be true.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Government is going to buy out the control.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My good friend the Minister of Finance laughs.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot help it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman knows the political history of Canada for the past twenty years, surely. He was a member of the Liberal party in 1904. What happened then? Is it not a fact that the Canadian Northern in 1904 got control, a few days before nomination in the general election, of a powerful daily in Montreal, which, heretofore, had been supporting the Government; that, under the influence of the Canadian Northern, that paper made a right-about turn, just on the eve of nomination day? Is it not a fact that, at the same time, it was reported that the Canadian Northern would see that three ministers of the Crown would be arrested—Sir Clifford Sifton's name was mentioned as one of them—and that a number of candidates would be bought outright by the company, in order to get control of the Parliament to be elected in 1904? I am not repeating cock-and-bull stories. Let my hon. friend put the question to the member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean). He brought the whole matter before the House in regard to the election of 1904, and hon. gentlemen will see by reference to Hansard that he stated that there had been a deliberate conspiracy by that very company to get control of the Parliament of Canada. I am not inventing the story. It is well known, and probably my hon. friend is well aware of it. Did it succeed? The plot failed miserably.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They got a guarantee of bonds from the hon. gentleman's Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let the megaphone of Mackenzie and Mann keep silent for a few minutes. There has never been any insinuation or accusation against any of the members of the Laurier Government on account of that guarantee of bonds, and the hon. gentleman is the first to make the insinuation this evening, but it is only an insinuation worthy of him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the hon. gentleman making this last half hour?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have not been making any insinuations. I stated two things, that the people are reporting, from one end of the country to the other, that the Canadian Northern have control of this Government, and that, in this transaction, they are the powerful interests represented. I stated what is current in the city of Ottawa, that Sir Clifford Sifton is interested to the extent of $750,000 worth of shares in the Canadian Northern. That explains the activities of some gentlemen who want to form a win-the-war party, and who want to get a union Government. Such things happen in other countries, where people are perhaps less callous than they are in Canada, but they do not last. In France some years ago, at the time of the Panama scandal, it was proven unfortunately that mostly all the members of the Government and of Parliament were in the hands of the Panama companies, and there was nearly a revolution in France as a result of it. In England when, a few years ago, the Marconi scandal was rumoured, it nearly destroyed the career of the present Prime Minister of England, and there was only the suspicion that he had been given a hint to speculate in Marconi shares.

It is very generally stated throughout Canada that the Canadian Northern owns and controls the present Government, and that we are now embarking on a transaction the object of which is to make richer people who are already millionaires. These people, it is said, are afraid of the future; they think that their private enterprise is not safe, and that it is better they should be made secure by public ownership. I ask the minister to be frank with the country and to state positively who are the shareholders, pledgees and bondholders who will profit by this transaction. I want to know with whom I am dealing. I do not want to act blindly; I want to deal with A, B and C. I want to know these people who will get the money out of the Canadian treasury. I am a taxpayer; I am responsible to my electors for the taxation Bills which come before this House. In that respect I will give my hon. friend my support to a certain extent, reserving my right to criticise what I believe to be unjust. I believe, however, that the Income Tax Bill proceeds upon a right principle. On behalf of my electors, who will be called upon to pay the half-billion dollars involved in this transaction, I want to know to whom this money is going. Tell me, Mr. Chairman, of any transaction—not necessarily a transaction of this importance, but any transaction—in which the parties are not known by their names?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The North Atlantic Trading Company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend, in order to make some defence of the scandalous proposal that we are now considering, is obliged to refer to the North Atlantic Trading Company. Did he approve of the absence of names in that case?

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not here.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why does my hon. friend mention it, then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the hon. gentleman approved it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, I approved it; but if I was wrong, is the hon. gentleman right to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not doing the same thing.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If at that time the Government was misled by its agent in England, is my hon. friend right to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly we are right.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is ready to involve the credit of this country to the extent of $439,000,000, as he said a moment ago; but he will not give to Parliament the names of the parties with whom we are going to deal. I protest most vehemently against that procedure. We have a right to know to whom this money shall go. Otherwise, we shall be compelled to believe that what is being said on the street is true; that you are making wealthier men who are already immensely wealthy.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has been quite melodramatic; he has indulged in a good deal of what you might call romance. Departing from the sober discussion of facts, he mentioned street gossip and club rumour.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no free press; the press is chloroformed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I feel sorry for my hon. friend in his distrust of the press.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is how the news was spread in the old days.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think a man's case is almost hopeless when he distrusts the press, because the last safeguard of liberty will be the press.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not a gagged press, a free press.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is not enough money in Canada to gag the Canadian press. My hon. friend is talking about a most important transaction. I usually talk to the House seriously about serious matters, and I shall answer my hon. friend. He has referred to this transaction as being a scandalous one. Let us consider for a moment the situation with which this Government is confronted. Let us go away from gossip and rumour; let us get down to facts. We have been confronted with a great fact during the last six years, namely, the condition of certain railway systems for which the Government of which my hon. friend was a member was mainly responsible, the Grand Trunk, the National Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern Railway systems. We found the Canadian Northern Railway system, with its branches in three western provinces; with its lines through British Columbia half completed; with its line between Montreal and Port Arthur, upon which the Government of which my hon. friend was a member had given a guarantee at the rate of $35,000 a mile, a total of $35,000,000 uncompleted. We found that the Dominion Government under the Administration of which my hon. friend was a member had pledged its credit in connection with the Canadian Northern's financing. We were confronted, I say, with a grave fact, not with a theory. From time to time we have had to bring down to this House measures of assistance in order that the Canadian Northern Railway company with which was involved the credit of the Dominion, under legislation for which hon. gentlemen opposite were responsible, and with which was involved the credit of the provinces of Canada, might be enabled to complete its system and continue as a going concern. The responsibility for the Canadian Northern railway system was not upon this Government, but the responsibility was upon us of seeing that the system was completed and continued as a solvent, going concern to serve the people. It is idle to talk of the eighteen who signed the manifesto against reciprocity. What has that to do with the Canadian Northern system?

Mr. MURPHY: That is what we want to know.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What had it to do with the Canadian Northern system, which was in existence long before 1911, when the manifesto was signed?

Mr. MURPHY: If my hon. friend will answer our question and tell us where the stock and bonds are held, we will find out what it has to do with it. If he does not, then we will suspect what it has to do with it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I was saying, we brought down from year to year legislation that was necessary to complete the system and to continue it as a going concern. Last year we announced that the situation had become intolerable whereby the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific were coming to Ottawa each year for the purpose of getting further assistance. I stated that we would appoint a commission, and I indicated that in order to solve this question permanently it might be necessary to take over one or more of the railway systems of Canada—even to nationalize the entire system of railways. This year the Canadian Northern Railway company, for reasons that have been stated a dozen times to the House during the present session, found itself in need of further aid.

We determined to take over that system in order that it might be owned and controlled by and for the people of Canada. What other way of doing it is there than the way in which we are doing it or by expropriation? We have discussed the merits of the two modes of taking over this stock—the one, by expropriation, the other, by purchase of the stock. I do not intend to discuss that now. I am simply leading up to the point at which we are at present, namely, that, in order to save this system and to save the credit of the Dominion and of the provinces, we are taking it over for the people of Canada. What is the mode of taking it over? It is this: The Dominion Government having already $40,000,000 of the stock of the company, there remains outstanding $60,000,000 of stock.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who owns that stock?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Fifty per cent, of the entire issue, that is $51,000,000, is owned, as I have stated, by Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited. The agreement into which we are about to enter will provide that that $51,000,000 worth of stock will be deposited. Then there will be the right to the other owners and pledgees of the stock to come in and participate. If they do not do so, the Dominion Government may declare their stock to be vested in His Majesty, to be paid for at a price determined by arbitration under the provisions of this legislation. I have stated the position truly to the House. The 51 per cent of stock which, with the Dominions's 40 per cent, will give the Dominion 91 per cent, will come in at once. That leaves 9 per cent of stock. At present I do not know who are the shareholders of that 9 per cent of stock, and I do not believe that is relevant to the consideration of this question, because if the 9 per cent does not come in, the Governor in Council may declare it to be vested in His Majesty to be paid for at the price determined by arbitration. If there is any information which I can get for the committee, I shall be glad to get it but, so far as I can see, the information asked for is not relevant to the consideration of this question, because we get in the 51 per cent which makes operative this agreement.

With regard to the bonds, it would not be possible for this Government, nor for any other Government, to ascertain the bondholders of the Canadian Northern Railway company. There must be tens of thousands of bondholders, principally in Great Britain. There are note-holders in the United States of America. Hon. gentlemen know that bonds and bearer notes pass from hand to hand; there is no registration of them, and the same remark can also be made with regard to stock. My hon. friend would have some difficulty in ascertaining the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway company to-day. He knows there are shares of that company, representing hundreds of thousands of dollars of par value, standing in the names of brokers or held in vaults endorsed in blank.

Mr. MURPHY: Even that would be information.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am giving the members of the committee the full information I have respecting this transaction. I have indicated—and I am sure it was unnecessary—why this transaction is being undertaken. It is not a question of buying stock for the sake of buying the stock. The transaction is to save this railway system as a going concern for the people of Canada, and the method we have adopted is by buying the stock. Let me ask my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), who speaks about rumour and gossip connected with this transaction and who insinuates some impropriety in connection with it, would I be justified in making any insinuations in reference to the guarantee of $35,000,000 which the late Government gave in connection with the Canadian Northern from Montreal to Port Arthur; or with respect to the guarantees given in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific and with the contracts let on the National Transcontinental, unless I had evidence to sustain them? Would I be justified in saying that there were rumours at that time respecting those transactions? I do not believe I would. This transaction is entered into for the purpose of saving the Canadian Northern Railway system. It seems to me to be the only way in which that can be done, unless you continue to give aid from year to year. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) voted, in 1914, for a resolution in which his leader moved that the Dominion Government should acquire this stock by arbitration, precisely in the mode in which we are acquiring it, and he named a maximum price of $30,000,000. Supposing to-night I ask my hon. friend: Whom was he trying to help on that occasion? Would he not be justified in saying that I was unjust in my insinuations? My hon. friend is on record as having voted for that resolution. The real fact of the matter is that this talk is largely political, and my hon. friend knows that perfectly well. It is a pity, in connection with a transaction of this magnitude, undertaken for the purpose I have indicated, should be made the subject of baseless rumour and insinuation. The course my hon. friend has seen fit to adopt is not justifiable. There is nothing new about legislation brought down to assist railways in this country, the problem of transportation being as it is of the utmost importance to the community as a whole. Every year legislation of this character is brought down. Why then upon this occasion should there be any insinuations based upon what my hon. friend has termed " street rumour " or " club gossip "? I protest against the insinuations of my hon. friend. The transaction has been undertaken for the reasons I have given; it is one of the most important transactions ever before Parliament. I am always prepared to discuss seriously, before the House or in committee, any transaction for which I may be sponsor, but my hon. friend is not fair to members of the Government when he puts forward insinuations upon unsupported evidence. He has stated that Sir Clifford Sifton is an owner of some of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company. I can state to my hon. friend, as I have stated before, that I have absolutely no information as to the stockholders of the Canadian Northern Railway company, with the exception that I believe Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited own 51 per cent of the capital stock which could be lodged so as to make this agreement operative.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have never impugned the fair name and personal honesty of my hon. friend; I have never made any insinuations against him; I believe he is acting in good faith; but I repeat this again: If he is anxious that those rumours should cease, he should do what any man of business ability—and the minister can claim to have business ability—would do in a circumstance such as this. As he states, this is one of the greatest transactions that have come before this Parliament since Confederation. I do not believe, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk Pacific, there has ever been a transaction of this magnitude. I ask in all fairness—are we not entitled to have at least the names of the parties who are going to benefit by this transaction? My claim is that the Canadian Northern is only a blind. We are going to pay out a large sum of money—whatever value will be attached by the arbitrators to the balance of that stock.

Besides that, we are assuming all the liabilities of the Canadian Northern company. I ask again, are not the common people of this country, whom you and I, Sir, represent, entitled to have the names of the parties who are going to benefit by this transaction? If there are no shareholders besides Mackenzie and Mann, well and good; it will be easy for us to discuss the transaction. The minister knows the secretary of the company, and with a stroke of the pen he could get this information from him.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If he has it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They have a list of the shareholders and of the pledgees, and they know where the bonds are. Surely Parliament is entitled to this information. My hon. friend says that this is a big order, and complains that I am suspicious. Am I not right in being suspicious, Mr. Chairman, when I hear the Solicitor General waxing eloquent about this transaction, defending the reference to the arbitrators, and calling black to-day what he called white in 1914 on this very question. Speaking on this question in 1914 my hon. friend said (Hansard, page 3693):

> Or, if we choose, we can ourselves, by Act of Parliament, legislate that that road is the property of the people of this country and that the interests of all persons whatsoever outside of the people of Canada are eliminated.

That is what my hon. friend said in 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is quite true, too.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps my hon. friend will say whether the next sentence has the same ring of truth with it. My hon. friend had just said that we were passing this legislation to save the Canadian Northern from default, and, speaking of clause 24, he said:

> The idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all stockholders parties to this contract and we say to them: We now and here bind you that should the day of default come you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever, but you here and now leave the Parliament of this country free from any such question and untrammelled in every way to deal with the property of the Canadian Northern as it may be advised in the interests of the people of this country. That is the summary procedure outlined here for taking over the road.

Hon. gentlemen might well drown those words in applause, because they are the condemnation of this transaction by my hon. friend. The company has gone to the wall; it cannot meet its liabilities. In 1914 we passed legislation to the effect that the moment the company went into default the axe would drop under section 24. My hon. friend gave notice to the stockholders, to Sir Clifford Sifton and others, that they could not come here and get value on that stock after the property has been confiscated. And yet, to-day, the Government come before Parliament and say: "We must save this company or the credit of Canada will be impaired." It was stated this afternoon that it would be much better to send the whole business into the hands of a receiver than to impair the credit of Canada to the extent of half a billion dollars. My hon. friend, who is quick at figures, will perhaps tell me just what the liabilities amount to per capita of our population. I have not made the calculation myself, but I ask my hon. friend was he not affrighted when he took this leap in the dark? He knows that our war debt to-day is over one billion dollars, and before the war is over it will be a very much larger amount. The population of this country is seven million or a little more, and yet my hon. friend comes before Parliament and coolly says that we must give the company more compensation. It is true that they are in default. It is true they have built their system with the public moneys of Canada and of the various provinces. It is true that we have ladled them out tons of silver and gold. Notwithstanding all that, during this terrible war, when the essential thing for Canada is to maintain unimpaired her credit in the financial markets of the world, my hon. friend says: "Yes, I have considered all that, and I now come before Parliament and insist that the Canadian Northern be satisfied." You may say what you like, Mr. Chairman, but I say that this is a scandalous transaction, and we should be given the names of those who are to benefit by it. The public have no voice in this matter, the press being absolutely silent, because it has been silenced, as it happens, unfortunately, in many democracies. It was silenced in New York by the ring that ran New York for so many years, and who, by the way, ended up in Sing Sing. It was silenced in San Francisco until the citizens took the law into their own hands. It was silenced in Chicago a few years ago when a few men were directing the municipal government of that great city, but the day came when a few honest voices were heard, and then the boodlers disappeared and public opinion came into its own.

In conclusion, I want to ask any of those hon. gentlemen who drowned in applause the words of the Solicitor General which I quoted a moment ago, whether they have seriously considered this question. Have they consulted their electors about it, and has it their approval? Were they ever authorized by their electors to countenance this legislation? I will not be stampeded by any one. I represent the farmers of the county of Rouville. I represent the people of this country.

Mr. SMITH: Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not blame him. He wants to get a senatorship. The hon. gentleman will shortly be one of the C.O.D. senators. So we can well understand why he stands so firmly, not for the people of this country, but for Mackenzie and Mann, the masters of this Administration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It must be a very great solace to the heart of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) to get off one or two of these orations occasionally.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not a megaphone.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did you, Mr. Chairman, ever see so fine a spectacle of the form, trappings and the suits of oratory without the substance at all? The hon. gentleman has at last reached that pitiable state of mental hopelessness where he is in the condition ascribed by Macaulay to Southey of being able to believe without reason and to hate without provocation. He also seems to have abundant time for standing around street corners and listening to gossip, or sitting around the club, hearing something there, and retailing it before this Parliament, which, I must say, has much better to do than listen to street corner gossip. "The masters of the Administration," because we offer, because we propose, to take from them their stock and pay its value arbitrated by a competent tribunal. Who were the masters of the Opposition in 1914, when the very same thing was proposed? Who was the master of the hon. member for Rouville when he wanted us, in 1914, to take the same stock for $30,000,000 at a maximum, and pay it to the very same men? Before he voted for that resolution, in 1914, why did he not stand in his might, and majesty, and grace, and demand that we know to whom that $30,000,000 was going? Why did he not ask the leader of the Opposition, whom he was following, to take care that this money did not get into tainted hands? Will he answer? Was he chloroformed then, as he says the press is chloroformed to-day? Ah, the chloroformed press! What is the press that is chloroformed? Is the press to be described as chloroformed because it cannot follow the vaccillating, deviating, methods of hon. gentlemen opposite? How can it follow those hon. gentlemen now, if it followed them three years ago? Is the press expected to turn, because hon. gentlemen turn their backs on their representations? What is the chloroformed press? Is the Toronto Star chloroformed by Mackenzie-Mann money? Is that the insinuation? The Toronto Star approves of this transaction, and approves of this policy. Why does not the hon. gentleman answer? Is the Toronto Globe chloroformed by the money of Mackenzie and Mann? The Toronto Globe will thank the hon. gentleman for his insinuation. After to-night, the last man to mention insinuation in this House should be the hon. member for Rouville—standing here and regaling us with street gossip, and then lecturing us on insinuations. I do not know who are the stockholders of the Canadian Northern, and for my part I am not interested in knowing. I would deal with those stock-holders just the same if the stock were held by the Angel Gabriel as if it were held by His Satanic Majesty?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No doubt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It did not make any difference to the hon. gentleman in 1914 whether he had the information or not, but it has become of great importance now, because he thinks he can throw some nasty thought into the minds of the people of Canada which he does not believe for a minute himself. Never until to-night have I heard the name of Sir Clifford Sifton mentioned in connection with the stock of the Canadian Northern, I had never heard it until I heard it from the lips of the hon. member for Russell and expatiated on later by the hon. member for Rouville. I know Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, are the owners of fifty-one per cent of the stock, and I know those are the only persons with whom we have to deal. I know that, once we make our agreement with them, the others, whoever they may be, have to take their luck on the valuation fixed by the tribunal which values the stock of Mackenzie and Mann Limited. I know nothing whatever about it, but I would be surprised if Sir Clifford Sifton owned a dollar of this stock. I am ready to give the committee not only all I know but all I have any reason to believe as being correct. Fifty-one per cent of the stock is owned by Mackenzie and Mann. Forty per cent is owned by the Dominion of Canada; that is ninety-one per cent. Only nine per cent is left. A substantial part of this nine per cent was owned in England—and I suppose is owned there yet— in respect of a certain bond issue, or more than one bond issue, which was financed or underwritten by a banking firm there. I understand this banking firm got a certain amount of stock as a bonus for the underwriting of the stock. I am not sure if I remember correctly the name of the firm, but if my recollection serves me right it is Lazards. I also understand a director of the company over there, Mr. Horne Payne, owns a portion of the stock I do not know whether that is correct or not. Then the Government of British Columbia has a substantial portion of this nine per cent, which it holds as security for certain construction work of the Canadian Northern Pacific still incomplete. I am speaking subject to correction, and only from my recollection of the information given. I understand the government of British Columbia holds about $1,500,000; in any event, it is a substantial sum. Beyond that, I have never had the slightest information, beyond that I have never made the slightest inquiry, and could not give the committee a particle of information more than I have given. So far as I am aware, no member of the Government has any more information, and I doubt if any member ever happened to get that much.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Could you not exact that information from the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume the company could give the stockholders recorded on their books.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why don't you get it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because it makes no difference in the world. Why did not my hon. friend get it three years ago?

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend say to this House and this country that it makes no difference who the owners of the stock are?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly it makes no difference. We are dealing with Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, the owners of fifty-one per cent of the stock, 10 p.m. and it does not make five cents difference to the country who owns the rest of the stock.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend says that Mackenzie and Mann are the registered owners of five-sixths of the stock of the Canadian Northern railway. If he knows that, why does he not tell us who are the owners of the one-sixth?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because I don't know.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should they not tell us?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not of any importance whatever. If the hon. gentleman will just wait a moment, I will ask him a question. Before he voted for the same resolution in 1914, to submit the same stock to arbitration at a maximum value of $30,000,000, why did he not insist on getting the information he now seeks?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is harping on that. This afternoon, for instance, he undertook to say that I moved in the House three years ago that the proposition should not be considered for six months. That is the species of casuistry my hon. friend deals in. He knows what I moved was a parliamentary motion. He knows that he and his Government voted down the motion of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) that the whole question should be investigated. And he knows that when this motion was voted down my proposition with regard to getting the stock was suggested simply as an alternative.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has that to do with the question I asked? I asked why the hon. gentleman supported an alternative—a third, or fourth, or sixth, I do not know which it was—why did he support that alternative without the very information he is demanding to-night?

Mr. MACDONALD: Because my hon. friend had, as a member the Government, voted down a resolution moved on this side of the House, asking that the information should be given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all, there was no such resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. The resolution of the hon. member from West Middlesex was a direct resolution asking for an investigation into the general affairs of the Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, not asking an investigation as to who owned the stock. After Parliament voted down the resolution that would have required the names of the stockholders, why did the hon. gentleman support a resolution to pay shareholders whose names he had not?

Mr. MACDONALD: We would have found it out had the resolution of the hon. member for West Middlesex carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did he not vote against it? What was the good of finding out who they were after the money was voted?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was suggested to the Government. The Opposition did not pay it, the Government paid it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same proposal precisely, the same principle that hon. gentleman voted for on their own motion in 1914 without inquiry as to who owned the other one-ninth of the shares, they are now opposing, and they say the country cannot deal with the stock until they know who owns it. I know of no objection to getting any information as to who owns the stock. Nobody ever said he would not get the information. I contend that it is not of importance to the committee, but if the committee considers that it is, I see no objection to getting any information available. I never considered that it made the slightest difference to the country, for whom I was acting, whether the stock was owned by Tom Smith in England or John Brown in Canada. I know that Mackenzie, Mann & Co., Limited, own the greater part of the stock and I presume that this country will presume that the people of Canada will do just as fairly by any individual in this country or any other country as by Sir William Mackenzie or Sir Donald Mann.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman has said that Mackenzie, Mann & Co., Limited own 51 per cent of the stock. Will he say whether this stock or any portion of it is pledged, and if so, with whom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I can say to whom it is pledged. Some is pledged to the province of British Columbia but I think the bulk is pledged to their bankers as security for various advances, which advances to a considerable extent I understand were made in respect to undertakings the primary object of which was to bring freight to the company. I do not know the proportion, however, which can be said to be attributable to advances of that nature. My information is, speaking from recollection although I did not pay very close attention, that the whole of the stock is pledged and pledged in support of advances, and particularly to the bankers of Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. MURPHY: Who are the bankers?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Canadian Bank of Commerce.

Mr. MURPHY: I have to express my personal thanks to the Solicitor General for the information which has just been extracted from him. If we had got that information earlier in the evening we would have made very substantial progress. Let me point out what has been going on in this House recently. Within the last two weeks the business of this House has on many occasions been transacted without the quorum required by the rules of Parliament. We have voted estimates without the necessary quorum. We have, indeed, enacted laws without the necessary quorum being present. Now, when a quorum is present, we are asked to pass, perhaps, as important a piece of legislation as ever came before Parliament, without having the information before us which would be insisted upon and exacted by the smallest company doing business in Canada.

Let me illustrate the position of affairs. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), in speaking of the relations between this Government and the Canadian Northern railway, said that this Government came into power and found the Canadian Northern system. I submit that my hon. friend rather inverted the order of things—the Canadian Northern Railway system found my hon. friend and several of his colleagues and put them in power. That was the order of the happening. That having happened, let me illustrate the position of affairs. Up to that time the Minister of Finance had been the capable manager of the National Trust company. In that capacity he occupied a fiduciary position. He was, in point of fact, the trustee for those who had their investments in that company. To-day he occupies an analogous position with relation to the people of Canada. Now, while my hon. friend was manager of the National Trust company, if he had gone to a meeting of the board of directors of that company and had said: Gentlemen, here is a transaction through which I propose to acquire for this company, we will say a railway, here is certain information with regard to it. If he had then been asked: With whom are we dealing, who are the beneficiaries, to whom our money is to be paid? And if my hon. friend had said: Well, I do not know these gentlemen, I do not know who they are—then I submit he would have been told to go and find out who these gentlemen were and not to come back to the board meeting until he had that information. The position is exactly analogous here. The hon. gentleman comes here in a trust capacity. He asks this committee and this Parliament to enter into a transaction, and when he is asked with whom, he says: I do not know. In effect, that is what he says, that personally he has not the information for which the Opposition asks. I for one, having had to endure the spectacle of business in this House being transacted, with regard both to estimates and to legislation, without a quorum, do not propose to sit here and take part in a transaction of this kind without registering my protest against the putting through of this legislation unless we are given the information for which we have asked, information which the Solicitor General has said, in part at least, is reasonable by virtue of the fact that he has furnished some of it himself, where this stock and where these bonds are registered. There are records, and what these records disclose should be made known to us. I agree that it may be impossible to find out at the present moment the stock holding and the bond holding, but at least we should have a knowledge of what the last registration discloses. Without that, I submit, it is improper in the highest degree to ask this committee to proceed with this legislation. I register my protest against such proceedings on the part of the Government.

Mr. NESBITT: I know that the Solicitor General does not wish to misrepresent any one, and so, before leaving that question of the resolution voted on in 1914, I wish to say that the resolution set forth that the whole of the stock was to be pledged with the Dominion Government for a period of five years, and if Mackenzie and Mann in that time were able to make a success of the operation, they were to be handed back the stock which was to be held in trust. Thus, at the end of five years, it would not have been necessary for the Government to find out who held the stock, because they would have held it themselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was on a previous resolution moved by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley).

Later on the bald resolution was proposed, seconded by the hon. gentleman from St. John, to the effect that no aid should be given until the contract was made with the shareholders for the acquisition of the stock in a reasonable time, the value to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed $30,000,000.

Mr. NESBITT: That was in the first resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was the bald resolution moved on the third reading, seconded by the hon. member for St. John. In explaining why the second resolution differed from the first, the hon. gentleman said it had to be changed in order to comply with the rules of Parliament. He made it clear that the Opposition had to change their policy in order to keep straight with the rules. This second resolution was to the effect that contract should be made for the acquisition by the Government of that stock within a reasonable time, the value to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed $30,000,000. It has been argued that that resolution meant that the Government was only to take it up if the Canadian Northern got on well, and took care of its obligations. But the very contrary is the fact. The leader of the Opposition moved that resolution, and in his speech on that occasion said that the would not, under any circumstances, favour taking over a railway that was getting on all right, but the only reason for moving that resolution was because the railway was continually coming back to Parliament, and could not pay its debts. If the railway got on, it was better to leave it in private hands, because he said he was against public ownership. The very opposite principle was laid down by the hon. leader of the Opposition, who moved the resolution, to the principle hon. gentlemen on the other side now seek to advance.

Mr. NESBITT: Has the hon. gentleman that resolution before him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. At page 4634 of the Hansard of 1914, the resolution appears, and reads as follows:

> That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that, under existing circumstances no assistance should be given to the Canadian Northern Railway unless at the same time it is provided that the Government have power, within a reasonable time, to acquire the ownership of the entire stock of the company at a price to be fixed by arbitration, but not to exceed $30,000,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The answer to my hon. friend is that if he had voted for that resolution the country would have saved $15,000,000, because he was proposing to advance $45,000,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, we would have to pay the $15,000,000 anyway, because that sum was to cover necessary expenses for betterment and interest on outlying securities. That money would have to be paid if the Government owned the road, just the same as if the company owned it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman has voted to advance $60,000,000 since that resolution was moved. If he had adopted the resolution moved on this side of the House he would have saved $30,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the resolution said that if we had adopted that agreement we would advance $45,000,000, and would be able to get the common stock at $30,000,000 extra.

Mr. OLIVER: I think this committee has something more important to deal with than what occurred three or four years ago. I submit that, whether our policy was well-judged or ill-judged has nothing to do with the responsibilities resting on the shoulders of the Government to-day. It is only fair, however, to consider the difference in the circumstances between the conditions three years ago and conditions to-day. At the time these matters were under consideration three years ago Parliament was considering the guarantee of $45,000,000 of bonds of the Canadian Northern. The guarantee had not been given, but was under discussion. At that time war had not broken out, and conditions were vastly different from those existing to-day, so that I do not think it is profitable, or to the point, that we should be instructed as to what one member or another member on this side of the House did three years ago, under circumstances entirely different. What was done then was done for good and sufficient reason, and what is being done to-day is being done for good and sufficient reasons, on our side of the House at any rate. Does the Government realize the difference between the conditions as they exist now, and as they were three years ago, when they gave that guarantee of $45,000? What was the debt of Canada at that time? Was it $300,000,000? What is it to-day? $1,200,000,000, or thereabouts, as I understood the Finance Minister to say. Are the conditions the same in assuming a responsibility such as this, with a debt of $1,200,000,000, and the debt piling up and piling up, as it must do for an unknown period? Whether we considered wisely or not in 1914, we should consider wisely to-day where our money is going, what we are going to do with it, and where it is going to come from. If we are to meet the stupendous obligations that have piled up against us, and are piling up against us from day to day, which arise from circumstances not under our control, should we not take every care to restrict the growth of obligations that are under our control? Is that not a reason why we should most carefully consider the taking over of the vast responsibilities of the Canadian Northern railway, if that could possibly be avoided, and is it not a reason why we should consider carefully the payment of money for something that has no value? We are to buy $60,000,000 of the stock of this Canadian Northern Railway company, for what purpose? To give us control of the railway company and of the railway. We do not need to buy $60,000,000 stock of the company in order to get control of it. Mackenzie and Mann have control of the railway to-day and they have only $51,000,000 of that stock, and we could have control of the railway just as complete as Mackenzie and Mann have, if we acquired $11,000,000 of the stock. Therefore, the purchase by this Government of the difference between $11,000,000 and $60,000,000 of stock has absolutely no warrant whatever, except that it is in the nature of a hand-out to the parties concerned. Has Canada money to throw away under such circumstances? Is it confiscation to leave in the hands of whoever may happen to own it to-day $49,000,000 of the stock that they own? There is no confiscation about that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman think it would be fair to the people of Canada to acquire eleven per cent more, own fifty one per cent, take control, and thereby finance the company, continue to finance it, and leave in the hands of private stockholders forty-nine per cent, which stock would get the whole benefit of that financing, and ultimately become of great value?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not so sure that the stock will ultimately become of great value, as a result of Government operation of the road, but I am sure it will become of great value as a result of this bargain. I am satisfied the arbitration provided for in this Act will in fact, as in intent, convey to the owners of that stock money out of the treasury of Canada out of proportion to the value of the stock as a business proposition. It will mean depletion of the treasury of Canada; it will mean injury to the credit of Canada, for the benefit of the parties interested in that stock. Now we know who is interested in the stock; it is not Mackenzie and Mann, but the Bank of Commerce. It is not a matter of rumour or of supposition that the Bank of Commerce is one of that financial group in Toronto that has a strangle hold on the progress and prosperity of this Dominion; that group to render advantage to which this Government exists and for the benefit of which the Government has shaped its legislation since it took office. To-day, for the advantage of that member of the group, it proposes to make such a raid on the Dominion treasury as never was made in the history of the Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that not the Cox group that my hon. friend refers to?

Mr. OLIVER: I could not say; I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the way I have heard it described—as the George A. Cox group.

Mr. OLIVER: Who is Mr. Cox?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is known as the Cox group. Senator Cox was at the head of the group at that time.

Mr. OLIVER: Where is the gentleman whose name the Solicitor-General has used?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is dead.

Mr. OLIVER: For what purpose does my hon. friend drag a dead man's name into this discussion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not drag any name into this discussion.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has my hon. friend never mentioned in this House the name of one who had departed?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not talking about what I have done; I am talking about what my hon. friend has done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never dishonoured the name of any man in this House. I mentioned the name of George A. Cox in connection with the group mentioned by my hon. friend. I do not impugn either him or the group.

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely, the group that is a menace to Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say so.

Mr. OLIVER: I say so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You lampooned him, I did not.

Mr. OLIVER: No, I did not. George A. Cox has passed from this life; he is before another Judge than this Parliament. I did not bring his name here. I am dealing with men who are alive, and who are sitting before me in this House. I say that no such raid was ever made on the treasury of Canada as is being made under the terms of this Bill for the benefit of the Bank of Commerce, by a Government which sits here in large measure because of the exertions and activities of the Bank of Commerce and their allies in the city of Toronto.

I was struck by the suggestion of the Minister of Finance when he deplored the idea that the criticism made by the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) had a political tinge. My hon. friend knows that he and his colleagues sit in the House as the result of one of the wickedest fake campaigns ever carried on in Canada; the most insincere, the most untruthful, the most discreditable that ever took place in this country. Yet my hon. friend deplores the idea of discussing matters that could be construed as having a political connection with a subject that is of the most vital interest to the people. If this proposal is being made honestly in the public interest, why is is not put before Parliament in an honest manner? Why are the facts as to the liabilities, the obligations to be assumed by the people under this measure, not stated in so many words?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the information that my hon. friend speaks of has been given very fully. The balance sheet of the last fiscal year of the Canadian Northern showed the liabilities as of June 30, 1916 I filed the other day a further balance sheet showing the assets and liabilities as of the end of April, which is the latest date at which it is possible to obtain such information. I have given, I think, all the information asked for. I have taken the trouble to have Hansard gone over very carefully with a view to seeing whether any information asked for by the committee had been overlooked. I may have a good many faults, but I do not believe that one of them is that of denying information to Parliament.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not accusing my hon. friend of denying information; I am saying that the most important Bill that has come before Parliament for many years does not contain the facts and the figures, or set forth the limitations in such manner as to give us to understand how far-reaching it is. It is not a matter of balance sheets; it is a matter of obligations expected or intended to be undertaken. When we asked the minister to-night what was the attitude of the Government with regard to the liabilities of the company, he told us that if there were funds in hand to pay those liabilities, they would be paid. But what will happen if there are no funds in hand to pay such liabilities? Those claims that may be made on construction or other account, are they to be paid, or are they to be repudiated? The committee wants to know just how far the Government is going to go in these matters. In one breath we are told that this does not mean any assumption of liability at all beyond the payment for the stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the legal position.

Mr. OLIVER: Is that the position the Government is going to take? Because if it is, then we understand the situation. But surely the Government is not going to take that position. Surely the honour of Canada demands that the Government do not take that position; that they do not step into the shoes of the Canadian Northern Railway company and deal with claims against that company as the company has been dealing with them. If that is what the Government intends to do, then the Government should say so in so many words. It is on such a point as that that I claim the Government has come to us without satisfactory information. We have the right to know what is the attitude of the Government with regard to that matter. We have a right to know also how far the Government considers itself to be obligated to carry out the undertakings of the Canadian Northern Railway company; we have not been informed on that subject. In this Bill we are authorizing the Government to do anything it pleases with the Canadian Northern railway without further authorization from Parliament and without accounting to Parliament for it. When such a transaction amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars, this Parliament will be falling very far short of its duties and responsibilities if it does not at any rate demand the information that will let the country know what is the measure of the liabilities assumed, and what is the nature of the obligations taken upon our shoulders by the terms of this Bill.

There is a feature of this case that it is only fair we should draw to the attention of the committee and of the country when we consider the associations of the transaction. There is outstanding nearly $150,000,000 of the unguaranteed bonds of the Canadian Northern Railway company. If that company is in default, if it is unable to pay the interest on its bonds, I presume those unguaranteed bonds will stand at a very low market value. They will not be worth par; I presume they will not be worth nearly par; in fact, I do not know what they will be worth; but I know that the day the Government, with a sufficient majority at its back, announced to the people of Canada that they were going to assume the control of this railway, that very day, those bonds rose to par.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, they did not.

Mr. OLIVER: I know they appreciated very largely in value, and I know those who had knowledge of the relations between the Canadian Northern and the Government were in a position to reap stupendous profits from that knowledge because of that increase in value. This whole transaction from beginning to end is one that does not appeal to the people of Canada as being an honest transaction, to say nothing about its being a provident transaction. We are to be compelled to pay out of the treasury of this country sums which may amount to $60,000,000 for that which is to-day our property under the statute of 1914; and we are doing that at a time when we are passing the hat to get money to maintain the dependents of our soldiers in the field; at a time when the women of Canada are knitting socks to be provided free to our soldiers; at a time when we are implored to save and serve; at a time when we are told that we must cut out personal extravagance of all kinds, we must restrict individual expenditure in every line, we must restrict what we eat and what we wear; at a time when we are not able to meet, as we should do, all the demands made upon us because of the exigencies of war—at that time, upwards of $60,000,000 is to be taken out of the treasury of Canada to be handed over to the Canadian Bank of Commerce in order that we may have the privilege of carrying the present obligations of the Canadian Northern Railway company and the further inestimable privilege of mismanaging the 9,500 miles of the track which that company owns.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was surprised, coming into the House late in the evening, to hear the Solicitor General, with that superior air which he has chosen to assume towards hon. members during the last year or two since his vanity has been flattered by the Conservative press of the country, telling the committee that he did not know who were the owners of this stock and that he had not taken the trouble to inquire. In other words, this Government has reached the summit of audacity in regard to this matter. At a time when, as my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has told us, the Food Controller is telling us that we cannot eat what we want on two days of the week, when an enormous debt is being piled up on the shoulders of the people of this country, so that the Minister of Finance has been reduced to the lowest depths to which any Minister of Finance has ever been reduced, a responsible minister of the Government has the audacity to tell us that this Government desires to enter into a bargain with some people but he does not think it worth while to find out who they are. Ever since 1914, when, owing to the fact that we have in this Government a Minister of Railways who does not present to Parliament the propositions which his department fathers, the Solicitor General has been given important work to do in connection with railway matters, his vanity has been flattered by the Conservative press. Since his promotion to the Cabinet he has assumed a curious air of superiority to his fellow-members in this House. He affects an air of lackadaisical lack of interest in regard to matters. He always waits until just before the conclusion of a debate before he ventures, with his august majesty, to present his opinions upon any ordinary question that may interest this House; and when he does so, he takes occasion to make statements which he knows he would never venture to make if other hon. gentlemen had an opportunity before the debate closed of replying to them.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Never.

Mr. MACDONALD: The would-be senator sitting on the door-step waiting until the House rises—

Mr. LEMIEUX: He is not in the Senate yet.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. member will never be there, because that requires a property qualification.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am willing to be classed with the poor men and not with the nabobs of this country.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps my hon. friend will marry wealth.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett) has not shown any great desire for the conscription of wealth. He is anxious to conscript anything but the money he has. He is conserving his wealth until he gets into the Senate, into which he has not shown very great signs of getting.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Very well.

Mr. MACDONALD: He is standing by the wayside. When we find an hon. gentleman like the hon. member for East Simcoe who has been doing the dirty work of the Conservative party—

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I rise to a point of order. I ask that the hon. member withdraw the expression that I have been doing the dirty work of the Conservative party.

Mr. MACDONALD: To what does my hon. friend object?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: To the use of that expression.

Mr. E. M MACDONALD: What kind of work has my hon. friend been doing?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I ask the Chairman to rule on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Dugald Stewart): I do not think the language used by the hon. member is parliamentary.

Mr. MACDONALD: What part of it?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Dugald Stewart): That the hon. gentleman has been doing dirty work. That is my ruling.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would be very glad to qualify the expression if I could, in any other manner, fitly describe the performances of my hon. friend in this House.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I rise to a point of order—

Mr. MACDONALD: Let me finish. The use of the particular adjective, which, under your judgment, Mr. Chairman, is contrary to the rules of debate, I am willing to withdraw. My hon. friend, who is known to have been disappointed on different occasions during the session when people were appointed to the Senate, can allow the Solicitor General and myself to discuss this question without interruptions from him. The Solicitor General this afternoon, in that characteristic way of his of challenging somebody on the other side of the House to do something which he knows that other to be prevented from doing under the rules of debate, challenged me this afternoon to show where he had declared that section 24 of the Canadian Northern Railway Act of 1914 meant an absolute foreclosure of the interests of that railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

Mr. MACDONALD: What did my hon. friend say?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said that I had never stated section 24 to mean that on default the equity of redemption automatically became the property of the Government. I stated most clearly that it did mean the foreclosure, and on such terms and conditions as Parliament should prescribe.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is sidestepping.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not in the slightest.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend did not use that language this afternoon. He challenged me to prove that the effect of section 24 was that this Parliament had the right, in case of default, automatically to take over the road without compensation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that either.

Mr. MACDONALD: I will read what my hon. friend said in 1914, and we will see how far it differs from what he said this afternoon. Let me say this: If section 24 of the Act of 1914 gives this Parliament the right absolutely to declare that the equity of redemption in all the property of the Canadian Northern could be foreclosed without compensation, then my hon. friend had no right to challenge me on the subject this afternoon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated then, and I state again now, that we have the right to do it. I stated that the shareholders placed themselves absolutely in the power of this Parliament, who are to exercise that right in such a way as would be in the interests of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend went farther than that in 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is the greatest sidestepper in this House. He pronounces with more assurance, whether natural or acquired, on questions of law than any judge on the bench would assume. My hon. friend is on record as to the meaning of section 24, and in the light of his challenge to me this afternoon I will read exactly what he said. After enumerating the various guarantees the people of Canada had that the Canadian Northern would not come back for assistance, and after stating that we would control the railway for all time, he went on to say, as an alternative proposition—(Hansard p. 3693):

> Or, if we choose, we can ourselves, by Act of Parliament, legislate that that road is the property of the people of this country and that the interests of all persons whatsoever outside of the people of Canada are eliminated. The idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all stockholders parties to this contract, and we say to them: We now and here bind you that should the day of default come you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever, but you here and now leave the Parliament of this country free from any such question and untrammelled in every way to deal with the property of the Canadian Northern as it may be advised in the interests of the people of this country. That is the summary procedure outlined here for taking over the road.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: I can understand the mentality of some hon. gentlemen who see sunbeams in cucumbers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We see one now.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Solicitor General have caught his spirit of casuistry, and would in a Machiavelian way misdirect the judgment of the House of Commons and of the people of this country. If I understand the English language, the statement of the Solicitor General was that in case of default the Canadian Northern could not come to Parliament and say "You are going to confiscate our interests in this road." Parliament had the power to do exactly what it liked having regard to the interests of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend's coadjutor this afternoon, the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) in the midst of a very peculiar address in which he first of all denounced this measure, but subsequently worked himself into a mood where he was prepared to vote for it, held up his hands in holy horror at the suggestion that there should be any question of confiscation; Parliament should never consider the question of confiscating the equity of redemption. Yet the Solicitor General told us in 1915 that we were giving notice to the Canadian Northern people to this effect in case of default: "Don't you come here and suggest a proposition of confiscation. The Parliament of Canada will deal with this problem in the interests of the Canadian people without any regard to any suggestion of confiscation." This afternoon he had the temerity to argue that in the interests of the Canadian people at this moment, instead of exercising our rights under the statute of 1914 and paying no money at all, we should initiate a new proposition under which this country is to be committed to a further additional expenditure of $100,000,000. If he has the temerity to suggest that that is in the interests of the people of Canada, all I can say is he is a casuist of the first order. Does he suggest that it is in the interests of the people of Canada to provide for an arbitration board to investigate, after the Drayton-Acworth report has told us there is nothing to investigate? Does he think it is in the interests of the people of Canada to arrange to pay to some person or persons unknown whatever sum of money might be arrived at by the arbitrators, without any reference to the rules of evidence, and having regard only to the fantastical basis of valuation suggested by the Minister of Finance? Does he mean to tell us that it is in the interests of the people of Canada to do that to-day, when he told us in 1914 that we could acquire the equity of redemption without any compensation and without anybody suggesting the idea of confiscation?

My hon. friend has had the temerity to submit to this House and to Parliament some perfectly wonderful propositions during the time he has been permitted to be the first lieutenant of the Prime Minister, but his temerity and assurance will not enable him to satisfy either this House or the country that an arbitration by means of which certain unnamed parties are to receive from the Canadian people a sum in the vicinity of $100,000,000 is better than exercising the right which in 1914 he said existed notwithstanding any allegation of confiscation.

Hon. gentlemen come to Parliament and submit this proposition, the first section of which authorizes the Government to secure a certain amount of stock in trust for His Majesty "on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths thereof." My hon. friend wants to know whether it is a matter of importance to know who are the owners and pledgees of the stock. In an airy way he suggested that he was not very much interested, and had not made much inquiry into the matter. Either he or his colleague, the Minister of Finance, knows something about this matter. The Minister of Finance told us on August 1, 1917, that of this $60,000,000 stock, par value, of the Canadian Northern, "about five-sixths is available for transfer in the near future, being held by private owners and by pledgees." How does the Minister of Finance know that, unless he has made inquiry?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We stated that. My hon. friend was out. We stated who owned the five-sixths.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who does?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who are the pledgees?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Canadian Bank of Commerce.

Mr. MACDONALD: Of the whole of it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure. I think substantially the whole of it.

Mr. MACDONALD: "Not sure."—"Substantially". Of what use is information of that kind to the House? What is the use of my hon. friend coming to Parliament and telling us he is not sure?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will my hon. friend allow me? The agreement becomes operative upon five-sixths of the stock being lodged. Mackenzie Mann & Company, Limited, are in a position to lodge that stock.

Mr. MACDONALD: How can they be if it is pledged?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They would have to arrange with the pledgees. The agreement becomes operative when five-sixths—that is to say about $51,000,000—of the stock, is lodged.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend told the House on August 1st, that all of that stock was available, therefore, he must have made inquiries. Now, there is no need of having any uncertainty about it. Who are the registered owners of that stock, and who are the pledgees? That is what we want to know.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That has been stated as to five-sixths of the stock. We have not the information as to the balance. We may be able to get it. The Dominion Government owns $40,000,000, and there are $51,000,000 to be lodged under this agreement, that leaves $9,000,000 of stock in regard to which we have not information as to who are the owners. I believe a considerable portion of it is held in Great Britain. The Solicitor General made a statement in regard to it to-night.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend told me a few moments ago in regard to the five-sixths that the great majority of it was pledged with the Canadian Bank of Commerce. He also said there was some part about which he would not speak. Why does not he deal with this very serious and important problem along the most frank lines? If this Government has nothing to conceal in regard to the matter, all it has to do is ask the proper authorities of the Canadian Northern for a copy of the stock register, to be laid upon the table of the House, showing in whose name the stock is registered, both in regard to the five-sixths and the one-sixth. There is no use of talking about one-sixth of the stock being held in England. If it is held in England the stock register of the Canadian Northern Railway company will show who holds it, if it is not held in England, then the stock register of the company will show where it is held. My hon. friend has intimated to the House that five-sixths is available for transfer in the near future. It is held by private owners, and by pledgees. That means my hon. friend must have had such communication with the private owners of five-sixths of the stock, and with the pledgees, that he was in a position to make an agreement with them based on the terms of this Act. Otherwise he would not have made the statement.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the position as I understand it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then, my hon. friend qualifies it somewhat. He now states it is the position as he understands it. We have had so many questions about this Canadian Northern railway; we have had so many documents laid upon the table of the House; we have had so many returns of Parliament in regard to aid for the enterprise —$15,000,000, $45,000,000, $15,000,000; in all $75,000,000 of money of the Canadian people have gone within the last five years—yet my hon. friend tells us simply that he understands certain things, and that the stockholders of the company are unknown. He and the Government should have laid upon the table of the House a definite statement showing who held every dollar of that stock, according to the stock register of the company. On what possible basis can this Government expect Parliament and this country to enter into this unnecessary arrangement—this arrangement which, if the Government had carried out the terms of its statute passed in 1914 would never be necessary? Upon what possible grounds can the Government come and ask Parliament to-day what they are asking, and at the same time withhold from Parliament and the country the names of the men who are to receive the money awarded by the arbitrators to be appointed under this Act? I venture to say that at no time in the history of this or any other Parliament has any Government ever had the temerity to approach Parliament with any such proposition. Will not my hon. friend say that he will obtain from the Canadian Northern Railway company a statement, under the hand of their secretary, showing who are the registered holders of all that stock, so that we shall know who are to receive the benefit of whatever award may be given? I listened to the remarks of my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) this afternoon with a great deal of interest. If he was correct in his statement in regard to the $25,000,000 of income charge convertible debenture stock, and the fact that the holders thereof have the right to receive stock in the Canadian Northern Railway company therefore, over and above the $100,000,000 which we are discussing as being the amount of the stock of the Canadian Northern railway, this Parliament has a right to know who are the holders of that $25,000,000. No attempt was made by the Solicitor General this afternoon to answer the hon. member for Calgary on this subject. What possible objection can hon. gentlemen have to getting that information? Do my hon. friends think that they can get a measure through Parliament by putting up the Solicitor General to tell us, as he did this afternoon, that because I moved what is known as a six months' hoist of a measure, that that was to be a solution of the problem? Such a claim is childish nonsense, My hon. friend has a good deal of temerity if he wishes to attempt to mislead this House into the belief that a motion for the reading of a measure this day six months is not an absolute negative of the measure, but is not intended to mean that it is to be considered some time in the future. If he suggests anything of the kind, he is presuming on the credulity of the House, to a rare degree for him, although he attempts some very strong things. If that is the method in which this Government is going to approach this scheme, if they think the credulity of the House is so great that it can be misled with propositions of this kind, and that it is not necessary to give Parliament and the country the information as to who owns this stock and who are going to get this money, then I say my hon. friends are presuming too much. We are late in the session, and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have no desire to prolong it unduly, but if the Government refuses to give us information, and if, for instance, it declines to give us ordinary and natural information to which the Parliament and the country are entitled, then it may become our duty to insist upon that information being given. Upon what possible ground can hon. gentlemen attempt to befool the House on this question by telling us, after long deliberation, that the Canadian Bank of Commerce are pledgees of the $51,000,000, if they do not give the information about the other $9,000,000, or the $25,000,000 outstanding? If the Government was candid or fair, and if its measure was one in which it had confidence, if there was no underlying motive behind the proposition, if it did not have some object to serve, some person to please, some provision to make for some particular interest, it would at once put its cards on the table and let the House and the country know just where it stood, and who will receive this money.

11 p.m.

Who are to receive this money? My hon. friend's failure to be candid with this House and with the country indicates a condition of affairs which demands further inquiry. And honourable gentlemen cannot refuse it in the face of the reasonable request that we on this side of the House make when we claim that we have a right to know who are the owners of this stock and with whom it is pledged. What is the use of talking in a dilettante way about some of this stock being owned in England. If it is in England, the Minister of Finance is too old a hand in company business not to know that all he has to do is to go to the Canadian Northern Railway company and ask them to tell him who are the registered holders of the stock on the books, and then he can give the information to Parliament. Why should he not give it? If these men who are the registered holders of this stock according to the books of the Canadian Northern Railway company have pledged it elsewhere, if the Canadian Northern Railway company people know that, they ought to tell us, and they should also tell us in regard to their share of that $25,000,000 of convertible stock whether Canada is going to be called on to meet that amount now or at some other time. My hon. friend will realize that if the value of every one of those shares is fixed by arbitration, that is, if the value of the five sixths is fixed by arbitration, that fixes the value of the $9,000,000 shares, it fixes the value of the $25,000,000 shares. This arbitration, made under an agreement, is one which would not be set aside by outside tribunals. Why should we not know who is going to benefit by it? The failure of the government to give a reason indicates a suppression of facts, the intent, the deliberate intent, to refuse to the people of this country the knowledge to which they are entitled. Has any government ever come to Parliament and asked for such a carte-blanche contract as the one pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) this afternoon?—whereby under section 3:

> For such purposes they may make advances of the consolidated revenue fund, may guarantee payment in whole or in part, and may give the obligations or securities of the government in connection therewith.

Ad libitum, no limit, absolutely without any attempt to indicate to the Government how far they should go—a blank cheque whereby the Minister of Finance can draw upon the treasury of this country without limitation. And yet this Government declined to tell this House and the country who are going to be the beneficiaries of all this blank cheque authority. I say that every hon. member in this House would be recreant to his duty to Parliament and the country, to the people who sent him here, if he did not insist upon having, without any equivocation, all the information it is possible for this Government to get. They can get it all because otherwise they never would have made this proposition to Parliament; they never would have made it if they did not know where they were going to land. Are we going to have it or are we not? There is the question, and I leave it with the committee.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In reply to my hon. friend's question about the income convertible debenture stock, he realizes that if that stock was sold, as I believe it was, in England, it would be difficult to obtain the names of the owners. Not only that, but that income debenture stock is a liability of the company. It may be convertible into stock, but it is obvious that it would not be converted into stock unless it would pay the holders to so convert; that is to say, unless the stock of the Canadian Northern railway was worth par. As the income convertible debenture stock is convertible up until 1919, it is obvious to the House that there is no chance whatever of the $25,000,000 of income charge convertible stock being converted into stock of the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not if the arbitrators give par for the common stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is talking what he knows to be nonsense when he speaks of the arbitrators giving par for the stock.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all. Why should they not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: During the passage of this resolution through the committee information of various character was asked for by hon. gentlemen opposite, and so far as I know, all information has been supplied. I said that I had even had an official go through Hansard with a view of seeing whether anything had been overlooked. So far as bonds and debentures are concerned, it seems clear to me it is not possible to obtain the names of the holders, because those are bearer securities that pass from hand to hand. Even in the case of debenture stock, transfer can be made in blank. So far as the five-sixths is concerned, it is necessary only that five-sixths of the stockholders should be known to be willing to deposit under this agreement, because the agreement becomes operative when the five-sixths do so deposit; and so far as the remainder is concerned, they would have to come in or the Government could declare their stock vested in His Majesty. The information asked for we shall endeavour to obtain. It does not seem to be of very much consequence to know the ownership of nine per cent of the stock when we have ninety-one, but we shall probably be able to get the names of shareholders that are on record. I do not think that would necessarily show the real shareholders, because the shares may have been assigned in blank under power of attorney or otherwise. At all events it would be the shareholders on record on the books of the company.

The discussion to-night has been of a general character, such as might have occurred on the second reading rather than in committee. I would suggest that the committee rise. Or perhaps we could take up clause 1 and make some progress and then proceed with it to-morrow.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. OLIVER: Clause 1 is the Bill. Would the minister give direct answer to my question as to the intention of the Government in regard to liabilities of the company which could be established, and which we must meet? Is it the understanding of the Government that these claims will be paid off, or is the Government going to take the stand that it is not bound to pay them?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know to what claims my hon. friend refers.

Mr. OLIVER: I am asking the general principle.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend knows that we are not changing the status of the Canadian Northern railway or of any of the subsidary or constituent companies, it is simply a change of the shareholders of the company. Instead of the present shareholders, the Dominion Government become shareholders. But, from a strictly legal standpoint, the Dominion Government does not become in privity with the creditors of the Canadian Northern Railway company. Of course the Government acquire the Canadian Northern Railway company as a going concern, and the result is that claims against the railway company, just claims, would still be just claims against the railway company, and the Dominion Government would from time to time have to finance the Canadian Northern railway as it has done in the last two or three years. The only difference now is that our financing will inure to the benefit of the people of Canada, because the stock is owned by the Government on behalf of the people.

Mr. NESBITT: Is not the difference now that the Government really own the company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They own the stock of it.

Mr. NESBITT: They own the company.

Mr. GRAHAM: They own the company.

Mr. OLIVER: It is established, then, that the Government, by taking over the stock, is taking over the liabilities of the company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, it is not.

Mr. OLIVER: That is the point I wish to make clear—yes or no.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a different thing. The Dominion Government will become the stockholder of the Canadian Northern to the extent of $100,000,000. That is, they will own and control its stock, and the other companies will run as companies, will contract liabilities within their corporate powers, and carry on the business for which they were constituted. If the Canadian Northern requires to finance, as it does for the purpose of meeting its obligations, whether of underlying interest or otherwise, it would ask the Dominion Government to put it in funds for the purpose. The Dominion Government would make an advance to the Canadian Northern Railway company, and the Canadian Northern Railway company would use that advance for the purpose of paying its liabilities, whether on interest account or otherwise. The true position is that the Dominion Government is not legally liable in respect of the liabilities of the Canadian Northern or its constituent companies, but will continue this system as a going concern; it is the purpose of the Dominion Government to continue this system as a going concern, and from time to time to finance it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The stock being fully paid up?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The stock being fully paid up. If the stock were partially paid up, there would be a liability on the unpaid stock.

Mr. OLIVER: It is the policy of the Government to finance the company as a consequence of having the ownership of the stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: So far as the interests of Canada require, the Dominion Government would from time to time finance the Canadian Northern Railway company, in order to carry on the enterprise. That does not mean that the Canadian Northern Railway company, owned by the Dominion Government, must at once commence extensions here, there, or the other place.

Mr. OLIVER: Not at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It means that it will be run having regard to the existing financial situation and the transportation needs of the people of Canada whom it serves.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that is entirely satisfactory. It is understood now, that, as a consequence of this transaction the financing—that is the carrying on of the Canadian Northern railway—will in fact be a charge upon the treasury of Canada ?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would not put it that way. I will tell you why: because it is in the discretion of the Dominion Government to make advances, or to withhold advances, and to decide as to the amount of advances; in other words, we own the stock, and it is for the Dominion Government to determine to what extent it will finance the Canadian Northern Railway system. But it is the intention that the Canadian Northern Railway system shall continue to be operated, in the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Finance Minister, as holder of the stock, will ask the Finance Minister of Canada if he will advance him some money to carry on the undertaking ?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He will ask the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: It resolves itself into one and the same thing, with the entity of the Canadian Northern remaining intact.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like to know from my hon. friend concerning the implementing legislation, which it is contemplated to bring down in a few days as was stated the other day by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, as regards the Quebec and Saguenay railway, which has for its object to pay the same group of gentlemen who are interested in the Canadian Northern. I am informed the same group of financiers are the bondholders of the Quebec and Saguenay and the Quebec and Montmorency. I am told they are creditors to the amount of $3,000,000 worth of bonds, and that the contemplated legislation has for its object the payment of those bondholders.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no information as to the bondholders or where the bonds are held, nor have I had the legislation to which he refers before me. I have been engaged with other matters.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the hon. minister endeavour to give to the House a statement as to the registered stockholders of the Canadian Northern?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not believe it would be possible to obtain it for tomorrow. I think we shall have to do some cabling to get it.

Mr. MACDONALD: If five-sixths of the stock is held by one group of people, and one-sixth held by others, a telegram to Toronto would get it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would obtain the information as to the local register. I am not sure as to the other.

Mr. SINCLAIR: When procuring that information, will the hon. minister obtain information as to who holds the stock of the affiliated companies? If I understand the statement submitted to the House, there is about $6,000,000 of the stock of the affiliated companies held by people outside Mackenzie and Mann Limited, and it would be important to know also who the people are who hold that $6,000,000 stock of the affiliated companies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will try to get that information but it would be quite impossible to get it by to-morrow.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Friday, August 17, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1917-18.

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting a supplementary estimate for the year ending March 31, 1918, was presented by Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

HARVEST HELP FROM UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): I desire to ask the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) certain questions with regard to the regulations under which harvesting help may enter Canada, and, with the permission of the House, I will read a short extract from a letter, which shows the circumstances in the district south of Swift Current, where the entry offices are far apart:

> I live on the International line forty miles south of Admiral, and am familiar with conditions on both sides of the line. The last three years there have been hundreds cross at harvest and threshing time, but this year the report has spread that the regulations are so drastic that they are afraid to come into the country.

In view of this report, I would ask if the minister could not issue an announcement that bona fide harvesters will not be interfered with, and that they need not travel to far distant points to get the necessary certificate.

Mr. ROCHE: Such an arrangement has been entered into between the Government of Canada and the Government at Washington. The deputy minister is working out the details. It is the intention of the Government to waive the immigration regulations. Such an announcement will be made —in fact, it has already been made in the press.

PRICE OF BRAN IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce taken any steps to confirm or contradict the statement contained in the clipping from Farm and Dairy, which I read the other day, as to the price at which Canadian millers were selling bran in Canada and in the United States? It is only fair that I should state my reasons for asking the question. I have a letter from the manager of one of the largest mills in Canada in which he states as follows:

> At Montreal and points, taking same rates, the price of bran was $35 per ton sacked, in comparison with
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Buffalo | $41.00 |
> | Toledo | 40.00 |
> | New York | 41.00 |
> | Boston | $38.00 to 40.00 |
> | Philadelphia | $41.00 to 42.00 |

It would depend, of course, somewhat on the duty on bran going to the other side whether the prices were higher there than here.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Inquiries are being made, and the information so far obtainable goes to show that bran is not sold at lower prices on the other side, as compared with prices charged to our own farmers.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM AVERY BISHOP, V.C.

CONSPICUOUS GALLANTRY OF A CANADIAN OFFICER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): I desire to refer to the case of a Canadian officer who has been honoured on three different occasions for distinguished conduct at the front. The record of one person being awarded these three distinctions is most unusual. In a supplement to the London Gazette, dated August 11, is contained the approval of His Majesty the King for the award of the Victoria Cross to Captain William Avery Bishop, whose father resides at Owen Sound, Ontario. Captain Bishop belongs to the Canadian Cavalry, and was attached to the Royal Flying Corps. He already possesses the Distinguished Service Order and the Military Cross. Reference has already been made to the matter in the press, but I thought it desirable to convey the facts to the House in order that a record of them may be placed on Hansard. The paragraph in the London Gazette reads as follows:

The award was made for most conspicuous bravery, determination and skill. Bishop, working independently, flew first to an enemy aerodrome. Finding no machine about, he flew to another aerodrome about three miles southeast, and at least twelve miles behind the German line. Seven machines, some with engines running, were on the ground there. He attacked these from about fifty feet up, and a mechanic who was starting an engine was seen to fall. One enemy aeroplane got off the ground but from a height of sixty feet Bishop fired fifteen rounds at very close range and it crashed to the ground. A second machine got off the ground; Bishop fired thirty rounds at one hundred and fifty yards' range and it fell into a tree. Two more machines then rose. One he engaged at a height of one thousand feet. The enemy machine crashed to the ground three hundred yards from the aerodrome. Afterwards Bishop emptied the whole drum from his machine gun into a fourth enemy aeroplane and then returned to his station. Four hostile scouts were about one thousand feet above him for about a mile on the return journey, but would not attack. Bishop's machine was very badly shot about by machine gun fire from the ground.

CANADIAN LOAN IN NEW YORK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the following statement appearing in the American press:

Wall Street reported that the largest check which has ever passed through the New York clearing house was paid yesterday by the Liberty National bank. The check was for $96,111,111, drawn by J. P. Morgan & Co. to the order of the agents of the Bank of Montreal for the credit of the Minister of Finance and the Receiver General of Canada.

In answer to a question which I asked in the House the other day, the statement was made that the net proceeds of this loan amounted to $96,250,000. This statement shows a difference of $138,889. I would like to know which statement is correct.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The statement which I gave my hon. friend. The $111,000 represents the interest.

Mr. MACDONALD: But it is $138,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is another fact which has a bearing upon this question. The Government availed itself of the very capable services of Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, of the Bank of Montreal, who negotiated the loan, and received a rebate of one quarter of one per cent commission; so that the flotation expenses were about one and three quarters per cent instead of two per cent. My hon. friend will see, if he disregards the item of interest, and makes allowance for one-quarter of one per cent, that the answer which I made is accurate.

WESTERN COAL SUPPLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) intimated that to-day he would make a statement with regard to the supply of Pennsylvania coal in the West.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that I can say anything very definite about it. The facts which are apparent are these. First, there is a great and unprecedented call for coal in the United States. Second, both water and railway carriage are inadequate for the quick supply of coal, and that reacts upon the output of the mines. That applies particularly to the eastern and middle portions of the United States. As regards the lakes, the chief difficulty has been and is the matter of railroad transport from the mines to lake ports. Lack of means of transport has had the effect of causing several, perhaps many, grain and ore vessels to come back to the north with water ballast rather than with coal. Everything that can be done by the United States authorities and by the Fuel Controller is being done to co-ordinate the transport facilities and to hasten the delivery of coal. As to what will be accomplished, I cannot speak definitely at present.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister kindly tell us what is being done? The condition that he speaks of with regard to transportation is well known.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that I can tell my hon. friend what is being done; that would take a long time.

Mr. KNOWLES: You have lots of time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All I can say is that, in short, everything possible is being done by the Fuel Controller and his aides who are acting in close co-operation and sympathy with the authorities on the other side of the line. If my hon. friend wants to know the exact number of cars that are hauling coal or the exact tonnage that is being hauled, that I cannot give him at this time. A great deal of examination would be necessary to procure that information.

CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

CONSIDERATION OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL RESUMED IN COMMITTEE.

Consideration in committee of Bill No. 125, providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company—Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance)—resumed from Thursday, August 16, Mr. D. Stewart in the Chair.

On section 1—Acquisition of shares of Canadian Northern railway authorized:

Mr. GRAHAM: When the Government took over the 40 per cent of Canadian Northern shares they appointed representatives on the board of directors. These representatives must have made some report to the Government; I imagine that they would make a report with regard to the Drayton-Acworth report. Have they done so, and if so, should not the minister give us that report?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There was communication from the directors representing the Government on the board with respect to the Drayton-Acworth report, but we have not regarded it as expedient to make it public; it might have an effect in connection with the arbitration proceedings. It is of a confidential character, and the Department of Justice thinks that it should not be made public. It calls attention to the omissions from the report to which I referred the other day.

Mr. GRAHAM: Was it signed by the Government directors only, or by the entire board of directors?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it was signed by the three Government directors only. Certain information was asked for last evening, which I am endeavouring to obtain, but which I am not yet in a position to give to the committee. As this information was asked for in connection with section 1, my suggestion is that that section be allowed to stand and that we take up sections 2, 3 and 4 with a view to seeing whether we can make some progress with one or more of them.

I desire to give notice of some amendments with respect to clauses 2, 3 and 4, and in connection with those amendments I desire to make a few observations to the committee. It has been drawn to my attention by members of the House that section 3 gives the Governor in Council very wide powers indeed as to paying out money, issuing securities and giving guarantees. I wish to explain to the committee why that wide discretion was considered necessary in connection with this measure. It is possible to estimate with a reasonable degree of accuracy the shortage which would require to be made up to meet underlying interest indebtedness incurred and to be incurred and for betterments and the purchase of rolling stock. But it is not possible to estimate what amount of money will be required to meet maturing short-term obligations. I explained to the House that a number of short-term obligations of the Canadian Northern Railway company would mature from time to time during this and next year. I expressed the hope that the Canadian Northern Railway company would be able to meet those obligations by renewing them or making fresh issues from the proceeds of which they would be paid. However, on account of war conditions it is not certain that they will be able to do that; therefore it was considered advisable that the Dominion Government should take this power, this wide discretion, in order to be in a position to take care not only of underlying interest charges that the net earnings were not sufficient to meet needed betterments and equipment payments, but also one or more, possibly, of these short-term obligations, if it should chance that the Canadian Northern Railway company should not be able to provide the necessary funds to meet them as they matured. The result is that this clause was drafted, which is very wide in its terms; indeed, when I was considering it I thought that it was too wide in its terms. I believe that so far as possible Parliament should be acquainted with the objects for which expenditures are made; in other words, that wherever possible there should be an estimate. I have accordingly drafted an amendment to section 3, of which I now desire to give notice. Before reading the amendment I would call the attention of the committee to the concluding portion of subsection 1 of section 3, which states that the Governor in Council may guarantee payment in whole or in part and may give the obligations or securities of the Government in connection therewith.

The object of that was that the Government, instead of paying cash, might give its securities, and it might be able to guarantee a debt and in that way continue the obligation without immediate payment. But on thinking the matter over, I have reached the conclusion that I would rather be without those powers; that is, I would rather that the Dominion Government, instead of issuing securities in payment of obligations and instead of giving guarantees, to which of course there is a certain objection, should pay cash in connection with such financing as it has to do for this system. The amendment of which I purpose giving notice is this:

That all the words after "Fund" on line 4 page 2, of the Bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

Provided however that until authorized by Parliament the total of such advances shall not exceed the sum of $25,000,000. A statement of any such advances showing in detail the purposes for which they were applied shall be presented to Parliament by the Minister of Finance within twenty days after the opening of the next ensuing session thereof.

As nearly as I can estimate, $25,000,000 ought until the next session to carry the system, including payments of obligations so far as we are able to estimate that they will fall due and cannot be renewed—and that is to some extent a matter of conjecture—and take care of all the interest payments and the payments for betterments and instalments upon rolling stock.

The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), in his very interesting and able speech yesterday, referred to another matter which, I think is of some importance. He referred to the fact—and it is an undoubted fact—that the cost of labour and of material of all kinds is very much higher to-day owing to war conditions than it was in the period preceding the war or than it is likely to be in the period succeeding the war. The point he made was that the arbitrators might, in reaching a conclusion as to the value of this stock, be guided, to some extent, by the reproduction cost of the physical assets of the Canadian Northern Railway company on a basis of war conditions. He thought it would be desirable that that should be obviated. Personally I would not be disposed to agree with the view that the arbitrators in valuing stock would, if they considered, in connection with such valuation, the reproduction cost of the physical assets of the system, regard the higher prices during war conditions as governing that cost. The point was made yesterday by the Solicitor General that, if the Government were expropriating the physical assets of the Canadian Northern Railway company, possibly such a course might be adopted. My own view is that, even in that case, it would not be adopted by a board of arbitrators, because it seems to me it would be manifestly wrong to take the inflated prices of material and equipment of every kind and the high cost of labour into account in reaching a conclusion as to the fair price to be paid for the physical properties of a railway company expropriated at a time like this. My opinion is not entitled to the weight of that of either the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) or the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). In this connection, however, I would like to call attention to the view of Professor Swain, to which I referred the other day, as to the principles of valuation. Professor Swain at page 4 of his report emphasizes earning power as to the principal test of value, and I will quote him again for the information of the committee. He says:

There is no sentiment about a commercial property like a railroad. The real value of such a property is measured by its earning power and by nothing else. No matter how costly or how inexpensive it may have been originally, its value in exchange will be measured by its earning power. Prospective earning power, perhaps under altered conditions, must of course be considered. Some properties, therefore, have a so-called "strategic" value, because, while they may earn nothing by themselves, they may be combined with other properties in a way to produce or enhance earnings.

Then his statement on the next page with regard to the valuation of physical assets is this:

Just what the present value, or the fair present value may be, is not easy to state, and probably cannot be stated. The courts, however, have frequently stated what it is not. They have again and again laid down the principle that it is not original cost. In some instances they have stated that it is not the cost of the reproduction new, but it is generally admitted, I think, that both the original cost and cost of reproduction new, and also the depreciation, depending upon circumstances, are all elements which may affect the judgment as to the "fair value."

He emphasizes earning power actual and potential, but in connection with a railway system such as this, my own view would be that if potential earnings were considered at all, it could be considered only as to the company in private hands as it is to-day, and in the serious financial position in which it is. I stated that the other day. I would not admit for a moment that the prospective earning power of this system in the hands of a strong Government able to finance it should be considered by the arbitrators. On page 6, Professor Swain deals with this question which was raised by the hon. member for Calgary and as to which I purpose giving notice to-day of an amendment. This is what Professor Swain says:

> These principles were briefly discussed with your commission before the beginning of the work. The problem, therefore to be performed by the force under my direction, was to ascertain the cost of reproduction new of the properties in question at the present time. By the phrase "at the present time" is not to be understood the present moment, in view of the inflated prices for materials and labour which have come about as a result of the war; but rather, the fair cost of reproduction new, assuming that the properties were to be reproduced at fair average prices prevailing during a brief period of years just before the war.

Professor Swain, therefore, in dealing with the question of reproduction cost in war time, clearly states that the inflated prices for material and labour are not to be taken into account, but rather that there should be considered the fair cost of reproduction "assuming that the properties were to be reproduced at fair average prices prevailing during a brief period of years just before the war." I do not make his sentiments my own, because I do not think the matter is one on which I am called upon to express an opinion. But I desire to make the point that it is not probable that a board of arbitrators in fixing the value of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company would be guided in their deliberations by the bearing which the high prices prevailing during the war have on the cost of reproduction. But after all is said and done, the question is a legal one, and one upon which I think no chances should be taken, and I therefore give notice that when we reach section 4 I shall move to add the following to subsection 2:

> In determining the value of the said six hundred thousand shares the arbitrators, should they regard it as expedient to take into consideration the reproduction cost of the Canadian Northern Railway System, shall not include therein the increase in value, due to the war, of labour, materials, equipment or of any property.

Mr. NESBITT: Does my hon. friend propose striking out the words "as of the date of the said agreement," in subsection 2? Otherwise, I think they will conflict with his amendment.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) raised the point the other day, and I am not sure that it makes any difference whether we change the words or allow them to stand, but when we are considering the subsection I shall be glad to hear the views of the committee, and if it appears that the words should be changed at an earlier date selected, we can make the change.

There is one other amendment of which I wish to give notice, and that is that all the words after "Fund" on line 38, page 2 of the Bill, be struck out. The subsection will then read:

> The amount of the value so determined shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The subsection as it now stands suggests that these shares might be paid for by the issue of securities, or by an indebtedness secured by the deposit of securities. Personally, I do not like arrangements of that kind, and I would rather, as I stated in connection with the previous section, that the Dominion pay cash.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has my hon. friend considered the point suggested by my hon. friend from Calgary with reference to the phrase "the said arbitrators. . . . may apply their own judgment in determining such value"? I agree with my hon. friend from Calgary, if I understood him correctly, that if the arbitrators may apply their own judgment it will be no use allowing an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am extremely obliged to my hon. friend, for I had overlooked that point. The reason why those words were inserted was that the arbitrators might be able to proceed expeditiously in determining the value of the stock. But there does appear to be a doubt, so far as concerns an appeal to the Supreme Court, that if these words are left in, the court might find itself unable to review the award on the ground that the arbitrators had acted, not only as arbitrators, but as experts. I confess that I think it could be argued that to use their own judgment would mean using their own judgment having regard to the evidence. I am inclined, however, to the interpretation which has been placed upon the words by the hon. member for Calgary and the hon. member for Pictou. I think it would be better that the words be left out, and I shall move accordingly:

> That the words "and may apply their own judgment in determining such value," appearing on lines 24 and 25, page 2 of the Bill, be struck out.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The minister and my hon. friend from Pictou misunderstood me if they assumed for a single moment that I said these words should be left out. I pointed out that under the decision of the Supreme Court they had very great value.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then I misunderstood my hon. friend. I understood him to say yesterday that the Supreme Court had refused to set aside the award in a certain case because the arbitrators in the exercise of their own judgment had decided in a certain way. The principle that I thought was at stake was this: If arbitrators, in addition to being judges, so to speak, are made experts, so that they may act upon their own opinion in addition to considering evidence, the Court of Review might say, "How can we come to a different determination when it is open to these arbitrators to exercise their own judgment not only upon the evidence but with regard to the valuation"? However, when the amendment is before the committee we can hear the arguments, and if it is considered advisable that these words should be left as they are, it may be done.

Mr. ROSS: I would suggest that in subsection 3 of section 4, after the words "so determined," the words "if any" should be added. In section 24 of the Act, under which you say you are acting, the Crown was to take over this railroad upon such terms as would be prescribed. If the wording remains as it is, it is presumed you are going to pay the money.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It does not occur to me that it is necessarily so, because the arbitrators' award will either be for a certain amount of value, or it will not. As it stands, if the arbitrators came to the conclusion that there is no value, of course nothing would be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. It is only in the event of their reaching the conclusion that there is value that payment is made. However, when we come to the subsection we will consider that point. My suggestion is that we take up section 2.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The motion of my hon. friend is that section 1 should stand, with a view to providing the information which has been asked for. I have been away for a day or two, but so far as I know we have not yet had complete information as to what we are going to acquire by this Bill. We acquire the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, and in that way we take over the whole system. The Canadian Northern Railway system is a very extended one, covering all the provinces of the Dominion —not entirely, but in some part—with the exception of one. If there was only one charter there would be no trouble. But, as my hon. friend is aware, the main charter controls quite a number of subsidiary charters. All these are to be acquired, and we do not know what they are. I think we should have a detailed statement of all the subsidiary charters controlled by the main charter. For instance, there are charters in Nova Scotia which are covered by this main charter. There is also a very important question as to whether we acquire the Montreal terminals under this present Bill, and whether we acquire the Model City, which is an adjunct of the Canadian Northern Railway company in Montreal. I would suggest to my hon. friend that before we take up section 1 we should have a detailed statement of the different charters which will be covered by the Act now proposed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree entirely with my hon. friend. It is surprising how often we agree on matters non-political.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Of course, I am always right when we agree.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend could readily find the information he seeks in the statute of 1914 dealing with the agreement for the guarantee of the $45,000,000 bonds.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What chapter?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is chapter 20. I have the information before me. I will place it upon Hansard, and lay it upon the Table of the House. This information was sent me by Mr. Mitchell, assistant to the vice-president of the Canadian Northern Railway system:

Toronto, August 3rd, 1917.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The statement shows in each case what amount of shares of each constituent company is held by the Canadian Northern?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There are several newly organized companies which are not mentioned in the statute of 1914. The Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, Limited, for instance, has been acquired since. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should have a schedule made as part of the Bill, showing everything we acquire.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know that we can arrange to have it as part of the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why not? What is the objection?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a question of fact. If anything should chance to be overlooked—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Quite true, it is a question of fact, but if it is not in the Bill it may be a question of law. If you have it in the Bill there is no question of fact. It is law.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend wants a declaration in the Bill as to the constituent companies in the system?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have considered that and I am not sure as to whether we should make a declaration or not. I thought that, perhaps, some property might be overlooked. Of course, that might be overcome by the wording. I will consider it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would like my hon. friend to consider the advisability of including all subsidiary companies so that we would know exactly what we are acquiring. We are acquiring the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, but there are many subsidiary companies, and I think it is advisable that we should know what they are and have them set out in the law.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I think that, perhaps, there is some little misapprehension as to that portion of it at all events. The schedule to the statute of 1914 contains the names of the companies that comprise the Canadian Northern Railway system. Amongst those you will find the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, Limited. That is found at the top of page 14 of the statute, chapter 20. The names of the companies are those which my hon. friend has given, the Bay of Quinte Railway, the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Northern Pacific, the Canadian Northern Alberta, and so on, and then follow the names of subsidiary companies, such as the Marmora Railway and Mining Company, the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, the Niagara Company, and the Northern Consolidated. As I understand it, there was a limitation imposed at that time upon the Canadian Northern Railway system creating any further subsidiary companies without the consent of the Governor in Council. No further companies, I am advised, have been created since 1914, which are owned by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. I gathered from what the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said a moment ago that there was the Montreal Terminal Company.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The Montreal Terminal Company? My understanding was that it was the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company. In the statutes of 1916 we passed an Act confirming a lease made for the use of the terminal by the Canadian Northern Quebec and the Canadian Northern system whereby a rental was to be paid equivalent to the fixed charges upon the securities and the name given was the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, Limited. I am satisfied that there is only one terminal company and that it is the one that is mentioned in the schedule. If the name has been changed I am not aware of it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no change.

Mr. MURPHY: Would my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) tell me what lease he is referring to?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: A lease by the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company to the railway company for 4 p.m. the use of its facilities. The method adopted was the usual one adopted under circumstances of this kind. You create a company with power to issue securities and the securities have to be guaranteed by the rentals to be paid for the use of the terminals. In this case the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, which owns the terminal facilities in Montreal, leases them to the Canadian Northern, but in order to give the securities any value they had to have behind them something more than the physical property of the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company. Therefore they leased the terminals at a rental to the Canadian Northern Railway system, including the Canadian Northern Quebec, and the rental is equivalent to the annual interest charges upon the securities. That has been assigned to trustees for the purpose of enabling the securities to be sold, but they have behind them something more than the mere physical property upon which they were issued.

Mr. MURPHY: Is that lease contained in any of the papers which have been brought down?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That lease was set forth in the statute passed by Parliament in 1916. We had it before us, and we considered it in the Railway Committee. The lease itself is set forth in the schedule to the Act. In so far as the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company is concerned, the position would be that the Canadian Northern Railway and the Canadian Northern Quebec have rented the terminals for an annual rental equivalent to interest charges upon the securities. The Model City and the Port Mann terminals, which I apprehend are what are referred to by the leader of the Opposition, are in no sense the property of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. They illustrate the second point I complained of yesterday, namely, the exploitation of subsidiary companies by these gentlemen to create inflated values, resulting in loss to small speculators. For instance there was $1,000,000 lost by one group of speculators through the Port Mann enterprise alone. But, we do not get that. A subdivision was made and the land was sold but not a single share of the capital stock of the Model City, the Port Mann terminals, the fishery, or timber, of any of these companies come to us. That is my understanding of it as a result of the best consideration I have been able to give the matter from a perusal of the various documents in the statute-books, and I have no further information with regard to it. The Minister of Finance proposes to offer an amendment to one of the sections. But that amendment is not ample for the purpose of safeguarding the public interest. What we should say in the statute is that the question to be referred is: What is the present cash value per share of the outstanding shares of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company? What we are endeavouring to fix is the value that appertains to the shares as shares and not the value that appertains to the $60,000,000 that would carry control. That is best illustrated by the experience in connection with the Northern Pacific. Members of this House who have been reading the life of the late Mr. J. J. Hill will recall that Mr. Harriman attempted to get control of the Northern Pacific on the open market and that he nearly had control. It is interesting to remember that he would have secured control of the company if he had been able to secure the holdings of the two Scotch Canadians. That stock was bid up to $1,000 a share. That did not represent the intrinsic value of the shares, that was not the real value that attached to them; it was only the value that attached to them because possession of them carried with it the ability to control the corporation. Shares amounting to $60,000,000 carry with them control of the Canadian Northern system and it must be remembered that control always has a market value. Whether it be a small or a big corporation, control has its value. Whoever has control in this case can elect the directors and thereby control the operation of 9,500 miles of track, with all the subsidiary enterprises and at the same time control $40,000,000 cash during the year. Another illustration of the value of control is given by the Equitable Life Insurance Company. The Equitable Life is perhaps one of the greatest of our American financial institutions; yet it only has a capital stock of $100,000 and its dividends are limited to seven per cent per annum. The outstanding insurance is computed in the billions and its revenues in the hundreds of millions. General Dupont, since this war began, gave $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 to get control of the $100,000 of stock. These particular illustrations I submit, would warrant this House in inserting in this section adequate language to provide that what we pay Mackenzie and Mann for the equity of redemption; that is, the value of their shares, is not for control but for the value of $60,000,000 of shares in relation to the capital stock of $100,000,000. What the arbitration has to determine is the value of the outstanding shares.

The conclusion after that is a problem in multiplication—simply multiply the number of shares by the value fixed by the arbitrators.

With reference to the expression "their own judgment," my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) did not follow me, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) could not have read what I have stated in Hansard—and I do not blame him for that. I was pointing out that it was desirable the words remain there. The expression "their own judgment" should be retained as, in the event of the acquisition of shares, you could not view them as you could a parcel of property. In the acquisition of a piece of property by expropriation, you can view the premises, and I desire to apply the principle here so that if the arbitrators travelled over the property of the railway company and saw its physical condition in arriving at the value of the shares, they would, in the exercise of "their own judgment," come within the provisions of the McKinnon case, and thereby enable the citizens of the country to have the benefit of the evidence, and the exercise of the judgment of the arbitrators in fixing the price to be paid for the shares of the company if such price is to be determined by reference to the value of the assets.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What about the question of appeal?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That in no sense destroys the right of appeal. The Supreme Court of Canada said it would set aside the judgment of the Supreme Court of Alberta and sustain the award, not because there was no appeal, or that it was an improper case in which to appeal, but because the fact that the arbitrators did exercise their own judgment did not in any sense destroy the validity of the award or limit the right of appeal.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree with the hon. gentleman. But suppose that the Government is dissatisfied with the award, and appeals to the Supreme Court. When this question of the amount of the award is being considered before the Supreme Court it may be argued on behalf of the company that the Supreme Court is not in a position to review the judgment of these arbitrators because by the express terms of the legislation they are authorized to use their own judgment. The Supreme Court would have before them the evidence, but there would be another element which they would not have before them; that is, the facts on which the arbitrators had exercised an expert judgment. It occurred to me that that was the point the hon. gentleman from Calgary was referring to. It still strikes me as a pretty important point with regard to the question of appeal. I did not understand the statement of the hon. gentleman from Calgary as to the Supreme Court in the McKinnon case refusing to disallow the award. I thought the Supreme Court refused to disallow the award on the ground that the arbitrators were pemitted to exercise their own judgment.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: However, I did not follow the argument closely.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: I am inclined to agree with the hon. Minister of Finance as to the effect of those words which it is proposed to strike out, and I think my hon. friend from Calgary in his argument yesterday was endeavouring to point out the danger that would ensue from these words being left in, so far as the effect on an appeal court is concerned. Because, manifestly, the Board of Arbitrators would arrive at a conclusion not merely upon the evidence submitted to them but by the exercise of their own judgment. They might take an expert view of the situation not based upon the evidence, and might arrive at the amount of the award in that way. You can well understand how the appellate tribunal would say: It is impossible for us to enter into the question whether or not the best judgment of the arbitrators, exercised beyond the evidence, was a matter in which they erred. The argument of my hon. friend from Calgary, I think, requires most careful deliberation before coming to a conclusion, and perhaps it would be well that the consideration of this question should stand over until the minister has brought down the information which he intimated he intended to bring with reference to section 1. That is the section which provides for the taking over of the stock and is the vital section of the Bill—the whole principle of the measure is contained in section 1. The data as to who are the holders of the stock which is to be taken over is so material that the consideration of the whole measure turns upon that to a very great degree, and I should like the minister, in that connection, to intimate what information he can give us with reference to the $25,000,000 of convertible stock. Does he expect to be able to give us any information which would indicate that a number of the stockholders were likely to come in and avail themselves of an award which fixed the value of the stock at a very high figure, and would enable them to get more than par for it? It is impossible for us to predicate in any way what award this tribunal might give, in fixing the value of the stock. Any one who has had any experience with reference to valuations or testing the question of value in the courts knows the tremendous number of matters that can be taken into consideration, more particularly in the case of an enterprise of the extent and possibilities of the Canadian Northern. So that I think we should have some information about the liability that is likely to arise, in addition to the nominal registered holdings of $100,000,000. We should understand the facts with regard to this extra $25,000,000, which, under the law, the holders could convert into common stock, for, if that is done, we shall be dealing, not with $100,000,000 of common stock of the company, but possibly with $125,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no chance in the world, having regard to the earnings of the company, of the income debenture stockholders converting their holdings into common stock on the ground that their holdings are worth par. My hon. friend knows this company is not earning sufficient over its operating expenses to pay its fixed charges. There is a deficit, and it is not only unthinkable, but it is perfectly absurd, to say that the Board of Arbitrators might find any such value in this stock as he suggests. Further than that, we are only buying 600,000 shares. No debenture stockholders would have any right to come in under this agreement. The agreement which will be entered into under the authority of this legislation provides for the purchase of only 600,000 shares. There is no right accruing to holders of the income convertible debenture stock to change their debenture stock for stock of the company, and get the price determined by the arbitrators.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: My hon. friend says we are only purchasing 600,000 shares. If that is all he is purchasing, and there is going to be $25,000,000 outside, why should he go to the trouble of purchasing 600,000 shares? Why not purchase 11,000 shares and get the control?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Because there is no chance in the world of the debenture stockholders becoming shareholders by exchanging their debenture stock for shares, for the earnings of the company are such that this stock is of little, if any, value as it stands now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When must they elect?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: January 1, 1919. They have $25,000,000 of debenture stock, which is an obligation of the company. My hon. friend asks why do we buy 600,000 shares? Why do we not confine ourselves to 51 per cent? To me it is perfectly obvious that the Dominion Government, while buying this stock, should buy all of it. They do not want a majority of the stock, with a minority stock to deal with. Their proper course is to buy all the stock.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I agree that we should acquire every dollar of the stock, but I do not agree that we should be subject to the chance of the holders of $25,000,000 worth of minority shares coming in and owning one-fifth of this road after we have put our money into it. That right should not be standing there. After we have put from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 into it, certain men over in England will say: This is a good thing for us! just now there is no income in this company; I paid a big price for these income certificates; I can get no money out of them—and I would much rather be a partner with the Dominion of Canada than have an outstanding obligation with the Canadian Northern. What they will do is to exchange these income certificates for common stock; then we shall find ourselves unable to deal with this enterprise as we please, in view of the holding overseas or somewhere else of this $25,000,000 worth of minority shares.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the income stock not pay dividends?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Of course not; the income certificates do not pay any dividend. They are five per cent income certificates, and they pay a dividend only when the surplus over the fixed charges is available for dividend purposes. They are just what their name indicates; an income certificate is a certificate the income of which is chargeable against surplus income after paying all fixed charges. Therefore, unless there is a surplus after paying all fixed charges, there is no dividend on the income certificates. As a matter of fact, the income certificates that are outstanding were issued with respect to a special portion of the property. I understand that complaints have been made by the holders of the income certificates in England that upon the property on which these were originally charged there was a surplus available for dividends, because the Canadian Northern prairie section is a very profitable section. Their contention was that what they had was an income certificate against income in respect of that property, not in respect of the losing sections of the line in British Columbia and in eastern Canada. They have not established that point to the satisfaction of anybody, but I know that they have made that claim. It is not divulging any confidence to bring this to the attention of the committee, because these certificates can be bought on the open market. Some investors in England paid $106 for $100 par value of these certificates. The Canadian Northern received, I think, $25,000,000 net, after paying commissions. What the Solicitor-General (Mr. Meighen) said yesterday is sound: this Parliament extended the time for conversion by statute in the Act of 1914 until January 1, 1919. Section 12 of the Act reads as follows:

> The capital stock of the Canadian Northern is hereby fixed at the sum of one hundred million dollars subject to increase only by the Parliament of Canada:
> Provided that for the purpose of exchange of Income Charge Convertible Debenture Stock, secured by trust deed made to the British Empire Trust Company, Limited, and the National Trust Company, Limited, dated 6th

May, 1910, not exceeding twenty-five million dollars in all, there may, during the period of the option of exchange given by said Trust Deed to the holders of said debenture stock, viz., the years from January 1, 1916, to January 1, 1919, inclusive, and during any extension of that period, be issued to such holders who may exercise said option, such amounts of capital stock, over and above one hundred million dollars as may be required for the purposes of such exchange, not exceeding one hundred dollars ($100) of capital stock for one hundred dollars ($100) of debenture stock and not exceeding in all twenty-five million dollars.

Provided that the Canadian Northern may extend the period of said option from time to time. The said additional twenty-five million dollars of capital stock is hereby authorized and shall be set apart for the sole purpose of such exchange and any fully paid stock deposited with the trustees of said trust deed for such purposes may be returned to the depositors thereof:

Provided, also, that no further issue of said Income Charge Convertible Debenture Stock shall be made under said trust deed.

As these income certificates are on the open market, something should be done to prevent, say, John Smith from going to the London Stock Exchange, buying $1,000 worth of these income certificates and becoming a partner with the Dominion of Canada in the ownership of the Canadian Northern. That is my case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was considerable discussion about these bonds in 1914. To understand the position it is necessary to make amply clear the nature of the bonds. I do not know what it is secured on; my own understanding was that it was secured on the Canadian Northern Railway Company's properties of every kind; that is to say, the properties of the parent company alone. The issue was of this nature: the Canadian Northern Railway Company made the issue, secured on their own property, and there were two exceptional provisions in the trust deed which secured the issue. One was that the debentures were to be entitled to dividends only out of profits over and above previous fixed charges and operating expenses. Where there were no profits there was no accumulation, and they could not exact a dividend out of one year's profits by reason of a failure to pay dividend before. That was the first exceptional provision. The other exceptional provision was this: the holders of these debentures were entitled to exchange debentures for stock—$100 debenture for $100 stock—at any time between the dates specified in the Act, January 1, 1916, and January 1, 1919.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It was not as long as that at first,

Mr. MEIGHEN: These were the dates.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That period was extended by statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is wrong; we did not extend it by statute. Reference to the Act will show that. Section 12 reads:

> Not exceeding twenty-five million dollars in all, there may, during the period of the option of exchange given by said Trust Deed to the holders of said debenture stock, viz.—the years from January 1, 1916, to January 1, 1919, inclusive.

That was the period fixed by the original trust deed within which the option of exchange might be exercised. Of course, the company has the right to extend that at its pleasure, but they cannot be compelled to extend it. That is still the effect of section 12. Selling at the time they did, no doubt that provision for exchange enabled them to sell those bonds at a higher figure than they would otherwise sell for. It being clear that that dividend on those stocks is a first charge on the profits of the company —over and above, of course, previous fixed charges and operating expenses—those bonds would bear a five per cent dividend before the stock could bear any dividend at all; or, indeed, before the stock could have any dividend-bearing value.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend told the member for Pictou, in answer to a question, that these stocks were cumulative. I do not think they are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not cumulative; that is what I am emphasizing. So that inevitably these debentures would bear a five per cent dividend before any stock for which they were exchangeable could bear any dividend. This business conclusion, therefore, follows: there was some reasonably early prospect of the stock bearing more than five per cent dividend, and after they had borne a five per cent dividend no one would ever think of exercising the option of exchange. They have only this year within which to exercise it, unless the company sees fit to extend. Of course, if this Bill goes through we shall own the company, and may extend or not. just as we see fit.

Mr. NESBITT: As a matter of fact, they are entitled to that 5 per cent before any dividend is paid on the ordinary stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they are absolutely entitled to that. A man cannot get a cent of dividend on his stock until the holders of those debentures get 5 per cent on their debentures.

Mr. MACDONALD: Those debentures are really preference stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are really, in a sense, preference stock. We are in this position: The records of the company show that there is no possibility for some years—I do not know how many years, two, three, four, five to ten years—of the stock bearing a dividend. There is, however, a possibility of those debentures bearing a dividend, and whatever may happen to the company, the debentures are a charge on the assets of the company, of course, in preference to the stock. Consequently, the debenture holders are in a far better position now than they could ever get into by exercising their option of exchange, at all events, until January 1, 1919. Therefore, exercising what business ability I have, I would think there is not the remotest possibility of this right being exercised. Assuming that to be at least tolerably correct, we are in this position: There are the holders of those convertible debenture bonds, and one element of the value of those bonds is the element of the option of exchange. We cannot, in this Parliament, without paying them in some way for that right, very well cancel it. We cannot extinguish that asset which they have, whether we deem it of any value or not. They might, perhaps, deem it of value, but I do not see how we could extinguish it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: If we took possession under the Act of 1914 we would wipe them out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We could do that, but we would suffer infinitely more by doing that, because they would have a charge against the company just the same.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, there would be no stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be no stock for which the debenture holders could exchange their debentures. We would have to adopt a different course altogether, and that would inflate the value of the other properties, and it would cost the country a great deal more to carry out the transaction in that way.

Consequently, as there is no reasonable prospect of any exchange, and inasmuch as we should not take away the assets of people without making provision for the valuation of those assets, I do not think we should take action now. Suppose the worst came to the worst; suppose those people in England, and those citizens of Canada, of whom there is probably a greater number of them in England, who hold this debenture stock, should immediately come to the conclusion that under the efficient management of this Government that stock will immediately reach a value over par and consequently be worth more than the debentures, some of them who came to that conclusion might exchange. It would then be open to us to provide a similar measure to this and submit that stock which they exchanged to a court of arbitration for the determination of its value, and then we could take it. We would not be at any great loss because for every $100 worth of stock we then expropriated, we would get rid of $100 of debt—$100 of debt would be exchanged for $100 worth of stock, and we would get the stock. Consequently, the debt would be gone, so that we would have nothing very great to fear.

In the first place, then, there is no reasonable possibility of any of those debentures being exchanged. Secondly, if there is, it is difficult to arrive at any just or practicable way of extinguishing that right of exchange. Thirdly, without extinguishing that right, we are in no peril whatever. While we do not wish to be partners with any one in this property—and the hon. member for Calgary is right when he states that we should own it out and out—we have a very fair method of extinguishing the interest of any partner who might possibly come in under this legislation.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite agree with the Solicitor General that it is not within reasonable possibility that the debenture holders would want to exchange. I do not think they would exchange on the expectation of the road earning a dividend on those debenture shares or on the common stock, but if the common stock were submitted to arbitration for valuation and the value fixed by arbitration, if they could exchange then and get the same value for their stock as that fixed by arbitration, I for one, if I were a holder of that stock, would much prefer to take my chance of getting a certain amount on the dollar in that manner to taking a chance on the road earning a dividend.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I thought that was what the solicitor mentioned yesterday, namely, that a section should be added, giving those debenture holders the opportunity of exchanging their 5 per cent debenture income certificates for the same amount of cash as fixed by the arbitration for the value of the stock, if they wanted to do that, as my hon. friend now suggests.

Mr. NESBITT: That would be using them only fairly and justly. That is the only reason I can see why they might wish to exchange, because I think there is no reasonable probability of the road, within many years, earning the interest charges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under this legislation, of course, after they made the exchange and got the stock instead of the bonds, they would not have the right to say: We are entitled now to ask you to take that stock from us at the rate fixed by the arbitrators for the other stock you are now taking. The hon. member for Calgary suggests that we should give them that right.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes. Why should they not have it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would lose nothing by letting the legislation go as it is, because we can at any time send this stock to arbitration, should it ever come in.

Mr. NESBITT: If they exchange before the arbitration took place, would they not be entitled to rank?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, because this Bill provides only for buying 600,000 shares.

Mr. McCREA: It would be wise to postpone this discussion until we get the necessary information. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) last night asked for certain information in particular as to who were the present holders of this stock, and if I understood the Minister of Finance aright, he promised to get that information. As yet, however, we have not received it, and there is other information to which we are entitled. Evidently, the Government brought down this measure without being equipped with the necessary information that the people of this country and we, as their representatives, are entitled to have. We are entitled to information concerning a thousand and one things—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Leave out the one.

Mr. McCREA: —but the information has not yet been furnished. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) last night referred to a disputed account. A contractor had made a deposit of some $18,000, of which $5,000 had been refunded, there being still outstanding $13,000 which the contractor claims, but which claim the Canadian Northern do not recognize. In addition to that the contractor claimed the balance of some $18,000 making a disputed account outstanding amounting to about $31,000 that evidently the Canadian Northern do not acknowledge. If we are to take over the stock of this road and become the owners, taking the place of Mackenzie and Mann as regards the financing of the road, it is well we should know how many of those outstanding accounts are floating around and not acknowledged or settled. We should know many things in connection with this transaction before we pass it through this House. There is, for instance, the question of the basis on which the arbitrators will determine as to the value of this stock.

The hon. member for Calgary suggested two bases: First, the actual cost of the road less depreciation, and secondly, what it would cost to reproduce the same property under present conditions. If the latter is adopted, no one can say what we should have to pay, because the cost of labour and material used in every kind of railway construction has increased in very great degree. The gate is left open; the arbitrators can adopt whichever course they see fit. I think the safer and wiser way would be to deal with the stock from the point of view of what assistance it had been in the construction of the road. I notice that the commissioners say in their report that there is no money to be derived from the sale of the stock which was used in the construction of the road. If that be true, and I do not think there is any doubt about it, what need is there to arbitrate to find out the value when the stock has no value?

The hon. member for Calgary also told us yesterday that prior to the legislation of 1914 the capital stock of the company was $70,000,000, but then, by a simple stroke of the legislative pen, we created $25,000,000 more stock, which represented no actual value. To-day, we are asked to place a value on that $25,000,000 of stock by arbitration.

I think it would hasten the passage of this Bill if we adjourned the debate and proceeded with some other business until we get the necessary information. I have never been disposed to delay the proceedings of this House, but I certainly am not disposed to allowing this legislation to go through, if I can help it, until we are given full information, and I trust that members on both sides of the House who are interested in the welfare of the country will support me in that suggestion. It will be a bad enough bargain when we have all the facts before us, but in a matter of this magnitude, involving the expenditure of $600,000,000 we should at least know how bad a bargain we are making, and should not pass this legislation in any light or hasty manner. I repeat that the Government have not shown a disposition to give the House the information to which it is entitled, and I again urge the Minister of Finance to adjourn this debate and proceed with some other business, because I think by so doing he will make just as quick progress.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am afraid my hon. friend has not read Hansard in so far as it records this debate, nor the documents which have been already filed. I think it would be impossible in a transaction of this magnitude to give the uttermost details in connection with minor claims such as my hon. friend has referred to. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) brought up the question of claims last night, and I gave a full explanation with regard to the particular claim he referred to. It is a claim that is not admitted; it is contested. My hon. friend would not contend that the Department of Railways should insist upon the payment of a contested claim without investigation. The Department of Railways have investigated this particular claim, and have suggested a mode of solution which appears to them, and appears to me, to be reasonable, but which has not been availed of by the parties who have complained about the matter. Not only that, but there is ample money in the way of drawback in the Department of Railways to take care of that claim. All that was stated last evening.

As far as the stock is concerned, I stated that I would endeavour to get the information for the House, and I am doing so. When my hon. friend says that the Government has come down to the House without adequate information, so far as the purchase of stock is concerned, for carrying out this transaction, I do not agree with him. For this reason: The Dominion Government owns 40 per cent of the fully paid up stock of this road. We provide in the agreement for the acquisition of the remaining 600,000 shares. We know where we can get five-sixths of the shares. We know that 51 per cent, which is more than five-sixths of the 600,000 shares other than those held by the Dominion Government, will come in. That leaves only 9 per cent of shares. If the 9 per cent come in they will be dealt with under the agreement.

[Mr. McCrea.]

If they do not come in, there is power in the Bill enabling the Government to declare that they are vested in His Majesty, and their owners will be entitled to the price which the others receive.

So far as the Government's programme before the House is concerned, for providing the machinery to take over the remaining capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway, it is complete. All the information as to the general financial position of the company is already before the House in the blue books which have been published and in the statements which have been laid upon the Table. More than that, the House is generally familiar with the Canadian Northern Railway situation, which has been before the House for practically the last ten years. In 1914 a most thorough investigation was made by accountants and experts with a view to determining the facts. The sessional papers of that year are full of information respecting the Canadian Northern. We have the balance sheet certified by the auditors, and we have our own auditors carrying on a continuous audit. We have had Government directors on the board for the past year. While there may be a number of outstanding accounts, some of them contested and others not, it seems to me that we have substantially before us the information which would enable the House, which is not a judicial body, to come to a conclusion such as Parliament comes to on a question of this kind. In all these large transactions, whether it is a question of building a transcontinental railway, or of affording assistance to the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian Northern, while it is desirable to have all reasonable information, it is not possible to get down to the meticulous information that would cover every particular point. If, however, there is any information that is not before the House other than that which has been asked for, and which it is reasonable to ask for and possibly to get, I shall be disposed to use my best endeavours to obtain it for the House.

We might go on with the other sections until six o'clock, and take up some other Bill this evening. I thought possibly the Income Tax Bill might be taken up, if the committee is of opinion that we cannot make much progress with regard to section 1. The Prime Minister is not here, and I would prefer that hon. gentlemen would address themselves to section 2, with a view to seeing whether we cannot make some progress.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is a good deal of force in the remarks made by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea), that the information first supplied by the Government was rather scanty. I must say the Minister of Finance has been very courteous and ready to give any information asked for. I think the amendment which he has proposed had better wait until we come to discuss that section. In the meantime, I would ask for more information than we have received so far, upon some other points. I have asked information as to what we acquire, and my hon. friend has satisfied me that in acquiring the stock of the parent company what we acquire is limited to what is set forth in the schedule of 1914. So far, so good, and we understand where we are.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The information I gave is brought down to date.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, I understand. As a point of law everything is detailed in the Act of 1914. We acquire what is stated in the schedule to the Act of 1914, nothing more and nothing less. A moment ago I mentioned The Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, which is a very important part of the terminals of the road. My hon. friend has not given us any information, so far as I know, as to the liabilities, possibilities, and obligations we are assuming when we acquire this company. The Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company provides for the terminal of the road at Montreal. I do not know whether the tunnel has been completed or not, but I understand it is practically so. There is, however, a great deal still to be done in connection with the completion of the terminus at Montreal, and we have had no estimate as to what it will cost to complete that portion and make it a working enterprise. At the present time the Canadian Northern has no terminus in the western section of Montreal. It has a temporary terminus in the east end of the city. Like the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern must have two stations there, one in the east and one in the west. I do not know whether it is using the eastern station or not, but, in any event, it must have a western station, and there will be a great liability upon the Government to complete this. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) called attention yesterday to the terminal in British Columbia. He said:

> The Canadian Northern is the owner of Northern Pacific stock. That will now belong to us. If you take the line from Vancouver to the Kamloops valley, a large quantity of property has been acquired. As regards British Columbia we find that there is $4,725,945.51 in the banks, and the total liabilities with respect to western lines uncompleted is only $1,612,000, so that there must be in the banks of British Columbia a large sum of money arising from the sale of securities that has to be used for the construction of terminals and lines which we are bound to construct.

We have had no information whatever upon those lines which we are bound to construct in British Columbia. My hon. friend will realize that Parliament cannot be expected to pass this Bill until we have positive information on these points.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think I gave the House the information my right hon. friend asks for, respecting the terminals.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not see the figures.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is no trouble giving them again. Three terminals have been referred to, the Montreal terminal, the Toronto terminal, and the Pacific Coast terminal. The estimated cost to complete those terminals is as follows: the Montreal terminal, $578,000; the Toronto terminal, $388,094; the Pacific Coast terminal, $1,500,000—a total of $2,466,094. Add to that the estimated cost to complete lines already under construction, as follows: western lines, $1,612,005, eastern lines, $110,000, a total of $1,722,005. This makes the estimate of the requirements for the construction programme the Canadian Northern has now under way, $4,188,099. As provision to meet these payments, there is cash in trust accounts, representing the proceeds of bonds which have been sold, and applicable to the construction of these terminals, and those western lines $3,683,831—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is in British Columbia.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes—government guaranteed securities $217,160, Canadian Northern four per cent debenture stock, $287,108, making a total of $4,188,097. With regard to the last item, Canadian Northern four per cent debenture stock, $287,108, my own opinion is that it is not readily saleable. The Comptroller of Railways is in close touch with the operations of the company, by reason of the guarantees and the subsidies which the Dominion Government has given in respect of their lines. He has checked these figures very carefully and there seems no reason to doubt their accuracy. I shall get the other information for my right hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is meant by completing the programme of the Canadian Northern?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Probably I should has said, the programme actually under construction—not the ultimate programme.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does it mean continuing every branch so that it will no longer be a blind line, for example?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. Only the work actually under construction; with the idea of determining what is the outstanding liability and what funds there are to meet it. Of course, in any railway system, as my hon. friend knows better than I do, because he is from the West, extensions will have to be made continually. The construction of those extensions will depend, first, upon the urgency of the need for them, and secondly, upon the financial situation. I have no doubt that the Canadian Northern Railway system, the Grand Trunk Pacific system, and even the Canadian Pacific have had extensions in contemplation on many lines, but the programme has been held up by reason of war conditions, and difficulty of financing.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The information my hon. friend gives is partly satisfactory, but it is not complete.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What else is there?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: For instance, my hon. friend says it will cost $578,000 to complete the terminus in Montreal, if I caught the figures correctly. It is impossible that half a million dollars will complete the terminals in that city—the actual, present programme. But, as to what it will cost to complete the terminals in Montreal we have no information. A railway is always building, always spending money. The Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk, the New York Central, are always constructing and building, but these railways are going concerns; they are railways in operation. The Canadian Northern, to a certain extent, is a going concern, but it is only partially so. It is not a going concern in Montreal to-day. The Canadian Northern is not completed to Montreal, and it is of the greatest importance, with reference to its own profit and the interests of the country, that it should be completed to Montreal. I am quite a believer in the Canadian Northern and I believe that when it is completed, as it was conceived by its promoters, from Edmonton to Montreal, it will have a very great future before it. But it is to be completed and that is what we want the information about. My hon. friend has not told us how many millions of dollars will be necessary to complete the entrance of the Canadian Northern to Montreal. He has information only in reference to the programme that they have in contemplation this year, or that they had, perhaps, three years ago, when they were interrupted by the war. But this programme is not complete and it must be considerably supplemented in order that the Canadian Northern may become a going concern especially in the eastern part of Canada.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am informed that the present construction programme is adequate to meet the needs of the system at this time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand that $500,000 or $600,000 will bring this railway to the terminals on Dorchester street?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Comptroller of Railways informs me that that is so. I have no personal knowledge about it. The expenditure on terminals might be quite unlimited. Take Toronto, for example; for many years they have been getting on with a station wholly inadequate to the traffic requirements.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But there was a station.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There was a station. I understand there is to be a temporary station in connection with the Canadian Northern at Montreal, approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners. It is better to have a temporary station than not to have a station at all. But if we can look forward, as I think we can, to greatly increased business the time will come when this temporary station will not serve the purpose and when a proper station will be built. I do not think it is possible at this moment to say how many millions are to be spent on that terminal. Over a course of years, or in a generation, a great many millions might be spent on a terminal. The safeguard is that the company is not permitted to go beyond this programme.

5 p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend tells me that $570,000 will cover the expenditure on the terminals at Montreal. I understand that that expenditure will provide a temporary station and enable trains to come to Dorchester street?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Comptroller informs me that is absolutely correct.

Mr. MURPHY: Might I suggest to my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that he might be too easily satisfied. I happen to know something about the Mount Royal terminal and station. While $570,000 may be sufficient to bring a train into the temporary station that, it is now stated, will be erected there, nothing at all is said about the enormous amount that will be paid by way of compensation and damages for land that has been taken and which has not yet been settled for. The claims have reached a huge sum. I happen to have personal knowledge of some of them, and I submit to the Minister of Finance that there should be placed before this committee, in addition to the information which has been asked for and which the minister has promised to bring down, a statement showing the actual amount determined so far to be paid and the undetermined claims that will have to be paid for land taken by the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company. The claims for land in and about the city of Montreal must run into a very large sum indeed. This committee should have the information before it is asked to put through the Bill. The request made for the postponement of the consideration of the Bill was based on two grounds. It was based by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) upon the necessity of considering the amendments that have been proposed, and, secondly, by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) upon a request for further information. In connection with the amendments might I suggest that if possible the amendments which were forecasted by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) might be submitted to the committee also, so that if there is any postponement of the discussion we shall have the benefit of having these amendments before us and we can consider them all. I would like to ask the hon. member for Calgary a question. Did I understand him to say that if the holders of the income certificates were to exercise their election within the time specified and the exchange for common stock were to take place, such exchange would be made for a portion of the present $100,000,000 of stock.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, I said that any exchange would involve an increase in the capital stock beyond $100,000,000 and would introduce new shareholders into the enterprise.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall endeavour to get the information which my hon. friend requires in regard to the claims. I think the Comptroller of Railways can obtain it for him. Some of the claims are in the courts. I am unable to say at the moment what the sum total will amount to. The fact that they are in the courts is not a reflection upon the company, because the claims may or may not be just. A portion of a bond issue was paid in connection with these charges in order to provide money for completion, and there is a balance on hand which it is estimated will take care of the construction programme in immediate contemplation.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is other information that I would like to have. The minister said that there was a specified sum of money available to complete the work which is called for by the programme. That amount must have been arrived at by some system of accounting or by a statement of some sort. I would like the minister to give us some information showing how that sum was arrived at and where geographically this programme is to be put into effect.

For example, in my riding there is a piece of the Canadian Northern railway which runs fifteen or twenty miles from the international boundary, and goes westward to Bengough, which is about straight south of a point between Regina and Moosejaw. But the line stops there quite suddenly and unexpectedly, although they have a portion of the supplies to continue the railway further. I am in doubt as to what the hon. minister calls building according to programme. This is at present a blind line, and it was never intended it should stop there. It was to serve the country west of that place, and that was the justification for building the railway, because people west were more urgently in need of the transportation. Does he mean that money now lies in the bank earmarked for that? Is it earmarked for the road beyond Bengough, or only up to Bengough? Because the road beyond Bengough was more essential to the people of that district than the road up to that point.

There is another line north of the Saskatchewan river, passing westerly south of Kindersley, between that and the south Saskatchewan river. This line stops east and about 20 or 25 miles south of Kindersley. Money has been borrowed on the bonds for the building of that road. I cannot conceive that the money borrowed and lying in the bank is just enough to provide for construction exactly as far as the road happens to be built. That is inconceivable, because they did not get the money mile by mile. I should like to know how far these two particular lines are covered by money that is earmarked for the completion of the line.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That would involve an examination of the legislation authorizing the construction, and the trust deed under which the bonds were issued, whose proceeds my hon. friend has referred to. I have asked the Comptroller of Railways to obtain the information, and I suppose he will furnish it later.

Mr. KNOWLES: If they have been able to arrive at a sum which would likely complete the road, surely they must know where the road will be when it is completed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is quite possible the money they have in hand, representing the proceeds of the bonds, would not be sufficient to construct the railway which they had in contemplation when the project was entered upon, because of the increased cost of labour and material at the present time. I beg to move that the committee report progress.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the hon. minister adjourn the debate till Monday?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have to obtain certain information, and we will proceed on Monday or Tuesday, when I hope we shall be able to make progress.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With regard to the land damages in Montreal, arising out of the construction of the tunnel, has the Government any information as to the unsettled claims for damages? They amount to a very large sum, and I hope the Government will give us the information.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Much of the information asked for by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is already contained in the Canadian Northern blue book. On page 10 of that book we have a list of the unguaranteed securities, as follows:

Mt. Royal T. & T., 5 per cent rent charge bonds, $9,191,366.72.

Those bonds are secured by mortgage on the rental, as I pointed out, equivalent to five per cent of that amount, and if my right hon. friend will turn to page 11 he will find that, in London, $790,000 of these bonds are hypothecated for loans there. There is none of them in Canada, but in New York, due on the 1st September this year, there is a loan of a million and three-quarters secured by the hypothecation of two and a half million of those securities, and that money is paying for these temporary structures.

Progress reported.

WAR TAX UPON INCOMES.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved the third reading of Bill No. 117, to authorize the levying of a war tax upon certain incomes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I hope the hon. minister will not take that up now.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understood it was agreeable to hon. gentlemen that we might proceed with the discussion of this Bill.

Mr. PARDEE: As I understand this matter, the hon. Minister of Finance has practically said that the income tax is being introduced in lieu of what is known as the business profits war tax.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, that is not correct.

Mr. PARDEE: As I understand the matter, the business war tax is to come to an end, and will not be continued after the end of the year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The business profits war tax, by its terms, comes to an end on December 31st of this year. When that measure was introduced, it was thought the war would be at an end by that time. I stated expressly the other day that we should tax abnormal business profits resulting from the war, and in the next Budget that I bring down we shall deal with that matter.

Mr. PARDEE: Can we take it in this way: that the present War Tax Profits Bill expires December 31, 1917?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: By its terms.

Mr. PARDEE: Will there be a renewal?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have stated that next year a taxation will be imposed on excess business profits. I stated also the other day that it might be necessary to make some allowance for necessary plant extensions, but I laid down the principle, as strongly as I could, that abnormal business profits due to the war must be abnormally taxed.

Mr. PARDEE: In that I quite agree. In so far as this Bill is concerned, abnormal business profits will be taxed, but I think we may take it that, to a large extent at least, the Bill before the House is to take the place of the former measure, with the exception of abnormal business profits tax. It appears to me, under these circumstances, that, in the first place, the House and the country are entitled, at least, to an approximate estimate by the minister as to what the income tax is expected to yield. Even although it may be as the minister argues, that by reason of income tax investments are not encouraged, and that people are kept out of the country. We have to face this question squarely; we have to make up our minds that no matter what may be the result of the income tax or no matter what may be the result of imposing taxes at this time, taxation must be imposed in order that Canada may carry on her share in this war. I was one of those, Sir, who voted for the Military Service Act. I did not do that lightly; I did it with the full realization of the responsibility that it involved. But when I did that I considered that my duty would not be fully performed if I did not urge upon the Government not only the conscription of men but also the actual and entire conscription of wealth. I do not believe —let me repeat it—that this or any Government can with justification pass a Bill conscripting flesh and blood and leave practically untouched a man who is a large bondholder, the man who periodically clips the interest coupons from his stock certificates and cashes them. That man, I say, should, more than any other man in this country, pay in proportion to his wealth towards the carrying on of the war. Unless you take measures to provide that such men shall pay according to their ability to do so, you are not making for equal sacrifice. The minister argues: you should not speak about equal sacrifice, because no sacrifice is equal to the sacrifice of life. Nobody has argued that such is not the fact. But I do say that in taking away from the rich man his money you do cause him to make sacrifice, because if he did what he ought to do he would give up that money in some other way than under a form of taxation. I argue, therefore, that to that extent the giving up of wealth is a sacrifice; that that sacrifice should be made by those who are in a position to make it, and that if it is not made willingly a measure ought to be brought in by the Government to provide for the conscription of wealth in the actual sense of the term. Men have volunteered for service at the front, willing to give their all for the cause for which the Allies are fighting. Voluntary recruiting having failed and a measure of conscription having been adopted, it is the absolute duty of the Government to back up the men at the front by the wealth of the men who stay at home. The soldier at the front should not be obliged simply to take the crumbs from the rich man's table; there should be absolute conscription of wealth; only that is at all worth while. I am not content that the man whose income is $10,000 should have $9,640 left after paying the proposed income tax; that a man whose income is $12,000 should have $11,640 left; that a man whose income is $20,000 should have $18,740 left; that a man whose income is $50,000 should have $44,740 left; that a man whose income is $75,000 should have $64,990 left. There is no conscription of wealth there. It is a mere flea-bite; a mere cheese-paring. It does not take from men enough to make it hurt. The rich man and the rich corporation who are protected by the men who are fighting our battles at the front should give to such an extent that it will hurt. My contention, therefore, is that the so-called income tax is not an income tax; that it is merely a pretense at taxation where taxation does not really exist. I submit that the Government should so amend the Bill that larger sums should be taken from those who are best able to pay. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Ross:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions (with the approval of the Government) to further consider the question of providing that a much larger tax be imposed on income exceeding $6,000.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: I know that Mr. Speaker, if he were here, would make a ruling in respect to this motion. At eight o'clock, I assume that he will have something to say with regard to it. In the meantime, the discussion on the amendment may proceed.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I am aware, Sir, that the third reading of the Bill is not usually taken advantage of for an extended discussion, and in anything that I say to the House I shall keep that well in mind. I had not an opportunity of saying anything on the second reading of this Bill, and I should like to make one or two observations at this stage.

A shrewd man said in his biography: "Nations seldom accept advice from individuals, however reasonable; they are taught less by theory than by facts and events." If this House had been teachable by theory on a question of direct taxation, we should have had an income tax before to-day, and I should have had some responsibility for its existence, because since I came to this House nine years ago I have taken frequent opportunities of pointing out the disadvantages of indirect taxation and the superiority of direct taxation. The war, however, has been a great fiscal schoolmaster, as well as a great schoolmaster along other lines, and personally, while I have something to say in the way of suggestion to the hon. minister, I beg to offer him my hearty congratulations that—somewhat tardily, I am afraid—he has learned from the course of the war the necessity of putting on some direct taxation.

I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) yesterday. He drew attention to one of the points of superiority of direct over indirect taxation when he very clearly said that direct taxation has a tendency to fall more upon the shoulders of the rich than upon the shoulders of the poor. In this way it is diametrically opposed in its incidence to taxation of an indirect nature under a tariff, which, as a matter of fact, falls more upon the poor than upon the rich.

He might have gone on to point out another advantage of direct taxation, and a very great advantage in this regard. The minister has said that he anticipates that $20,000,000 will be raised under the Income Tax measure as he has introduced it in this House. If we were to raise that $20,000,000 under a tariff, we should permit people within our own shores to take, for their own aggrandisement, two, three or perhaps four times that $20,000,000 out of the pockets of the taxpayers, at the same time that we got the paltry $20,000,000 for the benefit of the State. That seems a very absurd way of raising the revenue of a country, and there is no contraverting the fact that, when we take, let us say, $20,000,000 by duties on goods imported into the country, by raising the price of goods of a similar kind produced in the country, we at the same time transfer two or three or four times that $20,000,000 from the pockets of the consumers into the pockets of those incidentally protected by the customs tariff. That, with the advantage pointed out by my hon. friend from Kingston, would seem to me to be enough to convince any reasonable body of legislators that there are very great advantages in direct taxation over those possessed by indirect taxation.

[Mr. M. Clark.]

I want, however, to do the Minister of Finance the obvious credit of saying that I think, so far as my knowledge of the history of Canada goes, he is the first Minister of Finance who has raised any direct taxation in the Federal Parliament, and, after all, it is but bare justice to do him that credit. He deserves credit to that extent, and he has earned that credit, not always with the encouragement which he has a right to expect from every one in war time. When the minister introduced his excess profits taxation, I remember the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), night after night, castigating my hon. friend for introducing the tax. I am sure the minister remembers that also.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He does.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That does not represent the full measure of the hardness of the minister's case, because when he proceeded to carry out his previous promise by which he was bound to let the tax lapse at a certain period, just as my hon. friend from Pictou had pursued him with horse, foot and artillery, for putting the tax on, so my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) pursued him with horse, foot and artillery for taking the tax off. I do not think it is possible to conceive of any Minister of Finance, unless he had gifts superior to those of human beings, pleasing two critics holding such diametrically opposite views. The surpassing ability of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as a leader is shown by the fact that he gathers both those followers holding diametrically opposite views under the capacious shadow of his own garment. I hope this will not be taken in bad part, because I do not mean it so.

Mr. McKENZIE: For of such is the Kingdom of Heaven. His followers come from the East and from the West.

Mr. Michael CLARK: My hon. friend is the last person to whom I would go as being an authority on who would be of the Kingdom of Heaven. I want to say something in endorsation of the view which has been put forward by my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) and which had been previously put forward by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I do this by way of suggestion to the minister. When I made some remarks upon the second reading of the Military Service Bill, I very earnestly pointed out to the Government that they would facilitate the reception of their military service measure with the people if they gave an earnest that they were disposed to use not only the man-power, but the material-power of the country to the utmost possible point for the purposes of Canada's further share in this great war which, I sincerely hope, in spite of the fact that it seems largely forgotten for the moment, we have not really forgotten in this country and we are not going to forget.

The war cannot be continued upon the principle of death in the trenches, debt for posterity and millions for the profiteers. That is not a fair arrangement of sacrifice. I quite agree, as my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) has agreed with the Minister of Finance, that you cannot have equality of sacrifice, but that simple statement is not any excuse for our not going as near to equality of sacrifice as we can when we pit mere dollars against flesh and blood. From intercourse with a very large number of one's fellow-citizens and from all that I can learn, I am bound to say that the people, and, in particular, the wealthiest portion of the people, would have been glad if the minister had gone further along the line of income taxation than he has gone by this measure. I offer him this suggestion and make this statement in no unfriendly spirit. The very opposite is the case; I make it, believing that what I say is true, namely, that the people of Canada are prepared to suffer and to suffer financially in the cause of this war. What other meaning could be attached to the fact that a gentleman in Hamilton actually gave about $750,000 of excess profits that he felt he could not keep in face of the sacrifices being made by the men in the trenches? The people, I am sure, are ready to make that sacrifice and would be glad to see this tax go further. The exemption is very high. The people of Great Britain, as everybody knows, are making enormous financial sacrifices in this war, and if I am not mistaken the minimum exemption there is $750. There is a long interval between $750 and $2,000, and I cannot think that the cost of living in war time is so much higher here than it is in Great Britain as to justify so large a hiatus as that. I believe the people of this country would have stood for a lower level of exemption in regard to this tax, and I know that is so, because I have met numbers of people whose incomes are lower than $2,000 who resent having been left out of the operation of this tax. But however that my be at the lower end of the scale, I feel with others on both sides of this House, that the Government has not gone far enough upon the higher end of the scale. I know millionaires who have expressed their very highest satisfaction with this income tax, and I do not think that is a good compliment to the tax. I would lower the satisfaction of those gentlemen if I were in the position of the minister; I would give them less satisfaction and more taxation.

I am certain, as some others have said, that this form of taxation has come to stay in the Dominion. The best experts say that the war will last for two years yet, and the condition of affairs after the war will require an amount of revenue in this country which it would be impossible to raise by means of customs taxation—absolutely impossible whatever party is in power—and whoever holds the portfolio of Finance will have to look more and more largely to direct taxation for discharging the liabilities that come to us through this war and for carrying on the ordinary business of the country. I must say, I wish the minister had gone a little further than he has done, while I am grateful that he has gone as far as he has in moving in the direction which one day will lead him to be a free trader—because the moment he raises all this taxation by direct means, clearly he will have no customs tariff. One of the results of that will be that he will find his people and the country generally getting so much more wealthy that the raising of taxation by direct means will come with an ease that at present he does not suspect, or at least, if he suspects it, he does not give any sign of acting on it.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The House is shortly to be called upon to consider an amendment which proposes to increase the amount of tax that shall be levied under this Income Tax Bill on those of larger incomes. I want to put in a plea for that organization with which I have been connected for the last three years. I would ask the members of the House seriously to consider how an increase in the tax upon higher incomes will affect those who have entered upon serious obligations of their own accord. If it were proposed that the income tax rate on higher incomes should be made greater to cover the year 1918, I would raise no objection. I quite concur in what has been said, that those who have the money during these times should be the ones to contribute as much as they possibly can. But I would call the attention of the House to this. The income tax which will be payable on 1st June next will be based on a statement filed on 28th February, 1918, covering the income of the year 1917. Now, during the year 1917, the people of Canada have taken upon themselves voluntarily very large obligations. Never in the history of the war has there been a year in which the subscriptions to various war charities have been so generous and so universal as in the year 1917. During the year many and many a man has asked himself the question, "How much can I possibly do without in order that I may put my name down for the largest possible amount for one of the war funds?" Many of these men have voluntarily reduced to a very considerable extent that portion of their income which they are free to spend upon themselves, not in any way anticipating that an income tax would be brought in by Parliament this year. Now, I contend that you are going to place upon these men a double burden. They have already of their own accord assumed a heavy load, and you are going to lay upon them a still greater burden.

There are a few people in this country—very few, I am glad to say—who have not given of their means to the Patriotic Fund and other war charities, but have hoarded and held all they had and all they could make. These men are held up again and again to the contempt and scorn of their fellow-citizens, and are receiving only what they deserve in the way of contumely. I do not care how heavily they may be taxed, but I want to testify on behalf of the Canadian people that for one man of that kind, there are twenty who are contributing generously and have been doing so since the war began. In every community where a campaign has been conducted our attention has been drawn to one or two men who will give nothing, but you can at the same time secure a list, if you care to, of a score of men who are denying themselves daily in order that they may give. When the history of this war comes to be written there will be no brighter page in the whole record than that which records the efforts to do something that have been made by those who, for various reasons, could not go to the front, but who endeavoured in their turn to do all they could to back up the men on the firing line. That spirit has been practically universal from one end of the Dominion to the other, not a single province excepted.

It has been my duty since the war began to act as a sort of apostle to the stay-at-homes. I was six years beyond the military age, and physically unfit to enlist, and as I could not go to the front I gave my whole time to another work which was the best I could get under the circumstances. During the past three years I have travelled up and down this country again and again from Halifax to Vancouver, and have spoken in every city and town of considerable size in the whole Dominion, and I want to say that universally the people of Canada have been ready and willing to make sacrifices. Again and again we have asked communities to give us not only all they needed for themselves, but something over which might be spent in more hard-pressed districts, and with the exception of five towns in Ontario—Sarnia, Preston, Orillia, Fort William and Kenora—every area that I know of in the province of Ontario has given not only what it needed for itself, but an additional sum to be spent out in Alberta and Saskatchewan, in the far West and along the Pacific coast. If any one had told me at the beginning of the war that the Patriotic Fund would be able to raise between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000, I would have confessed that I did not believe a larger sum was possible, yet a fair computation to-day will show that there has been raised for the various war charities in Canada since the war began between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 in money and food supplies, not one dollar of which would have been raised had not the hearts of our people been right. Our generosity has been an astonishment to ourselves; it has been a stimulus to our neighbours to the south of us, and has been the subject of congratulation from other parts of the Empire. I think that this year alone no less a sum than $20,000,000 has been pledged and will be paid by the people of Canada out of their revenues to the various war funds which are well known to us all.

Last fall we reached the apex of our demands. The Manitoba Patriotic Fund, although independent of ours, works on exactly the same lines and is in constant touch with us, so that when I give figures regarding the Patriotic Fund I give figures for Manitoba also. Last fall we realized that we had about 65,000 families to look after, scattered throughout the Dominion. The fundamental principle of the Patriotic Fund has always been that every community should raise what it could, and put that sum into a common purse, to be dispensed in each district according to need.

Some of the wealthy districts of the East that sent comparatively few men were able to send a considerable surplus of money to districts in the West that had sent nearly every available man of military age, and in that way the burden has been distributed. We realized, however, that we should have to meet during the year 1917 a monthly expenditure of approximately $1,000,000. We could not think for a moment of allowing our soldiers' dependents to be in need this year, and so we carefully prepared our campaign. We alloted to each province, and to every part of each province, what we considered to be its fair share, and there is not a province in the whole Dominion but has given the full amount asked for. The result has been that we have already received in cash $8,500,000 in the first six months of this year.

We have another eight and a half million dollars due and payable during the remainder of this year, and considerable sums payable in January and February.

My contention is that people having voluntarily assumed large burdens for the year 1917, called upon as they will be to pay this income tax in addition at the rates already specified, they should not, at least in the first instance, be overburdened with an excessive amount. It is not fair to imagine that a man's whole income for 1917 remains with him, apart from the amount which may be taken out of him by this income tax. The first year of the war, 1915, we took in about $6,000,000, 85 per cent of which came from voluntary subscriptions. On analyzing it we found that the rural districts were not giving as freely as the cities. We found the reason to be that it was very much more difficult to organize campaigns in the rural sections than in the cities, not that there was any less willingness to give in the rural communities. We had recourse to the county councils, and wherever a county council was willing to make a unanimous appropriation and levy its contribution as a tax, we regarded it as a voluntary gift. We received a large amount in this way. Of the $15,000,000 or $16,000,000 we expect to receive during the present year, 63 per cent is voluntary, 16 per cent comes from provincial grants, 15 per cent from county council grants, and 6 per cent from various municipalities, that is, the grants of city councils and so on Last winter, when we made these campaigns, we told all those who subscribed that we wanted them to pay upon a monthly basis. We told them if peace was declared they would not have to pay any further subscriptions after the date of peace negotiations, for it was our endeavour to keep on hand a sufficient surplus to take care of the returned men for a time after peace was actually declared. So, we have a large number of these continuing subscriptions coming in to us in very considerable amounts from month to month. Our revenue is almost uniform. Every month is practically the same as the preceding month. It is very popular, indeed, to talk about the sacrifices of the poor man, and let me pay a tribute to the working people of the Dominion of Canada, who, from one end of the country to the other, are giving us their day's pay, sometimes a day's pay a year, sometimes a day's pay each quarter, and sometimes a day every month. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid in to us, taken each month out of the pay envelopes of the working men of Canada. The working men of Canada, however, are not the only ones who are making sacrifices. The rich men of the country are also making sacrifices. More than once I have heard men say " I do not want to have one dollar more when this war is over than I had when it began, and every dollar I have in the way of surplus, I give it to some patriotic fund." I know of other men who have cut down their living to as economical a basis as they can, in order that they may give large subscriptions, and any campaign committee in any city will tell you they are absolutely surprised at the sums men supposed to have only normal incomes are willing to deprive themselves of in order to give to those funds. Many men are giving a very large percentage of their incomes at the present time, in the full expectation that that would constitute their main war contribution for 1917. When you say that a man with an income of $10,000, for instance, has practically all of his income left, do not forget that he may have already promised to give out of that income for patriotic purposes a very much larger sum than the tax gatherer proposes to collect from him. Not everybody in Canada is a profiteer. Not every wealthy man is rolling in wealth because of this war. There are a great many industries in this country that are not making money and there are a great many men reputed as wealthy who were never so poor in their lives as during this war, yet these men are giving generously and saying nothing about it. The percentage of those who make extreme profits is small, taking Canada as a whole. I would be the last to defend these people in the smallest degree. Where abnormal profits are being made from munitions, or from any other source, I would vote to take a very large share of those profits. At the same time, we should not consider that every man reputed to be fairly comfortably off has become a millionaire from day to day during this war.

This income tax is new. It is more or less experimental. It seems to me, in view of the fact that it was unexpected, it should not be made excessive. We should consider the obligations people have already voluntarily assumed for 1917. In all probability, it will be necessary to re-impose this tax, because the war will not end in a few months. Either the present Finance Minister, or some other Finance Minister, will within twelve months have to deal with the tax again, and probably will increase the rate on the higher incomes. People will not complain if that be done for the year 1918, because they see it coming, and can make their arrangements accordingly. If I am fortunate enough to be here in 1918, and it is then proposed to place a larger tax on the higher incomes, I, for one, shall raise no objection. I wish, however, to say to the Finance Minister that if the tax is increased he must expect that the Patriotic Fund will not receive as much as it has received up to the present, and it may be necessary for him to add $10,000,000 to his income tax in order that that sum may be given to the Patriotic Fund. I do not believe that after a heavy income tax is introduced, we shall be able to get from voluntary giving anything like the sums we are to-day receiving. We shall probably continue the organization, and we shall probably endeavour to utilize those sources of revenue which the income tax will not affect, but since our revenues come largely from givers in the cities, I do not think those other sources will be sufficient for our needs. We had voluntary campaigns not long ago in connection for the needs of the current year. Montreal gave us $3,000,000; Toronto, outside of York county, gave us $2,500,000; Hamilton, $650,000; Ottawa, $400,000; London, $300,000; Brockville, $150,000; St. Catharines, $100,000; Halifax, $200,000; Vancouver, $400,000; Victoria, $200,000; Edmonton, $150,000; Calgary, $175,000; Quebec, $250,000. The greater part of this money is voluntarily subscribed and is being paid monthly, and will not all be paid up for another eight or nine months.

[Sir Herbert Ames.]

Speaking again of the men of wealth, I feel we should put on record some of the noble gifts they have made since the war began . We well remember the gift of $500,000 made by Mr. J. K. L. Ross. I heard indirectly that Mr. James Carruthers, of Montreal, had given to various war funds about $200,000 since the outbreak of hostilities. Mr. A. Hamilton Gault gave $100,000 for the P.P.C.L.I. Here are several men whose gifts, I know have gone into six figures since the war began: Sir Edmund Osler, Sir Edward Kemp, Sir Herbert Holt, Mr. Huntley Drummond, the Birks' of Montreal and the Ross', of Quebec. These men men have all given in the most generous possible manner. I have a list here of our subscribers in Montreal and I see that 240 men have given $508,000. I could put the names on Hansard if it was desired but I see that it is just six o'clock. I have a list here of thirty-one men in Toronto who gave $143,500. In London thirty-three men gave $135,000. Hamilton also has been very generous. I trust that, whatever the future may bring for the patriotic fund, the present relief organization may be continued. We are administering a million dollars a month at no cost whatever to the subscribers inasmuch as the interest on our bank balance pays all the cost of administration from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have been able to secure this year $15,000,000 at a cost of less than one-third of one per cent for the raising of it. We have a voluntary staff in every part of Canada, composed of people who are taking up this work for the love of the cause and who are endeavouring in that way to do their bit. I trust that whatever this or any government may do it will not break up the existing relief machinery which is running so smoothly. My plea to this House in connection with the income tax is that it should remember the voluntary obligations which have been assumed by the people of Canada for the year 1917 and that, if it is planning to make the tax fall more heavily upon the larger givers, this may be postponed for another year.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I wish to make a few remarks, and as the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who had the floor at six o'clock is not present, I may as well proceed.

I agree with a great deal of what has been said commending the action of the hon. Minister of Finance in bringing down a measure providing for an income tax. I think the principle of the measure is desirable from many points of view. It is direct taxation, and, therefore, it is definite. Those who pay know how much they are paying, and the money is paid into the treasury. It is not the same as a tariff imposition, under which for every dollar paid into the treasury two or more dollars are paid into the pockets of those who have the benefits of the tariff provision. To that extent I desire, therefore, to add my support, to that which the Finance Minister has already received.. But, when I agree with the principle and the desirability of establishing a principle, I am also compelled to follow the criticism that has been made by other members on this side, in recognizing that the upward graduation of the tax as the hon. minister proposes it does not appear to me to be adequate, considering the circumstances in which we are placed to-day. In these special circumstances, when extraordinary expenditures are being made, when debt is being piled up as it is to-day, it appears to me that there should be a heavier levy on the larger incomes than is imposed by the measure now before the House. To that extent I would agree with those who have taken exception to the measure. I am also compelled to agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), that it is unfortunate and undesirable that it should be held out to the country that in consideration of the imposition of the income tax, there is contemplated, or may be contemplated a remission of the excess profits tax. It is true the excess profits tax has been criticised from varying points of view, It has been said, of course, that no taxation is pleasing, and that it is an easy matter to find fault with any form of taxation, and no doubt the excess profits tax imposed by the Minister of Finance a couple of years ago has points and features that press unequally or unfairly, and is capable of great improvement. At the same time, I am sure the Finance Minister must recognize that, from this side, speaking generally, he received support for the principle of the excess profits tax. There was disagreement as to details, but I do not think there was any disagreement as to the principle that there should be such a tax. Some people objected that it was excessive, but I am compelled to take the view that it was below the mark rather than in excess, considering the circumstances in which we are placed. It was imposed especially as a war measure, as I understood the matter. It proposed to deal with a condition which existed, in which excessive profits were reaped because of the existence of war. It is only natural, right and proper, that when such excessive profits are being reaped by reason of the existence of war, and when it is obvious that these excessive profits must cease when the war ceases, there should be excessive or extreme taxation upon these profits in order to balance the situation; that is to say, a heavy tax on excess profits, and especially on war profits, is a proper measure of taxation at this time. And if it is contemplated, as it appears to be, that the excess profits tax shall cease, to be replaced by the present income tax, I consider that to be exceedingly objectionable legislation. I consider that the principle involved in the remission of the excess profits tax is a bad principle, and that that remission is not balanced by the imposition of the income tax. It has been said here to-day that the advantage of the income tax, or of any direct tax, is that it can be made to bear more heavily upon the wealthy than upon the people of ordinary means, whereas a tariff tax must bear more heavily upon the man of lesser than upon the man of greater means. For that reason, looked at from a proper economic standpoint, the income tax is essentially a desirable form of taxation. But when we find that the special taxation taken from war profits and levied because of war conditions is to be abrogated, and in the place of that is established an income tax, which, being lightly graduated upward, rests more heavily, in proportion, upon the men of lesser income than upon the men of greater income, I can only take the view that the minister, while adopting a sound principle, has not given that principle the effect that should be given to it.

We must have money to carry on the business of the country. If that money does not come from one source, it must come from another. If it does not come from the excess profits of those who are fortunate under war conditions, if it does not come from the man with large income, then it must come from the man with a small income, either through the income tax or through the exactions of the tariff. This is a time and an occasion in the history of this country during which, while there has been a vast outpouring of money into the lap of Canada, those who are dependent upon their labour, whether of hand or of brain—that is to say, whether the artisan who works for wages or the office man who works for what he is pleased to call salary—are, by the cost of living, subjected to a heavier burden than they have ever before been called upon to bear. That is to say, owing to the advance in the cost of the necessaries of life the man who receives a fixed salary or a fixed wage is closer up to the limit than he ever was before. That being the case, this is not the time to increase either directly or indirectly the burdens upon that section of the community. Whatever increased burden of taxation is imposed should be levied upon those who are able to bear it; upon the man who is reaping excessive profits out of war conditions or the man who by reason of good fortune is in the enjoyment of the larger income and therefore can spare a greater proportion of that income to assist in the upkeep of the country during these strenuous times. The man of smaller salary necessarily has to spend that salary in order to live; the burden of taxation upon that man is greater in proportion, although much less in amount, than that which rests upon the man of the larger salary. A single man in receipt of say $1,500 or $2,000 or a man with family in receipt of $3,000 a year has but a small margin between the cost of living and the amount of his salary; that is, according to the ordinary standard of living. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the single man receiving $1,500 or married man receiving $3,000 a year should not pay income tax; I quite agree that he should pay income tax; but, as compared with the amount paid by the man who has an income of say $10,000, the amount of the tax imposed upon him is necessarily out of proportion to the difference between his salary and his expenses. The man with the $10,000 income can cut down his expenses without unreasonably reducing his standard of living, but the man with the $2,000 salary cannot cut down his living expenses without seriously affecting his standard of living. There is room for the taking of the larger proportion from those whose incomes are greatest.

In following out the schedule submitted by the Finance Minister it cannot be argued that the proportion taken from a man of large means bears the same relation to the difference between his cost of living and his revenue as in the case of the man with the smaller income. That, I think, should be remedied; it is a condition that militates seriously against the merit of the proposals of the Finance Minister. I want to make this suggestion. It is borne in upon the people that the cost of living has tremendously increased in recent years. It has increased by one-half in four years, while salaries and wages have not increased in anything like that proportion. While I make the plea that the heavier burden be laid upon the man of larger means, I also make the plea that the tariff should be reduced so that the burden would be lightened upon the man of lesser means. The man almost the whole of whose income must be spent in maintaining himself and his family should have some measure of relief by a decrease in the customs tariff on the necessaries of life. An increase of revenue should be taken from those who can afford to pay it and the burden of the high cost of living should be lifted in some measure from those who are less able to pay. This country is going up against the wall, so to speak. The cost of living is increasing. Taxation is necessarily increasing, and the means of meeting that high cost of living and that increase of taxation are not being provided, notwithstanding the enormous outpouring of wealth into the lap of Canada as a result of the war. I would urge, therefore, that the income tax measure should not displace the war profits tax; that the war profits tax should be increased; that the income tax should be graduated more steeply in its higher figures, and that the tariff should be reduced with a view to reducing the cost of living to those whose outlay is necessarily within such a close margin of their income.

I was attracted by the plea made by the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) for consideration, in the imposition of the income tax, of those men of wealth who have contributed liberally to the Patriotic Fund. There is, I think, some merit in the hon. member's contention. The purpose of the Patriotic Fund is essentially a national purpose. It makes provision that is an absolute necessity to the credit of the country and to the maintenance of Canada's position in regard to the war. I have never looked upon the Canadian Patriotic Fund as something that should be a matter of private enterprise. I have always looked upon it as something that should be borne by the nation and that should be dealt with by the nation. I was never able to understand why there should be paid out of the Dominion treasury to the dependents of the soldier overseas a separation allowance that is admittedly less than is requisite to provide those dependents with a decent livelihood. Whatever amount is reasonably necessary to maintain the dependents of the soldier overseas should be provided out of the Dominion treasury, and anything less than that is not doing justice to the soldier and is not creditable to the country. There is plenty of work for an organization such as the Canadian Patriotic Fund in taking care of special instances of difficulty or hardship that necessarily result because of men leaving their families and going to serve their country. I have heard the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) argue that it is not possible for a Government to take care of the many exceptional cases that must necessarily arise, and that, therefore, there is a reason for the existence and administration of the Canadian Patriotic Fund. I quite agree with that. That, however, is not the point. The point is that the Canadian Patriotic Fund, under certain circumstances, pays to the dependents of the soldier a fixed amount, and my contention is that that fixed amount should be paid out of the Dominion treasury.

Sir HERBERT AMES: It is not a fixed amount; it is a variable amount, and that is the crux of the whole situation. The Government cannot discriminate, but the Canadian Patriotic Fund can. The Government can consider the dependents only as appanages of the men and the Government has to give the families through the men the same sum, whether they need it or not, no matter what the cost of living or the size of the family may be. The Canadian Patriotic Fund approaches the matter from an entirely different angle. It looks into the case of each family separately. It does not take the soldier into consideration at all. It simply says: How much is needed, in addition to the existing income of the family to bring that income up to the scale of decent subsistence for that family, and the sum differs in every province. I would be glad to-night, or at any other time, to hand to the hon. member the monthly statements for April, May and June, and he will see from them that, in no two places in the Dominion of Canada, is exactly the same amount given to families differently circumstanced. There are no two places in Canada where there are identical conditions. In Prince Edward Island we give to the average family $10.24 per month; in Nova Scotia, $11.83; in New Brunswick, $13.87; in Newfoundland, $13.14; in Ontario, $15.03; in Quebec, $16.17; in Saskatchewan, $22.58. We give twice as much in Saskatchewan as we do in Prince Edward Island because the cost of living in Saskatchewan is considerably higher than it is in Prince Edward Island. We give to the average family in Southern Alberta $19.10 per month, and in Northern Alberta, $19.58; in greater Vancouver, $20.25; in Victoria city, $21.54; and in British Columbia generally, $20.79 per month.

The point I am taking is this, that the Government cannot discriminate—if the Speaker will allow me to finish this matter with the hon. member for Edmonton—between families. It will have to give the soldiers' family in Prince Edward Island the same amount that it gives the soldier's family in Alberta, and if it were to do that, it would be giving to families in Prince Edward Island a great deal more than they required. The only way in which the Government could satisfy every one by an indiscriminate method would be to give the maximum rate throughout Canada, and in that case it would be giving a great deal more than would be needed by the families in some of the provinces. We have estimated that we do for about $12,000,000 what the Government could not do for less than $20,000,000, because in each case we discriminate according to locality and according to the needs of each individual family; and if, in doing that, we can save $8,000,000 a year, and, at the same time, bring the families up to a decent state of subsistence, it is surely better that we should do that work than that the Government should do it.

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot altogether agree with the position taken by my hon. friend. My point is that if it takes $30 a month to provide decent subsistence for the dependents of a soldier in Prince Edward Island, the Government should pay that $30, and if it takes $40 to provide decent subsistence for the dependents of a soldier in Alberta, the Government should pay that $40. There is no reason why the Government should not discriminate between province and province in the payment of separation allowances for soldiers, any more than there is reason why it should not discriminate in the payment of salaries of its officials; and, as a matter of fact, it does discriminate in regard to the salaries of its officials. There are certain allowances paid in western Canada that are not paid in eastern Canada in the public service of the country, and there is no reason why there should not be a similar discrimination between province and province in the payment of separation allowances. As to discrimination between families, once you bring the payment from the public treasury up to what is admittedly required for the decent subsistence of the family, then the work of the Patriotic Fund comes in, and if there are special cases, then there is room and opportunity for those people who are desirous of showing their benevolence and who take an interest in the welfare of our soldiers and their dependents to exercise that benevolence, care and supervision about which my hon. friend speaks, and which I do not wish for one moment to belittle in any way. When it is recognized that a certain fixed amount is necessary as reasonable subsistence to the dependents of the soldier, that sum should be paid out of the Dominion treasury. It is the country that the soldier is serving, not his neighbours particularly, nor those who are of patriotic or benevolent mind, and the country should pay whatever is right and proper for the maintenance of his dependents. If the present rate of taxation is not sufficient for that purpose, then the rate of taxation should be increased until it is sufficient. Perhaps this is not an appropriate time to discuss the merits of the Patriotic Fund, but my hon. friend (Sir Herbert Ames) favoured the House with his views in regard to the matter, and I have taken the liberty of following him to this extent.

I said, in the beginning of my remarks, that I was quite willing to agree that those men of wealth, who had contributed liberally and who were still contributing liberally to the Patriotic Fund, should have their contributions recognized as part of their income tax—but only if the whole of the money required for the maintenance of the dependents of the soldiers is taken from the Dominion treasury, as, in my judgment, it should be taken.

I do not desire to withhold in any way the credit that is due to the men of wealth who have contributed of their means to the maintenance of the dependents of soldiers, and I certainly would not wish to see them taxed double, but I would like to see those men of wealth who have not contributed as they should have done made to contribute either through a war profits tax or an income tax or in some other way, so that they may pay their share of the obligation that rests upon them as citizens. I do not want to detract in any way from the work my hon. friend has done or from the good-will of those who have made the contributions, but I say that the system of making the dependents of our soldiers subject to the control and direction and at the mercy of an organization that stands where the country should stand, tends to lower the standing of our soldiers and their dependents, tends to depress the patriotic enthusiasm that caused those men to volunteer and, in its moral effect, is an injury, and I am compelled to say an injustice to the men and their dependents. I hope that what I am saying will not be considered as any reflection upon the good intent of everybody concerned, but I say that you cannot make men and women and children subject to that which of necessity has the appearance of charity, without lessening their self-respect, and when you do that you take away what is best in them and do them irreparable harm when you are really trying to do them good.

My suggestion is that the contributions of the rich to the Patriotic Fund should be recognized in the income tax, but that the burden now carried by the Patriotic Fund should be carried direct by the Dominion treasury, and if it is necessary the income tax and the war profits tax should be increased in order that that money may be paid out of the treasury.

Mr. SPEAKER: With respect to the amendment moved this afternoon by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), section 54 of the British North America Act, the rules, and the invariable practice of this House, prescribe that any motion which is designed to levy a tax can only be introduced by a minister on the previous recommendation of the Crown. The amendment of the hon. member for West Lambton, if it has any object at all, is designed to levy an increased charge upon the people, and is therefore, for the reasons I have indicated, clearly out of order.

Mr. PARDEE: I just wish to refer you, Sir, to page 431 of Bourinot which says:

> All the authorities go to show that, when the Government have formally submitted to the House the question for the revision of customs and excise duties, it is competent for a member "to propose in committee to substitute another tax of equivalent amount for that proposed by ministers, the necessity of new taxation to a given extent being declared on behalf of the Crown."
> It is also competent for any member to propose another scheme of taxation for the same purpose, as a substitute for the Government plan.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Read the next sentence.

Mr. PARDEE (Reading):

But it is not regular to propose a new and distinct tax, which is not a mere increase or diminution of a duty upon an article already recommended by Government for taxation, though it is the function of this committee to impose rather than to repeal taxes.

I submit that my amendment proposes to the Government the same scheme of taxation they have themselves proposed, but in a larger form. I would also point out that the amendment simply asks that this scheme of taxation be submitted with the Government's approval. It asks nothing further than that. I submit that I am doing exactly what Bourinot says it is competent for any member to do, namely, "to propose another scheme of taxation for the same purpose, as a substitute for the Government plan." Bourinot gives his authorities in a foot note on the same page. I am simply proposing the same scheme of taxation in a larger form, and I am asking that it be done with the consent of the Government, and that the Bill be referred back to the committee. With all deference to you, Sir, I therefore submit that the amendment is in order, because Bourinot expressly states that while it is not regular for a member to propose an entirely different scheme of taxation, it is competent for him to propose another scheme of taxation for the same purpose, although it is in a larger measure.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had occasion to refer to the paragraph in Bourinot from which the hon. member has quoted, and clearly he puts himself out of court at once in admitting that while his scheme of taxation is in the same form as the Government's, it involves an increase. As an increase is involved, he is precluded under our rules and practice from moving his amendment except upon the recommendation of the Crown through a minister. I might say that our practice is identical with that followed in the Imperial House. May puts it more clearly still at page 462 (12th Edition):

The principle that the sanction of the Crown must be given to every grant of money drawn from the public revenue, applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue. No motion can therefore be made to impose a tax, save by a minister of the Crown, unless such tax be in substitution, by way of equivalent, for taxation at that moment submitted to the consideration of Parliament; nor can the amount of a tax proposed on behalf of the Crown be augmented—

I draw attention to the word "augmented." He goes on:

In like manner, no increase can be considered—

If the hon. member's amendment means anything, it is clearly designed to effect an increase.

In like manner, no increase can be considered either of an existing, or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister, acting on behalf of the Crown.

I have no doubt at all that the amendment of the hon. member for West Lambton is out of order, and I so rule.

Mr. PARDEE: May I ask you, Sir, to rule upon the point that I am asking the Bill to be referred back with the approval of the Government?

Mr. SPEAKER: I may say to the hon. member that after consulting the authorities I have not been able to ascertain that in any instance the consent of the Government has been given to a motion of this character being made by a private member, and except it should be so it would not be in order.

Mr. PARDEE: I must, of course, bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. At the same time I believe that the clause within the resolution which only refers it to the House, or to the committee, with the approval of the Government—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Government would first have to obtain the approval of the Crown.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), in discussing the measure before the House, pointed out what he apprehended as a menace to the future success of the Patriotic Fund, which has been under his charge since its inception, and which he has undoubtedly administered to the general satisfaction of the Canadian public. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has dealt with the observations of the member for St. Antoine, and has taken the position that the benevolence administered through the medium of the Patriotic Fund is an obligation which the Government should assume and administer. With that view I concur. I also desire to point out to the House that a couple of years ago, when speaking in the debate upon the Address, I took the position that all these funds should be in the charge of the Government, that all moneys to be paid out on account of the war should be raised and distributed by the Government, and that no part of the work should be left to private initiative, private benevolence or private administration. My hon. friend from St. Antoine has supported his view of the matter—a view to which his experience, I admit, gives great weight—by stating that if the fund were administered by the Government instead of as it is now administered, there would be an increased burden of $8,000,000 upon the country.

Sir HERBERT AMES: We have uncollected balances, arising from pledges which have been made, which we expect will yield us from $8,500,000 to $10,000,000 in the course of the next nine months. Until those pledges are paid, it seems to me it would be double taxation to assess unduly the persons who are paying those large sums of money.

Mr. MURPHY: That is not exactly the point to which I allude. I understood if the work were taken over by the Government, it would cost the country many millions more than it is now costing—some $8,000,000 I think my hon. friend said.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Yes, in this way. In the first place this fund is administered without any expense whatever, inasmuch as the interest pays the administration expenses; in the second place, by being able to discriminate between families, and only give a family the supplementary assistance necessary to bring it up to the scale of decent subsistence in the particular locality, we are able to vary the sums we give to families in different provinces, whereas my contention is the Government would have to treat every family from one end of Canada to the other in exactly the same way, just as a soldier's pay has to be the same whether he comes from Prince Edward Island or from the Yukon. If the Government took it over, the supplementary grant would have to be sufficient to meet the highest requirements of the most expensive province, and if that were done we estimate it would cost the Government about $21,000,000 to do what we are doing for about $12,000,000.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) will not enlarge upon the discussion on the Patriotic Fund. It had a bearing, inasmuch as the hon. member for St. Antoine referred to it as one of the reasons why the amendment of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) should not be adopted on the ground that it would take a larger share from the larger incomes. It has not the same bearing upon the discussion of the third reading of the Bill. While I do not wish to restrict the hon. member unduly, I hope he will make his remarks upon the Patriotic Fund as brief as possible.

Mr. MURPHY: I promise I will not infringe upon the time of the House at any length with reference to this matter. I may, however, be permitted to conclude my observations on the point by saying that I do not admit the last position taken by my hon. friend (Sir Herbert Ames), and it is rather surprising to me that he should offer such a candid criticism of the administration of affairs by the Government. I would commend the methods of my hon. friend to the Government, particularly the one by which he says the cost of administration is defrayed by the interest he is able to secure upon the principal fund collected.

Now, just a word or two with reference to this Bill. I do not question your ruling, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the amendment offered by the member for West Lambton. I regret it was not within the rules of the House, and that the object sought by my hon. friend could not have been attained in that way, but still the same end may be attained if the Minister of Finance will forget his difficulties with the Canadan Northern Railway Bill and be receptive to the advice which has been tendered him in connection with this measure. He can surely do this of his own motion. The amendment of my hon. friend from West Lambton merely asked the committee to apply in practical operation two principles—first, that taxes should be levied upon those best able to pay them; and, second, that in the case of this particular Bill, a greater burden should be laid upon those in receipt of large incomes. Leaving aside my hon. friend's amendment, I may point out that the Bill itself brings up the whole question of the taxation methods adopted by the Government, and the result to be obtained therefrom, and necessarily causes us to take public opinion into consideration with regard to the Government's methods of taxation and with respect to the results which have accrued from the application of those methods. I desire to place before the House two views upon this aspect of the matter. One of these views I wish to present from a Canadian standpoint, and the other from the standpoint of a recognized authority in the United States. If the Minister of Finance will not hearken to the advice that is tendered to him in all friendliness from this side of the House, it occurred to me that possibly he might give ear to the advice that may be obtained for him from the pages of a Government publication. I hold in my hand a small pamphlet on the title page of which I read:

For Free Distribution.

National Organization for War, by Stephen Leacock. Reprinted for the National Service Board of Canada.

On the back of the cover there are various mottoes encouraging national thrift, national saving, and national investment. I might explain that this pamphlet contains an article written by Mr. Stephen Leacock. The National Service Board of Canada, a creation of the present Government, and presided over by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), thought so much of the advice given in this article of Mr. Leacock's that they had it reprinted and distributed as a government pamphlet. That being so, and in case my hon. friend the Minister of Finance may not be familiar with the contents of this pamphlet, I desire to quote from it briefly so that he may know what practically another branch of the Government, of which he is a member, thinks of the method and the measure of his taxation. After an introduction dealing with the war and the position of affairs in this country under war, this pamphlet says—page 3:

To and fro we go about our business. We pay our easy taxes, and subscribe to our so-called patriotic loan, so issued that the hungriest money-lender in New York is glad to clamor for a share of it.

Then this National Service Board pamphlet lays down a certain principle in regard to the war tax, and in the course of what it has to say on this point, I find the following dictum:

The so-called War Tax is but a small part of a man's earnings.

After discussing that principle at some length, the pamphlet proceeds:

War brings with it the peculiar phenomenon of war prosperity.

Then the author, who is so highly thought of by the National Service Board as to have his pamphlet officially adopted for circulation in Canada, applies this dictum to the Dominion of Canada, and having made the application, he proceeds thus:

In and through it all moves smug hpyocrisy, suggesting the little words and phrases that are to salve the soul; teaching the manufacturer to call himself a patriot as he pockets his private gains, and to shout for trade, more trade, that he may cram his pockets the fuller; teaching the farmer that his own fat, easy industry is war itself, and that he may count his fatted cattle in the light of his stable lantern and go to bed a patriot; teaching all the drones and parasites, the lawyers, the professors, the chefs and the piano-players, the actors and the buffoons that in going on with their business they are aiding in the conduct of the war.

I think, Mr. Speaker, you will admit that that is a very candid criticism of one branch of the government of the day by another branch. If I were to adopt it as expressing my own views, I would say that it leaves nothing for me to add to the criticism on that point. It follows that criticism by presenting, through the National Service Board, to the Government, what should be the real war policy. It goes on to say:

Every cent of the money that can be gathered up by national thrift should be absorbed by national taxes and national loans. Our present taxes are, for war time, ridiculously low, as far as all people of comfortable, or even of decent, means are concerned. And they are made with one eye on the supposed benefit to industry.

The author of this pamphlet goes further and suggests a policy in regard to loans:

Over above the taxes we need a succession of Government patriotic loans, not money-lenders' loans at market and supermarket rates, but patriotic loans in the real sense, at a low rate of interest, let us say four per cent, and issued in bonds of twenty-five dollars, with a dollar a year as interest.

But, in addition to this advice which is tendered by one branch of the Government to the other, the author further enjoins the absolute necessity of practising economy, and that is done in this way:

But first let the Government—of the dominions, the provinces, the cities and the towns—itself begin the campaign of thrift. At present vast sums of money are being wasted in so-called public works, railways in the wilderness, cement sidewalks in the streets, post offices in the towns—millions and millions that drain away our economic strength. In times of peace these are excellent. For war, unless they have a war purpose, the things are worse than useless. The work of the men who labour at them is of no value, and the food and clothes that they consume must be made by other men.

I do not think, if I took up the time of the House for the rest of this sitting, I could add anything to the excellent advice given to the Government, and particularly to the Minister of Finance, by the National Service Board of Canada through this pamphlet circulated by the National Service Board, of which my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) is the distinguished chairman. That is a home view, a view at close hand, of the method and measure of the taxation for which the Minister of Finance has stood sponsor.

It may be of interest to the House, and will I am sure be of interest to the Minister of Finance, to hear very briefly the view which is entertained in the adjoining republic of his taxation measures, and particularly of the one which is now before this House. In the Montreal Gazette of Monday last I noticed an article dealing with a pamphlet which has been issued by Mr. Otto H. Kahn of Kahn, Loeb and Company on the subject of the war tax. In the course of that pamphlet the writer lays down this principle:

> The cost of the war must be laid according to the capacity to bear it.

Mr. Kahn goes on to discuss the measure which is now before this House, and in the course of his analysis of it, he has this to say:

> Within the last few days it has been announced that the Canadian Government has introduced a Bill for the imposition of an income tax. The rates proposed are moderate for a war tax, the highest percentage of taxation being considerably less than one-half the rates fixed by our House of Representatives.
> Moreover, the Act as introduced by the Government provides that income taxation will be remitted to individuals up to the amount which they are now paying directly or as members of a co-partnership or as shareholders in corporations, for excess war profits, taxes and other special war taxes under the existing law.
>
> In fact, if the newspaper reports are correct, it is the announced intention of the Canadian Government with addition of the income tax, to reduce or abolish the excess profits tax at the end of the present year. Accordingly, while America, under the Bill pending in Congress, would provide an unprecedently high income tax, and excess profits tax, Canada would have but a moderate income tax, and that tax apparently would not be in addition to, but largely or entirely in place of the excess profits tax.
> The enrichment of corporations or persons out of profits resulting from a war in which this country is engaged is rightly abhorrent to the public conscience.

I commend that criticism from a recognized financial authority to the consideration of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I do so for the reason that there seems to be an impression that the taxation in this country is as high as that in the United States. According to the statement of Mr. Kahn, it only approximates about one-half of the rates provided in the measure now before Congress.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Our business profits taxation is very much heavier.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman says it is very much heavier, but he himself is authority for the statement that that tax is to be discontinued.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I stated two or three times that the profits tax is to be continued, and that it will be dealt with in the next Budget.

Mr. MURPHY: After this year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: After this year. This tax, by its terms, comes to an end December 31, and I stated this afternoon, as I have stated on several occasions recently, that when this tax was proposed it was thought the war would be at an end by next December.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. minister says this tax will be continued, and will be dealt with in the next Budget?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there to be another Budget this year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, next year.

Mr. MURPHY: How can the hon. minister give a guarantee as to next year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know who can give a better guarantee.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend expects to be here next year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: All I can say is that my hon. friend is very much alone in that view. However, we have more serious business to transact at the present time. I commend the criticisms that I have submitted to my hon. friend's very careful consideration, and I hope that even before his next Budget to which he alludes he will provide for a more equitable distribution of this Income Tax, and will particularly see that those in receipt of large incomes shall pay a much larger percentage than they are going to pay under the present measure.

Mr. D. C. ROSS (West Middlesex): As the hon. Speaker ruled the amendment out of order, I feel that it is incumbent upon me to say a few words on the third reading of this measure. This Bill introduced by the Finance Minister may be all right as far as it goes; but, coming from the city of Toronto, as he does, I would not expect it to go very far, and my expectation has been realized. Judging from the views I have heard expressed throughout the country by the man on the street and taking my own personal view, the taxation imposed by this Bill by the Minister of Finance is considered to be a very meagre form of taxation. In this House one question probably has been uppermost in our minds, and that is the question of making the sacrifices of our people, to some extent, a matter of equality, if it is possible to make an equality between sacrifices of men and sacrifices of money. For my own part, and speaking, I think, for every member of this House, I can say that is an impossibility. But there is this to be said: that a sacrifice in money is a greater sacrifice if a man has to habituate himself to a smaller income than if the law leaves to him a larger income. I think this Act as presented is not going to satisfy the people at all in regard to comparative sacrifices between the poor and the rich. I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), for whom I have the highest regard, and who, I believe, has done an immense service to the country in connection with the Patriotic Fund. In principle, I do not believe the Patriotic Fund should be dependent upon voluntary subscription. I do not believe the soldiers and their dependents should have to rely on what looks like charity. They have done too much for this land and for freedom for us to ask them or their families to be dependent on what looks like charity. I believe that is a matter which should have been handled by this Government, and should be paid for by the Canadian people as a part of their taxation. I may say in passing—and I do not want to digress and depart from the rules, but I think it is relevant to the subject—that as far as my country is concerned, it affects the question of taxation generally. My county, Middlesex, part of which I have the honour to represent, has considered that as a cardinal principle, and they have given to the Patriotic Fund $72,000 a year. In addition to that, generous men have contributed in a very liberal manner. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) said, among other things, that he has heard patriotic rich men say that they did not want any more money when this war was over than they had when it began, or words to that effect. I am the last man in this House to detract from what has been done by the wealthy men of Canada in the way of assistance in this war. I believe their hearts are in it, just as much as are the hearts of the plain people of this country. But I ask you, Sir, if there is any class of men in this country whose hearts should be more in this war than the wealthy men of this land? They have more to be protected than the poor man. They have more at stake, and if any person or class of persons should be willing to make sacrifices in this war, it is the wealthy men of this land. When patriotic rich men have said that they do not want to be any richer when the war is over than when it began, it is a very—shall I put it mildly?—low ideal of patriotic duty. No man, rich or poor, should want to be as well off when the war is over as when it began. If he is stirred by patriotic emotions, if he has the love of Empire at his heart, and the desire to save the Empire and civilization, he should be willing to be much poorer when this war is over than when it began, if this war means anything to him; for, as Lloyd George has said, if Germany wins this war, nothing else matters. The member for St. Antoine says that the wealthy man is willing to give of his wealth; that he does not want to be any richer when this war is over than he was when it began. I have read of wealthy men making similar professions; talk is sometimes very cheap. I have read in the public press—and it has not been denied—that one very wealthy man in this country said "To hell with profits."

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Order.

Mr. ROSS: That is a quotation; if it is offensive to him, the hon. member for North Grey need not listen to it. It is all very well for wealthy men to make such professions as "to Sheol with profits"—if you like to put it that way. But the man who said that was willing to take $5,000,000 in a year for himself or his company from the poor people of Canada. During this war we want not professions but acts. We should make the wealthy men of this country—in a reasonable, not in a cruel way—pay their share of the burden that is imposed upon us by reason of our participation in this war. Can the sacrifice of the wealthy man who has an income of $100,000—who under the income tax will pay $14,900 and who professes that he is willing to do so—be compared with the sacrifice of the poor widow who, not merely professing that she is willing to sacrifice her three sons on the altar of her country, actually does sacrifice them? There is no comparison at all. The wealthy men of this country should bear a fair share of the burden of sacrifice made by the Canadian people for the cause of civilization.

The Minister of Finance introduced two measures into this House recently, one of which we discussed to-day. I would characterize the measure now under consideration as the Millionaires' Relief Act. Under this measure the wealthy men will not be asked to make any sacrifices. They are doing nothing to win the war. Whatever they may do from patriotic motives, they are doing nothing under compulsion by this Parliament as a matter of sacrifice. As to the other measure introduced by the Finance Minister, that with relation to the Canadian Northern Railway system, I would characterize it as The Millionaires' Aid Act —because, to my mind, that is all it is.

The Minister of Finance stated some time ago—although, in the vernacular, he is a little bit wobbly on the subject—that the excess war profits tax would cease to be effective on December 31, 1917. I understand that he intimated in the House this afternoon—I was not here when he did so—that he had changed his mind in so far as profiteering in connection with munitions and war supplies was concerned. I am rather surprised; nevertheless, I compliment him on his change of heart. As a member of this House, who has the interests of the people at heart—I mean not particularly the people of Toronto, or of the large cities, but the people as a whole—I say emphatically that the Minister of Finance makes a great mistake. When he brought down his Budget he pointed out what he considered to be the many virtues of the excess profits war tax. He pointed out that in the first year of its operation he was getting $12,500,000, and that he would likely get $15,000,000 when the whole returns were in. He said that in the second year he would get $20,000,000, but that he could not say what he would get in the third year—I do not quarrel with him in that respect, because it would be difficult to calculate the amount that would probably be received. He pointed out what a wonderful law this was; how easily and economically it worked; how everything was simplicity itself in connection with the collection of the tax; how the cost of collection was only one-half of one per cent. Well, the war is still on; the financial necessities of our country are greater than they ever were. The minister deems it necessary to go to the American market to borrow $100,000,000 and to pay thereon almost seven per cent interest. Yet, although men are making millions of dollars in the manufacture of munitions and of war supplies, at the expense of the people, my hon. friend says that he will cut off the excess profits tax, so far as it relates to ordinary business profits, at the end of the year 1917. No such action has been taken in England; I submit that this tax should be continued in Canada for the advantage of the people and in order that we may be able to carry on the war to a successful conclusion. Persons who are now subjected to that tax should be required to pay their share. Some of them are making immense profits out of the war, and in view of the fact that the end of the war is not yet in sight, there is no reason why they should not continue to pay the tax which has been imposed upon them. It was pointed out this afternoon that a gentleman with higher ideals than some others had turned into the treasury $675,000, an amount which he considered to be in excess of what he ought to have made. In the light of all these considerations this tax on excess profits should be continued at least until the end of the war, and Parliament should at this session make statutory provision to that effect.

The Government may think that they are following the wishes of the people in passing this very moderate form of taxation. Before this taxation measure was introduced, we had meetings of public bodies all over the country. We had meetings of the labour people, meetings of all the church courts, meetings of the great agricultural classes in the West.

Mr. LALOR: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS: Some of my hon. friends are rather sorry for it, I know; they may yet have reason to be more sorry than ever. What has been the general expression of opinion of all these public meetings? They have said: If the Government is going to enforce a compulsory Military Service Act they should just as sedulously enforce compulsory money service upon the people. They have said that in no uncertain tone.

I ask the Prime Minister if the opinions of those people are not to be considered? Is he going to pay no attention to the well-considered opinions of the labouring men of this country? Is he going to pay no attention to the strong opinions expressed by all the religious bodies? Is he going to pay no attention to the opinions of the great agricultural classes as they were recently expressed in the West? Let us take, for instance, my own church—the Scotch Presbyterian Church in this country. What was the expression of opinion of that body? They said, without any indefiniteness: If we are going to have compulsory service in regard to man-power, we should have compulsory service in regard to money-power. Does this country consider that the opinion of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, composed of men, some of whom are probably—and I do not wish to say this rudely—the superiors or the equals of men in this House, should not have some attention paid to it? Those men come from all walks of life, from the professional classes, the working classes, the clergy. Their opinion before the people of this country is just as good, just as potent and has just as much right to consideration as the opinion of any hon. member of this House or of any public body in this country. The Scotch people of this country have in this war given of their sons and of their money without stint, and those people convened in their General Assembly have a right to expect from this Government that their opinions, solemnly expressed, shall receive due consideration.

Under the system of taxation submitted to us in this Bill, every opinion that has been expressed by those bodies, labouring, religious, agricultural, has been entirely disregarded, and we are exacting no sacrifice from the wealthy men of this country. My contention in that regard is stronger when one considers that the Minister of Finance says to this House that, except in regard to the manufacture of munitions, he is going to discontinue the tax which has, for the last two years, been imposed upon this country in regard to excess profits. I know this amendment has been ruled out of order by Your Honour, but I consider it is very unfortunate that, under the rules of the House, you should have that power. I know you have exercised it with absolute impartiality, as you always do. I have no doubt that you may be right in ruling this amendment out of order, but although the Prime Minister has said in reply to my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), that the consent of the Crown must be obtained for the submission of an amendment calling for an increase of taxation, we know that, as a matter of practice, the recommendation of the Crown means simply the recommendation of the Government, and in this democratic country, we should alter our rules so that any hon. member of this House may be able to submit to the House an amendment for which I believe not only Liberals on this side but Conservatives on the other side would vote if they had the opportunity.

We are passing through strenuous times, and the end is not yet in sight. We are going to need all our money and all our men in order that victory may be ours. The people of Canada, rich or poor, have but one heart in this issue; they intend to win this war. Generally speaking, they are prepared to pay the price, and this Government, if it were really listening to the voice of the people and not to the voice of just a class of the people, would have submitted a measure of taxation that would receive the fuller approval of the people of Canada than the measure upon which we are passing to-night has received.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend (Mr. Ross) has made a reference to me. Apparently he has not a perfectly clear idea as to the present legislation with regard to the business profits tax Act enacted in 1916. That legislation was enacted in 1916; the tax was payable during that year, in respect of profits made in 1915. It is payable this year in respect of profits made in 1916. It will be payable next year in respect of profits made in 1917.

Mr. ROSS: I am quite clear in regard to that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Well, if my hon. friend was clear with regard to that, he did not seem to express himself very clearly with regard to it, because if that idea is firmly rooted in his mind, I would have expected him to understand that there will be ample opportunity, at the next session, to take any action in respect of the profits that may be made by any company, corporation or individual in this country during the year 1918. We have already provided for taxation of profits made in 1915, 1916 and 1917. That is all dealt with, and the tax in respect of the profits of 1917 will be payable next year.

It will, therefore, be perfectly proper for the Parliament that is to be summoned in the immediate future to make any disposition it may see fit in respect of the profits, if any, that will be earned by any company, corporation, or individual next year.

Mr. ROSS: If my right hon. friend will guarantee to me that he will be Premier of Canada at that time, and that that will be done, I shall be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman has no faith in his own party.

Mr. ROSS: I do not mean that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend seems to have a great deal of doubt as to what will happen if I am not Premier—

Mr. ROSS: I know what will happen.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: —and I am very much obliged for his expression of confidence as to what will happen if I am Premier.

He has not been very much clearer in his appreciation of what has been said by my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance has explained over and over again that the Business Profits Tax Act enacted in 1916 contained this section as the final clause of the Act:

The provisions of section 3 of this Act shall not continue in force after the 31st day of December, 1917.

I am not aware that any hon. gentleman opposite has raised any question about that particular provision of the Act of 1916. Did my hon. friend raise any protest about it? He did not. It was in the minds of us all at that time that this war might probably reach a triumphant conclusion before the date mentioned in that section, and so the matter passed in that way, except that the Minister of Finance at the present session thought it necessary, in view of the financial situation which has developed through the unexpected length of the war, to increase largely in respect of the business profits earned this year, the taxation that was imposed by the Act of last year. Whenever the question has come up in this House as to the continuation of the business profits tax, the Minister of Finance has made his position perfectly clear. I happen to have under my hand what he said only this afternoon with regard to it, and it shows that the Minister of Finance has made his position perfectly plain. His statement was as follows:

Mr. Pardee: As I understand this matter, the hon. Minister of Finance has practically said that the income tax is being introduced in lieu of what is known as the business profits war tax.

Sir Thomas White: No, that is not correct.

Mr. Pardee: As I understand the matter, the business war tax is to come to an end, and will not be continued after the end of this year.

Sir Thomas White: The business profits war tax, by its terms, comes to an end on December 31st of this year. When that measure was introduced, it was thought the war would be at an end by that time. I stated expressly the other day that we should tax abnormal business profits resulting from the war, and in the next Budget that I bring down we shall deal with that matter.

[Mr. Ross.]

Mr. Pardee: Can we take it in this way: that the present War Tax Profits Bill expires December 31, 1917?

Sir Thomas White. By its terms.

Mr. Pardee: Will there be a renewal?

Sir Thomas White: I have stated that next year a taxation will be imposed on excess business profits. I stated also the other day that it might be necessary to make some allowance for necessary plant extensions, but I laid down the principle, as strongly as I could, that abnormal business profits due to the war must be abnormally taxed.

The explanation already given, that the tax upon profits during the year 1917 will be exigible during the year 1918 should be entirely satisfactory. So, as my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) has said that he would be perfectly satisfied if an assurance were given to him, and as I adopt the assurance that has already been given by the Minister of Finance, I am confident that the discussion leaves my hon. friend in a perfectly happy, contented and satisfied frame of mind.

The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) was good enough to indulge in a little chaff towards my colleague the Minister of Finance, with regard to the probability of his presenting a Budget next year. If I should follow his example in that regard I might say that it is very fortunate for my hon. friend from Russell that he presented his criticism of this measure now, as he may never have another opportunity. He was a little in error as to the authority he quoted. It was not Mr. Kuhn, but Mr. Otto H. Kahn, a very well known financial authority in the United States, and a member of the firm of Kahn, Loeb & Company, who has written several treatises with regard to business and taxation.

Mr. MURPHY: That is the name I quoted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend called him "Kuhn."

Mr. ROSS: His pronunciation must be bad.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would call to the attention of the hon. member for Russell and of the hon. member for West Middlesex that when they compare taxation in this country with taxation in the United States they should bear in mind that the business profits tax prevailing in Canada is very much higher, so I am informed by the Minister of Finance, than any corresponding taxation in the United States at the present time. More than that, I am ssured by the Minister of Finance, who has made a careful study of the systems of taxation prevailing in the various countries in the world during this war, that the business profits tax of 1916, as amended by the Act of 1917, imposes a heavier taxation on profits of that character than is imposed in any other country in the world. So there can be little fault found from the standpoint of my hon. friend or from the standpoint of any one else, with the course which has been pursued by the Minister of Finance in that regard. War-business profits in Canada to-day are paying a heavier tax than similar profits are paying in any other country in the world. So much for that.

With regard to the income tax, it is perfectly true that the income tax as recently introduced in the Congress of the United States is heavier than the income tax proposed here. It was introduced there upon a certain scale, and that scale has been considerably increased. The scale proposed by the Bill which is now under consideration corresponds approximately, I think, with that which was first introduced in the Congress of the United States. But we shall not have exhausted the legislation that may be possible in this country by the passage of this Bill. The Minister of Finance, in introducing this measure, had to take into account more than one consideration. In the first place he had to take this into account; that in so far as this legislation imposes taxation during the year 1917, it is retroactive in respect of more than half of the year. He had also to take into account what has been put forward very clearly and cogently by the hon. member for St. Antoine, namely that a great many persons in this country who are contributing this year as in the past very abundantly and generously from their incomes towards the Canadian Patriotic Fund ought to be considered in that regard. Notwithstanding what has been said by my hon. friend from West Middlesex in depreciation of those people in this country who are blessed with this world's goods, I hold that the vast majority of them are entitled to every commendation for the splendid way in which they have come to the aid of the Canadian Patriotic Fund. Simply because a man may be found here and there who, although blessed with abundant means, has not done his duty as others have, it is neither fair nor just to cast aspersions upon the community as a whole, because the community as a whole has risen splendidly to the need of the hour.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to say who in this debate was casting aspersions?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), as I understood him.

Mr. ROSS: I rise to a question of privilege. I think the Prime Minister has entirely misrepresented my remarks, unintentionally, I believe. I commended those wealthy men as a matter of fact. Many of them have done noble things. What I said was that as a class they should bear their burdens with the poor people of the country, and I still say so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not in the least suggest anything to the contrary, but I understood the hon. member for West Middlesex to speak in some such sense as I have mentioned. I am very glad indeed that he did not desire to be understood in that way. On more than one occasion he referred in a somewhat depreciative tone to the people of Toronto, apparently considering, for some reason which I cannot comprehend, that they had failed to do their duty in this regard. I believe the people of Toronto have risen splendidly to the need of the whole country, and have done their full duty in this war in every respect.

The Minister of Finance thought it desirable, for the reasons which have been mentioned, that he should fix the scale of taxation as it is proposed in this Bill. In the first place, he had before him the example of what had been done in the United States. The scale there has since been increased. In the second place, he had before him the fact that this Bill is retroactive for more than one-half of the year 1917. In the third place he had to take into account the fact that those who have contributed so splendidly and generously to the Canadian Patriotic Fund without the expectation that heavy taxation would be imposed upon their incomes, ought to be given for this year the consideration which is rendered by this Bill. All these matters, however, leave it entirely open to the Minister of Finance to take up the question again at the next session and have it dealt with by a Parliament fresh from the people. There is no doubt that that will be done, so that under the circumstances it seems to me the measure as proposed meets the situation up to the present time. There will be occasion, no doubt, to take it up, for another reason. If we begin taxation upon a heavy scale on incomes in this country, it is hardly within the bounds of probability that the Canadian Patriotic Fund can expect to receive the liberal contributions which have been made to it from private sources in the past, and therefore there may be occasion, on that account, for the Minister of Finance to take the matter up from that point of view, with the intention of making provision for a need which otherwise cannot be met. The hon. member for St. Antoine has, if I remember correctly, spoken of the possible necessity that this may have to be done in another year, and the splendid organization which has been built up by those responsible for the direction and management of the Canadian Patriotic Fund would insure the effective and useful expenditure of any moneys which might be devoted by the Government for that purpose. However, these are all matters which will have to be considered at some later stage. In the meantime, I venture to submit with a great deal of confidence that the measure proposed by the Minister of Finance is one which meets the situation for the present and will lend itself to such amendment as may be found necessary in the future.

Mr. PARDEE: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? As the member for St. Antoine, whom he has quoted, practically said that but a very small proportion of the Patriotic Fund came from the rich man, and the contributions came largely from the poor man, might it not be that this measure of taxation was still taking from the poor man more than he ought to pay, at the same time leaving the rich man practically immune?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not hear the hon. member for St. Antoine make the statement referred to, and I am not aware of the statistics. I would point out to the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) that this measure exempts unmarried persons in respect of an income of $1,500 or less, and it exempts married persons in respect of an income of $3,000 or less. Therefore it does not seem to me it would bear very heavily upon the class of persons he has in mind.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. PARDEE: Might I say that the Prime Minister's answer is not a reply to my question?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Then I did not understand the question.

Mr. PARDEE: The member for St. Antoine said that the rich man contributed about one-quarter of the Patriotic Fund, and the rest of the people contributed the balance. My question is this: Under the present Bill, if you take the incomes from $6,000 up, which I think will be considered by any man in this House as a fair income, irrespective of what may be his circumstances, he may—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentle man is proceeding to make a speech.

Mr. PARDEE: I was just going to ask a question, your Honour. Is it not fair to suppose that under this Bill the poor man is still being mulcted, whilst the man with an income of over $6,000 is being practically left alone?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The terms "rich" and "poor" are relative terms. I do not know what my hon. friend has in mind. I can only repeat that no married person will be "mulcted" under this Bill unless he has an income of more than $3,000, and no unmarried person will be "mulcted" under this Bill unless he has an income of at least $1,500. Therefore, it does not appear that the evils my hon. friend has in mind can possibly occur.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Prime Minister seems to call us severely to task on this side of the House for even suggesting that it was ever the intention of the Government to put an end to the War Profits Act at the end of this year. The Prime Minister was not in the House, I believe, on one of the days when it was discussed, but, if we can rely upon what the Minister of Finance says—and we ought to—he stated emphatically and clearly, in unmistakable English, that the War Profits Act terminated by virtue of its creation or length of existence on the last day of this year, and that it was not the intention of the Government to continue it. I will read the statement to the Prime Minister, and he will excuse us for thinking that the Minister of Finance meant what he said. Speaking in this House on the 25th day of July, as will be found at page 3915 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance said:

My hon. friend from Wright very properly asked as to whether those who are paying a very heavy business profits taxation are subject to this income measure. The House is aware that liability to the Business Profits War Tax Act of 1916 and the amendment thereto of this year comes to an end on December 31 this year, and it is not the intention to renew that measure.

There can be no mistake about that. It is perfectly clear. I myself spoke, at the time, and told him that it was most unfortunate that he should have said that and pressed him to qualify that statement but he sat obdurate and would not even deign to answer me. But now, having thought the matter over, he is coming around to another condition of mind. It only shows that you cannot cross the street upon the word of the hon. gentleman because he says one thing now and another thing the next minute. The Prime Minister should chastise his Minister of Finance instead of blaming us, and ask him what he meant before he reads a lecture to us on this side for believing what he said. Perhaps the Prime Minister will say: If you knew the Minister of Finance as well as I know him, you would pay no attention to what he says. I did not think that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government should be allowed to get off full sail with a statement which was not the fact, as to what the Minister of Finance said. Whether he will keep it or not is another matter which nobody on earth can tell.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

GAME IN THE NORTHWEST TERRITORIES.

House again in committee on Bill No. 100 respecting Game in the Northwest Territories.—Mr. Roche.—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 4—Regulations:

Mr. ROCHE: Owing to some criticisms that were offered, we allowed several sections to stand over for further consideration. The criticisms were made particularly by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) who stated that he would like to see incorporated in the form of a statute what we had proposed to put in the form of regulation. To meet the wishes of the hon. gentleman, and after consideration, we have decided to amend this clause by striking it out and substituting another. I therefore beg to move:

That section 4 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

4. (1) Except as hereinafter provided, the following shall not be hunted, taken, killed, shot at, wounded, injured or molested in any way during the following times of year respectively:

(a) Moose, caribou, deer, mountain sheep and mountain goats between the first day of April and the fifteenth day of July, and between the first day of October and the first day of December;

(b) Minks, fishers and martens between the fifteenth day of March and the first day of November;

(c) Otter and beaver between the fifteenth day of May and the first day of October;

(d) Muskrats between the fifteenth day of May and the first day of October;

(e) White fox between the first day of April and the fifteenth day of November;

(f) Partridge, prairie chicken, ptarmigan and other species of grouse between the first day of January and the first day of September;

(g) Wild geese and wild duck with the exception of eider duck between the fifteenth day of December and the first day of September.

(2) Except as hereinafter provided, no eggs in the nest of any of the said birds or in the nest of any other species of wild fowl, shall be taken, destroyed, injured or molested at any time of the year.

(3) Notwithstanding anything contained in subsections 1 and 2 the game therein mentioned may be lawfully hunted, taken or killed and the eggs of birds therein mentioned may be lawfully taken by Indians or Eskimos who are bona fide inhabitants of the Northwest Territories or by other bona fide inhabitants of the said territories and by explorers or surveyors who are engaged in any exploration, survey or other examination of the country, but only when such persons are actually in need of such game or eggs to prevent starvation.

(4) Except as hereinafter provided, buffalo or bison shall not be hunted, taken, killed, shot at, wounded, injured or molested at any time of the year.

(5) Except as hereinafter provided, musk-ox and wapiti or elk shall not be hunted, taken, killed, shot at, wounded, injured or molested at any time of the year except in such zones and during such period as the Governor in Council may prescribe.

(6) Except as hereinafter provided, white pelicans shall not be hunted, taken, killed, shot at, wounded, injured or molested at any time of the year.

(7) Except as hereinafter provided, the following shall not be hunted, taken, killed, shot at, wounded, injured or molested in any way.

Subclause (a) of Clause 6 of Section 4:

(a) Wild swan, until the first day of January, 1928.

(b) Eider duck, until the first day of January, 1923.

(8) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsections 1, 3, 4, 5 and 6, the minister or any officer or person authorized by him, may issue a permit to any person to take or kill at any time such mammals and birds or take the eggs or nests of birds, for scientific or propagation purposes.

(9) Excepting a native-born Indian, Eskimo or halfbreed who is a bona fide resident of the Northwest Territories no person shall engage in hunting, trapping or trading or trafficking in game without first securing a license so to do.

(a) The fees for such licenses when issued to a bona fide resident of the Northwest Territories shall be:

For hunting and trapping, $2.

For trading or trafficking, $5.

(b) The fees for such licenses when issued to non-residents of the Northwest Territories shall be fixed by the Governor in Council.

(10) The Governor in Council may make regulations:

(a) Regulating or prohibiting the use or possession of poison, ammunition, explosives, traps, snares, spring-guns, firearms and other implements, appliances and contrivances for hunting, killing, taking, trapping, destroying or capturing game: Provided that such prohibition shall not apply to such types of guns, rifles, traps and ammunition as are now in common use;

(b) permitting the hunting, killing, taking, capturing or trapping of specimens of game for scientific or propagation purposes;

(c) governing the issue of licenses and permits and prescribing the terms and conditions thereof;

(d) authorizing the appointment by the minister of game officers and game wardens and prescribing their duties;

(e) regulating the possession of and transportation of game;

(f) for any other purposes which may be deemed expedient for carrying out the provisions and intentions of this Act whether such regulations are of the kind enumerated or not.

(11) Any regulation made under the provisions of this section may be made to apply to the whole or any part of the Northwest Territories.

For caribou, deer, mountain sheep, etc., we are making the dates much the same as they now are in the Northwest Territories Game Act, with such slight changes as are necessitated by the migratory bird treaty which has been entered into between the United States and Canada and which has been confirmed by this Parliament. These amendments have been submitted to my hon. friend from Edmonton and I may say he approves of them.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Game officers to be justices of the peace:

Mr. ROCHE: Every game officer under the authority of this Act and of the regulations was to be an ex-officio justice of the peace for the Northwest Territories. We are striking out this section, and, therefore, I move section 7 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 8—Game officers may appoint constables:

Mr. ROCHE: In view of the elimination of section 7, it is necessary to change section 8, which, in its original form, provided for a person being brought to trial before a game officer. I therefore move:

That subsection 2 of section 8 be amended by striking out the words "or game officer" in the third line thereof.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Seizure:

Mr. ROCHE: In its original form section 10 provided that the outfit, including traps, boats, horses, dogs, etc., belonging to a convicted person could be seized, and, if so ordered by the trial justice, confiscated. The new section simply provides for their being held as security for the payment of any penalty imposed. I beg to move:

That Section 10 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

(10) (1) All guns, ammunition, traps, boats, skiffs, canoes, punts and vessels of every description, horses, dogs, wagons, sleighs, and other outfits, decoys and appliances and materials of every kind, used in violation of or for the purpose of violating this Act or any regulation, may be seized upon view by any game officer or game warden or taken and removed by any person appointed for such purpose by a game officer or game warden for delivery to a justice of the peace who may order such chattels to be held pending the payment of any penalty for the offence committed.

(2) (a) Any game taken, caught, killed or had in possession, or any nest or egg or parts thereof taken or had in possession, in violation of this Act or any regulation, and

(b) any poison, ammunition, explosives, traps, snares, spring-guns, firearms, and other implements, appliances and contrivances the use of which is prohibited under the provisions of this Act, may be seized on view by any peace officer, game officer or game warden, and shall be forfeited to the Crown.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Separate offences:

Mr. ROCHE: A person might consider it desirable and profitable to take chances of offending on a large scale, if the killing, trapping, taking or capturing of each animal did not constitute a separate offence, and that was the reason this section was inserted. When this measure was before the House on a former occasion objection was taken to the words in this section "or having in his possession," and we are eliminating those words, and confining it to the killing, trapping, taking, or capturing. The section as amended will read as follows:

The killing, taking, trapping or capturing of each animal or bird contrary to the provisions of this Act or a regulation shall constitute a separate offence.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 19—Penalties:

Mr. ROCHE: The maximum penalty for killing such animals as the musk-ox and buffalo, is made $500 and the minimum penalty $5 for other offences. The section, as amended, reads as follows:

Any person who violates any of the provisions of this Act for which no other penalty is provided, or of any regulation, shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable on summary conviction to—

(a) A fine not exceeding $500 or less than $100 or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months or to both fine and imprisonment for any offence against subsections 4 and 5 of section 4.

(b) A fine not exceeding $200 or less than $50 or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months or to both fine and imprisonment for any offence under subsection 9 of section 4.

On section 18:

Mr. ROCHE: This is a new section. I move that the following section be added to the Bill, as section 18:

18. (1) Whenever by this Act it is made an offence to do any act without holding a license therefor, the onus in any prosecution shall be upon the person charged, to prove that he was the holder of the license required by this Act.

(2) In any prosecution under this Act the onus of proof as to his bona fide residence in the Northwest Territories shall be upon the defendant.

Section agreed to.

On section 22—Commencement of Act:

Mr. ROCHE: I move that this section be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported as amended and amendments concurred in.

On motion of Mr. Roche for the third reading of the Bill:

Mr. OLIVER: As the amendments have been run through somewhat hurriedly, I would bespeak of the minister a very careful comparison of the typewritten copies placed before the committee, and if there are found to be any differences the Bill could be referred back for correction.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

MINISTER OF OVERSEAS MILITARY FORCES AND PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES.

THIRD READING OF BILL.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden for the third reading of Bill No. 122, respecting the Minister of Overseas Military Forces, the Parliamentary Secretaries of the Department of Militia and Defence, and Parliamentary Secretary for External Affairs.

Mr. OLIVER: I should like to have it recorded that the Bill is carried on division.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time on division.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 10.12 p.m.

Saturday, August 18, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Secretary of State for the year ended March 31, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Roche.

WHEAT REGULATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I wish to make an inquiry of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who is not in his place, in regard to a notice appearing in the Montreal Gazette this morning respecting the limitation of the price of wheat. Recently an order was promulgated fixing a maximum limit of $2.40 a bushel on wheat of last year's crop after August 1. The statement in the Gazette, as I read it, is that the price of wheat is absolutely fixed at $2.40 a bushel until August 31. I do not understand whether it is stated that the provision has application particularly to last year's or to this year's crop. I wanted to ask the minister if the provisions of the order are correctly stated.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I do not know whether I can give my hon. friend the information that he desires. There has been no recent Order in Council, so far as I recollect at the moment, with regard to the price of wheat. There has been, however, a regulation of the commission in regard to the exportation of flour. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce is present I shall direct his attention to my hon. friend's inquiry and endeavour to give him the information that he asks for.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to what appears to be an inaccuracy in the statements made by him in the House in respect to a question of mine on August 16th. On that occasion, the minister is reported as saying—page 4746 of Hansard:

> At the present moment the price of grain, grade for grade, is less at Minneapolis than it is at Winnipeg.

I have looked up the market reports in the Montreal Gazette and I find that on Thursday the Gazette reports that at Minneapolis, No. 1 Northern was $2.60 to $2.65. Those who are acquainted with the grain trade know that No. 1 Northern at Minneapolis is not better than or worth more than No. 2 Winnipeg; so that there was a very marked difference in the price on that day, according to the report in the Gazette. I think that it is only fair that the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce should be drawn to that fact. I should like to draw attention also to the further fact that in this morning's Gazette the Minneapolis price is given, No. 1 Northern, as $2.40 to $2.45. Again I say that No. 1 Northern Minneapolis is no better than No. 2 Winnipeg; therefore there is, even to-day, a marked difference between the Winnipeg and Minneapolis prices, in favour of Minneapolis.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The other day my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) either made a statement or left the impression on the House that the allied producers of wheat in the United States were paying more than was being paid under the fixed price of $2.40 in Canada. I think I expressed, at that time, my impression that that would not be true. I have since received official information, and perhaps it is well that I should give it to my hon. friend and to the House. Since July 1, the highest price paid by the Wheat Commission for export to the Allies in the United States was $2.50 for No. 1 Northern, f.o.b. at Atlantic and Gulf ports. The price quoted on August 17, was $2.27 f.o.b. When my hon. friend takes into account this statement of price and the further consideration that from fifteen to twenty cents is required to carry wheat from Fort William to Atlantic ports, he will see that there was no foundation for any impression he might have or for any statement he might make.

Mr. OLIVER: Before the minister came in, I drew attention to the feature of the discussion in which the remarks alluded to now occurred. If I am not out of order, I might perhaps repeat my remarks, now that the minister is here.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Perhaps my hon. friend will let the matter lie over until Monday.

Mr. OLIVER: Very well. The minister will see my remarks in Hansard.

PENSIONS TO CANADIANS IN IMPERIAL FORCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I notice a despatch in this morning's papers in regard to a query put in the Imperial House of Commons relating to a matter upon which we might have a statement from the Minister of Militia. A Canadian enlists in the Imperial forces. Is he entitled to receive pension, in the event of being wounded—or in the event of his death, are his relatives entitled to receive pension—from the Canadian Government? I was under the impression that the report of the committee last year, which was incorporated in an Order in Council, provided that pensions would go to Canadians enlisted in any of the Allied forces. However, in a letter written to me, a young sailor who enlisted when the war began on the other side said that he was anxious to get into the Canadian forces, because if he should be wounded, being a member of the Imperial forces, he would not be entitled to receive Canadian pension. This is a matter of some importance, and if the Prime Minister cannot give me any information on the subject to-day, perhaps a statement could be made on Monday.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall be glad to direct the attention of the Minister of Militia to my hon. friend's inquiry. Whatever recommendations were made by the committee last year—I have not a precise recollection as to this particular point—were embodied exactly in the Order in Council that was passed. There will be a distinction, I think, between the case of a Canadian who actually enlisted in the Imperial forces and that of a Canadian who enlisted in the Canadian forces and was subsequently transferred or attached to the British forces. However, I shall obtain exact information in regard to the matter and see that it is given to my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: When is the resolution with regard to pensions to be introduced? Instances have been brought to the attention of many hon. gentlemen indicating the desirability of giving wider discretion to the Pensions Board to deal with cases that could not have been anticipated when the Pensions Act was passed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend's inquiry is a very reasonable one. I shall make an announcement on the subject early next week.

WESTERN COAL SUPPLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated on Thursday that he had received a report from Mr. Magrath. Would he be averse to bringing down a copy of that report?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not sure about bringing down copies of those reports. They are made to me, and I would have to look them over. To convey all the information my hon. friend and, no doubt, the House would like to have on the subject of provision of coal for Canada during this season would require more than an answer to a question. I do not say that the House is not interested in that information, nor that it should not have it. I think that on Monday or Tuesday, if the House so desires and will permit me, I will make a somewhat extended statement so as to show the existing conditions of things and the present possibilities of securing supplies.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The House will certainly be glad to have such a statement.
