Allusion has been made to the rules of the British House of Commons and to the proposed closure, and they have been compared. I do not want to enter upon that question, but I say that the conditions which prevail in the Mother Country are entirely different from those which prevail here. In the British House of Commons they have to deal with an Empire having an approximate population of three or four hundred millions, and to deal with the whole foreign policy of the Empire. The situation is entirely different in Canada. Our population is comparatively small and we do not have such great problems to deal with as they have. The difference is fundamental between the two, but fundamentally different as the conditions are, we know that in the British House of Commons the closure cannot be applied unless in the discretion of the Speaker it should be applied. The motion may be made, it is true, by a member of the Government, but it is always subject to the approval of the Speaker. In the present instance, Mr. Speaker, you are debarred from passing judgment on a motion that is made from the Government benches. A minister may rise; he may move that this be the last day of the debate, and you, Sir, have to put the question without exercising your judgment as to the necessity for such a motion. That in itself is sufficient to prove that the rules of the English House are quite different from the rules now proposed for the Canadian House of Commons.

I do not desire to delay the House at any greater length, but I would like to point out that almost ever supporter of the Government from the province of Quebec has been elected on what is called the Nationalist ticket which was founded on opposition to naval aid of any kind, whether by a contribution or whether by organization of a Canadian naval service. I will give you the names of the hon. gentlemen who in the province of Quebec are asked to support these proposals, and who have been elected on the Nationalist ticket: Messrs. Achim, Barrette, Bellemare, Boulay, Guilbault, Lamarche, Mondou, Blondin, Brabazon, Coderre, Cromwell, Lesperance, Nantel, Paquet, Pelletier, Rainville, Gauthier (Gaspé), Forget, Girard, Lavallee, Sévigny. I omit Mr. Monk. Here are twenty-one gentlemen in the House who have been elected and pledged to oppose any and every kind of naval expenditure. And, what did we see the other day when this closure resolution was introduced and it was proposed to prevent any amendment to it? We saw twelve of these gentlemen voting with the Government: Messrs. Achim, Bellemare, Boulay, Guilbault, Blondin, Brabazon, Coderre, Cromwell, Nantel, Paquet, Gauthier, (Gaspé), and Sevigny. Six of them were paired: Messrs. Barrette, Lamarche, Mondou, Lesperance, Pelletier and Forget, and they were paired with members of the Opposition. One was absent and was not paired, Mr. Rainville. I do not see Mr. Rainville in his seat now, but if he were I would ask him how he would have voted. Another gentleman who has been elected on the Nationalist ticket, Mr. Lavallée, is the only one who voted against the motion of the hon. member for East Hastings to take the floor away from the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and give it to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The Postmaster General was absent and was paired; but it would be only fair to-day to afford him an opportunity of saying how he would have voted on this motion. Would he have voted the reversal of your decision, Mr. Speaker? Would he have voted, when you had decided that the leader of the Opposition had the floor, to take that floor away from him and give it to his colleague the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen)? Undoubtedly he would. 'Qui ne dit mot, consent,' as we say in French, 'the one that does not utter a word, consents.' He would have voted for the motion. So all Nationalists, we may contend, with the exception of Mr. Lavallee, have voted to preclude every amendment on this proposition which has been framed with the view of forcing through the Naval Bill, the contribution of $35,000,000, without reference to the people of this country. We have resisted for a long time on this Bill but not any too long. We have been supported, as I said, in the first place by public opinion. We are more supported to-day than we were in the first place. Whatever may have been the duration, the vicissitudes and the physical strain of the resistance carried on by His Majesty's loyal Opposition in this House against the most objectionable and dangerous principle embodied in the Naval Bill, it has not been without charm; it has not been without some compensation. We have the profound and vivifying satisfaction of having fulfilled a great patriotic duty. Yesterday it was on the ground of Canadian autonomy threatened in its very vitals and in its very existence that we displayed our energy and directed our most generous efforts. To-day another inscription is to be read on the Liberal standard of Canada, and that is, 'Freedom of Speech.' Canadian autonomy, freedom of speech; these are the two paramount ideas. These are the principles governing the Liberal party in this unequal parliamentary struggle. They are the guiding stars that will mark our way and lead our steps in the accomplishment of our destinies. We may succumb beneath the number in this House, but the principle will live and survive and will ultimately triumph.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say something, on this motion for the adjournment of the House, on a matter that was brought to the attention of Parliament some weeks ago by the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). It is a matter that concerns the administration of the natural resources, the lands, of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I beg to remind the hon. member that a discussion on that subject would not be permissible now. It would only be permissible to give reasons why the House should adjourn now or to deal with the question that is immediately before the House. It is not permissible to wander off on another subject.

Mr. OLIVER: I was endeavouring to give reasons why the House should adjourn, for the purpose of considering a matter which has stood for a number of weeks awaiting consideration by the House, a matter that is of importance to the country at large and that should not be allowed to stand any longer. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the occasion is of sufficient importance to warrant the motion to adjourn for the purpose of securing its consideration. It was, as I have already said, a matter of such importance that it called for the action of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) in addressing the House on a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is a matter of urgency, there is a provision in the rules for bringing it up. Rule 39 says:

> A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance), shall always be in order.
> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the House (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance), must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (rule 25) has been concluded and before notices of motion or Orders of the Day are taken up.
>
> The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of public importance, and states the matter.
> He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, reads it out, and asks whether the member has the leave of the House.

This rule was made expressly for such cases, and the hon. member could take advantage of it to deal with the subject which he now proposes to discuss.

Mr. BELAND: As I made the motion, might I be allowed to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to rule 36, which says:

> When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the Orders of the Day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not at all disputing the propriety of the motion to adjourn the House. There is no question about that. It is the question of what discussion may take place on the motion to which I am referring.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the right to discuss various questions upon a motion for the adjournment of the House must be regarded in the light of what has been the parliamentary practice in the past, not only in this House but in the British House of Commons. The universal usage of this Parliament has been that very great latitude is given to a member on making a motion of this character. There are not many opportunities which members have to discuss important questions which are of public interest and in regard to which hon. members may desire to make their views known to the House and to the country. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), as I understand, is proceeding to show to Your Honour reasons why it is desirable that the House should adjourn. Your Honour has stated, and I think with absolute correctness, that upon this motion it is quite competent for him to discuss the question of closure; but he can also discuss reasons as to why the House should adjourn, the effect of which will be to supersede the motion for closure which is now under consideration. The reasons which my hon. friend would give might not commend themselves to Your Honour as they would commend themselves to him or to other hon. members; but, such reasons as they are, the hon. member has a right to give them. We are confronted to-day with a proposition to which this Government seems to be devoting the most intense energy, to which it seems to be giving all consideration, from which no consideration of public interest can draw it aside, and that is to gag and to manacle members of this House. That is the phantom which is pursuing the members of the Government and their supporters. Surely, if there is a great question of public interest, one affecting the administration of public lands of this country, one affecting the conduct or administration of the Department of the Interior by an hon. gentleman who is a member of this House and a minister of the Crown, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) is of the opinion that some time ought to be given for the consideration of that question and that all the time of the House should not be taken up with the motion for closure, surely he has a right to present the motion to the House, the effect of which will be to supersede the motion for closure and to give to the Government and to the House an opportunity to take up other questions of great importance. Upon a motion made in this House in 1891—a motion which, no doubt, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will remember—there was a long discussion, in which many prominent members of this House, including my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, took part. This discussion was confined almost entirely to the consideration of questions connected with the formation of the Government. The Speaker at that time might have been unable to see very clearly what the formation of the Government had to do with the motion for the adjournment of the House, yet no one questioned the right of my right hon. friend to make the motion, or the right of hon. members of this House to support it. As I have said, you will find scores and hundreds of cases where a motion for adjournment of the House invoked a wide discussion, during the course of which the greatest possible latitude was allowed, and questions were discussed which were not directly connected with the matter before the House. This has been for centuries the unalienable privilege of members of the British Parliament, and, ever since Confederation, it has been recognized as the right of members of this House to enter upon the discussion of any public grievances—matters connected with the formation of the Government, with the administration of public affairs by the members of the Government, or with the conduct of ordinary members of the House. These questions could all be entered upon, and they are of greater importance than the one now before the House. It would be limiting in an unprecedented manner the right of the members of this House to say that an hon. member cannot urge as a reason why the Government should drop this mad course which it is pursuing in its attempt to gag and manacle the members of this House, that there are matters of far greater importance to the people of this country which ought to be discussed, rather than that the whole time of the Government should be concentrated on this one objectionable proposition, that the members should be kept here day after day discussing this motion, which is against the public interest, and that other vital matters should be wholly ignored. That, as I understand it, is what my hon. friend proposes to argue. It may be his intention to deal with other matters, but, in any case, he has a right, as a member of this House, and in the exercise of his own judgment, to present any reason which he thinks ought to appeal to this House as an argument why this motion should be superseded, and why other matters should be taken up and brought before the House for consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: It was the common practice, both in England and in Canada, to make these motions. In 1906, the rule which I have just read was adopted for the specific purpose of avoiding these motions for adjournment, and to provide that a motion could be made under special circumstances, to bring before the House a matter that was of special importance. I take the English rule, and I find that the experience of the British House must have been the same as ours, because they have exactly the same rule as we have. If a member desires to make a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, leave must be asked on certain days, and a member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter. He then hands to the Speaker the paper containing that statement in exactly the same manner as it is done in this House. So that their practice is the same as ours. Before our rules were last amended, I think they revised theirs, and we amended ours to make them in accordance with theirs, and for the same purpose.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would call Your Honour's attention to the fact that the English rule has a different provision from ours as to the ordinary motion for adjournment. We have been careful to leave rule 39, which extends to hon. members the right to make an ordinary motion to adjourn, just as it stood for years. While an hon. member can obtain the leave of the House, with your concurrence, to move the adjournment for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, the right to make an ordinary motion for adjournment remains just as it was before the rules were revised in 1906 and 1910. I presume the reason why the House did not change this rule was because of its desire to refrain from restricting in any way the liberties of members to bring these matters before the House. Rule 39 is as follows:

A motion to adjourn (except when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance), shall always be in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: That I did not dispute; I disputed as to what should be discussed on that motion. I held that it was not permissible to discuss any question other than the reasons for moving the adjournment, and the question immediately before the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is all I wish to argue. It is competent for the hon. member to give reasons why the adjournment should take place. He has a most unlimited right to do that; Your Honour or this House may decide that his reasons are not good and sufficient ones, but apparently he must be the judge of the reasons he proposes to submit.

Mr. OLIVER: I was moved to take the action I did on this occasion by what was said by the right hon. the Prime Minister in his explanation of the resolution now before the House, and from the terms of the resolution itself. I read in the first sub-section of the resolution that every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions, is hereafter debatable. Clearly the intention of the new rule is to cut out adjournment motions or a motion such as I have proposed to make. I understood the right hon. the Premier to say that that was the purpose of that particular section of the resolution, and I am bound to believe that that was the purpose. Then, he having made that statement and finding this provision as I read it in the resolution, I assumed that, in accordance with what is admitted to have been the practice of the House, I had the right to make the motion in this form.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, you have stated the matter correctly; it only now remains for us to determine what are our rights under the rules as laid down. The rule was amended in 1906 for the purpose of giving any member the privilege of bringing forward, with the consent of the House, a matter which he deemed of importance and urgency. But while we adopted this rule, we also left in operation the rule which provides that at any time during the sittings of the House a question is under discussion the adjournment of the House can be moved. You have stated that such a motion can be made, and the matter that remains to be determined is what subjects can be debated on that motion—that is the only question. As I understand it, your ruling would be on such a motion we cannot discuss anything but the subject that is under debate at the time the motion is made, or the reasons why the House should adjourn. If that be the case, it seems to me that the argument of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is irresistible, that the member who moves the adjournment of the House must be allowed to give his reasons. Until he has given his reasons, I submit, it would be premature for Your Honour to pass judgment and say you will not hear him; he must be allowed to state what is the reason why the House should adjourn. In this matter, we are threatened with a curtailment of our privileges. I understand that during the two weeks' almost continuous sitting we had some time ago—I was not present during the last week—the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled that on a motion to adjourn anything and everything could be discussed except the question which was then before the the Chair; he would not allow a discussion of the Navy Bill which was the question then under consideration. Now, as I understand you, Sir, we must be confined to what is before the House. So, at one time, we are told we cannot debate what is before the House, and then we are told that we must not debate anything else. We want to know our rights. Whatever is the ruling of Your Honour we shall submit to it. But, if your ruling is that we must confine ourselves to the subject before the House, then, when we come to debate the Naval Bill and desire to move a similar motion, we must be allowed the privilege of debating that subject and not be told then that that is the one subject that we must not discuss. It is these contradictory rulings which perplex us, and we should have an authoritative determination of what our rights are in reference to this matter.

Mr. BORDEN: I remember an occasion when this very question was debated between the right hon. gentleman and myself, some few years ago. If I remember well, he took the position at that time that there is a distinct difference between a motion to adjourn when no debate is in progress and a motion to adjourn when a debate is in progress. I think the view that my right hon. friend put forward is sustained by the authority. I find in the eleventh edition of May, pages 316-7 the following:

Motions for the adjournment of the House, when there is no question under discussion, must be clearly distinguished from similar motions during a debate.

In the one case any subject can be brought up for discussion; in the other case as I have understood the matter, the debate is limited. And I think the same view is recognized by Bourinot, pages 466-7. I should think the House would be impressed with the manifest inconvenience and undesirability of introducing into the midst of a debate such as this the matter to which the hon. member for Edmonton referred on a previous occasion to-day and which he says is of such a character that he desires to make a motion with regard to it conveying censure upon a member of the Administration. I should think every member would be impressed with the inconvenience and undesirability of approaching such a question in that way. My hon. friend had the opportunity of making his motion some two weeks ago when the House was moved into Committee of Supply on various occasions, and when other motions of this character were made.

Mr. OLIVER: May I say a word there? The information upon which I base the argument I desire to place before the House had not been brought down at that time.

Mr. BORDEN: I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation. But he spoke of this as a matter that had been under consideration for some months, and I was not aware that the information to which he alludes had been brought down at so recent a date. But in addition, if he regarded this as a matter of urgency, and it did prove to be a matter of urgency, he could have taken it up on motion to adjourn the House to-day, when the Orders of the Day were called. That would seem to me a much more convenient course than the one which he now proposes to adopt. However, as it is nearly six o'clock, perhaps we had better call it six o'clock and allow His Honour the Speaker to consider the matter.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not my intention or desire to prolong the discussion on the point of order that was raised.

Mr. BORDEN: Perhaps I may obviate the necessity of my hon. friend speaking on the subject. I have consulted the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and he is very anxious indeed that there should be no delay in respect of the discussion of any matter which involves the question of his administration of any department of the Government. He is also most anxious that no difficulty should be placed in the way of taking the opinion of the House upon any question relating to his administration of the Department of the Interior or of the department of which he is now the head. I may therefore say to my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) that if he desires to proceed with this matter to-morrow, I will see that the House is moved into Committee of Supply for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to make the motion which he desires to make.

Mr. GRAHAM: So far as that concerns my hon. friend from Edmonton, I think it would be perfectly satisfactory. But from my own personal point of view, what I desired to have made clear, Mr. Speaker, was not so much the point of the hon. member for Edmonton as to this particular discussion as this: During the past few weeks, we have had what I consider some peculiar rulings by temporary chairmen; I mean chairmen who were taken from the body of the House, and in some instances very young members of the House. We argued strenuously; but some of their particular rulings, in my opinion, were not according to the rules of the House at all. I think I am not putting it too strongly when I say that. I believe that if the business of the country is to be carried on properly and in order, these rulings will have to disappear from the records as rulings of this House. If I remember correctly, there was one ruling on the motion that the Chairman do leave the Chair that no discussion could take place on the motion that was then before the House, and the ruling was very peremptory on that point. Thinking that that was not in accordance with the rules of the House—and I would judge from your intimation this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, that that was your view—we appealed. However, the majority of the House upheld that decision. I think that this would be an opportune time to have a ruling from you, Sir, that would put right this question, so that we may know what is the proper procedure on that point. My own view is, and I present it merely as my opinion, that the Chairman's ruling in that respect was wrong, and that we were at perfect liberty to discuss the motion before the Chair. To make my point clear, I may read the record. On the 10th of March:

Objection being taken in the committee to the decision of the Chairman (Mr. Aikins) on a point of order, and an appeal being made to the House,

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair, and the Chairman of the committee made the following report:—

An hon. member in speaking to a motion that the Chairman do now leave the Chair, was proceeding to discuss the merits of the Bill previously under discussion in the committee.

A point of order was raised that such discussion was irrelevant, and I ruled the point of order well taken.

Against my ruling the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Pugsley) appeals to the House.

The question being put by Mr. Speaker: shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed; it was decided in the affirmative, on the following division.

The Chairman, in the case, ruled absolutely that we could not discuss the merits of the main question that had been before the committee on the motion to adjourn. As a private member of the House, I would like to have a ruling on this point, so that we may know exactly where we are at on these motions

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to say, with reference to that, that the motion before the House to-day is a little peculiar. The original motion is a certain resolution; the subsequent motion is the previous question. The previous question might entirely displace the original motion. Any debate on that motion would necessarily involve the original question, and therefore could be debated. As the motion to adjourn the House would displace both of these, in my opinion the discussion might properly be confined either to giving reasons why the House should adjourn or to the original motion. There are some exceptions which on the spur of the moment I cannot give. In some cases there would be a reason why you might refer to the original motion, but as a general principle of debate, relevancy means that you must discuss the last motion before the House. May on Relevancy, page 293, says:

> He must direct his speech to the question under discussion.

It follows, therefore, that debate must not stray from the question before the House to matters which have been decided during the current session. Then, Cushing on page 628, says:

> The question to which a member is bound to speak is that which was last proposed from the Chair, which is thus immediately pending, and which, according to the course of parliamentary proceedings, is next to be taken.

That is the last motion that is put to the House, and therefore the debate would have to refer to that. But with reference to amendments another principle comes in on which I gave a ruling, and I think that some misunderstood it. With reference to amendments to a Bill, if an amendment was that all the words after 'that' be struck out, in the event of that carrying, it would displace the Bill entirely, and therefore the original motion would be debatable. If the motion was that a portion of the clause be struck out, or that a portion of a clause be added, or that a new clause be added, then the discussion must be confined to the last motion before the Chair. That would be different. There are some other cases which I have not clearly in mind at present, but which at some subsequent date, I shall endeavour to deal with.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The motion to which my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) refers, was a motion that the Chairman do now leave the Chair. The effect of that is to displace the resolution. It has the same effect as a motion to adjourn the House would have, according to Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would not say anything in reference to that, because I am not dealing with it just now. The objection which I took was not to the motion, but to the relevancy of the debate on the motion, which I think ought to be confined to the subject before the House and should not be allowed to stray to other matters that are not relevant.

Mr. OLIVER: The proposition of the right hon. the Prime Minister is entirely satisfactory to me, so far as the subject which I wish to bring before the House is concerned. But I may say that that was only part of the purpose I had in view. I considered that the present was an opportune time to acquire a knowledge of what rights existed under our present rules permitting a vote of censure upon the Administration, so that we would know when the new rules came into force, what the difference would be between existing conditions and the conditions that would thereby be created. It seemed to me that a decision in a concrete case would probably be the best way to arrive at a conclusion, in view of the fact that the Government has not seen fit to give us that full and detailed explanation of the changes in our rights that will come about because of the passage of the resolutions. I am still, Mr. Speaker, in some doubt, even after you have given your decision on the point which required elucidation. You have decided that a motion to adjourn the House is in order, but there is a question as to the relevancy of the debate upon that motion. I understand you to rule that there is a perfect right to discuss the question that is before the House when the motion to adjourn is made, but it is in regard to the possibility of discussing other questions on the motion to adjourn the House that I am not clear even although you have delivered your ruling. Subject to correction, I am aware that it has been the practice in the House to discuss questions, other than the main question that is before the House, on motions to adjourn, such as I have made, and it is, I presume, that hitherto exercised right that is to be taken away by the resolutions now before the House.

Mr BORDEN: Is the hon. gentleman speaking of a motion arising during a debate or a motion made afterwards?

Mr. OLIVER: A motion made afterwards; a motion made as I have made this motion. I am desirous of knowing, for present information and future guidance, what the ruling of the Chair is with regard to relevancy in a discussion based on a motion to adjourn the House such as I have made.

Mr. SPEAKER: Looking over the authorities, I find that the English rule is very much the same as ours. In Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice I read that:

Motions for the adjournment of the House, when there is no question under discussion, must be clearly distinguished from similar motions during a debate. The former can have no object but the discussion of some extraneous subject;—

That is a substantive motion for adjournment.

—the latter has referred only to the adjournment of the question then before the House.

Because it refers to that simply. Bourinot takes the same ground. He says:

A motion for the adjournment of the House may be made while a matter is under discussion, or in the interval of proceedings. In the first case such a motion is in the nature of an amendment, and in the other it is a substantive motion, to which a reply is permitted to the member who makes it.

I have not 'Hansard' under my hand where the question was debated at considerable length by the Hon. Mr. Blake, but he contended that there must be a substantive motion made to allow of the bringing in of some particular question that the members desired to discuss. He expressed the view that it could not be properly done by interjecting it into the debate on some other question. Then, I have a quotation here from the English 'Hansard' with regard to this question in which the Speaker, in giving his ruling, said:

That when there was a question before the House it was quite open to move the adjournment of the House upon that question; but in so doing the hon. member must confine himself to the question.

The hon. member in question was trying to debate another question, but the Speaker ruled that he could not do so, and then the member gave notice that he would take it up on another day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand your ruling to be, Mr. Speaker, that on this motion to adjourn the House, we are confined to the question now before the House, which is a proposal to amend the rules of the House. I have certainly no fault to find with your decision; I bow to it with great respect. Therefore, I understand that henceforth it will be the rule that upon a motion to adjourn we are confined to the question then before the House. The present effect of this is to prevent us from having the discussion which we intended to have. But I may perhaps be allowed to recall again to your attention the fact that upon a previous occasion the House ruled quite against your decision. I would refer again to the matter which was brought to your attention on the 10th of March.

Mr. SPEAKER: What year?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This year, during the naval debate.

An hon. member in speaking to a motion that the Chairman do now leave the Chair, was proceeding to discuss the merits of the Bill previously under discussion in the committee.

This was the report which was received by you from the Chairman of the committee. An hon. member was proceeding to discuss the merits of the Bill which had been previously under discussion in the committee.

A point of order was raised that such discussion was irrelevant, and I ruled the point of order well taken. Against my ruling the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Pugsley) appeals to the House.

The ruling was confirmed. On that occasion the point of order was taken that upon a motion for the committee to rise we could discuss everything except the Naval Bill which was under discussion. On the present occasion the ruling of the Chair is—and I submit to it with great respect—that upon a similar motion, although not exactly identical, we cannot discuss anything except the motion before the House. We cannot do now what we could do at that time. We are perfectly willing to be shut out at some time, but not every time. Thus, henceforth, we will understand that when we come again to debate the Naval Bill, if we move an adjournment of the House, we can exhaust our twenty minutes in speaking to the Bill itself and perhaps we shall not be called upon to speak at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, as one who took a little part in advocating such a motion, I think an explanation to the House is becoming at this time. I might recall that at the time the House was in committee and it was debating clause 2 of the Naval Bill. It was held from the Chair, and held doubtless correctly, that inasmuch as the Bill had passed its second reading, the principle of the Bill was no longer a subject of discussion, that it was not consequently before the committee and that the committee was engaged in the discussion of the details of clause 2. In order to circumvent that very proper decision, in my mind, the device was adopted of moving that the chairman of the committee leave the Chair and thus it was sought to discuss the principle of the Bill which before had been ruled not to be the subject of discussion. The subject of discussion was clause 2 in its details. The Chair ruled that, inasmuch as the principle of the Bill was not the subject of discussion before the committee, it could not be made such by a motion that the chairman leave the Chair. The decision of the Chair was appealed against and the House upheld the Chair. But the decision of the House to uphold the Chair on that occasion, is in line with its decision at this time inasmuch as you, Mr. Speaker, have held that only the matter under discussion when the motion to adjourn is made can be made the subject of discussion after the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is one of the subjects that I did not refer to, and that I desired a little more consideration of. When a debate takes place there are other rules that must be observed as well as the one I have referred to, and one is that, when the judgment of the House has been given on a specific subject, that cannot be revived during the current session.

Mr. GRAHAM: I thought that perhaps the majority might find it necessary to amend the Bill again, to meet the ruling that Mr. Speaker has given, in order to be consistent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that the judgment of the House would bind Your Honour, and if it was an erroneous judgment, that, on the motion that the Chairman leave the Chair the merits of the Bill which was then under consideration could not be discussed, the question raised by my hon. friend from Edmonton would be very important.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be a precedent, but if I thought it was wrong of course I would not be bound by it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: May I say one word in justification of the view that the Chairman was right when he decided that the subject before the committee could not be discussed upon a motion to adjourn. If a motion to adjourn under these circumstances has any reason at all or is to find any reason, I submit it must find that reason outside and separate from the subject that is before the House or the committee. Otherwise the motion to adjourn if allowed simply permits doubling up the speeches. Now, in support of the motion I made, (to illustrate my point merely), I desired to give the House reasons why the debate on the resolution should not for the time be continued, I being prepared to urge that other matters of grave public importance called for the immediate attention of the House. It was on that ground that I based my motion and I submit again, it is worthy of consideration, if that is not a better and more useful interpretation of the right of adjournment of the debate than the suggestion that on the motion to adjourn the subject under consideration is still and must still be discussed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is this House ready for the question?

Mr. BELAND: I withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, if this were not the last occasion upon which the present Government intends to permit the minority in this House to exercise the privilege of free speech in a free Parliament I would not feel that it was incumbent upon me to take part in this discussion. But, Sir, having regard to the revolution in the public life of this country that will inevitably follow the adoption of the resolution standing in the name of the right hon. the Prime Minister, I feel it is my duty to add my protest to the protests already uttered upon this side of the House against this deadly attack upon the rights of minorities, upon the privileges of Parliament and upon the freedom of debate. And, Sir, to that observation let me add the expression of my belief that whatever the historian of the future may say as to the general record of this Administration he will not fail to point out that in one respect, at least, it stands unique. It stands unique in this: that within eighteen months after its accession to office, it put constitutional government on trial for its life, passed capital sentence upon it, and invented a new-fashioned kind of guillotine for the purpose of more speedily carrying that sentence into effect. That, Sir, is an achievement of which no other Canadian Administration could boast, and of which no other Administration would care to boast.

And what reasons did the Prime Minister give for his proposal to place the minority in this House at the mercy of a single minister, whether that minister be a man with a fine sense of honour and a high conception of duty, or a machine politician defiant of all the rules and amenities that are supposed to govern the proceedings of a deliberative assembly? In the first place the Prime Minister claimed that public business had been obstructed. That claim, as practically every gentleman who has taken part in this debate on this side of the House has proven, is absolutely without foundation. The public business that the Government brought down for our consideration passed and passed promptly, and the same remark applies to the Supply for which the Government asked. The Supply for last year was voted in its entirety and one-sixth of the estimates for this year was voted after very brief debate indeed. But, some hon. gentlemen say that the Naval Aid Bill is a matter of public business and that its progress has been delayed. Well, Sir, we on this side of the House, and I believe the majority in this country, do not regard the Naval Aid Bill as a matter of public business. We regard the Naval Aid Bill as a deal; a deal between the Nationalists and the jingoes; a deal between an hon. gentleman on one side of the Atlantic and an hon. gentleman on the other side of the Atlantic; a deal that we, the members of the Liberal party, have decided to resist to the uttermost of our powers and to the very end of the chapter.

Now, Sir, the right hon. the Prime Minister in support of this proposal of his quoted the opinions of certain Liberal newspapers and of certain members of the Liberal party in favour of what he describes as some form of closure. In that connection he did me the honour to mention some observations I made during the campaign of 1911. Let me point out that neither in any language of mine nor in any language used by any other Liberal speaker, can the Prime Minister find one syllable in approval of the closure which is contained in his resolution now before the House. The remarks I made in 1911 were elicted by the conduct of the right hon. gentleman himself and of his followers in their obstruction of the reciprocity agreement in this House. My idea then as it is my idea now of what should be done to meet such a situation as they raised, was to follow the precedent that I had seen followed in 1910, namely: to appoint a committee to act with you, Mr. Speaker, to revise the rules and to report their deliberations to the House. My further idea in that regard was that such a revision should take place in the first session of a new Parliament when any revision of the rules could not be said to apply to any particular piece of legislation brought before Parliament.

As a justification for the time limit of twenty minutes which the right hon. the Prime Minister proposes to apply to speeches at a certain stage of procedure in this House, he referred to a time limit of five minutes which prevails in the United States House of Representatives. He quoted from Bryce's American Commonwealth to show the advantage of such a time limit. If the right hon. gentleman had been more familiar with Bryce's monumental work, or with the procedure at Washington, he would have known that the very privilege which he propose to take away from this House exists unchecked in the United States House of Representatives. In support of that statement, let me read another quotation from Bryce's American Commonwealth, Vol. I, page 135. There the author says:

> To use the power of closing debate as stringently at Westminster as it is used at Washington would revolutionize the life of the House of Commons. But the House of Representatives is an assembly of a very different nature. Like the House of Commons it is a legislating, if hardly to be deemed a governing body. But it is not a debating body. It rules through and by its committees, in which discussion is unchecked by any closing power; and the whole House does little more than register by its votes the conclusions which the committees submit. One subject alone, the subject of revenue, that is to say, taxation and appropriation, receives genuine discussion by the House at large. And although the power of limiting debate is often applied to expedite business, it is seldom applied till opportunity has been given for the expression of all relevant views.

Mr. Speaker, you cannot have failed to note that that statement ilustrates the great difference that exists between the procedure at Washington and the procedure at Ottawa. As the author of the American Commonwealth points out, at Washington the great bulk of the business of the House of Representatives is done through its committees, and that closure cannot be applied in those committees. That, however is the very thing which the right hon. the Prime Minister proposes to do in this Parliament; he proposes to apply closure in committees as well as in the House itself. The extract also shows that at Washington the subject of revenue, or Supply, as we would call it, receives genuine discussion by the House at large; but, under the rules proposed by the right hon. the Prime Minister, in this House hereafter there is only to be such discussion of Supply as a minister will permit. In other words, a minister under these new rules can force through committee and through the House, after little or no debate, estimates which at Washington would receive genuine discussion both in the committee and in the House. I think you will agree with me, Sir, that the right hon. the Prime Minister was not very happy in his choice of this illustration to buttress the rules which he has submitted for the consideration of the House.

What other justification did the right hon. the Prime Minister give for his new departure? He cited the British precedent of 1882. Then, although he did not directly say so, he hinted that the public favoured these new rules. The British precedent to which the Prime Minister referred was the closure of 1882, the Gladstone closure as it has been called. As has been pointed out over and over again, that is not the closure which it is proposed to apply here. The closure contained in the proposed resolution is the Tory closure of 1887. It is a matter of history and it has been mentioned during the course of this debate that the first guillotine motion in the British House of Commons was moved on June 10, 1887, by the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, then the Conservative Prime Minister, to force through the committee a perpetual coercion Act for Ireland. That is the model followed on the present occasion by the right hon. the Prime Minister and supported by those of his followers who have spoken in this debate.

On the other branch of the right hon. gentleman's argument, I deny that he has any mandate from the people in support of these revolutionary rules. Singularly enough the Montreal Star, which, as the Ottawa Citizen says, is passing through a period of delirium, violently supports these new rules. That very paper, in an editorial published on November 24, 1908, discussed both British precedent and public opinion in their bearing upon closure in Canada. The article is so interesting at the present time that I shall read a few extracts from it. These extracts are as follows:

> There is talk of amending the rules of debate next session so as to make it possible for the majority to clôture the minority. British precedent will doubtless be quoted in favour of such a step. But British precedent fails to cover our case in several important respects. In the first place, there is no such danger of the congestion of business from too prolonged debating as exists at Westminster; for we have nothing like so much business to get congested. Then we have no second chamber worthy of the name to prevent a majority in the Commons from railroading through measures without sufficient consideration which might be very mischievous in their effect upon the nation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MURPHY: I would ask my hon. friends on this side of the House who cheer that statement to bear in mind that it was made by the Montreal Star.

Mr. MARCIL: What was the date of it?

Mr. MURPHY: November 24, 1908. That, as my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said, was during a lucid interval and before it became the great naval authority on this and every other continent.

We must never forget that freedom of debate is a right of immense value. The power to do business may be of greater value; and no one doubts, for example, that the American Congress was justified in putting a stop to the 'filibustering' which prevented that body from transacting the business of the nation. But the condition of blockade ought to precede the application of the remedy. The nation must really suffer before it will be willing to give up the privilege of free debate.

With a Parliament so little burdened with business as ours, it is hard to conceive of a condition of affairs under which our people would be willing to give to the majority the power to gag the minority at will. That is a very tyrannical and dangerous power; and might be used most despotically. The nation could be made to suffer far more under present conditions from the shutting off of free discussion than it is likely to suffer from the tieing up of public business. Conditions may change as Canada grows and our national business becomes more intricate and voluminous. But it will not do to regard the addition of the parliamentary gag to our weapons of party warfare as a matter of little importance, and a step abundantly justified by the tediousness of the talkers in the Commons.

A summary of the arguments made by the Montreal Star would result in the conclusion that British precedent, which the right hon. gentleman has invoked, does not apply in Canada, because, in the first place, there is no such congestion of business in this House as there is at Westminster. That was true in 1908, and it is true to-day. In the second place British precedent does not apply, says the Star, because we have no second Chamber worthy of the name to prevent the majority in the Commons from railroading through measures which might be very mischievous in their effect upon the nation. As to that observation, its truth, or the reverse, remains to be seen. The Star further says that public opinion will justify closure only if a condition of blockade of public business exists, and if the nation has really suffered. No hon. gentleman will seriously contend that either of these conditions exists to-day, and, this being the case, closure, according to this argument of the Star, cannot be justified. That, I submit is a perfectly correct statement of the situation—a statement with which I and my friends on this side of the House entirely concur.

But, Sir, in discussing British precedent, the right hon. Prime Minister has—what shall I say? perhaps to be parliamentary I had better say, overlooked two important features of the closure rule in England which make that rule far less objectionable than the one which he proposes here. The first feature that the right hon. gentleman overlooked was the provision that under a temporary chairman—and we have heard of such gentlemen in this House—closure cannot be enforced in the British House of Commons. We have no such safeguard in the rules proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister, and the importance of having some such safeguard must come home very strongly to my hon. friends on this side of the House, who, during those two strenuous weeks of continuous session, had such extraordinary experiences with the temporary chairmen who were selected to preside over the deliberations of the committee at that time. The second feature of the English closure rule which the right hon. gentleman overlooked is that excellent provision which precludes the Speaker or the Chairman from putting the question if the closure motion be either an abuse of the rules of the House, or, what is much more important, an infringement of the rights of the minority. This safeguard also is absent from these proposed new rules, and I think you will agree with me, Sir, that, bad as the English closure rule may be, the absence of this safeguard in the rules now before the House makes them, in the estimation of every fair-minded man who will give to them patient and serious consideration, infinitely worse.

Next to the Prime Minister the chief apologist for the introduction of coercion in this House was his colleague, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). As one of that hon. gentleman's friends and well-wishers, I regret that he appeared in that role. Having regard to his nationality, to the people he is supposed to represent, and to his well-known sense of fair play, I would have thought that such a role would have been so repugnant to him that no pressure could have forced him to assume it. But, as he out-Heroded Herod in proclaiming his belief in coercion, he will not, I hope, take it amiss if I make brief reference to some of his remarks. First let me read one of his opening statements as contained on page 7617 of 'Hansard.' Discussing the protest made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition against the conduct of the Government in preventing him from speaking and moving an amendment, after you, Mr. Speaker, had ruled that he had the floor, the Minister of Justice said:

> When these rules in their simplest and clearest meaning were applied to himself, he complained that he was gagged; he complained of a lack of fairness on the part of the right hon. leader of the House and on the part of members on this side.

Any person who heard the hon. gentleman when he uttered those words, and any person who heard them read just now, would imagine that, according to the Minister of Justice, it was quite a customary thing to apply rule 17 as it was applied to the right hon. leader of the Opposition one week ago to-day. It must have been within the knowledge of my hon. friend, and it is within the knowledge of every man who has studied the annals of this Parliament, that that rule was never before applied in the manner in which it was applied a week ago to the leader of the Opposition in this House. I venture to say that no hon. gentleman on either side of the House can point out a case in which that rule was ever before applied to the most obscure member who ever occupied a seat in this Chamber, and yet my hon. friend the Minister of Justice referred to that rule, as it was applied to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, as having been applied in its simplest and clearest meaning. I leave the House and the country to judge, both as to the application, of that rule and as to the men who applied it. Now, practically a similar observation was made by my hon. friend with reference to the application of the previous question on the same occasion. Well, Sir, a search of the records of this House indicates that only once before was the previous question invoked against the leader of either of the great parties of this country as it was applied in the case of the right hon. leader of the Opposition a week ago to-day. The occasion to which I refer was the 11th of March, 1886. It was then applied as the result of a trick between two members of the Government of the day. And it is interesting to recall for the benefit of the performers on the latest occasion who were the performers on the other occasion to which I have referred. One of the gentlemen who took part in that performance in 1886 was known as the buffoon of the House. A short time before he figured in that performance, he had entered this Chamber in disguise, and the Speaker, thinking he was a stranger, ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to remove him; but as the Sergeant approached he pulled off the disguise he was wearing—and received privately, if not publicly, a merited rebuke from his then leader, Sir John Macdonald. The other performer was a minister of the Crown who, a few years later, was driven from public life in disgrace and whose name is never now even mentioned. I am not going to draw the obvious parallel either for the benefit of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or for the benefit of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, but the country will draw that parallel, and will do it at the first opportunity.

Now, the Minister of Justice, in the course of his remarks, challenged the statement of my right hon. leader that the Minister of Justice and his friends who sat on this side of the House in 1911 had obstructed the reciprocity agreement in that year, and he said he was not prepared to admit that there was any obstruction on that occasion. Well, if he will not accept the statement of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, perhaps I can give him an authority that he will accept. I would therefore refer him to the words of his own leader, spoken during the campaign of 1911. In the Canadian Annual Review of 1911, page 176, there is an account of the address delivered by the present Prime Minister at St. John, N.B., on the 5th of September in that year. After describing several incidents connected with the meeting, the Annual Review says:

In this address also Mr. Borden frankly admitted having obstructed the agreement in Parliament.

And then it proceeds to give his own words as follows:

We would have been untrue to our duty if we had not obstructed.

Further, I would refer the hon. Minister of Justice to the Montreal Star of September 7, 1911 in which he will find the report of a meeting at Sussex, N.B., on the previous day at which the right hon. Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, asserted that he and his followers had obstructed the reciprocity agreement in Parliament, and added:

I have no apologies to offer for our course he declared, amid loud cheers. We would not have been worthy of our responsibility if we had done anything else.

As to which statement will be accepted, that of the Minister of Justice or that of the Prime Minister on this question as to whether obstruction was practised by the Conservative Opposition in this House in 1911, I think it is safe to say that every one of us who had a seat in this House during that year will unreservedly agree with the statement of the Prime Minister that there was obstruction—obstruction practised to the very limit of parliamentary rules and procedure.

The Minister of Justice also said that one had only to look at the manifesto which the Prime Minister issued during the last election to see that he had promised, if he were placed in power, to do just what this resolution proposes to do. Well, I have looked over several manifestos issued by the Prime Minister during the last campaign and I cannot find any such promise. I cannot find a single word about closure. But I did find several promises, one of which it might be interesting to recall. I found a promise, repeated several times, that if the right hon. gentleman were returned to power, he would at once bring in a measure of redistribution; and I found that he criticised the former Administration very severely for not having brought in a redistribution Bill before the election of 1911. And having found that broken promise I thought I was fairly well repaid for my search through these dreary manifestos.

In the further course of his speech my hon. friend the Minister of Justice inveighed against some proposition to have the naval issue settled by a referendum or plebiscite. With regard to that I have only to say that his shafts fell harmless on this side of the House; the Liberal party never proposed to settle the naval question by referendum or plebiscite. The only thing I ever heard of that kind was a statement made by the hon. minister's own allies, the Nationalists, that the Prime Minister had promised them a referendum or plebiscite on the naval question. So, any eloquence the hon. minister has to waste on that subject, he had better direct it at his allies. This is, after all, a family row into which I shall not enter.

The hon. the Minister of Justice alluded to the statement of the leader of the Opposition that in introducing closure the Prime Minister had yielded to the pressure of his followers, and the minister wanted to know whether my hon. leader was speaking out of the abundance of his own experience. No, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Opposition was not speaking out of the abundance of his own experience. Ever since the day when the right hon. gentleman was elected leader of the Liberal party he has led the Liberal party. That constitutes one of the chief differences between him and the right hon. gentleman, who, through courtesy, is said to lead the Government. That right hon. gentleman leads in spells, but we in this House know that he very often surrenders the leadership particularly to his colleague the Minister of Public Works. Let me give you a notable case in point. You will recall that on Saturday, the 15th of March last, there appeared in the Votes and Proceedings of this House a notice in the name of the right hon. the Prime Minister that on the following Tuesday, the 18th of March, he would move a change in the personel of the Committee on Privileges and Elections—he would move that he himself, the Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre) and the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bristol) should be dropped from that committee and replaced by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes). You will also recall that about that time there were very widespread rumours with regard to the charges that were going to be made by my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) with reference to the Hochelaga election, and every man in the House and out of it knew very well that this notice of motion of the Prime Minister to change the personel of that committee was made because he intended to refer to the committee the charges that were to be made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe.

Now, Sir, what happened? I am informed that on Sunday the 16th March, which was the day after this notice was put on the Order Paper, there was a meeting in a certain hotel in this city attended by what some gentlemen irreverently described as the 'strong-arm squad,' and it is currently reported that two of the gentlemen present at that meeting, were the right hon. the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works. As to that I cannot speak, nor can I say what took place at that meeting. But we know what took place afterwards. We know that when my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) moved his motion in this House on March 17, to the amazement of every person who had given the matter any consideration, he was met by a straight refusal to refer his charges either to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or to any other committee. Now, Mr. Speaker, would it not be interesting to know who led and who followed on that occasion, just as it is interesting to know that the Premier's motion has never been heard of from that date to this. I commend that situation to the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and to some other hon. gentlemen who are inclined to dispute that a certain man leads and that another man follows.

In the further course of his observations, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, twitted the right hon. the leader of the Opposition with having to give up Mr. Gladstone as his political model, because, he stated, Mr. Gladstone had first introduced closure in the British House of Commons. While my hon. friend the Minister of Justice did not say so in so many words, his speech left the impression that the closure that we are to have here, is modelled on the closure introduced by Mr. Gladstone. As I have stated in an earlier part of my remarks, the closure that we are to have in this House is not by any means the Gladstone closure. The closure that we are to have in this House is the Tory closure, which was introduced by the Right Hon. W. H. Smith in the British House of Commons in 1887, to pass, not an ordinary coercion Act, but a perpetual coercion Act for Ireland. That, Sir, is the model which excited the admiration and the eloquence of the Prime Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Justice. If my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was aware of the facts, he should have been fair with the House, and he should have stated that Mr. Gladstone while responsible for the closure of 1882, opposed the Tory closure by guillotine, and that the bulk of his Liberal following would not vote for it. For the sake of brevity, Mr. Speaker, I will read a short extract from Morley's Life of Gladstone which sets forth what happened in the British House of Commons when the Tory Government of the day introduced closure by guillotine. The description is to be found in volume III, at page 377.

It was at this point that the Government suddenly introduced their historic proposal for closure by guillotine. They carried (June 10, 1887) a resolution that at ten o'clock on that day week the committee stage should be brought compulsorily to an end, and that any clauses remaining undisposed of should be put forthwith without amendment or debate. The most remarkable innovation upon parliamentary rule and practice since Cromwell and Colonel Pride was introduced by Mr. Smith in a characteristic speech,

I would ask you to pay particular attention to the rest of this sentence:

—Characteristic speech well larded with phrases about duty, right, responsibility, business of the country, and efficiency of the House.

We have heard something like that in recent days in this House.

These 'solemnising complacencies' did not hide the mortifying fact that if it had really been one of the objects of Irish members for ten years past to work a revolution in the parliament where they were forced against their will to sit, they had at least, be such a revolution good or bad, succeeded in their design. Perhaps looking forward with prophetic eye to a day that actually arrived six years later, Mr. Gladstone, while objecting to the proposal as unjustified, threw the responsibility of it upon the Government, and used none of the flaming colours of defiance. The bulk of the Liberals abstained from the division.

After the debate had been closured the guillotine motion was carried by 345 votes against 93, and a perpetual coercion Bill for Ireland was passed into law. That, Sir, is where the right hon. the Prime Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Justice, got their model for the rules which both of these hon. gentlemen so strongly recommend to the favourable consideration of this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is what my hon. friend describes as the Tory closure and what he is now denouncing, the same closure that is in force in Britain to-day?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not want to depart from my line of argument, but speaking off-hand I think it is the same. But, Sir, a rule to be binding in this House, or elsewhere, must have the force of moral sanction behind it. While I admit that the Government has the power to enact such rules as those proposed by the Prime Minister, or any other rules for that matter, I deny that they have the right to exercise that power in the way they have done on the present occasion. The constitutional way would have been to appoint a committee to act with you, Mr.

Speaker, in revising the rules. That constitutional method was rejected, and an unconstitutional method, the power of numbers, was substituted for it. As I have pointed out, the proposed rules cannot be justified on the ground of a blockade of public business, and therefore, Sir, I claim that any rules passed in this way are unconstitutional, are unjustifiable, and can have no binding force on the members of this House. I, for one, decline to be bound by them.

But, Sir, it has been contended by hon. gentlemen opposite that these rules are required to pass the Naval Aid Bill, and that there is a popular majority in favour of that measure. The first part of the argument was exploded by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition when he read clause 4 of the rules relating to the passage of estimates, and asked the Government what the passage of estimates had to do with the passage of the Naval Bill. Of course he received no answer, because no answer was possible. The second part of the argument was completely destroyed by my hon. friend the member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin). Taking the figures of the last general election, the hon. member for Shefford showed that when you add to the total vote cast for the Liberals in that election, the total vote given to the Conservatives who were opposed to a naval contribution of any kind you have a grand total of 749,135 votes against the principle of this Bill. Deducting the total of 545,518 votes cast for Conservative candidates who favoured the principle of the Bill, there remains, as my hon. friend pointed out, a popular majority of 203,617 against the Bill. The Government know that and that is why they prefer closure to a general election. That popular majority is growing every day. There is no better indication of that than the letters which appear each week in the columns of that staunch Tory organ, the Orange Sentinel. For instance, last week Mr. Wm H. Boyd of Winnipeg wrote in these terms:

I see that the Grand Lodge placed itself on record endorsing the Borden naval policy. As a Conservative and a supporter of the Hon. Mr. Borden, I am often asked to explain what brought about the change in the leaders of my party as to the naval policy, and I try to explain that the change came about owing to a great emergency in which the Motherland was placed. This explanation does not meet the argument. I then bring forward the Admiralty memorandum, but this is not taken seriously by any person.

Just imagine that in the Orange Sentinel! In the same issue of the Orange Sentinel, April 10, 1913, Mr. James Bryan of Gallingertown, Ontario, has this to say:

Editor Sentinel,—Your paper reaches me through a friend, and I beg to state that in my opinion it would have a much wider circulation both among members of our order and among Protestants generally if you did not take such a one-sided stand in politics. I do not understand how you can ask members of our order to support the Borden-Rogers-Pelletier-Nantel-Blondin combination. The three latter represent the church party in the province of Quebec. In my humble opinion our order was duped in the last Dominion elections. Many Orangemen in Canada will refuse to support said combination in the next fight.

So far as Sir Wilfrid Laurier goes I believe he has always tried to be fair to all classes and creeds.

Such being the sentiments of members of the Orange Order, before they had any knowledge whatever of the episode that took place in this House last week when these rules were introduced, you can imagine, Mr. Speaker, better than I what the feelings of all the members of that powerful order will be when they learn that your decision, giving the floor to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, was reversed by the votes of the Government majority, led by the right hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and that you were subjected to the humiliation of being voted down by the members of your own party.

Let me assure you, Sir, that, strongly as we would oppose these rules under any circumstances, our opposition was intensified by the conduct of the Prime Minister on Wednesday of last week. On that occasion the right hon. gentleman presented a spectacle that I hope has no counterpart in British parliamentary history. Standing in his place in this House, he gave us his solemn assurance, not once but several times, that we could always rely on fair play and generous treatment while he was Prime Minister; yet, at the time that he was making these fair-sounding promises, he knew that, to the right and to the left of him, sat two of his supporters with typewritten motions in their pockets which they would spring on this House the moment he sat down and so would carry out his prearranged plan of preventing the leader of the Opposition from speaking immediately after him and moving an amendment. The only language that I could use to fittingly describe such conduct as that would be language that you, Sir, would declare to be unparliamentary. But desiring to relieve my feelings, I have found a fairly good substitute in some words which I heard Mr. Winston Churchill, whose authority I am sure will not be questioned on the other side of the House, use in the British House of Commons on July 24, 1905, and which the Speaker of the House of Commons did not consider a transgression of the rules of debate. Mr. Churchill spoke on that occasion in condemnation of the conduct of Prime Minister Balfour and his words contain a message which I would urge my fellow Liberals to take to heart and to apply to the present situation. His words as reported at page 98, vol. 150 of the English 'Hansard,' are these:

The humiliations of the Government were not yet ended; and opportunities remained, numerous and varied, for pressing these. He believed that if every member who resented the action taken by the right hon. gentleman would fight him inch by inch and word by word the session could not be concluded at all by this Ministry. And he was sure that public opinion outside the House would approve and acclaim any action which might be taken by the constitutional Opposition to terminate a situation which was as dangerous as it was disgraceful, and to dismiss from unlawful power a minister who had flouted the traditions of Parliament and dishonoured the service of the Crown.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have only to say in reference to the last words, as I expected that the matter would be brought up at some time again, that I have the decisions of two Speakers who ruled such words as 'dishonouring to Ministers of the Crown' out of order.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling and I desire to have it placed on record that expressions that the Speaker of the House of Commons in England has held to be permissible in debate there are not considered permissible in debate here.

Mr. SPEAKER: It was by a Speaker of the House of Commons in England that the ruling was given to which I have referred.

Mr. A. VERVILLE (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, so much has been said on this question that the indignation of any one at this present moment would seem to be expressed more clearly by keeping absolute silence with regard to it and that is the course which I would follow were it not for my desire to show to the country the way in which the people's rights are threatened not only in this House but in the country generally. During the seven sessions since I have been in this House, nothing has ever been proposed which more seriously affects the people I represent than the present measure. I have heard all kinds of expressions during the present debate and the labour cause has been introduced into the argument by some previous Speakers. It is my intention, for a few minutes only, to deal with this question as it affects the cause of labour. I ask you if this measure, and especially the famous motion of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), would be tolerated in any deliberative assembly. Would the medical men in this House when in convention assembled to discuss the interests of their profession, tolerate any such rule as this which would preclude discussion? Would the business men of this House in their meetings tolerate it; nay, would the millionaires of the Cabinet when they meet to further their business transactions tolerate being shut down when they had a suggestion to make which they thought might enhance their wealth. I would ask those members of this House who belong to benevolent societies if they would tolerate a system of closure, when they hold their meetings? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the Orange lodges of the country would permit any rule of the kind that is sought to be perpretrated on the members of this House, to interfere with their deliberations? And when all these organizations preserve free speech and liberty why should this Parliament be inferior to every other deliberative body in the land? In my opinion, Sir, this measure of closure will bring about a very dangerous state of affairs in the country. The masses of the people are studying what is transpiring in this House of which they are kept informed from day to day and it would not surprise me if in the near future, the revolution which is smouldering to-day may become seriously apparent, to demand liberty of speech. I represent a very large element of the population, and as we know, labouring questions are now and then brought to the attention of Parliament—in future they will of necessity become more frequent subjects of debate here—and I ask you in what position will I be when this closure is passed to defend the interests of those I represent? We have heard about the fair play of the Government and my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) has said something about that, but I may say that as to the present Government, from the experience I have had in this House I have no confidence whatever in their sense of fair play. That feeling has been intensified since the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has belittled himself so as to present that famous motion of his on the previous question. Since then, I feel that no man with any common sense can have confidence in the fair-play of the present Government. There is another important thing which should be considered by us, and that is that we should remember the diverse needs of a country such as ours. It appears to me that this closure measure does not take into consideration that this great Dominion of ours is composed of nine provinces with people of different creeds, different mentality, and different languages. We do not know at what moment the iron ruler of the House of Commons who is the Minister of Public Works will bring in a measure to affect some of the rights we now have and if such a thing should occur what position will the Opposition be in to discuss such a measure. Why, Sir, the Opposition would be absolutely at the mercy of the Minister of Public Works. If we study the evolution of the economic conditions of the country, we must see that a measure of this kind is almost impossible to carry into operation. For my part, and I take this opportunity of saying so, if this closure be adopted, whenever I have anything to discuss in this House in the interests of the people I represent, if I think I need more than the twenty minutes which is to be accorded to me, I am very much afraid that the Speaker will have to use his authority to prevent me from speaking, I want to be fair, and I state that is exactly how I feel about this matter, and I know that if the House judges me one way I will have the advantage of being judged in another way by those whom I represent. I remember when the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) was a member of the city council of Montreal, how he used to dilate on the rights of the minority, and of course the rights of the minority in Montreal were always conceded and absolute liberty of speech and action has always been accorded them. The hon. member (Mr. Ames) has not spoken on this question, but judging by his applause and his support of the measure I fear that he has now changed his mind about the rights of minorities. The history of the labour movement teaches me to be absolutely and strongly opposed to a proposal of this kind. Anyone who has studied the history of the labour unions in Great Britain realizes how the labour people of the Old Land suffered for the lack of liberty of speech and shivered at the very idea of having a thing of this kind passed in Canada. The history of the trades unions in Great Britain from 1779 to 1825 is one of continuous persecution and oppression. We also know that in the years between 1831 and 1837, England was brought to the verge of civil war by the effort to prevent free speech and to deprive the working people of their liberty. Time and again in this very country men have tried, not to prevent free speech, because it has been tolerated so far, but to prevent if possible the right of organization. The authorities have tried to prevent free speech on the street corners of some of our cities. I never thought, however, that it would be attempted in a body of intelligent men, representing the people of Canada. Free speech might be interfered with in any other sphere, but not in Parliament.

If we follow history a little further, we shall see that labour men upon this very question have shed their blood, have given their lives and have been exiled, just because they have had the courage to express their opinions. That has happened in the Old Land. I am very much afraid, under this proposed Russian rule, that in the near future we shall not have free speech any more in this House. We have had demonstration after demonstration in favour of free speech. We had a large demonstration in this Canada of ours only as far back as 1904, through which we have retained the liberty of speech that we have now. I am sorry that we have not had so far, right at the door of this Parliament, thousands and thousands of people protesting against the measure which we are now discussing. I am almost surprised that such a demonstration has not been made. If the members of the Government wish to know the feeling of the masses of the people of this country, as has been pointed out time and again, they have a very good chance to find out now. Let the Government go and ask the people if they are in favour of this closure or not. Let them ask their very kind friends the manufacturers. Let the Government apply the closure to their own deliberations. Let them apply what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries did at the opening of the discussion. I am almost sure, if you were to take a secret ballot on this very question, that not a dozen would vote in favour of the measure.

We often speak of socialism, which has become a nightmare of the Government, and of anarchy. What will bring about anarchy in this country, if not the prevention of free speech? What will be the cause of the brewing of that discontent, of that ill-feeling that exists now in our social life, but the prevention of free speech; the prevention of myself and others from expressing the absolute opinion of those whom we represent? On the opposite side of the House there are members who possess intelligence enough for the balance of the members, that is to say, they believe so. If they do, they must bear in mind that we, on this side of the House, are also sent here to represent the people, to defend their rights, and that we have as much right to free speech as hon. members opposite. We boast that we live in a democratic country. What is democracy? If the present legislation is democracy, I never want to be a democrat; I would rather go back to the old rule. If the country is democratic, surely the rules should also be democratic; but it seems to me that in the future we are going to have a democratic country but not democratic rules. That is exactly what the people will not stand for. We will not stand for it in this House. As I am not a lawyer, I cannot discuss the constitutional right as it has been discussed by other members. From my own judgment and commonsense, I do not see how it is possible to enforce this measure. You have all my sympathy, Mr. Speaker, when you are called upon to apply that rule, because I can imagine the position in which you will be placed, especially in some cases.

We must also bear in mind that up to the present time this country has prospered. Our institutions are large and increasing all the time. The needs of the country are very numerous. That is why we occupy so much time legislating. If this resolution has been introduced in order to pass more legislation and to pass it more quickly, I think that the Prime Minister has made a great mistake. More discussion is absolutely necessary. Anyone, who has travelled through the country and has seen the progress of industry, should understand that rules of this sort, especially with the new population that we are receiving on our coasts every year, are impossible. I am surprised that the Prime Minister has not realized that yet. I am wondering why he has permitted one of the ministers of the Crown to move the previous question. If it had been moved by somebody else, probably it would not have had the same effect. I give the hon. minister (Mr. Hazen) notice now that I may have opportunity of going into his city this summer, that is to say, if the Government does not give us an election too soon. I want to tell the twelve hundred longshoremen and many others in the city of St. John exactly what has transpired in this House, especially on this question of closure; and I want to show how good and kind the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was when he moved the previous question before I had a chance or before anybody else had a chance to move any amendment to the present measure. I shall also have a chance—although I know my hon. friend the Prime Minister does not care whether I have or not—to visit his own city, and it will be my duty to do the same thing as I propose to do in the city of St. John.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VERVILLE: Hon. members may laugh, but I can tell them that, when I make up my mind to do a certain thing, I do not know who is able to prevent me from doing it. I think it is fair that I should tell the hon. gentlemen that I am going down there, so that no one will be taken by surprise. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not going to gag the city; there will be no closure; no moving of the previous question, and we will furnish every opportunity for the moving of amendments. I will conclude by saying that my recent experience in this House has been to me a very great lesson. I have learned that when you, Mr. Speaker, have by your ruling, granted the floor to an hon. member of this House, as you did the other day to the hon. leader of the Opposition, the members on your right can say to you that you are absolutely wrong. I have learned many other things during the present session, and I suppose I shall learn many more. I am strongly against this proposed amendment of the rules, and I hope and trust, whether or not the measure passes—though I suppose it must pass, by reason of the majority on the other side—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE: Hon. gentlemen say 'hear, hear,' but let them try to apply it on me when I am talking. I hope and trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will never be called upon to apply that measure of closure, because Russian rule, as I have said, should not be adopted or applied in Canada.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the question now under consideration is an exceptionally important one, and I propose discussing it briefly apart from those hair-splitting considerations with which the Government has attempted to becloud it.

This Government seems to be under the incubus of some fatality. After engaging into a policy of makeshifts, deceit, double dealing of all kinds, our ministers have found themselves under the necessity of listening to the great voice of the people. To-day, they are panic-stricken; they govern under perpetual fear, and rendered tyrannical by their own apprehensions, they have resolved to restrict the rights and liberties of the representatives of the people in this House.

Their closure resolution is a move inspired by a stubborn and selfish desire to maintain themselves through persistently and narrowly resisting the demands of the people. It is the result of a fit of bad temper; it means the sacrifice of one of our most beloved franchise for the purpose of giving a new lease of life to a discredited Administration.

That legislation is wrong in its principle, and its results will be pernicious. It will not even secure the object for which apparently it was resolved. As a matter of fact, never could Great Britain accept a gift offered under such circumstances.

The justification of that closure resolution is the desirability of passing the Government's Naval Bill. How far away have we drifted in the meantime from the spirit which inspired the great Imperialist manifestation which this House witnessed on December 5 last, when the Prime Minister introduced that now famous Bill.

The Borden policy has undergone all manners of transformation, but the various changes effected by the Prime Minister have in no way improved it; to-day something further must be changed, and it is the rules of the House which hon. gentlemen are now thinking of sacrificing. Indeed, the Navy Bill cannot be passed unless Parliament is gagged, and public opinion as well.

The struggle in which we have engaged is brought about by our love of principle; we are intent on preserving to the Canadian Parliament full control over the expenditure of public moneys; that is the very essence of liberalism.

It is to defend that fundamental principle that Canadian statesmen have strenuously fought, and it is to force through a measure which strikes at the very root of our constitution, that this Government finds itself to-day under the necessity of doing away with freedom of speech. Unable to answer us, those gallant gentlemen opposite are anxious to close our mouths.

Is it fair, Mr. Speaker, to have recourse to a closure rule while a great debate is on, a debate which concerns the most sacred interests of the country, and more particularly with a view to putting an end to such a debate?

There is a principle universally recognized by law-makers and it is that a new enactment does not affect any arrangement made previous to its putting in force. Otherwise, the new enactment would be considered immoral, as well as ineffective, and clothed in bad faith and treachery.

Accordingly at all times it has been acknowledged as a principle of law and ethics, that whenever people are deprived of rights or guarantees they enjoyed heretofore, the law has no retroactive effect. A government which refused to take into account such a recognized principle, would be condemned by public opinion.

Now, what is the effect of this proposal of the Prime Minister? It is introduced in the midst of an important debate, wherein the most sacred interests of this country are being considered, and with the express and acknowledged purpose of forcing through this House, by means of the gag, a hateful Bill which public opinion has condemned in no uncertain manner. Is not that violating most outrageously that principle of the lack of retroactive effect of laws which legislators at all times and in every country have respected?

There is another fundamental principle which this closure resolution threatens with destruction; I mean the principle of the separation of the executive and legislative powers. Parliament will no longer be independent of the Administration. The latter will have the upper hand and will limit debate in this House. And what right have they to do so? I represent here five thousand electors in one of the finest constituencies of the Dominion, and the rights I enjoy in this House of Commons are not superior, but are quite equal to those enjoyed by honourable gentlemen who happen to be at the same time members of the Privy Council and of the Canadian Government. Ministers have not and should not have in this House rights superior to those of other members.

The closure resolution which we are asked to pass implies the denial of that principle. In Great Britain, ministers enjoy no such privileges. The Speaker is the supreme arbiter; he can always set aside a closure motion if it impinges on the rights of some minority. Now, in Great Britain, the Speaker is independent of political parties; governments may change, but, the Speaker remains in office, by common consent, and that is the best guarantee of his unfailing impartiality.

Moreover, in Great Britain, there is no discrimination as between ministers and private members, and every member is allowed to introduce a closure motion, subject to the approval of the Speaker and to the concurrence of a majority, the proportion of which is fixed under the law.

The resolution which we are asked to pass will put in the hands of some ministers a dangerous weapon. That weapon will be still more dangerous when such ministers owe their position to lobby wire-pulling, to services of a suspicious character, to a deep knowledge of intrigue. These ministers may then, without apprehension, purchase padlocks or mail bags for several generations, they may appoint to positions of public trust blackmailers and perjurers, as a reward for their work in election time, because they will be in a position to apply the infamous gag which thhy are preparing for the purpose of preventing any criticism of their misdeeds. Freedom of speech will be reserved exclusively to the men in power, and subject at all times to be denied to others. Freedom which is granted only by way of sufferance is really not freedom. We will then have only a parody and a sham of the parliamentary system.

The Government vindicates what it calls the right of majorities. Do honourable gentlemen forget that minorities also have rights? Above the present will of a hybrid majority such as the one we have now in power, does there not exist a community of opinion, traditions, particular interests and future prospects which go to make up a nation?

And those rights of the majority when did we interfere with them? Have we not discussed and passed without unusual delay every measure which the Government submitted to our consideration? Have we not even pressed the Government to introduce that legislation, promising our assistance towards its completion? Have we not passed every item of Supply which was submitted to us?

So then, the only Bill which the Government charges us with having obstructed is the one referring to contribution for the navy. Now what are the facts? That Bill was discussed when the resolution on which it was founded was introduced. The resolutions were passed after the usual delay, following on a preliminary arrangement between the leaders of both parties. The Bill was subsequently discussed and carried in the same way on its second reading. And it is only in Committee of the Whole, and after the Prime Minister had insisted that we should adopt the clauses before the information to which we were entitled had been furnished, that we were obliged to vindicate our rights and prevent that summary and tyrannical procedure from being adopted.

And now the Prime Minister finding that public opinion is irretrievably opposed to that hateful legislation, comes here and tells us that the rules of the House must be revised, that they are of no use, that these same rules which, in 1911, expressed, to his mind, the essence of freedom are no good. Under those circumstances am I not justified in saying: It is your legislation that is no good? The rules of the House are excellent. If you have recourse to-day to such a tyrannical measure, it is because you realize that you have not at your back the support which is indispensable to governments, the support of the people. Our opponents say that we wish to appeal to the people on the navy question, in the hope of capturing power. Do you not think as I do, Mr. Speaker, that such a claim implies the most severe condemnation of the Government's proposal? In taking such a stand, the Government condemns itself in a way which the people are not likely to forget when an opportunity is offered to them of expressing their will.

The proposal which I am considering is an extraordinary one, but the circumstances under which it is made are still more amazing. Never before have the rules of the House been changed without first a special committee being appointed, made up of representatives of both parties and under the control of the Speaker. Indeed, that is the course pointed out by Bourinot and every writer on parliamentary procedure.

In this instance, the Prime Minister does not even allow us the right of submitting an amendment. His first move when introducing his resolution was to set aside every usage and rule of courtesy by shamefully insulting the right hon. leader of the Opposition, the recognized leader of Canadian politics, by depriving him, through the sheer force of a servile majority, of the right to speak, to which he was undoubtedly entitled. That insult was resented by the whole Canadian people. If your intention was to deeply wound the heart of the people, you could not have adopted a surer, or rather a more effective, plan.

The rules of this House should be made by both parties in the interest of Canada, and not to subserve the temporary requirements of a government at bay. Never in any country has such a course as that adopted by this Government been followed.

In 1882, Gladstone summoned the British House of Commons in special session to amend the rules then in force, for the purpose of facilitating the carrying on of public business. Every member was consulted; every member discussed the proposed changes; amendments were introduced and agreed to by the two great parties in British politics. Why is not such a course followed by this Government? Besides it should be noticed that the British Parliament exists under conditions quite different from ours. It is made up of nearly seven hundred members; the British House of Commons is called upon to transact the business of the whole United Kingdom, to settle local questions as well as others. In Canada, we have a parliament comprising two hundred and twenty-one members, and a large proportion of the business is transacted by provincial legislatures.

Conditions prevailing in the United States Congress are also quite different from ours. Congress meets at dates fixed under the law; it adjourns also at a date prescribed in advance, and every item of business must be transacted within that period. Moreover, passing over the essential differences which exist and necessarily exist between various nations, I may say that Canada has nothing, and will have nothing, comparable with the national and social organization of the countries whose example is constantly suggested to us.

The Government should not lose sight of the fact that the rights of the House are the rights of the country. And any action of the legislator which irritates or counteracts public sentiments, is liable to bring about a dangerous state of discontent. A power which will not allow liberty its legitimate share, is always on the verge of the worst catastrophe. It was not at all necessary to have recourse to such arbitrary means for the purpose of amending rules which are the outcome and the result of the experience of centuries. The Government claims that it is desirous of bringing about a reform. A great French statesman, Prime Minister

Briand, stated on December 5, 1909: 'The idea of progress, of reform, should not present itself in the shape of a stroke with the stick; it is not by such means that it will make greater headway.'

And what are the rules which are being forced on the House? The third is surely the most treacherous. Any minister of the Crown is enabled to prevent the discussion of any proposal. It reads as follows:

(3) Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an ajourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any Minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the Committee, and shall not further be pastponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes in any such adjourned debate; or, if in Committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

Under that new rule, the Government seemingly grants us twenty minutes for discussion, after a minister has given due notice accordingly. Now, what would happen if an unscrupulous minister, and there are such, wished to forestall all discussion? Once notice is given, the Government may press the discussion of some other matter, and by two o'clock in the morning the Bill or resolution subject to closure, will be declared carried, although no discussion whatever has taken place. Will not such a measure be termed arbitrary and tyrannical?

Rule 4 reads as follows:

(4) On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House the estimates of each Department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thurday or Friday.

That rule will considerably restrict and, in certain cases, completely destroy that prerogative which has been recognized in Great Britain for centuries, and in Canada since we enjoy responsible government, of making known the grievances of the people before we can be called upon to vote the moneys asked for by the Crown.

The putting in force of that resolution will amount to a refusal of giving a hearing to the members of the minority; it amounts to a denial of the rights of the people; it is an attempt against the freedom of parliament.

In order to show that this closure resolution has been imagined by this Government in the hope of avoiding an appeal to the people, I propose setting forth what the Prime Minister and some of his lieutenants thought of such a measure while they were sitting on the Opposition side. Honour to whom honour is due! I shall begin with you, Mr. Speaker, and quote what you said in this House in 1908, when you were member for East Grey:

It is one of the valuable rights of this House, and one which should not be given up, that any member may bring before the House any grievance before supplies are voted This is one of the rights which no free parliament would ever desire to give up.

Let us now hearken to the utterances of the Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition. On February 12, 1908, page 2985-6 of 'Hansard,' he expressed himself as follows:

It rather takes the House by surprise to have a proposal of this kind made. The rules of the House are not lightly dealt with in this way; the universal practice is that so important a matter as an important amendment to a rule of the House should be submitted in the first place to a committee, considered by that committee and reported on to the House, when the House would take it into consideration. We revised the rules of this House two years ago, and in the opinion of the House there was no occasion at that time for any such far-reaching amendment as is now proposed. It would prevent the discussion of any grievance on motion to go into Committee of Supply unless two days' notice were previously put upon the order paper. That would be an abnegation of the practice that has prevailed for five hundred years in the British House of Commons and that has prevailed in this House of Commons ever since we have had parliamentary institutions in this country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McLean) speaks of members of the House being taken by surprise, but they need not be taken very much by surprise if they perform their duty and attend here. Surely matters of public interest can be discussed in this House without two days' notice on the Order Paper. The proposal would cut down to a very serious extent the privileges of this House, and I venture to say that in the end it would not be found to shorten the length of the session. I understood the hon. gentleman to refer to some English rule, but so far as the English practice is concerned, they go infinitely further than I hope we shall ever be obliged to go in this country. If we carried out the English practice to the full we would adopt the English system of closure, under which the passage of the estimates would be reduced to very little more than a farce. Often a sum of £10,000,000 is voted by the Commons of Great Britain after a discussion of not more than two hours' duration. We do not require any restriction of that kind in Canada, and it would be a most infortunate thing to attempt to restrict discussion as the hon. member for Lunenberg proposes. There has been no very great evil attendant upon the practice of this House since confederation. Hon. gentlemen who desire to bring a matter of public importance to the House usually give notice in advance. That is certainly done when there is intention to move an amendment to the motion that the House go into Committee of Supply. I have always pressed upon hon. gentlemen on this side of the House the extreme importance of giving the Government notice in advance of any amendment to Supply; and apart from that, hon. gentlemen have, from time to time, given notice in advance of their intention to discuss important public questions. I decidedly object to the passing of this motion; first, because according to the usual order of procedure such a proposal should be referred to a committee; and, in the second place, because it does not seem to me that there is any abuse of the present practice which would justify us in making such a very important amendment to the rules.

Several hon. gentlemen sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, were then in the ranks of the Opposition, and insisted on the great dangers which would result from a change in the rules. About that time, the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) expressed himself as follows:

I trust that this Committee will not interfere with the franchises of parliament and more particularly with the privileges of members of this House. In the United States, it is averred to-day that the popular House has lost its franchises and is at the mercy of the Speaker, who is designated under the name of Czar. That house which should have been a model to similar institutions the world over, has lost all prestige, as well as its attributions; the powers it possessed have been attributed to others.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Militia and Defence spoke on the same lines. I shall now quote the opinion of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Referring to a speech you had made, Mr. Speaker, he said:

My honourable friend may be satisfied that the Government do not propose wielding the majority which supports them in this Parliament to, in the least, interfere with rights and privileges of the members of this parliament. We on this side of the House appreciate these prerogatives just as much as do honourable gentlemen on the other side.

The Prime Minister apparently derived much amusement from pointing out the weaknesses observed in others; he would have been better inspired by meditating over his own past record.

I shall now quote the opinion of l'Evenement, which had as a director the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). In connection with a closure resolution which was then been considered, L'Evenement published the following on July 20, 1911:

There are a number of old-time Liberals, however, who are sorry to see that their old leaders are reluctant to fall like men, in arms, facing the enemy, and that, even previous to the announcement of polling day, they are already deserting the battlefield, dishonoured by their cowardice just as much as by the scandals of their administration.

Nevertheless, L'Evenement boasted that the Opposition at the time had prevented the Government from carrying on public business. I shall quote the following extract, dated July 31, 1911:

Mr. R. L. Borden, whose energy and resources his enemies had inaccurately gauged, has just driven that Machiavelli to straits such as Canada's Prime Minister has never known heretofore. It may be truly said that for the last six months Sir Wilfrid Laurier has not governed the country. It was actually the Opposition which dictated to the other side its requirements and concessions.

Mr. Speaker, all these people have charged their minds. Freedom of speech is to-day in their minds an empty word only, and their only thought is to remain as long as possible in power, that power which they secured through false pretences, at a time when the people were temporarily blinded.

And what is the situation of our friends the Nationalists of Quebec? What is their stand? Not only do they repudiate their pledges, not only do most of them favour the sending of a contribution for the Imperial navy; but they all assist in gagging those who fight that hateful policy, they all lend a hand in stifling the voice of the people. They are working hand in hand with these stranglers of political liberty. They have the zeal of neophytes, or, if you prefer, what Berryer termed the 'cynicism of apostasies.'

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister is committing just now an irreparable mistake. He had allowed himself to be circumvented and controlled by an unwholesome set in his Cabinet, a set which more than any other fears the verdict of the people. I shall quote for his benefit the utterances of a brilliant statesman who has to-day the honour of being the President of the French Republic, Mr. Poincare:

Some political men resemble those travelers who, to recall a famous saw, are prevented by the presence of the forest from seeing the trees. The branches which are nearest to them cut off the view, and they do not even always notice that what they take for a great mass of verdant foliage, consists in dead plants and rotten wood.

I request the Prime Minister to meditate over this, and he may come to the conclusion that he has been led astray by the sight of dead plants and rotten branches.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House any longer. I wish to enter my solemn protest on behalf of my constituents which I have the honour to represent in this House, against this infamous proposal of the Government. When I hand over my mandate to them, I will be in a position to say: You are free citizens and you have returned a free representative; I was desirous of fulfilling my duty, my whole duty; but it happened one day that brute force prevented me from doing so, I was gagged.

But, Mr Speaker, there still remains with us two sources of energy which cannot be gagged: faith in the righteousness of our cause and the nobleness of our aims; the assurance that we retain the confidence and good-will of the country.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as this is probably the last opportunity offered me of discussing freely in this House of Commons of Canada, previous to being gagged, I wish to enter my solemn protest against the resolutions which are now being submitted to our consideration. And, to state my whole thought, I venture to say that a government which, to retain power, is ready to run counter to the whole course of our past political history since confederation, a government which is willing to repudiate the stand taken by its own leaders, as well as by its opponents, such a government, I say, is worthy of the measure submitted to the House. Both are on a par.

What! Do you expect the people to believe that this Government, in spite of its majority of forty-eight, is unable to carry through legislation and to provide for the administration of public affairs? What legislation have we opposed? A single Bill. What supply have we refused to vote? Not a single item out of a large number which have been proposed. Every one of them was willingly agreed to. We have opposed a single measure and that one we shall oppose even after you have passed your closure regulations. We shall fight it with all our might, because, even with closure at your disposal you will not be able to prevent us from opposing your Navy Bill. Before your Bill passes you will have gagged and expelled every one of us in succession, because we are satisfied you have no mandate to pass the Bill in question. Even though, after having passed the closure resolutions, you succeeded, by means of the majority at your disposal in this House, to force through your Navy Bill, it does not follow that your Bill will become law. If we are to believe the rumours which are circulated in the lobby, you even entertain the hope that the Senate will never adopt your Bill, but, on the contrary will rid you of that measure which you now wish had never been introduced.

You contend that the closure regulations are brought forward to ensure the passing of Navy Bill. If that is actually your object, what is the sense of that clause of the resolutions which concerns Supply?

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Government in forcing the consideration of their closure resolutions, in resorting to the previous question as a means of coercion, is preparing the overthrow of the parliamentary system in Canada. When it is realized that this measure with which we have been threatened for such a length of time, is the outcome of the discussion relative to the Naval Bill, when one reflects that this debate, which lasted two weeks without interruption, night and day, and in which every member of the Opposition, without a single exception, participated, and that such debate was one of the most memorable since confederation, both in point of the knowledge evidenced and of the force of the arguments brought forward; when one considers that the interest of that debate never flagged for one moment, and when one thinks that it is following on such a debate that the Government intends to gag the Opposition for the purpose of preventing us from discussing this question further; and above all, Mr. Speaker, when one reflects that, with the rules as they are to-day, the Government has the means of maintaining the debate at the same high level, by preventing useless and tiresome repetitions, it is impossible not to recognize that the reasons given by the Government are not the actual reasons.

I submit that it is impossible, under a democratic system of government, in the interest of liberty as well as in the interest of good administration, to prevent the representatives of the people from expounding their views and those of their constituents. However, that is what is going to happen as soon as the closure regulations are passed.

When a minister of the Crown will have given the notice of motion mentioned in these resolutions, and when the debate, after being limited to twenty minute speeches, will terminate automatically at two o'clock in the morning, are we to believe that the new members in this House will have an opportunity of expressing their opinion and setting forth their grievances? No, Mr. Speaker, old parliamentarians will have precedence, according to usage and as is proper, and it is only after being many years in public life that members will be in a position to discuss public matters. So I say without fear of contradiction that, as regards the breaking in to parliamentary work and discussion, this measure will surely produce objecionable and unfair results. It will stand in the way of the exercise of public franchises, and it will prevent new members from acquiring that experience which is indispensable in the performance of their duties as representatives of the people.

The Government in introducing their measure have presented us with a weighty and painstaking statement of the case, and one which seemed inspired by a spirit of fair play. However, in the lobby, hon. gentlemen on the other side stated openly that the Government in moving the previous question, wished to show that they were not afraid of laying hands on the idol of the Liberal party, the right hon. leader of the Opposition. Here is my answer, and I shall make it as short and plain as I am wont to do: I prefer being a supporter of the idol of the Opposition, to sacrificing on the altar of the golden calf which goes by the name of the Minister of Public Works.

That measure will undoubtedly pass, owing to the servile majority at the command of the Government, and I do not propose taking advantage of the last opportunity which is offered me, to impose on the good nature of the House. However, let me, in the name of my constituents as well as in my own name, enter my most solemn protest against the passing of these resolutions.

Let it be well understood, as was stated a moment ago by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), that even after those resolutions are passed, I shall never bend my head before those unfair regulations, when I believe it is my duty to make known my views in regard to the questions submitted to the House.

Since the opening of this session, the Government, by way of practice, have gagged their own supporters one after the other, and they may have surmised that they would not encounter more resistance on the part of the Opposition than they had experienced from their own supporters, docile victims of their authority. But we shall show before the session is over that there is more energy on this side of the House than on the other. We shall claim without weakness and to the utmost limit of our rights, every constitutional liberty to which we are entitled, and that in spite of these new regulations.

After voicing my protest against that measure, after stating as briefly as possible that Parliament should not, in the interest of the proper training of our public men, pass such closure regulations, I may add that it is extremely unfair to alter the rules of debate in the course of a discussion which has already been going on for quite a while.

We protest with all our might, and we rise against this tyrannical, arbitrary and autocratical measure, but we are good enough sports to accept our fate as men. We do not propose whatever may say newspapers at the bidding of the Government, to uselessly make trouble or kick up a row. We propose claiming our rights by every constitutional means, and when the majority of this House has decided that these regulations must be enforced, we will abide by the decision, but we shall take the question before the people, the judge by rights of the Government as well as of the Opposition. That judge is the people, and when we go before the people, be it this year, or in 1914, or in 1915, the Government will always in the end have to answer for their action. That is where the issue will be settled, and it is with confidence that we say to the Government: Pass your measure as soon as possible, a measure inspired by fear, inspired by cowardice and which will be condemned by the popular will as soon as elections take place. That is where your majority will be powerless to instil new life into the straggling remains of that hybrid Administration, which manages the business of the country through the combination of the most incongruous elements ever brought together.

Here is a Government that maintains itself in power through the assistance of an element which has pledged itself to safeguard all popular franchises, of men who, to hear them speak, are opposed to the Navy Bill, and who, nevertheless, help the Government to gag the Opposition, so that this Navy Bill may be forced through by the majority.

I am justified in saying that the Government, with its past record and the record it is now making for itself, is wise in refusing to grant an appeal to the people. Hon. gentlemen on the other side are aware that when a general election comes on, defeat awaits them in more than one constituency represented by supporters of the Government who to-day, by their silence and their complicity, and to-morrow, by their vote, will cause the passing of the closure regulations and of the Navy Bill. They will have to desert public meetings and will be wiped out of existence by popular scorn and indignation.

When accounts are settled I know more than one Nationalist who, in my own province since 1909, scoured all the parishes calling to witness all the church steeples, and, at every crossing of the roads, stirring up our disquieted people, I know, Mr. Speaker, more than one of those stalwart defenders of our popular franchises who will have to render a strict account of their stewardship, a stewardship which they are about to degrade and tarnish.

When the people take in hand their own cause, the Government and their supporters will get their due, and I may tell them that it is an exemplary punishment which awaits them. There will be no more closure, the wildest latitude will be granted to us, the accusers, as well as to them, the accused. That will be the day of retribution, and those men who call themselves the masters of the Administration, however great they may be, we shall have an opportunity to meet them. In the meantime there is a punishment which history will settle on them: history will say that when this retrograde, iniquitous and tyrannical measure was introduced in this House, it was hailed by the frenzied acclamations of these paragons of virtue, of these champions of popular liberties, who vigourously applauded the murder of freedom of speech in this House.

One word more, and I shall resume my seat. In ancient Rome, when gladiators, entering the arena, passed in front of the Emperor's seat, they exclaimed: Caesar, those who are about to die hail thee. I abstain from giving the latin wording, so as not to perturb the minds of those who graduated in the country places back of Toronto, and I now put it into common parlance so as to be understood by them: 'Masters of the gag, you who claim to be masters of this Parliament, I am in waiting for you before the people, and I challenge you.'

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): The Prime Minister, when he introduced this resolution, assured hon. members on this side of the House that they might expect the utmost of fair treatment while he occupied his present position. We have no intention of questioning the sincerity of the right hon. gentleman, but if we are to judge by the treatment we have received in the past, I think we have a right to refuse to accept his judgment as to what is fair. We have a vivid recollection of the use of the big club on the 3rd of March last, and an even more vivid recollection of the treatment our leader was accorded while the right hon. Prime Minister was leading the House the other evening. And if a gentleman occupying the position in this country that the leader of the Opposition now occupies, receives such treatment as that—if that is the courtesy and fair play such a man is to receive from the present Government—what may the rank and file on this side expect? I think it must be admitted that we have no right to suppose that we shall be accorded any better treatment than was accorded to our leader.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), in a very laboured argument has attempted to justify the treatment accorded to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, but notwithstanding the great ability of the hon. gentleman he has not made very much headway in his performance of that duty. Practically his argument is that had the previous question not been moved at the particular time it was moved, the Opposition, by means of amendments, would have prevented the Government from carrying out their proposal to introduce closure during this session. But in the same speech he tells us that practically every legislature on the civilized world except this already has rules of closure. But, so far, neither he nor any other hon. gentleman has undertaken to tell us that any of the legislatures that have rules of closure, found it necessary to adopt the plan, the discourteous plan adopted by the present Government in order to bring in those rules, nor have they shown that they were obliged to take special means to prevent lengthy discussion on the question of adopting the closure. If other legislatures are able, without adopting such discourteous means, to introduce closure, why cannot this Government do so? Surely, this Government is as competent to perform its duty as are the governments of these other countries.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, you are wrong about that.

Mr. THOMSON: Well, I am willing to admit that. We are all wrong sometimes. I have discussed this question frankly in private conversation with members on both sides of the House, and up to the time when the previous question was moved, I had never heard anyone on either side suggest that it was possible to successfully resist the introduction of closure, provided the Government took the responsibility of introducing it. If my hon. friend really was sincere in his suggestion, I am afraid he was politically in the same condition as people get into physically through long debauchery—I think he 'was seeing things.' If this was not the case, it seems to me the argument must have been used simply for a purpose; in fact, if I may say so without disrespect, I think my hon. friend was not sincere. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie seems to be very much in love with closure. He saw the necessity of closure not merely under the present Government, but while the late Government was in power. Apparently he is a believer also in free trade in agricultural implements. But he approaches these questions in different ways. When he was in opposition he preached free trade in agricultural implements, but now that his side is in power he is silent on that question. On the other hand, now that his side is in power, he preaches closure, but when in opposition he was dumb on that subject. The question of whose ox is gored is apparently a very important one with the hon. gentleman.

I must not forget the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins). I am sorry that hon. gentleman is not in his place, because it is always a pleasure to look across the House and see his pleasant countenance. Apparently he is never so happy as when the gag is removed and he is free to address this House. On such occasions he resembles the immortal Tam O' Shanter in one of his moods:

> Kings may be blessed, but Tam was glorious,
> O'er all the ills of life victorious.

That is about the way the hon. gentleman feels when the gag is removed. He is quite a philanthropist; he would relieve people of their troubles and distresses at all times. Not long ago, he saw the Empire in clouds and darkness, and he proceeded to dispel them. He saw that with only six hundred and fifty-five war vessels, the British Empire was in the greatest danger; the collapse of the Empire was certain. But he saw that by adding three vessels to the number all would be safe—six hundred and fifty-five vessels meant absolute ruin, but six hundred and fifty-eight vessels meant absolute safety; and my hon. friend proceeded at once to do his part to bring about that state of affairs. Now, he sees the need of more philanthrophy. He sees that we on this side are under delusions and he proceeds to dispel these delusions. He says we are under the delusion that we shall be able to force this Government to go to the country, and that delusion he proceeds to dispel. He may save his breath, because that delusion if we ever held it, we were forced to give up long ago. We recognize that this Government are bolted and barred to their places indeed the additional locks that the Postmaster General has bought would be merely superfluous for this purpose. We have taken it for granted for some time that the policy of the Government is not to allow the people who are to supply the $35,000,000 to have a say in the matter at all. Whatever happens they are not going to let the people have anything to say as to whether or not this money should be spent or how it should be spent. Another delusion which he thinks it necessary to remove is that we are under the impression that it is our duty to obstruct. I am quite willing to let the hon. gentleman call it obstruction if he cares; he can call it by any name he pleases. When it comes to adopting a certain line of policy on this side of the House, I think we ourselves must decide what it shall be. We shall judge as to what course we shall take in every emergency, if I may be permitted to use that term. When any question comes before the House we ourselves must settle what course we shall pursue, and I think I speak for the Opposition when I say that we are not prepared to adopt the suggestions of my hon. friend for Brandon (Mr. Aikins). We do not consider him a disinterested adviser in this House, and we are not prepared to carry out his advice, unless we consider it to be good advice.

He also says that we are under the delusion that the Conservatives obstructed in 1911. He thinks that it is a delusion to think that they were guilty of the terrible crime of obstruction, and he wants to remove that delusion. He proceeds to prove that we have been obstructing and he proves it by pointing to the time which has been taken in discussing the naval question in its different stages. But he ignores altogether the fact that more time was taken in this House in discussing the reciprocity question in 1911. While practically no progress was made on the reciprocity question, very great progress has been made on the present question. In other words, he does not deny that more time was taken in the discussion of the reciprocity question than in the present question, and yet, according to him, there was no obstruction on the reciprocity question, while there is obstruction in the present case. To me that seems a very funny sort of argument. There is another delusion which he is anxious to remove. He says we cannot convince the people that the reason the late Government went to the country in 1911 was because of the alleged obstruction of the Conservatives or because of the action taken by the Conservative Opposition. He says that is a delusion. He does not say that it is a delusion that the Government went to the country because of the obstruction of the Opposition; he says it is a delusion that we think we are going to convince the people of it. I do not suppose any hon. member would suggest for a moment that had the reciprocity agreement become law the late Government would have gone to the country at that particular time. I do not suppose that any man in his sober senses would say such a thing and if the hon. gentleman thinks he can convince the people of that, I think he will be met with the old answer 'who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge'? I think that is what the people would be disposed to say to my hon. friend if he attempted to convince them of anything of that kind.

The position in which the Government of the day find themselves is not a new position. Previous governments have found themselves in the same position, and have had to take action under similar circumstances. But no previous government attempted to take the action which the present Government has taken. That is a new departure. Other governments met a situation of a similar kind by appealing to the people, by compromising, or by dropping the particular matter to which objection was taken. That has been the policy heretofore adopted. But the present Government have made a new departure. They say we will not adopt the policy adopted by previous governments; we will adopt a policy of our own, and they try to make us believe that they are obliged to adopt such a policy. Why they are obliged to adopt what other governments did not adopt, I cannot understand. We are told that members of the late Government and private individuals and certain newspapers supporting the late Government have advocated closure. But when the late Government was placed in exactly the same position as the present Government they did not adopt closure. When they were up against a situation of the kind, they did not take the responsibility of introducing closure. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister, refused on every occasion to consider the question of closure, and the attitude he adopted is the only fair test by which he shall be judged. We must remember that when an opposition undertakes by lengthy debate to hold up any question that comes before the House, that Opposition assumes a grave responsibility. We must remember, too, that in the experience of the Canadian Parliament, the Opposition has generally had nearly as many votes cast in its favour as the Government. We must remember that, comparatively, there is not such a very great difference between the vote cast for the Opposition and the vote cast for the Government. Certain figures have been quoted here to show that the votes cast for candidates who are opposed to the policy of the present Government, exceed by some 200,000 those cast in favour of the candidates supporting that policy. But let us assume for a moment that the figures usually quoted as votes cast for Conservative candidates and for Liberal candidates are correct, and we find that out of every hundred, a little less than forty-nine voted for the Opposition candidates and fifty-one for the Government candidates. Is it not quite possible that if you take 100 men and ask for their opinion that the forty-nine of them are as likely to be right as the fifty-one? We know that to be so. When a government undertakes to say that no responsibility rests upon an opposition, and that they have no rights in matters of this kind, they ignore existing facts and take too much upon themselves. It must be remembered that an opposition have rights, and that when a position is taken such as has been taken by the present Opposition in the recent discussion, the Opposition assumes the responsibility for their action, and they should be given much more consideration than the present Opposition have been given in this matter. As I have said, the action of the present Government is a new departure. Former governments have adopted one or other of three alternatives in situations of this kind. Either they have agreed to a general election or compromised the matter in dispute, or they have dropped the question which was objected to. I would say that there is still another course which at present is very popular in the country, though not so popular with the majority of the members of this House, and it is a course which should receive some consideration. That is the suggestion made by the leading newspaper supporting the present Government in the city, that the question should be referred directly to the people to allow them to pass their opinion upon it. I know that serious objections are taken to that plan, but under the circumstances I think the Government would be well advised to seriously consider the advice given by their leading newspaper supporter in this city. When we consider the argument and the figures adduced by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) when we consider that over 200,000 more people have voted against the proposition of the Government than for it, so far as the figures are on record, the Government should take action to get the view of the people before they undertake the responsibility of spending this vast sum of money. The present Government are determined that they will not go to the country. That is one question on which they are unshakable. That does not appeal to them at all. Then, I would like them to consider the fourth alternative, that of asking a vote of the people on the question. After all, who has a better right to decide as to whether or not this vast sum shall be expended than the people who pay the money? The principle is not a new one; it has been adopted pretty generally in municipal matters by provincial legislatures. In Saskatchewan, and most of the other provinces, as far as I know, when a municipality wants to give a bonus, or to expend any unusual sum of money, the matter has to be submitted to the people. A municipal council is not allowed to expend that money or to grant a bonus until the people have by a two-thirds vote expressed themselves in favour of such expenditure. No hon. member of this House will undertake to say that this principle in municipal matters has not worked satisfactorily. It has given universal satisfaction and if the principle has given universal satisfaction in one sphere is it not a good idea to apply it in another sphere? I think we might call this proposed vote a subsidy or a bonus, but if hon. gentlemen opposite do not like that term, we must all admit that it is a very great and unusual expenditure. We might safely apply the same principle that we have applied in municipal matters and let the people say whether or not this money shall be expended and, if so, how it shall be expended. After all, the people have to pay this money and I see no reason why they should not be able to say whether or not the money shall be expended and, if it is to be expended, I see no reason why they should not be allowed to say how it shall be expended.

On motion of Mr. Kay, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. White, House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, April 17, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SOREL WORKSHOPS.

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Was Mr. W. S. Jackson, the present superintendent of the Government workshops at Sorel, before his appointment to this position, charged, whether alone or with other persons, to make an inquiry or any investigation of the workshops of Sorel and the work done there?
2. If so, on what date was he appointed to this duty?
3. Has he made a written report?
4. Does this report suggest the dismissal of some officials of the workshops? If so, what ones?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. 11th March, 1912.
3. Yes.
4. The report does not recommend the dismissal of any particular officer, but suggests a reduction of the staff.

MAIL BAG LOCKS.

*Mr. LAFORTUNE:

1. Did the Postmaster General have an interview during the week ending April the 12th with Edouard Lapointe, of Quebec, concerning the purchase on behalf of the Post Office Department of a certain invention for the improvement of the old padlocks for mail bags?
2. Has this invention been secured?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

*Mr. MARTIN (St. Mary's, Montreal):

1. What does the Post Office Department intend to do with the old padlocks for mail bags?
2. Will they be sold at auction?

Mr. PELLETIER: This matter will be considered in due course.

*Mr. McCRANEY:

Have new padlocks for mail bags been sent to any of the Western postal divisions? If so, where?

Mr. PELLETIER: It has been repeatedly stated that none of the new locks have as yet been supplied.

*Mr. DEVLIN:

How many new padlocks for mail bags will be allotted to the county of Wright for mail service?

Mr. PELLETIER: This matter will be duly considered.

LES EBOULEMENTS MAIL SERVICE.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is the Government aware that on the 27th September 1912, a mail contract was awarded, after tenders had been called, to Edmond Tremblay of Les Eboulements, county of Charlevoix?
2. Why has this contract been annulled by letter of March 1913?

Mr. PELLETIER: It is not true that tenders were invited for this service. The temporary agreement of Edmond Tremblay for the summer service between Les Eboulements and Wharf at fifty-five cents per trip expired with the close of navigation, 1912. A renewal of this agreement was authorized, but as it was terminable; at the pleasure of the Postmaster General a new agreement has been authorized with Treffle Tremblay at the same price.

2. What are the names of the tenderers, the amount of each tender, and which tender has been accepted?

Mr. PELLETIER: Tenders for this service were due at the department on the 11th April, 1913. They have not yet been considered.

RURAL MAIL BOXES.

2. Was there in 1911 a greater number of boxes purchased than were required?

3. Did the present Government succeed in obtaining a reduction on the price of these boxes, and has it consequently paid a lower price than that agreed to by the preceding Government?

4. Was a certain number of these boxes paid for during the election period of 1911? If so, how many boxes and what amount?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Date of Payment.	Number of Boxes.	Amount Paid.
January 28, 1909.. ..	6,000	$ 18,000

Mr. GERMAN:

1. For what reason was Mr. W. V. Pettit, postmaster of Picton, county of Prince Edward, dismissed from his office?

2. Were charges made against Mr. Pettit? If so, what was the nature of such charges, and by whom were they made?

3. Was any investigation held? If so, what was the nature of the investigation?

Mr. PELLETIER: The postmaster was dismissed for political partisanship, by direction of the Postmaster General. The facts were sufficiently known to render it unnecessary to go to the expense of an investigation.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINETAL RAILWAY—EMPLOYMENT OF M. BALKAM, C.E.

*Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Is Mr. Balkam, engineer of district 'C' and 'D,' eastern division Transcontinental railway, still in the employ of the Government?

2. If not, at what date did he cease to be so employed?

4. Answered by number 3.

SUPREME COURT REGISTRAR.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) it was ordered that the House do to-morrow go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be paid an annual salary of five thousand dollars.

PRINCE ALBERT HOMESTEAD ENTRY —PROPOSED CENSURE.

On the motion for Committee of Supply:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I desire to move, seconded by Mr. Martin (Regina):

That all the words after 'that' be struck out, and the following be added thereto :

That the homestead entry for the north half of southwest quarter of section 8, township 49, range 26, west of the 2nd meridian, was granted to Arthur Donaldson on April 16, 1912, in violation of the rules and practice of the Department of the Interior, and contrary to the public interest;

That the Hon. Robert Rogers, a member of this House, having been at the time the said entry was granted Minister of the Interior, is responsible therefor, and that the granting of such entry is deserving of the censure of this House.

The matter alluded to was brought to the attention of the House on the 14th of February last by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) as a question of privilege. It relates to the administration of the Department of the Interior, of which department my hon. friend was in charge at the time the homestead entry in question was granted. At the time my hon. friend made his statement, he evidently considered that the matter was one of very serious importance, because he took the opportunity of placing it before the House as a matter of privilege, under circumstances which, under the rules of the House, debarred discussion. My hon. friend took occasion at the same time to criticise the administration of the department when it was under my charge. I think the House will agree that I have not been unduly critical of the work of the Department of the Interior under the present administration. It may be thought that I have been, perhaps, somewhat derelict in my duty in not giving to the matter greater attention, and in not being more critical in my attitude towards the department; but my view was that the new Administration was entitled to a fair opportunity to work out any change of policy it might have in mind, and that the proper time to offer criticism of the department would be when the results of the Administration were in evidence. The hon. minister was not satisfied with that condition. Having control of the administration and records of the department, he saw fit to take advantage of an opportunity to make a public attack upon my administration at a time when I was not in a position to reply. My attention was drawn to the case under consideration; naturally I made some study of the circumstances surrounding it; and it is my duty to-day to place before the House the information I have secured and the conclusions at which I have arrived.

My hon. friend, I say, did me the honour, in his defence, to indicate that in the course he or his department had followed, he had taken his example from myself, that is to say, that the action complained of had been taken by the department under his administration, because like action had been taken in like circumstances by the same department under my administration. There is no question as to the facts; they are admitted; my hon. friend, in his statement, did not deny the allegation that appeared in the paper to which he referred; the facts being: that a piece of land of some seventy-three acres, located within the corporate limits of the city of Prince Albert, had been granted as a homestead on the 10th of April, 1912, to one Arthur Donaldson, of Prince Albert; that the land had been under reservation; that public notice had not been given of the removal of the reservation; that the land that became the property of Arthur Donaldson was worth a large amount of money, estimated at $100,000. In other words, it was frankly admitted by the hon. minister that, as he claimed, in the ordinary course of the administration of his department, property of this Dominion of Canada of the value of $100,000 had been presented to a citizen of Prince Albert who happened to be politically a friend of my hon. friend, and not only a political friend but an important personage in the political party of which my hon. friend is the present manager. In order that there may be no question as to the present value of this property, I may say that I have just been handed a telegram which is as follows:

Donaldson homestead put on market as Howard Place subdivision at values aggregating $374,000.

Now, when my hon. friend wants to convey to this House and the country the idea that the system of administering the Department of the Interior, when I had the honour to be its head, contemplated or admitted a business transaction of that kind in the name of the people of Canada, it is necessary for me to come forward with some explanation; and certainly I claim to have been thoroughly justified in the efforts I made yesterday to bring the matter to the attention of the House. My hon. friend has based his assertion of precedent for his action upon the disposition made of the adjoining quarter section under my administration. His words were:

If Mr. Donaldson owes a debt of gratitude to any person for getting an entry for this particular eighty acres, he owes it to my hon. friend the member for Edmonton, because the agent of Dominion lands in Prince Albert followed his ruling to give his friend the very adjoining quarter section a few years before. That rule is standing on his books in his office, and he followed it in this case.

This statement is so specific, so definite, the accusation is so strong, that I think I may fairly be justified in asking the House to listen to me while I show that the statement is not founded on fact. First of all, let me point out the change in condition in our western country in the years since 1908, or in the years between 1908 and 1912. The change in values of certain properties is so great that the comparison my hon. friend attempts to make simply does not hold. Those who have any knowledge of conditions as they are know that there are to-day millions, and many millions, of dollars worth of what is called suburban or subdivision property which in 1908 had only farm land value, and therefore the act of administration which treats subdivision or suburban property as land having only farm land value was treated in 1908 is on the face of it absolutely wrong, absolutely unjustified. If the statement went no further, my hon. friend has condemned his own administration. But he went on to give the House some details in regard to my administration of this adjoining quarter section; and, in order that there may be full knowledge of this matter, before I close, I think I shall be able to demonstrate to the House that the country has an intimate interest in this matter entirely above and beyond any matter of difference of opinion between my hon. friend and myself. This land was under reservation as a forest reserve—and here let me draw attention to an inaccuracy in the statement made by my hon. friend on the 14th of February, when, in dealing with this matter, he said:

A few years ago when my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was Minister of the Interior, he undertook to lay out a forest reserve in that portion of the territory north of the town of Prince Albert.

Now, the fact was that this land was declared a forest reserve in the year 1895, as shown by the return brought down and which I have under my hand. Correspondence began in regard to on the 2nd of August, 1894, and on the 8th of November, 1895, the assistant secretary of the Department of the Interior notified the Crown timber agent in the following words:

There is no objection to the tract shown on the plan being reserved as a forest reservation, and you may make a note in your records that no disposition is to be made of any land within the tract without consulting this department.

Therefore my hon. friend, having the records, with no access to them by myself and no opportunity on my part to question the statement which he made, practically opened his attack upon myself by a statement that was not correct, as is shown by the records.

To follow the history of this forest reserve, it remained under that original reservation. On November 2, 1906, the Crown timber agent at Prince Albert, R. S. Cook, stated that sections 7 and 8, the two sections that are under consideration in connection with this matter, as well as sections 11 and 12, were fairly suitable for agricultural purposes and might be withdrawn from the forest reserve. On October 23, 1907, Cook recommended in the new boundaries the exclusion of section 7 and the undisposed of portion of section 8. On November 25, 1907, the agent in charge of the forestry branch of the Department of Interior recommended the establishment of a statutory reserve according to the boundaries suggested by agent Cook. In March, 1909, Mr. Campbell is on record in the file brought down as stating that the reserve was set apart in 1895; that it has since been continued as a reserve with some exceptions, and that it was not then under the Forest Reserve Act but was still a forest reserve, that is to say, the original reservation had not been withdrawn, although it had not been brought under the Forest Reserve Act. He says:

The southern tier of sections might be withdrawn and disposal made of them as might be considered best, but not in large areas as they are close to the city of Prince Albert.

So far as the records show, the reservation was never withdrawn from these lands as a whole; but from time to time, as portions were disposed of, the reservation was withdrawn for the purpose of making the disposition. I find on the files a letter of January 27, 1910, from Mr. Campbell of the forestry branch to Mayor Holmes of Prince Albert, in which letter Mr. Campbell says that these lands had been withdrawn from reservation. There is no evidence, however, of that withdrawal in any of the files which have been brought down.

On July 19, 1911, a statutory reservation was created which did not include sections 7 and 8. The reason I make the statement in regard to the existence and continuance of this reservation is because my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) in his statement to the House saw fit to say:

The fact is that in the statement showing the number of sections that had been disposed of by the Administration, by some oversight this eighty acres had been left out; and some Tory to-day has had the good fortune to get that land under the rule as laid down by the hon. gentleman opposite.

What I desire to establish is that this land was placed under reservation, not by myself, not by the Liberal Government at all, but by the Government of 1895; and that, so far as the records show, the reservation placed upon this land in 1895 has not been withdrawn at the time when Mr. Arthur Donaldson received homestead entry for the land. At any rate, it is plain that the land had been under reservation; it is plain from the statement of the chief clerk of the forestry branch that it was under reservation in 1909. There is further evidence in the files that have been brought down that as a matter of fact it was under reservation from the public at large until Mr. S. J. Donaldson, M.L.A., for Shelbrooke, the adjoining constituency to Prince Albert, decided to secure possession of it by locating half-breed scrip upon it. I find further evidence in the files brought down by the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crothers) in response to my request. There is a memorandum on the file addressed by the chief clerk of the patent branch to the commissioner of Dominion lands. The commissioner of Dominion lands had asked the chief clerk of the patents branch if this land for which Mr. S. J. Donaldson had applied to the minister was available for the application of scrip. Mr. Coté replied, after dealing with the particulars of the location and so on:

The north half of the fractional southwest quarter of section 8, however, is vacant in the records of the department, and there would appear to be no objection to the applicant applying scrip thereon provided he is the first applicant and the land is vacant according to the records of the agent of the Dominion Lands at Prince Albert and that land has been posted or advertised in the usual way.

The land was vacant; but, when the chief clerk of the patents branch states in his memorandum that its condition was such as to require notice or advertisement before it was available for entry, that is the evidence that it had been under reservation until approximately that time. There is further evidence on these files which I deside to give. Here is a letter signed by Mr. John S. Fowlie, of the firm of Romeril, Fowlie and Company, real estate agents, Prince Albert, which reads as follows:

Prince Albert, Sask., Feb. 21, 1913.

I, the undersigned, have never had a personal interview with Hon. Robert Rogers.

From the information I received, however, from the Department of the Interior, as one of the delegation that went to Ottawa with regard to local affairs in January, 1912, I may say that we were assured that there was no land open for homestead entry in the district north of the North Saskatchewan river, now within the limits of the city of Prince Albert.

So that, up to January 1912, the land was clearly under reservation, so far as the public were concerned, and therefore there was no justification for my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works making the statement that he did.

That by some oversight these eighty acres had been left out presumably of the forest reserve.

There was no oversight. The land had not been included in the statutory forest reserve. The reservation which had been placed upon it in 1895 had never been withdrawn, and according to the evidence of Mr. Fowlie, the public had been given to understand, as late as January, 1912, that the land was not available for settlement, and that in fact it was still under reservation. My hon. friend the minister was very strong in his assertion that he did not know anything about this transaction with the Donaldsons. Remember that the transaction was with the Donaldsons, father and son. He says:

Let me say further, Mr. Speaker, that I had no knowledge of any kind or description of the entry that was being made.

He says again:

In so far as this half quarter section is concerned, I had no knowledge of any kind whatever of the transaction, as I can prove by the records of the department.

In response to the request made, I have been favoured with some portion of the records of the department, and I find on one of the files brought down the following letter, a copy of which I shall read:

File No. 1,335,979.

In Session at Regina,
February 14, 1912.

Dear Mr. Rogers,—Referring to our conversation at Winnipeg, in regard to the southeast quarter of section 7, township 49, range 26 west 2nd, and ninety acres contained in the southwest quarter of section 8 in the same township and range, as I have the scrip on hand, I would be glad if you would give me the necessary permission to apply it on the above parcels of land. I inclose map showing the land in question.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) S. J. Donaldson.

Honourable R. Rogers,
Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that a delegation from Prince Albert visited Ottawa in January, 1912. Mr. Fowlie was a member of that delegation, and I am credibly informed that Mr. Donaldson was also a member. While these gentlemen were here, no doubt, in the interests of the city of Prince Albert, it also occurred to them, no doubt, that they might do a little business on behalf of Fowlie, Donaldson & Company, and on the statement of Mr. Fowlie, they evidently made judicious inquiries in the department as to whether there was something good that might be picked up. So far as Mr. Fowlie is concerned, they were informed that there was not anything there, and they went home with the report, 'nothing doing.' But apparently Mr. Donaldson is no quitter, and having got to the session at Regina, he got his second wind, and wrote direct to the Minister of Public Works, not on behalf of the city of Prince Albert, but on behalf of S. J. Donaldson. I am bound to assume from the statement made by the hon. minister that he never saw this letter, that it was never brought to his attention. I can only say, in view of the circumstances which followed, that his method of conducting the business of the Department of the Interior is certainly worthy of very serious criticism, because we find that this land which had been under reservation from 1895 until February, 1912, at once came into action. The date of the first letter of Donaldson is February 14. On February 27, there is a memorandum on the file from the commissioner of Dominion Lands to the head of the patent branch:

Will you kindly advise me in regard to copy of letter addressed to the minister by S. J. Donaldson?

The chief of the patent branch replied on March 4. They were not losing very much time you will observe, Mr. Speaker, once Mr. Donaldson got into action, and it was on March 4 that Mr. Coté replied to Mr. Greenway in the terms I have mentioned. The matter was no doubt looked up in the department, and in some unaccountable way, so far as the records show, this land, which had been under reservation up to that time, ceased to be under reservation, and Mr. Greenway was informed that it was available. But having been under reservation, it was subject to the regulation of the department calling for ten days' public notice, and Mr. Coté said so in the memorandum that he gave to Mr. Greenway. On 3rd April Mr. Donaldson was written to by Mr. Cory, the deputy minister. That letter my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works read to the House when he brought this matter up on a question of privilege. I have not been able to find that letter, or a copy of it, on any of the four files which the department have been good enough to place in my hands, but I assume the letter to be authentic, because my hon. friend read it to the House. It is written and signed by W. W. Cory, is addressed to S. J. Donaldson, M.L.A., and reads as follows:

In the absence of the minister, your communication to him in which you make application to apply scrip on the S.E. ¼ of 7 and the S.W. ¼ of 8 in 49-26 west 2nd, has been referred to me for attention.

Legal subdivisions 2, 7 and 8 of the S.E. ¼ of section 7, have been set aside as school lands, while fractional legal subdivision 1 stands as a time sale patented to A. S. Stewart the N. ½ of the fractional S.W. ¼ of section 8, however, is vacant in the records of the department. The agent of Dominion lands has been communicated with and has been asked to advise the department as to the standing in his records of the said last-mentioned parcel. When he is heard from, you will be further communicated with in the matter.

On the 3rd of April Mr. Donaldson was written to by the deputy minister and on the 13th April the assistant secretary of the department wrote in similar terms to the agent of Dominion lands at Prince Albert. He said:

I am directed to request you to advise the department at the earliest possible date of the standing in your records of the north half of fractional southwest quarter of section 8, township 49, range 26, west of the second meridian.

Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) K. L. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary.

On the 13th April an official inquiry was addressed from the department at Ottawa to the land agent at Prince Albert. The matter had been simmering in the department since the 3rd April when the deputy minister wrote to Mr. Donaldson. It is reasonable to suppose that some echo of the simmerings in the department reached as far as Prince Albert in some way that the files do not show because, on the 16th April, just three days after the official letter left the department here, Mr. Arthur Donaldson, the son of S. J. Donaldson, applied for this land as a homestead and was granted homestead entry. The cost of a homestead entry is ten dollars and that puts the entrant in possession of the land against all the world except the Government of Canada. It imposes certain duties upon the entrant, but these duties can be avoided by the cancellation of the entry and the application of half-breed scrip, in which case the patent can be issued without the requirement as to homestead duties being fulfilled. This action was taken by Mr. Donaldson in due course. Just let me point out the sequence of events. Mr. Donaldson, during a visit to Ottawa, finds that this land is not privately owned. He exercises his pull with the minister by a letter dated the 14th February. Whether the letter ever reached the minister or not, evidently the pull worked and on the 16th April Donaldson's son is the owner of a $100,000 homestead at a total cost of ten dollars in cash. This land is afterwards placed under half-breed scrip. To-day it is offered as a subdivision of the city of Prince Albert and is listed at a price of some $350,000. This is not a business transaction in the interest of the people of Canada and I protest most energetically against being in any way directly or indirectly held responsible for it.

My hon. friend did me the honour to refer to my dealing with an adjoining quarter-section of land in 1908. I shall not weary the House by going into all the details but I will simply state that, while the land was under the original forest reservation, certain parts of sections 7 and 8, were selected by different people as being suitable places for residence. Application was made for homestead entry upon that land. The question of the propriety of keeping the land in the reservation was taken up, considered, discussed, reported upon and it was decided ultimately to place part of it under statutory reservation and that the remainder should not be placed under statutory reservation but that it should be disposed of according to the circumstances of the case as they arose from time to time. At that time the land was of purely farm land value. When it was decided to allow the land to be homesteaded, application was made to homestead and homestead entry was granted. My hon. friend tried to make it appear to the House that I had unduly favoured some particular entrant in regard to that homestead. Let me just briefly give a statement of what occurred. The records show that in August, 1903, J. C. Stewart applied for settlement on this land. On November 14, 1904, Mr. Firmin Bedard applied and on May, 2, 1907, Charles Everett applied. It was decided to release this quarter-section for which application had been made from the reservation after a report had ben made by Charles McGregor, forest ranger, on April 26, 1907. He inspected this section and reported that the land should be made available for settlement. On May 28, Mr. R. S. Cook, land agent, covered Mr. McGregor's report to the secretary of the Department of the Interior and recommended notice to the public. On May 30, 1907, he wrote to the department recommending that this land be opened for settlement. On November 25, 1907, Mr. Campbell, of the forestry branch, reported recommending that part of the land be withdrawn and that the reserve be extended in other directions and stated that the reserve was there only by ministerial order. In February, 1908, the secretary of the department wrote to the agent of Dominion Lands as follows:

You are hereby authorized to take the necessary action and grant re-entry to the eligible applicant in accordance with the regulations.

On February 11, 1908, there is a memorandum on file sent by myself to Mr. Greenway authorizing entry to the eligible applicant. On February 14, the assistant commissioner asks the chief clerk of the forestry branch if action has been taken to release this land from the forestry reserve and the chief clerk of the forestry branch replies that the only action necessary is the order of the minister. On March 19, the agent writes that the land is increasing in value and that notice should be posted in accordance with the recent regulations. On March 31, the assistant commissioner inquires regarding the posting of notice for ten days. On March 31 there is a memorandum signed by myself which repeats the instructions of February 4 and on April 4 the secretary of the department instructs the agent of Dominion Lands that the letter of February 4——was intended to authorize the granting of free entry to the first eligible applicant in accordance with the regulations, after the receipt by you of the instructions contained in that communication.

Entry was made, and the Minister of the Interior who took occasion to refer to this entry as a justification for the Donaldson entry said:

Although that letter of instructions from Mr. Keyes was sent to the agent at Prince Albert on the 4th of April, 1908, the applicant for the adjoining quarter-section to the section just referred to was granted a homestead entry on the 1st day of April.

That is to say, the minister says that the entry for this homestead was granted before the instructions were issued here. I have looked through the file very carefully and I do not find on the file particulars as to the date of entry by Charles Everett. So that, so far as the minister's statement is concerned, I would be in his hands before the House, and his statement would have to be accepted that there had been impropriety in some way in the granting of that entry similar to the peculiar condition that exists with regard to the Arthur Donaldson entry, but fortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have not been left entirely in the minister's hands because on the file as brought down is Charles Everett's application for patent. It is peculiar of course that it should be possible to have an application for a patent without entry, but that is the condition. I find on the application for patent, amongst the memoranda to which Mr. Everett is compelled to swear before he gets his patent, the following:

Q. When did you obtain homestead entry? A. 11th April, 1908.

That is to say, instructions were issued on the 4th of April that entry should be given according to the regulations and on the 11th of April, according to Charles Everett's affidavit upon which he drew patent, entry was given. I think I have established that the two cases are not parallel.

In regard to this man Everett, he got his entry; he fulfilled his duty; he drew his patent, and so far as the records show there never was any question in regard to his entry from the time he made it until the time he got his patent, either then or since. He made his statutory improvement; he did his statutory residence; and he drew his patent according to the law of the land. I say that the minister has no justification for attempting to draw a parallel between the entry by Charles Everett in 1908 for the northwest quarter of section 8 and the entry by Arthur Donaldson, in April of 1912, for the north half of the southwest quarter of that section. I do not know that it is necessary to point out at any great length the situation of this land, but for the information of hon. members, I may say that it is on the north side of the Saskatchewan river from the city of Prince Albert and as nearly as I can figure it is within less than a mile from the post office of the city of Prince Albert. The idea that land so situated is properly subject to homestead must I think appeal to anyone who considers the matter as absolutely preposterous. In regard to the matter of notice, the minister tried to give the House to understand when he was discussing this Everett homestead, that notice as required by the regulations had not been given. I do not know whether notice was given or not; I cannot tell now, but it is on the records that the instructions given by the officers here were that the entry should be given according to the regulations and if there were regulations requiring ten days' notice, then that order was that these regulations should be observed, and as no complaint was ever made against that entry, I assume, so far as I have ever heard, that the regulations were observed. But in the case of the Donaldson homestead, I do not think it is pretended there was any notice given. I will assume there was not, but allow me to place before the House the evidence that under the well-understood regulations and practice of the department, ten days' public notice was required. I find in the regulations brought down in answer to an order of the House that in these regulations dated the 1st of February, 1909, the following paragraph occurred:

Lands which have been under reservation for any purpose or have been under a timber berth or under lease, which become available to the first eligible applicant at the counter, must first be posted for at least ten clear days.

That is repeated in the edition of 1st of April, 1909, and is again repeated in the edition of the 1st of February, 1911, and from the evidence I have given from the report of Mr. N. O. Coté of the patents branch, it was still the practice of the department to require such notice at the time Arthur Donaldson got the homestead entry, and so far as we have been yet informed no notice was given.

Mr. LALOR: Was Prince Albert incorporated as a city in the year 1908 or previous to that time?

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot say whether it was incorporated as a city then, but it was incorporated as a town or as a city in 1908. At that time the bridge across the river had not been constructed.

Mr. MORPHY: What would you assume to be the value of the Everett lot to-day, which lot passed through your administration and lies alongside of this lot?

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot form any idea; it is just that much further out from the centre of the city, and, as my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy) is aware, the great value of the Donaldson property might be in that portion which was nearer the city.

Mr. MORPHY: You could get it by another telegram, I suppose.

Mr. OLIVER: No, I cannot.

An hon. MEMBER: That's very clever of the hon. member (Mr. Morphy).

Mr. OLIVER: No, it is not clever at all. I want to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy) that the value of the Everett lot to-day has nothing whatever to do with the case. The question is as to the value of the lot when Everett got entry for it just as the question is with regard to the value of the Donaldson lot when Donaldson got entry for it. We do not pretend when we give a man a homestead for a ten dollar entry fee that we give it with any guarantee that that property will not increase in value. But we did adopt a policy, whereby, when it was demonstrated that land was exceptionally valuable, means were taken first to do what was right as between man and man, and give everybody a fair chance to get the land, and, second, to secure for the Dominion of Canada a fair value for its interest in the land.

Mr. LALOR: The land you gave to Everett was within a mile of the city of Prince Albert?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. LALOR: And probably within a mile of the city hall.

Mr. OLIVER: No; the other land lies between it and the city hall. I want to establish the principle that the value of the land at the time it passes from the control of the Government is the question at issue; not the value that attaches to it afterwards. While the late Government safeguarded the public interest, by means which I will explain in a few moments, they never did anything to prevent and never desired to prevent the man who had secured a homestead entry from getting the full benefit of any legitimate increase in the value of the land. Not only were we desirous of refraining from preventing it, but we were very glad when it occurred, because it was an inducement to settlement generally.

As lands in the West increased in value by reason of the conditions surrounding the different centres of population, under our policy of wiping out reservations wherever that could reasonably be done, and making available the odd-numbered sections and all other lands that could properly be made available to the settler, there naturally became available for disposition lands that had a very considerable value; lands that had been held as water reserves; lands that had been subject to a homestead dispute of some kind; lands to which, for one reason or an other, no private person had a right; and in such cases the Government dealt with those lands in a special manner. We dealt with such lands simply by first giving ten days' notice; then by publishing a notice in the newspapers that certain lands which had been withheld from settlement would become available for that purpose on a certain day. As time went on, as population increased, and as the value of lands went up, we found that whenever these notices were published there was a great rush, in which physical force played a prominent part to secure the lands, and it became necessary to devise some other method of procedure in order to do what was fair by the people. So we established the principle of offering for sale by auction, subject to homestead conditions, lands which were not especially valuable, or which had an intrinsic rather than a speculative value; and, finally, land which came to have a serious speculative value, such at this Donaldson homestead, we thought it wise to transfer to school lands, so that in the first place school lands being subject to sale only by auction, whoever wanted that land would get it on equal terms with his neighbour, and, in the second place, the provincial treasury would benefit by any increased value that would attach to that particular land. That was the principle upon which we administered lands situated as was this Donaldson homestead. In order to bring that point out very clearly, let me direct the attention of the House to the condition in regard to the adjoining section 7. The land in question is the southwest quarter of section 8; I desire to speak of the southeast quarter of section 7, which immediately adjoins 8, is on the same side of the Saskatchewan river, and was included in the original forest reserve.

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia): Does the southeast quarter adjoin section 8 ?

Mr. OLIVER: The map says so.

Mr. HUGHES: The southwest quarter adjoins 8.

Mr. OLIVER: I am afraid my hon. friend's head is turned. I have here the maps and all necessary information; the records of the department show it to be as I have stated. The Donaldson homestead is on the southwest quarter of section of 8; I now propose to give the House an account of the dealings had by the late Government in respect of the southeast quarter of 7 immediately adjoining. I find from the files that disposition was made of some fifteen acres of the southeast quarter of 7 immediately on the bank of the river by conditional sale on May 6, 1907. A. S. Stewart applied to purchase this fifteen acres for the purpose, as he alleged, of erecting upon it a cold storage warehouse, and a sale of the land was made to Stewart at $3 an acre, conditional upon his erecting such a building upon it. In due course he erected the building, paid his money, and a patent was granted.

Mr. McKAY: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that Mr. Stewart paid for the land and erected a cold storage building upon it ?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. McKAY: Does the record show that ?

Mr. OLIVER: That is what the record shows; I have no knowledge of it other than the information supplied by the record.

Mr. BORDEN: How much of the fifteen acres would be occupied by the cold storage building ?

Mr. OLIVER: The figures are on the file; I suppose it would be a building about twenty by thirty feet. The building itself is not of serious importance, but the sale was made subject to that condition; the condition was fulfilled and the sale effected. Any hon. gentleman who was acquainted with conditions in the Northwest during 1907 will recall that subdivision or suburban property did not play a very important part in western real estate matters. At the time this property was disposed of to Stewart on these conditions, the property, so far as I can judge, had no exceptional value. Of course it is very valuable to-day. In regard to the balance of the quarter-section, in 1906, W. T. Hutchinson applied to homestead it. Mr. Hutchinson had a homestead elsewhere. These facts I find in the record—he was a contractor, and had been used to winter his horses on this quarter-section, having established stables, buildings of different kinds, and occupied this quarter-section during a part of a number of years, not as a farm or homestead, but simply as a camping place. He applied for homestead rights. He already had a homestead which he occupied, but he was entitled to a second homestead, and on the ground that his occupation of this land entitled him to prior rights, Hutchinson was given homestead rights for it. This homestead entry was given on the 15th of July, 1909. At once Mr. Hutchinson claimed a patent on the ground that he had already fulfilled the conditions of settlement. His claim was not allowed. The file shows that there was a good deal of correspondence and a number of inspections of the land. Apparently he never went into residence on the land, and not only so, but he moved away from Prince Albert to British Columbia. After considerable correspondence, an application to cancel was entered. Mr. Hutchinson put in a protest; the cancellation was thrown out, and he was given another chance. He did not avail himself of it, and ultimately a special inspection was made by the very well-known friend of my hon. friends opposite, Mr. R. E. A. Leach. It was decided to cancel Mr. Hutchinson's homestead entry for this land. That cancellation took place on the 21st of October, 1910. Mr. Leach reported on the 27th September, 1910, that Mr. Hutchinson's statements when he was applying for the patent were entirely at variance with the facts, that the department was justified in summarily cancelling it, and if cancelled that the property should be transferred to school lands or else sold by auction subject to homestead conditions. On the 29th of November the cancellation was confirmed, and on the 10th of January, 1911, the land was gazetted as school lands.

Thus, this land came back to the Government in 1911. At that time its value had increased; a bridge had been constructed across the river putting it more in touch with the city of Prince Albert; it had come to have value as sub-division or suburban property. If the late Government had done as the present Government did, it would of course have handed this land out as a homestead to some important party supporter, possibly to the local member for Prince Albert city, so as to try to keep the peace between these two dignitaries, one representing the country surrounding, and the other the city. But that was not done. We had a well defined policy for dealing with such cases, and we dealt with this case in accordance with that policy. We had given the man who had a colourable right to that property opportunity to establish his right and to acquire the property. He did not see fit to take advantage of the opportunity. He left that part of the country and we were compelled to cancel his rights. Having done so, we had then to dispose of the property, and we decided to dispose of it in the way I have stated. The reason why we transferred it to school lands was this: When the country comes to be surveyed, sections 11 and 29 of each township are automatically school lands. But in many cases these lands are occupied by settlers in advance of the survey. In order to protect the settler in his rights, the land he is on is withdrawn from the school lands and he is given the land which if the automatic rule were followed would be school land. The school lands to be given to the province are thus depleted to that extent, but other land is selected to replace the lands given to the settlers. In many cases it is not possible to pick up a quarter-section that has the same value as the quarter upon which the settler has squatted. These quarter-sections are sometimes in the suburbs of the towns, and have abnormal value. But on account of the first occupation of the settler he is given the benefit; and then, in order to balance matters up with the school lands of the province, we thought it was wise, and fair, and reasonable, that where any land fell into the Government's hands, as was the case with this southeast quarter of section 7, these lands should be transferred to school lands; so that, first, there should be no favouritism between citizens who wanted to acquire it, and second that the school funds of the separate provinces should get full benefit of it.

I do not wish to deal with this subject at much greater length. I think I have established that my hon. friend had no warrant for asserting to this House that the administration of the late Government gave him precedent for his action in regard to the Donaldson homestead. I think I have shown that if he had no personal knowledge of the transaction in regard to the Donaldson homestead it was because he was not paying that attention to the duties of his department that the interest of this country require a minister to pay.

I wish, however, before I leave this subject, to draw the attention of the House to the fact, that as shown by the files, if the hon. gentleman did not have personal knowledge of or interest in this transaction, certainly some of the officers of his department took a very lively and active interest that would seem to me to call for action or censure on his part directed against them. I have already shown how quickly action was taken when S. J. Donaldson appeared on the scene; how Arthur Donaldson by some means found that the land was available and got entry for it, and how on behalf of Arthur Donaldson the officers of the department here were making inquiries about it. It would seem to me under these circumstances that the land agent at Prince Albert who granted the entry to Arthur Donaldson was certainly entitled to be reprimanded, or else the officers of the department here were entitled to be reprimanded.

The Donaldson homestead is the north half of the southwest quarter of section 8. The greater part of the south half of that quarter was disposed of to a Mr. Sanderson. In order that my hon. friend will not be led into any mistake in regard to who was responsible for the Sanderson application or for the Sanderson ownership of this land, which was more valuable than the Donaldson land, I gather from the file that Sanderson applied for this land on March 28, 1896, and that on May 7, 1896, the then chief clerk of the patents branch, Mr. Goodeve, reported to the deputy minister, Mr. Burgess, that the land might be sold to Mr. Sanderson. As the general election did not take place until June, it will be observed that the Sanderson transaction, like the establishment of the forest reserve, is on the responsibility of the Government that was in existence before 1896 and not of that after 1896. Of course Sanderson's right accrued after the Liberal Government came into power; and in due course the contract entered into between Sanderson and the late Government was carried out by the Liberal Government and Sanderson became the proprietor of the south half of the southwest quarter of section 8, property that I imagine is very valuable because it lies immediately across the river from the city of Prince Albert, and is very close to the north end of the bridge. I find that Sanderson, having done pretty well in regard to that transaction, after he had got patent for the south half of the quarter, came back on the 4th July, 1906. There is evidence that he had applied for this Donaldson land, because there is a memorandum here of that date addressed to Mr. Greenway, commissioner of Dominion Lands, to the chief clerk of the patents branch, stating that the land is not available as it is in a forest reserve. He says:

The land applied for, as will be seen by the sketch attached hereto, is the Prince Albert forest reserve and is not therefore at the disposal of the department.

That is the last record on this file regarding the southwest quarter of section 8 until March 4, 1912, until S. J. Donaldson got into action. The land lay there apparently without a record against it during a matter of nearly six years. Once Donaldson came on the scene, it only took six months for him to get patent, or for his son to do so. As to the interest of the department in forwarding Mr. Donaldson's desires, let me give a few references. Mr. Arthur Donaldson got entry on the 16th April, but he never intended to homestead. What he intended to do was to put scrip on the land as his father had intended to do. Arthur Donaldson, I presume, jumped in and got entry for it so that there would be no complications by any other of the many friends of our friends opposite applying for the land. After he had acquired the homestead entry, his next move was to apply half-breed scrip, as he was entitled to do under the regulations. The same energy that was used in dealing with the homestead feature of the land was used in regard to the scrip feature. On the 5th of June, the agent at Prince Albert writes to the secretary of the department as follows:

Herewith I beg to enclose declaration of abandonment executed by Mr. Arthur Donaldson of his homestead entry for the north half of the southwest quarter of section 8, township 49, range 26, west of the 2nd meridian, for the alleged reason that he wishes to obtain authority to place half-breed scrip on this land.

I find on the 17th of June a memorandum from Mr. A. B. Hume, who I understand is of the minister's office, addressed to the deputy minister, in which he says:

On the 16th April last, Arthur Donaldson made homestead entry for the north half of the southwest quarter of section 8, township 49, range 26, west 2nd meridian, and on the 5th instant he executed a declaration of abandonment with a request that he be allowed to locate half-breed scrip on the land; and if he is not permitted to do so, he does not wish the abandonment to take effect. This application is submitted through you for the consideration of the minister.

You will observe that the official letter from the agent of Dominion Lands, notifying the secretary of the department that Donaldson wished to abandon in order to place half-breed scrip, does not convey the information that if he is not permitted to do so he does not wish the abandonment to take effect. That information reached the department by some other channel which is not made evident on the file. I notice on the corner a memorandum:

'Held for minister.'

I next notice a memorandum of June 25. This is from the deputy minister addressed to the chief clerk of the patents branch, and says:

Kindly note that Mr. Arthur Donaldson may be permitted to abandon his entry for the north half of fractional southwest quarter of section 8, township 49 (remainder of description not given), and that he be allowed to locate scrip thereon.

I imagine that the officers of the department could not bring themselves to believe that homestead entry had been granted for this particular land and that it must have been in some other township and range. It goes on:

If you are unable to locate this land from the information given, a correct description may be secured from Mr. Donaldson's father, Mr. S. J. Donaldson of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan.

There is a pencil note on the corner.

Wire S. J. Donaldson for complete description and allow request. G. F. B.

I am given to understand that these are the initials of Mr. George F. Buskeard, who at that time was private secretary of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. I find a memorandum to Mr. Cory the deputy minister, dated July 26, 1912, as follows:

Arthur Donaldson has asked to be allowed to place scrip on the N. ½ of the fractional S.W. ½ of 8-49. It has been decided to grant his request.

Will you kindly have thee matter put through the department without further delay?

(Sgd.) G. F. B.

Later on, Mr. Speaker, application was made by, or on behalf of Donaldson, for an extension of time for the location of his scrip. At least I presume that an application was made, because I find the following memorandum dated 16th September, 1912, addressed to Mr. Cory:

Arthur Donaldson was recently given time to place scrip on his homestead N. ½ of the fractional S. W. 8-49-26, W. of the 2nd meridian.

Kindly extend this for a further period of three months.

(Sgd.) G. F. B.

Notice of this was sent to Mr. Donaldson on 21st September. It appeared however, that the contingency which Mr. Donaldson had feared did not occur. No doubt he had feared that he was not going to be able to locate the half-breed from whom he had bought the scrip, so that the half-breed could locate, that being the routine required. But apparently he was more successful than he had hoped to be, because I find that on the 17th September, Mr. J.

McMillan, Prince Albert, forwarded to the department a memorandum as follows:

I am inclosing herewith receipt for half-breed scrip located on the above lands, also assignment from Albert St. Denis to Arthur Donadson, abstract of title and certificate as to execution against St. Denis. Kindly have patent issued as soon as possible and advise me when same is forwarded to the registrar here and oblige.

In due course on 3rd October, McMillan was notified that a registration fee would have to be sent. It was sent in due course, and a patent was issued to Mr. Donaldson on the 19th November, 1912. That is to say, on the 16th April, Mr. Donaldson got entry for this homestead, and on the 19th of November, he got patent for it, closing out the transaction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no interest in this matter beyond establishing in the first place, the facts of the case, and in the next place, establishing from those facts that my hon. friend had no warrant for claiming that the policy or the late Administration or my own personal action gave him any precedent for the course he has taken, and that he was not justified in making the statements he made in the House, either in general or in detail.

But there is another feature of the case which I want to bring to the attention of the House, and which I think of very serious importance. It is in regard to the southeast quarter of section 7, the land which came into the hands of the department, or of the Government, after the rights of Hutchinson had been disposed of. I have told the House that this land was gazetted as school land. It was attached to the school fund. It was placed in a position where it could not be acquired by any private individual under our Act except by auction sale, under the terms of the School Lands Act. When sold the value received must go to the School Lands Fund, or in other words, to the benefit of the province of Saskatchewan. That, I contend, was the course which should have been followed in regard to the Donaldson homestead, if my hon. friend had regard to the precedent and the policy of the department under the previous Administration. The urgency that I felt in bringing this matter to the attention of the House, was not so much in regard to my own position, or that I wished to place the facts of the Donaldson matter before the House, as that I found from reference to the files that my hon. friends, having done so well in the case of the north half of the southwest quarter of section 8, proposed, as the record would indicate, to repeat the operation in regard to the southeast quarter of section 7. They are in the position of a man who having stolen a mill came back after the dam. The southeast quarter of section 7 has been placed in the school lands fund, but my hon. friend proposes to take it out of the school lands fund, and what is he going to do with it? He is going to put it through the same course I presume as the Donaldson homestead, to hang it up, with the label, 'for a good boy,' and whichever of his friends in the province of Saskatchewan can show him the best results in downing the Scott Government will no doubt have the best chance of obtaining this plum, as you might term it. I have already told you, Mr. Speaker, that the land was gazetted as school land early in 1911 under the late Administration. You will remember that the election took place on the 21st September, 1911. Our hon. friends had got nicely into office. The southeast quarter of section 7 had been receiving attention. I find a letter dated December 11, 1911, on behalf of J. F. McKenzie who applies for homestead entry. My hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) writes on behalf of Mr. McKenzie. He is informed that the land has been transferred to school lands. The matter rested there. You will observe that at that time the Donaldson homestead episode had not taken place. Inquiry was made regarding the section, in December, 1911. Donaldson began to get active in February, 1912, and by March of 1912 it was satisfactorily settled that he was going to get his patent. Then we find on the file a memorandum from Mr. Greenway, the commissioner of Dominion Lands, to Mr. Hume of the minister's office. On October 11, 1912, I find that Mr. Greenway wants a statement of the facts regarding the Hutchinson homestead. It is peculiar that the commissioner of Dominion Lands should take such a special interest in this particular piece of land which had passed out of his jurisdiction and was under the separate control of the school lands branch. However we find the record there. Mr. Greenway had had an inspiration, I presume; at any rate the inquiry is here. He wants 'a statement of the facts re Hutchinson homestead.' Then, on October 14, we have a memorandum from Hume to Greenway with an endorsation by G. F. B.—'Have agent authorized to hold investigation as to duties performed by Hutchinson.' On October 18, Mr. Cory, the deputy minister, orders Mr. Greenway to have an investigation made by the agent of Dominion Lands and there is an endorsation by Mr. Greenway to Mr. Hume to prepare memorandum to council. On October 19 the memorandum of the minister is dated and on November 12, an Order in Council is passed providing for an investigation of the rights of Mr. Hutchinson to this piece of property which had been transferred to the school lands. On the 19th the Donaldson patent was isssued and the Order in Council to go into the Hutchinson matter is dated November 12, but no doubt it was well understood in the department that Donaldson was going to get his patent and that the time was ripe for opening up the question of Hutchinson in regard to the southeast quarter of section 7. The Order in Council is dated November 12 and on the same date the instructions of the assistant secretary were sent to the agent. On November 19 they were acknowledged by the agent and on February 8, 1913, the assistant secretary wrote the agent reminding him of the investigation. The file does not disclose anything further. I think this is the important part of what I have desired to place before the House—that, having so dealt with one piece of land within the city of Prince Albert, land that was unquestionably the property of the people of this country, they undertook to go into the question of the propriety of the southeast quarter of 7 being placed in the school lands and, may I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to think not for the purpose of permitting Mr. Hutchinson to get the benefit of the value of that land. I think that the transactions that I have placed before the House so far would indicate that Hutchinson, living in British Columbia, would stand a very poor chance of getting the value out of that homestead as the result of the investigation that is now being held.

What, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is to be the position of this Government in regard to matter such as this? Here is a concrete case, brought before the House by the minister himself, not now the minister, it is true, but still a member of the Government, in which he justifies what was done by a precedent that does not apply and makes no suggestion as to any other course that the Government propose to follow. I ask you, are we not compelled to assume that when he made that statement to the House he was deliberately holding out to his followers in the West and throughout this country that there were prizes to be had—magnificent prizes—in consideration of satisfactory political services?

Mr. BRADBURY: There were not many prizes left.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) says there were not many prizes left.

Mr. BRADBURY: Not many.

Mr. OLIVER: Well, it does not need many at $100,000 apiece; a few will do. Is it because there were not many that our friends were going to put section 7 through the same process as that which they had already put section 8 through? This is a matter of the most serious importance. We have seen the Government party in this House abdicating their functions as legislators day after day, week after week, month after month—at whose bidding and for what consideration? There has been established in this country a condition that gives reason for alarm. If the property of Canada can be, and is to be, used without regard to precedent, to rule, to law, for the purpose of advantaging party friends, it is desirable that we should know it and realize what such a condition means, not only in money, but in direct control of the public affairs of the Dominion in all its parts.

If the minister had suggested that what had occurred was a mistake or an error on his part or on the part of his department; but he did not. He boasts of it; a good Tory had got this land that the Liberals had left lying around loose; the logic being that if there was anything else lying around loose some other good Tory could get it.

Mr. CARVELL: If it was not loose they would cut the string.

Mr OLIVER: As they propose to do in the case of the Hutchinson homestead.

Mr. MUNSON: There was nothing left when you got out of office.

Mr. LALOR: They overlooked this chunk.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, we did overlook this chunk.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: We overlooked it so far as dealing with it was concerned. If we did not overlook it we would have dealt with it as we did with section 7, but apparently it would not have made any difference what we did with it, when these gentlemen came into office. Precedent is good so long as they think they can use it for their own purpose, but when it does not suit them then precedent is not any good at all, as is the case of the Hutchinson homestead; precedent only works one way for our friends on the other side. I do not wish to detain the House unduly, Mr. Speaker. The minister has seen fit to bring this matter to the attention of the House and to place it in a light that the circumstances do not justify. I have taken the earliest opportunity I could get to place it before the House according to the facts and to let the House and the country understand just how far the Minister of the Interior was justified in the action he took; how far he was justified in the argument he made, and how far he is justified in the policy he boasts of pursuing.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, for some time past I have been the recipient of very considerable attention in this House at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, and, Mr. Speaker, I have also been the subject of a very considerable amount of attention at the hands of friends of hon. gentlemen opposite outside of this House. I have also been made the subject of much abuse in the Liberal press of different parts of Canada. Indeed, I may say that probably very few men in the public life of this Dominion have had such falsification and misrepresentation heaped upon them by the reptile press of the Liberal party as I. And not only have I been slandered in the Liberal press, but I have been subjected to misrepresentation and falsification by a bureau of information that has been established in the city of Ottawa to circulate party literature throughout the Dominion, and which is run under the authority of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. Notwithstanding all this, I think my strongest political opponent will at least do me the tardy justice of acknowledging that I have not offered very much complaint either in this House or outside of it. But, Sir, I am no more than human, and when things reach such a pass that if an old horse drops dead on Sparks street, it is sufficient cause for the Ottawa Free Press or the Toronto Globe to have columns the day following, stating that I was responsible to the owner of the horse for his untimely demise. I say, Sir, that when one is met with such a condition as this I may be pardoned if I feel that decent and fair treatment, which I claim to have at all times and upon all occasions extended to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I challenge any one of them now to deny this. Under such conditions, Sir, I am led to think that further forbearance on my part would cease to be a virtue. I stand here to-day as a member of this House, representing, I think I may fairly claim, one of the largest and one of the most influential constituencies within the borders of Canada. I have respect for my constituents and for myself, and I stand prepared here to-day, or on any future occasion, to face hon. gentlemen opposite or their friends outside this House, or their press in any part of the Dominion, and to challenge criticism of my official administration of the public domain, which has been entrusted to me by the right hon. the leader of the Government.

I must at once acknowledge that I am indebted to my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) for having brought this motion before the House, thereby giving me an opportunity which I am glad to take advantage of. I was sorry yesterday that the rules of the House prevented my hon. friend from going on, because I was as ready then as I am now to meet the arguments he has advanced. Let me say at once, Mr. Speaker, in respect to this matter which the hon. member has discussed at such great length to-day, that I repeat that which I stated in my place on the 14th of February last: that I had no knowledge of the circumstances under which this case arose, that I had no knowledge of the conditions surrounding it, and that I have not the slightest recollection of having had any knowledge whatever of the matter.

My hon. friend spoke of a deputation which came from Prince Albert some time in the early part of the winter, and of a question asked by Mr. Fowlie as to whether or not there was any land in or adjoining Prince Albert available for homestead entry. If I were asked this question, I would naturally say that there was in that locality no land available for homestead entry. That would be a proper answer, and was undoubtedly the answer I would have given in such a case. My hon. friend went on to say a great deal about the conditions surrounding this special piece of land, but the facts are as I stated them on a former occasion. Mr. Donaldson was able to secure entry for that piece of land not because I was following any precedent established by my predecessor, but because the former Minister of the Interior had laid down in the land office in the city of Prince Albert a rule which the agent followed, under which Mr. Donaldson obtained entry for the land in question, and of which I had no knowledge whatever. My hon. friend has dealt with the manner in which he disposed of the adjoining quarter section. He has gone into that at some considerable length, but he has not told the whole story. Let me make it clear to hon. gentlemen of this House that the reason why my hon. friend was responsible for this condition of affairs, and why Mr. Donaldson is indebted to him for having been able to secure this entry, was because of the precedent the hon. member for Edmonton himself as Minister of the Interior established in the land office. My hon. friend talks about the rules and regulations governing these conditions; why did his rules and regulations not apply as against his friend when he obtained entry for the adjoining quarter section? What are the facts? On the 11th of February, 1908, this memorandum was sent to Mr. Greenway:

Kindly have the necessary action taken to grant entry to the eligible applicant for the N. W. ¼ of 8, 49, 26, W. 2, (Signed) Frank Oliver.

The following was issued on February 14, 1908:

Re your memorandum of the 25th of November last, below.

If this land is in the forest reserve, I presume you will require to take action before the agent is instructed in accordance with the minister's memorandum of the 11th instant.

This is a letter from Mr. Keyes, dated the 4th of February, 1908:

I beg to inform you that it has been decided to make available for homestead entry the northwest ¼ of section 8, township 49, range 23, west of 2nd meridian, and you are hereby authorized to take the necessary action and grant re-entry to the eligible applicant in accordance with the regulations.

This is a letter dated Prince Albert, 19th March, 1908, from the land agent to the secretary of the Department of the Interior, Ottawa:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th ultimo, Ref. 811135, received here on the 10th instant, advising me that it has been decided to make available for homestead entry the northwest ¼ of section 8, township 49, range 26, west of 2nd meridian, and authorizing me to take the necessary action and grant re-entry to the eligible applicant in accordance with the regulations, and I have to ask if it is your intention that any notice should be taken of the applications on file either in this office or in your department (see your letter of 20th May, 1907). This case has been pending for some considerable time past and it is not altogether clear to me from the wording of your letter, whether it is your intention to recognize the applications now on file or dispose of this land in accordance with the recent regulations by posting it on the list kept in this office for a period of ten days and then disposing of it to the first eligible applicant applying in person therefor. My reason for referring this back to you is on account of the situation of the land and the fact that a bridge is now building across the river which will make this land valuable in the very near future and as a consequence I would like to be perfectly clear as to what action you desire taken. I enclose a sketch for your information.

Your obedient servant,
R. S. Cook,
Agent Dominion Lands.

Mr. Fitzroy Dixon addressed this memorandum to Mr. Maber, my predecessor's secretary:

Please read minister's instructions dated 11th February, 1908.

In view of the special value of the land affected, I think it would be well to submit for consideration the agent's letter of the 19th instant.

The point is whether the land should be thrown open to the first eligible applicant after having been posted for ten days under recent regulations, or whether there is a particular eligible applicant who should receive the entry.

To which Mr. Dixon received the following reply:

Re N. W. 8, 49, 26, W. 2.

Referring to the instructions to the agent dated 4th February, advise the agent that the entry should have been given to the first eligible applicant for the same after the receipt of the instructions. He will therefore grant the entry to the first eligible applicant who applied to him for the same after the receipt of the instructions.

Frank Oliver.

I would like to ask my hon. friend how he can harmonize that action with his statement to-day that everybody got an equal chance and fairplay under his administration? The agent at Prince Albert called the attention of the minister to the fact that prior applications had been placed upon the file, and when Mr. Fitzroy Dixon asked the minister if he had a particular eligible applicant who should receive the entry, my hon. friend evidently did have a special and particular applicant, for the records go to show that the entry went to a man by the name of Everett, who was a labourer in the town of Prince Albert, a brother-in-law of the homestead inspector, and the Liberal organizer of that district. Mr. Everett got the homestead because of his relationship to a friend of the Liberal party, and I understand he was able to sell the property a short time afterwards for $100,000, and to divide the proceeds with his friend Gladstone. It is evident that any action based upon the statement that the first eligible applicant was to secure the homestead entry was a violation of what my hon. friend refers to as his rule and regulation. I have before me a copy of those rules and regulations, which state that in the case of the proposed disposition of lands formerly reserved or immediately available, it will be necessary to post up a notice to the effect that such lands will be open for homestead entry at the end of ten days from the date thereof, and to notify the sub-agent. These instructions and regulations, signed by the secretary of the department, were to take effect the 1st day of March.

Mr. OLIVER: Of what year?

Mr. ROGERS: 1908. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that when instructions were sent to Prince Albert to give this eligible applicant entry for the quarter section to which I have referred, the land agent wrote to the minister directing his attention to this very regulation. He drew attention to the fact that the land was improving in value. But all this was overridden. Mr. Fitzroy Dixon well expressed it—particularly eligible application who should receive the entry, did receive the entry. Here is a letter which has already been read in this House, dated the 3rd of April, and signed by Mr. W. W. Cory, of which my hon. friend complained that he did not have a copy. When I brought this matter to the attention of the House, I had a file or two in connection with it, and if I remember correctly I sent them over to the hon. gentleman and thought that this had gone with the rest.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not get the file for some days afterwards.

Mr. ROGERS: However that is not a matter of any consequence. This letter is addressed to Mr. S. J. Donaldson and is signed by W. W. Cory as follows:

The N. ½ of the fractional S. W. ¼ of section 8, however, is vacant in the records of the department. The agent of Dominion Lands has been communicated with and has been asked to advise the department as to the standing in his records of the said last-mentioned parcel. When he is heard from, you will be further communicated with in the matter.

Now, as I understand it upon inquiry, Mr. Donaldson got that letter about this fractional piece of land stating that it was vacant in the records of the department. He went to the land agent in Prince Albert and found the same condition—the land was vacant there. Then Mr. Donaldson, following the precedent—not set by me, because I had no knowledge of it of any kind or description, but as laid down by the hon. member for Edmonton—was able to secure entry. And for that he is entitled to thank my hon. friend and not me, for if I had known the facts and circumstances, neither Mr. Donaldson nor Mr. Anybody else would have secured the homestead entry.

Mr. NEELY: Why not cancel the entry?

Mr. ROGERS: That would be possible. But, following the practice of the department, for many years, Mr. Donaldson applied for scrip and had it placed upon the land, the same as is done in many other cases.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina): Would the fact that Mr. Donaldson had applied the scrip to western lands prevent the department from taking action to cancel the patent?

Mr. ROGERS: I could not answer that off-hand. But my hon. friend was referring to the matter of placing scrip upon lands like this, and said that such cases had to be held for my approval before going through. That was very correctly stated by my hon. friend, and I will tell him the reason why that was done. When I went into the Department of the Interior I found that a short time before, a policeman had been despatched to Churchill and there had delivered scrip to certain half-breeds in that locality; and I found that in a very short period of time all this scrip found its way back to the city of Edmonton and other parts of the West. So, I made a ruling that this scrip should not be placed upon any land, as my hon. friend knows, without the approval of the minister himself, because I wanted to know where all this scrip was coming from that was being applied upon pieces of valuable land in the West.

I do not know that there is much else that I can add to make more clear the position in this matter so far as I am concerned. I can only repeat that I had not the slightest knowledge that the agent at Prince Albert had acted upon his own motion knowing as he did, the precedents as laid down by my hon. friend in his own office, and that is the reason these lands have been entered as homestead entries. The hon. gentleman has read a telegram with respect to the value of the land. I do not deny that this is a valuable piece of land, but I do say that the value placed upon it by my hon. friend in the telegram he has read—and he did not favour us with the name of the sender of it—is ridiculous and out of all proportions to the value of the land. The hon. gentleman goes on to talk about rules and regulations, about the principles and practices in the administration of the public domains of this country. Now, I stand here to say to my hon. friend that there was no rule or practice so far as he was concerned when he was administering the Department of the Interior, especially if the matter came in conflict with the bosses of the Liberal machine in western Canada who had in charge and under control not only the hon. member for Edmonton but the hon. leader of that Government.

Mr. NEELY: Proof.

Mr. ROGERS: Some hon. gentleman says he would like to have proof.

Mr. NEELY: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be delighted to gratify him. I have said that my hon. friend did not control the Department of the Interior. And I will say more—that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the Opposition did not control the public domain of this country when he was Premier of this Dominion. That control rested largely in the hands of a gentleman whom my hon. friend has named, Mr. R. E. A. Leach, who was the Liberal organizer for years in western Canada and who was placed at the head of the Civil Service of western Canada and held that position until the defeat and downfall of the Government led by the right hon. gentleman. He has associated with him a gentleman by the name of Howard Douglas who held the important position of inspector of parks for western Canada. With them was associated a Mr. Perry who was the Liberal organizer for years after Mr. Leach had given up that position. Now some gentleman asks me for proof. That is a fair question. I will prove it in more ways than one. These gentlemen whom I have named as running the political machine of hon. gentlemen opposite proved very bold in their administration of the public domain in western Canada. They grew so bold that they left behind abundant of evidences of their boldness when they left their offices.

So bold was their operation and so legitimately did they look upon the plunder of the public domain of this country, that the proof and the evidence that my hon. friend wants to have and which he will get go to show, in my opinion at all events, that the men whom I have named formed a joint stock company and were carrying on business under that form for the purpose of plundering the public domain. The only capital stock that they had, so far as I can find out, was the power to control the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Mr. MARTIN (Regina): Would the minister mind telling the House where this joint stock company was incorporated?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall give the hon. member that information before I sit down. He need not be at all anxious. Just sit quiet and take your medicine; you will get it.

I recognize, of course, that the statement which I make is a serious one, and naturally I would not attempt to make such a statement were I not justified, and had I not under my hand abundance of proof. My hon. friend is anxious for proof in respect of the actions of those gentlemen whom I have just named. I shall get down to a concrete case and furnish him with that proof. I state first of all that my hon. friend the member for Edmonton did not really control his department. I shall prove that to the satisfaction of the memmer for Regina by a certain case. I have told you that Mr. Douglas had charge of the parks in western Canada. The Rocky Mountains park at Banff contains an area of some 1,800 square miles. Mr. Douglas had charge of the administration of this park as well as of other parks. What happened in that locality? Mr. Douglas recommended to my predecessor that the owners of twenty-seven square miles of the timber embraced within this park should be allowed the right to transfer their holdings to a place outside of the park. That land was first held by two Americans in the United States, who applied for this transfer. What answer did they get from the department over which my hon. friend presided? I may say that Mr. R. H. Campbell, who is head of the forestry branch, was probably the most industrious man in all Canada to see that the rights of this machine, as representing the Liberal party in western Canada, got all possible advantage under our land laws. On July 28, 1906, there is this memorandum to Mr. Campbell:

> The recommendation of Mr. Douglas that Mr. Lammers should be allowed to select a berth outside of the park in lieu of the one which he now holds within its boundaries cannot be entertained. Please have Mr. Douglas advised accordingly.
> (Sgd.) W. W. Cory.

That was very positive My hon. friend thought he was in control when that order was issued. He thought he was bossing the job. The secretary of the department wrote a letter to Mr. Douglas, dated the 7th of August, 1906, as follows:

> Sir, I beg to asknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant with respect to timber berth No. 550 situated in the Rocky Mountains park. In reply, I have to say that after due consideration it has been decided that the proposal to permit Mr. Lammers to select a timber berth outside of the Rocky Mountains park in lieu of the one held by him within its boundaries cannot be entertained.
> Your obedient servant.

> Perley G. Keyes,

> Secretary Department of the Interior.

From the records of the department, we find that this Mr. Leach, whom I have just mentioned, appeared at Ottawa on the 15th of September. The ruling so strongly and stoutly given by my hon. friend did not last long when Mr. Leach arrived here, because the records of the department show that Mr. Douglas was notified on the 25th of December that the matter was being attended to, and upon that date Mr. Douglas in turn notified a Mr. Crawford who had secured the transfer from these Americans of the twenty-seven miles of timber lying within the Rocky Mountains park. Mr. Speaker, you might naturally ask who this Mr. Crawford might be who suddenly appeared on the scene. Before I get through, this House and this country will be better acquainted with Mr. Crawford. Some little time evidently was taken for the organization of their plan of campaign, because it was the 3rd of December before official orders went out from this department to grant the transfer of this particular berth and the right to transfer their holdings outside of the park. In order that this House may understand the value placed upon the twenty-seven miles of timber within the park and for which an exchange was being asked. I have here a report made by the timber inspector for that locality under date of November 4, 1904, in which he says:

> This timber is on very rough ground and at a very great height above the Saskatchewan river and five or six miles of a haul to a point that logs could be hauled from to the nearest market which would be Edmonton. For those reasons to me it has no more value than a gold brick.

Then he goes on to say that it is hardly fair that an annual tax for a concession should be taken from Lammers Brothers. There you get from an officer of the department in 1904 his estimate of the value of this land which they were asking to exchange for a timber berth outside of the park. The inspector reports it as having no more value than a gold brick.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us follow that up, and here I will give a summary of the fact in order that the House will better understand the true position. This is an official statement prepared by a member of the department on the 25th April, 1912:

As requested, I have looked through the official file pertaining to berth No. 528.

I may say with reference to Mr. Douglas and Mr. Leach that when Mr. Leach came to Ottawa, what he was asking for was that the holding of the parties that had control of the timber on berth 550, then within the Rocky Mountains park, should be allowed to be transferred to, a location outside which was named and known as berth 528, and which was to be held under license by William Crawford, Medicine Hat, with a view to ascertaining what connection either Mr. Howard Douglas or Mr. R. E. A. Leach had with respect to the exchange which took place.

As you know, Messrs Lammers Brothers, of Stillwater, Minnesota, held berth No. 550½, comprising some twenty-seven square miles, which was situated in the Rocky Mountains park, and which Mr. Crawford acquired by assignment. Mr. Crawford was afterwards allowed to select berth No. 528, in the province of British Columbia, in lieu thereof. Berth No. 550½ was at one time known as berth O. and P.

In June, 1906, Mr. Douglas, who was superintendent of the Rocky Mountains park at the time, wrote the department that he had interviewed Mr. Lammers, who had expressed willingness to make an exchange of his berth for one in the province of British Columbia, which exchange Mr. Douglas strongly recommended. The matter was taken up by the department, and it was decided that the exchange could not be made, but before Mr. Douglas was advised to that effect, he forwarded a copy of a communication from Mr. Crawford which indicated that he had secured the berth and was arranging for the manufacture of lumber, in connection with which Mr. Douglas strongly recommended the exchange, as the cutting of timber would destroy the beauty of the lake Louise district, where the berth was situated. On the 7th August, 1906, Mr. Douglas was advised that the suggestion of Mr. Lammers to make an exchange of the berth could not be entertained. Two or three other communications were received from Mr. Douglas, urging the exchange, but no action was taken thereon at the time. There is a slip on the file, marked 'A' which indicates that the file was asked for and sent to Mr. Leach here in Ottawa, apparently some time in September, 1906. On the 15th September, 1906, Mr. Douglas was advised that Mr. Leach had gone into the matter of the exchange when visiting the department recently, and that the exchange would be further considered (see letter marked 'B'), so that apparently some decision was arrived at when Mr. Leach had the file. On the 25th September Mr. Douglas advised Mr. Crawford that the department had signified its willingness to consider the question of asking him to accept an exchange of timber lands in British Columbia for those held by him within the park. I presume this letter was written on the strength of the departmental letter of the 15th of that month, above referred to. The question of exchange was taken up on the 3rd December, 1906, and it was decided to make Mr. Crawford an offer of an exchange (see memorandum marked 'C'). On the 22nd December, 1906, Mr. Douglas was advised that it had been decided to take steps to see if an exchange could be arranged with the holders of the berth, and he was instructed to communicate with the owners and see what arrangements could be made. It was afterwards decided that Mr. Crawford should be granted an equal area in some five or six blocks, outside of the park in the province of British Columbia. The selection was duly made, and the department surveyed the tracts selected. Later on Mr. Crawford represented to the department that in selecting blocks 3 and 5, a mistake had been made in the locality, and asked to be allowed to reselect these blocks. His request was refused by the late minister in January, 1910. Last summer Mr. Leach interviewed me on behalf of Mr. Crawford, who, he stated, intended to make an application for an exchange of some of the blocks of this berth, but the application did not reach the department. He, or some person on his behalf, apparently made application to the minister at Edmonton in August last, with the result that an Order in Council was passed on the 3rd October, 1911, authorizing the exchange of several blocks of the berth selected by Mr. Crawford, which Order in Council, however, has not yet been gazetted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who signs that memorandum?

Mr. ROGERS: B. L. York.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had just concluded reading a memorandum by an officer of the department which set out the facts of the matter with which I was then dealing and with which I now propose to deal further. The facts of the memorandum were that application had been made to the department to transfer the interest in berth 550 and the timber thereon to berth 528 within the borders of the province of British Columbia. The then Minister of the Interior refused to sanction this transfer on the 7th August. On the 15th September, Mr. Leach arrived in Ottawa to attend to the business as represented by one Wm. Crawford who was making application for this particular transfer. Mr. Leach, according to the files of the department, met with almost immediate success and Mr. Douglas, who was working in conjunction with Mr. Leach in regard to this matter, got notice on the 25th of the same month that the transfer would be made.

Now, Sir, let me point out to you and the House that Mr. Wm. Crawford, who was the applicant for this transfer, was a gentleman living in Alberta and was employed as a railway conductor. Apparently the chief value that he represented to Mr. Leach, Mr. Douglas and their associates, was in the fact that he was a man who could be depended upon, that he was a man who would be absolutely secret in his dealings and his understanding of the circumstances. I pointed out that official notice was given to Mr. Crawford early in December from the department and perhaps I cannot do better than read to the House some of the correspondence that took place upon this question. I have it here in the files under my hand and what I am going to read from are copies of the letters that I desire to put upon 'Hansard,' which are taken from the original files and written by the gentlemen whose names I will quote.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) is reading from certain files which he has before him. I understand that he is basing an attack upon the administration of the department by myself on the contents of these files. I would ask that they be placed on the table of the House at the conclusion of my hon. friend's remarks for the information of myself and the country at large.

Mr. ROGERS: I have got the files from the Department of the Interior and I will return them to the department. If my hon. friend asks for a return, I am satisfied that he will get the return from that department in the proper way.

Mr. OLIVER: I have been given to understand that there is a rule such as I am now invoking and, if there is such a rule, I ask that it be enforced.

Mr. BORDEN: The rule is that a copy of the document that is quoted from must be laid on the table of the House. That is being done.

Mr. ROGERS: I have a copy here and I will place it on the table of the House, or it will be in 'Hansard' at all events.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I have your ruling, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is well known. I do not know whether it actually says a copy of the document, but if any minister quotes from an official document the rule is that he places it on the table of the House afterwards.

Mr. ROGERS: The first letter which I will read—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are the documents to be placed on the table of the House?

Mr. ROGERS: The copies that I am reading from will be placed on the table of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Those are not the original documents. My hon. friend is not free to quote extracts. He must place the whole documents upon the table.

Mr. ROGERS: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon, I do not propose to quote extracts, but I shall quote the letters on the file.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very well then, put them on the table.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair, chair.

Mr. OLIVER: May I explain myself for a moment?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Rogers) cannot be expected to put them on the table until he has read them. That is the rule and I take it for granted it will be complied with.

Mr. OLIVER: The point is as to whether my hon friend shall merely lay on the table the copies of the letters or communications which he proposes to read and which will appear in 'Hansard.' My request is that the file which he has under his hand and from which he is reading these copies shall be placed upon the table because the file itself is the history of the transaction and a single letter or memorandum from that file is not the full information in regard to the subject under consideration which information can only be given by the placing of the file upon the table.

Mr. BORDEN: I am not aware of any such rule as that which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) invokes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that it would include the whole file. Whenever any document, whether it be a letter or statement, is gotten up and compiled in one paper and whenever any selections are read from that, the minister presenting such a statement is obliged to lay the document on the table. But as far as I know at present, I do not think the rule means that the whole file should be placed on the table.

Mr. OLIVER: If I may be permitted to explain—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. OLIVER: May I be permitted?

Mr. BORDEN: Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER: I just wish to place the position as I understand it before the House. You have stated, Mr. Speaker, that if parts of a document are read the whole document must be placed on the table. Now, the file is the history of the case and one letter or memorandum from that file is only an extract from the history and the history can only be given from the file in full. Therefore, my contention is that the file should be placed on the table.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given the rule as I understand it. I will look it up in the meantime, but no more can be expected until the quotations are made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Your ruling is, Mr. Speaker, that letters quoted from must be laid upon the table of the House when they are read?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

An hon. MEMBER: Whatever he reads?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, not whatever he reads, but the original of these letters.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not know of any such ruling.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The ruling is, that if a document is read from it must be laid upon the table of the House. The moment a letter is read it is part of the archives of the House, and if my hon. friend reads from it, it must be laid on the table according to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BORDEN: I am not aware of such a rule, if the right hon. gentleman means to say that the original document must be laid on the table of the House; a copy?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that the original document should be laid on the table of the House.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not so understand it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is for the Speaker to say—Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is quite proper for the hon. member to proceed to read the document if he desires to do so. In the meantime I will look the authorities up and give my ruling according to my judgment.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. ROGERS: The first letter I shall read is from the Department of the Interior and is as follows:

Ottawa, 31st January, 1907.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I have your letter of the 25th instant, in regard to the exchange of the limit in the vicinity of Laggan in the Rocky Mountains park which is held by Mr. William Crawford, of Medicine Hat. The matter of the exchange has been approved, as I think I advised you some little time ago, but the details have not yet been worked out. Mr. Crawford has been furnished with a list of the available lands in British Columbia from which he can make a selection but the matter has not yet taken shape in a final form. So soon as he has a definite proposition to submit as to the lands which he wishes to obtain in exchange for those in the park, we will be in a position to deal finally with it. I understand from Mr. Douglas however that Mr. Crawford wishes to get 2½ miles outside the park for each mile which he held inside of it. This may make some difficulty in reaching a final agreement.

Faithfully yours,
R. H. Campbell,
Secretary.

R. E. A. Leach, Esq.,
Brandon, Manitoba.

The next letter is from Banff, Alberta, dated February 14, 1907, and reads:

Banff, Alta., Feb. 14, 1907.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I saw Mr. Crawford since getting your letter and he agrees that it is better for him to go to Ottawa. I think he is writing you to that effect. I think he should wire Jim Ross and ask him what date he could meet him there and then when it was settled what amount of limit they would allow for the exchange, ask for 60 days in which to make the selection.

Crawford said it was possible you might go to Ottawa yourself which I hope is correct. A very good point to raise with the department would be that the list of available limits furnished by McDonald, assistant Crown timber agent, Kamloops, shows only a few miles in each tract which would evidently go to show that the best timber has already been taken and what is now available is mostly culls and it would not pay to put up a large mill plant out any of the small parcels of timber that he is asked to select from.

I certainly think Crawford should go down as soon as he can arrange to meet Ross there.

Your faithfully,
H. Douglas.

Mr. Speaker, I am reading these letters in order that the House may understand the connection between Mr. Leach, Mr. Douglas, and others who had to do with this transfer, in which the Government of that day were so particularly interested. The next letter is from Banff, Alberta, dated August 12, 1907, and reads:

Banff, Alta., Aug. 12, 1907.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I received your letter and express from Calgary, and will forward amounts as directed to the parties, and get voucher from each one. Mr. Oliver spent Saturday here and seemed to be in fairly good form, and got off at Field for a few hours on Sunday morning and saw Hoar. I think you had better come west as soon as you can and we will go to Revelstoke and get papers fixed up before I leave for the South, which will be about the 1st of September—would like if you could arrange to go along for a week or so. It is only about thirty hours from Lethbridge to Ravelli. Advise me a day or two before you come west, so that I can go through with you to Revelstoke and I will have Dan meet us and get all papers transferred.

Martin sent up a Mr. McVittie for the office here; he only came this morning so do not know how he will pan out yet.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. Douglas.

The next letter is also from Banff, dated October 22, 1907, and reads:

Banff, Alta., Oct. 22, 1907.

Dear Mr. Leach,—Since I saw you I have been thinking that if the minister wants to show his appreciation I think it would be a good scheme to appoint a general superintendent of all the parks in the West, this to include the Glacier, the Yoko, the Rocky Mountains park, Elk Island, and the new reserve east of Battle river. Don't you think it would be better for the department to have one man responsible for the laying out of the work and looking after all the details rather than have four or five men, many of them inexperienced in the kind of work. There will be a lot of work in getting these two northern animal parks in smooth working order—estimates will have to be got out and fencing and building done, which should be carefully thought out before going on with the work, and I have no hesitation in saying the best results will not be obtained by inexperienced men in this line of work. If such an appointment were made I think I am entitled to consideration, and would like very much to take hold of the Battle river reserve especially. What do you think about this? Would it not be much better to have one man responsible for all the parks instead of five men, each pulling his own way, and no one directly over them to see how the work is being carried out. If you should go to Ottawa soon you might see what the minister thought about this. I think my work here and the Yoko for nearly eleven years has been fairly successful, at least I have not been informed to the contrary, and an appointment of this kind would show that my efforts had been appreciated.

I had a letter from Crawford to-day and he says he is going to Ottawa soon. I have written him to let you know a few days before he goes, and if you could get away it would do no harm to happen along there about the same time; you could then have a chat with the minister about the above suggestions, that is if you think favourably of them.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) Howard Douglas.

The next letter is also written by Mr. Douglas from Banff on November 13, 1907, and is as follows:

Banff, Alta., Nov. 13, 1907.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I have been expecting to hear from you daily for some time, or expected you here as you said in Calgary that you expected to go to Field in about two weeks. I wrote you that Crawford would be in Ottawa from the 20th to the 25th, and thought you might arrange to be there, so as to get business closed up. I have not had any communication from the department about it since I came home.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. Douglas.

The next letter is also from Banff and reads:

Banff, Alta., Dec. 6, 1907.

Dear Mr. Leach,—There was a telegram from Crawford about a week ago that he could only get one and one-half miles for a mile, and asking if he would accept, all the others were willing and anxious to have it closed, so a reply was sent to make possible deal and close; he was in Ottawa; I expect he is on his way home now, and we will soon know the result. If you do not hear from him I will advise you when I see him. When do you expect to go to Ottawa? The parties all think that a surveyor and cruiser should be put to work as soon as we have things settled, so that we can select the very best of what has been reserved. I presume they will allow a reasonable time to make a selection from the seventy miles that are reserved; if so it will pay to have it all surveyed and cruised, then we have something that we know the value. We will arrange for a meeting soon after Crawford gets back.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. Douglas.

The next letter is written from Banff, the 31st December, and reads:

Banff, Alta., Dec. 31, 1907.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I only returned from Revelstoke on Sunday night where we spent our Xmas. Also met Dan there and got out descriptions and had them sent in on the 25th so that the department will have it within the thirty days allowed. I suppose you saw that the provincial Government in British Columbia had withdrawn all their timber from the market, which should make our holding double in value.

When do you expect to go west. I might meet you for a few minutes here. Trusting you had a pleasant Xmas and wishing you and yours a prosperous and happy New Year, I am.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) Howard Douglas.

The next letter is written from Banff, March 11, 1908, and reads:

Banff, March 11, 1908.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I have just returned from Ottawa and was disappointed at not meeting you in Regina yesterday. I wired you from Winnipeg on Monday night that I would go through on Tuesday; but from the telegram George had you were in Brandon that day. With regard to the Ottawa business everything went on the lines we discussed, and I think you must have fixed things pretty well while you were there, as Campbell and I had no difficulty in getting all fixed very satisfactory. I inclose you copy of my new office.

Hunter will be superintendent here, Hoar at Field, and one to be appointed later for the Battle river reserve. I should have liked very much to have met you and hope the first time you are west you will let me know and I will meet you any place you mention. The timber exchange is all fixed satisfactory and the Government will make the survey. The Surveyor General's estimate for it was $3,500, so you see that is something.

You will also note that in future all park matters come under Campbell instead of Rothwell, for which I am also very well pleased. From what I got in Ottawa, you have your work cut out for some time. I may mention that I heard the minister speak in the highest terms of you while in Ottawa, and considered that you were the most competent man he had for a most difficult work you are engaged in now.

So the Tories have let up at last, and I am sure you must be pleased, although you never feared the result. It was the uncertainty and the trouble and annoyance for so long.

Thanking you for the interest you have taken on my behalf.

I am yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. Douglas,
Superintendent.

Letter from Mr. Leach to Mr. Douglas, dated at Brandon, Manitoba, 17th July, 1908:

I returned from the East a few days ago and missed seeing Campbell before he left Ottawa. I will be pleased if you will let me know when he will be in Banff and whether you and he have yet made that trip up to Yoko.

Brandon fair has been on all this week and yesterday was a record day.

We have had recently a few rains and the crop will, I think, be a pretty well assured success.

Faithfully,

The next letter is from Howard Douglas:

Department of the Interior.
Office of the Commissioner of Dominion Parks,
Banff, August 27, 1908.

Dear Mr. Leach:

When do you expect to be west again? I expect to leave for Montana any time after the first, and will probably be away for some time.

Crawford has got the transfer of the new limit, but we do not know how the survey is coming on. As soon as that is finished it might be well to meet some place, and decide on something. If you could come west before I go south, we might arrange for a meeting some place, and get some cruising done. McCarter says he can sell a portion at once, if it was cruised, and from the way we have been fighting fires the last month, I would suggest we get at least our money back at once, as the whole thing may burn up.

I have not seen Crawford for a month, but will try and see him in a few days and see what he thinks about it. Please drop me a line on receipt of this.

Howard Douglas.

This letter is from Brandon, and is addressed to Mr. Howard Douglas, commissioner of Dominion Parks, Banff, Alberta:

Do you know the whereabouts of Mr. Galt, civil engineer who was in charge of the Banff waterworks and sewer construction, also would you say if you are on sufficiently intimate terms with him to be able to approach him on a somewhat delicate matter of business?

I expect you will be leaving for Montana shortly. Have you any idea how long it will take you this time?

It might be necessary to see Mr. Galt as soon as possible. I understand he is in British Columbia somewhere, but am unable to say where.

Yours faithfully,

Department of the Interior, Canada; Office of Commissioner of Dominion Parks, Banff, September 1, 1908.

Your letter to hand this a.m., and in reply would say that I know Mr. Galt very well indeed, and I am sure he is all right. He is living at Vernon, B.C.

I expect to leave for Montana about the 10th, but it is very uncertain. Ayotte has been there for three weeks and has done nothing. I will likely have to go on the round-up again myself, and if so, will likely be gone a month. If I do not get something definite by the 10th, I will leave there.

Howard Douglas.

The next letter is from the office of the commissioner of Dominion Parks, Banff, September 13, 1908:

I am leaving for Revelstoke to investigate a number of charges that were sent to the minister against Hoar, and I am of the opinion that his time will be very short, as I do not think it will be difficult to get the proof. I will be at Revelstoke to-morrow and Golden on Tuesday, and expect to be here after that until the 21st.

I hope you are getting the seed grain of theirs in shape, so that you can get round again. Walter Scott has been here for the last week—left for home last night. The other party from the West was also here for three days, and talked over matters.

Howard Douglas.

Extract from letter from Banff, dated November 28, 1908:

Dear Mr. Leach:

I met Mr. Oliver on Monday, and got along all right. He was in particularly good humour.

The following letter is from Howard Douglas to Mr. Leach, and is dated March 29, 1909:

I enclose you letter I have from McCarter, in reference to one plat of the timber. Of course Crawford and I would not do anything without consulting you. When do you think you will be west? I will be at home all this week. I would try and meet you in Calgary when Crawford would be there; he is there every alternate night. I do not think it would be wise for the three of us to go to Revelstoke, but we could decide on whatever would do and authorize Crawford to act. You might address me by wire or letter on receipt of this.

The next letter, written from Revelstoke, is addressed to Mr. Douglas:

I have your letter. I have had the Fish Crub block cruiser. It runs over twenty-five millions of fine timber all done to water on good driving stream. Some mill men are in there now examining it, and on Saturday I expect to get an offer for it. I will want you and Crawford to come over if possible to a meeting of the company to decide whether we will accept this offer. T.K. is a hard man to make a deal with, and although he always talks about not being able to sell any or all his stuff, yet when a chance comes up he always wants more than buyers will pay.

I told him of this chance to sell and suggested a dollar a thousand which is a big price, but he said they ought to pay $1.50 as it was exceptionally good, &c. If we can get twenty-five thousand out of this, it will give us our money back and some more and get us all out of debt, and I think we ought to be reasonable and make a sale if possible. The party will pay as good as cash if they buy, as they are good men with a mill on the lake.

You now understand the situation, and should I wire you and Billy to come, you will understand that there is business in sight.

I have also just had the southerly block of Cranberry Crub three and three-quarter miles cruiser. It is somewhat of a disappointment, as it runs only a little over sixteen millions and is very high up, though the timber is sound but not large. I am told that the other block on the north side of Cranberry is better stuff but has not yet been surveyed.

All are well here. We hope to get a trip to Seattle before Easter.

I may say for the information of the House that J. S. McCarter is a member of the firm of Harvey, McCarter and Pinkham, barristers and solicitors, Revelstoke, and I understand he is a son-in-law of Mr. Howard Douglas. The following is a letter from Brandon, addressed to Howard Douglas:

Referring to your favour of the 29th instant, I beg to say that I have been from home a week, only returning yesterday afternoon. This morning I wired you stating that the suggestions made in your letter would be satisfactory. Whatever you arrange for will, I am sure, be all right.

I hope to leave here about next Monday for Calgary and will see you then; will wire you in advance, however, of the date I will be there.

The next is copy of a telegram:

Howard Douglas,
Dominion Parks Commissioner,
Banff, Alberta.

Kindly meet Mr. Cory and myself in Calgary Tuesday morning.

R. E. A. Leach.

There is further correspondence, as follows:

Department of the Interior, Canada.
Office of the Commissioner of Dominion Parks,
Banff, Oct. 28, 1909.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I have been so busy that I have not had time to write you sooner.

Immediately upon my return from the Yellowhead I had to go to Montana for a small shipment of buffalo and after they were delivered I brought the cars here and on Tuesday this week shipped seventy-five heads from here to Wainwright, so you will see I have not been idle.

I made a new note and drew on you a few days ago and hope it was all right .

With regard to the other matter—McCarter says if Perry will sign a transfer of what shares he wishes to dispose of and send it to him it will be all that is necessary. The stock is all in the Imperial Bank in Crawford's name, but he has assigned to Perry and the others.

When do you expect to come west?

Sincerely yours,
Howard Douglas.

To R. E. A. Leach, Esq.,
Inspector of Dominion Lands,
Brandon.

Brandon, Nov. 8, 1909.

Howard Douglas, Esq.,
Commissioner of Dominion Government Parks,
Banff, Alta.

Dear Mr. Douglas,—I regret missing you in Calgary. I got your note all right but could not see any possibility of meeting with you, as I had made dates ahead for a week and was only a few hours in Edmonton, Tuesday evening. Crawford would probably explain matters to you. I expect to be west again before a great while. I arrived home this morning at 5 a.m. . .

Faithfully,

Personal. Brandon, Nov. 13, 1909.

Dear Mr. Douglas,—Mr. Kenneth Mucheson, of Souris, has just phoned me to say that owing to rheumatic trouble he is leaving to take baths. Mr. Mucheson is a personal friend of mine of long standing and an enthusiastic Liberal worker. If you can do anything to make his stay pleasant I would esteem it a personal favour.

I have just learned that Mr. Jas. Madill, Souris, who is the present Liberal candidate for the local constituency, was leaving yesterday for Banff; also my assistant, Mr. Evans, gave him a note to you. He is also O. K.

Faithfully,

Howard Douglas, Esq.,

Commissioner Dominion Government Parks, Banff, Alta.

Banff, April 1, 1910.

Dear Mr. Leach,—When I was in Ottawa it was fully decided that I must move to Edmonton, the minister had fully made up his mind, so I had to give in; this will probably be about the month of June. I had thought of taking McVeity up there, but since then certain things have come out, so that I do not wish to keep him in any capacity any longer, and if you can arrange for his transfer to Edmonton land office it would be acceptable all round. I was up in Edmonton for a week and that personal letter you wrote me saying he was to be transferred to Edmonton the 1st of April and asking about my own transfer; he had opened it, and half a day after I was home he brought it in saying that he was sorry that he had opened it by mistake, so I asked him to give up his post office key, and in the future not to touch any letters that came in the office. And told him I would ask for a transfer at once, so he quite understands the position, and said he would prefer going to Edmonton; so if you can make room for him in the land office there, I hope you will do so as early as possible. I am writing Mr. Cory and advising him of the facts. Will it be necessary for you to have authority from him to act in the matter?

I would like you to get me a good man to come to the office here under Tom—and I would probably take Kelly to Edmonton, or the new man if he was a good one. I would like to meet you and talk over matters—could you go to Calgary any time. Will be down at the horse show on Wednesday next—if you should be in Calgary soon let me know.

There are some St. Paul men figuring on the Crawford proposition.

Yours sincerely,
Howard Douglas.

R. E. A. Leach, Esq.,
Inspector Dominion Lands,
Brandon, Man.

P.S.—Since the above was written, Mr. McVeity says he would prefer going to the Calgary land office.

Banff, April 15, 1910.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I have a letter from Campbell to-day in which he says if you can arrange for the transfer of McVeity, it is better for you to do so. He said he would see Mr. Greenway in regard to it, so you may hear from him. As matters are now the sooner he is moved the better, and I will arrange to get a good girl stenographer. I expect to go to Montana about the 1st of May and would like to have this fixed up before then.

Yours sincerely,
H. Douglas.

Calgary, Alta., Monday morning.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I got a few lines from Crawford to meet you here to-day. I was just at the station leaving Banff for Edmonton. I expected to meet you at the Yale here this morning, but you was not registered. I have to go on this morning to Lamont. Simmons the superintendent there, sent in his resignation about two weeks ago, and Mr. Oliver wired me to put on a man temporarily the first of the month, so I had arranged to meet a man at Fort Saskatchewan to-night and go on to Lamont. I expect to be in Edmonton on Wednesday and come south in the evening. You might wire me to Lamont Tuesday and say where you will be. I will likely get to Edmonton Wednesday morning at 6 a.m. and be there until four. Could see you either there or here on Tuesday.

Yours sincerely,
H. D.

Banff, Aug. 31, 1910.

Dear Mr. Leach,—The new superintendent is writing you to-day about the two lots that we were holding for you, also one held for Ingram. He is going to see that everything is done right and no favours to any one. I would recommend you strongly to sign an agreement for both lots and send the first year's rent in advance, and if you do not want them next spring you can easily get $100 for the equity in each lot, and you had better advise Ingram to the same effect. There will be no trouble in getting them sold and all you have to pay is $8 on each lot now. You can take them in some other name if you choose and I will guarantee to turn them over if you do not want them, and you advise Ingram to do the same with his.

I expect Sir Wilfrid will see Oliver on Friday at Medicine Hat about my staying or going. Sir Wilfrid told me without asking that he was going to request Mr. Oliver to leave me at Banff. If there is no definite word I must commence to pack next week and move before the 1st of October. If McDonald is left here I would rather go as there is only room for one manager here.

I do not think there was anything very important in the letter you mislaid, in fact I forget now what I wrote you about. I expect to go down to Arcola about next Monday to look up a range for buffalo in the Moose Mountain. Do you ever go in there, if so, perhaps you could make a trip in for a couple of days; if so wire me on Saturday and I will advise you definitely.

Yours truly,
H. D.

Edmonton, Nov. 25, 1910.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I would like to arrange for Crawford and yourself to meet me sometime soon at Calgary to make some definite arrangement about that business. McCarter has done nothing and it seems that if any move is made we must make it. Do you happen to know of a good cruiser that we can get? You might make some inquiry. I have to go to the Moose Mountain between the first and the tenth, and it might be possible to have Crawford meet us at Moosejaw; if you are not coming west soon, let me know and I will try and fix a date.

It certainly is time we were getting something done towards placing this property on the market and unless we move in the matter it will be left as McCarter has so much of his own that ours is left to the last.

Will be glad to head from you what you think.

Yours, &c.,
H. D.

Nov. 29, 1910.

Howard Douglas, Esq.,
Commissioner Dominion Parks,
Edmonton, Alta.

Dear Mr. Douglas,—I beg to acknowledge your favour of the 25th. I have been from home for about ten days and have just returned. If it would suit as well to meet Crawford at Moosejaw, or better still Regina, it would answer me better as I have nothing special to go west for at present time. If you can fix a date with him and wire me as soon as possible I will endeavour to keep that date clear. I am, however, having a number of court investigations and the dates for those must of necessity be fixed somewhat in advance; so on this account I would like to have as much notice as possible, and if Crawford cannot come to Regina I would like to meet with you there when you come east, if you are not able to come to Brandon. I think it is time something was doing about that matter.

Faithfully,

The next letter is:

Department of the Interior
Office of the Commissioner of Dominion Lands
Edmonton March 31, 1911.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I have a letter from Crawford this morning in regard to our business and things are not looking very good. The cruise is all finished and is most unsatisfactory. I wish you could arrange to meet us in Calgary, sometime soon and decide on something definite as if we cannot get an exchange of some kind the sooner we sell for what we can get the better. Would like if you could possibly arrange to meet us before the end of this month as I expect to be away nearly all April. Wire me a couple of days in advance.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) Howard Douglas.

I wish to draw attention to the fact that the letters I have been reading previously have been referring to the exchange they had already had of berth 550½ to berth 528. Now they are evidently not satisfied with berth 528 and they want a further exchange. They find, in examining berth 528, that it is not all in one place, that it is divided up into small sections of one, two three, four and five mile belts in eight different places, and a few of those parcels they find not to be satisfactory and not to contain all the timber they would like them to contain.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina): Do I understand that the letters which the minister is reading constitute a part of the departmental file on his desk?

Mr. ROGERS: I am reading the letters and taking the responsibility for them, and I shall lay them on the table when I have finished.

Mr. MARTIN: Do not the letters from which the minister is reading constitute a portion of a private file got from a certain office in the city of Brandon?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know that they constitute a private fyle, I know they constitute a file containing public records belonging to the department and to the people of this country, and if they contain letters of this kind—

Mr. MARTIN: Are those letters part of the departmental file which had a place in the department in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. ROGERS: Most of the letters which I have read I have here on a file coming form the office of Mr. Leach in the city of Brandon.

Mr. MARTIN: Private letters.

Mr. ROGERS: They are not private letters any more than other letters, the same file contains the public records of the department.

Mr. MARTIN: Stolen letters, stolen letters.

Mr. ROGERS: The next letter reads:

Office of the Commissioner of Dominion Lands
Edmonton April 3, 1911.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I am enclosing you a renewal note to fix up before you leave so it will be all right until your return from the Coronation.

Would it not be well to have a talk with our friend in Ottawa that in case the minister is in England and Crawford goes down he will understand. You might drop me a line from Ottawa how things will be and I will have all arrangements made from this end for location, we wish in exchange. There need be no fear of Crawford, as he is as close as yourself. Let me know if there is anything new.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) Howard Douglas.

The next letter is from the Department of the Interior to the Commissioner of Dominion Parks:

Department of the Interior.
Commissioner of Dominion Parks.
Edmonton, April 26, 1911.

Dear Mr. Leach,—Yours of the 21st to hand and in reply would say that it is only this Sicamous block we wish exchanged as there is absolutely nothing on it. This timber we expected to get is about one mile east and our property is the bow side of the mountains high up—there was no survey when it was selected and after the lines were in it shut out the timber we expected. Crawford and I was at Revelstoke a few days ago and I think we have a fair prospect of disposing of the balance within the next sixty days. It is being submitted to the Old Country stockholders. We saw Mr. Munther the president and A. McBar the vice president of the company and they both have recommended the purchase at $100,000 and if we can only get the exchange of the Sicamous it will easily be worth as much more and we can well afford to pay the 'Com.' I wrote you about. Drop me a few lines before you leave Ottawa.

Hoping you will have a very pleasant trip and that you will see all the sights.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) Howard Douglas.

The next letter is as follows:

Calgary, July 15, 1911.

Dear Mr. Leach,—I saw Crawford here tonight and he is ready to leave for Ottawa as soon as he learns that Ross is there. Could you find out Ross movement. Crawford would like to meet him here as any place in the West or Ottawa if you could arrange the meeting place at any time.

The parties who were to see the three parcels will return from England on Friday next and we expect something definite from them but after that must fight for the exchange.

I am going to Waterton Lake park this morning and will be back to Banff Saturday next. Wire me there and in the meantime see if you cannot arrange where Crawford could meet Ross.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) Howard Douglas.

The next is a letter to Howard Douglas, from Brandon:

My Dear Douglas,—We arrived home night before last and have had a most enjoyable trip. I wrote you sometime before leaving England asking if there was anything special to communicate you could write me to Ottawa. As I did not receive anything I assume there is nothing of very special importance. How about the matter of re-selection; has anything been done. Brandon fair is on next week. How would you like to take a run down and talk matters over with me.

The next letter is:

July 29, 1911.

Dear Mr. Douglas,—Referring to your favour of the 25th instant from Calgary I beg to say from the best information I have been able to obtain it would appear that Senator Ross is now on the return voyage from the Old Country. I wired you this morning to Banff to that effect. We will in all probability be coming West shortly; but as soon as he reaches Ottawa I will endeavour to ascertain definitely. This matter should be dealt with as quickly as possible.

Faithfully yours,
Inspector.

The next is a telegram from Brandon to Howard Douglas, Esq., Banff, Alberta:

Available information intimates Ross about returning from England.
(Sgd.) R. E. A. Leach.

The next telegram is dated 29th September, 1911, as follows:

Howard Douglas, Esq.,
Commissioner Dominion Parks,
Post Office Building, Edmonton.
Leaving for East this evening, will only remain a few days.
(Sgd.) R. E. A. Leach.

You will observe that the last telegram I have read was dated September 29, eight days after the election of the 21st of September, 1911. Mr. Leach in it informs Mr. Douglas that he will not remain long in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, you will have gathered from the correspondence which I have submitted to the House how anxious those gentlemen were for a further exchange of a portion of limit 528, and that is what they were here appealing for. They had appealed to my hon. friend the member for Edmonton at an earlier period for this exchange, but my hon. friend did not grant it. As on the former occasion when they asked for the transfer of berth 550½ to 528, he refused it until Mr. Leach arrived on the scene. Then the scene changed, and the transfer was made. Now Mr. R. H. Campbell recommends this further transfer in a long memorandum dated 25th January, 1910, in which he goes into the reasons why this transfer should be made. But my hon. friend and predecessor in his own handwriting has written across it:

Mr. Crawford got what he asked for, and can't come again; the deal is closed. F.O.

This is on the original file, and was on the 25th January, 1910. But these gentlemen were still persisting in their efforts, and were coming to Ottawa and asking for a further exchange, believing as they did that a portion of that berth was available, as they thought it ought to be. They came asking for what they call berth 532. I hold in my hand the report of the Crown timber agent at New Westminster, B.C., dated August 10, 1910, dealing with this particular forest of timber limit, for which those parties were making application in the name of Mr. Crawford. This letter of the Crown timber agent reads as follows:

Sir, I beg to confirm my telegram of even date as follows:—'No offers received for timber berth 532,' and to state further that very few persons attended the sale, none of the lumber men from the upper country being in evidence. The lack of interest shown in this case cannot be explained otherwise than that the large upset price was more than many could finance. I am still of the opinion however, that the berth is well worth the price at which it was offered, and would pay the purchaser a handsome profit on his investment, as there is no question about the quantity of timber thereon as estimated by the cruiser, Mr. W. R. Peacock. The berth being situated in the Revelstoke Crown timber agency, the file in connection therewith will be sent to the agent at that point on receipt here of instructions to that effect. See your file 551771 T. G. & I.

Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) James Leamy.
Crown Timber Agent.

The Secretary, Department of the Interior,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Leamy refers to the report of the cruiser, Mr. W. R. Peacock, in respet to this berth that was being applied for on behalf of Mr. Crawford, and his report is as follows:

In the matter of the application of Mr. E. L. Kinman to have the timber on certain lands in the province of British Columbia put up for sale, I, William R. Peacock, of the city of Notch Hill, province of British Columbia, occupation, 'timber cruiser,' do solemnly declare that I have carefully cruised the lands mentioned in the schedule hereto attached marked 'A' and 'B' respectively, and to the best of my knowledge and belief the said schedules contain a true and faithful statement of the timber upon said lands. And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of 'The Canada Evidence Act, 1893.'

Declared before me at North Hill, British Columbia in the province of British Columbia this 4th day of April, A.D., 1910, J.P. or Commissioner in B.R.

(Sgd.) W. J. Smith, J.P.
(Sgd.) Wm. R. Peacock.

What Mr. Peacock swears to, is that he has examined this berth and that it contains 160,000,000 feet of timber. That is what Mr. Leach was making his hurried trip to Ottawa for, to find out if they could get this in exchange for a berth which they themselves acknowledged to be of no value. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say that while my hon. friend the late Minister of the Interior turned down that proposition, it has never been known in Ottawa or in western Canada that when anything political had to be done Mr. Leach would be turned down. He came here to Ottawa on 29th September to urge upon a defeated government the transfer of this 160,000,000 feet of timber in exchange for a piece that they themselves acknowledged to be of no value. As I stated at the outset, we have here the evidence that there was an organization of men representing the Liberal machine of western Canada, carrying on business in the plundering of the public domain in the manner which is set forth in the letters that I have read, and they were using the name of this individual Mr. William Crawford, as they themselves stated, simply because he was to be trusted. They were careful in western Canada of their movements. They were afraid to be seen, three of them, in the one town on the same night. In addition to this we have the statement that their stock was in trust in the Imperial Bank, and was duly divided up for the purpose of holding their shares in this business transaction in which they were dealing. My hon. friend the member for Edmonton talked to-day about principle and about practice and about rules of the administration of his department. Was I not right, Mr. Speaker, when I stated at the outset that he did not control the rules or the practice or the administration of the department when he came in contact with the machine politics that operated in western Canada? While he refused to grant Mr. Crawford the exchange that would give him 160,000,000 feet of timber for a piece upon which he himself placed no value, I will read to you a certified copy of an Order in Council passed on 3rd October, 1911, twelve days after the late Government were defeated:

The Minister of the Interior submits under date of 16th September, 1911, that by Order in Council of the 27th March, 1908, P.C. No. 642, authority was given to grant Wm. Crawford of Medicine Hat, under the license regulations timber berth No. 528 situated in the province of British Columbia in exchange for timber berth No. 550½ located in the upper valley of Bow river. Strong representations had been made by the Superintendent of the Rocky Mountains park of Canada and by several other persons not connected with the Department of the Interior that it would be advisable and in the public interest to have berth No. 550½ surrendered to the Dominion as if lumber operations were carried on in the locality under the ordinary license regulation, it would destroy one of the most beautiful portions of the park.

An examination of the district had been made by an officer of the Department of the Interior who submitted a report recommending that a surrender of this berth should be obtained from Mr. Crawford and that he should be offered in lieu thereof, an equal area of timber lands in the railway belt of the province of British Columbia.

The minister further submits that Mr. Crawford selected an area of timber lands in the railway belt in British Columbia, in a number of different blocks which comprised an area equal to that contained in timber berth No. 550-1-2. These selected timber lands are shown on the plan attached to the Order in Council of the 27th March, 1908, referred to above, and are designated berth No. 528. Subsequently Mr. Crawford made representations to the Department of the Interior to the effect that he made the selections in some localities where no survey lines were to be found, and it was impossible to locate accurately the particular blocks on which merchantable timber was to be found, but as he was confined to certain localities and only permitted to select an area equal to that surrendered, he stated that in the case of two of the blocks, he had included in the selection, ground which carried no timber of value, and had omitted adjoining ground carrying timber of value, which he thought would fall within the limits of the selection when surveyed. Moreover it was found that block 1 included a portion of Crown grant No. 811, comprising 527 acres.

In view of the circumstances and as it would seem hardly fair that Mr. Crawford should suffer, as the exchange was made on the request of the Department of the Interior, the minister, therefore, recommends that upon a surrender being obtained from Mr. Wm. Crawford of blocks 1, 3, 4, and 5, of timber berth No. 528, he be given authority to substitute therefore an equal area of timber lands in berth No. 532, situate east of Adams lake, in the province of British Columbia, in township 25, ranges 11 and 12, west of the 6th meridian, as shown on plan hereto attached, and to isssue a license under the timber regulations to Mr. Crawford the balance of berth No. 528 and the available timber lands in berth No. 532. The following lands in berth No. 532 have been reported as of agricultural value, and not having valuable timber thereon, and have, therefore, been eliminated from the berth.

Legal sub-divisions 3, 4, 5, 6, 11, 12, 13, and 14, of section 30, township 25, range 11; legal sub-divisions 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, of section 13; legal sub-divisions 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15, of section 24; legal sub-divisions 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 16, of section 25, township 25, range 12, all west of the 6th meridian, containing an area of 1.97 square miles.

As timber berth No. 550-1-2, referred to herein, and which Mr. Crawford surrendered at the request of the Department of the Interior, has been surveyed the minister further recommends that he be authorized to pay the cost of the survey of the available timber lands in berth No. 532, to be granted to Mr. Crawford under the license regulations, from the appropriation for the survey of Dominion Lands, if such survey should be found necessary.

The committee submit the same for approval.

Here is an Order in Council dated twelve days after the late Government were defeated and what does it mean? It means, Mr. Speaker, according to their own statement here, that because Mr. Crawford claims that he has a certain portion of timber in berth 528 that is of no value, and because he comes down here twelve days after the defeat of the Government, this Order in Council is passed handing over to Mr. Crawford, 160,000,000 feet of timber belonging to the public domain. Do you mean to tell me that a defeated Government would be so generous to a man by the name of Mr. Wm. Crawford had it not been for the fact that Leach, Douglas, Perry, and those associated in the organization of the Liberal party in that country, were interested parties in this matter? But this was the manner and form in which the Government that was destroyed by the will of the people twelve days before, undertook to pay their hirelings out of the public domain and to hand over 160,000,000 feet of the people's timber in the province of British Columbia.

When I read this Order in Council I was amazed and I was anxious to find out what minister in the late Government would be bold enough to go into the Council Chamber and sign an Order in Council handing away the people's property in this manner. I am sure that I will surprise this House and I will surprise the country when I tell you that the minister who signed that Order in Council and brought it down to the Council Board to be approved was no less a person than the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Apparently he was the acting Minister of the Interior as the Minister of the Interior at that time had not recovered from his defeat and had not returned to the department.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The minister was not defeated, by some 2,000 majority.

Mr. ROGERS: To talk of principle, to talk of rules and to talk of practice in the administration of the public domain comes well from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. You have the record here to-night which makes clear the manner in which the public domain of western Canada was being plundered under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite during their reign in this country. I think that I have satisfied this House, and I want to satisfy it still further by stating that when I was sworn in Minister of the Interior on the 10th day of October, seven days after the passing of this Order in Council, one of the first acts of my administration of the department was to arrest that Order in Council and to save that 160,000,000 feet of timber. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that my administration of that department in connection with this matter, as well as in connection with all other matters, will meet with the approval of the vast majority of the members of this House and I am satisfied that it will meet with the approval of the vast majority of my fellow countrymen in all parts of this vast Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: In reference to the case raised by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), I wish to say that Bourinot, at page 461 says:

> It has been laid down by the highest authorities that when a minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House, and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced.

Reference is made to May and then the author goes on to give certain examples.

> But it is allowable to repeat to the House information which is contained in a private communication. When such private papers are quoted in the House there is no rule requiring them to be laid on the table. The rule respecting the production of public papers, quoted by a minister of the Crown, is necessary to give the House the same information he possesses.

On the same subject, May says:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid on the table of the House if it can be done without injury to the public interest.
> The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda.

It goes on to cite some cases, giving the case of Lord Robert Cecil, who contended that papers that had been cited should be produced, and the Speaker held that this rule applied to public documents. On the 10th of August, 1899, the Speaker ruled that confidential documents, or documents of a private nature, passed between officers of the department and the department, cited in debate, are not necessarily to be laid upon the table of the House, especially if the minister declares they are of a confidential nature.

> Indeed, when it is obvious that the House deals only with public documents in its proceedings, it cannot thus incidentally require the production of papers which if moved for separately would be refused as beyond its jurisdiction.

I am strengthened in my view by the ruling given by Hon. Mr. Blanchet some years ago with reference to the production of papers in this House:

Official papers quoted during the debate should be laid on the table of the House.

In this case, I think that these letters which have been read ought to be laid on the table of the House, but under the supervision of some one who would see that they would not be destroyed or removed so that they would not be available for the department in future, because I take it they are part of a file. I cannot rule that the whole file be laid on the table of the House, because if a motion were passed in this House for the production of that file it would be, as is always understood, only for the production of such portions of it as might be made public; there might be letters on the file which are private or of a confidential nature. But, the letters that are read here I think ought to be laid on the table of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: Letters from the file?

Mr. SPEAKER: Letters from the file.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask the minister (Mr. Rogers) whether the letters he has read are public or private documents?

Mr. GAUVREAU: He said they were on the file.

Mr. ROGERS: Most of them are public. One or two of them may have been marked private. There are other private documents on the file which I have not touched upon at all.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister give me some description by which I could identify the file, because I desire at a later date to move for the placing of that file on the table of the House; the file from which these papers are taken.

Mr. ROGERS: I will give my hon. friend any information he may want about it tomorrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of taking part in this debate, because, as to the facts which have been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) I know nothing at all. But the Minister of Public Works has connected my name with an Order in Council which was passed after the defeat of the late Government, as to a recommendation which he said I had signed in the absence of the Minister of the Interior. I have no recollection at all of that. If I did it all, it must be simply in the course of the ordinary routine business which was transacted after the defeat of the Government. But if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) implies that I did anything wrong, or even makes an insinuation, I will be prepared to meet his charges if he will move for a committee of investigation.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN (Regina): Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) on the two hours' speech he has just made, and which was almost entirely devoted to an endeavour to show that Mr. R. E. A. Leach and some other Government officials in western Canada were just as bad as he is himself. At all events, since dinnertime, his speech has resulted in proving that the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), in his administration of the Department of the Interior, was a decent, honest man. The Minister of Public Works has spoken for two hours, and during that time he dealt with the question of the Donaldson homestead for a period of, I think, ten minutes. In the first part of his speech he posed before the House as a public martyr and complained that the so-called reptile press, which he is so fond of speaking about in this House, had done him an injustice, while in the next breath he admitted that the whole Donaldson homestead transaction was wrong, and if he had known of it he would not have permitted it at all. It seems to me the hon. gentleman has not much to complain about in this so-called reptile press telling the facts in connection with the Donaldson homestead. During the last hour and a half of his address, the hon. gentleman has simply indulged in the familiar tu quoque argument, which is always advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite when they get into a corner. Let me say that there is not a man who knows the facts in connection with this Donaldson homestead deal in the city of Prince Albert, and who knows the value of that property and who has seen it, who will for one moment defend that transaction. I would suggest that the Minister of Public Works should devote some of his time to defending this transaction, and if he does so, I will willingly give place to him so that he may discuss the resolution before us, which he did not refer to at all in the course of his speech. I contend that the minister having admitted that this whole transaction was an absolute wrong, and that he would not permit it himself, should now vote for this resolution moved by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and seconded by myself, which reads:

That all the words after 'that' be struck out and the following added thereto:

That the homestead entry for the north half of the southwest quarter of section 8, township 49, range 26, west of the second meridian, was granted to Arthur Donaldson on April 16, 1912, in violation of the rules and practice of the Department of the Interior, and contrary to the public interest.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) who was then acting as Minister of the Interior, has admitted this afternoon that the whole transaction was wrong, and, therefore, he could and should vote for the resolution up to that point. The resolution is not a condemnation of the minister personally, but a condemnation of the fact that this entry was allowed to be made. It proceeds to say:

That the Hon. Robert Rogers, a member of this House, having been at the time the said entry was granted, Minister of the Interior, is responsible therefor, and that the granting of such entry is deserving the censure of this House.

Surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) will not say to-day that he is not responsible for the granting of this homestead entry because he knows as we all know that in Canada and every other British country where responsible government exists, the minister of a department is held responsible for its administration. I want to emphasize the point that the Minister of Public Works, having admitted on the floor of the House this afternoon that this whole transaction was wrong, should not, in the face of such admission, oppose this resolution.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) is very fond, whenever he gets into a corner, of drawing a red herring across the trail; he believes in the motto that when you get into a corner you should hammer the other fellow, and try and get the attention of the public off the question at issue. He has pursued that course to-night. He is also very fond of making personal attacks on men who have been connected with the Liberal party organization in western Canada. I need not stand here to defend Mr. R. E. A. Leach; it is only during the past few years I have known Mr. Leach but I may say, that he has been a citizen of Regina for the past year or two and I venture to say that if the Minister of Public Works will go to the city of Regina he will not find many citizens, even of the Conservative stripe of politics, who will say very much against Mr. R. E. A. Leach. If he would like to hear about them, I can tell the hon. Minister of Public Works something about his own personators and thugs in the province of Manitoba. It has been rumoured throughout Canada that the present Minister of Public Works, who has been associated with the Manitoba Government, has succeeded in building up the most complete system of political crooks that has ever existed in the Dominion of Canada. When he came to the Dominion House of Commons and became Minister of the Interior, and subsequently Minister of Public Works, he was not satisfied to leave all of his political crooks in the province of Manitoba; he brought three or four of them to Ottawa, and, at almost any stage in the proceedings of this House, one can see two or three Manitoba personators and crooks sitting around the galleries of this House. On half a dozen different occasions I have seen sitting around the galleries of this House two or three men connected with the Manitoba political machine who are a disgrace to the citizenship of Canada. They came to Regina last summer during the Saskatchewan elections; they were not there long, but we knew their mission. One of them escaped in a small compartment which is usually found at the end of a railway car, while another hid in a public building for a day or two, and, during midnight, put on another man's clothes in order to help him get out of the city. That is the kind of men the Minister of Public Works brings to Ottawa to sit in the galleries, because he likes to perform in their presence, and is fond of their company.

I do not intend to say anything more that is not germane to this discussion. As far as the matter discussed by the Minister of Public Works is concerned, the whole thing is entirely out of order. The minister knows this, and I would have risen to a point of order, but I thought it as well to let him run himself out. He succeeded in showing that the documents which he read, and which he said in the first place belonged to a departmental file of public documents, were nothing more or less than private letters stolen from the office of Mr. Leach in Brandon, some of them being even marked private. Imagine a minister of the Crown, who aspires to be master of this Administration—

Mr. ROGERS: I absolutely deny that I quoted from any documents that were stolen.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the minister deny that these documents, some of which were marked private, were on a private file?

Mr. ROGERS: They were not stolen.

Mr. MARTIN: I will have my own opinion about that. Will the hon. minister tell us how he got them?

Mr. ROGERS: They came from the officers of the department.

Mr. OLIVER: What officers?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Stephenson.

Mr. MARTIN: If the Minister of Public Works is content to belittle the proceedings of this House by quoting from private documents and correspondence, I will leave him to take the consequences of the quandary in which he finds himself. I said a few moments ago that the Minister has been unable to even defend this steal—for it is nothing more or less than a steal. Imagine one hundred thousand dollars worth of property, situated within the limits of Prince Albert, being given to a Conservative whip in the Saskatchewan legislature for $10. I wonder what some of the hon. gentlemen in this House who represent constituencies in the province of Ontario would think if the corner of his town occupied by the post office were allowed to be homesteaded. I propose to prove, by a statutory declaration, that at the time this entry was granted to this man Donaldson, the property was assessed on the assessment roll of the city of Prince Albert at $80,000. I care not what it is worth to-day, but, as I say, in the year 1912 it was assessed at $80,000, and I can prove that at that time it was worth $130,000. What will the homesteaders of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba think of such a condition of affairs? From my knowledge of the location of this homestead, I say there is not a man in this House who will, if he is acquainted with the facts in connection with this nefarious transaction, get up and defend for one moment the granting of $100,000 worth of property to any person for the sum of $10.

The Minister of Public Works went to the city of Regina not many months ago, and at a banquet held in the month of June, 1912, the greater part of his address was devoted to his apparent interest in the settlers—homesteads for the settlers; and yet two months before that he had allowed $100,000 worth of property, situated within the city limits of Prince Albert, to be homesteaded, and the Dominion Lands Act prostituted for the benefit of a speculator in the city of Prince Albert. I would suggest that the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), who took part in an election contest some years ago in the West, should take his little lantern and go to western Canada.

The Minister of Public Works has said that the agent followed the precedent of 1908. Many of the members on both sides of this House have speculated in lands in western Canada, and we all know that to compare land values in 1908 with the land values in 1912 is absolutely absurd. I can show you land near the city of Regina which in 1908 was sold at $50 an acre, and which could not now be bought for less than two or three thousand dollars an acre. The same conditions exist in Saskatoon, Moosejaw and Alberta, and all the important cities of western Canada. But the Minister of Public Works says that the agent, when this entry was put through, had before him the precedent of 1908. Imagine the absurdity of such an argument. I believe that instructions were sent to McKechnie, the land agent at that time, by some official in the employ of this Government, acting under the instructions of the Minister of Public Works, to grant an entry for this piece of land.

Mr. ROGERS: I absolutely deny that.

Mr. MARTIN: I recognize that the minister has already denied that, but the minister has also denied that he knew anything about this proposal at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules of the House, when an hon. member makes a denial, the hon. gentleman should accept it.

Mr. MARTIN: I have accepted his denial.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member did so rather ungraciously, and in such a manner as to intimate that, while accepting it, he did not believe it.

Mr. MARTIN: Do you wish me, Mr. Speaker, to make any further statement in regard to the matter?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am satisfied, so long as it is accepted.

Mr. MARTIN: We will see if the hon. minister accepts it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood me—not that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) accepts, but that the hon. member speaking accepts the denial of the hon. minister.

Mr. MARTIN: The rule of course, compels me to accept his denial, and I think I have made myself plain in regard to that. The Minister of Public Works has also made a statement concerning the regulations, and has made a good deal of fun of the argument in regard to regulations, made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) I shall have occasion to refer to that further, but in the meantime, I would draw attention to this: if there is any virtue in regulations, I have in my hand the regulations of the Department of the Interior when the late Liberal Government went out of office and when the department was in charge of the hon. member for Edmonton. These regulations make a pamphlet of thirty-nine pages referring to homestead entries in western Canada. And my experience with regard to administration of homestead entries for western Canada has been that we were always compelled to live up to that book of regulations. But what is the position of affairs to-day, when the Minister of Public Works has had charge of the Department of the Interior? I find that he had no regulations—he put out of business the regulations that there were. There is a small pamphlet of four or five pages covering practically a dozen rules affecting homestead entries. And why this change? Because the Minister of Public Works and his followers want to be free to play fast and loose with the natural resources of western Canada which the present Prime Minister promised faithfully, before the last election, to restore to the people of the province of Saskatchewan and the province of Alberta immediately if he was returned to power.

Now, let me run over the facts in connection with this case. I find on examining the file in connection with the matter that for a period of the last six years there was apparently no correspondence and nothing done at all with respect to this quarter section of land—from July, 1906, to February 14, 1912. And what is the first letter that appears at the expiration of these six years? It is a letter addressed by Mr. S. J. Donaldson, the Conservative whip in the Saskatchewan legislature, to the Minister of Public Works. He says:

Dear Mr. Rogers:—

Referring to our conversation at Winnipeg in regard to the southeast quarter of section 7, township 49, range 26, west 2nd and 90 acres—

It should read seventy acres.

—contained in the southeast quarter of section 8 in the same township and range, as I have the script on hand, I would be glad if you would give me the necessary permission to apply it on the above parcels of land, I enclose map showing the land in question.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) S. J. Donaldson.

Hon. Robert Rogers,
Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa.

Now, that letter shows that Mr. S. J. Donaldson did discuss this question with the Minister of Public Works in Winnipeg —likely in the Royal Alexandra—and also that this letter was addressed to the hon. minister and was intended for him personally. 'Dear Mr. Rogers,' seems to me a rather familiar way to address the Minister of Public Works. Now, I would like to ask a question. Does the Minister of Public Works intend to tell this House and the country that he did not have any conversation with Mr. Donaldson and that he has no recollection whatever of receiving that letter to which I have referred.

Mr. ROGERS: Not the slightest.

Mr. MARTIN: Does he remember meeting Mr. Donaldson in Winnipeg?

An hon. MEMBER: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTIN: Let me tell the hon. member for Ontario that I intend to make my own speech. Did I understand the minister to answer that question? Did he say he had no conversation with Mr. Donaldson——

Mr. ROGERS: I did not say so; I may have had.

Mr. MARTIN: We get that admission from the minister; a little while ago he denied having had any conversation with Mr. Donaldson in the city of Winnipeg; now he says he may have had. I believe that the majority in this House and the people in the province of Saskatchewan from which I come will believe that Mr. Donaldson did have a conversation with the Minister of Public Works with respect to this piece of land. It is a most peculiar thing that for six years this land lay at rest and this particular file in the department shows that in that time nothing was done, but that as soon as this letter was sent to the Minister of Public Works, then Minister of the Interior, by Mr. Donaldson, things began to move, and move pretty fast; because immediately this letter got into the department some instructions were sent from somewhere to the officials of the department to get busy and see if this land could be homesteaded, and if Mr. Donaldson could apply scrip on the land or not. Then there is a most peculiar situation in regard to the matter it appears to me. The letter was dated February 14, 1912. Early in March, 1912—the 4th of March—the matter had got as far as Mr. Coté who, I believe, is the chief of the patent branch. And I find a memorandum from Mr. Coté which reads as follows:

With reference to your memorandum of 27th ultimo hereunder respecting the application of S. J. Donaldson, to be allowed to apply scrip on the fractional S.E. ¼ of section 7, and the fractional S.W. ½ of section 8—

The land in question.

—in township 49, range 26, west of the second meridian, I beg to say that legal subdivisions 2 and 7 and 8 of the S.E. ½ of section 7 have been set aside as school lands while fractional legal subdivision 1 stands as a time sale patented to A. G. Stewart; the N. ½ of the fractional S.W. ¼ section 8, however, is vacant in the records of the department and there would appear to be no objection to the applicant applying scrip thereon, provided he is the first applicant and the land is vacant according to the records of the agent of the Dominion Lands at Prince Albert.

A small sketch is attached hereto showing the land applied for hatched green.

Chief of branch.

J. W. Greenway, Esq.,
Commissioner of Dominion Lands.

That shows that Mr. Côté, chief of the branch, when he said that the land might be scripped, said also that it should be posted or advertised in the usual way. Was it posted or advertised? I myself asked some questions in the House about this matter on the 6th of February last, and I will read those questions with their answers:

1. Was the north half of the southwest quarter of section 8, in township 49, range 26, west of the 2nd meridian, a part of a forest reserve?

The answer was:

1. No. It was included in land set aside by the department with the intention of having it form part of a forest reserve, but subsequently this parcel with others along the southern boundary of the proposed reserve were found to be good agricultural lands and were withdrawn prior to the establishment of the reserve.

The second question and answer were as follows:

2. If so, was it ever made available for homestead entry, and on what date was it made so available?

2. Yes; March, 1909.

There is not a tittle of evidence on any of the files brought down by the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of the Interior to show that this land was ever thrown open to entry. The answer to my first question on February 6 says that it was withheld from entry. What are the rules that were in force on April 12 with respect to land of this class that was withheld from entry for any purpose? The rule was that it must be posted. The hon. Minister of Public Works does not care much for rules, as I have shown——

Mr. OLIVER: Closure rules.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, he favours closure rules. I have a copy of the rules and regulations of the department, of 1910, which constitute the last revision of the rules until the present Minister of Public Works abolished the rules and regulations altogether, and at page 12 I find the following:

Lands which have been under reservation for any purpose or have been in a timber belt or under lease, which become available to the first eligible occupant at the counter must be first posted for at least ten clear days.

The third part of the question which I asked on February 6, had reference to the posting:

3. Was any notice that the land was available for homestead entry given to the public? If so, what notice was given, and what was the nature of such notice?

To that the minister replied: No.

I submit that in granting this entry, whoever was responsible for it, a direct violation of the rules and regulations of the department, having the force of law according to the Dominion Lands Act, was committed and the Minister of Public Works this evening simply admitted that the whole thing was absolutely wrong and that if he had known anything about it he would have stopped it. I would like to see the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) get up and defend his action in connection with the homesteading of a city property in the middle of the city of Prince Albert. Let me say to the Minister of Public Works that this whole question did not become a scandal in the province of Saskatchewan within the past two months. It did become a scandal during May and June of last year. It was whispered all throughout the province that S. J. Donaldson had been presented with a city block in the city of Prince Albert under the guise of a homestead for $10. It was a public scandal and if it did not come to the notice of the Minister of Public Works when he was Minister of the Interior it is most peculiar. Let me point out to the minister that the fact that the man was allowed to apply scrip to the payment of the land, if his entry for the land could be shown to be improper, would not prevent the department taking action to cancel that particular patent. I have seen many actions brought for the cancellation of patents for homesteads in western Canada and I venture to say that the Minister of Public Works, who was then Minister of the Interior has seen such cases. I have seen cases brought in the Exchequer Court for the cancellation of patents. All the Minister of the Interior has to do to-day is to say to Donaldson: You got that land contrary to the regulations, without my knowledge, some official is to blame for it; it is an illegal entry for that homestead and you have been allowed to apply scrip on it; we will give you back your scrip, give us back the land. If S. J. Donaldson refuses to give back to the minister or to the people of Canada that homestead within the city limits of the city of Prince Albert, the minister can file a caveat for the cancellation of the patent and commence an action in the Exchequer Court and I venture to say that the Crown will succeed in recovering the land for the Dominion of Canada.

I have heard in this House and I have read in 'Hansard' some years ago speeches made by hon. members opposite, then in opposition, demanding restitution from people who had apparently got some land or timber limits, according to their interpretation of the law, in an improper manner. I say to the Prime Minister and to the Government that if ever there was a case where restitution should be made to the people of Canada and of western Canada in particular this Donaldson homestead in Prince Albert is the case.

I would not use very strong language but it is nothing more or less than highway robbery of the natural resources of the people of Saskatchewan. For $10 this man is allowed to go to the Dominion Lands office in Prince Albert and homestead a piece of property which he subsequently sells for $100,000 but which was assessed at the time he made entry for $80,000.

Let me say further that this whole proposition constituted a prostitution of the Dominion Lands Act. The Minister of Public Works knows full well, having been Minister of the Interior, that the Dominion Lands Act only applies to agricultural lands. I am well aware that in 1907 or in 1908 there seems to have been placed on one of the files some report to the effect that these lands were fit for agricultural purposes. The information I have been able to get in connection with the matter does not bear out that contention at all. I have here a declaration, which I shall read, to the effect that this is not agricultural land, never was agricultural land, and is only valuable for subdivision purposes, and apparently is a high-class residential district in Prince Albert. Let me read what appears in the Prince Albert Times. Someone will say that this is a Liberal newspaper. So it is, but the Conservative paper in Prince Albert has never raised one little finger to defend the transaction in connection with that homestead in Prince Albert. This paper tells of the location and value of this property:

The property in question is the north half of the southwest quarter of section eight, township 49, range 26, west of the second meridian. It lies well within the city limits and is already bounded to the north by the Park Hill subdivision in which all lots near it are now fetching $400 a piece, to the east by the Hazeldell subdivision while on the south is Riverside Drive which are fetching a still larger figure. To the west of it the city limit stretch over a mile, to the north half a mile, while the three miles east of it are within Prince Albert's boundary. The property is within about fifteen minutes walk of the city hall.

A little further on in the same article the paper says:

Although Hon. Dr. Roche is reported to have stated in the House, in answer to a query of the member for Regina that the tract in question was found to be 'good agricultural land,' it is low lying, in bad need of draining and covered with a scrubby second growth of jackpine.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is quite out of order in quoting any paper or document from the outside world criticizing or contradicting any statement made in this House by a member in connection with the business of the House.

Mr. MARTIN: I have no particular desire to read it.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What rule is that?

Mr. SPEAKER: Bourinot says at page 459:

It is also irregular to read extracts from newspapers or documents referring to debates in the House in the same session.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is not referring to a debate of this session.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not referring to answers given by the Hon. Dr. Roche in this House and endeavouring to contradict the correctness of a statement made in this House in the present session.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This newspaper does not refer to the answer of Dr. Roche.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes it does.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, what the hon. member is quoting from now is a statement that these are not agricultural lands and that is all and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works did not say that they were agricultural lands. He has not criticized the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is certainly referring to a statement made in this House during the present session and criticizing it and the rule in every particular is contravened by the reading of the article.

Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications, whether printed or written, emanating from persons outside of the House, referring to or commenting on or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the House.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not read this extract with a view of criticizing the answer made by the Hon. Dr. Roche; I am prepared to take his answer as correct. As a matter of fact I am taking his statement as correct. Then do I understand Mr. Speaker, that I cannot refer to this?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot quote from a newspaper referring to what took place in this House during the present session. I may say with reference to the quotations which he made that at first it seemed to me that they were quite irrelevant to the case, that they had regard to the land outside of the property in question, but when he touched the question that had been before the House I thought it time to interfere.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood the quotation from a newspaper to be merely the evidence which my hon. friend desired to place before the House as to the statement he made that the land was not agricultural land.

Mr. SPEAKER: It referred expressly to the answer made by the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) and therefore to what took place in this House during the present session.

Mr. MARTIN: There was a statement read this afternoon either by my hon. friend the member for Edmonton, or by the Minister of Public Works referring to a report of Campbell, a forest inspector, back in 1907 or 1908, which stated that this land was practically fit for agricultural purposes. I submit that I can proceed to confute that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: A statement made in 1907 or 1908 cannot refer to anything that took place in the House during the current session.

Mr. MARTIN: Putting aside this newspaper altogether, I want to say with respect to the matter that notwithstanding the fact that Campbell, a forest inspector, came to the conclusion that a portion of this land was practically fit for agricultural purposes. I know of my own personal knowledge that it is not fit for agricultural purposes, and I think the hon. member for Prince Albert will bear me out when I say that it is not agricultural land at all.

Mr. CROTHERS: I understood from the documents that have been read here that this land was withdrawn from the forest reserve because it was agricultural land. If not, I would like my hon. friend to tell me why, when the new forest reserve was being constituted, these lands were left out. If they were not agricultural lands, why was part of them given to this man Everett in 1908 for agricultural purposes?

Mr. MARTIN: I will answer the hon. Minister of Labour in this way. There is absolutely no evidence on the file in any shape or form to indicate that this land was ever withdrawn from the present forest reserve.

Mr. CROTHERS: From the original forest reserve.

Mr. MARTIN: Or, from the original forest reserve.

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. MARTIN: The Minister of the Interior stated in February, 1912, that it was withheld from settlement, and therefore it could never have been thrown open in 1909 or 1912; it could never be properly thrown open until it was advertised according to the regulations, which was never done. I presume the Minister of Public Works will admit that. It was never properly thrown open for homestead entry, the files show that, and the answer made by the Minister of the Interior on February 6, was that the land had not been posted in accordance with the regulations. I say that this man Donaldson got entry to this land improperly and illegally. If the Government, with the Prime Minister at its head, and the Minister of Public Works, who to-day has assumed the role of protector of the natural resources of western Canada, will look into this question and ask Mr. Donaldson to make restitution to the people of western Canada, they will show the people of Canada and the members of this House that they are anxious to preserve the natural resources for the benefit of the people and not for the benefit of party heelers who reside in Saskatchewan and different parts of western Canada. I have a declaration here which I want to put on record. I may say it does not refer to any ministers of the Crown or to any past proceedings in this House.

Canada, Province of Saskatchewan, to Wit:
In the matter of a certain homestead, within the limits of the city of Prince Albert, entered for by Arthur Donaldson, son of S. J. Donaldson, and subsequently transferred to the said S. J. Donaldson, being the north half of southwest quarter of section 8, township 49, range 26, west of the 2nd meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan.

I, Samuel McLeod of the city of Prince Albert in the province of Saskatchewan, real estate agent, do solemnly declare:

1. That the above described land is situated within the limits of the city of Prince Albert and was so situated at the time of the above mentioned homestead entry.

2. The assessed value of the said land as appears by the city assessor's books is $80,000.

3. The above described land is not fit for agricultural purposes and would be valueless as a farm, but is extremely valuable for subdivision purposes and is estimated to be worth at the present time $125,000.

4. No advertisement that the said land was open for homestead entry has appeared in any of the local papers or has the said land been advertised by public notice in the Dominion lands office, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

5. I am informed and believe that J. S. Fowlie and Silas A. Milligan applied for a homestead entry on this land and were informed by the Dominion lands agent that the same was not open for entry.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me at the city of Prince Albert, in the province of Saskatchewan, this 3rd day of March, A.D., 1913.

F. W. Halliday,
Commissioner for oaths in and for the province of Saskatchewan.

(Sgd.) S. McLeod.

Now apart from the fact that that declaration shows that it is not agricultural land and, therefore, that it does not come under the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act; apart also from the fact that it shows that the assessed value was $80,000 and that the actual market value was $125,000; and apart further from the fact that I have a letter from a prominent citizen of Prince Albert stating that he knows that Donaldson sold this land some time ago for $100,000—I do not know anything about the telegram which the hon. member for Edmonton got, and it does not make very much difference—what the people are asking is what was the value of the land when this entry was made in 1912, I wish to point out that other men in the city of Prince Albert had inquired at the Dominion lands office about this particular piece of land, and had been told that it was not available for entry. I also find that a man named Fowlie wrote a letter in which he stated that while he had had no interview with the Minister of the Interior at Ottawa, he had had interviews with officials of the Department of the Interior, and had been told that there was no land available for homestead entry north of the Saskatchewan river. A number of those people in Prince Albert, if rumour has it correctly, applied to the Dominion lands office and to the Department of the Interior and were informed that there was no land available for entry. Does it not appear suspicious that a man occupying the position of Mr. S. J. Donaldson should be allowed to make that entry without any posting in accordance with the regulations?

I do not want to draw conclusions or inferences, if I did I could say some very unparliamentary things in connection with this particular transaction. I believe the whole transaction was nefarious from top to bottom. It was born in iniquity. It was born when Mr. S. J. Donaldson met the Minister of Public Works, then the Minister of the Interior, in the Royal Alexandra hotel in the city of Winnipeg. The next step was when Mr. S. J. Donaldson, wrote a letter to the Minister of the Interior, now the Minister of Public Works. The minister says he knew nothing about it, but his private secretary has written no less than three or four letters or memoranda with respect to this particular transaction. The minister may say that that was after the entry was made. It is true, according to the files, that that was after the entry was made, but the fact remains that while the application was being made for the scrip of this land, and the negotiations were going on over a period of three or four months all the memoranda on file came from the minister's office in the building situated in front of the parliament buildings in Ottawa and were signed by G. F. B., then private secretary for the Minister of the Interior, now the Minister of Public Works. I am not going to take up time by referring to these three or four or five letters. I have some of them here. But, there always seemed to be a great rush about this matter. They could not take time to consider it. This man had to have his land and he had to get it right away. I find on the files no less than three letters sent by the minister's private secretary instructing the officials of the Department of the Interior to hurry up this application for scrip so as to allow this man Donaldson to apply the scrip and get the patent for his land. A most peculiar thing is that there is nothing on the files to help us at all. I would not like to say that these files had been stripped but they appear at least to have been stripped before they were brought down to this House. It is a most peculiar circumstance that, although during six years prior to this transaction, a great deal of interest must have been taken in this particular piece of property, no correspondence appears on the file from anybody wishing to know whether this land was to be retained as part of the reserve or whether it was to be thrown open to entry.

What should the Government have done in connection with this piece of land? We know that the practice that has been followed where lands are particularly valuable has been to transfer them to the school lands branch. If the Government did not want to do that they could have sold this land at public auction to the highest bidder, if they must part with it. We used to hear some hon. members, whom I see before me now, waxing most eloquent in the contention that all public land and timber rights should be sold at public auction to the highest bidder. Here is a case where a strong party heeler in Saskatchewan practically robs the people of the country. I will not say that the minister has robbed the people, but I will say that Donaldson has robbed the people of $100,000 worth of property. That property would have brought $100,000 if it had been publicly offered for sale; it would at least have brought $80,000 if put on the market last year. If the Government did not want to sell the land to the highest bidder they might have transferred it to the school land branch and thereby increased the school grant by that amount or, if they did not want to transfer it to the school lands branch, they might have presented it to the city of Prince Albert to be used as a public park. There was a movement in the city of Prince Albert on the part of some of the business men there to get this land from the Government for park purposes two or three years ago. I may not be correct in that statement but it was so rumoured.

I can give an instance of what was done with valuable public land adjoining cities in western Canada during the time of the late Liberal Administration. There was a piece of land, 186 acres in extent, adjoining the city limits of Regina. Efforts were made on two or three occasions in 1903, 1904 and 1905 to get that land for homestead purposes. The land at that time would not have brought more than $40 or $50 per acre if put on the market as farm land. The Department of the Interior, both under Mr. Sifton and my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), absolutely refused to allow that land to be used for homestead purposes because they said it was too valuable to be homesteaded. About 1906, or 1907, the city of Regina was presented with the land by the late Dominion Government and the assets and borrowing powers of the city have been increased to the extent of the value of that property. That is what the Government might have done in connection with this piece of property at Prince Albert. They might have presented it to Prince Albert to be used for park purposes or for any other purpose to which Prince Albert desired to put it.

To put this matter in the mildest possible form, the transaction was brought about by an abuse of the homestead regulations. The entry for the homestead and the scripping of it constituted an illegal and improper transaction the result of which is that one man in Saskatchewan obtained a fortune at the expense of the whole Dominion. Let the Government investigate this matter and see if it is not a proper case for restitution to the people of Canada.

Mr. J .D. TAYLOR (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I think that those of us who have followed the course of this debate will agree with me in the conclusion that this mouse so painfully brought forward by the Liberal mountain in labour has a very long tail, and a very piercing squeal for a very attenuated body. The substance of the complaint of these hon. gentlemen seems to be that a ripe plum, neglected on the public tree, has fallen off after the general election instead of before. After the illuminating addresses we have had this evening it seems to me that these hon. gentlemen ought to be thankful for that rule in this House to which, if I may be permitted a word of reference, they so strongly objected during the past week —that is the previous question—because, as we know, a motion in amendment to the motion to go into the Committee of Supply is only another form of the previous question in that it also prevents any possibility of an amendment to the amendment itself. Otherwise I would be glad to take the responsibility of moving, for reasons much stronger than any that have been given here to-day, to substitute for the name and description of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) the name and description of his predecessor in the office of Minister of the Interior, and so substituted, I feel quite sure that both in the House and in the country there would be a chorus of approval of the suggestion of censure.

Now, to deal for a few moments with our animated friend the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin), I would like to say to him that he appears to know very little indeed about the history, the reputation and the practice of the gentlemen with whom he has been associated. That hon. member worked himself almost into a frenzy because letters which he was pleased to describe as stolen, which he modified in his further description to merely private, had been read to this House and he said that the minister who read them would be held up to public scorn because he had made this use of private letters. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the use of private letters—the theft of private letters —constitutes the very beginning of his party, the very soul and substance of his party, and that if there are no recent records to which to refer of this use of private documents, it is only because, unfortunately for the country, the Liberal party were in power so long that the incidents have in large measure been forgotten, since necessarily private letters are from the files of their opponents. But if the hon. gentleman wished to revise his opinion of his colleagues and to take back the harsh criticisms that he offered upon hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House, for using the material which the gods had provided for them on the files at Brandon, I would refer him to the sessional papers of 1897, which he will find fairly bristling with communications marked 'private' abstracted from the files of the Post Office Department by the Postmaster General of that day at the birth of the late Liberal Administration. They were not in regard to matters of serious moment like this attempted theft of 160,000,000 feet of the finest timber in British Columbia, but abstracted from the files of the Post Office Department and spread before this House, simply to cause a little local confusion amongst the neighbours of members of the House who had interested themselves in mail contracts. These private letters printed because there were little personal references in them which might be embarrassing to the writers of the letters, but which could have no concern whatever, and certainly no injurious concern to the public, were spread before the country in the sessional papers by the very gentlemen with whom the hon. member (Mr. Martin) has been associating all these years.

I would like to offer to that hon. gentleman another short chapter from the history of his party; from the history of one of his leaders, perpetuated by another of his leaders who succeeded him in the office of Minister of the Interior, and justified in this House by the Liberal majority on many occasions. I refer to the practice of the department in dealing with possible townsites. This matter came up in connection, not with a piece of land obtained by accident as this piece of land at Prince Albert appears to have been obtained, but the discussion arose over an incident of a most deliberate nature.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Happy accident.

Mr. TAYLOR: Hear, hear, says the ex-minister (Mr. Pugsley) with great unction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I said was that it was a very happy accident.

Mr. TAYLOR: A very happy accident indeed for the beneficiaries of the townsite of Blairmore, to which I am referring. The Liberal Government of that day wilfully and wantonly disturbed a large number of settlers on that townsite and robbed them of their whole possession, for the purpose of illegally bestowing that townsite upon a party favourite; a townsite worth then from $100,000 to $200,000 as appears by the sworn evidence in the trial of the case which followed on this transaction. In the Blairmore townsite case the late Government ousted the settlers and gave the land to their party favourite, and upon their being challenged and taken into court, the Minister of the Interior of that day wrote to the Solicitor General for his guidance in the conduct of the case. This letter appears in 'Hansard' of April 12, 1907, page 6595. Mr. Sifton was Minister of the Interior and the letter of instruction to the Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick, says:

> The Crown does not attempt to sell lands which have an artificial value, by reason of being valuable for town sites or for any similar reason at the highest price obtainable, and the whole experience of the department, both under the late administration and under the present administration proves conclusively that an attempt to hold land from sale and settlement, under ordinary terms and prices, with the object of selling particular parcels at higher prices, would result in trouble and expense which would more than counterbalance increased receipts and would cause a great deal of trouble and irritation.

Again on the suggestion that the Government having ascertained the extraordinary value of the land should make a cancellation, the same Minister of the Interior writes:

> Under the circumstances it appears to me that the proper course to pursue is to bring the matter before the judge and ask to have the case disposed of. The statement should be made that the Crown has no desire to ask for the cancellation of the patent on the ground of the inadequacy of price, because everything relating to the price was thoroughly well known when the sale was made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to agree with the opinion of the former Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) as to the procedure to be adopted in the case of lands adjoining towns, I simply quote the letter to show what was the recognized practice of the Interior Department, and further to show that the late Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), who made this charge in the House this afternoon, was fully conversant with that practice because it had been strongly brought home to him in the discussion of this Blairmore outrage. And further, that during the whole six years of his tenure of office as Minister of the Interior, he made no attempt whatever to lay down any other policy with respect to dealing with land adjoining town sites, or to protect the public in any way from loss such as that he complains of as having occurred with respect to land which might have been sold for townsite purposes, being disposed of under ordinary conditions.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand my hon. friend to be alluding to me?

Mr. TAYLOR: Yes Sir.

Mr. OLIVER: He says that I did not enter upon any policy for the disposal of land that had become valuable on account of its proximity to townsites?

Mr. TAYLOR: That is my understanding.

Mr. OLIVER: I can only say that my hon. friend is decidedly wrong. I tried to explain to the House to-day what the policy was, and proved it by the action of the Government in regard to the very adjoining quarter section to this Donaldson homestead.

Mr. TAYLOR: Then the position is worse than ever for the hon. gentleman, for he did realize the danger; he did know what ought to be done with this townsite and he did allow it to remain in the perilous position in which it was found; not reserved by any law at all, but reserved by the personal instructions of the minister; the mere personal order of the minister which has no force and effect at all except between that minister and his subordinates, and of which no future minister could possibly have any record or knowledge, or be bound by in any way. I think that is absolutely clear, and therefore if there is anyone censurable at all for what happened to this eighty acres near the town of Prince Albert, it is the late Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), who proceeded to allow that to remain reserved only under his personal order, as I heard read from the evidence produced in this House to-day.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, but I explained to the House that the reservation was not made by me nor by my immediate predecessor, but by the last Minister of the Interior of the Conservative Government in 1896.

Mr. TAYLOR: Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the information he has given, but I would call his attention to the fact that it does not differ in the slightest degree from anything I have said. I remember perfectly his statement made to the House this afternoon and also remember the statement made later by an official of the department that this reservation was on the personal word of the minister only and required no process whatever to disappear.

Mr. OLIVER: Except the order of the minister?

Mr. TAYLOR: Except the order of the minister who fifteen years before had gone out of office and possibly was dead.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. member surely will not be so absurd as that. The reservation is made by order of the minister and the letter of the officer of the department which was sane, informed whoever was inquiring that the reservation remained until removed by the order of the minister.

Mr. TAYLOR: Precisely; here was an exceptionally rich plot, reserved for some person not by an Order in Council, which would have to be brought before the colleagues of the hon. gentleman to be cancelled, but kept under the personal control of the minister, so that at any moment that reserve could be lifted without any record at all of its having been recalled or having existed. That was the position in which this hon. gentleman chose to leave this valuable land at Prince Albert when he so unexpectedly went out of office.

Mr. OLIVER: That apparently is the position in which my hon. friend found it.

Mr. TAYLOR: I am obliged for this further contribution to the debate, but I do not think it adds anything to the substance of it. The hon. member for Regina ventured upon an inference. He drew the inference that something must have happened to put this land in motion. Let me suggest an inference, which I think is much more reasonable, and which will appeal to those who know the sentiments that have prevailed and the creed that has been accepted by the Department of the Interior in late years. It seems to me—and I am fortified in this impression by the fact that one of the favourite occupations at Prince Albert seems to have been applying for entry upon this piece of land, as we have had affidavits and statements that this citizen and that citizen applied at different times for entry—that it is quite plain that there was no knowledge of any binding reservation; so the boys kept constantly coming up and asking for permission to go on this land.

Mr. OLIVER: If there was no reservation, how was it that the boys did not get the land?

Mr. TAYLOR: If I must answer the question—I suppose the right boys did not go to the minister. If we are to deal with inferences, such as those with which my hon. friend from Regina has been concerned, it is a fair inference that, if these boys applied for the land as often as we have been told to-night, it would be borne in upon the agent at Prince Albert, that here was a ripe plum ready to drop into some lap, and that at the proper time, when he found that a change of government had occurred, it would be quite reasonable if he were casually to mention to some good citizen the fact that here is a piece of land against which there is no reservation except the personal order of the minister, and it will be open to the first man who gets in his application for it. It seems to me that is the reasonable origin of the dual application for this land at Prince Albert. What would the hon. ex-minister or the hon. member for Regina do in such a case? The complaint which they have made to us of most serious irregularity is that this was not advertised for ten days. To what effect? That it might be made eligible to the first man who appeared at the counter and made his entry. The whole gist of this accusation is that, after all, the wrong boy did get this piece of land, while the country suffered nothing, because under the ex-minister's procedure, the country would have obtained nothing more than the $10. Both the ex-minister and the hon. member for Regina made the complaint that this should have been advertised to give every person a chance to come up there and take it, although in any case the payment to the country would not be more than $10.

We heard something from the member for Regina about taking a lantern and going west to see what was done under the late Government with the land there. If the hon. member had not left the Chamber, I would tell him that I could give him some information, which seemingly would be of great value to him, that again he has utterly failed to appreciate the habits of his associates; that you do not need a lantern, in the particular part of the west from which I come, to see what has been done with the Government's land there; that you would not find them advertised even for ten days, and to be awarded to the first man at the counter; that you would not find any desire at all to protect the public interest; that none of the noble sentiments given utterance to by the ex-Minister of the Interior this afternoon have been carried out in British Columbia. Take a case which I have in mind in the city of New Westminster. The late Government expelled from the ground on which the end of the splendid provincial bridge rests, a settler who had been on the land for fifty years—a worthy fisherman — so anxious were they to obtain possession of it. They did not put him off—they dispossessed him of fifty acres out of fifty-five, which had been part of his heritage from his father on the ground that as it had been a military reserve when his father went on it, the land was not properly open to entry at that time. They did not put him off, however, in order to secure a large revenue from the public in respect of that very valuable land. One would think, to hear these gentlemen speak this afternoon, that they had nothing else in their minds except to get from the public every dollar they could for the land of which they disposed. But the boys came along and cast covetous eyes on the property, and made a deal with the Government at Ottawa to take from this poor fisherman, who had been born on the property, and had lived on it for fifty years, fifty acres of that most valuable land—land now worth two or possibly five thousand dollars an acre—and give it to Mr. T. W. Paterson, a millionaire contractor of the city of Victoria. But they did not have the courage to make a straight gift. They held a fake auction, as the means of transfer, in the land agent's room on Saturday afternoon, when the office was supposed to be closed, exhibiting there a map upon which there appeared in large letters across this piece of land: 'proposed to be sold to T. W. Paterson.' This happy boy, who got in that time and got his little plum, had some local connection at Ottawa, where he was fortunate enough to be a son-in-law of a member of the other House. We had another land transaction out there—6,800 acres this time, on the Canadian Pacific railway, and on the Pitt river. This is as fine a piece of land as there is in British Columbia—land for agricultural purposes alone worth anywhere from $500 to $800 an acre, as well as being very valuable for industrial and settlement purposes. That land was disposed of not by public auction, or even after ten days' notice, but it was handed over by the late Minister of the Interior—the very gentleman who so eloquently addressed the House this afternoon on the iniquity of this transaction—at $1.50 an acre.

This was supplemented by two pages of pretentious matter in the Canada Gazette stating the precise manner in which these lucky gentlemen were to dyke their land, the whole iving it the pretense of a great reclamation scheme—and this in a district where all lands are dyked and where the dyking follows as naturally as the making of roads. That transaction meant to these favorites easily $1,500,000, and through inquiry into it, I find that that land was distributed over the official heelers in three ridings in British Columbia. It was divided into eighteen parts, so that eighteen of the boys might have a hand in it—eighteen of the boys headed by our old friend Bob Kelly, with whose name this House echoed at one time. I think I need not give further samples to show the member for Regina that it is not necessary to take a lantern to go out to the West to find how the members of the late Government disposed of lands.

The cold-storage treatment seems to have had quite an effect on the ex-Minister of the Interior. In some respects it has improved him, if I may say so without offence, by toning him down, for I have heard him more vigorous than he was this afternoon. In other respects, it seems to have spoiled him by giving him a contrary disposition he did not always possess. For instance, a few years ago, he was indignant that any person should come here and put forward charges, founded or unfounded, against a minister of the Crown. He thought it was a horrible thing to do. One could hardly believe that the hon. gentleman who so carelessly launched this trivial charge today upon which he asks the censure and the disappearance of a minister of the Crown was the same gentleman who so feelingly and almost tearfully made these remarks to the House in 1907. I quote from 'Hansard,' page 6570:

> We have no protection against their shout of scandal from their benches here and from their press throughout the country, a campaign, I say, directly and essentially intended to hurt this country, to retard the prosperity of this country more than it can possibly hurt any individual or political party in the country. If the Government can be discredited by that campaign the country is discredited by the same campaign, and the wheels of progress are retarded by the gentlemen who are here in their places in this House for the purpose, if for any purpose, of pushing the country forward and helping the Government and not of hindering it in securing or forwarding the welfare and prosperity of the people.

Quite eloquent; quite worthy of a minister of the Crown. But what a contrast to the suggestions, the accusations of the hon. gentleman this afternoon. The ex-minister dealt in inferences, like his follower from Regina. He 'presumed' that some one had made judicious inquiry as to whether there was something good that might be picked up. He suggested that someone had a pull with the minister; and by contrast he declared that he himself had a well-defined policy for dealing with such cases. What was the hon. gentleman's policy when dealing with such cases? Can the ex-minister say that he ever indicated any policy which would give land or other property of the Government to the public without favouritism to members of his political party?

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. member has asked me the question, and I will say, most undoubtedly, and at no time during my administration of the Department of the Interior did any other policy prevail or was any other principle followed so far as my authority extended.

Mr. TAYLOR: The hon. gentleman says, in all seriousness, that favouritism at no time prevailed in his department, that everybody had a square deal there.

Mr. OLIVER: So far as my knowledge went and so far as my authority extended, the policy was declared and the principle acted upon.

Mr. TAYLOR: And the ex-Minister of the Interior and his supporters know of no instances where money was paid because of friendly acts of the department?

Mr. OLIVER: What does the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. TAYLOR: I ask if the ex-minister knows of any instances in which money was paid for recognition of the offices of the department in connection with the public domain?

Mr. OLIVER: I have no knowledge of such instances. Has my hon. friend such knowledge of any case? If he has, now would be a good opportunity to state it.

Mr. TAYLOR: I do not know whether or not I have knowledge of any; I have only the ex-minister's word. I have his word given in 1911, I have his conflicting word to-night. I am bound to accept the ex-minister's word—but which word? Standing in this House on the 3rd of May, 1911, the then Minister of the Interior, the hon. gentleman who made these charges in this House this afternoon, laid down a splendid ideal for the conduct of a department disposing of the public domain, for the permanent officials of the department, an ideal for the public men who might succeed him in office and for the members of Parliament their supporters. Speaking in this House on a memorable occasion, and endeavouring to make it plain that a sum of money not yet explained in detail was explainable without any sinister suggestions, that it might have come in in the natural course of events, just as waiters in a restaurant gather in tips and do not forcibly squeeze the public—addressing the House on that lofty plane, he said, as reported in 'Hansard' of 1911, page 8327:

I want to say to the House, what is within the knowledge of the members on both sides, that the transactions of the Interior Department during the six years that I have been at its head have been necessarily of such a character as to make possible the securing of contributions from day to day of large or small amounts. Everybody knows that.

Here there were several interruptions by hon. gentlemen which are not relevant to the question. Then the minister proceeded:

In that time there have been from day to day,——

Mark you, Mr. Speaker.

—from day to day, administrative acts involving values of large and small amounts which might be laid under contribution for political purposes or for any other purposes, either private or political.

Mr. OLIVER: If I might make a remark in connection with what my hon. friend has said I would draw your attention and that of the House to the fact that he has suggested that in those words I admitted that sums of money were paid. I made no such admission; on the occasion upon which I spoke I made an absolute denial and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He has not read that.

Mr. OLIVER: And if there is any question about the denial made then I want to be understood as absolutely making it now. But I want to say that my hon. friend has no warrant nor has any hon. member any warrant to draw the inference my hon. friend has dared to draw to-night.

Mr. TAYLOR: I have dared more than that in my time. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he will permit me a question. What did he deny then?

Mr. OLIVER: If I remember the incident there was a question before the House involving a suggestion that certain moneys had come to me because of transactions of the Department of the Interior. I was making allusion to that suggestion and if my memory is correct I conveyed with my statement a denial absolutely of any such suggestion and moved for a committee of inquiry by the House.

Mr. TAYLOR: This is a matter of record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR: I would commend to hon. gentlemen who say 'hear, hear,' the perusal of 'Hansard,' particularly of a small part I took in that debate and the question I put to the present Minister of the Interior, whether he would permit investigation of the source of $19,000 of that money and I suggested the source of it. The hon. gentleman in his answer did not deal with the money at all, but said that he challenged investigation into the merits of the transaction, that is whether Smith or Jones had the best right to have the property in question. I invite the perusal of the 'Hansard' to which I refer and I think I am safe in saying that there is no more explanation of that money than I have read to the House, no explanation there of what this means, if it means anything, except that it is certainly proper for a man having the custody of public property in the administration of a department to accept from his visitors on the occasion of their visits to his department such largesse as they care to give him.

Mr. OLIVER: I think my hon. friend is going pretty far. He says that this is a matter of 'Hansard.' He is quite aware that he is putting on 'Hansard' to-night certain statements which are certainly intended to be construed as of a very damaging character to myself. May I be permitted to give my friend's statement and the passage between my hon. friend and myself. I was speaking in regard to the question which I mentioned a little while ago. My hon. friend raised a question, I do not think he mentioned any sum of money or any incident. My reply, if I remember correctly, was that I did not know to what incident my hon. friend alluded, but that I was perfectly satisfied to have whatever incident it might be included within the scope of the proposed committee of inquiry.

Mr. TAYLOR: I will get the 'Hansard' so that we may see precisely what is there but, in the meantime, in the light of the explanation which we have had now, and which will help us to interpret these significant sentences, I would like to read them again:

I want to say to the House what is within the knowledge of the members of both sides that the transactions of the Interior Department, during the sixth years I have been at its head, have been necessarily of such a character as to make possible the securing of contributions from day to day of large or small amounts.

Now, mark the language of the Hon. Frank Oliver, the then Minister of the Interior:

To make possible the securing of contributions from day to day of large or small amounts.

That was not amounts of land or timber, it would only be amounts of money. If there was no money, as we must infer from the way in which the hon. gentleman challenges the meaning, what in the world did this mean?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems like obstruction, that is all.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. OLIVER: I would suggest that if my hon. friend is going to continue to read my remarks he should give to the House what they did mean and I am satisfied they did not mean, and the 'Hansard' will not show that they meant, what my hon. friend is attempting to convey to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR: Unfortunately 'Hansard,' while it is its own interpreter, does not put its interpretations in any plainer language than the original text. I do not want to read all of this but I think I shall read as much—

Mr. OLIVER: I would like the hon. gentleman to read sufficient of my remarks to convey the idea that I desired to convey. That would be fair.

Mr. TAYLOR: I shall endeavour to do that, I shall be just as fair as I can. The ex-Minister of the Interior, referring to this money, says at page 8326 of 'Hansard,' 1911:

As to what private transactions any person may have it is quite true that when an improper connection is established between these private transactions and public responsibility then the public have an interest and a serious interest, but as long as private transactions are private transactions, as long as they are not connected with public responsibilities, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that however public curiosity may be aroused, however public interest may be inflamed from other causes or in other ways, these matters are not in any degree in the same class or entitled to the same consideration as the discharge of public responsibilities.

Then he refers to the articles in the World and the Telegram respectively, and proceeds:

There was an insinuation, and a serious insinuation, which related to an important administrative act for which I was primarily responsible, and I think it is only right that the country should know and have the earliest opportunity of knowing, what foundation there was for that insinuation.

That has not happened yet, Mr. Speaker. He proceeds:

In regard to that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has suggested—he has been unkind enough to suggest—that the money which was deposited to my credit might have come from a thousand different source. He was perfectly correct in that. I want to say to the House, what is within the knowledge of the members on both sides, that the transactions of the Interior Department during the six years that I have been at its head have been necessarily of such a character as to make possible the securing of contributions from day to day of large or small amounts. Everybody knows that.

That, Mr. Speaker, was the first part of the passage from which I quoted, and I do not think that the text has made it any better for the ex-Minister of the Interior. Then the present Prime Minister interjected:

I would like to interrupt the minister for a moment. In the first place, I did not say a thousand. In the second place, I used the word 'hundred' without the slightest idea of making any insinuation or suggestion, but merely by way of argument. I do not want the minister to be under any misapprehension as to that. I was merely saying that if you select one particular source, you do not clear the whole matter up. I did not wish to make any insinuation or suggestion whatever as to matters of fact. I was using that argument only in the way of an illustration.

Mr. Oliver: I do not wish to press the point. I was only using it as an argument, too.

Mr. Borden (Halifax): I was making no insinuation.

Mr. Oliver: I do not wish to make any suggestion of that kind, but such a view might be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks.

So, you see he was practically drawing an inference himself at that time.

Mr. Borden (Halifax): I did not intend it.

Mr. Oliver: I very much appreciate the consideration of the hon. the leader of the Opposition in making that statement. But what I want to say is this.

Now, this is what he wants to say. He wants this to go down to history as his last official statement in connection with the appearance of that $50,000 which he has declined to explain, because that was the subject before the House. He wants this to go down to history because it is his statement in 'Hansard,' the proof of which had been read by himself. He proceeds:

But what I want to say is this. I have been at the head of the Interior Department for the last six years, and in that time there have been from day to day administrative acts involving values of large and small amounts which might be laid under contribution for political purposes or for any other purpose either private or political. Now, I want to say, so far as I am concerned, that, although the motion before the House has reference to a specific case, the only case with which my name has been specifically connected, I court inquiry, and the fullest inquiry, by parliamentary committee or otherwise, into any administrative act of mine of all the thousands that have taken place, and of all the millions of dollars of value that they have involved. I say I court the fullest inquiry into any or all those thousands of acts, in the House or in the committee or anywhere else; and I want the House distinctly to understand that as far as I am concerned, there is no restriction to the particular charge mentioned, because it was the only specific case in which my name was mentioned.

Although the administrative acts of his department might be laid under contribution for political purposes, or for any other purpose, private or political—that suggestion, made seriously by the minister as something that he wants to say—I read all the rest without observing any statement that in spite of all the opportunities no use was ever made of them. If no use was ever made of them, I ask the ex-minister why he confused us by mentioning it, because nobody else mentioned it. Therefore I think I am justified in the belief that he intended this House to believe that a very likely source of that $50,000 was free contributions from persons who happened in his department on business. That at least was what I understood him to mean, and after reading this carefully I see nothing else which can be taken from his statement. I think it ill becomes the ex-Minister of the Interior with the record of administration to which I have so briefly referred, and upon which this House has voted so often, to come before Parliament with nothing better than an insinuation that a piece of valuable property, which he left exposed to the first person who should ask for it, has fallen into private hands without the public getting the value of that piece of property. I say, in all seriousness, that the reflection is upon him for leaving the department in that case, rather than upon his successor in office. Further, we have to-night the answer of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition that he had personally signed and recommended the grant of 160,000,000 feet of timber to a party of political thugs. We have his answer that he signed it as a matter of routine, and that he had no knowledge that he was signing anything of the kind. Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary for me to say that I do not question for a moment the statement made to the House by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, but I would commend to the charity of hon. gentlemen opposite the statement of their own leader, and ask them if they do not suppose that the Minister of the Interior also signs documents as a matter of routine, and is not personally familiar with the descriptions of the various grants to which he gives his authority, and whether we are not justified in resisting this amendment because of our belief that in this, as well as in all other transactions of the department, that minister has acted honestly and in perfect good faith.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the fact that the speaker on the Government side following the Minister of Public Works in his defence is a member from the province of British Columbia who takes up the time of the House in discussing ancient history, and who fails to make any attempt at defence, so far as the case put up by this side of the House is concerned, is another evidence of the fine Italian hand of the hon. Minister of Public Works in the direction which he is seeking to give this discussion. You must have noticed, Sir, that in the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster, whom we are glad to hear once again after quite a considerable silence, and in the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), as my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Martin) said, there has been but the very slightest reference to the question before the House. I submit to you, Sir, in these days when the questions of rules and the application of rules is so much to the fore, that if you take the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works and that of the hon. member for New Westminster you will find that not five or ten per cent at the outside of their remarks was relevant to the resolution before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may not have in mind the particular occasion. There are two reasons why the discussion at this time may wander almost over any subject. When the motion is made for the Speaker to leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply the rule plainly states that there is no limit to the debate. Then, the other reason is that the motion of the Opposition is a motion of want of confidence in a minister of the Crown in connection with the administration of the public lands. Therefore, I would regard anything in connection with the administration of public lands as within the reasonable limits of a debate on this subject.

Mr. NEELY: Whether or not the discussion of these two hon. gentlemen has been within the parliamentary rule is a matter that does not concern me in the slightest. I hold the view that whether their remarks were within the rule or not, they certainly were not germane to the resolution before the House. However, I am very glad to hear from the hon. gentleman from New Westminster after the very considerable silence that he has maintained since the change of Government has taken place. One would judge by the hon. member's remarks that we on this side of the House were being censured because we had brought to the attention of the House and the country this contribution to a political friend of a small matter of $100,000. I suppose we must assume from what the hon. gentleman has said that the only subject worthy of serious consideration, of sufficient moment to bring before this House, would be the subject that my hon. friend brought before it, not once but on several occasions during the course of the last Parliament, and that was the notable escape of the notable Bill Miner. It seems to me rather strange that the hon. member for New Westminster should be the first man from the Government benches to rise to the defence of the Department of the Interior and of the hon. gentleman who was at the head of that department before he became the Minister of Public Works. I would have thought that it would have been much more to the point if the hon. member for New Westminster had been present some days ago when the question of the Japanese treaty was under consideration which one would naturally conceive would be a question very near to the heart of that hon. gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR: May I make an explanation in regard to that matter?

Mr. NEELY: Yes, we are always glad to have explanations.

Mr. TAYLOR: I am very glad indeed to have the opportunity of making an explanation particularly as the subject was referred to in the House during my absence. The reason that I was not present was that I still have to make a living outside of politics. Unlike some other hon. gentlemen I have not become well enough off from my connection with politics to be able to afford to neglect my means of livelihood.

Mr. NEELY: The hon. gentleman has my sympathy because I am exactly in the same position as himself. However, if I had to take occasion to absent myself from the House, it would not be when a most important consideration affecting the people of my own province was being brought to the attention of the House. It seems somewhat strange that my hon. friend should be the first to rise to the defence of the department in view of the fact that we have sitting as a Government supporter a member from the very section in which this particular parcel of land under discussion is located. Possibly we may hear from him later on but I had thought that he would be the first man, as the one most directly concerned, and as the one in whose constituency this parcel of land is located, to spring to the defence of the department if the department were justified in their action in giving this homestead to the son of Mr. S. J. Donaldson.

Looking over the papers in connection with this case, there are a few side lights that strike me very forcibly. While I am always prepared to take the word of the hon. the Minister of Public Works when he makes a statement as to what he has said or done, there are some side lights on this question that we obtain from the meagre documents that we find on file in connection with the matter that strike one very forcibly. About a year ago the question of the obtaining of this homestead by Mr. Donaldson or by Mr. Donaldson's son through his father, was a matter of public notoriety in the northern part of Saskatchewan, in the city of Prince Albert and in the surrounding district. The hon. the Minister of Public Works has told us that he does not remember having discussed this question with Mr. Donaldson in the city of Winnipeg, notwithstanding the fact that on this file, as my hon. friend from Regina has pointed out, there is a personal letter, or at least a letter addressed to the minister personally, in which Donaldson refers to that particular conversation and to that particular interview. It was a matter of public notoriety in the city of Prince Albert and vicinity, when Mr. Donaldson took the trip to Winnipeg, as his neighbours understood, for the express purpose of discussing this question of obtaining this parcel of land with the then Minister of the Interior, now the Minister of Public Works. It was well known in the neighbourhood that he made the trip for that express purpose. Mr. Donaldson will not deny that he made the trip and he will not deny that he had an interview with the Minister of Public Works for the very good reason that Mr. Donaldson wrote a letter to the Minister of Public Works in which he expressly referred to the interview which he had held with that hon. gentleman in Winnipeg. It may be that an interview concerning a parcel of land worth $100,000, or thereabouts, was not of sufficient importance to impress itself upon the minister's memory. However, Mr. Donaldson claims that he did have the interview, and the interview was followed by a letter. Surely that letter was presented to the Minister of Public Works. It is addressed 'Dear Mr. Rogers,' addressed to him personally. Surely his private secretary would take the trouble to pass this letter over to the minister for his consideration. Yet, Sir, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Donaldson declares that he did have an interview with the minister in Winnipeg, notwithstanding the fact that his letter so declares, notwithstanding the fact that the interview was followed by a letter addressed to the minister here at Ottawa, the minister asks us to believe that he has no recollection of any such interview. As I say, we accept the minister's statement, but we must be pardoned if we express to him our sincere sympathy on the condition of memory with which he certainly must be afflicted, if Mr. Donaldson's statement is true that he actually did have the interview he declared he had with the minister.

Another peculiar thing about this transaction is this: if Mr. Donaldson had an interview about this matter, and stated the facts of the situation to the minister —the minister says he does not remember it but he does not deny it—if Mr. Donaldson interviewed the minister—and we all heard what the minister said if he had personal knowledge of the case and if it had been brought to his attention he would not have permitted it to go through —is it not a peculiar thing that Mr. Donaldson, if he had that interview—I suppose the minister was in the same frame of mind as he is now that he would not permit the transfer—if the minister took the ground with Mr. Donaldson that he would not permit this transaction to occur, is it not a very strange thing that Mr. Donaldson persisted in the pursuit of that homestead? It is a remarkable feature of the case that notwithstanding that the minister tells us to-day that if the matter had been brought to his attention it could not have occurred because the thing is wrong, that nevertheless Mr. Donaldson, after his interview with the minister at Winnipeg, goes right on in his purpose to secure this land for his son, who of course was undoubtedly acting in the interests of the father. We are inclined to give acceptance to the word of the minister, but those are some features of this case that are very hard to appreciate and understand, notwithstanding that the minister tells us he had no personal knowledge of the transaction. Following up this thought and going a little further into the meagre correspondence we have on the file, we find that after Mr. Arthur Donaldson, the son of Mr. S. J. Donaldson, whip of the Conservative party in the Saskatchewan legislature, had obtained a homestead entry, the method of which I will not discuss at the moment, he communicates with the department to the effect that he does not wish to perform his homestead duties but rather he wishes to abandon his homestead entry for the purpose of the application of scrip. I would like to know from the minister—I am sorry he is not here at the moment, to give me the information——

Mr. BORDEN: He has been called out of the House: he will be back in a moment.

Mr. NEELY: I was going to ask the minister, how it happened, or if it is the usual practice in his office, that when cases that call for special consideration the heads of the department are brought in to the minister's office, the private secretary of the minister takes the responsibility of ordering that certain of such transactions be put through and that certain of them be not put through. Because, after Mr. Donaldson had obtained his homestead entry and had expressed to the department his intention to abandon his entry for the purpose of the application of scrip, I find from the correspondence in that connection in the department that the authority comes from the minister's office and is initialed by his own private secretary, Mr. Buskard. Surely, at least at this stage of the proceedings, the minister was aware that the transaction had occurred. Does any one in this House ask me or anyone else to believe; does the minister ask us to believe that his private secretary had no knowledge of the exact location of this particular parcel of land and did not know approximately something of its very great monetary value. Would the secretary of the minister take upon himself the responsibility of dealing with this parcel of land without a reference to the minister himself? Those are questions that we would like some information about. The minister has absolutely failed to make any defence whatever, so far as the conduct of the officers of his department is concerned, and particularly that of his own private secretary. We cannot bring this matter home personally to the minister, because he has given us his word, and this authority for the application of scrip to this parcel of land is signed by his private secretary.

Mr. MACDONALD: What status has he to sign it?

Mr. NEELY: We are entitled to know whether it was or is the practice in the Department of the Interior, that parcels of land involving a matter of from $75,000 to $125,000 in value are dealt with on the authority of the private secretary of the minister. If the private secretary of a minister has not that authority, it is about time for us to know by what right or authority this private secretary exercised the power which he apparently did exercise in this case. If he did not act on his own authority, but on the authority of the minister, then we must come to the conclusion that, at least, after this homestead entry was granted, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) became aware that the transaction had been completed so far as the obtaining of the homestead entry was concerned. I say that we can come to no other conclusion that at least at this stage of the program the minister (Mr. Rogers) was aware that this transaction had been completed, and that Mr. Donaldson had become the possessor of this valuable parcel of land. In connection with this whole proposition I would like to emphasize the statement made by the member for Regina (Mr. Martin) when he called attention to the fact that for six years we have on the file absolutely no record of any correspondence or of any transaction in connection with this particular parcel of land. If this parcel of land had been thrown open for homestead entry in the records of the department and in the books of the land office in the city of Prince Albert, and had been open from 1906, does any hon. gentleman ask me or anyone else of common sense and sound judgment to believe that no one would have been acquainted with that fact previous to last year? Mr. Donaldson has lived for a great many years in the city of Prince Albert. That particular parcel of land has been located as a homestead on the banks of the North Saskatchewan river as long as and a good deal longer that Mr. Donaldson has lived in the city of Prince Albert. Apparently there is no adequate record in respect of this land, and I suppose that condition of affairs would not exist with reference to one out of a thousand unimportant homesteads, let alone a parcel of land adjoining and for some time within the city limits. If that parcel of land had been open since 1906, will anybody tell me why Mr. Donaldson did not become cognizant of that fact before the autumn of 1911? Why did someone else not become cognizant of the fact? If it was open, as the minister would lead us to believe, from 1906, surely the agent of Dominion Lands at Prince Albert would be aware of the fact. I happen to be personally acquainted with the late agent of Dominion Lands at Prince Albert, who was formerly the agent of Dominion Lands at Humboldt, Mr. Geo. L. Dempster. Not only was Mr. Dempster aware of the fact that this parcel of land was reserved, but he makes the statement that in the books of the land office when he was agent at the city of Prince Albert—and he has left the office only within the last year and a half or so—the word 'reserve' was written across this particular parcel of land. We cannot believe anything else, Sir, because it is absolutely inconceivable that that valuable parcel of land could have been open for homestead entry for four or five years, and there be on the files not one single application from any quarter for that parcel of land as a homestead under the ordinary homestead regulations. It would seem that our good faith, to a great extent, is imposed upon when we are asked to believe that this land had been open for homestead entry for some considerable time before entry was actually taken out, and that the late Minister of the Interior was responsible for that condition of affairs. I say that condition did not exist; that that homestead was not open for entry on the books of the department or on the books of the land office at Prince Albert, otherwise the agent at Prince Albert would have known that this parcel of land was open for homestead entry, and long before the beginning of last year some enterprising citizen of Prince Albert or the surrounding district would have claimed that prize for his own. That is the only conclusion I can reasonably draw from the facts before me with regard to the question as to whether or not this homestead was eligible previous to the application of Mr. Donaldson for this entry. If the Minister of Public Works could present to this House satisfactory documentary evidence to the contrary, I would be delighted to accept the conclusion that by some oversight this land had been left open in the books of the department. But we have no such evidence; we have no such proof; we have nothing to lead us to believe that either in the department at Ottawa, or in the land office at Prince Albert, previous to Mr. Donaldson's application for this homestead entry, there was the slightest knowledge or belief on the part of the officials, either of the department or of the land office at Prince Albert, that this land was open for homestead entry in the ordinary and proper meaning of the term. Leaving out of the question the recollection of the Minister of Public Works with reference to his interview with Mr. Donaldson in Winnipeg; leaving out of the question his memory as to receiving Mr. Donaldson's letter on this question; taking it for granted that he now has no personal remembrance or knowledge of these facts, and taking into consideration also the letters written by his own private secretary giving authority to Mr. Donaldson to abandon his entry on this parcel of land and to apply scrip instead, I say that the Minister of Public Works, then the Minister of the Interior could, at that stage of the proceedings have stopped this wholesale steal if he had entertained a desire to do so. No harm could have come to Mr. Donaldson, the entrant for the land; he spent no money on it aside from his ten dollars entry fee, which could have been refunded. I am sure he did not undertake any agricultural duties because any one who has a knowledge of the local conditions in Prince Albert knows that this particular piece of land on the north side of the river is quite marshy, although for townsite purposes it could be very easily drained into the river, but it is very valuable for the purposes of a townsite. I have myself walked over a portion of it; I have seen it and know the nature of the soil, and that it is covered with a scrubby growth of jackpine and other timber. I say that at the time Mr. Donaldson asked for permission to abandon his entry and to apply scrip in lieu thereof, the mischief could have beeen prevented by the Minister of Public Works, then Minister of the Interior. His private secretary had this matter in review not once, but three or four times, according to the correspondence on the file, and, whether with the cognizance and by the authority of the minister or on his own authority and behalf, his private secretary authorized the other officials of the department which had to do with the case to grant Mr. Donaldson's request to abandon his homestead entry for the purposes of the application of half-breed scrip. If the minister meant what he said this afternoon, that this transaction should not have been put through the department, why did he not stop the transaction when the matter was brought right into his own office and dealt with by his own private secretary? We cannot get away from the conclusion that, whether or not the minister had personal knowledge, at least the documents giving authority for the abandonment of this homestead entry and application of scrip came right from his own office, because the letters are on file signed by his own private secretary. So, the contention of the hon. member for Regina is sound—that if the minister himself meant what he said, there is only one course open to him, and that is to return to Mr. Donaldson his half-breed scrip and his original ten dollars of homestead entry fee and to ask Mr. Donaldson to restore that parcel of land to the Crown, to whom it rightfully belongs. There is a rather interesting history in connection with the consummation of this whole transaction. It would appear that Mr. Donaldson was not actually the first person to become aware of the value of this particular parcel of land. There were two gentlemen in the city of Prince Albert of the same political faith as Mr. Donaldson, one of whom was a Mr. Fowlie. It appears that these two gentlemen—I believe they are contractors or something of that kind—affirm that they had a claim against the Government for about $2,000. They went to Mr. Donaldson, the member for the local legislature for the constituency, one who, of course, would have influence with the new Government at Ottawa, and told him that they were having difficulty in collecting this amount and that for purposes of their own, this particular parcel of land would be of great value to them; and they asked Mr. Donaldson to make a trip to Winnipeg for the purpose of seeing the then Minister of the Interior to see whether or not some means could not be devised whereby they could obtain this land, and they would allow their claim against the Government to go against the payment for the land. Mr. Donaldson went to Winnipeg, he went to see the Minister of Public Works then Minister of the Interior; and he returned. But the only reward these two gentlemen received who had entrusted their confidence and had placed their case in Mr. Donaldson's hands that he might be their counsel was when the information was conveyed to them that this parcel of land, by instructions from Ottawa, had been handed over to Mr. Donaldson's son for the entry fee of a ten-dollar bill. There is the whole story from a local standpoint. And I say it was a likely story; these gentlemen will make affidavit that they asked Mr. Donaldson to do this thing for them, as he was the local member, whip of the Conservative party in the Saskatchewan Legislature, and presumably would have a great deal of influence with the Government at Ottawa. Their deputizing was all right, but the result was one that they did not expect. They looked for a chance to obtain the land by purchase for, as I understand, they were willing to pay a good sum for obtaining it.

Now, in discussing this matter I have no desire or intention to cast any reflection on the personal integrity of any of the persons concerned. But I will say this to the Minister of Public Works, that he nor anyone else can prevent the public generally from wondering, from questioning, whether or not it is the practice to donate parcels of land in western Canada within city limits and worth $100,000 to political friends without some drawback in the transaction. I say the public cannot be kept from thinking thoughts in connection with a transaction of this description. The minister ought to take this question seriously, he ought to have attempted to make a serious defence. His memory ought to have served him better than it did. He should have more knowledge of an important transaction of this kind than he claims to have, if such things can be done under his very eyes and under his notice without any knowledge on his part. And I say it will be very hard to convince the public that Mr. Donaldson obtained this prize simply because the matter was not brought to the minister's personal attention. Now, with regard to the regulations covering this land, let it not be understood that the hon. member for Regina or the hon. member for Edmonton have intended to say, as I understand it, that if this land had been properly advertised there could be no fault found with Mr. Donaldson obtaining this entry. As I understand it, the fault is here,—that the land should not have been available for homestead entry. There has not been given one tittle of evidence to prove the statement that has been made that this land was available for homestead entry. The very fact that for six years there is no correspondence on the files dealing with this question, the very fact that the Minister of the Interior was not besieged by applicants for the entry, demonstrates that under the late Administration it was conceded that this land was not available, that it was reserved for some purpose, whatever that might be. On the 23rd of September, 1911, a change of government took place. It was not very long until Mr. Donaldson, local Conservative member for the county of Prince Albert, became aware that this parcel of land might possibly be secured in the ordinary way of making a homestead entry for it. That is a sort of awakening that one can hardly understand. Why for years previously did Mr. Donaldson remain in ignorance of the fact, if fact it were, that this land was open for homestead entry and why almost immediately after the change of government did Mr. Donaldson become seized of the possibility of securing this valuable parcel in this particular way? I say these are some side lights on this transaction that I think the minister might seriously have undertaken to explain, but he did not do so, as the hon. member for Regina properly admitted; attempting to draw a red herring across the trial by discussing matters which are absolutely foreign to the question before us. He discussed these foreign questions in a way that, to my mind at least, absolutely proved nothing either for or against the integrity of the administration of western lands by the late Administration. The minister undertook to say that a parcel of land, part of a homestead lying alongside this particular parcel, but further out, had been given some years ago to a certain applicant, Everett I think was the name, who had ultimately obtained the entry to the other parcel of land which lay further out. Let me say that when Everett obtained entry for this other parcel, land values in the West were not what they are at the present time. That particular parcel of land at that time was outside the city limits of Prince Albert. It was agricultural land, it was land that could be fairly given to a homesteader in the usual way. That land, of course, like all other lands in the West, has increased in value since that time, but there is absolutely no comparison. Here is a parcel of land situated within the city limits of Prince Albert, land that was assessed, immediately homestead entry was given, by the city assessor, for $80,000, and we know that an assessment of this kind does not by any means give us the value which is actually placed upon the property assessed. One can hardly appreciate what a transaction of this sort means to people who are most directly concerned. Take as a comparison the city of Ottawa. The Minister of Public Works, who was Minister of the Interior and so had control of western lands, now, in his new position, has control of Crown lands in this part of the Dominion of Canada. What would any one think, if the Government of the day decided, for instance, that they were going to move Rideau Hall to some other location outside of Ottawa, if, having decided upon that particular course of action they were to advertise to the public that on a certain day the ground of Rideau Hall would be thrown open for homestead entry by the simple method of paying an entry fee of ten dollars. Yet that is actually what happened in Prince Albert. The transaction, of course, could not occur in Ottawa because it would be under the public eye. It is too near the centre, it is right at the heart of things and yet, because Prince Albert is a few thousand miles from here it seems that Mr. Donaldson, for anything the minister said to the contrary, can get a homestead entry of almost equal value in the city of Prince Albert and the minister proposes to leave Mr. Donaldson in possession of that homestead.

Mr. BUREAU: Is Mr. Donaldson a Grit?

Mr. NEELY: No, for years the sign over his livery barns was: I run a livery and my politics are Tory. Something to that effect. So I say, in the name and on behalf of the people of the West who are more especially concerned in this transaction, namely the people of the city of Prince Albert, that even if Donaldson has sold this parcel of land and received money for it, even to-day the minister should take the responsibility of saying that this thing had happened without his knowledge and consent, as he tells us, nevertheless restitution must be made to the people of the province of Saskatchewan and the city of Prince Albert, even if the Government has to cancel the homestead entry and compel Donaldson to refund the money which some other person may have paid him for the possession of that land. There is nothing else that will put the Government right in the eyes of the people of Prince Albert and the surrounding country and the province of Saskatchewan, in fact of all western Canada. The disposition of these lands is a matter that is dealt with not only by regulation of the department but by the Dominion Lands Act. In the Revised Dominion Lands Act, section 80, we find that the minister has the power to set aside for various purposes lands not suited for agricultural purposes but especially located as being of service for townsite purposes and for various other purposes such as the construction of harbours, docks, &c. That is the power vested in the minister by the Dominion Lands Act.

An hon. MEMBER: Which section is that?

Mr. NEELY: Section 80. It is evident from the facts that I have brought to the attention of the House that this parcel of land had been set aside by the preceding Administration. If it was so set aside, when was it released, and by whose orders? Where is the authority? That it was so set aside, is evidenced by the fact that six years the files have no record of any application to obtain this land. The suspicious part of the conclusion of the transaction is this: had the department decided that, notwithstanding its great value, this land should be thrown open for homestead entry, the rules and regulations governing the procedure in such a case state very distinctly and clearly the course that must be followed. The minister decides, or the heads of the department at Ottawa decide that a certain parcel of land is to be thrown open for homestead entry. The agent for Dominion Lands at the particular point where the land is located is advised of the fact. What is his duty? Every Dominion Lands agent in western Canada has a copy of these printed rules and regulations; he knows perfectly well that when land is thrown open to homestead entry his first duty is to give public notice, to advertise for ten days that the land can be legally applied for as a homestead. In this case, no such posting and no such advertising was done. Instructions were sent to the agency at Prince Albert that this parcel of land was to be given to Mr. Arthur Donaldson by way of a homestead entry. No posting, no advertising was done. No outsider had a chance in the world to put in an application for this parcel of land. Where did the authority come from? Surely the agent of lands at Prince Albert would not take upon himself the onus and responsibility of defying the printed regulations which he had obtained from the head of the department at Ottawa? That is not conceivable. It would appear that the agent of Dominion Lands at Prince Albert had obtained instructions, if not from the minister, from someone who thought he was acting by the authority of the minister, to take the entry of Mr. Donaldson and of no one else, and the usual regulation of posting or advertising for ten days previous to the acceptance of the application was not done in this particular instance. Hon. gentlemen opposite may look on this as a trivial question. They may say that we are attempting to make a mountain out of a molehill, but if it is to be the practice under this Administration that a friend of the Government can take a trip down to Winnipeg, interview a minister of the Crown, write him a letter, and then receive permission from the department at Ottawa to make application for a piece of land worth $100,000 by the simple expedient of paying $10 for it, it is about time that the country knew that it was to be the practice in the disposition of the natural resources of this country. That is what happened in this instance. What reason have we to believe that it is not going to continue? It is very heroic for the Minister of Public Works to tell us about that transfer of a timber limit by which a certain individual had his limit transferred from the Rocky Mountain Park Reserve to another location, and to tell us about saving the country 160,000,000 feet of timber. In view of what has happened in the limits of the city of Prince Albert, the question will naturally be asked, for whom is the minister saving 160,000,000 feet of timber? Is he saving it for the people of Canada, or is it another plum that some other political friend is to pick off the political tree? If there is one thing, Mr. Speaker, that I admire about the Minister of Public Works it is the way in which he can stand up—I notice he cannot sit so long as he might after he has made his statement in the House—and assume the air of a martyr. In giving exhibitions of heroics, he is certainly an artist. He tells us about how he prevented the coming into effect of this Order in Council, a perfectly legitimate transaction as I understand it, and one which can be defended, and will be defended, if the minister will give us an opportunity on some future occasion. It is surprising I say to note the way in which he can throw these heroics when he tells us about saving the country millions of feet of timber. I am not going to say anything about reputations, political or otherwise, but I come from the same part of Canada as the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and if ancient history is pertinent to this discussion, I might give a considerable amount of it as to the transactions in swamp lands that once were under the administration of that hon. gentleman when he was Minister of Public Works in the Government of the province of Manitoba. But as I say I do not know if this is the time or the occasion for such a discussion. It is a matter which may very properly be taken up at some future date if the minister wants us to follow his lead and wander all over the face of the earth in the pursuit of transactions in days gone by in western lands which he considers were not in the best interests of the people. Now, I think I have touched on all the points that I wish to deal with at the present time. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Public Works has not been able to retain his seat until the conclusion of this discussion, but these are some of the queries that come to one's mind in the consideration of this matter. When the minister undertakes to give his defence more fully at some other time, or further on in the course of the debate, I would like him to take the opportunity of answering some of these questions which I have been trying to propound since I have been engaging the attention of the House. I would like him to tell us how it was that, if this homestead was open for entry previous to last year, there is nothing on the file to show that anybody made application for it. I would like him to tell us how it comes about, that, if he has no remembrance of the interview with Donaldson in the city of Winnipeg, and if he cannot recall Donaldson's letter to himself, his private secretary gave authority to the officers of his department, who had to do with these things, to allow Mr. Donaldson to abandon his homestead entry and apply half-breed scrip to that particular parcel of land. I would like to have that information. I want to be fair with the minister. If he is lying under a suspicion that he should not lie under, if he knows more about this case than he admits he knows, we want to give him an opportunity to clear up these points which have not as yet been explained. Of course, in this House we take the minister's word, but the public outside form their own conclusions almost irrespective of what members and ministers say in this House. In justice to the minister, in view of the fact that there is outside a body of people who believe that the minister did know about this transaction, who believe that the minister authorized this transaction, who believe, some of them possibly, that Donaldson was not the sole beneficiary in this case—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEELY: Levity comes very properly from hon. gentlemen in the consideration of a matter which may or may not involve the personal integrity of one of the chief advisers of the Crown in this country. The public want all the information and for that reason I think it is the duty of the responsible minister to give every possible bit of information on this question, to answer every query which he possibly can answer in order that the public may have their minds disabused of the suspicion that Donaldson of Prince Albert was not the sole beneficiary of this very munificent gift of $100,000 in exchange for ten dollars of His Majesty's currency.

These, Mr. Speaker, are all the suggestions that I have to make at the present time. There are other matters that have been discussed that I do not consider relevant to the debate, and therefore to these matters I shall not give any more attention at the present time than I think they deserve, because in my judgment they are not at all relevant. I say again that I am sorry that the minister has not been able to remain in his place until the close of the discussion in order that he might answer these questions and give the House and the public the information that they are justly entitled to in connection with this nefarious transaction.

Mr. JAMES McKAY (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, or rather early hour, it is not my intention to detain the House at any great length. But, representing as I do the constituency in which this transaction took place, I feel it my duty, not only to the minister and to the House, but to my constituency, as well as to the country at large, to make a few remarks in regard to it. In my opening remarks, I think it is right that I should state that in anything I say I do not wish to allege any personal, improper conduct to the previous Administration or its officials. I have had occasion to look through this and other files in connection with it and the prima facie evidence as disclosed by these files would go to show that the late Administration was more grievously at fault in the administration of the affairs of the country than my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) in connection with this matter. This is one of those transactions which will slip through in spite of the most vigilant administrator overseeing a large department. I venture to say, and I hardly think there is a person here who will successfully contradict me, that if we were able to search through the records of the late Administration, we would find a great many more grievous cases than the one which we are now discussing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKAY: Hon. gentlemen seem to object to that. What about the Blairmore townsite, and what about the timber limits in British Columbia.

Mr. CARVELL: Get down to the Donaldson townsite.

Mr. McKAY: I will discuss that. I will confine myself to the subject, but in order to look at this question fairly and squarely and to do justice, both to the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), under the previous Administration, and the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), under the present Administration, we must consider the practice and custom irrespective of the printed regulations under which these lands are being administered. The hon. member for Edmonton, who moved this resolution, read the printed regulations, but apparently the late Administration departed from those regulations. The hon. gentleman stated in his remarks that, to his mind, the most important reason for urging the immediate necessity of the discussion on this matter was the apparent intention of the present Administration to deal in accordance with the same policy with section 7, adjoining this particular land now under discussion. I wish to take that matter up first because it will shed some light upon the question now under consideration. I do not wish anybody to interpret what I may say as imputing improper or any personally corrupt act as far as the ex-Minister of the Interior in the late Administration is concerned. The hon. member for Edmonton read the regulations and he stated what the practice of the late Administration was with regard to lands which had become Government property; they were, he said, put into the school lands. The hon. gentleman said that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works should have followed his policy and put this Donaldson land into the school lands. He was followed by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) who reiterated the same thing, and by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely), who also made the same remark. They declared that this land should have been put in the school land endowment fund. Is it not pertinent to ask: Why did you not put it into the school lands endowment fund? The minister (Mr. Rogers), as I understand, went into office on the 20th October, 1911, and this piece of land was homesteaded on the 16th of April, 1912. Mark you, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) had not been in office a year, whereas the Liberal Administration had been in office for something like fifteen years and as I will show you this land had already become more valuable than ordinary homestead land. Why then did not the late Administration put this land in the school endowment fund? They had sold portions of it—somebody says it had been reserved, but, Mr. Speaker, I intend to show the House and the country that this land was never in the forest reserve. So we have it that these gentlemen opposite are accusing the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) for not doing during the few months he was in office what they themselves had not done during the many years they were in power. I submit, Sir, that is hardly fair. Another point we must consider is that it is impossible for the head of a large department to bear in mind or to be able to keep in touch with every detail of the different matters which are transacted in that department. I submit it is very reasonable to come to the conclusion, (even if the minister had not told us so), that he did not have any personal knowledge of this matter.

On the question of school lands, I would impress upon the House that with regard to section 7 which adjoins this section 8, the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) stated that after a certain Mr. Hutchinson defaulted on that quarter of section 7, they put it in the school land endowment fund, and that since the present Administration came into office a certain letter was written to the Government with regard to this land, which letter the hon. gentleman informed the House came from me. A certain person in Prince Albert wrote to me with regard to this quarter section of 7——

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to say that I did not intend to convey any reflection on the hon. member (Mr. McKay) in making that allusion; I was merely stating a fact.

Mr. McKAY: I quite understand.

Mr. OLIVER: It had no bearing on the case.

Mr. McKAY: It has a bearing in this way: that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) told us that the reason why it was so important he should bring this motion in now was that he was afraid of what was going to follow, owing to what had taken place with regard to section 8 and that is what I intend to deal with. Of course, I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) imputed any improper motive to me, because everything was perfectly open. When I received this letter from the gentleman referred to, inquiring whether the land could be homesteaded, I wrote to the department from Ottawa while the House was in session year before last.

Ottawa, December 11, 1911.

Deputy Minister of Interior, Ottawa.

Sir,

Re South-east quarter 7-48-26 West of 2.
J. F. McKenzie.

Mr. J. F. McKenzie desires to make a homestead entry for the above quarter. I understand it was at one time entered by Mr. W. H. Hutchison. Will you let me know if it is open for entry.

Yours truly,
James McKay.

I did not know that this land had been put into the school land endowment fund and hence when the inquiry was made of me, I in turn made inquiry of the department. The reply came from the department that it had been set aside as school land, and I reported accordingly and nothing further was done. Then the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) went on to state that an investigation had been asked for with respect to the same quarter in regard to the Hutchinson homestead. I do not wish that all the responsibility in connection with this matter should be on the late Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers); if I am guilty I am prepared to share my responsibility. The reason the homestead inspection was asked for was this: true it is that Mr. Hutchinson had claimed it as a homestead and true it is that Mr. Hutchinson claimed he was entitled to it, and true it is that it had been cancelled, and put in the school land endowment fund. But before I wrote to the department as to having an investigation, I was approached by a citizen of Prince Albert on behalf of Mr. Hutchinson and he told me that Mr. Hutchinson had been found entitled to this homestead on investigation by the late administration, provided he put some additional improvements to his house. He produced a telegram and he left it with me. He went on explaining how it was that there had been a thorough examination by the Liberal administration and apparently they found he was entitled to it; that he had put in sufficient residence and that all he had to do was to improve the house to some extent. He stated, under Mr. Hutchinson's instructions, that these improvements were done, and I happened to know the house and I know it is a house worth more than $300 in my opinion. He said the improvements required by the department were to bring the value of the house up to $300, and the value of the house is much over $300. This is the telegram he left with me to substantiate and corroborate what he stated to me. It is on the Department of the Interior paper apparently.

Telegram.

Department of Interior.
Ottawa, August 10, 1910.

Copy for W. H. Hutchinson, Esq.,
Royal Oak, B.C.

J. B. Kernaghan, Prince Albert, Sask.

Yours 29th July, Hutchinson application for Patent Department will accept residence and cultivation already performed but will require house on homestead worth $300 same as all homesteads entered since February, 1909.

J. W. Greenway.

May I inform the House that Mr. Hutchinson was a well-known Grit worker; that he worked in all the elections up there, Provincial as well as Dominion, and that he handled what is known as the road-work and had road gangs working throughout the district. Mr. Kernaghan was also a well-known Liberal, and apparently the late administration had enquired into this question of Mr. Hutchinson's homestead after he had gone away to British Columbia, and had instructed him as stated in this telegram. This telegram was despatched to Mr. Kernahan at Prince Albert, and a copy was also sent from the Department of the Interior here to Mr. Hutchinson at Royal Oak, B.C., on August 10, 1910. I desire to again direct the attention of the House to the fact that the only condition demanded by the late Administration was that the house should be improved to such an extent as to make it worth $300. Knowing as a fact that the House was worth more than $300, I wrote to the department asking them to find out why Mr. Hutchinson's homestead entry had been cancelled, in view of the fact that he had fulfilled the condition which had been imposed. According to my recollection, I did not suggest or intimate that the homestead should be given to him, I contended that an investigation should be held for the purpose of ascertaining why his entry had been cancelled. This I did notwithstanding the fact that I knew him to be a Liberal; I felt it my duty to give justice to either party whether Liberal or Conservative. That explains why the investigation was asked for; and, so far as I know, the investigation was ordered, at any rate I have heard no more about it.

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia): Was the hon. gentleman a member of this House at the time these events transpired?

Mr. McKAY: No, this took place in 1910, but I was a member at the time I wrote about this homestead. As I say, I asked about the homestead because it appeared very strange to me why an entry should be cancelled when the condition under which it had been granted had been fulfilled. I am not contending that it was improperly cancelled, but if the only reason for its cancellation was that the homesteader did not comply with the condition that was imposed, namely, the improvement of the house to such an extent as to bring its value up to $300, then it was improperly cancelled. They may have found other reasons; that I do not know.

Mr. McCRANEY: Might I ask who held the investigation to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. McKAY: I do not know; I presume the land office officials. As a matter of fact, I do not know whether the investigation has yet been held; according to the hon. member for Edmonton, it has, at any rate, been ordered.

Mr. OLIVER: It has been ordered, but there is no report of its having been completed.

Mr. McKAY: All I did was to write about the homestead, and I have given the matter no further attention. I make this explanation because of the fact that the hon. member for Edmonton said he was afraid that this homestead would go in the same way as did the Donaldson land.

I now wish to refer for a moment to the question of school lands. If hon. gentlemen are sincere in their statement that this land should have been put in the school lands department by the Minister of Public Works, why did they not put it under that department when they had ample opportunity of doing so?

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend will refer to the file relating to the forest reserve, he will find that negotiations were held between the department and the city of Prince Albert with regard to its being acquired by the city.

Mr. McKAY: I hardly think the hon. member is correct in that. I do not say he wilfully mis-states the facts, but I do not think he has fully digested the contents of the file. I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that the very position the hon. gentleman takes justifies my contention that the hon. Minister of Public Works did not know the exact condition of the matter when this transaction was put through. The hon. member (Mr. Oliver) and some of his officials were apparently under the impression that this Donaldson homestead was in the forest reserve and he is evidently still under that impression. Referring to the question of the school lands, I have here a file which was brought down a few days ago. I shall not weary the House by reading the whole file, but I will state briefly the nature of the transaction to which I desire to refer. I make these statements simply to show that the officials apparently did not follow the printed regulations to which the attention of the House has been directed in connection with this debate. It would appear that a homestead entry was made by one John F. Morton for a piece of land near the town of Weyburn, and that for many years he was in default in his homestead duties. There were no less than three applications to cancel his homestead entry, and it was cancelled in 1907. He apparently desired to have another investigation held, and an inquiry into the matter was made by the inspector of homestead agencies under an Order in Council passed by the late Administration. A thorough investigation was made as to whether this man, John F. Morton, was entitled to the homestead—the southwest quarter of 4, township 9, range 14, west of 2. I am informed that this land is situated very close to the town of Weyburn, and is worth over $100 an acre; I understand that it is easily worth $200 an acre. A report in respect of this matter was made on December 28, 1910, and of that report I will read one paragraph, as follows:

Sir,—Re southwest quarter, 4-9-14 west 2nd meridian. Referring to your favour of the 26th of October last, file No. 538787, re the above land. In this connection I beg to say that on the 22nd and 23rd instant I held a court investigation into this matter, making a careful examination covering the whole history of the case of John F. Morton and the land in question. Altogether 37 witnesses were examined. I enclose herewith a report of the evidence taken.

Then he goes on to deal with the report, and the evidence is attached.

The last paragraph of his report reads:

To sum up, I would say that at the time Mr. Morton's entry was cancelled, September 9, 1907, his entry was flagrantly in default.

Mark the word:

The residence duties were never performed in any single year. That in 1909 when a request was made for his reinstatement there was no reasonable ground upon which such a contention could be based, but there were the strongest reasons for refusing such a request. That in going into residence on the land in 1909 Morton did so in the face of repeated warnings against trespassing upon the land I can, therefore, see no grounds for reinstating him in his entry for this land, and would renew my recommendation of July 1st, 1909, to the effect that Morton be not reinstated in his entry, that the land be not made available again for homesteading, but that it should be transferred to school lands, or retained as school lands.

It would appear that there had been several investigations with regard to this homestead, and all went against the homesteader. In this investigation he appears to have had counsel to appear in his behalf before the agent investigating and thirty-seven witnesses were called and examined. So, it was a most exhaustive examination; and the homestead inspector reports that there should be no re-entry. He had been cancelled, apparently, on one occasion before. So the agent recommended that the application should not be granted but that the land should be transferred to school lands. There was a Dominion election on the 21st September, 1911, and I find a letter which I will read. I may explain to the House that apparently somebody got very active just about election time and either communicated with Ottawa or came down here, and I find that on the 19th of September, two days before the election, a telegram was despatched, whether by the deputy minister or by some official in the Interior Department, I do not know, authorizing this man to re-enter this land. Mark you, apparently this was done without any further investigation or any further evidence than they had had up to that time which condemned this homesteader in the strong terms I have just read to the House. Yet we find that on the 19th of September a telegram is despatched from here authorizing this man to re-enter this land which land had been recommended to be transferred to the schools, and apparently had been so transferred. Now, where is the authority for that? According to the rule cited by the hon. member for Edmonton, that land should have been advertised because it had been cancelled and put into school lands. Now I will read the letter:

Ottawa, October 24, 1911.

S. W. ¼ 4-9-14 West 2nd—File 21499.

Sir:—

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, enclosing the application for patent of Mr. John F. Morton, and stating that Mr. Morton was granted re-entry for the above-mentioned land on the 23rd ultimo.

That is, that the entry was made by the land agent for the district in which the land is situated on the 23rd of September, whereas, apparently, the authority was sent out here by the telegram on the 19th of September to take his application.

I am to direct your attention to the fact that the telegram sent you from this office on the 19th ultimo.——

That is the 19th of September.

—merely authorized you to receive Mr. Morton's application for re-entry. Entry cannot be granted to him until land is removed from the school lands endowment. You will be further advised as soon as possible and in the meantime you will kindly notify Mr. Morton in accordance with the foregoing.

L. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary.

This was on the 24th of October, 1911, after the present Administration came into office. I do not know whether it was the vigilance of the present Administration which put a stop to its going through, or it might have been the officials themselves; and I am not prepared to say whether the former Minister of the Interior authorized that re-entry. According to the present member for Edmonton's statement, he was very vigilant with regard to these matters, yet the officials whom he had trained, were apparently doing improper things under his very eyes. Here was a piece of land which, according to this letter they authorized to be re-entered which had been put into the school lands without having taken it out first.

Mr. OLIVER: Of course, the acceptance would have no effect if the land had been gazetted as school land.

Mr. McKAY: Exactly, but apparently the intention was to take it out of school lands. That is the point I make. Notwithstanding the instructions which went out from here under the late Administration on the 19th September, 1911, the Government were defeated two days afterwards and—to use a popular phrase—could not deliver the goods, that is, the official could not deliver the goods. I simply say that in connection with the school lands, I have here evidence to show how, even with the vigilance of the former Minister of the Interior, these matters were being put through by his officials, and I understand that the heads among these officials are the same under the present Administration as they were under the last Administration.

Now, let us come down to this case that is before the House, the Donaldson homestead. I take the position that, apparently there has been an important mistake on the part of the officials in connection with this particular piece of land. They were under a misapprehension, until Mr. Corry made further investigation in April, when he wrote that letter to Mr. Donaldson. I believe, and I think my judgment is right, that this piece of land, the Donaldson homestead, and all that portion of the section down to the river, was never in the forest reserve at any time. The present Minister of the Interior when he answered these questions stated that this land had been in the forest reserve, and I am satisfied that he was misinformed by his official. When the minister made this statement this afternoon that the land had been in the forest reserve and was taken out by the late Minister of the Interior, the hon. member for Edmonton, he also, I am satisfied, had been misled by officials. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the late Minister of the Interior, was misinformed when he stated, even after reading these documents, that this was in the forest reserve as early as 1895. I admit that, owing to this misapprehension on the part of the officials, it was generally understood that it was in the forest reserve. I am satisfied that people in Prince Albert were always under the impression that it was part of the reserve as constituted in 1894. I shall read certain documents with regard to this matter and I am in the judgment of the House when I make the statement that a great deal of the misapprehension with regard to this matter hinges on the point as to whether or not the land was ever in the forest reserve because if it were never in the forest reserve there would be no necessity of giving any notice for anybody to enter, so far as the officials were concerned. Consequently I say that the officials inadvertently made a mistake in respect to this matter and inadvertently allowed it to be entered without any notice being required. I may also state that the arguments adduced for condemning the Minister of Public Works with regard to this matter were really two, first that you should have put it in the School Lands Department. I have shown that the late Government had an opportunity to do so and did not do it and very likely the Minister of Public Works did not know of the existence of this piece of land and therefore could not put it in the School Lands Department. These matters, as we all know, do not come by intuition; the minister deals with a great many matters and it is only by being in the department for a great many years that he can become familiar with all the details of the different branches of the department.

Another point was that he should have given notice to the public. I say again he did not know anything about this piece of land.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why did he not find out?

Mr. McKAY: Apparently he did not know anything about it.

Mr. McCRANEY: Has my hon. friend a copy of the memorandum which is on the file, of date July 4, 1906, signed by Mr. Coté in which it is stated that this land is in the Prince Albert forest reserve?

Mr. McKAY: Exactly and I say that Mr. Coté was mistaken. He cannot produce any evidence to show that it was ever in the forest reserve but it became a general impression that it was in the forest reserve.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that at the very first of the return it is stated that it is in the forest reserve, there is a statement that the land is reserved and is to remain reserved until further notice.

Mr. McKAY: I do not see that statement here.

Mr. OLIVER: I think it is right there on the beginning of the file.

Mr. McCRANEY: Would not a copy of the memorandum to which I have referred be on the file of the agent of Dominion Lands at Prince Albert and would that not give him notice?

Mr. McKAY: No, I do not think so. That was a memorandum passing from one branch of the Department of the Interior in the city of Ottawa to another branch in the city of Ottawa, a memorandum from Mr. Coté to Mr. Greenway, as I understand in 1906 and consequently the agent at Prince Albert would know nothing about it.

I wish to state again that in all fairness to both parties the facts should be placed before the House as I conceive them to be, the actual facts; then it will be for the House to draw its own conclusion with regard to those facts. I wish the House to bear in mind that the conclusion I have come to after perusing the file and with my knowledge of the matter is that this piece of land was never in any forest reserve and I shall be very pleased if anybody can show me any evidence that it was in the forest reserve. That is where the difficulty comes in with regard to notice, etc. Before taking up the file of correspondence I wish to say something as to what we may term the geography of the country with regard to this matter. This piece of land lies some distance across the river from the town of Prince Albert. What is known as the Everett homestead is part and parcel of the same section as the Donaldson homestead, they are adjoining. The Everett homestead is the north-west quarter of section 8 and the Donaldson homestead is the north half of the south-west quarter of section 8; consequently they lie alongside of each other. Part of section 8 runs into the river. The southern portion of it, along the banks of the Saskatchewan river, is quite high and dry land. As you go a little further back in the south-west quarter of the section you come into the Donaldson land. That is largely what is known as muskeg and so appears in the file that has been placed before the House. At the end of the Donaldson land, there is a hill rising perhaps twenty yards or perhaps forty yards. The Everett Homestead has a nice high piece of land running back, consequently, the Everett homestead of 160 acres, both as a homestead and a townsite property is in my opinion by far superior to the Donaldson piece of land. Although I say that the Donaldson piece of land is muskeg, as is shown by this plan and as is the actual fact, it can be drained, because the river is quite near, but to do so would cost a considerable amount of money, just how much I am not prepared to say. I wish the House to bear in mind that this muskeg is between the dry land that is right alongside the river and the Everett homestead. I do not say it is all muskeg, but a great portion of it is. However, as I say it can be drained, at some cost. I am under the impression that the reason why this piece of land was never got after, to use a popular expression, by other people, was because it was in the muskeg. When Donaldson enquired about it, he apparently thought he could make good use of it.

Now, I will read a few letters, but before doing so I may state that on the north side of the river the land is pretty well timbered with what is commonly known as jackpine, and as the correspondence shows, it was thought it would make a good forest reserve. On the 25th June, 1894, Mr. R. S. Cook the then homestead inspector at Prince Albert wrote as follows to John McTaggart, Crown timber agent Prince Albert. I will not weary the House by reading the whole of the letter; I shall content myself with giving a part of it. The letter is dated Prince Albert, 25th June, 1894. First he says that there is a great deal of destruction by fire going on in connection with the timber north of Prince Albert, and he advises that there should be some system of fire protection and so forth. Then he goes on to say:

Attached to this is a rough sketch of a portion of what was once timber land immediately north of here. All the timber of any value or size has now been removed, but there is now a dense growth of young jackpine which if protected from fires would in time make a nice forest park, and I would recommend that a reservation for that purpose, as shown by said plan, be made, that fire guards be made to protect same and be kept in order.

And so on. I wish to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House to the portion I have just read. On the 25th June, 1894, Mr. Cook the homestead inspector and forest ranger, whose duty it was to look after these lands, writes to his principal, the crown timber agent at Prince Albert, advising that the land shown in the rough sketch attached should be put into a forest reserve. I call your attention to the fact that in this letter he does not mention that sections or any portion of the sections he just refers to the rough sketch. Then he goes on to say:

I think probably that the Northwest Government could be induced to make fire guards along the trail as shown upon sketch.

I wish to emphasize the statement that fire guards should be placed along the trail as shown upon the sketch, as none of the letters in the correspondence describes the various sections or portions of sections. We are referred only to the sketch, and I want to indentify that sketch mentioned in the correspondence with the one which I produce here as a copy. Then we find that on 2nd August, 1894, G. U. Ryley submitted a memorandum to Mr. Hall who was then in the Department of the Interior in which he states, referring to Mr. Cook's report, a portion of which I have just read:

Mr. Cook recommends that the tract outlined in pink on the annexed plan be reserved as a forest reservation, and that fire guards be placed as shown on the sketch, which he thinks the Northwest Council might be induced to make and keep in order.

There again the tract of land to be put into a forest reserve is referred to by a sketch marked in pink. Then he says:

I think that the recommendation that the tract shown on the plan be reserved as a forest park should be approved, and I suppose the reservation can be made by Order in Council.

Then we find on 9th January, 1895, a memorandum made by G. U. Ryley, to Mr. Burgess, who was apparently Deputy Minister of the Interior, in the following terms:

Department of the Interior,
Ottawa, Jan. 9, 1895.

Memorandum Mr. Burgess.

On August 2, 1894, I reported to Mr. Hall that Forest Ranger Cook, of Prince Albert, in his letter re destruction of timber by forest fires north of Prince Albert, had recommended that the tract outlined in pink on the annexed plan be reserved as a forest reservation, and that fire guards be placed as shown on the sketch ,which he thought the Northwest Council might be induced to make and keep in order. Mr. Hall thought the recommendation should stand for the minister's approval and you agreed with him.

Then we find a letter from the Hon. T. Mayne Daly, Minister of the Interior to the Lieutenant Governor of the Northwest Territories, dated Ottawa, 7th February, 1895:

My Dear Sir,—I inclose herewith for the inforpmation of your Government a plan showing a tract of land which Mr. Cook, a forest ranger of this department at Prince Albert, has recommended should be preserved as a forest reservation, and also a copy of a report and statement made by him of the estimated cost of a fire break for the protection of the proposed reservation from fire.

You will see from that correspondence that Mr. Cook refers to the sketch, that the different officials refer to the sketch marked in pink, and that the Minister of the Interior is prepared to approve of the recommendation and he refers to the sketch marked in pink. I produce the sketch on this file which is apparently referred to by the different parties. According to the copy of the plan or sketch referred to in all the correspondence which I have read, and which plan I now produce, I notice that the only portion of section 8 that is put in the forest reserve, or was intended to be put in the forest reserve in 1894 and 1895, is the northwest quarter of section 8, township 49, range 26, west of the 2nd meridian, and the west half of the northeast quarter of the same section. Thus, according to Mr. Cook's report and correspondence, and the subsequent correspondence, it was never his intention, or the intention of the Government, to put the south half of section 8, in the forest reserve. Why?—because, apparently, prior to that time the east half of the east half of section 8 was given to the rifle association as a rifle range and consequently the Government could not put it in the forest reserve. But the west half of the southeast quarter was still Government land and apparently that was put in the forest reserve together with the northwest quarter of section 8. But the south half of section 8 was never put in the forest reserve and for a good reason; there were some squatters on the portion along the river bank and apparently the department did not care to put the muskeg part in the forest reserve.

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia): There was no danger of its being burned, I presume?

Mr. McKAY: No, it was covered by water. I now find on the file a letter written by the secretary of the Department of the Interior to the Crown timber agent at Prince Albert, dated, Ottawa, 8th November, 1895 dealing with the report which he had received from the Crown timber agent referring to Mr. Cook's recommendation for the setting apart of this piece of land for a forest reserve, and in that letter he says:

> I am to say, however, that there is no objection to the tract shown on the plan being reserved as a forest reservation, and you may make a note in your records that no disposition is to be made of any land within the tract without consulting the department.

That is that the northwest quarter of section 8 and the west half of the northeast quarter of section 8 were not to be disposed of without consulting the department. If I understood the hon. member for Edmonton correctly, he contended that this Donaldson piece was in the forest reserve and had been in the forest reserve up to March, 1909 because he referred to Mr. Campbell's letter. Mr. Campbell's letter simply refers to a sketch and the sketch he refers to does not show the land by sections and quarter sections as does the sketch referred to in Mr. Cook's correspondence and the correspondence of different officials in regard to this matter. Hence, I come to the irresistible conclusion, that Mr. R. H. Campbell, on whom the hon. member for Edmonton depends for his statement that this piece of land was in the forest reserve, was wrong because this is what he produced (referring to plan). In fact, it is worse than I thought it was. The sketch does not show the Everett land and consequently this plan excludes the Everett land as well. That is what my hon. friend was referring to was it not?

Mr. OLIVER: I was not referring to the plan, I was referring to the letter that my hon. friend read just now where it spoke of the reservation on the assumption that the reservation covered the land in question and the rest of the file shows that, wherever these lands are spoken of, they are spoken of as being in the reserve. Therefore, in practice they were under reservation as against the public.

Mr. McKAY: Mr. Campbell's letter is dated 5th March, 1909. Here is another plan that Mr. Campbell's letter refers to. His letter reads as follows:

> Ottawa, March 5, 1909.
>
> Memorandum addressed to the Minister of the Interior.
> You asked me a few days ago to give a report in regard to the forest reserve lying across from the town of Prince Albert on the north side of the Saskatchewan river. This reserve as shown in pink on the plan hereunder was set apart in 1895, and has been continued as a reserve with the exception of small portions which are granted to the town of Prince Albert. The tract in question was not, however, included in the reserves as set apart by the Forest Reserves Act.

Here is the plan showing in pink right down to the water's edge. Mr. Campbell must be manifestly incorrect because it never went down to the river. Portions of the land along the water edge were sold on different occasions by the Liberal Administration and it was never in the forest reserve. It is manifest that Mr. Campbell's letter is wrong because the facts are as the hon. member for Edmonton has stated, that some time in 1896 Mr. Sanderson purchased a piece along the river; another piece was given to the Roman Catholic Church Corporation for church purposes; then some time prior to 1906 over fifty acres were sold by the Liberal Government to Mr. McLeod, and consequently Mr. Campbell could not be correct when he says this was always a forest reserve. Even if it were in the forest reserve we find that the late Government sold some to Mr. S. McLeod for three dollars an acre, shortly before 1906, without calling for notice, and a part of the northeast quarter adjoining the Everett homestead which was in the forest reserve, they sold to Judge Maguire and somebody else on time sale. I am not claiming that there was anything improper in that, but I cite it simply to show that even if this piece of land we are discussing had been in the forest reserve and had been taken out, they did not give notice to anybody when they made the sale. But I am satisfied the late Government came to the conclusion that apparently there was no necessity for giving notice. When we come to the Everett piece of land which was in the forest reserve as shown by the plans and was apparently taken out in 1908 according to Mr. Campbell's letter, we see it was given to Mr. Everett without any notice as homestead and consequently the late Government themselves did not consider it was necessary to give notice on that occasion.

Mr. OLIVER: How is the hon. gentleman aware there was no notice given?

Mr. McKAY: The files do not show it, and it was common report that there was no notice given.

Mr. OLIVER: It is understood that the regulations called for notice and the instructions were that entry should be given in accordance with the regulations, and therefore it is to be presumed there was notice.

Mr. McKAY: According to the file there was no notice given and the correspondence would show if there was notice given, but it does not. Does the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) contend that with regard to the dealings with other portions of the land which were in the forest reserve: the time sale to the Northern Produce Company; the time sale to Maguire and others; the absolute sale to McLeod of over fifty acres of the valuable portion along the river, does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) contend that notice was given. As a matter of fact, there was absolutely none. This all goes to show that even if this Donaldson piece had been in the forest reserve, the late Government dealt with double that quantity of land without notice and in the case of the other pieces of land that were sold to their different friends.

It is contended that there is a difference between the Everett homestead and the Donaldson homestead. I do not think that the mere fact of the city limits having been extended makes any difference, because at the time the Everett homestead was granted to Everett as a homestead in 1908, on the same section there had been sold to Mr. Samuel McLeod (who makes the declaration in this case), without advertisement, a quantity of land at three dollars per acre. This same section, mark you, was sold without notice; he registered sub-divisions of land in 1910 off the same section across the river as Everett got his homestead in 1908 without any notice. Consequently, it had ceased to be homestead land in 1906 prior to the time Mr. Everett got his homestead. Therefore the cry that there is a vast difference now because it is within the city limits does not have any effect. I do not think the fact that it is within the city limits makes any difference at all, because if it was wrong in one case it is wrong in the other. The Everett piece at the time it was given as a homestead had ceased to be regarded as homestead land. I again repeat that possibly the late Administration through their officials, were apparently misled by the Weyburn case, and no doubt the present Administration was misled in the same way as the late Administration with regard to this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that when one goes over the whole matter, we must come to the conclusion that the officials who had been dealing with this particular land dealt with it in the same way they had been in the habit of dealing with it under the previous Administration, and it is quite possible and it is very probable that the attention of the Minister of the Interior was never drawn to it, or if his attention had been called to it he would very likely say: follow the usual practice in dealing with this land. It seems to me reasonable that the new Minister of the Interior—mark you he was only in office a few months—would be very likely to tell his officials to deal with it in the same way as it had been dealt with by the late Administration. Then, let us take the whole section and see how it was dealt with by the late Administration. I have shown, to my mind conclusively, that the Donaldson piece never had been in the forest reserve, that the Everett piece had been in the forest reserve and was taken out, and that the homestead regulations demanded notice and that apparently no notice was given in the Everett case. It was no doubt the intention of the then Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), that notice should be given, but the correspondence shows that notice had not been given and that the minister (Mr. Oliver), had been misled with regard to it. Then when you come to some of the time sales —remember that some of this land had been in the forest reserve and according to the regulations read by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) should have been advertised, yet when they came to make time sales to Maguire and Company, there was no advertisement; when they came to make time sales of the quarter of 7, there was no advertisement, and when it came to the absolute sale to McLeod of that valuable high and dry piece of fifty acres right across the river, there was no advertisement, and it was sold to him at three dollars an acre. When the bridge was being built, or, at any rate, talked of.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the date of the sale to McLeod?

Mr. McKAY: I am under the impression that it was between 1900 and 1906. I do not seek to impute any improper motives to the hon. member for Edmonton, the former Minister of the Interior; I am simply pointing out how this matter was dealt with by his officials, and I leave it to any member of this House who is familiar with what is involved in the administration of the different departments, and who must realize the multitude of work coming before a new minister who takes office on October 20, as well as the legislation arising in the meeting of Parliament in November, to say whether or not the minister, if such a question arose, would naturally be inclined to trust the officials who had been carrying on the administration of affairs under the late Government. It is out of the question for any reasonable man to contend that the new Minister of the Interior, however intelligent and clever he might be, could be fully seized of all the numerous details in connection with the department in the short space of time which would necessarily have elapsed between the time of his assuming the duties of minister and the making of this homestead entry. Would it not be natural that he should say to his officials, if inquiry were made with regard to such a matter; deal with it as you have been dealing with such matters in the past?

I am sorry indeed that I have had to address the House at such length, but I have felt it incumbent upon me to make a few remarks in regard to this matter to show clearly why I come to the conclusion that the Minister of Public Works should not be censured in connection with this motion. I would again direct the attention of the House to the query which I made a few moments ago: why did not the late Administration, who should have been familiar with the matter, place this land under the school lands instead of selling some fifty acres at $3 an acre, and disposing of other portion on time sales? With regard to the time sales. I am satisfied that, so far as the city of Prince Albert is concerned, it will benefit by them, and possibly the late Minister of the Interior had that under consideration. But he should not take the position that these lands should have been put under school lands when he had an opportunity of doing that when administering the department, and did not do so. Knowing the hon. member for Edmonton as I do, I am satisfied that he had not thoroughly digested this correspondence or the manner in which this matter had been dealt with under his own administration, otherwise I do not think he would get up in this House and, in respect of a minister who had been in office only from October 20 to April 16, say that he should have protected these eighty acres by putting them under school lands. As a matter of fact the hon. gentleman sold or parted with the unsold part of that section, with the exception of the eighty acres and another forty acres which apparently the general public do not know anything about, but which I think he has tied up in such a way that nobody can touch it. If the hon. member is fair, he will admit that he would not have taken that position if he had known the exact situation with regard to this quarter.

So far as this motion is concerned it is simply a vote of censure of the Minister of Public Works, who, at the time in question was administering the Department of the Interior; therefore I have confined my remarks strictly to that phase of the matter. Before I conclude I desire to draw to the attention of the House one other point. I find that on October 5, 1909, Mr. R. H. Campbell wrote to the then Minister of the Interior inclosing a tracing showing that the original forest reserve extended right down to the water's edge, with the exception of the piece given to the city of Prince Albert. I have shown that prior to March, 1909, the late Administration had given a homestead to Everett; consequently that was not in the forest reserve in that year. They also sold to Macleod some fifty acres, which could not originally have been in the forest reserve. On January 27, 1910, Mr. R. H. Campbell wrote to Mayor Holmes of Prince Albert, inclosing a copy of a plan, and telling him what lands were in the forest reserve. I shall read this letter, for I think it is very important that the House should be fully seized of its significance, and the importance of this question as to whether or not this land was in the forest reserve. The letter is as follows:

Department of the Interior, Forestry Branch.
Ottawa, January 27, 1910

Dear Sir,—In accordance with the instructions of the Minister of the Interior when you were in Ottawa recently, I beg to enclose you a plan showing the location of the lands at present reserved for forest purposes north of the river from Prince Albert. The lands shown in pink were all reserved, but those cross-hatched in black have been withdrawn from the reserve.

By this letter Mr. Campbell says that the original reserve ran down to the river, and that portion that is cross-hatched in black has been withdrawn from the reserve, consequently the late Administration must have taken the Donaldson homestead out of the reserve—if it ever was in—because Mayor Holmes is officially informed that certain portions, including the Donaldson homestead, are now without the reserve. But as a matter of fact it never was within the forest reserve; that I submit I have clearly shown. So far as the officials of the department here were concerned, this land was dealt with as thought it were within the forest reserve. The member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) says that the late Dominion lands agent, Mr. Dempster, informed him that across the record of this land at Prince Albert was written the word 'reserved.' I have naturally made some inquiries about this thing. It was not brought to my knowledge until long after it was entered as a homestead. As far as I can see, it was an unfortunate mistake on the part of the departmental officials in some way. I made inquiries about this, and as I understood, it was in this way: the Canadian Northern railway crosses the river on this section, and the railway going north of Prince Albert runs through a portion of this homestead lot. I am informed that there was written across something 'reserved for C. N. R.'—that is reserved for the Canadian Northern railway right of way, and possibly that has given rise to the idea that it was reserved, but apparently what was really reserved was the right of way; if anybody got the land it would have to be subject to the right of way of that company. I am not giving this as authoritative or as a thing I know, but this is what I learn on making inquiry, and it was only a pencil entry, by whom made nobody knows. There is absolutely nothing on record to show that it was ever reserved either for a forest reserve or for anything else, but apparently the right of way was reserved through that piece of land. Now, the position was this, as I take it from reading the correspondence—that Mr. Donaldson knew, as everybody knew as it was the common report, that Mr. Everett got his homestead without notice, and that it was valuable, that Mr. McLeod had sub-divided his claim, that he got it without notice. Mr. Donaldson made inquiries about several pieces of land. A great deal has been said as to the conversation alleged to have taken place between Mr. Donaldson and the Minister of Public Works. Suppose that there had been such a conversation, apparently Mr. Donaldson did not get any satisfaction from the Minister of Public Works. When Mr. Donaldson approached him, it is likely the minister would not know anything about it. We find that there was nothing done with regard to this piece of land, and the first correspondence we find is a letter from Mr. Donaldson to the deputy minister. Now, if Mr. Donaldson was going to do anything improperly, he would not write to an old official of the late Administration. But he knew that Mr. Everett got his homestead, he knew that Mr. McLeod got his piece of land, and that these other pieces were sold to the parties enumerated, and he writes to the official mentioning several pieces of land and asking if any of these are open to homestead entry. The deputy on that occasion apparently looks into the matter and finds that while the others were sold, this particular piece of land was open to homestead entry. He apparently had searched the files and found that, though everybody thought it was in the forest reserve, they were mistaken, and it was free.

Mr. OLIVER: May I correct my hon. friend? Mr. Donaldson's letter was to the minister, and not to the deputy.

Mr. McKAY: The first letter of February 7, he appears not to have received any answer.

Mr. OLIVER: The deputy replied, the letter having been referred to him. The deputy replied on the 3rd of April.

Mr. McKAY: Do I understand that Mr. Donaldson wrote to the deputy?

Mr. OLIVER: No, to the minister.

Mr. McKAY: Well, take it that way. So far as the Minister of Public Works is concerned, apparently all he does is to say that if there was a conversation about land, it had escaped his memory. If he was going to be crooked about it, to use a common phrase, he would have dealt with it instead of handing it over to the deputy to deal with in the ordinary way. It was dealt with in the ordinary way, and the deputy tells Mr. Donaldson that all these parcels of land were taken except this piece which apparently was open, but he would write to the agent and see about it. Mr. Donaldson's son goes to the Dominion Lands agent and shows the letter, and when they search they find that there is no reservation in any way, and so the entry is allowed to go through. For these reasons, I do not think the Minister of Public Works should be censured, and so far as I am concerned, these are the reasons why I intend to vote against the amendment to the motion.

Mr. GEORGE E. McCRANEY (Saskatchewan): At this hour of the night, I do not wish to detain the House for long, but there are a few observations I would like to make. This discussion has brought out two points of view. The minister stands by his declaration that this land was in the forest reserve, and he says that the land agent had followed the old precedent and had disregarded the printed rule. The hon. member for Prince Albert has another theory, a curious theory. He says the minister did not know anything about it, but the officials dealt with this matter as other lands have been dealt with in that locality. Now, if that were the case, the file shows that Mr. Coté regarded the land as being within the forest reserve and suggested that it should be posted up or advertised in the usual way. And he suggests that the Dominion Lands agent should be asked to report on it. I think that while the hon. member for Prince Albert wishes us to understand that the officials at Prince Albert had dealt with this as other lands had been dealt with, the fact is that the Dominion Lands agent who had dealt with other lands was not there. Mr. McKechnie was a new official and I think that every one of the staff who had been on when other lands had been dealt with in that vicinity had been fired. Now as to the minister's theory, I know Mr. McKechnie quite well. I met him the first day I went west over eleven years tgo, he is a capable man, and I should say, he would do the work of the Dominion Lands office at Prince Albert as well as any man who has not had previous training in that line. For a number of years he was a collector for McCormick Harvester Company. When the International Harvester Company took over the McCormick business, Mr. McKechnie continued as collector for the International Harvester Company. He had got a new master; but I do not think for a moment that when he entered the employ of the International Harvester Company, he followed the precedent that had been set by the McCormick Company and disregarded the written instructions of his new employers. Knowing Mr. McKechnie as I do, I am quite satisfied that he would be very careful, from his previous training, to follow instructions, that he would spend very little time hunting up old files and what he would think would be bad precedents and that he would remember, being a good Conservative, that there had been a change of Government, and that there ought to be a change of policy, that if instructions had not been followed in the past they should be in the future. Unless he was told to do otherwise I would expect Mr. McKechnie to follow written instructions. The Minister of Public Works speaks of this matter as a mistake. So does the hon. member for Prince Albert. Nobody justifies it. The Minister of Public Works claims credit for having cancelled the Crawford transaction; when he discovered that this was a mistake he should have done the same thing. From his explanation he has an official who has overlooked the rules and who has disposed of a piece of land worth over $100,000 contrary to the regulations of his department. I say that there was no legal or moral right in Donaldson to hold that land when it was disposed of in that way, and that the minister would have been perfectly justified if he had cared to do so, in cancelling the patent. I am not assuming that he cared to do so. The fact is that although he makes Mr. McKechnie the scapegoat to-night and throws on him the responsibility for a transaction taking place in April, 1912, since the beginning of this year he has appointed Mr. McKechnie to conduct an investigation with regard to the Hutchison homestead, thus showing his confidence in him and his judgment, and his belief that he is a good officer of the department. There is something that is not explainable in this whole affair. We have had before us two explanations, I think we ought to hear Mr. McKechine. Mr. McKechine knows the facts. The instructions which were sent Mr. McKechine were dated April 13, 1912. The entry of Arthur Donaldson is received on April 16th, 1912. No person who knows the way the mails go from Ottawa to Prince Albert would say that the entry of the 16th of April was received because of the letter of the 13th of April mailed in Ottawa. The letter of the 13th of April had not reached Prince Albert at the time the entry was received; something else must have reached Prince Albert. The secretary of the department, Mr. Pereira, had asked a report from Mr. McKechnie on this land and he did that on the suggestion of Mr. Coté. Mr. Coté in his memorandum says that the land should be posted or advertised and he suggests that the Dominion Lands agent should be asked for a report. Mr. Coté knew that this land was in the city of Prince Albert. He had in mind the practice of the department, because he had served under the previous minister, and he proposed that there should be a report from Mr. McKechnie on this homestead, which might prevent Donaldson getting it as soon as he would like. There must have been some communication between Ottawa and Prince Albert after the letter of April 13 was sent out and before the application of April 16 was received by McKechnie. I would like to know what happened but I expect that there was a good deal of hot telegraphing going on.

Changes of policy consequent upon changes of government ought to be changes to the advantage of the public. There are throughout the West quite a number of homesteads which will be available for entry but which have not yet been put upon the list. I shall give to the acting minister the numbers of two that have come to my attention because for the last two or three years I have been making inquiries as to when they would be thrown open. They are S.E. 9-41-6, west 3 and north ½, 21-44-4, west 3. The answer I always received from the late Minister of the Interior and from the officials of the department was that these sections, being odd sections were overlooked because they were railway lands but that a list was in preparation in the Department of the Interior and that at some time convenient to the department these lands would be advertised, plenty of notice would be given and they would be thrown open to entry. In view of the precedent in the Donaldson case I am anxious to know whether these lands are going to be properly advertised, with plenty of notice given, or are going to be dealt out to friends of the party now in power as plums to be found for the good boys.

I notice in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning a despatch which shows how the land hunger has taken hold of the people of the West. This is in connection with some land that has been opened for entry at Moosejaw. The despatch reads:

Excitement at Moosejaw.

Moose Jaw, Sask., April 16.—An exciting time was witnessed at the Dominion Land office here when some hundred and fifty men gathered in the hope of gaining cancellation on a homestead and pre-emption near Assiniboia, a new C.P.R. town south of Moosejaw. The police were called, but no blows were exchanged, and in the end the land was made over to R. C. Perkins, formerly of Owen Sound, Ont.

In conclusion I would say that if there is anything in ministerial responsibility, that responsibility rests with the present Minister of Public Works on his own showing. If he is not responsible, according to the explanation which has been put forward by the hon. member for Prince Albert, we ought to find where the responsibility lies. The public will not be satisfied without knowing the facts in this case, and I think that the Minister of Public Works should receive the condemnation of this House and that the full facts of the case should be disclosed by an investigation of the circumstances surrounding it.

Mr. OLIVER: Before the vote is taken I would like to have the papers that were referred to laid on the table.

Mr. SPEAKER: I gave a decision in regard to that that these letters which were read should be laid on the table in the care of some official so that they might be returned to the department

Mr. McCRANEY.

Mr. OLIVER: There are certain files which the Minister of Public Works gave the House to understand pertained to the same subject as the letters. I would consider them a part of the record, and would ask that they be placed on the table with the letters that were actually written.

Mr. SPEAKER: My ruling did not go so far as that for this reason, that the case which I cited, the British case, set out that a minister was not obliged to lay on the table documents which would not be produced in responce to an order of the House for their production. From a return would be omitted all private papers or documents which, for state or other reasons, should be withheld, and it is not to be expected of course that such documents would be laid on the table in a case of this kind.

House divided on motion (Mr. Oliver).

SUPPLY.

Amendment negatived, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BORDEN: I move that the committee, rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) think that we ought not to make some progress in Supply? It has been stated day after day in the Conservative press that the Opposition is obstructing public business. I want it to be understood that I for one am prepared to stay here just as long as it is necessary in order to vote Supply to carry on the public business of the country. I think that the matter of granting Supply is of great importance and that attention ought to be given to it at as early a date as possible. I rise for the purpose of making that assertion on my own behalf and I really believe that I can speak for the gentlemen on this side of the House. On all matters of public importance, with the exception of one Bill which we conscientiously are opposed to, we are prepared to facilitate in every possible way the expeditious carrying on of the business of the country. Therefore, I object, Mr. Chairman, to the committee rising without doing any business.

Mr. BORDEN: I am glad that the hon. gentleman is in so amiable a mood. One reason why I did not propose to go on with Supply was that I understood it was arranged last night that we were not to take Supply to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BORDEN: But seing that the hon. gentleman is so anxious, we will go on for a while.

Department of Customs—salaries, $287,725.

Mr. BUREAU: There is an increase of $9,400 and I would ask the minister to explain how it comes about.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): I explained it the other day but I will be glad to explain it again. We have increased the number in the first division, sub-division 'A' by two; that is we have taken two from sub-division ' B' and added them to sub-division 'A.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, there is only an increase of one.

Mr. REID: If the right hon. gentleman will look at page 18 he will see that the commissioner of customs remains the same but that in the first division there were two last year while there are four this year; that is an increase of two. They have been promoted from the first division of sub-division 'B.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No there is only one promoted from the first division.

Mr. REID: We promoted two from 1B to 1A and then we promoted one from 2A to 1B leaving the number in 1B at 9. Therefore, there is only a decrease of one in 1B. Then we promoted eleven from 2B to 1B.

Mr. BUREAU: From where?

Mr. REID: The new men that are coming into the department are all coming in under 2B. To the 1A class we add two, thus decreasing the number in 1B.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not tally. In the second division of sub-division A there are twenty-five this year and there were fourteen last year. In 1B there is one less, although you claim that you are promoting two to 1A.

Mr. REID: We promoted two from 1B to 1A and when we did that we promoted one from 2A to 1B, making one less than we had last year. Then we promoted eleven from 2B to 2A. The new employees all come in under 2B according to the Civil Service Act.

Mr. GERMAN: Would the minister explain if there have been any increases?

Mr. REID: Two officers have been promoted and that makes an increase.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is not the increase a pretty big jump for one year?

Mr. REID: We are promoting those at the head of the class into the next class so that they will get increases under the Civil Service Act. On account of the increased revenue we have had to add many more officials to the department and they had to come under sub-section (b) of the second division.

Mr. MACDONALD: That means nothing. How many additional people does the minister employ?

Mr. REID: There are ten additional officers.

Mr. GERMAN: Would the minister start out by telling us who belong to these divisions? Would the minister be good enough to inform me what does first division, sub-division A mean, and let him tell us what first division, sub-division B means? I am free to admit that I do not know what it means and I want an explanation from the minister.

Mr. REID: I wish to give the hon. gentleman all the information I can. Of course the hon. gentleman knows that the first division, sub-division A, is the highest class in the Civil Service and that a salary of $2,800 is the minimum of that class. I do not know that I can give any further information than that this class commences at $2,800 and goes to $4,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is their particular business?

Mr. REID: These officers are in charge of the different branches of the department.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is no information.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What were they getting last year?

Mr. REID: The two promoted were getting $2,800 and were at the top of the next class below. Having been there for many years they had reached the maximum of their class and they could not get any further increase unless by promotion.

Mr. GERMAN: What do they get now?

Mr. REID: They get $2,800 and they will get an increase of $100 per annum afterwards.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): Who are the officers promoted?

Mr. REID: Mr. Watson who has been in the service for many years and the other officer, I cannot give his name just at this moment, but he has been in the service also for a number of years.

Mr. WILSON: I know Mr. Farrow and Mr. McLaughlin of Montreal; are they referred to?

Mr. REID: This refers to the inside service at Ottawa.

Mr. WILSON: I am perfectly serious in the question I am asking; I know Mr. McLaughlin of Montreal, he is one of the ablest officers of the department and he was in Montreal until a few years ago. Has he been brought to Ottawa?

Mr. REID: Mr. McLaughlin is surveyor of customs at Montreal.

Mr. WILSON: I understand that Mr. McLaughlin has been transferred to the Ottawa office, and is working under Mr. MacDougald and Mr. Farrow, and that he is classed under sub-division A?

Mr. REID: Mr. Farrow is the assistant commissioner, and his salary remains the same. It is the only one at $4,000.

Mr. WILSON: What about McLaughlin?

Mr. REID: The only Mr. McLaughlin I have in mind is the surveyor of customs at Montreal.

Mr. WILSON: Has he been transferred to Ottawa?

Mr. REID: No. He is still surveyor in Montreal, and, by the way, a first-class officer.

Mr. CARVELL: I understand there is a gentleman in the department who came from the Canadian Manufacturers Association; in what class was he placed?

Mr. REID: I presume the hon. member refers to Mr. Breadner. He was employed in the Department of Customs for I think twenty-four or twenty-five years, when he resigned to become the tariff expert of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. We have felt the need in the department of a man who has had such an experience as Mr. Breadner has had, and I got him to come back to the department again, and when Mr. Bristol, chief Dominion appraiser, resigned in December last, Mr. Breadner was given his position as chief Dominion appraiser and member of the Board of Customs.

Mr. CARVELL: In what class has Mr. Breadner been placed?

Mr. REID: He is on the outside service.

Mr. MACDONALD: We have heard a great deal about the desirability of Civil Service reform in this country, and, with reference to the report made by an expert brought over from the Old Country, I would like to know from my hon. friend, before these estimates are passed, whether the Government intend to bring down during the present session any measure of reform in connection with the Civil Service?

Mr. REID: That report is now under consideration.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend has under consideration any measure of Civil Service reform, he is hardly in a position to ask the committee to vote these estimates at this stage, because his proposed measure of reform might seriously affect the voting of this money. It might be desirable for my hon. friend to pass some item other than that of salaries, as the status and salaries of civil servants might be entirely changed as a result of any measure which might be submitted in this regard.

Mr. REID: I am willing to pass to one of the other items of my department if the hon. member wishes it, but I do not see why this item should not pass.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. minister said that Mr. Bristol, chief Dominion appraiser, resigned in December, 1912. Was he superannuated.

Mr. REID: He resigned without superannuation.

Mr. BUREAU: How long was he in the department?

Mr. REID: I think more than twenty years. He was entitled to superannuation had he remained in the service, but, of course, he lost it by reason of his resignation.

Mr. BUREAU: Was he asked to resign?

Mr. REID: He resigned of his own free will, and we were sorry indeed to lose him; he was one of the best officers in the department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Upon a previous occasion I called the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, to the fact that Mr. Baldwin, collector of customs at Coaticook had been dismissed from office because he wrote a letter appealing to both Liberals and Conservatives to lay aside their party politics and condemn those who were appealing to a certain class of people upon the ground that they owed nothing to England, and that certain people had been obliged to shoot bullet holes in the British flag in order to breathe the air of liberty. I made an appeal to my hon. friend as Minister of Customs to consider whether or not that gentleman ought to be reinstated, and I would ask him if he has taken up the case with a view to acting upon the letter which he afterwards wrote, stating frankly what he said and the reason why. His letter is a thoroughly patriotic one, having no reference to either of the great political parties, and simply condemning what he thought to be the disloyal utterances which were being made in a certain portion of this Dominion.

Mr. REID: I think the last paragraph of that letter contained very strong expressions against Mr. Page, the candidate for that constituency, and advising the constituents to vote against him.

Mr. MACDONALD: For what reason—because he was espousing the Nationalist cause?

Mr. REID: He concluded his letter by advising the people in his constituency to vote against Mr. Page; at any rate there was something to that effect in the letter. He was certainly doing something of that kind, and I think the hon. member will agree that as a Government official he should not take any part in politics. He made it a point to write and publish his letter and to have his picture in the paper, and he used very strong words against the Conservative party in that letter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; there was not a word against the Conservative party in the letter. It condemned the utterances of Mr. Bourassa in Parliament when that gentleman spoke against the Government for having sent soldiers to take part in the South African war. Mr. Baldwin condemned those who were making these disloyal statements. It would be difficult for any loyal servant of the Crown, under such circumstances to refrain from calling upon all good citizens to stand together against these disloyal appeals. I do not think that is interfering in politics. When such disloyal appeals are made, for which neither of the great parties is responsible and when an officer speaks against them making no attack upon either Liberals or Conservatives, I think it is going a long way to dismiss him for his patriotism. And he was dismissed upon the request of men, who, made the disloyal statements that Canada owed nothing to England but that Canadians had to shoot bullet holes in the English flag in order to obtain liberty. Does the minister tell us that when a public officer writes a letter publicly condemning utterances of this kind he is taking such a part in politics that, though a faithful and efficient officer, he should be dismissed?

Mr. REID: If I remember the letter correctly, it contained strong words against the Conservative candidate. And I certainly think a customs officer should attend to his own business and not interfere in any way in politics. That is the rule this House has laid down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps the hon. minister will allow the item to stand until I can produce the letter—I have a copy of it.

Mr. REID: As the hon. gentleman knows, there are other items on which this can be discussed, and pernaps hon. gentlemen will go on with these items with the understanding that one or two of them shall be left over.

Mr. ROSS: Is it on account of that letter alone that he was dismissed? Was there any investigation?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. ROSS: That seems a very high-handed proceeding.

Mr. MACDONALD: The question raised places the Minister of Customs in a very unfortunate position. I do not know who may be looked to to uphold the loyalty and patriotism of the people if not the man who has taken the oath of allegiance and occupies an important position in the service of the Crown. In the olden days in Canada a man in the customs service occupied one of the most superior positions in the country, and in England the customs service is one of the most important of all. When there arose, last election, a party who happened to be the allies of the Minister of Customs who were deliberately and notoriously disloyal to Canada and to the Empire, and who made the most inflammatory appeals to the prejudices of one class of the people, would not this customs officer have been recreant to his duty had he failed to raise his voice in protest? The Minister of Customs owes his position to the fact that there sit behind him men from Quebec who were elected as a result of these disloyal and dishonest appeals. He was paying a political debt to the men who put him in office when he dismissed a good and patriotic servant of the Crown whose sole offence was that he declared that loyalty to the Crown and devotion to Canada should be respected. While there are certain supporters of the Minister of Customs who owe their election to these disloyal cries, there are others who were elected as the result of flag-flapping and all kinds of miserable appeals. And as a result of the combination of the Conservatives and the Nationalists the Minister of Customs obtained his position in this House and in this Government. This House has been engaged in the past six months in the consideration of a question on which the hon. minister and those behind him have declared that they were the sole repositories in this land of everything that meant loyalty and devotion to the Crown.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: And the hon. gentleman who has the audacity to say 'hear, hear,' sits cheek by jowl with the very man who asked for the support of the electors on the ground that he wanted to shoot holes in the British flag.

An hon. MEMBER: Rot.

Mr. MACDONALD: And the hon. member for North Essex could discover one minister, were he in his place to-night, who went even further than I have said, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), who had the audacity to declare in this House that if Sir John Macdonald had been alive and Prime Minister instead of the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) no soldiers would have gone from Canada to South Africa to assist the British arms, and that no duty was imposed upon any portion of the people of Canada to support British prestige upon the sea. He could have seen sitting close beside him, men who made these dishonest, inflammable appeals to the habitants of Quebec and who declared that if the policy of assisting the Mother Country on the sea proposed by the Liberal party were carried into effect, the sons of fathers in the province of Quebec would be compelled by a policy of conscription to take part in the battles of the Empire. The Minister of Customs owes his seat to the fact that there came from the province of Quebec at least twenty men who promised their constituentts that in Parliament they would take a position in accordance with their appeals on the stump and who when they came here, by this dishonest alliance which has been made between the Conservatives and Nationalists in this country, combined to hold office and patronage and refused explanations when sought here in Parliament as to the resignation of the leader of the Nationalists from his seat in the Government. The Minister of Customs is willing to assume the responsibility for the fact that coming from the province of Ontario where appeals were made that the Empire and our relation to the Empire were threatened, he dismissed a man, whose sole offence was that where disloyalty showed its head he ventured to raise his voice in protest against this menace to British connection and British interest here in Canada. That is the position in which the Minister of Customs stands.

Mr. EDWARDS: It comes with ill grace from hon. gentlemen to debate as they have done for the last five or ten minutes. We have been somewhat accustomed in the past to hear such utterances as have fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Pictou. I do not think we should be surprised at anything that that hon. gentleman says at any time. When he attempts to read a lesson to members on this side of the House for having disciplined a customs officer for having interfered in politics and advances the reason which he has advanced here to-night, saying that the man was dismissed because he had shown his loyalty and because he had denounced disloyal utterances, then I say it comes with an extremely bad grace from the hon. member for Pictou or any other hon. gentleman on the other side of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: I want to say to my hon. friend——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACDONALD: When my hon. friend says we have no right to say that I say that the hon. member from Frontenac has no right to impute to any hon. gentleman on this side of the House——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take your medicine.

Mr. MACDONALD: Medicine? Neither the hon. member for Vancouver or the hon. member for Frontenac can hand out medicine. No hon. gentleman in this House has any right to impute to any other hon. gentleman any lack of loyalty and I say that I take from no man any such imputation.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member from Pictou is accustomed to use language which is not parliamentary and often goes beyond that point, but he is very sensitive himself when his own toes are trodden upon or he expects that they will be. I can only conclude that he knows perfectly well that his position to-night is most inconsistent when he talks about loyalty. Has he forgotten that his own leader has said:

> Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy the day when Canada would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy.

Has he forgotten that his own leader stated in a foreign country:

> Canada would never consent to Imperial confederation even on commercial lines because the consequence would be the participation of Canada in Britain's wars and Canada would never consent to that.

This is the hon. gentleman who reads us a lesson on loyalty. Has he forgotten that another hon. member from that side of the House said:

> As a Canadian I wish to say——

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. EDWARDS: We are not indebted to Great Britain for anything.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The point I make is whether Mr. Baldwin was properly dismissed from office in no way depends on the utterances of any hon. member in this House thirty or forty years ago.

The CHAIRMAN: I admit that the debate has gone far from the point under discussion but it is very hard for me to stop an hon. member answering when an other hon. member has gone a little too far.

Mr. EDWARDS: The Mr. Baldwin who has been referred to here to-night is not concerned in the item of Supply under discussion and if hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House are in order in bringing his name in question or what he said I am certainly in order in bringing in some other name. The trouble is that I am quoting the exact words of their leader and quoting things said by hon. members on that side of the House that were disloyal in the extreme and were applauded by their leader and by themselves. That is what pinches. I am perfectly willing to admit that it is not relevant to the subject under discussion but neither was the reference of the hon. gentleman. I could quote further remarks made by Mr. Turcotte, a former member on that side of the House. He said:

> It is not patriotic or loyal, I say, to contend that we must remain ever under the protection of the British flag.

I understand perfectly well, as every person in this House does, that it was pure bluff on the part of the hon. member for St.

John when he asked us to go into Supply to-night. We all understood that perfectly well.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to compel the hon. member to withdraw that phrase.

Mr. EDWARDS: Might I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: I suppose the hon. gentleman is going to withdraw.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I use the words that he did not wish to facilitate the business, instead of 'bluff'?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I ask the withdrawal of that expression. It does not tend to pleasant discussion. I ask him to withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand the intention of the hon. member is to withdraw.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Let him do it then.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had used another word which would not grate so much on the extreme sensibilities of my hon. friend. We are all aware—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Wihdraw first. Take it back.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order. I ask him to withdraw that expression.

Mr. EDWARDS: In deference to him I have used the words 'did not wish to facilitate business' instead of 'bluff.'

Mr. PUGSLEY: I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the statement that he knew it was a bluff on my part. I demand its withdrawal, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EDWARDS: I suppose I cannot use words of the same meaning in the same sentence, and as I used the words 'did not wish to facilitate business' instead of 'bluff' I suppose the word 'bluff' would have to go out. My hon. friend is sufficiently well versed in the use of the English language—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think you should ask him to withdraw that expression, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I suppose it would be more simple to withdraw the word.

Mr. EDWARDS: I thought I had withdrawn it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Do it.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood him to withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It is not withdrawn.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not wish—

Mr. CARVELL: Withdraw.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think it is the gentle voice of my hon. friend from Carleton.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and I am going to stay here and see it out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the hon. gentleman will not withdraw the word and obey your ruling, I think you should not allow him to continue his speech. We must have order in this House.

The CHAIRMAN: I asked the hon. member to withdraw the word and I understood him to withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He has not.

Mr. EDWARDS: Your understanding Mr. Chairman is better than that of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. GERMAN: The speaker must abide by the order of the Chair, he must withdraw that statement.

Mr. MACDONALD: Make him withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: That is not a way to address the Chair.

Mr. MACDONALD: You would make us withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand the hon. member to withdraw the statement.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am glad at last that it has penetrated the undersanding of hon. members opposite. Far be it from me to reflect upon or to attempt in any way to hurt the feelings of an hon. gentleman who has so much regard for the dignity of this House as the hon. member for St. John. Allow me also to say that it would be far from me to say anything that would hurt the very sensitive feelings of the hon. member for Pictou or of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., who is known throughout the length and breadth of this land, and particularly in this House, for his extreme courtesy to members on both sides.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: Surely my hon. friend does not call me to order for paying him compliments like that. I have used a great many expressions about the hon. member for St. John, but lately he has blossomed out in a new role, as a defender of the suffragettes. He has earned for himself throughout the country, I venture to say, the distinguished title of William Pankhurst Pugsley. I say, Mr. Chairman, that I have no wish not to facilitate the work of this House. The hon. member for St. John is extremely anxious that we should pass some items of Supply. I do not want to take up time, and I do not want to prevent him from facilitating the business of the House. It is well known that during the past few weeks he has been extremely anxious to facilitate the business of the House. I congratulate him upon his extreme anxiety to go on, and see some progress made. I think that comes with very good grace from him. I look upon it as an attempt on his part to atone for the past, and I hope he will now allow the items to go through, and not drift to other subjects that have nothing to do with the matter under discussion. I have tried to keep close to the subject, and I hope he will do likewise.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not surprised that the reference to the dismissal of an official in the province of Quebec who is a loyal citizen has brought forth such a remarkable exhibition of temper as we have had from the hon. member for Frontenac. We have heard the same speech every time he is on his feet. I do not know what he would do if he had not on the top of his desk that reference to the statement that is said to have been made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in the United States some five and twenty years ago. It is not the shorter catechism; it is the longer catechism for that hon. gentleman. He could not speak if it were not for that. I think I have heard him refer to Turcotte a dozen times since I was in the House, and this comes from the man who accepts a gold watch wrung from the postmasters and mail carriers in his constituency. This is the man who talks about the dignity of members. This is the man who turns traitor—I will withdraw the word if he thinks it too strong—on the Minister of Justice.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, I wish that word withdrawn.

Mr. CARVELL: I will withdraw it, I knew he would object to it. A man like my hon. friend always whines when you tell him the truth. I expected he would raise a row about it.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has no right to use such a word.

Mr. EDWARDS: I ask that the hon. member withdraw the word when he is told.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I will withdraw it. I will say he always cries baby; it is the same thing. He is the man who was put up to ask the question as to who was to be warden of Kingston Penitentiary, the man who tried to work up a creed prejudice against the Minister of Justice, the man who tries to have a certain man appointed to a position in Kingston Penitentiary because he happens to be an Orangeman and not a Roman Catholic.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. member is in order.

Mr. CARVELL: I can prove it by the records of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not surprised that my hon. friend gets ugly over this. One would expect him to get ugly.

Some hon MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I wish to give an emphatic denial to the statement made by my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not a point of order. I rise to a point of order. I demand my rights.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not propose to allow a member to take away the floor from me.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member for Carleton has made a false statement.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not a point of order.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member has made a false statement.

Mr. CARVELL: I won't take it from anybody that there is any point of order upon that.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member for Carleton, N.B. has lied.

The CHAIRMAN: Such language will lead hon. gentlemen too far.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely you will not allow the words of the hon. member for Frontenac to go unchallenged.

The CHAIRMAN: No, certainly the hon. member has no right to say that another member lied.

Mr. GRAHAM: You should ask him to withdraw.

Mr. EDWARDS: In obedience to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and only in obedience to your ruling, I withdraw. I said what I meant, but I will follow the custom of the hon. member for Carleton, and immediately withdraw it.

Mr. CARVELL: We have the hon. member for Frontenac in his true colours tonight. We have never got the hon. gentleman where he belonged before. A man who so far forgets himself, who loses his head, who displays his natural self to such an extent that he will tell another member of this House that he lies—you can expect a man like that to make the poor mail carriers contribute a gold watch and chain to himself.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is another false statement which is better represented by the word 'lie.' I will have to withdraw that expression here, but I am prepared to say it outside, where I will not have to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN: I will remind the hon. gentleman that he is out of order now, and I would draw his attention to the fact that he is going too far.

Mr. BORDEN: I think the debate is wandering very far indeed from the item under discussion, and we had better come back to it.

Mr. CARVELL: I rather agree with my right hon. friend that we are wandering somewhat. I am only trying to treat the hon. member for Frontenac to a little of his own medicine and he does not like that. This hon. gentleman has been trying to run this House for the last two or three years and it is necessary to give him a little dose of his own medicine in order to make him appreciate it. I think he is appreciating it now and I hope in future that he will be a little more moderate and try to conduct himself a little more along the lines of orderly debate. I admit frankly that that is my object in telling my hon. friend some of the things I have told him. I hope that we will have heard the last of these old stock speeches that they say that somebody made on this side of the House. Now, to come down to the question at issue, I hope that the Minister of Customs will give some better reason than has already been given why he dismissed from office a man who thought it his duty to defend the good name and fame of a large section of this country. The Minister of Customs ought to try and find some better reason for driving this man out of office. I think, now that the heat has been allowed to cool off a little and that his Nationalist friends have become good Conservatives, he ought to ask these gentlemen to withdraw their objection to this man and reinstate him.

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia): Lest the language which has been made use of here this evening towards a gentleman who has been retired may be misconstrued as including the gentleman who was defeated in the election and who was opposed by the gentleman who was dismissed from office, I want to point out that Mr. Page is an officer in command of a battery of artillery ready to turn out and defend the country upon any occasion.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about Armand Lavergne?

Mr. HUGHES: I have always found Armand Lavergne ready to defend his country.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about his Nationalist attack? Are you standing for Armand Lavergne and for the country?

Mr. HUGHES: I have an extract in my archives which states that a gentleman by the name of E. M. Macdonald made a speech on a certain occasion. Does he want me to resurrect it?

Mr. MACDONALD: I want to say to the hon. Minister of Militia that he will find no speech of mine that ever approached any of the speeches made by Mr. Armand Lavergne in Quebec denouncing the duty of Canada to support the Empire in naval matters, speeches in which he incited the people of Quebec to take the attitude that they should give no assistance to England.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am exceedingly sorry that the fact that I am asking the Minister of Customs for this information has led to such a stormy scene and I am sure that upon reflection the hon. member for Frontenac will be sorry that he used language which was calculated to produce such disagreeable scenes as those we have witnessed. I do not mean his reference to myself when he said that, in urging that we go on with Supply, I had not been actuated with a sincere desire to get on with Supply. I am and I think that the hon. member for Frontenac very unnecessarily obstructed the procedure this evening. The way to get on with Supply is to get on. As far as I am concerned I have had sufficient information with regard to the item under discussion. I do not desire to raise any further objection or ask for any more information, but I think, in order to remove any wrong impression from the mind, even of my hon. friend from Frontenac, although he is only one member and perhaps not the most important member of the House, I will take the opportunity of reading the letter of Mr. Baldwin and it was in consequence of this letter that this gentleman was dismissed from office. After he had received word that he had been suspended Mr. Baldwin wrote a letter to the Minister of Customs, stating frankly that he had written the letter, stating why he had written it, stating that he felt it his duty to do so as a loyal subject of His Majesty, that he had written it after hours and that he did not intend it to interfere with the performance of his official duties. This is the letter:

An hon. MEMBER: What are you quoting from.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I quote from the Coaticook Observer of September 15, 1911:

The Nationalists.

What are they? Who are they? Where do they come from? Where are they going?

There comes a time in the history of nations as in the lives of individuals, when somebody should cry 'Turn, hell hound, turn.' We have reached one of these pivotal points. The world is watching Canada to-day, and from across the border line there come the words of President Taft: 'Canada is at the parting of the ways.' But of far greater importance than the international aspect, to which reference is here made, is the political status of affairs within the Dominion; a state of affairs, which in order to clearly understand, makes it necessary to consider the conditions leading up to it.

The patriots of 1837 cherished the ideal of a French Canadian nation on the banks of the St. Lawrence; and in 1849 the idea was revived by Papineau and the ultramontanists and was taken up by the Institute Canadian as a propaganda. The Ultramontanists exerted much influence on the political situation before Confederation; and several statesmen have begun their careers as its adherents, and later left the faction. But the society itself seems to have existed down to the present time in the guise of the Nationalist party, led to-day by Henri Bourassa, a relative of Papineau.

The Nationalists have discarded some of the principles of the ultramontanists but they are one with both the patriots and the ultramontanists is presenting an irreconcilable front to the English Government and in dreaming of a Canadian nation on the banks of the St. Lawrence, composed of French-speaking people. This brief retrospect shows what the National party stands for and is sufficient to enable us to better understand the underlying motive which actuates its members. And that we may more clearly comprehend the present political conditions, let us turn once more to the past.

The pioneer of every country, those leaders of civilization who cut down the forests, build log houses, clear and till the soil are subjected to many hardships and privations. These sturdy sons and daughters who penetrated the woods of the eastern townships were no exception to the rule. The trials they experienced, the difficulties they encountered and the sufferings they endured will not be forgotten by their descendants. As one of these, I love my country, I love it well, and I am proud of being a British subject. I shall not so far forget myself as to be ashamed of my country—ashamed of England. No, Hell itself is not hot enough for that man who is disloyal to the land that gave him birth.

I entreat every citizen of the Dominion to forget that you are Liberal or Conservative, to forget that you are Protestant or Catholic, to forget that you are French or English and remembering the sacred ties of the past, the responsibilities of the present and the obligations of the future, think of these words copied from the Debates of the House of Commons, Tuesday, November 22, 1910, where anyone can find proof of their authenticity. Most of these quotations are from Le Devoir, a newspaper edited by the noted Henri Bourassa, who has tried to displace the British flag by another ensign and is a grandson of Papineau who occasioned the rebellion of 1837 and was driven out of Canada for causing bloodshed and rebellion at St. Charles, St. Denis and other places in the province, where hundreds of lives were lost and many buildings burned.

Think of these words used by Bourassa at St. Eustache, July 28, 1910. 'I denounce Mr. Laurier because he harnessed himself up to the chariot of Rhodes and Chamberlain and changed fronts for the sake of a decoration.' In other words the Nationalists denounce the Prime Minister of the Dominion for being loyal to the Empire in time of war.

Again on the 17th of July last Bourassa said: 'Then again, when big ships will have replaced small ships, and when we will have gone in that disastrous policy of which Laurier and Borden are the prophets, when the policy will have fully developed, one day conscription will be enforced, and this little lad here that you send to school to study the law of God as well as that of man, so that he may take your place to continue to fecundate the old farm where you were born, where you have learned in the furrows made by your forefathers, to be Catholics, to be Canadians, to respect law and to nobly accomplish your duty, then this little child if you should continue to listen to Mr. Laurier, this little child taken away and put under arms, embarked on the fleet of which you will have approved, this little child, I say, who will shed his blood on a foreign field, disembowelled by a Chinese or a Japanese cannon ball, will have a right to curse you, if you were to sacrifice to the partisanship which binds to one man your duty as a citizen and a free man.'

Those hot words from the tongue of their chief very clearly show the disloyalty of the Nationalists in opposing the navy, in opposing Canada's contribution to the defence of the Empire; but to make sure that we understand him in another place he uses these words 'imperialistic virus.'

Yes, think of a member of parliament in a British colony saying: 'You are intimidating the people in waving the English flag, adding that we must contribute always and everywhere to the defence of that tormentor of our constitutional liberties; but we will not be made to forget that in 1837 it was necessary to bore holes in it in order to breathe the atmosphere of liberty.

These are the words——

I hope, Mr. Chairman, you will excuse me if I omit a few words here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. PUGSLEY (Continuing to read):

These are the words of a man called Blondin, member of parliament for Chamlain, speaking at St. Louis de Blandford on the 25th of October last. This Nationalist according to Le Devoir also said: 'The English have never done anything for the French Canadians, we do not owe them anything. these very ones who disembowelled our forefathers, on the Plains of Abraham, ask of you to-day to be slaughtered for their sake. We have had enough of England and the English'.

Furthermore after the Prime Minister had said that a victory won by such means was disastrous and that they,—the Nationalists,—were ashamed of what they had done, this same member for Champlain cried out across the floor of the House of Commons:

'I am not ashamed, I will repeat them to you to-morrow'.

I appeal to every citizen of the Empire to resent this insult to our flag to our honour and to our children. Have we no country? Or is this a nation without a soul? If we have a country and if there is left within it one single spark of spirit let us respect our institutions, our traditions and our national ideals, let us make a distinction between a loyal French Canadian and a Nationalist.

When George W. Page says to the electors of the county that he is against the navy, displaying the fact by using letters seven feet high, he endorses the principal plank in the platform of the Nationalists and identifies himself with those who pride themselves on their disloyalty.

No, Mr. Page, you may know the price of hogs; but the loyal electors of old Stanstead county will never endorse a man in alliance with men disloyal to their King.

Eugene O. Baldwin.

Mr. EDWARDS: Did not the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) deny the words attributed to him there?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness——

Mr. EDWARDS: Be manly enough to answer my question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is too late in the morning to pay much attention to the hon. member for Frontenac. I ask you in all seriousness, Mr. Chairman, whether when you bear in mind the excitement which these speeches from the public platform were causing in that portion of the province of Quebec, you can wonder that a man filled with the intense loyalty which seems to have actuated Mr. Baldwin, should make an appeal to all loyal citizens, Liberals and Conservatives alike, to join in resisting the disloyal appeals which were being made by the Nationalists of Quebec. And yet for that letter, and for that letter alone, this man, who, as far as the records show, was worthily and properly discharging his duty as a public officer, was first suspended, and, after he had communicated with the Minister of Customs, telling him that he had written the letter in good faith and because of what he believed to be these disloyal appeals which were being spread throughout his province, informing the minister that he had not neglected his duty and that he had written the letter after office hours, the Minister of Customs changed his suspension into a dismissal—for the crime of being a loyal citizen, having, as my hon. friend from Pictou says, the King's commission it being his duty to frown down disloyal utterances and actions wherever they appeared throughout in any part of this Dominion. For that act of loyalty, and for that alone, and without any investigation whatever, this gentleman was dismissed from office. Let me say to my hon. friend the Minister of Customs that this is not a case of ordinary dismissal. I have evidence that the loyal people of this Dominion from one end of Canada to the other are interested in the dismissal of Mr. Baldwin. They believe that, as a loyal citizen, and a man whose only fault has been his extreme loyalty, he has been unfairly treated by this Government through the Minister of Customs, and it is because of the importance of the principle which is involved that I have deemed it advisable to place this letter upon 'Hansard.' Instead of dismissing Mr. Baldwin my hon. friend the Minister of Customs should have said to him: I too am opposed to these disloyal utterances; I too am opposed to these attempts to incite our people against the British flag and to induce them to believe they owe nothing to England or to the Empire. Instead of dismissing Mr. Baldwin he ought to have said to him: I commend your conduct heartily as a loyal citizen of this country, and I trust that every British office holder in Canada, will, whenever disloyalty is seen stalking abroad, do everything in his power to put it down and make of our people loyal and good citizens of Canada and of the Empire.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend has alluded to this gentleman, Mr. Baldwin, as being a loyal man; with his assertion in that regard I am not at all disposed to quarrel. The question is not whether Mr. Baldwin was a loyal citizen; the question is whether or not he interfered in a political contest. My hon. friend says he held the King's commission; so did the candidate in the election; but Mr. Baldwin in the letter which the hon. member for St. John has just read, distinctly and deliberately charged the candidate in that election with being a disloyal man. I am not concerned with the quality of his assertion in point of truth or falsity, although I do not think anyone who knows Mr. Page would for one moment pretend that he is not as loyal a man as there is in Canada; but the letter was a deliberate entry into the political arena, and a deliberate and distinct appeal to the electors of that riding to vote against Mr. Page on the ground that he was disloyal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On the ground that he was in alliance with the disloyal Nationalists.

Mr. BORDEN: He put him in the same category as other gentlemen whom he characterized as disloyal, therefore characterizing Mr. Page as being disloyal and appealing to the electors of the county to vote against him. I do not know how you could have a more distinct interference in a political contest than this. A good deal has been said by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as to the iniquity of the statement that Canada owes Great Britain nothing. I think my hon. friend from St. John characterized that statement as most outrageous, but I sat in my seat just opposite when a member of the late Government, in my presence, stated in this House of Commons, that Canada owed nothing to Great Britain except Christian forgiveness. He had uttered the words before, and I reminded him of them; I could not then quote them exactly, but he repeated them on that occasion, and not one of his colleagues—they were all sitting around him—found the slightest fault with his utterances in that regard, at least in so far as it was evidenced by any outward expression of opinion. So, when he enters into considerations of this kind, my hon. friend may find that they more closely affect him than he was inclined to think when he first introduced this subject. Under the circumstances, I think it would be well to pass this item, as the hon. member for St. John has respeatedly assured us during the course of the evening—or rather the morning—that he is very anxious to facilitate Supply.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Customs to the necessity of having a list of every man and woman in the service who has been promoted with particulars as to salaries, &c. I think this would be very desirable in view of the many inquiries which are frequently made for information in that connection.

Civil Government—Office of the Auditor General—salaries, $24,300.

Mr. GRAHAM: I see that in salaries there is an increase of $8,350. What do these increases mean?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman will observe that there are three more officials for the current year than for the previous year—ninety, as compared with eighty-seven. This increase is made necessary by the greater volume of work of the department. There are seven promotions from sub-division A of the second division to sub-division B of the first division, and there are statutory increases as well.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who are the officers promoted?

Mr. WHITE: I have not the names, but will get them if the hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When officers of the Auditor General's Department are promoted, on whose recommendation are promotions made,—on that of the Auditor General?

Mr. WHITE: Entirely so. The Auditor General is responsible to Parliament, and he reports to Parliament through the Finance Minister. These are entirely his recommendations.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Better let this item stand.

Mr. WHITE: I shall be glad to do so. As to the promotions, I discussed the matter in a general way with the Auditor General, and he assured me that these were all men who had been in the office for years and deserved promotion.

Mr. FOWLER: I ask that this item be allowed to stand, because I have something to say about the Auditor General's office and promotions.

Progress reported.

Mr. BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN: I am not quite sure; I will let the hon. gentleman know as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.50 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, April 18, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into and report upon the law respecting pilotage and its administration in the pilotage districts of Montreal and Quebec, and what changes, if any, are desirable therein.—Mr. Hazen.

DOMINION POLICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 172, to amend the Dominion Police Act. He said: This Bill makes some very minor amendments to the present Dominion Police Act. The principal provision is in section 5, which adds to the existing Act a provision requiring the district commissioners of police, who are appointed under the Act as it stands, to report at the beginning of each month to the chief commissioner in writing

All informations, complaints, proceedings and convictions or orders instituted or made before him during the preceding month, with a statement of all moneys collected or received by him for fines, penalties, forfeitures or costs, showing the dates of such collections of receipts, and how and when the collections or receipts were appropriated; and every such commissioner shall moreover furnish the chief commissioner with such additional information touching the discharge of his duties as commissioner as may be by the chief commissioner reasonably required.

At present that is practically done under an Order in Council, but I think it has been a question whether there was an absolute obligation to comply with that order, and we thought it wiser to introduce it into the statute. The other provisions are not material.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many commissioners of police are there in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to give the exact number, but I can procure the information. They are appointed as they are required, principally in connection with the construction of railways.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I desire to rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday, as reported at page 8218 and 8219 of 'Hansard,' certain statements were made by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) reflecting upon my honour, to which I wish to make a very brief allusion. On page 8218, the hon. member for Carleton made this statement, referring to myself:

> He is the man who was put up to ask the question as to who was to be the warden of Kingston penitentiary, the man who tried to work up a creed prejudice against the Minister of Justice, the man who tries to have a certain man appointed to a position in Kingston penitentiary because he happens to be an Orangeman and not a Roman Catholic.

I wish to state emphatically that I did not ask any question as to who was to be warden of Kingston penitentiary. In the second place, I never tried at any time to raise any creed prejudice against the Minister of Justice, nor have I at any time in my life said anything which I believed would cause a feeling of resentment on the part of my Roman Catholic fellow-citizens and I never intended to do so. I wish to state further that the man whom I recommended for the situation of warden of Kingston penitentiary was also recommended by thirty other members of this House, by ten or twelve members of the Ontario Legislature, and by five or six executives of Conservative associations. He was also spoken of in the highest terms by the late Sir John Thompson, when Minister of Justice, by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, when he was Minister of Justice, and by the late Sir Oliver Mowat. I refer to Major W. S. Hughes, whose ability has since been recognized by the Minister of Justice by appointing him to the important position of inspector of penitentiaries. Major Hughes never was and is not an Orangeman. There could not be any question about the appointment of an Orangeman or a Roman Catholic, because the Minister of Justice told me he had no thought of appointing a Roman Catholic to that position. I say that in fairness to the Minister of Justice and to myself, as we have both been misrepresented in regard to this matter.

The second question of privilege arises out of the words at page 8219 of 'Hansard' where the member for Carleton charges me with having made the poor mail clerks of Frontenac contribute to the purchasing of a gold watch and chain for myself. This is the second time that such an allegation has been made by the same member. It is true that the electors of Frontenac did make me a presentation at our annual meeting, but I knew nothing about it in advance. I do not know who contributed to it; I made no enquiries as to who contributed; I am not concerned in that in any way. I am not the only man to whom such a token has been given. It has been given to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and to others, and I, like, them, appreciate not only the gift but the spirit which prompted it. That is the most valuable part of it to me, although I value the gift and appreciate it very highly. I quite understand the lack of appreciation of this on the part of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have nothing further to say except to give an emphatic denial to having suggested anything of that kind, and I will give my hon. friend for Carleton the honour and myself the pleasure of discussing our mutual regard for one another at any time that will suit his convenience and where we shall not be hampered by the rules of the House.

IMPORTATION OF PHOTO-ENGRAVERS.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour and the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crothers) to a telegram placed in my hands to-day by a Mr. Lennon representing the Photo-Engravers' Union of Toronto. It is dated Toronto, Ontario, April 16, 1913, and is as follows:

> Employer in Montreal has gone to England to get more men over. Do what you can to get order through to prevent further importations.
> Louis Kehlietz.

This means that the employers of photo-engravers in Toronto and Montreal are still importing men to this country to take the place of strikers. I would ask the Minister of Labour and acting Minister of the Interior if it is his intention to take steps to have an Order in Council passed under section 38 of the Immigration Act to prevent, for the time being, immigrants of that class coming into Canada?

Mr. CROTHERS: Will my hon. friend be kind enough to send me the telegram or a copy of it?

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY BOXES.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I was not in the House yesterday when a question was put by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Rainville) about rural mail delivery boxes, as follows:

Mr. Rainville:

1. When and how were the hundred and ten thousand boxes for the rural mail paid for, which were purchased by the preceding Government without tender?
2. Was there in 1911 a greater number of boxes purchased than were required?
3. Did the present Government succeed in obtaining a reduction on the price of these boxes, and has it consequently paid a lower price than that agreed to by the preceding Government?
4. Was a certain number of these boxes paid for during the election period of 1911? If so, how many boxes and what amount?

I do not object to the form of this question, but I see that there may be an imputation in question 4. I do not know what prompted the hon. gentleman to put the question in this form. When I was Postmaster General orders were given on two different occasions for rural mail delivery boxes. An Order in Council was passed and a contract was signed in each case. I have moved for that Order in Council and a copy of the contract to be laid on the table. The contract stipulated that no boxes should be paid for unless they were required by the Government, and if——

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is not quite in order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have just finished, Mr. Speaker. If the payments were made for those boxes they were made according to the contract. But if there is any apprehension of improper conduct on the part of the Postmaster General of that day, I wish to say categorically and emphatically that it is the duty of the Government to investigate it; and I would state to the right hon. leader of the House that if he thinks there is anything improper in the payment for these boxes under my administration, I am ready to accept the judgment of a committee of the House which he should appoint, composed of members of his own party only.

QUEBEC HARBOUR LOAN.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the Corporation of Quebec Harbour Commissioners, hereinafter called the Corporation, such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of three million five hundred thousand dollars, as are required to enable the Corporation to construct such terminal facilities as are necessary to properly equip the port of Quebec.
2. Resolved, that during the period of construction of the terminal facilities mentioned in these resolutions the interest payable on the debentures receivable by the Minister of Finance in exchange for such advances shall be deemed to be money required to construct and to be part of the cost of construction of the said terminal facilities, and such interest may be paid out of the said sum of three million five hundred thousand dollars.
3. Resolved, that the Corporation shall upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance debentures of the Corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue, and bearing interest payable half yearly at the rate of three and one-half per centum per annum.
4. Resolved, that the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any Act founded on the Resolutions, shall be payable by the Corporation out of all its property, assets, tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall be a charge thereon next after, and have precedence in regard to payment next after all debentures or bonds issued by the Corporation amounting to the sum of one million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, under chapter 48 of the statutes of 1898, chapter 34 of the statutes of 1899, and chapter 36 of the statutes of 1907.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. HAZEN: This is a Bill to enable advances to be made to the commissioners of the port of Quebec city to the amount of $3,500,000 for the purpose of equipping the port so that it may be in a position to handle the import and export trade of the port, which is increasing every year, and which, considering the geographical position of Quebec, must continue to increase. The Bill follows very closely—is practically a replica of—the Bill relating to the Montreal Harbour Commissioners under which, from time to time, this Parliament votes sums of money as loans to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal to be expended on that harbour for the purpose of equipping it to successfully carry on the very large business that is carried on there during the navigation season. Like the harbour of Montreal, the harbour of Quebec has been managed by a board that was considered to be unwieldly. A number of years ago an Act was passed under which the constitution of the Harbour Board of Montreal was changed, and it was provided that there should be three harbour commissioners to be appointed by the Governor in Council. This plan worked most satisfactorily so far as the port of Montreal is concerned, and at the last session of the House I brought in a Bill, which was passed providing for the the reconstruction of the Harbour Commission of Quebec, a commission consisting of three members to be appointed by the Governor in Council. These commissioners were appointed under the provisions of that Act. They are now entering upon their duties, and it is desirable, if the work is to go on vigorously and is to be useful, and if ample facilities are to be provided for the export and import trade through the port of Quebec, to loan to these commissioners a sum of money to put the port in proper condition to do business.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the hon. gentleman give a statement of the amount of the present indebtedness of the Quebec harbour?

Mr. HAZEN: I intended to do that before concluding my remarks. I have the information under my hand, as I took it for granted that it would be desired by the House. The present Bill provides that there should be paid to the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, from time to time, $3,500,000, this amount is to be expended by the harbour commissioners in a manner satisfactory to the Governor in Council and on the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whose department has charge over the matter. Interest on the debentures during construction, as in the case of the Montreal harbour, to be charged to capital account. There is a time limit for construction, as in the Montreal Act, and section 5 provides:

No such advances shall be made in respect of terminal facilities unless the plans, specifications and estimates for the works to be performed by the corporation and on which the money so to be advanced is to be expended, have been first submitted to and approved by the Governor in Council.

There is also a provision that, as moneys are advanced from time to time by the Government, the debentures of the commission for the amounts so advanced are to be deposited with the Minister of Finance. Section 7 has regard to payments on the loans. In the case of the Quebec harbour, Government advances to a considerable amount have already been made, as well as advances by private individuals. The harbour commissioners at Quebec are to-day indebted to the public who have bought up their debentures, in the sum of about $1,150,000. The interest on this amount has always been paid out of the revenues of the harbour, which to-day amount, I think, to about $128,000, and which it is believed with proper facilities, and with the steadily increasing trade, may increase very largely in the future. Section 7 is as follows:

The principal and interest of the sums advanced under the authority of this Act to the corporation shall be payable by the corporation out of all its property, assets, tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall rank as charges thereon next after, and have precedence in regard to payment next after, the principal and interest of all debentures or bonds issued by the corporation under the provisions of chapter 36 of the statutes of 1907, entitled: 'An Act to increase the borrowing powers of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

The advances, therefore, made under this Bill shall be a first charge against the property and assets of the corporation next after the payment of principal and interest of all debentures or bonds held by the public.

In reply to the question of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) with regard to the outstanding debentures for the moneys advanced by the Government in the past, I may say that they amount to $4,154,195.68. For Government advances, the Government holds debentures to the amount of $3,612,802.42. The Government advances without debentures amount to $541,393.26, and the arrears of interest to March 31, 1912, amount to $3,479,057.42. As my hon. friend will observe, about a year's interest has become due since that time. In 1910 the revenues of the harbour amounted to $121,036.84; in 1911, $122,425.81. While I have not the exact figures before me as to the revenues of the harbour for 1912, I understand that they amounted to about $128,000, or five or six thousand dollars in excess of the amount received during the previous year. I have a balance sheet here showing the details of revenue and expenditure.. The revenue was made up of: tonnage dues, $13,314; import dues, $5,801; export dues, $2,145; harbour dues, $3,787. The wharf and property earnings were as follows: Wellington wharf, $2,610; Grand Trunk wharf, $2,000; Atkinson's wharf, $2,820; East India wharf, $1,435.85; Reynar's wharf, $1,200; Louise docks and wharfs, $83,539.03; beach and deep water lots, $1,725.37; interest, $2,016.98; sundries, $30; making a total of $122,425.81. The expenditures were: Administration, engineering staff, salaries and fees, $16,532.04; legal expenditures, $2,668.50; notarial expenditures, $167.25; miscellaneous expenses, printing, stationery, advertising, harbour master's service, general labour.

&c., $4,508.01; property expenditure, taxes, insurance, repairs, &c., and the maintenance of docks, wharf and stores, $52,970.67; workmen's liability, $81.02; twelve months' interest on bonds, 62-63 Victoria, chapter 34, and 6-7 Edward VII, chapter 36, $30,000; surplus over working expenses, $15,498.32. This makes a total of $122,425.81.

The commissioners of the harbour have had a report made by expert engineers, and perhaps the members would like me to read some extracts from that report to give some idea of what the commissioners think are the essential things to be done at the present time for the purpose of placing the harbour in a proper position for doing business.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Who are the engineers?

Mr. HAZEN: Messrs. Coode, Matthews, Fitzmaurice and Wilson, of London, England, and the harbour engineers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you a plan?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes; I shall lay it on the table, so that members can look at it. The memorandum I have here states that Messrs. Coode, Matthews, Fitzmaurice and Wilson made a report dated 21st January, 1913, to the commissioners in regard to the proposed increase of the wharfage accommodation at the harbour for ocean-going steamers and for large vessels. It goes on:

The existing accommodation, is extremely limited for a port possessing such natural advantages and vast prospects of trade expansion. The provision of additional berthage and other facilities connected therewith could not fail, in their opinion, to prove of immense benefit to the port and to the country at large. The plans submitted show the additional wharfage accommodation and reclaimed areas that could be provided. Arrangements would not, of course, be made in the first instance for constructing the whole of the accommodation, at each site as shown on the drawing, but for putting in hand and executing the work in such instalments as might be considered desirable from time to time, each portion forming a section of the complete project.

The present accommodation at this point consists of the tidal basin which has an area of 18 acres, with 3,300 feet of quayage and a depth of 26 feet at low water of spring tides. The entrance to the basin is 200 feet wide. The wet dock, opening from the tidal basin, is about 2,400 feet long by 600 feet in average breadth with an area of 40 acres and a quay frontage of about 3,400 feet. The depth of water in the wet dock is from 22 to 30 feet and the depth over the sill of the gates in 35 feet at high water of spring tides. The width of the entrance from the tidal basin is 60 feet. From the northeast corner of the tidal basin a pier extends northwards a distance of 1,600 feet. This pier is 300 feet in width, and provision has been made for berthage on both faces, although the inner berth, 1,000 feet in length, is not as yet available pending the completion of the necessary dredging alongside and in the approach. There is a depth of over 40 feet at low water of spring tides alongside the outer face of this pier.

Louise embankment—Large additions to the present dock facilities have been contemplated for some time past, northward of the Louise embankment. The main feature of that scheme is the construction of a large sheltered basin in which extensive further berthage accommodation is obtained by a system of projecting jetties, about 1,000 feet in length, pointing approximately north and south. The construction of pier No. 1 was the first step undertaken in the execution of those proposals, and in continuation thereof, the Louise embankment has been widened on its northern face nearly as far as the route of the proposed pier No. 2, which it was intended to construct parallel with pier No. 1, and at a distance of 500 feet therefrom. The engineers do not, however, favour the construction of short jetties. They are of opinion that economical advantages are afforded by providing the wharfage accommodation in one continuous line. It gives a greater amount of berthage and adapts itself to the various lengths of ships to be accommodated.

As a first instalment the engineers recommend the widening of the Louise embankment. The basin opposite the proposed widening would ultimately be about 3,300 feet to 4,000 feet in length by 2,000 feet to 2,500 feet in width, thus affording a very large space for the manœuvring of vessels entering and departing. This basin would be dredged to a depth of 35 feet below the level of low water of ordinary spring tides. In the first instance, however, and until the 'proposed pier' as shown on the plan was executed, it would be unnecessary to dredge the full width of the basin. This basin when completed would have an entrance width of 1,500 feet. The proposed widening of the Louise embankment and the area of 80 acres to be reclaimed in this vicinity are shown on the plan by red colour of dark tint. These works of improvement would be for the advantage of ocean-going steamers and other vessels.

Diamond harbour improvements—These improvements are designed to provide additional deep draught wharfage accommodation for the expansion which it is confidently anticipated will take place in the shipment of produce from Quebec. The bulk of the rail-borne portion of this traffic will, it is anticipated, enter by way of Sillery in the near future, the south shore participating also, on the completion of the new bridge. Provided suitable facilities are afforded, this freight would be more conveniently handled at wharves situated in the neighbourhood of Wolfe Cove, where provision could also be made for the berthing of grain carriers, navigating the canal system from lake Erie.

The area to be reclaimed in this district would be about 80 acres in extent. It could be utilized for the storage of coal, &c., the coaling quay to be some 2,250 feet in length. Provision could also be made for the car ferry service to accommodate a vessel 350 feet in length with a beam of 60 feet and a draught of about 15 feet. The scheme submitted provides for an extension of these works of improvement so as to give a quay frontage of some 12,750 feet.

Railway facilities—In connection with the foregoing proposals for augmenting the deep water accommodation of the port, the engineers draw attention to the necessity of providing suitable railway communication, either by means of a tunnel or by tracks along the frontage. Roads affording convenient access to the new wharves will also be needed. Other questions relative to the handling and storage of grain, the extent and character of said accommodation with the layout of tracks and terminal facilities require careful investigation in order that the most satisfactory arrangements may be adopted.

Attached hereto is a copy of a memorandum submitted by the Harbour Commissioners showing the proposed expenditures on the several works of improvement in the harbour.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) asked me for an estimate of the cost. I can give that to the hon. gentleman now. The estimated requirements for the year ending December 31, 1913, although I do not think that it would be possible to do all this work during that short period of time, are as follows:

New quay wall on the north face of the Louise embankment, 1,800 ft.	$810,000 00
Dredging of the trench for the same	110,250 00
Dredging of the channel approach.	621,250 00
Filling required in the season of 1913..	85,067 00
Total estimated cost....	$1,626,567 00
Proposed grain elevator..	$1,014,483 00
Car ferry terminals..	56,350 00
Railway tracks to grain elevator and for terminal yards..	16,454 00
Roadway bridge..	25,000 00
Floating cranes..	60,000 00
Service boat..	130,000 00
Floating fenders..	4,000,00
½ dredging plant valued at $900,000.	450,000 00
Building plant..	50,000 00
Total anticipated expenditure..	$3,502,854 00

This is the estimated expenditure for the year ending December 31. My own view is that it would be impossible to get organized and to do work to the extent of $3,500,000 in one season. However, that is simply my opinion, and no doubt the opinion of the harbour commissioners and their engineers is worth more than mine.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The explanation seems to be full and complete; but the minister will realize that it is impossible to discuss these items upon simply hearing them for the first time. I would ask the minister, before the second reading of the Bill, to lay on the table of the House the reports of the commissioners and the engineers upon which the estimates are based. Who are the commissioners now?

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. William Price, Chairman, Mr. Gravelle, of Pointe Lévis, and Mr. J. D. E. Letellier.

Mr. HAZEN.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When were they appointed?

Mr. HAZEN: Some time after the Bill was passed last session. The salary of the chairman is $6,000 a year, and the salaries of the other two commissioners $5,000 each.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the minister bring down any offers that have been made for the sale of the land that is to be reclaimed?

Mr. HAZEN: I will bring down all the information available, but if there is any special information which my hon. friends opposite would desire, if they will send me a memorandum, I will have that information placed before the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the minister also bring down information as to the part of the map which is said to be coloured brown?

Mr. HAZEN: I will get the information. It certainly is not brown to my eye, and I think the man who described it as brown would have some difficulty in passing the pilots' eyesight test.

Mr. BELAND: Did the minister give us the estimated cost of the eighty acres on the waterfront where the proposed slip will be located?

Mr. HAZEN: I gave an estimate of what would be spent upon it this year.

Mr. BELAND: Is any part of this work to be done by the Transcontinental Railway Commission?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. BELAND: What about the slip for the ferry boat?

Mr. HAZEN: It is a question whether the terminals for the car ferry should be done by the harbour commission or by the Transcontinental Railway Commission. The Postmaster General tells me that he thinks some arrangement has been come to between the two bodies.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will you bring down that agreement?

Mr. HAZEN: If there is such an agreement, I will.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister also bring down the plan of the lock at the entrance of the river St. Charles? If any part of that work is to be done by the Public Works Department it would be well to have the plan for that brought down also so that we may see the whole scheme. Would the minister also bring down a list of the offers made to the harbour commission or to the department for the lands included in the other section of the plan marked in red?

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be glad to bring down all the information available.

Mr. ARTHUR LACHANCE (Quebec Center): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as one of the Liberal members for Quebec, I wish to offer a few remarks in respect to this proposed resolution, whereby we are asked to loan to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners an amount of $3,500,000 to provide for terminal facilities, as part of the proper and requisite equipment of the harbour of Quebec. I need not recall that I take an especial interest in this measure, and I hasten to say that the Government could not put too large an amount at the disposal of that commission, so that our port may be in a position to handle the enormous traffic which is expected to come our way. However, as the right hon. leader of the Opposition stated, it is rather difficult just now to intelligently discuss the views of the Government, as we have not as yet been provided with all the particulars and statistics in connection with the proposed works, and regarding the nature of such works. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has just stated that he would lay on the Table of the House all the documents required to enable us to post ourselves in regard to these improvements, at any rate when the Bill comes up for its second reading. So I shall postpone until the Bill reaches that stage a more extended discussion of the matter, if necessary. Nevertheless, before resuming my seat, I would request the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to leave on the Table of the House the plans which he has just taken down, so that we may look into the particulars.

Mr. BELAND: Has the question of the railway been considered yet? I understand from the plan that there will have to be a certain diversion of the railway to facilitate the approach to the new work. Has that question yet been discussed with the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway Company?

Mr. HAZEN: The estimates that I read referred to this as the estimated cost of the diversion of the line of railway.

Mr. BELAND: What is that?

Mr. HAZEN: I assume there will have have to be an expenditure of money to bring the railway down upon these new quays so that trade that comes by vessel may be loaded direct from the vessels into the warehouses and then into the cars. I presume that will mean some slight change in the railway. The amount mentioned is not very large, only $29,000. On the second reading I shall have full information for my hon. friends.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As I understood the report, it referred only to the diversion of the railway to reach the grand levee, the diversion of the main line is not touched upon but there is a casual reference in the report read by my hon friend to the effect that other lines of railway or a tunnel will be built. The information on that is very meagre.

Mr. HAZEN: I have the full report here, and I will have it laid on the table.

Mr. PELLETIER: I think I can say that this item simply provides for the bringing of the railway nearer to the quay and nearer to the wharfs.

Mr. HAZEN: The leader of the Opposition is right in his understanding. In the memorandum there is this:

> In connection with the foregoing proposition for improving the deep water accommodation of the port the engineers call attention to the necessity of providing suitable railway connections either by means of a tunnel or by tracks along the frontage. Rails affording convenient access to the new wharf will also be needed.

In their estimates of requirements for the year ending December 31, we have an item for railway tracks to the grand levee and for terminal yards, $16,454, so that the estimate is simply for some tracks to the levee and to the terminal yard.

Mr. PELLETIER: It will not be necessary, I understand, to have any arrangement with the railway company because the tracks or rails on the embankment belong to the harbour commission, and what they are going to have there will also belong to them and not to a company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is a small item, the price of the tracks. Would my hon. friend on the second reading have a list of the owners of the various sites that are being offered to the harbour commissioners at the various points marked on the plan, the prices fixed and the amount agreed to by the department? Has any amount been agreed to or is it going to be expropriated in the usual way?

Mr. HAZEN: I have no report on that. That depends on the action of the commission, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. What I understand my hon. friend would like to have is a statement showing who the owners are or who are interested in the lands which will have to be taken for the purposes of this work and what the estimated value of such land is.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did the figures given include the price of lands?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. My own impression is that very little land will have to be taken from anybody, that it belongs to the department, and that hardly any private lands will have to be taken by expropriation or in any other way; but I will get absolutely accurate information on that point.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the minister any general policy with regard to the equipment of harbours? I understand that by this resolution he proposes to lend a considerable sum of money to the harbour of Quebec for the purpose of equipping that harbour, and that the Government is making a large expenditure in Halifax on its own account. There are other great harbours in Canada, and the question is one of very great importance to the taxpayers of this country, if we are to undertake to become responsible for the equipment of the great harbours of Canada. Will the same accommodation be given to Vancouver, and Prince Rupert, and Victoria, and St. John, and all the recognized great harbours of the country, that is, the Government furnishing money for the development of these harbours and equipping them on terms similar to those proposed for Quebec?

Mr. HAZEN: My own opinion is that it is the duty of the Government to equip the great harbours of the country to such an extent that the business of the country can be done through our own ports, and at the same time that we ought to aim at having the great bulk if not all the business of Canada done through the ports of Canada instead if having, as we unfortunately have at present, a great deal of our business done through foreign ports. The Government of the country is spending large sums in the developing of different ports. For Montreal it is advancing large sums of money, but practically that is not costing the country anything, as the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal are paying interest to the country on all the money that has been advanced from time to time, and that now amounts to a good many millions of dollars. In order to keep pace with the growing trade of the country a great many more millions will have to be advanced in the future. In fact the great trouble before the Harbour Commission of Montreal is to provide adequate harbour facilities fast enough for the handling of the trade that in ever-increasing volume is coming there year by year. That is also true of other ports. The Government are spending a large sum in St. John, and yet, as a matter of fact, in that port there has been a congested state of affairs because the facilities have not been sufficient, the dockage and wharfage room has not been adequate to accommodate the vessels. Last week at one time twelve ocean going vessels were there discharging cargoes, and some of these vessels had to wait in the stream until the wharfs could be cleared of the freight from other vessels. I have always thought it was an absolutely proper and correct policy for a country that has done so much to build railways in order to bring the freight from the interior of the country down to the sea-ports, to see that when that freight gets to the sea-ports there are means of handling it economically and expeditiously so that shippers can be sure that when they send goods through Canadian ports they will be handled as economically and expeditiously as through the ports of any other country. The work the Government has been doing in St. John has not been done under a commission. There is no harbour commission there at present, although there probably will be at some time in the future. The city council, under the law, are the conservators of the harbour. But the Government has been building wharfs there, and they appoint wharfingers and collect revenues on the wharfs. These wharfs have been built by the Department of Public Works. In Halifax, as has been before explained to the House, a large expenditure will be made to provide terminal facilities in connection with the Intercolonial railway.

At Quebec it has been felt that the only way to develop that port is by means of a commission, and for the country to advance money to that commission, as at Montreal. I have no doubt that with the ports of the Pacific a policy of a similar character will have to be adopted. The port of Vancouver, which is seeking the establishment of a harbour commission this year—there is a resolution touching the matter now before the House—is doing a tremendous shipping business, and no facilities have so far been provided by the country in that port. No doubt shipments from Vancouver in the future will be enormous, perhaps as large as from any other port in Canada. Facilities will have to be provided there, and, judging from the result of the experience in Montreal, I believe that the most satisfactory way of dealing with a harbour of that sort is by means of a commission. Under this system men interested in the port devote their time to it, acting practically as a branch of the Department of Marine, men who are anxious to advance the interests of the port, and who have the intelligence and knowledge to do so. This year the people of Vancouver are asking for the establishment of a harbour commission to manage the shipping in that harbour, believing it to be far better done in that way than if managed by the city council. With the tremendous growth that there will be in the shipping on the Pacific coast immediately after the opening of the great Panama canal I have no doubt that in future this Parliament will have to be prepared to deal liberally and generously with the harbour of Vancouver and others on the Pacific coast, as it is prepared to-day to deal with Quebec and as it will be prepared to continue to deal with Montreal. No general policy has been adopted by this or any previous Government in regard to the matter. I think it is apparent that the trend of public opinion is favourable to management by harbour commissioners, it being felt that better results are obtained in that way.

Mr. WM. POWER (Quebec West): A question has been asked about these arrears that are due by the old Harbour Commission of Quebec. I think the minister said it was about $1,000,000.

Mr. HAZEN: Oh, no, it is more than that. The arrears and interest to March 31, 1912, were $3,479,057.42.

Mr. POWER: I desire to ask the minister if there has been any decision to relieve the Quebec Harbour Commission of these arrears of interest. I am not going to say anything with respect to the old harbour commission but it is well known that there is no city in the Dominion of Canada wherein so much money has been spent by private individuals to promote trade and commerce as in the old city of Quebec. Were I to put the amount which was so invested at $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 I would be well within the mark. It may be said that expense was made in the interest of trade and commerce and in the interest of a trade in which the men who made the expenditure were directly interested. Before the days of iron ships it is well known that the timber trade was one of the great industries of this country. But I must tell you in this House and the minister that it was not alone for the timber trade that these improvements were made in Quebec. I well remember the wharfs which were built in the part of the city where I first saw the light of day. Large expenditures were made for the encouragement of the grain trade which is on everybody's lips to-day. Private individuals spent over $200,000 in building docks. They built their own floating elevators, they did more than that, they built the largest class of vessels that could be sent from Great Britain to Quebec. Well do I remember the noble names of these wharfs, they recalled the names of England, Ireland and Scotland. Not only did the merchants of Quebec do this but every man interested in the great trade of Quebec chartered the largest class of sailing vessels that crossed the Atlantic in those days exactly as is done to-day. You have asked me why they did not continue to control this immense trade. Sir, the day of the sailing vessel has about passed away; an era of steam has been brought in but even with that we would have held our own in Quebec had it not been for a monopoly greater than we could withstand which stepped in between us and what well might be called our vested rights. If you ask me who was that monopoly I have to say that monopoly was the Government of this country who, under the guise of lending money to a body corporated in Montreal, commenced deepening the channel from Quebec to that city. When that body corporate found they were in the mire, what did they do? They unloaded that debt upon the Government of this country and that is exactly what I desire to refer to to-day, that the Government of the country would be perfectly justified in taking over not only the interest but the whole of the debt resulting from the old expenditures made upon the harbour of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Lachance) asked in French that this plan should be left on the table of the House. Is there no larger plan in the department?

Mr. HAZEN: I think that is the largest plan in the department. There is no doubt that there must be plans in the possession of the harbour commissioners much more detailed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would suggest that the minister get a more detailed plan for the use of members.

Mr. HAZEN: Very well. I will leave this one here in the meantime.

Mr. BELAND: Is it possible for the minister to give an estimate of the cost of the projected diversion of the main lines of that railway? Because though the minister appears to think that it will require a small amount, I am under the impression that it will be very costly. Every citizen of Quebec knows how valuable is the land situated northwest of that line It would mean a new right of way, and that could only be obtained only at very high figures.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is on Government property. I telephoned to Mr. Price, expecting that the question would come up. I asked him to whom the tracks of railway belonged, and he told me that that part which was on the embankment and the Louise basin, belonged to the harbour board.

Mr. BELAND: I mean the land beyond the railway on the water front. I doubt very much that that belongs to the Government or harbour commission. As I understand it the line would have to be diverted north in order to make room for the works proposed. It is shown on the plan that it is probable that the main line of the Quebec, Charlevoix and Montmorency railway will have to be diverted. That means a new right of way to the north of the present line.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the hon. gentleman does not understand.

Mr. BELAND: Well, we shall know later.

Mr. HAZEN: We will get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that the widening of this Louise basin will also entail the straightening of the Canadian Pacific railway line that goes down to the steamers. Am I right?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps the Postmaster General could tell us.

Mr. PELLETIER: I could not say exactly. I have an idea that the line would have to be diverted to come nearer to the elevator and to the edge of the wharf, but as to the details I cannot say. I have seen all the plans in Quebec and have taken a great deal of time to study them, but these details will not remain in the memory. I have asked Mr. Frank of the harbour board and the engineer to come here.

Mr. HAZEN: I will ask Mr Price of the harbour board and the engineer to come here, and I will notify the hon. gentlemen interested when they are to be in Ottawa. They will then be able to meet these gentlemen and get the information they desire.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Mr. HAZEN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 179, to provide for further advances to the Quebec Harbour Commission.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

House went into committee to consider amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 84, to amend the Exchequer Court Act—Mr. Doherty. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill was passed by the House to transfer to the Exchequer Court the appelate jurisdiction formerly given to the Governor in Council in cases of refusal of patent applied for. The amendments made by the Senate, do not, I think, very materially alter the Bill. The first relates to fixing the delay during which an appeal is taken. The Bill provided that the appeal be taken within six months after notice thereof has been mailed addressed to the parties interested. The first amendment inserts after the word 'mailed' the words 'by registered letter.' The other amendment is to sub-section 3. That sub-section declared that in cases of appeal to the Governor in Council actually pending jurisdiction was transferred to the Exchequer Court. The Senate thought it desirable to add to that provision the words 'The Governor in Council shall transfer the said appeal and all documents relating thereto to the Exchequer Court.' I fancy this would have followed without expressly requiring it, but there can be no objection, to this being stated.

Amendments reported and agreed to.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Mr. Doherty (Minister of Justice), House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair):

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be paid an annual salary of five thousand dollars.

Mr. DOHERTY: This resolution is preliminary to the introduction of a Bill to amend the Supreme Court Act. One of the clauses provides that the salary of the registrar shall be $5,000. The Act of 1903 fixed the salary at $3,500, with increases of $100 per annum until it reached the maximum of $4,000. That maximum was reached in 1907-1908. It has been considered that, in view of the responsibility of the work falling upon this officer and in view of the increased cost of living, it would be proper that the salary be fixed at the amount mentioned. I may add that in the statute as it stands the registrar of the Supreme Court is given the rank of a deputy minister. As the lowest salary paid to a deputy minister is $5,000, this proposal is to give to this officer, the same salary that is given to other officers of the same rank.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): It is not often that a subject comes before the committee which gives us an opportunity of dealing with matters pertaining to the courts and court officers. This matter has reference to the salary of a high officer of the Supreme Court of Canada. It is not my purpose to offer the slightest objection to any increase in the salary of that official, and I am sure that the maximum which the hon. minister proposes to adopt in respect of that salary is none too high. The purpose I have in view in addressing the committee at this moment is to call the attention of the Government and of the hon. Minister of Justice to claims that have frequently been put forward by county court judges all over Canada in respect of an increase in their salaries. Memorials have been submitted from the judges of the county courts of the province from which I come asking for higher salaries. When consideration was given to this matter in 1905 by the then Minister of Justice, I am sorry that the county court judges were not more liberally dealt with; it would have saved the present minister and the Government of the day the difficulty of reopening and dealing with this important and delicate question. At that time a very substantial and much deserved increase was made in the salaries of the judges of the different supreme courts in Canada. Those increases were necessary and proper to enable the judges of these courts to maintain the standard of life and society necessary to uphold the dignity of their positions. County court judges are appointed from the same bar as judges of the Supreme Court. They receive in their youth the same training, and they must be competent men, possessing sufficient skill and ability to do justice to the honorable and responsible position to which they are appointed. As far as training is concerned, I submit to the hon. minister there is practically no difference between the man selected for the Supreme Court bench and the man selected for appointment as a judge of the county court. The same education; the same training and practice, and the same capacity, are required; the judges have to move in the same circles of society; they have to educate their children in the same schools and colleges, and they have to provide for the necessaries of life in the one case in the same manner as in the other. I submit, therefore, it is hardly fair that there should be such a striking difference between the salaries paid to the judges of the one court and the salaries paid to those of the other. I do not say that the remuneration of the Supreme Court judges is too high; it is a respectable allowance, but I do say that the salaries of the county court judges should go up. We cannot expect competency in the courts of our country unless we are prepared to pay such an amount as is requisite to enable the judges to uphold the dignity, responsibility and respectability which should characterize our courts. Without going elaborately into this matter, I may say that I took this question up with the hon. minister last year, and I think he then intimated that he would be able to give this matter satisfactory consideration. I had a private conversation with him during the present year, and I am sure he is anxious to do what is fair and reasonable in connection with the salaries of the county court judges. I do not take the responsibility of naming any figure as being a reasonable salary, but I hope the remuneration of these judges will be increased to such an extent as to make life comfortable for them, as well as for those who may hereafter occupy similar positions, and to insure that there will be called to the ranks of the judges of the county courts capable men who will be able to do justice to that position and to the high honour of the profession from which they must be selected. If my hon. friend the Minister of Justice will look at the conditions that exist to-day and compare them with the conditions in 1876, when the first county court was, I think, established in the province of Nova Scotia, he will see that, although the work and the responsibility have increased ten-fold, and although the cost of living has gone up, the salaries have remained practically the same. I think that we should pay for competency and respectability and high standing in our courts more than in any other institution we possess, and I therefore, trust that this matter will receive at the hands of the Minister of Justice, at as early a date as possible, the consideration which I think the universal importance of the subject demands.

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): I desire to offer a few observations in support of the plea made by the hon. member for North Cape Breton with regard to increasing the salaries of the county court judges. In the province of Nova Scotia a peculiar situation exists. All the supreme court judges reside in the city of Halifax; the business of the Supreme Court is centralized in that city, so that a very large portion of the business which is disposed of by the Supreme Court judges in other provinces has to be taken up and dealt with by the judges of the county court in the province of Nova Scotia. The population of the province is in the neighbourhood of 460,000 and we have seventy county court judges so that each county court district in the province includes over 60,000 people. In the province of Ontario there are senior and junior county court judges; the situation is entirely different in that province, both with regard to jurisdiction and the emoluments the judges receive in their respective offices. I understand that in Ontario, in addition to their salaries, the judges of the county court, are in receipt of very large fees which are paid to them by way of commissions; that does not apply to the judges of the county court in the province of Nova Scotia. The records of our courts show conclusively that we have in the province of Nova Scotia judges discharging county court functions who possess the highest character and the highest attainments. I understand that some difficulty has existed in the mind of the hon. Minister of Justice with respect to the readjustment of salaries of county court judges throughout the Dominion, and as to the peculiar situation that exists in the province of Ontario. But it seems to me that the position of the county court judges in Nova Scotia, as regards salaries, ought to be treated somewhat differently from that of the county court judges in Ontario. If there is any difficulty in the mind of the Minister of Justice as to how to deal with the matter of county court judges in Ontario, I submit that that is no reasonable ground for deferring the justice which I think ought to be done to the judges of the county courts in the province of Nova Scotia. He should deal with them upon their merits and upon the merits of the situation then. Later on, when the hon. Minister of Justice has looked into the matter in the province of Ontario, he might deal with the county court judges of that province.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not wish to take up any time, because I addressed myself to the subject during the last session of Parliament. I only want to repeat what I stated then, that it does seem to me that the county court judges of the maritime provinces are not being fairly dealt with. Of course I find no fault with the present minister, he merely accepted the conditions as he found them when he entered office. No doubt there is a great difference between the position of a judge of the county court is the maritime provinces and that of a county court judge in the province of Ontario. I do not say that there is any greater legal ability in the one case than in the other. I think we ought to have men of the very highest legal attainments to occupy the position of county court judge. But there is no getting away from the fact that the county court judges in the maritime provinces are much more important officials than they are in the province of Ontario. In the first place, a judge of the county court in the maritime provinces has as a rule from three to five counties to cover, and he goes on circuit. He visits those counties as a rule about three times a year, I think, and holds circuit just the same as a circuit judge or High Court judge in Ontario. But as has been pointed out he receives no emoluments whatever. The only emolument to my knowledge which a county court judge receives outside of the small salary of about $3,000, I think, is something in the way of travelling expenses and per diem allowance which hardly pays his hotel bill when he goes away from home. In the province of Ontario they receive very large emoluments from the probate business, but in the maritime provinces—I am speaking of New Brunswick, I am not sure about the other provinces—we have local barristers who are appointed judges of probate and they perform the services and receive the fees.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is the same in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CARVELL: And I presume it is the same in Prince Edward Island. Now the county court judges could well perform the functions of those officials and in that way increase their salaries. Of course that is a matter entirely for the local legislatures and we have no jurisdiction over it. I do not have to point out the importance of the business transacted before the county court judges, because there is practically no limit except in the amount of money involved in the cases, and when you come to criminal business, I think I am safe in saying that three-quarters of that class of business in the maritime provinces is handled by county court judges, because they have the transaction of all cases except murder, I think, and rape, and one or two others. As we are a law-abiding community, fortunately the excepted cases are very few, indeed. But you can see that as a rule the county court judges in the maritime provinces have equal jurisdiction with the Supreme Court judges and, as they hold more courts, of course they do more business.

There is another point to which I wish to call the minister's attention, and that is the large amount of criminal business that is done under the Speedy Trials Act. I think that in more than one-half of the cases of men who are sent up for trial, they elect to be tried under the Speedy Trials Act. That is not a very grave burden on the county court judges in Ontario, because as a rule there are two judges for every county, and if one happens to be busy the other is able to attend to the cases. But he does not have to travel any great distance. The county court judge who lives in my own town travels one hundred and fifteen miles north and about one hundred miles south, and spends a large part of his time in travelling around through the four counties in the western part of the province, in order to try those speedy trial cases. Under the law he must go, and he does go; and I think I am safe in saying that the county court judges in the maritime provinces spend more time trying speedy trial cases than the whole of the Ontario judges. It has been suggested by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) that there may be some difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory arrangement as between the judges in the East and the judges in Ontario. I think the hon. minister can work that out. If he would allow me to make a suggestion, I would say to him not to replace the second judge who happens to pass away in Ontario, because I do not think it is necessary that there should be two judges to look after the ordinary court affairs in each county in the province of Ontario. This may be considered drastic, and possibly some of my hon. friends from Ontario might not care about it. But I do not think that the judges either in the maritime provinces or in Ontario are overworked. We want good men, and we cannot get good men unless we pay them reasonable salaries. Therefore I think it follows as a logical conclusion that we must increase their salary, and if the number of judges in Ontario stands in the way, then I say reduce them, cut them in two if you will, and then you will be able to give the judges good salaries. And when you give decent salaries to the judges in Ontario you can give decent salaries to those in the maritime provinces. I know this matter is not without difficulty, but I am satisfied the minister is giving it his best attention. I believe he is sympathetic with the idea, and I trust he will find some way of working it out.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no question as to the importance of the matter to which my hon. friends have called attention, and equally no question that there is very great force in what they have said. The matter is engaging my attention, and I can only say that what they have put forward shall be given my very best consideration. I am sorry to say that there are difficulties connected with the position in the Lower provinces, but I shall make my best endeavour to cope with them.

Mr. MACDONALD: When this matter was discussed on a former occasion, I find that a statement was made which went to indicate that there was some impression that the Supreme Court judges in my province had not the same jurisdiction and powers as the judges of the High Court of Ontario. I merely wish to say that the position of these judges in the province of Nova Scotia and their jurisdiction are quite as wide as those of the High Court of Ontario, and are equal to those of the Court of King's Bench of the province of Quebec. When we mentioned this matter before, the minister was good enough to say that it was receiving his earnest attention. I think it is hardly fair to the men who fill the judiciary in our province that the discrimination against them on the statute-books of the country should be maintained. We have given a distinguished Premier and a Minister of Justice to Canada who was a former judge in our Supreme Court and in the Department of Justice my hon. friend has under him to-day a distinguished barrister from our province of judicial attainments. His predecessor was the late lamented Judge Sedgewick, who, on the Supreme Court bench, gave good service to the country. In point of personality, there is no disparity between the men who have filled positions in that line from that province and those who come from other provinces, where higher salaries are maintained although there is no difference in the amount of work that is done. I am quite sure that, if the minister proceeded by a slight amendment to remove that distinction which is now maintained between the salaries of the judges of our province and those of judges in Ontario, he would find no objection from this side of the House and I do not think he would have very much difficulty in remedying these conditions if he would apply himself to it immediately, and in this session of Parliament.

Mr. DOHERTY: I can only say that I have endeavoured to deal with the matter, although it is not the only case where there is a disparity between salaries of judges of the high courts of the country. Some of the judges of the Superior Court in Quebec have salaries which are lower than those of the judges of the High Court of Nova Scotia. There are quite a number of anomalies which we will have to try to find courage to face and to find a remedy for as soon as possible.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Although this subject is not exactly germane to the resolution under discussion, yet as it refers to the Supreme Court, I would like to renew the question which I put the other day in the House and which my hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) promised to consider. The hon. gentleman will remember that a despatch appeared in the press about certain legislation introduced into the Imperial Parliament by Lord Haldane to strengthen the Privy Council by the addition of new law lords and from that mysterious cable despatch we gathered that the law lords would be taken from the higher courts in the various dominions. My hon. friend however was, like most of us, not certain what was the meaning of the cable despatch and I am no further advanced to-day as to the interpretation of it than we were the other day. But since then this despatch has attracted considerable attention in legal circles. I was reading in the Montreal Star a few days ago an interview given by one of the leading members of the Bar in Montreal, Mr. A. W. Atwater, K.C., in which he said that:

> The Bill which Lord Haldane has introduced in the House of Lords to provide greater facilities for the handling of overseas appeals to the Privy Council is warmly welcomed by members of the Bar whose practice takes them frequently to London.

Mr. Atwater, who has a very large practice as solicitor for the city of Montreal and who appears quite often before the Privy Council, went on to say:

> I do not think, that it will do anything to expedite the business of Canadian appeals, as there is now no undue delay. We have nothing whatever to complain of in that respect. We always find the committee most obliging, and they will sometimes sit right into August in order to finish their list.
> I think the idea of the Bill is so to strengthen the committee, so as to relieve the members of some of the strain which now falls on them, and to have appeals heard by at least four or five judges instead of by three as may be the case sometimes now. It should be borne in mind that Canadian appeals only form part of the great volume of business before the committee. Indian appeals for instance are much more numerous than Canadian.

The cable summaries of the Bill are very ambiguous, and it is impossible to understand what they really mean in places. It may be intended to lead up to the establishment of a uniform court of appeal for Great Britain and the dominions but the messages are indefinite on this point. Furthermore, they are not clear whether it is intended to strengthen the representation of the dominions on the committee.

We, like Mr. Atwater, find the cable despatch very ambiguous. But the hon. Minister of Justice, the other day, stated, in answer to my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) that last summer, during his stay in London, he had had informal conferences with Lord Haldane, if I mistake not, at which this question was broached. I would like to know from my hon. friend if his conferences with the Lord Chancellor were on the line of the proposals which were made at the time of the last Imperial conference in 1911. To refresh my hon. friend's memory, I might be permitted to read a summary of the proposals of His Majesty's Government which were agreed to by the conference. They will be found at page 236 of the Imperial Conference Report, 1911:

The following proposition appears to express the result of the discussion at the Imperial conference on Monday the 12th June.

1. At present, the House of Lords is the Supreme Court of Appeal for the United Kingdom, and the King in Council, (in effect the Judicial Committee) is the Supreme Court of Appeal for the rest of the Empire.

2. It is proposed to take a first step towards combining these courts into a Supreme Court of Appeal for the Empire, and towards strengthening them by adding to the number of Judges composing them.

3. The scheme is that the Home Government should add two selected judges to the Lords of Appeal. There would then be six Law Lords devoting their whole time to sitting in the two Courts.

4. In addition, the Lord Chancellor would, as now, preside whenever he is present, and all who are now qualified to sit in either the House of Lords or the Judicial Committee would be able to sit as now.

5. In this way the appeals of the United Kingdom and of the rest of the Empire respectively would be heard by the same judges who hear them now, with the addition of two Law Lords to both courts, but the two courts would both be branches of the Imperial Court of Appeal.

6. Except where it is necessary that the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee shall sit simultaneously it is contemplated that the court shall sit in full strength first at the one end then at the other.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

7. It will be necessary that the conditions and method of appeal from different parts of the Empire shall be suited to the local requirements, and it is not practicable to attain uniformity in these respects, at all events at first. But as the judges will be almost entirely the same for all kinds of appeals, it seems probable that a greater degree of uniformity may be reached, and possibly in time all differences may be effaced.

8. It is further proposed that, in accordance with the wishes expressed by the Dominion Representatives, the practice of the Judicial Committee shall be modified so that in Dominion cases any dissentient judge may be free to give his reasons if His Majesty's consent is given to this change.

I see by the precis of the conference that there was quite a long discussion about the proposals which were made, but what I am anxious to know from the minister is whether any action has been taken as between the Dominion Government and the Imperial Government on this line and, if so, what action has been taken. Parliament is anxious to know what was the purpose and what the result of these informal conferences.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think I ever described the conversations we had last summer as conferences. I may say that I cabled yesterday asking for a copy of the Bill and such information as could be given with regard to it. In these conversations to which I have referred there was no discussion of any such details as are suggested in the proposed Bill the hon. member has read. There was nothing done otherwise than in a conversational way, and I do not think I could say that the Lord Chancellor said more than that he was interesting himself in endeavouring to provide for strengthening the court which heard our appeals. There certainly was no outlining of any definite plans. Opinions have been invited as to the desirability of altering the present system of the Privy Council under which a judgment is rendered without an expression of individual opinion and the Dominion Government gathered the opinions of the different provinces on the subject and communicated them together with its own opinion, as was requested.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What were the opinions forwarded?

Mr. DOHERTY: The opinions of the provinces did not agree, but I may say that the opinion expressed by this Government was not favourable to the suggestion that the dissentient judges, if there should be any, should express their dissent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Did the Minister of Justice himself expresses any opinion?

Mr. DOHERTY: I concurred in the opinion that it would not be an advantage that their lordships of the Privy Council should depart from the present custom of rendering judgment without the expression of any dissenting opinion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This is a very important subject, especially affecting the members of the legal profession, and I would like the Minister of Justice to make a statement with regard to it at a later date; to give us a resume of the opinions expressed by the different provinces and by the Dominion, and to submit the Bill to us when he receives it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be very glad to communicate all the information I have and all that I may receive.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time, and concurred in.

Mr. DOHERTY thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 180, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

AID TO AGRICULTURE.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved second reading of Bill No. 103, for the granting of aid for the advancement of agriculture instruction in the provinces.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BURRELL: When I had the honour to introduce this Bill to the House on January 24, I went into its subject matter in such detail that it will not now be necessary for me to discuss the general principle of the Bill. I might say that in the intervening months since the Bill was presented I have seen no reason to alter my opinion as to the general lines upon which this proposed help to agriculture should proceed. Occasionally there has been a little misconception in the country as to the differences which mark this particular Bill from the Bill it is intended to repeal and which was only a provisional measure adopted by this House last year. I purpose reading one or two opinions to show the feeling of prominent journalists and leaders of opinion in regard to the particular line which this Bill takes. Every country in modern times has come to the conclusion that the most satisfactory and best aid that can be given to agriculture is by educational means. Great Britain has recently been awakened to the realization of the absolute necessity of revivifying her agricultural system, and the Hon. Walter Runciman, president of the Board of Agriculture, speaking on the subject recently used this language:

> Agricultural education is the right of the humblest agriculturist in the country. . . . First and foremost then it was necessary that agricultural education should come to be regarded as the right of the humblest agriculturist in the country, and it appeared that there were three groups of young agriculturists who could especially benefit by it. First, there was the well-to-do youngster who could afford two or three years in college; second, the youngster who could afford to spend the winter away from his father's farm for two or three years in order to attend a farm school; third, the boys and girls, young men and women, whose circumstances made it necessary that they should be taught by travelling instructors if taught at all.

Mr. Runciman adds:

> I found that the scientists and the demonstrators at the colleges were constantly making discoveries, knowledge of which ought to be widely disseminated, especially in their own districts. That is to be done now partly through the eductional network I have described and partay by advisors whose salaries are paid out of the development fund, and who at each centre give gratuitous advice on scientific questions to farmers.

That is the general view of the English authorities who are considering methods to help agriculture. In referring to other authorities I would gladly take this opportunity cordially to express my appreciation of the generous way in which the press of the country and various influential people interested in agriculture, apart altogether from the political aspect of things, have expressed themselves with regard to the terms and provisions of this Bill. I am not going to quote from these parties which might perhaps be naturally inclined to favourable criticism of the measure brought in by this Government, but I will refer to expressions from one or two other sources, which at all events, would not be looked upon as having such special leanings. I have here a quotation from the Toronto Globe of January 7:

> Mr. Burrell in his exposition drew a clear and proper line of demarcation between the ordinary agricultural services, managed by the department of which he is the head, and the educational service, which is properly a function of each provincial Government. As the ten million grant is to improve education he has adopted the wise course of distributing the money among the provinces, taking such precautions as may be found practicable to see that it is reasonably well spent. The basis of distribution is simple and equitable; each province is to receive twenty thousand dollars yearly, and the remainder of the appropriation for each year will be distributed according to population.

There is a small extract which I would like to put on 'Hansard' from the Family Herald and Weekly Star of Montreal:

> The sum is certainly not too large—it might, indeed, be made larger before the ten years are up, if it be found that the work is growing beyond its limits. The idea of concentrating on education is a good one, and is in line with modern thought and experience. We shall now see how it works out. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. The various bodies which will have to do with the administration of this fund will be on their trial. They will be judged by a critical and informed jury for they will be judged by the farmers themselves who are expected to benefit.

I have received a great multitude of letters during the last two or three months, and I would just like to read one or two. Here is a reference to an interview with Professor Cumming, secretary of agriculture in the province of Nova Scotia:

The Federal Department of Agriculture has in my opinion showed wisdom in the arrangements it has made for the expense of the generous increased assistance which is being given to agriculture. declared Professor Cumming. What Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces want is money to carry on more agricultural education work and to be able to offer the financial inducements to keep our good men to carry on this work. That is just what the Dominion Government's aid is going to enable us to do.

And may I be permitted to read a brief extract from a letter received from the president of the University of Saskatchewan, dated November 28, 1912:

Permit me to express my hearty approval of your policy of assisting agricultural education throughout Canada.

In this province our two greatest needs are the carrying of agricultural knowledge and practices to the new settlers and research. As you know conditions here are so different to those of the Old Country which are familiar to the settler that he is at considerable disadvantage for the first few years of his settlement.

There is also a great number of problems to investigate, and unless satisfactory solutions are found in the near future, our progress here will be seriously delayed.

We cannot appreciate too highly the aid which you are proposing to give to agriculture. It is a platitude to remark that the prosperity of the country depends upon the prosperity of agriculture. When the crops are good and plentiful, easily marketed and sold at a good price, the general business of the country thrives, and if they fail, the general business of the country is seriously crippled. I believe one dollar spent in improving agriculture here would yield five dollars worth in the general business of the province.

And in concluding these extracts, I will put on record a note I have received from the Premier of Saskatchewan, Hon. Walter Scott:

Regina, 1st Feb., 1913.

Dear Mr. Burrell,—I wish to send you a line of congratulation and commendation upon the measure which you have introduced in Parliament for aiding agricultural education in the several provinces of Canada. As I view it, your Bill is one which should have the hearty support of the country as a whole.

With kind regards, believe me,

Yours sincerely yours,

Walter Scott.

Hon. Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ont.

Now, I do not put these extracts on record—and do not wish to be misunderstood as doing so—for the purpose of showing that we are getting endorsation from these sources, but because I want to direct the attention of the House to the fact that this Bill differs slightly from the measure I introduced last year. That Bill allowed the money which was to be voted by this Parliament to be devoted in a large variety of ways which I can touch upon in committee if hon. members desire to have the matter threshed out. But these extracts are particularly on the line of agricultural education, and I have given them for the purpose of showing that on the whole the men in Canada who have given serious and careful attention to this subject, I think, will justify the Government in restricting the federal aid to lines particularly and soundly interpretative of agricultural education. I do not wish further to delay the House. When we get into committee if there are details of the Bill which hon. gentlemen wish to have explained, or on which they wish the view of the Government, I need hardly say I will give the fullest explanation in my power.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I do not rise with the object of offering any opposition to the Bill nor with the object of unduly delaying the committee stage of it. I am moderately equipped for saying much upon the subject, as it was raised by my hon. friend in his speech on the first reading. I listened to that speech with great pleasure. Its literary form was, as is always the case with my hon. friend's utterances, attractive, and he displayed great enthusiasm as he always does in referring to this idyllic subject. He went rather wider then than he seems disposed to allow the House to go or to suggest that we should go, and raised a great many topics, by reference at least in that speech. We have been so much engaged in the strenuous business of working out policies on the water that I confess I have not had time to devote myself much to the consideration of policies on land, as raised during the speech of my hon. friend. I have not had time to re-read his utterances, though I listened to them carefully at the time. I do remember that he stated that he desired to deal with the subject in a non-partisan way, and so far as I have looked at the Bill he has been guided by that principle. He was not quite non-partisan in his speech, however. I remember distinctly that he began by saying that he introduced the measure in fulfilment of a pledge given by his right hon. leader that something would be done for agriculture. Now, I do not know what it was precisely that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister promised to do for agriculture during the general election of 1911. I keep beside me the Halifax programme, but, of course, that was drawn up for the guidance of the Conservative party in 1908. I keep it beside me as an interesting piece of literature, as showing how far it is possible for a statesman to go when in power from what he professed in opposition. I cannot find in that programme any distinct promise on behalf of the agricultural interests.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but if he will permit me for a moment, I will explain. In the opening remarks I made on the introduction of the Bill, I said:

> The right hon. gentleman who now leads this House stated to the people of Canada on August 14, 1911——

Which was, as my hon. friend knows, an election manifesto.

> —that if he were placed in charge of the Government of the country he would provide for 'the granting of liberal assistance to the provinces for the purpose of supplementing and extending the work of agricultural education, and for the improvement of agriculture.'

That is the promise I referred to.

Mr. CLARK: I am glad indeed to have that evidence, which, of course, is incontrovertible, that the Government is about to fulfil one pledge. I am sure my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) on this, as on so many other grounds, ought to hold in the highest esteem my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. However, that is not the only pledge given by my right hon. friend and the party opposite as to what would be done for the agricultural interests if they came into power. They gave at least one pledge which they never can fulfil. It was not in the manifesto, but was given by voting for a declared principle in this House. I recollect, as I am sure you do, Mr. Speaker, that in the first session of the last Parliament, we had a division in this House on the principle that a vacancy on the Railway Commission should be filled by the appointment of a western farmer. I have not prepared what I have to say and do not recollect the exact wording of the resolution, but that is the principle upon which we voted. The resolution was moved as a vote of want of confidence in the then Administration. That is the most solemn method by which a party can give a pledge. They moved actually that the party then in power in this country were unworthy of the confidence of the country and inferentially declared that they would fill the vacancy on the Railway Commission with a farmer. The then member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) moved the resolution, and we had speeches from almost every western member upon the subject. The vote that followed was a party vote. My hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) spoke and my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) was even more solemn than usual in the closing words of what he said on that occasion:

> And I say further that he who votes the other way at this time acknowledging the immense interests, as members have freely acknowledged to be represented by the character of appointment aimed at, proclaims to his country and to his constituents by that vote, that in his opinion there is no practical western farmer qualified to measure for the office, and he must take the full responsibility for that position.

That was given a very solemn emphasis by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. I know that my hon. friend the minister was in the House, for I recollect that he intervened in the debate with, at any rate, a question; and he expressed the hope that Mr. Staples—I mention his name as he is not now in the House—included horticulture in his expression of ideas on the subject; that is to say, I presume he thought that better horticulturists would be found than agriculturists. There is just a possible chance that the Government will escape the charge of a broken promise in connection with that interruption, because Mr. Staples at once said he did not for a moment forget that horticulture was an important branch of the cultivation of the soil. I am certain the vote was brought in to catch the votes of members from the prairie provinces. But the way it worked out was this. Mr. Goodeve who was then a member of the House, voted with the party opposite; he has since been appointed to a position on the Railway Commission. I presume he got the appointment because of the fact that there was a garden behind his store, and he therefore came in as a horticulturist. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture came in as a horticulturist also, and got the portfolio of agriculture. I do not know how the farmers of the West will regard this matter when it is brought to their attention, because, what with the commissionership and the ministership, the farmers of plains are faring rather badly; I hardly think they will regard hon. gentlemen opposite as having fulfilled their pledges to the farmers on that particular question. I have referred so often to the speech of the hon. member from Portage la Prairie in regard to agricultural implements that I need mention it only as another case in which he would have had an opportunity of voting, if the session had not come to an end during the course of which the party opposite were pledged to a substantial reduction of the duty upon agricultural implements. That remains an unfulfilled pledge; the other pledge can never be fulfilled unless a horticulturist fills the position. Another pledge was given by the agriculturists of the party opposite. A solemn resolution was introduced, of which the meaning presumably was that agriculture, for its salvation, required a return of the Tory Government that they might save agriculture by introducing a chilled meat plant in the West under Government care. There was a debate upon that and the House was divided upon it. Hon. gentlemen opposite voted that a chilled meat plant was the particular thing that was necessary to save western agriculturists and the farming industry generally. I do not think they saw very far into real economic conditions when they brought in that resolution, because the experience of the people of western Canada now is that there is in that portion of the country a great deal more chill than beef. The fact is that beef is produced in western Canada is a quantity barely sufficient, under present conditions, to satisfy the wants of the people of this country. There is no particular need for chilling the beef to any greater extent than it is chilled by the ordinary effect of the climate. But that is not my point. My hon. friend, who was so eager to avow his non-partisan spirit, but nevertheless began his speech by saying he introduced this Bill in fulfillment of a pledge, also voted, I think, in favour of this chilled meat proposition; and that is another pledge to the farmer that has not been fulfilled. The western farmers know these things, and when they come to study the merits of this particular measure, having special regard to the statement of the hon. minister that it was introduced in fulfillment of a pledge, they will not allow themselves to be absolutely carried away by the glamour of this measure, which is really only a show so far as any actual benefit to agriculture is concerned. It is customary in this House to carry on a continual display, the object of which is to show that one political party is the friend of the farmer, that Codlin is their friend, not Short; but the western farmer I think will not feel that Codlin is really befriending him in supporting this educational system that is proposed to be established. I do not think my hon. friend is going to do a great deal for Canada nor for its agricultural interests. The trouble, as I have said, in considering economic conditions, many of which were dealt with in the very interesting speech of my hon. friend on the first reading, is that if you educate the farmer to a better production, you naturally make every farmer produce more. This matter was touched on by the hon. minister, and he gave us figures relating to various countries with regard to the production per acre of certain farm products. I believe we could have a great deal of improvement in our methods in Canada in that respect. I believe it is a fact that we produce only seventeen bushels or so of wheat to the acre in this country as compared with thirty-two or thirty-three in Germany and the Old Country. If you educate your farmers, spending ten millions in the process, to produce thirty-two bushels where they now produce seventeen, what will be the result? I believe there are one hundred million bushels of unmarketed grain in western Canada at the present time, of last year's crop, and if you double your production that means that in the spring you will have two hundred million bushels of unmarketed grain. It would almost appear that to confer a real benefit upon the farmers of the West it would be desirable to lessen the production, unless you provide by some economic means a method by which they will be able to get rid of their produce. We do not lack wheat in this country. My hon. friends are the great apostles of a home market, but we are supplying the home market and we have one hundred million bushels in the barns beside. The gentlemen who are engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements to sell to those in the West who are raising the grain with them are not getting on very well with their collections in western Canada. I want to put this to the Government and the hon. the Minister of Agriculture as a real economic problem. If you are going to teach your farmers to produce twice the amount of grain they are now producing, what is to be the result? The problem is simple enough; we are face to face with the fact that there are one hundred million bushels of grain from last year's crop unmarketed this year. I think it would have been better to have carried reciprocity and have allowed the farmers to have access to the markets beyond the line to the south of us. Referring to that question, there has been considerable rejoicing in the Government press because fifty per cent of reciprocity was likely to be carried by the United States Congress, but I quite fail to understand the physchology of either men or newspapers who believe that one hundred per cent. of a good thing is objectionable but fifty per cent. is all right. There is a good deal of fighting on this question below the line, and I am certain that Canada will not obtain, under any arrangement made by the present Government of the United States, any such a bargain as we could have obtained under the arrangement made by the late Government, but which, unfortunately, was not carried into effect. If there had been an opportunity for debate upon the first reading I should like to have raised some of these points at that time. I regret that I did not have the opportunity, for I would have liked to have heard the hon. minister express his views in regard to some of the points I have raised on this great question of how we are to help the farmers of the country. He mentioned just now in justification of his measure certain English authorities, and he quoted my old friend and colleague on the school board of Newcastle, Mr. Runciman, as approving of methods similar to those he is introducing under this measure. I suppose he was conscientiously endeavouring to give us an argument why this Bill is a good one. I am not opposing the Bill, but it is very difficult for me to refrain from opposing a false argument when I hear it, and I do not think that argument was a good one. There is a great difference between Britain and this country in respect of wheat production; they produce an amount in deficiency of the food supply necessary for the population, but we in this country produce an amount in excess of our requirements, and if we had a sensible fiscal system we could produce a vast excess, benefitting not only the farmers, but the wealth and prosperity of the whole country. My point in passing is that the economic conditions and the needs of the two countries are diametrically opposed. We have an excess production now over what we need. They have an immense deficiency of production, so that an argument drawn from what they are doing in England does not carry me any further in the solution of this problem which was so lamentably prevented from being solved partially, at any rate, by the unfortunate result of the last election, not unfortunate so far as the change of sides is concerned—that is a small matter to a man who, since he was in his 'teens, has been doing everything he could to the best of his knowledge and ability to promote the best interests of all classes, in any country he happens to be living in—but lamentable from the standpoint of the conditions that have followed the turning down of that agreement. I should like my hon. friend to tell me how he is going to help Canada or the agricultural interests by increasing any further the production of the farmers if he does not influence the Government of which he is a member to make such arrangements as will help them to dispose of the increased production. Of course the real burden upon the back of the farmer, is the burden of protection, which does not increase the prices of what he has to sell but which increases to an enormous extent the cost of what he has to buy. That is why farming is not a popular occupation in Canada. That is why we have such difficulty in getting our sons upon the land. I have experienced this difficulty in my own family, because farming is not remunerative to anything like the extent that it should be, considering the labour and care that are put into the occupation I know what I am talking about, because when I have not been dealing with water policies, I have been following a land policy of my own and trying to learn something about farming. The real burden is that his calling is not remunerative, and it is not remunerative because he has not a market for his material, so far as western Canada is concerned. My hon. friends on the other side of the House will tell me, and I think this is germane to what fell from the minister on the first reading, that the home market is the market. I believe that the protectionists of Toronto, in one of the various fields of their operations, have formed a society for nothing else than the sending out of literature on the value of the home market. No one depreciates the value of the home market, though why one should sing its praises particularly, I do not know, because every country that ever existed on the face of the earth must have its own home market for the great majority of its wants, and especially of its agricultural wants, a large portion of it anyway. There is no difficulty about retaining the home market for what you produce. Proximity, the fact that you are living in the midst of it, makes it certain that any produce worth thinking about will command the home market. But the trouble with the argument about the home market is that once you begin to cater only to the home market you are in very great danger of failing to supply it, and I would like to impress that upon my hon. friends opposite. When the home market becomes your creed and your method of practice, you are in very great danger of failing to supply it. Let me illustrate that. In Prince Edward Island—I am not certain whether I mentioned this before in the House or not—you have the finest land for growing potatoes in the world. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island will agree with me in that respect if not in any other. I am told by the Islanders I have met that they have the finest land for growing potatoes in the world, and yet the extraordinary spectacle was seen of potatoes being brought from Ireland to Ontario last year. That happened in this country. With an island nearly half the size of England, and one-third the size of Ireland, 120 miles in length and of considerable breadth, you had the extraordinary spectacle of potatoes being brought from Ireland and sold in the province of Ontario, and sold in Montreal in the province of Quebec also. That might have been due partially to a temporary failure of the crop, but why should a temporary failure of the crop in a country of unlimited extent, and of the unlimited possibilities of Canada affect the home market? Simply because by following the home market theory, you have reduced your production to what you can dispose of within your own country. If you had reciprocity, as they used to have it—and now I think we are to have it on potatoes, and we shall see how it works out presently—if we had accepted reciprocity, we would have seen these potatoe grounds cultivated, and I have no doubt we shall see them now. Anyway the illustration is just as good, apart from any changes that may be made in the fiscal arrangements of the country to the south of us. My point is that the farmers in Prince Edward Island do not put more land in potatoes because there is not a market for them when they raise them. While you are catering to the home market, you actually fail to supply it, and this in a country which is a continent. The same thing has happened in regard to beef, to which I referred in another connection. Here you have unlimited land for raising beef. Alberta is the finest province in the world for raising beef, and you cater mostly to your home market. The way to increase your production of agricultural products is to deal freely with other countries.

Now, we come to a point at which I am reminded of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, whom I miss very much when we are dealing with the fiscal problem. In a speech during the recess last summer, he advised the manufacturers of this country to cater to the foreign market. Why, Sir, it is an economic impossibility for Canada to be a huge exporter of manufactures at this stage of her progress, and for the very simple reason that you must get some goods in repayment for your manufactures, and it is certain that you will not buy much agricultural produce or food. It is an economic impossibility to develop a large export trade in manufactures at this juncture of Canada's history. I want to impress upon the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, who is responsible for the prosperity of agriculture to a certain extent, and for the arrangements which are to make for the prosperity of the farmers, that if he can do anything to promote the production of a huge excess by means of supplying a market for that excess, he will have some chance of success in his object. But certainly to my mind, he will not greatly affect the condition of the agricultural industry or of the farmers, or of the country at large by educating the farmers to produce more while your fiscal system fails to tell them where they are going to send it when they have produced it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer).

Now, in regard to the Bill itself—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: They are strong on fractional relief on the other side. They want to hear about how they are going to improve the farmers' bank account by helping some corner of his intellect. That is all very nice. I am a theorist, I am told some times, but I never spun so fine a theory as that by conferring a university degree you will satisfy a man's stomach. I never tried to make a man's fortune by recommending him to study Sanskrit. I am trying to show that I am a practical man in regard to farming, and I ought to be, for I know something about it. My hon. friend from West Algoma has not that advantage. In regard to the Bill itself, I have no objections to it, and I am bound to say, as I said before, that the minister has followed his promise out in the way he has arranged to spend this money. I am very glad that the Government has learned something from the criticism we passed upon another department of their policy last session. They wanted to pass a road Bill last session you will remember, and in these days when free speech is likely to be curtailed, I would direct attention to the fact that criticism even of this Government is capable of producing some little improvement. The criticism we passed upon the road Bill was: we have no objection to spend this money on roads, but we do not want you to use it as an electioneering device, and if you determine to use it as an electioneering device we will try to get our friends elsewhere to put you out of business on that particular line of your operations. I found nothing that was more easily defended than the Senate's action in taking our view in that particular matter, and they certainly should be easily defended because I find the best defence for the Senate in the method which is now followed by the Minister of Agriculture in sharing up the money under this Bill. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Burrell) is essentially a fair-minded man; he is a man who is open to improvement; he has learned something and the Government has learned something from our criticism on the road Bill. I congratulate him on the way in which he is going to divide the money equally between the various provinces in this case.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

AID TO AGRICULTURE.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, for once I do not find myself quite in accord with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), because he stated that he had no fault to find with this Bill. I have no fault to find with the supposed object of the Bill, but I have a good deal of fault to find with the Bill itself.

Mr. CLARK: I did not say so.

Mr. NESBITT: Then I presume that I am still in total accord with my hon. friend. When the Bill was introduced by the hon. Minister of Agriculture some time ago, he said that it was in fulfilment of a pledge of a grant of money towards agricultural education given by the Premier to the people of Canada during the recent election campaign. The Bill on its face purports to grant $10,000,000 for that purpose. That $10,000,000, however, is divided into instalments to be paid over a number of years, and is placed at the disposal of the Minister of Agriculture and the Governor in Council. The Bill does not say what form the education is to take. My hon. friend will certainly not be accused of hiding his light under a bushel when he advertises to the public that he is going to give $10,000,000 for the purpose of education, whereas what he is really going to do is to give a million dollars a year, which he could just as well put in the estimates each year without making any display. It is like a person giving $10 a year towards a particular object and advertising that he is giving $100 or $200, which in reality he is spreading over ten or twenty years. The Bill commences by reciting:

> For the purpose of aiding and advancing the farming industry by instruction in agriculture, and for the purposes authorized by this Act, the following sums, aggregating ten million dollars,——

And so on. My hon. friend says that he has received a great many complimentary letters from the people throughout the country upon the provisions of the Bill. I find fault with the Bill because there are no provisions in it. The minister does not say what he is going to do with this money. He practically keeps control of it. Let me direct the attention of the House in the first place to section 4, sub-section (a), in which he proposes to give to certain veterinary colleges a grant of $20,000 a year. Veterinary science is probably as worthy an object of encouragement as anything else for the hon. minister, because veterinary surgeons are very useful in association with agriculture. My hon. friend could very easily have given the money in such a way that it would advance the education of veterinary surgeons. In place of giving it to the colleges and letting the colleges pay their expenses out of it and make that additional profit, he could very easily have given the money for a certain standard of scholarship. He could readily have set some standard to which the students must come up to, before they would be able to acquire the scholarship. By that means he would very materially have assisted veterinary science in this country, and would have put it on a higher plane of education, which, without saying anything to the detriment of the ordinary veterinary surgeon in this country. I think is very much needed. The section goes on to say:

> (b) The sum of twenty thousand dollars shall be paid in each year to the government of each province;
> (c) The remainder of the appropriation for each year shall be allotted and paid to the governments of the respective provinces in proportion to the populations of the said provinces respectively as determined by the latest decennial census.

That looks all right on the surface, but section 5 says:

> The payments hereinbefore authorized shall, as to each province, be conditional upon agreement between the minister and the Government of the province as to the terms, conditions and purposes, within the meaning of this Act, upon and for which the payments are to be made and applied, and such agreement shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

That means that the provinces have to satisfy the minister as to what they are going to do with the grant. That may be all right, but at the same time it would be very easy for the minister not to agree with the provinces. I will bring to your attention a clause under which the minister keeps control of the money to do with it as he thinks proper. This minister may be all wise and a better judge of what should be done with the money than the provinces are. His successor, if he has one, may not be so wise, and some contention might arise whereby, under section 7, he would be able to expend the money himself. Section 6 says:

> The minister may appoint such officers as are required for carrying out the provisions of this Act, and for such inspection, examination and report as are necessary to insure the expenditure of the moneys paid in accordance with the intention of this Act and the agreements and regulations made under the authority of this Act; and the salaries and expenses of such officers shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by Parliament for the purpose.

I find fault with this clause, because if the intention is to give money to the provinces for the purpose of aiding agricultural education there is no need for the establishment of a staff over and above what the minister already has. To spend this money on a staff to be appointed, I say with all due deference to the gentlemen who might fill these places they might easily be of not much benefit to the country. If this money is to be given to the provinces as the Bill purports to provide, then it should be given to the provinces. And that is what I find fault with in the Bill all through. In the first place, it starts off by proposing to give $10,000,000, and so the agricultural community is led to believe that it is going to get $10,000,000 for the purpose of agricultural education, whereas the money is dribbled out over a period of years, and, as I say, all that is proposed to be done could be done with much less display. The next section provides:

The Governor in Council may make such regulations as are deemed advisable for giving effect to the objects and purposes of this Act, and, notwithstanding anything in this Act, the minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council and with the consent of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of any province and upon such terms and conditions as are prescribed by the Governor in Council, may expend in any such province in any year the whole or any part of the grant provided for such province under this Act for the purposes set forth in the preamble of this Act.

In the first place, there is no purpose set forth in the preamble In the next place, it is provided that both the Governor in Council and the Lieutenant Governor in Council must be agreed before the minister can spend the money. Suppose there is a difference of opinion between the Governor in Council and the Lieutenant Governor in Council, the money could not be spent. That clause, I think, is unnecessary. If the minister is going to give the money to the provinces to be spent on agricultural education why does he not give it, instead of trying to keep control in this hidden way. Why not give it outright to the provinces? They know, perhaps, as well as any of us here, what is the best way of spending the money to bring about the education of their farming communities, Section 8 provides that the minister shall lay an annual report before Parliament. But, as I said in starting, he takes the right of granting the ten millons to be expended by himself under the direction of the Governor in Council. He reports to this House, but before he reports the money is all spent; we are not asked how it shall be expended; we have no rights in the matter. The minister says that the money is to be spent for the education of the agricultural community. But what is the education of the agricultural community? Is it teaching the farmers to plough, or to break in colts, or to feed sheep or pigs, or to prune trees? Our agricultural college in Ontario, and, I fancy, similar institutions all through the country, are doing good work in the education of the farmer. But they do not reach the people. And, so far as I am concerned, if we are to have this money expended, I would like to know how it is going to be expended to reach the people. If it is going to be spent in assisting agricultural colleges, that is a good thing, but it is not the object, that, in my judgment, we should devote our thoughts to at the present time. We need to get at the ordinary farmer, the man who does not go to college or send his son to college—does not have the means to do so. Then, there are a great number of young men who go to our agricultural colleges who do not go back to the farm—we all know that; they go into other pursuits, probably become teachers in agricultural colleges or something of that kind. There is no doubt that the minister's intention is perfectly honest, but I would point out in all earnestness that if he is going to spend this money on agricultural education, he should work it out on some line to get in touch with the people on the farms. A few years ago the Department of Agriculture here inaugurated the system of teaching the farmers to carry on cow-testing. Men were appointed for each district who were supposed to teach the farmers how to test milk and cream and how to keep the records of milk production from each cow. That is of very great benefit to the ordinary farmer,—no one can imagine what a benefit it is who has not practiced it. But the good of this movement, in my judgment, was greatly lessened by the fact that these men instead of going to the farmers, went to the cheese and butter factories making tests and giving illustrations to those who came there. I understand that in some countries, they have what they call illustration farms—

Mr. EDWARDS: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say that, while I do not know how things were managed in his part of the country, in the country I represent, that which he suggests is precisely what was done. The man engaged in cow-testing visits the farmers. I had a man appointed in my county and he goes around to the different farms and instructs the farmers how to properly weigh and test the milk of each individual cow. He does not do the work in the factory, but on the different farms.

Mr. NESBITT: I congratulate the hon. gentleman on that fact. So far as my experience goes, I do not know if any farmer whose place has been visited for this purpose by the gentleman in charge of the cow-testing. He does go to the factory, and if the farmer goes to the factory, he gets the benefit of the illustration and test. But very few farmers go to the factory themselves. They send a boy, or more often the milk is carried to the factory by a milk drawer who engages at the beginning of the season to draw on a contract basis, and this man takes no more interest in the testing of milk than I take in the Persian language. I was about to speak of having illustration farms, which exist in some countries. I understand that these farms are run by those in charge just as though they owned the place. On certain days, perhaps a week or two weeks apart, the farmers from the surrounding country are invited to the illustration farm and those in charge teach them as far as they can, the benefits of adapting the soil to the kinds of grain they are growing, and so on. They follow out that line of procedure as well in the matter of dairying as in grain production; so that it is practically an education to the farmer. My hon. friend in his Bill says he proposes to grant this money for agricultural education. I have seen in my time a great deal of this so-called agricultural education, and I venture to say that very little of it reaches the ordinary farmer whom we all desire to reach. I hope my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture will see his way clear to withdraw any intimation that he wants to dispose of this money in a different manner than is indicated by the purport of the Bill, by striking out clause 7, which is absolutely unnecessary—and clause 6 is of the same character.

I desire to say a word to emphasize what I have said to my hon. friend with reference to the grant to the veterinary colleges. I can quite appreciate the fact that the ordinary veterinary in this country might be of much greater benefit to the community that he serves if he had the knowledge that he should have before attempting to doctor their stock. With the apparent intention of the Bill I have no fault to find; as to the proposed method of carrying out its provisions, I doubt very much the probability of the benefits to arise therefrom. The Ontario Government have a resident district superintendent who assists the farmer by giving him instructions along certain lines, but the difficulty in connection with that is that, like other matters of a similar nature, the whole thing is confined to party politics. If both parties could rise above that, and refrain from confining the benefits which might be derived from education of this or any other kind, which is supposed to be for the benefit of the whole community, to party politics; it would be a great advantage to the people. It does not necessarily follow that because one of my hon. friends on the other side of the House represents a farming district and a member on this side also represents a farming community, that the district represented by the Liberal members should not receive as much attention as it to be given to the district represented by the Conservative member. That is the fault I have to find with the district representative of the Ontario Government; he would not try to educate a Grit along farming or any other lines.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken; I am sure that half the district representatives are Liberals.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend may have had influence enough and fair play enough to see that in other parts of the country this is not the case, but I speak only whereof I know, and of what comes under my own observation. A certain amount of benefit, of course, results from the activities of that gentleman, no matter what district he is in, but I contend that he does not come in touch with the farming community as he should; he does not make it his business to meet the farmers and educate them along certain necessary lines. As a matter of fact, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has pointed out, if a market is provided for the farmer he will take steps to educate himself; it is wonderful how much he can educate himself and to what an extent he can, as a result, successfully carry out his duties. At any rate, the great bulk of the farmers I have the honour to represent are quite capable of educating themselves and of farming just about as well as it is possible to do. Many of them, of course, do not farm as well as they could, and many of them might be benefitted by a certain amount of education which could be given to them by the expenditure of this money if it was applied in such a way as to give the whole community the benefit—not any particular class or section of the country. I make these remarks to point out to my hon. friend not that I have any suspicion that he will do anything wrong, for I think he has the interests of his department very much at heart, but before his Bill passes, I wanted to point out some of the weaknesses which I thought I saw in it, and which I hope, before the Bill is given its third reading, he will endeavour to rectify. The hon. member for Red Deer has told the House, in a very much better way than I could do it, of several things the present Government could do for the farmer—things which they very strongly advocated when they were on this side of the House; at the same time, this is a step in the right direction if it is properly carried out, and I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture will endeavour to carry it out in such a manner as to make its application a benefit to the agricultural community, and to insure that its benefits will not be eaten up in some department in Ottawa or wasted in some other form by paying officials who could very well be dispensed with.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel): I am sure the farming community of Canada will be greatly disappointed in the remarks of my hon. friend the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), as will the farmers in the district represented by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) in that hon. gentleman's remarks. It is indeed unfortunate, when the Minister of Agriculture presents a non-partisan Bill to this House appropriating $10,000,000 out of the federal treasury for the purpose of extending aid to agriculture in every province of Canada, that hon. gentlemen in opposition, who are always posing as representatives of the farming community in this House indulge in such adverse criticism of it. My hon. friend from Red Deer is constantly reading lessons to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, pointing out their alleged inconsistencies, what they did when they sat to your left, Mr. Speaker, and what they are doing now when supporting the Government at your right. I would suggest to my hon. friend that a lesson applied to himself occasionally would be very beneficial to him. My hon. friend should, I think, learn the lesson that when the minister introduces a Bill of this kind for the purpose of assisting the farmers, he should not commence to discuss it by condemning the electors of Canada for what they did on the 21st of September, 1911. My hon. friend has not spoken in this House upon any question, I think, without dragging in the reciprocity question, which was settled by the farmers and the people of Canada in the general elections of 1911. I was coming to the conclusion rather reluctantly that my hon. friend was more a partisan than a farmer. Surely that would be an unfortunate, if not an unfair conclusion to arrive at with regard to a gentleman who poses as a free trader, and as not much of a partisan. My hon. friend, of course, commenced to talk about reciprocity. He pointed out what the electors did in 1911. Why could not my hon. friend be fair to the Government of the day and to the Minister of Agriculture and say that this legislation is a move in the right direction? There has been a universal desire from the farmers in every province that owing to the very large increase in the revenues of the country, a considerable portion of which is contributed by the farming community, they in return should receive a fair share from the federal treasury for the purpose of furthering the agricultural interests of the country. That was the view in every part of Canada. It is true that the party now in power, when on the other side, condemned the then Administration for not giving largely out of the treasury to the furtherance of the interests to which I have referred. The Conservative party in those days laid down a policy, and a pledge was given by the right hon. the Prime Minister that when they came into power they would give a larger contribution out of the federal treasury in aid of agriculture. Now, when my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture introduces a Bill for that purpose, my hon. friend from Red Deer indulges in a criticism about reciprocity. It does not seem as if my hon. friend was very much interested in the farmers. Whatever opinions he may have held in regard to the interests of the farmers when he entered the House, have been lost in the persistent and unflinching support he gives to his party on every question, regardless of the farmer or anybody else.

I do not wish to enter into a detailed criticism of the Bill. All I have to say is that I too have the honour of representing a considerable number of farmers. This Bill was introduced some months ago, and we have the word of the Minister of Agriculture that not a protest has been received from any local government in Canada, Liberal or Conservative, and that not a protest has been received from any Minister of Agriculture representing any provincial government that is Liberal in this country. But he has given to us the case of a Liberal Prime Minister who wrote to him congratulating him upon the Bill, and upon giving something more out of the federal treasury to further the farmers' interests in this country. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has also stated that he has not received any protest from any Premier of Canada from one end of it to the other, and that his desk and his office are filled with letters from every part of Canada approving of his course and commending him for the Bill he has introduced, which does not contain one particle of partisanship.

Mr. MARTIN (St. Mary's, Montreal): That does not mean that the Bill is perfect.

Mr. BLAIN: I did not say that. If my hon. friend has any suggestion to make, the minister would be willing, I am sure, to receive it. My hon. friend has had several months during which to offer some suggestion, and I venture to say he has not supplied one. I doubt whether my hon. friend would venture a suggestion to improve the Bill now.

Mr. MARTIN: Time will tell.

Mr. BLAIN: May I ask the hon. member for Red Deer if he has given any suggestion to the minister to improve the Bill since it was introduced.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): The first reading of the Bill was called at a time of night when it was particularly difficult to speak, and the minister thanked us for allowing him to get the first reading without discussion. We were very glad to assist him. We did not know that it was coming up for second reading to-day until mid-day. We could not ascertain last night what business was to be taken up. I think that is a sufficient reason for being rather diffident about the attention one has given to the Bill.

Mr. BLAIN: That answer may be satisfactory to my hon. friend, but I do not think the farmers will regard it as such.

Mr. CLARK: I will risk it with mine.

Mr. BLAIN: From reports received to-day from his own district he might find himself on dangerous ground. He offers that as a reason why he has not given the minister one suggestion for the improvement of this Bill. The Bill has been in the hands of the hon. member for Red Deer and my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) for several months. They have given it some consideration, and they are ready at a moment's notice to give it some criticism. I should be very much surprised if the farmers of this country agreed with my hon. friends from North Oxford and Red Deer. My hon. friend from North Oxford may suggest that the farmers in his part of the country do not require any education. They understand this question very well. There is a college in the city of Woodstock. Is my hon. friend opposed to the clause in the Bill which says that a certain proportion of the money shall go to the agricultural colleges?

Mr. NESBITT: I did not notice it.

Mr. BLAIN: Is he opposed to giving a portion of the money to the veterinary colleges in each province?

Mr. NESBITT: You said agricultural colleges.

Mr. BLAIN: I meant veterinary colleges.

Mr. NESBITT: There is neither a veterinary college nor an agricultural college in Woodstock.

Mr. BLAIN: What kind of college is it?

Mr. NESBITT: It is a boy's college, and it trains them particularly for the ministry.

Mr. BLAIN: We may conclude that my hon. friend did not pass through that college. However, I did not rise for the purpose of entering into any criticism of this Bill, but only to say that I thought the general impression in the House was that it would receive the approval of hon. gentlemen who pose as farmers, and that for once they would allow other questions to be set aside, and give the Bill a fair and reasonable criticism. Above all, if they think the Bill is not satisfactory, they might make some suggestions to the minister by way of improving it. I venture the statement that not one protest has come directly to the Minister of Agriculture from North Oxford or from Red Deer against the introduction of the Bill, nor any criticism of it.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to say that if there had been any protest from my constituents, they would have sent it to me, and not to my hon. friend.

Mr. BLAIN: Has my hon. friend in his possession any protests against the Bill from the farmers of his county?

Mr. NESBITT: Again I would like to say that I am in the happy position that the farmers of North Oxford think I am quite capable of looking after their interests.

Mr. BLAIN: I would suggest to my hon. friend that he send a few copies of his speech to the farmers of North Oxford and get their opinion about it.

Mr. NESBITT: I will send it to the daily paper, and it will be printed in that paper. which enters every home in North Oxford.

Mr. BLAIN: I am very glad. For myself, let me say that the farmers of my county are well satisfied. They feel that the Government are fulfilling to the letter the pledge they gave to the electors when they were in opposition, that they would give a further proportion of the revenue of Canada for the promotion of the agricultural interests of the country, and that they would leave the expenditure of this money partially in the hands of the provincial governments regardless of politics; my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, of course, having some opportunity of examination and investigation as to how this money shall be expended. I venture to think that when a portion of this money has been expended, there will not be much criticism or condemnation of the Minister of Agriculture for the part he has taken in connection with it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): May I ask my hon. friend if he would not prefer seeing this money distributed in the province of Ontario according to its farming population, disregarding the population of the cities and towns?

Mr. BLAIN: That is a fair question. I am a Canadian who believes in broad principles. I believe in a broader and more liberal policy, and I hold that it is not possible to expend a dollar of federal money in any part of the province of Ontario that will not influence and help the agricultural interests of the province. I am quite willing to give to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture my hearty support in this new venture that he is making, the object of which is to satisfy the agricultural interests and other classes in Canada that they shall have expended for educational purposes a larger proportion of the money that is in the federal treasury. The hon. member for North Oxford said that somewhere in the Bill there was something that was misleading. He asked why the minister did not say that a million dollars would be expended for one year instead of ten millions for the next ten years. If the Government proposed to lay down a new policy, that there should be further and better education in connection with agricultural pursuits, and that it shall be supported out of the federal treasury, then I say that if it is to be of any value to the agricultural interests, that policy should extend over a number of years. Surely that is a fair proposition. It would not serve the purpose nearly so well if the Minister of Agriculture were to say, as the hon. member for North Oxford suggests, that this year there shall be one million expended while no suggestion is made about next year or the years to come. If that were said I think my hon. friend would have a fair ground of criticism from a partisan standpoint. But the hon. Minister of Agriculture has ventured to say that he believes in his policy, that he is satisfied that his policy will commend itself to the people of Canada, and that, in order that there shall be no mistake, in order that no provincial government which co-operates with the federal Government shall be misled, he makes the announcement that we shall give out of the public treasury of the Dominion ten million dollars, of which one million shall be paid each and every year for ten years. Then the people of the country will understand the policy for the Government. Surely that is a proposition which has merit in it, surely that is something to commend this policy to the farming community and every class in Canada. Why the hon. gentleman should say that there is any deception in it I cannot understand, and I am sure that the people of Canada will not understand my hon. friend's criticism in that respect.

I said that I did not propose to enter into a discussion of this matter. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture does not require any defence or help from me. My hon. friend has made a forceful presentation of his policy, and I am sure it has met with general approval. Two hon. gentlemen have ventured to criticise it a little, one condemning it in part and one approving it in part; but I venture to say that no farmer in the constituencies represented by these hon. gentlemen has sent one line protesting either directly or indirectly against this policy; and therefore I say that the minister has a right to congratulate himself that the farmers of these two constituencies are satisfied with this Bill, as the farmers of all Canada are satisfied with it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer) : I should like to give my hon. friend a chance to remove the false impression that, I am sure, he did not wish to convey by his reference to some events of yesterday. I could not mistake the meaning of my hon. friend's words. In the riding that I have the honour to represent there are eleven provincial contituencies, in eight of which Liberals have been returned, in one a Conservative and in two the result is as yet uncertain. I do not see any danger in that.

Mr. BLAIN : I only mentioned that in a passing way, and I did not wish to convey any false impression. But I think that the returns from the province from which my hon. friend comes show that the friends of my hon. friend are rather disappearing and that the Liberal-Conservative policy is in the ascendant.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton) : Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we are all very glad to see that the closure has been removed, and we are more than pleased to hear again from my good friend from Peel (Mr. Blain). I am sorry that he has been under closure himself so long that he cannot get over the idea that it is a proper condition for a parliament to be in.

Mr. BLAIN : I thought we had no closure yet.

Mr. OLIVER : I say that my hon. friend has been under closure for a matter of three months.

Mr. HENDERSON: Not at all.

Mr. OLIVER: We have not heard from him and we have not heard from my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) either, except incidentally. We are delighted to see that the closure has been removed from the Government party and that hon. members now have liberty to express their opinions in regard to important public questions. I was going on to say that my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) has been under closure so long, and he has thought so much over the proposed measure, that he has reached the conclusion that a condition of closure is a proper condition for the Parliament of Canada, and he objects most strenuously to any member opposite daring to criticise for a moment this measure which is now before the House. Why, I ask the hon. gentleman, has the Bill been brought before the House? Why were the resolutions upon which the Bill was based introduced? After those resolutions were passed, the Bill was introduced, it is now at the second reading, it will be moved into committee, after which there will be a third reading. Why all this procedure if there is to be no discussion in the House, and if members of Parliament are to be under the threat of my hon. friend of being discredited in their constituencies because they dare to exercise the functions for which they were elected? My hon. friend seems to have misapprehended the purpose of Parliament.

Mr. BLAIN: I am within the judgment of the House when I say that I do not think I suggested that there should be no discussion of my hon. friend's Bill. Did my hon. friend gather that from my remarks?

Mr. OLIVER: That is what I thought the hon. gentleman was trying to say.

Mr. BLAIN: So far as I am concerned, I would be glad to hear criticism on the Bill from any gentleman on the other side.

Mr. OLIVER: Now that we are free to criticise the Bill without being threatened with the withdrawal of the confidence of our electors because we do so, I suppose I may proceed to offer some moderate suggestions as to the measure before us.

The Minister of Agriculture says it is proper that the Bill should provide for a continuous policy for a term of years, and for that reason instead of provision being made for a vote of three-quarters of a million dollars for the current year, ten million dollars is to be taken and a portion of it expended each year extending over a period of ten years. I point out that the Bill is in effect declaratory and not mandatory, and that the same result would be achieved if the Government provided a sum in the estimates equal to the amount which the Bill provides to be expended during the current year, and accompany that by a declaration from the minister that it was the policy of the Government to continue such vote for a period of ten years. Although this Bill may be passed to-day, Parliament can at any session repeal the law and restrict expenditure as it may see fit. There is nothing more in this Bill than a declaration of policy on the part of the Government which could be obtained by the ordinary procedure of placing a sum in the estimates for this year, accompanied by a declaration as to the policy of the Government for the next ten years. There is provision in the Bill by which at the beginning of each session the minister shall lay on the table of the House a return giving particulars as to what action had been taken under the Bill during the preceding year. That is a perfectly proper provision. But I maintain that when the subject is so important as education in agriculture; when the amount involved is so large, and the object to be achieved has such an important bearing upon the welfare of the people of the country, it is not satisfactory that the only share future parliaments shall have in directing the course of administration under this Bill, will be to criticise the thing that has been done. It would, in my opinion, be to the advantage of agricultural education in the country, if from year to year the minister placed before Parliament his proposals for the coming year, as is done in the case of the ordinary estimates, so that the members of this Parliament, all of whom have deep interest in the work and all of whom have more or less intimate knowledge of the results of that work in their localities, would have opportunities to give the minister and the Government the advantage of their knowledge and suggestion. This, without dispute, would be of great value in working out any scheme of assistance to agricultural education in Canada. The Bill is a new proposition; it is a new idea in the way of advancing agricultural education, and the details of its working will doubtless be altered and improved from year to year. I think that the minister would be well advised if he made such changes in the provisions of the Bill in regard to the appropriations of money as would put the working of the measure under the criticism, if you like, but more especially under the suggestion, of Parliament from year to year as the money was being appropriated for each year.

Mr. BLAIN: The hon. minister has laid down in the Bill provisions whereby he will consult the local legislatures of the different provinces as to the details of expenditure. That is the reason.

Mr. BELAND: The governments.

Mr. BLAIN: The governments.

Mr. OLIVER: I am very glad to have the criticism of my hon. friend, because it enables me to bring out more clearly this point. This is federal money that is being voted. This is the federal Parliament responsible to the people of Canada for the proper expenditure of that money. The members of this Parliament have a responsibility to their constituents that they are not relieved from in any degree because an arrangement satisfactory to the several provincial legislatures is made by the Minister of Agriculture. It is perfectly right and proper that the minister should, if he sees fit or as the Bill provides, discuss these matters with the legislatures, but our responsibility is to the people who elect us. If the method of expenditure can be improved in any way, it is our business to know it and it is our right, properly speaking, as well as our responsibility, to take the opportunity of saying so on the floor of this House. I lay some stress on this because I gather from the remarks of my hon. friend a suggestion that, if the people of the different constituencies had not complained in regard to the provisions of the Bill, that meant that they were perfectly satisfied with its provisions. The people of Canada have no knowledge of the details of this Bill. They have sent us here to represent them and to act in their interest. It is for us to have knowledge of the provisions of the Bill, to make up our minds as to whether those provisions will meet the case of our several constituencies and to declare our minds here in regard to those provisions. The responsibility rests upon us. It is for us to discharge that responsibility; and neither the individual elector in the constituency nor the local legislature of the province relieves us in any degree from the responsibility that rests upon us as members elected to this House, who are by the terms of this Bill making an appropriation of a very considerable amount of money for a very laudable purpose, and for the proper carrying out of which purpose we are the people who are directly and primarily responsible. Therefore I would say to the hon. minister that when the Bill comes into committee I shall go into further details in regard to such amendments as I would like to see made to the money provisions so as to bring its operation directly under the criticism and the suggestions of the members of this House from year to year; so that the minister, in mapping out his project, in carrying out this adminstration, would have the advantage of this criticism and these suggestions in working out a scheme that I am sure he is ambitious to have achieve a very considerable success. We are all just as anxious as he is to have the object of the Bill succeed to the benefit of the country.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, the principle of the Bill meets with my very cordial approval. I believe in agricultural education. In our own province, we have an agricultural college which is doing splendid work, and any assistance that it can get from this source will be acceptable indeed. The Minister of Agriculture, however, in addressing the House on this important matter, told us that this Bill was being introduced in fulfilment of a pledge given by the Prime Minister prior to the last federal election. I make this criticism, that it can scarcely be called a fulfilment of that pledge. I have here the platform issued by the Prime Minister prior to the last federal election, in which I find the following. He mentions a number of reforms that he proposes to introduce and then in section 10 he says:

> The granting of liberal assistance to the provinces for the purpose of supplementing and extending the work of agricultural education and for the improvement of agriculture.

The point I wish to make is that this can hardly be called liberal assistance. The amount is altogether too small to be of any great advantage in building up agricultural education in this country. If you look at the Bill, you will find that during the present year the minister expects to spend about $700,000. I have not the census at hand, but I believe that about four millions of the people of this country depend upon agriculture for their livelihood. If you divide up this comparatively small amount of $700,000 among the four million people who are engaged in agricultural pursuits in Canada, you will give them about eighteen cents apiece, or about the price of a couple of cheap cigars. You could not educate a boy very much on that. It seems to me that the amount is altogether too small.

Mr. BLAIN: How does it compare with the grants made during the last fifteen years by the Government which my hon. friend supported?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I quite admit that the former Government did not undertake to assist agricultural education in this way. This is a new venture in the government of the country. I am not complaining about it. It is a proper venture to make; but, after it was put down as an important plank in the platform of the party at the recent election, and after it was paraded in the House as a great reform, it is altogether too small, in my judgment, to be of any great assistance in this very important matter. I have pointed out that we have about four million people engaged in agricultural pursuits. We have a revenue of about $165,000,000 a year drawn very largely from the agriculturalists of this country. They are the people who pay the taxes. Now, can it be said that that comparatively small amount, is liberal assistance to give to this great country? Why, if you consult the estimates you will find the Minister of Militia will spend at least $10,000,000 a year—he will spend ten times as much in one year as the Minister of Agriculture intends to devote to agricultural education in the country. I am quite in accord with the Bill and think it has been worked out properly, in many respects. The money is being divided among the provinces, and that is the right system. The money goes to the provinces in proportion to population, and I agree with that also. I have no criticism of the measure itself, but as the Minister of Agriculture if to be considered as doing anything important, anything worth while, for agricultural education, he has got to do something a good deal more than he has submitted to the House in this Bill.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): I congratulate the minister on the new line of policy he has adopted. I believe it is a step in the right direction. But, like other gentlemen who have spoken on the matter, I am afraid the Bill has its faults. I am afraid also that it may to some extent be deceptive. I do not mean that the minister put in this $10,000,000 to be expended in ten years for the purpose of getting good big headlines in the party newspapers, but I must confess that the party newspapers made use of the headlines after the minister introduced the measure. It may be said that this is fair party warfare, and so I do not find fault with the minister on that point. I do think, however, that this money should be voted year by year as was said by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). Parliament could repeal the Bill at any time. This is nothing more than a declaration of principle. If it is necessary to spend, say, three-quarters of a million during the first, the second and the third years, let us say, you will find that an average of a million and a quarter a year during the last seven years will not be enough. In a new country like Canada where everything is growing, you cannot legislate ahead for ten years. And I am afraid that if the Minister of Agriculture is under the impression that $1,000,000 a year for ten years will be sufficient to carry out this scheme, he will be awfully disappointed. I have no idea, of course, that the hon. gentleman will preside over the department for ten years, but whoever is in his place will find that these institutions will come back in ten years—yes, in five years—and demand more money, and more will have to be granted. Also, there will be amendments made to the Act from time to time. For these reasons, I think that the minister would be right in abandoning the headline policy and in coming down to business, declaring his principles—and I think that every member will agree that it is advisable that we should enter into a permanent policy to assist agricultural education and agricultural educational institutions—and leave the matter open so that Parliament shall vote the money from year to year. Of course, Parliament can do as it likes any way and as I have said, as years go by, the subsidies will have to be increased. I have a concrete case in my own constituency. I understand that my constituency—in fact, my own town—is to be one of the beneficiaries under this Act. Some years ago a good-minded citizen left about half a million to the town to be expended by trustees in certain institutions, one of them a technical school to be created. That school was never created, and so a fund of probably $100,000 or $150,000 is available. I understand that an arrangement has been made with the minister under which the trustees of the estate are to provide the buildings and the college is to be established. But the difficulty is that because of political exigencies in the province of New Brunswick one college is not sufficient, and I am informed that a second is to be established in a different part of the province. Now, the province of New Brunswick is small from an agricultural standpoint. It was not very large, I regret to say, from the standpoint of population—we have only about 350,000 people, and I am sorry to say that our population is not increasing as rapidly as it ought to do. Well, two agricultural colleges are to be established. We are to get one in our town because we happen to have the funds to construct the buildings, and we shall have splendid buildings. The college will not be of very large size, but I am satisfied that it will be as well equipped as any institution of its size in Canada. Under the scheme as proposed in the Bill, as I figure it, we shall get in the province of New Brunswick somewhere in the region of $50,000 to $60,000 a year. Some portion of it must be utilized in other ways, and probably not more than $20,000 a year will go to each of these colleges. Now you cannot run any kind of an agricultural college on $20,000 a year, and I may tell the minister that the province of New Brunswick is not able financially to devote any large amount of money above what she gets from this subsidy toward the maintenance of agricultural colleges. I am not finding fault with the minister. I realize that he has been importuned by his political friends, and I am sorry to say that he has yielded, and instead of having one good college of this kind, he is going to have two, which in my judgment will be very ordinary, especially if he does not increase the amount. I have some doubt whether he would not get better results if he devoted the money to the establishment of well-equipped model farms. However, if the minister feels that he will get the best results from the colleges, I will not say him nay. But I do think that he ought to have a model farm in connection with each and every college. But here again political exigencies come in. The model farm in the province of New Brunswick will be about sixty-eight miles away from one college and a hundred miles from the other. If this kind of thing goes on all over Canada, we shall not get much from the inauguration of this policy unless the amount is increased. That brings me back to the original proposition, that this amount should be voted year by year and it should be left open that Parliament can increase the grant if it is necessary—and it will be necessary; the minister may rely upon that. No doubt, already, demands have been made upon him for more than $1,000,000 a year will provide; and I think he would do well to consider, before this vote goes through, the advisability of changing this feature of the Bill and have the money voted year by year, and then we can vote whatever may be deemed necessary.

Mr. F. R. LALOR (Haldimand): I congratulate the minister on being able to present such a Bill to this House in the interests of the agricultural class that cannot very well be criticized by hon. gentlemen opposite, although they are always in such a critical mood. We have criticisms from the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), who represents a great agricultural county, one of the greatest, I suppose, in the province of Ontario. I came into the House a little late, and heard only a portion of the hon. gentleman's speech, but from what I did hear it was very difficult for me to tell whether the hon. gentleman was supporting the Bill or opposing it, because in one portion of his speech he made a statement which in another portion he absolutely contradicted. He apparently objected to the Government's retaining any control over this sum of money which is being devoted to the interests of agriculture; and, later on in the same speech, he said, if I understood him correctly, that it was not wise to hand the money over to the provincial authorities, because the Government of the province of Ontario allowed its agricultural propaganda to be influenced by political considerations.

Mr. NESBITT: I am sure my hon. friend does not desire to misrepresent me. What I did say was that I did object to the Government's pretending to hand over the money to the province and at the same time keeping a string on it.

Mr. LALOR: Surely the hon. gentleman would not advocate that this Parliament should lose control of moneys granted under such legislation? The hon. gentleman told us that farm inspectors in the province of Ontario were political appointees. Although we have no farm inspector in Haldimand, I may say that in the county of Norfolk, lying directly between the hon. gentleman's constituency and mine, there is an agricultural instructor who is the son of one of the most prominent Liberals in the county of Haldimand. I do not believe that the provincial Government in the province of Ontario have the slightest desire to appoint men who are of the same political faith as themselves.

Mr. NESBITT: I did not say that.

Mr. LALOR: That is my interpretation of the hon. gentleman's remarks. I believe this Bill will give universal satisfaction to the farmers of this country; I believe it is a move in the right direction. I do not think any of us are too old to learn; I am sure that the farmers of Canada are not under the impression that they know all there is to know about agriculture, and I am confident they would be only too glad to receive instructions from competent men along such lines as would tend to help them get better results from their work. I am rather surprised that the hon. member for North Oxford should not, without hesitation, support this measure, instead of adversely criticising it.

This measure has also come in for a good deal of criticism from the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). My hon. friend occupies a good deal of the time of this House. If hon. gentlemen will look at 'Hansard' they will find that many of its pages are covered with speeches made by that hon. gentleman during this and preceding sessions; and the chief subject which the hon. gentleman invariably brings forward in every discussion in which he takes part is the nightmare of reciprocity. I thought that reciprocity was dead, and I do not see how even the hon. member for Red Deer can resurrect it and bring the corpse back to life. If we look at the returns of the provincial election in the province of Alberta from the district of Red Deer, which my hon. friend represents, we shall find that even in that great province, where we did imagine, from the remarks of the hon. gentleman in this House, that the people are all free traders and in favour of reciprocity; it looks as if the Conservative party were still alive, in view of the very small majority by which my hon. friend's friends were elected in the provincial legislature of that province. I think that hon. gentlemen from that province should be very careful as to their attitude in this House in regard to public matters now and the next general election. The hon. gentleman often refers to me as a manufacturer, and I may tell him that I would rather be called a manufacturer and have a record to point to as having done something for the constituency which I represent, and the Dominion as well, than be a theorist, as is the hon. member for Red Deer, who talks incessantly in this House about the beauties and advantages of free trade, without producing or suggesting any practical results. Free trade is not practicable in this country, as we all know, and the hon. gentleman, with his great ability, which we all recognize, is losing a golden opportunity when he endeavours to persuade the people of Canada that their best interests lie in the direction of reciprocity and free trade. I represent in this House a large agricultural community, a border county,—and I am free to say that, although reciprocity was popular in the county in the earlier stages of the last general election campaign, after listening to the arguments, the people quickly realized the true facts, and that hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to open up the markets of the farmers of this country to the competition not only of the United States but of twelve or thirteen other countries as well.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to remind the hon. member that it is the second reading of the Bill that is now before the House.

Mr. LALOR: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but, as the hon. member for Red Deer discussed the question of reciprocity during the course of his speech, I thought I would be justified in making some reply. Since the present Government have attained power they have, by legislation, done more for the agricultural interests of this country and the farmers of Canada than hon. gentlemen opposite ever attempted to do during the fifteen years in which they were in power. I defy one of them to point to any important measure that they ever brought forward and passed in this House which was in the interest of the agricultural classes of Canada. The farmers are the backbone of the country; they are the people who produce its wealth, and they are deserving of any legislation which may be in their interests. The Minister of Agriculture of the present Government is a practical farmer; he knows their needs and requirements; he can judge what legislation is likely to be in their best interests; and, in introducing this Bill, he is bringing forward a measure which will be a direct benefit to the farming interests of this country. The hon. member for Edmonton says he opposes the measure because it is a permanent policy; he does not want the Government to lay down a permanent policy in this regard. Surely that is not a sincere criticism of the measure.

Mr. OLIVER: I must beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I did not say I was opposing the Bill.

Mr. LALOR: I understood the hon. gentleman to criticise it because it was a permanent policy. Surely it is in the best interests of this country that the policy laid down should be a permanent policy.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not object to it because it was a permanent policy; I admitted that it was quite proper that there should be a permanent policy; but I said that the permanency should be embodied in the form of a Bill.

Mr. LALOR: If the hon. gentleman will make three or four additional speeches on this question, perhaps we shall better understand what he did mean.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no possibility of my hon. friend's understanding it.

Mr. LALOR: I venture to say the hon. gentleman understood a good many things last night that he had not understood before; he is not too old to learn. He criticised the measure because, if I understood him correctly, this is not a policy which will require to be brought down each year, year after year; and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) objected to it on the same ground.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not object to it on that ground at all.

Mr. LALOR: That is as I understood the hon. gentlemen. I listened very attentively to what they said. I believe that the Minister of Agriculture has adopted the proper policy in spreading the grants over a number of years, so that the farmers of the country, and the Government as well, will know what amount is to be expended year after year for a term of years. I believe that better results will be obtained in that way, and if at any time in the future it is necessary to make any amendments in the Act, we shall be able to do so even although the grants are spread over a number of years. This Government has already done more for the farmers of the country than our opponents did during the whole time they were in power. Last year we had the Highways Bill, and I hope it will be introduced again this year. That Bill was opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, if I remember correctly, and the Senate, I suppose at the dictation of the leader of the Opposition in this House, killed the measure. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially those who come from the province of Ontario, will have to answer to the farmers when they try to explain why that Highways Bill was opposed by them in this House and killed by the Senate. I represent a county which is expending something in the neighbourhood of $300,000 upon highways, and if the Bill of last session had passed the farmers of the county of Haldimand would have been relieved to the extent of one-third of their taxes for the highways, and the same no doubt can be said of every other county throughout the province of Ontario.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is an optimist.

Mr. LALOR: When hon. gentlemen opposite try to explain their position, the farmers will ask them why it was they refused to relieve them of taxation, and why they declined to permit this Government to give the aid which they were so anxious to give.

Mr. CARVELL: If the passage of the Highways Bill would have relieved the county of Haldimand to the extent of $100,000, how much would the relief have amounted to in the province of Ontario?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to point out that the Highways Bill is not before the House.

Mr. LALOR: As I understood the Bill, it provided for more than $100,000.

Mr. CARVELL: But you said it would have relieved the farmers of the county of Haldimand of one-third of the taxation; that would be $100,000.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should direct his attention to the Bill before the House.

Mr. LALOR: I will try to confine my remarks to that. While I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, this very subject which I am discussing was discussed by hon. gentlemen on the other side during this debate. I am very glad to support this Bill of the Minister of Agriculture because I think it is in the interest of agriculture. I believe it will strengthen the Government in the country, and that, as has been the case with other measures that have been passed in the interest of agriculture, it will increase their popularity with the farmers. I can easily understand hon. gentlemen opposite being uneasy about measures of this kind, which are in favour of the agricultural classes, because they know that if they pass, the popularity of the Government will increase during the next few years as it has increased during the past two years, and that when the next election comes many of them will find themselves outside with those who were left there at the last election.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I do not intend to follow my hon. friend in the remarks which he has addressed to the House except as to a question of fact which I would like to correct at once. Although the question is not germane to the subject, as you have decided, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has said that the Highways Bill——

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman should direct his attention to the question before the House. What is denied to one member cannot be granted to another.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I bow cheerfully to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I approve of the legislation that is now occupying the attention of the House. I was glad to see the introduction of the Bill this year, and I listened with great pleasure to the eloquent remarks which were made by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. I take this opportunity of thanking him for what he did last year in implementing a promise his predessor had made to the county which I have the honour to represent, where the finest apples blossom and the best tobacco grows; the county of Rouville. It is essentially a farming community which I represent, and I hope that we shall some day have a visit from the hon. gentleman. When I asked him last year to implement a promise made by the late Administration to assist in the establishment of a co-operative association for the tobacco growers in the county of Rouville, he very cheerfully asquiesced, and the farmers in my county are very grateful to him for it. The legislation now before the House is non-political, and I dare say it will receive the support of members on both sides. Of course, as has been stated, it can be amended in some respects; but I am speaking of the general features of the measure, which is to aid the chief industry of the country. Like other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, I shall take the local point of view, because of course we each represent a constituency, and this is a matter which concerns every locality. Some time ago I put a question on the Order Paper which had been suggested to me by the Council of Agriculture of the province of Quebec. If you will allow me, I would like to place it on 'Hansard' once more, because I believe it represents the views of the Government of Quebec, and especially of the Department of Agriculture in that province, and I would like to have from the hon. minister an expression of opinion as to the possibility of carrying out the suggestions which are embodied in that resolution. The question reads as follows:

1. Has the Minister of Argiculture received the following resolution, adopted on March 19, 1913, of the Council of Agriculture of the province of Quebec.

'Extract of the official report of a sitting of the Council of Agriculture of the province of Quebec, held at the Legislative Buildings, Room No. 4, in the city of Quebec, at 10 a.m., Wednesday, the nineteenth day of March, 1913.

Proposed by Mr. J. B. Carbonneau, seconded by Mr. A. J. Dawes and the Hon. N. Garneau, and resolved: That, whereas the Council highly approves of the employment which has been made by the provincial Government of the federal subsidy voted for the year 1912-13, in the interest of agriculture;

And whereas the method of employment has given entire satisfaction to the agriculture class and contributed to the improvement of agriculture and the development of several important agricultural industries;

And whereas the subsidies granted out of this subsidy for drainage, fruit arboriculture, the dairy industry, the culture of birds, the growth of pulse, the breeding of cattle, the production of smoked meats, the culture and preparation of tobacco, the manufacture of preserves, and schools of agriculture, have given the best results, and will give still better ones if these grants are continued for several years;

And whereas the method of employment adopted this year in accordance with the contract entered into between the two governments, lends itself with advantage to the different needs of the provinces more than if the subsidy is destined to one sole object, determined by the federal legislature;

The Council prays the federal Government to pass a law to permit the division of the $10,000,000, which it is proposed to grant to the provinces in the interests of agriculture. so as to continue the agriculture policy adopted at the last federal session.

The secretary of the Council is asked to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Hon. Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture of the federal Government at Ottawa.

(Signed) Oscar Lessard,
Secretary of the Council of Agriculture.

I ask the following question:

What decision and action does the Government intend to take in this matter?

I think the hon. Minister of Agriculture answered that the question was under consideration. I would like the hon. gentleman, at some time during the committee stage, to tell us if the wishes of the provincial government of Quebec shall be carried out. I notice that the minister has very wide powers under clause 5. By clause 4, it is enacted that $20,000 shall be paid to assist in the work of veterinary colleges established in the provinces, that an annual sum of $20,000 shall be paid to the government of each province and that the remainder shall be paid to the governments of the provinces in proportion to population. Then by clause 5, it is enacted that:

The payments hereinbefore authorized shall, as to each province, be conditional upon agreement between the minister and the Government of the province as to the terms, conditions and purposes, within the meaning of this Act, upon and for which the payments are to be made and applied, and such agreement shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

I hope that my hon. friend, in any such agreement, will consult the desires and wishes of the local legislature and the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec. It is stated in the resolution I have just read to the House what are the wishes and desires of the Council of Agriculture of Quebec, I hope my hon. friend will see that the moneys are spent in conformity with such desires and wishes. Once more, as representing an agricultural constituency, one of the oldest, the richest and most advanced in the province of Quebec, let me say that I heartily support this measure, subject, however, to some amendments that will be moved when the Bill is committed by the House. I believe it is a progressive measure and one calculated to help that large class of our fellow Canadians who are engaged in the agricultural industry.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I beg your pardon, for occupying a few moments of the time of the House, but I represent a constituency which, I suppose, is as strictly agricultural as any constituency in the Dominion of Canada. I want to express my hearty approval of the Bill which has been placed before the House. A great deal has been done in the province of Ontario, especially in the last few years, in advancing the interests of agriculture by way of giving practical instruction to farmers on their own farms. I have to give my personal thanks, and to convey to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) the thanks of the people of Frontenac, for having acceded to my request to grant to that county a man to conduct cow-testing work. This is very important work and in my constituency, the gentleman who has been appointed has a regular route assigned to him. He goes to the farmers, regardless of their politics, and gives instruction to as many as one man is able to give instruction to. It is very pleasing to be able to state that, out of the great number of farmers who may be regarded as his pupils in that particular, only two discontinued the work of cow-testing in which they engaged at the beginning of last season. I have had a number of requests from other parts of the county, not covered by this man, asking for the appointment of a man to take up similar work. It is an indication that the farmers are desirous of getting instruction and of acting upon the instruction that is given. A great deal of benefit has accrued to the province of Ontario from the appointment of district farmers' representatives. We have one of these men in my county and great good has come from the work which he has done during the few months he has been there. He is available at all times for consultation on farm problems. For instance, he goes to a man who wants to drain his land. He will plan the draining of the farm without any expense to the farmer, providing a plan and giving an estimate of the cost. He also gives instruction in the proper spraying of trees and the spraying of certain weeds which can be killed by that method. He has, in the few months during which he has been at work in my county, drawn the attention of the people generally to himself and his services are in very great demand. I do not suppose that the people of my county differ very materially from those of other parts of the country and this is another indication that agriculturists generally are willing and anxious to get practical instruction and to avail themselves of it.

I cannot see the point of the objections which some hon. gentlemen have raised to the Bill on the ground that we are making a grant of ten million dollars and spreading that grant over a period of ten years. To my mind that is a very excellent feature of the Bill because it gives to the system a certain amount of permanency. At the end of ten years there will probably be another grant for a further period of ten years and it means that, even if the Government is turned out, which I do not think will happen, whatever Administration is in office will go on with this very important work. By spreading it over a period of ten years the Government, no matter what Government is in power, whether this or a new Government, it will take charge of the work and continue it. Surely no objection can be taken to that. It will be remembered that in the city of Ottawa the late Government made a grant of one million dollars for the purpose of beautifying the city, which grant was spread over a period of ten years, one-tenth being given for this purpose each year. I think that was a much wiser course than to make a grant for each individual year and to depend upon Parliament to continue the grant or not as they saw fit. The idea of spreading the grant over a period of years, instead of being a weakness, is a decided advantage. I am also heartily in accord with the principle laid down in section 8 of the Bill which provides that the minister shall annually lay before Parliament, during the first ten days of the session, a report of the proceedings under the Act. The very fact of laying such a report before Parliament in the early stages of the session means that the minister is desirous of hearing as he no doubt would in the discussion of these reports annually, from the various parts of the Dominion, an expression of opinion as to its working and any suggestion in regard to it that may be made. That is a commendable feature of it which should receive the approval of every member in this House. There are the strongest reasons why aid should be given to agriculture in Canada. Our agriculturists find competitors in most of the countries of the world, and in these days distance from the common market is not measured by miles but by the length of time consumed in transportation. Transportation facilities are better and cheaper now than they were years ago, and Canadian farmers have to meet the competition of the farmers of the Argentine, the United States, Australia, New Zealand, Austria, Russia. It is, therefore, proper that the Government of Canada should take into consideration certain advantages which the agriculturists in these other countries have over our people. In the Argentine the farmers have not to contend with a rigorous winter and they have not to go to the large capital expenditure Canadian farmers have to incur, in providing barns to shelter their cattle. In the same way, the farmers of New Zealand and Australia in the production of certain commodities have decided advantages over the farmers of Canada, and this I mention only by way of illustration. If our farmers are to compete successfully with those of other countries, they must be taught up-to-date methods, but up to the present our expenditure on agriculture has been far behind that of many other countries. Let me remind hon. gentlemen that France and Austria each spend annually $9,200,000 in advancing and promoting the interests of agriculture; Hungary spends $9,400,000; the United States, $10,000,000; Japan, $3,700,000; and Russia, $25,000,000, all of which illustrates that the governments of these countries are alive to the situation in spending these large sums to make their farmers proficient in their industry.

Mr. BELAND: Do these amounts expended by the different countries apply to agricultural instruction alone, or is the expenditure in connection with carrying on a government department of agriculture in each country?

Mr. EDWARDS: As I understand it, these sums are spent by each country on instruction and grants to agricultural colleges and so on, in connection with which I may mention that in France they have experimental farms and branch stations to the number of seventy-one; in Germany eighty; in Austria sixty-one; in the United States sixty; in Russia one hundred and two; in Sweden twenty-six; in Norway twelve; in Italy twenty-two; in Belgium fifteen; in Japan fifteen; and in Canada only six. These figures again indicate the widespread instruction along agricultural lines which is given in these various countries and the deep interest taken by the various governments in the subject. When we compare the expenditure on agriculture in Canada with the expenditure in these other countries, Canada has nothing to be proud of. For the last ten years the expenditure for agricultural purposes in this Dominion has been less than $700,000 per annum, which, when compared with the sums expended by the other countries I have mentioned shows that we have not been alive to our own interests. Perhaps that is not to be wondered at because we have been opening up virgin soil in the West, and our attention has been withdrawn from extensive farming. However, it all goes to show that there is ample room for good work along the lines of agricultural instruction especially in the older provinces. The census returns show that the agricultural population of Canada, with the exception of course of the newer provinces in the West, is less to-day than it was ten years ago, which is a sad commentary on the conditions which have prevailed during the past decade. True, a number of our farmers from Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritime provinces, have gone to swell the agricultural population of the West, but for my part I believe that if the conditions in the older provinces were properly utilized we would have in the East a better country agriculturally speaking than they have in the West. I am forced to the belief that in the past our statesmen have failed to realize the situation. The Hon. Mr. Fisher, former Minister of Agriculture, referring to the matter of agricultural production said that if the farmers would use one-tenth of the knowledge they possess and carry one-hundredth part of it into their every-day operations, the result would be tens of millions of dollars more of agriculutral produce. Mr. Fisher thought it was the slip-shod methods of Canadian farmers which limited our agricultural production, but Mr. Fisher was sadly mistaken. My observation of the farming community of Canada leads me to the belief that they are industrious and energetic, and represent as intelligent people as are to be found in this or any other country. I believe that our Canadian farmers are anxious to avail themselves of all the knowledge at their command, and I repeat that Mr. Fisher was mistaken in his appreciation of them when he suggested they were slip-shod in their methods, and lacked industry and interest in their work. They have certain disadvantages. One of the great disadvantages confronting the eastern farmer to-day is the lack of labour. That is one of his great drawbacks. It is rather hard for men, who have been born and brought up and have lived all their lives in towns, to understand and appreciate the difficulty of the farmer along this line. I believe that, when the hydro-electric power is made available to the farmers of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces, as I have no doubt it will be in the comparatively near future, it will to a large extent make up for the scarcity of labour, and will enable the farmers to carry on their operations with greater advantage and greater comfort to themselves.

I do not desire to take up any more time in discussing this matter, but I would feel that I had not done my duty by my constituents if I had not expressed what I believe to be their opinion in regard to this Bill, that is, that they are heartily in accord with it; and if I had not conveyed to the Minister of Agriculture from them their congratulations on the introduction of this Bill. I am glad, Sir, that it has been received by hon. members on the other side of the House in the spirit in which it has been received, speaking generally. There has been a little criticism, a few expressions of doubt as to the purpose of the Bill, and so on. I do not think it is difficult to understand that. I think down in their hearts hon. gentlemen opposite see that this is a good measure and necessarily a popular measure; and therefore, from a purely political standpoint, that might make it a little less popular with hon. gentlemen opposite. The Bill, however, has been well received by hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe that hon. gentlemen in this House, whether they sit to your right or to your left, Mr. Speaker, are anxious to do all that they can to advance the interests of agriculture For myself, I believe this is a very important step in that direction, and I shall be glad to give the Bill my support and endorsation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Any measure which proposes the expenditure of public money for the purpose of aiding agriculture must necessarily receive the cordial support of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I could hardly imagine any hon. gentleman sitting in this Chamber, representing any section of the people of this country, who would not most gladly accord to any Government any support which he possibly could give in working out any agricultural policy which would aid the development of that very important industry of this country. Whatever differences of opinion may arise will relate altogether to the manner and means of expenditure.

So far as the determination of the Government to appropriate a certain amount of money per year for the next ten years is concerned, it has my support in a sense as it has, I know, the support of all hon. gentlemen. It is possibly regrettable that the amount is not even larger. If the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) is correct, as to the amount that has been expended annually during the past few years in Canada upon the great industry of agriculture, and when one considers the buoyant revenues which we have in this country, the very large surpluses which we have had for a number of years, and when one considers the purposes for which very large sums have been appropriated from year to year, one might very well express regret that the amount provided for in this Bill to be devoted to agricultural education is not even larger than it is.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, have unnecessarily provoked from hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House some observations upon the Bill in their efforts to ascribe to the Government and to the Minister of Agriculture some particular and special glory in presenting this Bill to the House. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) very strongly commended the policy of the Government as set forth in the Bill. There is no policy in the Bill. There is not a line of policy, nor a word of policy, and no hon. gentleman can read this Bill and tell this House that it discloses any policy whatever. It simply discloses a determination on the part of the Government to appropriate annually for a period of ten years a certain sum of money to the several provincial governments for agricultural purposes. It does not require a great deal of reflection or consideration for a government or for an individual to reach a conclusion of that kind, when financially the revenues of the country are in such a buoyant condition. The Bill indicates clearly that the Government have given absolutely no consideration to the question of policy whatever. They have simply concluded that, inasmuch as the finances of the country are in such an excellent condition, they may very well ask Parliament to vote for a period of ten years the sum of $10,000,000, and subsequently conclude how that money shall be spent. The only clause in the Bill that might possibly contain the policy of the Government is section 5, which reads as follows:

> The payments hereinbefore authorized shall, as to each province, be conditional upon agreement between the minister and the Government of the province as to the terms, conditions and purposes, within the meaning of this Act, upon and for which the payments are to be made and applied, and such agreement shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. MARCIL: Supposing the provinces do not accept the terms laid down by the minister?

Mr. MACLEAN: Then of course they could not get the money. I am not objecting to the desire of the Government to associate their work with that of the agricultural work carried on by the provinces. It would be unfortunate if they were working along different lines. So far as that is concerned, I am inclined to agree with the purposes of this Bill. What I want to point out is that the Minister of Agriculture is asking Parliament for a vote of $10,000,000 to cover a period of ten years without having considered for what purposes that money shall be expended. That is hardly in accordance with parliamentary practice in this country respecting the expenditure of public money for any purpose. In a word, my objection, if it would be any, to this Bill is that it would be preferable for the Minister of Agricultural to ask for an annual vote from Parliament rather than for the passage of a Bill which includes a vote covering a period of ten years. That policy would have this advantage, that, on the Minister of Agriculture approaching Parliament each session for a renewal of the vote he would be in a position to indicate to Parliament how the money given him in the preceding year had been expended. I concede that it is rather a difficult thing for the Government to determine, what is the best method in which to expend, for agricultural purposes any considerable sum of money as indicated in this Bill. On that subject a variety of opinion prevails in this country and in all countries of the world. This Bill is largely in imitation of legislation along the same lines in the Congress of the United States. Some 58 Bills were introduced in the American Congress last year practically along the same lines, and each promoter urged that his Bill was the best.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, any expenditure of money asked for from Parliament by the Government for agricultural purposes will receive the cordial endorsation of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I do not for one desire to sit in my seat and hear hon. gentlemen opposite say that this Bill discloses an agricultural policy, because it does not and does not pretend to disclose any policy. It simply proposes to ask Parliament for a vote of money. It further proposes that the manner in which this money is to be expended is to be determined hereafter by consultation between the federal Government and the several provincial governments.

Mr. McKAY: Does not section 4 disclose some policy?

Mr. MACLEAN: Section 4 discloses some little matter of policy in reference to the establishment of veterinary colleges. That is the only declaration of policy and that itself can be objected to. I intend to refer to it when we go into committee.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to address the House on the subject of the Bill which is now under its consideration; but there is one peculiarity about this debate, it is the zeal of hon. gentlemen opposite to discover hidden motives to the very mild criticisms offered by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. One might surmise that those hon. gentlemen are anxious that we should oppose that proposed legislation in aid of the agriculture of Canada.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) has taken to task my hon. friends from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and from Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) because they had the hardihood to think that this Bill is not the very acme of perfection, and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor), in his immense desire to find our friends on this side of the House opposing the Bill, went to the point of putting in their mouths words which they had never uttered.

On this side of the House we are quite able to see the difference between an Act which is introduced in the interest of the country and an Act which would open the door to the theft of public moneys and enable a minister to grant lands worth $100,000 to a political supporter for the petty sum of ten dollars.

One would be apt to think that this legislation is so perfect, considered with such care, that it has become the ark of the covenant of the Minister of Agriculture, and that should humble mortals, as we Liberals are, attempt to touch it ever so gently, we should right away be branded as enemies of the farming class in our constituencies and throughout Canada.

That is child's talk and nothing else; I for one am in favour of that proposal to grant $10,000,000 for the promotion of agriculture throughout Canada and the spread of agricultural education in the various provinces.

I agree with the hon. member for Carleton, (N.B.), (Mr. Carvell), that a little too much emphasis has been laid on that figure of $10,000,000, but it is pardonable weakness. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will not be so touchy as his friends from Peel and Haldimand, and that he will take kindly to the fair criticism and to the charitable suggestions offered from this side of the House, as well as to the amendments which possibly will be suggested to him by those who have at heart, as he himself has, the interests of agriculture and of the farming community.

Mr. JOSEPH GIRARD (Chicoutimi and Saguenay): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the measure which is now under the consideration of the House is of such importance, that, in spite of the lateness of the hour, I think it incumbent on me to make a few remarks, considering especially that I represent an exclusively agricultural constituency.

I see with pleasure that both sides of the House seem to be at one as regards this Bill and approve of its principle. All rejoice at finding that the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are increased by a considerable amount, while a most striking feature of the appropriation from the practical point of view, is its permanent character. The agriculture of the Dominion as a whole will thus receive an unprecedented uplift, through the co-operation of the federal authorities with those of the various provinces of Canada.

That is a special enactment which enables this Government to expend the amount therein specified for purposes which will be designated by the Dominion Government and the various local governments. But that should not prevent the Minister of Agriculture from including in his current estimates large amounts for similar purposes should he think fit, placing thereby the Department of Agriculture on a high level, on a par with the other great spending departments at Ottawa. Heretofore, the Department of Agriculture, as may be seen by a comparison of the various estimates voted from year to year, always had the smallest appropriations, especially if account be taken only of such amounts as were voted each year exclusively for agricultural purposes.

The speakers who preceded me have laid before the House the figures which I had in hand, and which I shall not repeat; they go to show what other countries are doing for the promotion of agriculture, both as regards field work and the teaching of the technique of agriculture. They go to show that a large expenditure has been made by those countries towards maintaining within their territory numerous experimental farms. It would appear that Canada, notwithstanding its extent, has, up to date, expended very little for purposes of agricultural education, and owns six experimental farms only. Hence the duty which clearly devolves on the Minister of Agriculture to have inserted in the estimates of his department for the incoming fiscal year, the amounts requisite to ensure the establishment of further experimental farms, which are in demand in many quarters, especially in the province of Quebec and in the county which I have the honour to represent, owing to its peculiar geographical situation, the exceptional composition of its soil and the climatic difficulties which confront our farming community.

It follows that the minister, according to my suggestions, should combine practical training object lessons with the special teaching which is given in the schools and colleges of agriculture specially referred to in the Bill now laid before the House.

Speaking for the province of Quebec, we have two schools of agriculture for young men which are subsidized by the local government, and several domestic science schools for young girls, the first of which was established at Roberval, while the Hon. Louis Beaubien was Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec. These colleges and schools are affiliated to Laval University and are enabled accordingly to grant university degrees in agriculture. However, in spite of that, on looking into official publications, it will be found that unfortunately there are too many strangers occupying important positions in the Department of Agriculture, owing to the fact, apparently, that it is not possible to find competent men among Canadians of the various nationalities. It must be inferred that our agricultural colleges have not heretofore given courses sufficiently complete to enable the young people following them to fill the highest positions and command the highest salaries in the gift of the Government. Now, I say, if the Government is anxious to help agricultural education in the provinces, it is important that the requisite measures should be taken to enable the young people, whether boys or girls, after frequenting such schools, to take up those highest positions to which I have referred.

While the Hon. Mr. Angers was Minister of Agriculture, there appeared a special bulletin under the signature of Professor Robertson, in which it is stated that in Germany and Sweden, there are agricultural colleges for boys and girls, and that, after they are through, the central government selects those who have graduated and sends them at the expense of the state through the country, or even abroad, where they take more extended courses in higher institutions or on model private farms. Thus do they learn about the various methods adopted by the highest institutions and the most successful farmers, they increase their ability and become more capable of occupying important positions or carrying on the struggle for life.

I respectfully submit that the Minister of Agriculture might take up that suggestion, which is not mine, but that of former Minister Angers, who was a prominent man in his time, an idea that he was not able to carry out owing to circumstances which hampered him and made him abandon the idea. But coming as it does from so prominent a man I may be allowed to submit it to the attention of the Government without arousing suspicion as to my motives.

I sincerely believe that the Government might easily enter into some agreement with the various local governments towards establishing the European system which I have just referred to, and supply the required amount towards further equipping, either under the Bill which we are now considering, or through special votes included in the estimates of the department, pupils, whether boys or girls, who graduate from these agcicultural schools.

In the course of the debate, I notice that the Government was being upbraided for having propounded what seemingly is not a permanent policy. Such criticisms do not appear justified to me, as it is certain, in the first place, that for ten years to come a fixed amount is appropriated every year to each province, in proportion to its population, the said amount to be expended for the purposes agreed upon between the various local governments and the Dominion authorities. The Government cannot be expected just now, considering the novelty of the idea, to say exactly in what way those moneys will be applied during that period of ten years, and considering also that the Government agrees, in accordance with the very provisions of the Bill, to make arrangements in this regard with the various local governments. However, when that system has been in existence for a few years, it being known to the public that these grants will be continued during a period of ten years, the various governments which have to do with the expenditure of those amounts will be in a position to come to some permanent arrangement based on the experience acquired in the carrying out of the Act.

But the moneys which we are called upon to appropriate to-day for a period of ten years to come, should, to my mind, considering that they are taken out of the Dominion exchequer, remain under the absolute control of the Dominion Parliament, as represented by the Government, within the lines of the agreement entered into with the provincial governments as regards the policy to be followed in the distribution and paying of the subsidies, and those provinces which refuse to submit being penalized by the privation of the annual grant set aside for their benefit.

Personally I am against the idea that the Dominion Government should delegate its powers in the matter of the division and payment of these moneys. And I am of opinion that as regards the ends towards which these subsidies should be expended, the Dominion Department of Agriculture, considering the superiority of its equipment, both from the practical and scientific point of views, should have precedence over the local departments.

Speaking from my knowledge of things in my own province, I understand that last year the Hon. Minister of Agriculture entered into an agreement with the local government under the Act of 1912, an agreement which bore the mark of the best of good faith on both sides. But I know that there were some regrettable oversights and that, in the working out of the scheme, weak points were discovered and some severe criticism ensued. It is important that, after that year's experience, the hon. minister should find some means of remedying whatever has been found objectionable. Always referring to the province of Quebec, I think I should call the attention of the hon. minister to the desirability of promoting the improvement of dairy cows and beef cattle. Census statistics go to show that the average yield of milch cows in the province of Quebec, as well as in other parts of the Dominion, is not what it should be. It is absolutely necessary that the Dominion Government should give more attention than in the past to that important matter. And one of the means which to my mind would help us most in securing better results, would be the establishment of cow-testing associations such as they have in Denmark. A few such associations have been established in this country, but I do not think they have received sufficient encouragement from the Dominion Government. By that means, Denmark has rescued its farming class from stagnation, and the Canadian Government should under present conditions take up that question more closely than in the past and spend whatever amount is required, as the Danish government has done, so as to wipe out as rapidly as possible that condition of things which is a source of an enormous loss of revenue to the farming community all over the Dominion. Our country's estimates reach a high enough figure to enable us to tender to the farming class all the encouragement it is entitled to from the Dominion Government.

Another question which we should not lose sight of, is that of soil depletion. Public documents go to show that every year Canada receives thousands and thousands of Yankee settlers who come to take up homesteads on the fertile lands of the Canadian west. Why do those Americans, whose wealth and enterprise are so much talked about, leave their native country to settle in Canada? The reason is known; it is because, through bad cultivation, the western country in the United States, in spite of its original fertility, has become depleted of its plant food. Constant demands have been made on the soil, without anything being returned to it. If the American west, through the use of injudicious methods, has been utterly ruined, is not the Canadian west threatened with the same results owing to similar causes? Notwithstanding all the care taken by farmers in the management of their business in eastern Canada, should not governments exert a close supervision, so as to restrict as much as possible the drainage of fertility which is going on and to maintain the fertility of our older lands and if possible to increase it. I respectfully submit that question to the consideration of the Minister of Agriculture; it should be on his part the object of special and practical consideration. Let an amount be expended sufficient to put an end to that evil; let the best qualified men available as lecturers and practitioners be sent out; let them be selected with the greatest care and distributed throughout the country places to educate our farmers and warn them against the danger with which we are undoubtedly threatened. To my mind the organization of agriculture as it exists in France is possibly the most perfect to be found anywhere in the world, and I would suggest to the hon. minister and to the Government to instruct some prominent official, or some special commission appointed for that purpose, to carry on as promptly as possible a thorough inquiry into the various agricultural organizations of Europe and America, with a view to letting Canada have the benefit of whatever they find of a nature to help us on. And the Minister and Government through whose efforts our farmers received such helpful suggestions would become generally popular. Then again, I trust the hon. Minister of Agriculture will allow me to suggest to him the desirability of popularizing and encouraging agricultural co-operative associations of all kinds. Dairying is in a prosperous mood, but our butter and our cheese are still in need of improvement. The hog-breeding and bacon-producing industries in the province of Quebec are practically non-existent. Poultry keeping, barring a few localities, is practically an unknown industry. Other industries of less importance are still in their infancy. I hope the hon. minister will confer with the representatives from my province before launching out a definite policy for the next year and the others to come. Of course useful information and practical suggestions might be obtained outside the representation of the province of Quebec in this House, but I sincerely believe that the Quebec members sitting in this House and who have the honour to represent agricultural constituencies, should be consulted, as they have information of a practical character, gathered on the spot, and which people who live outside the province cannot procure.

In concluding these remarks, I have pleasure, speaking on behalf of my constituents who are for the most part farmers and settlers, in congratulating the Government on the happy thought they have had of introducing this Bill, which, as I said a moment ago, meets, on the whole, with the approval of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I travel a good deal, I hear farmers conversing, and I am glad to say that this legislation is fully appreciated by the farming class of my province, and I am satisfied that the farmers of other provinces as well think highly of it.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton): I understand that the Minister of Agriculture desires to advance this Bill a stage or perhaps put it through to-night, so I do not wish to detain the House for more than a few minutes. But I do wish to express my strong feeling of pleasure at the approbation with which this measure has been received. I do not remember an occasion for a long time when a Bill before this House has had so cordial a reception from both sides of the House, and I think the Minister of Agriculture is to be congratulated on the very sympathetic chord he has struck in the presentation of this measure. We have been told by the junior member for Halifax that there is no policy embodied in the Bill. I am not particular whether he calls it a policy, a method, a plan, or anything else,—at any rate it is something which seems to meet the approbation of both sides of the House, and we need not quarrel over the name by which it is to be designated. I simply wish to express my hearty approval of this measure. I think it is well conceived; and in the country it will be received with cordial approbation. As I said, I will not detain the House now. Opportunity will be afforded, if we desire it, to discuss the Bill further in committee; but I did not wish the measure to pass even this stage without expressing my hearty endorsation of what the Minister of Agriculture has done. I think that in what he has done he is fairly meeting the feeling and wish of the agricultural community of Canada.

Mr. BURRELL: Before we go into committee, Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me I desire to answer very briefly some of the criticisms which have been made in this debate, especially as these affect the principle of the Bill, and therefore are more properly the subject of remark on the second reading. I have to express my appreciation of the way in which hon. members have discussed the matter. The discussion was begun by our very vigorous friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who was followed by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). I think I may fairly say that as the discussion proceeded the speeches grew more moderate, more intelligent and more relevant. For I think that of all those who spoke on the measure the hon. member for Red Deer—I am sorry he is not present, for I would rather have said this to his face—showed less relevancy, moderation and intelligence than any other hon. member either on that side or on this. The hon. gentleman is a vigorous enough speaker, but I do not think he ever showed to less advantage in this House than this afternoon when criticising this measure. I am fairly right, I think, in saying that if he gave assent to this Bill it was a grudging and half-hearted assent, and that assent was accompanied with harsh criticism of a great many matters absolutely beside the mark. I am not going into the question, this obsession of his, of reciprocity or free trade, but I would point out that his criticism went far beyond the Bill and was an arraignment of the whole system of education. I took a note of a few of his remarks, and what were they? One of his remarks was to the effect that under such a Bill, if its objects were achieved, the farmers would be worse off than they are without education, because they would produce more and would not know what to do with it. And not only that but he said that they could not expect anything from such a Bill, that it would not do anything for the farmers, that it was only a show-bill—his whole argument, as I say, was an argument against education. No man in this House will dispute that education is good for the rest of the community; will the hon. member for Red Deer, who is supposed to represent the farmers, say that the farmer is the only man in the country who should not be educated? He made the remark that he never knew a university degree to fill an empty stomach. I wonder if that is quite true. The hon. gentleman has told us his own qualifications, he holds a university degree; did it not do something to fill his stomach and the stomachs of those dependent upon him? I say that the arguments of my hon. friend from Red Deer were beside the mark; they were not legitimate criticism; and if they were meant, all I can say is that they pay a very poor tribute to the intelligence of this House and a very shabby compliment to the intelligence of the hon. member himself. very few men could be found to agree with him in this country. In all the correspondence I have had from men associated with agriculture or education in Canada in the three months since the Bill was introduced, not a single man has advanced criticism along the line taken by the hon. member for Red Deer, who poses as a representative of the farmers. In view of their respective attitudes towards this Bill the hon. member for Red Deer might well have said to his friend the member for North Oxford what the Quaker said to his wife: 'The whole world is crazy except thee and me, and I think thee is a little queer, too.'

One of the criticisms offered to this Bill was that it would be better not to have dealt in a statutory way with the amounts concerned, but to place them in the estimates from year to year. This position was taken by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). I can only say in reply that the most careful consideration was given to that point, and we came to the conclusion—and I still contend it is absolutely right—that the universal cry in this matter from the provincial governments in this matter was for a policy of continuity. They represented to us: There is no use in introducing anything of this kind unless we can bank on its being a continuous policy and can shape our plans knowing approximately what we are to do in the future. The hon. member for Edmonton rather argued that if the amounts were put in the estimates they would be assured just as much as though put in this Bill, but I venture to think there is greater stability about a measure in which the whole matter, especially in regard to the amounts involved, is made statutory than if the money depends upon votes in the estimates. It is here embodied in a form which no Government would care to turn down or alter, except to amend for the better. I venture to say that even if hon. gentlemen opposite came into power before the expiration of the period provided in the Bill, they would not touch the principle of the measure, but would recognize it as a permanent policy and one proposed on fairly sound lines, and if they made any changes, it would be in the way of an improvement. I am satisfied that the provincial governments are better pleased to have it in this form than to have the voting of the money depend upon the estimates.

The hon. member has another criticism—and it is a good thing, I admit, to have these criticisms put forward. He urged that the proposal in regard to these matters should be laid before Parliament in order that Parliament might discuss them before they were embodied in particular arrangements between the governments of the several provinces and this Government, I have only to say in answer to that, that it is diametrically opposed to the opinions placed before the House by other hon. members. For instance, the hon. member for North Oxford argued that the money should be given to the provinces and should not depend upon these agreements. That proposition has been put up to us on several occasions. I would point out to the hon. member for Edmonton that we do not propose to exercise quite the same close supervision in a matter of this kind that we would if we were dealing with it as an ordinary departmental affair. We regard this as a measure devised to assist the various provinces, and we recognize that the provinces should deal with it through their own machinery and in their own way, because they know best what their own conditions are. We believe that it will be better and more practical to deal with the matter in this way than if we were to try to thresh out definite propositions on the floor of the House.

Another criticism, made by my hon. friends from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), and Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), was that if this measure was to be criticized it was because the money to be voted was not enough. The hon. member for Guysborough put in a very poetical way when he said that nobody would get more out of this than the price of two cheap cigars. Well, they did not get a smoke at all under the late Administration, so far as that part of it goes. As to it not being enough, I have only to recall to my hon. friend from Carleton, the statement I made in explaining the Bill, that if the provinces co-operate with us, as we hope and as we have every reason to expect, it is my conviction, considering the magnitude of the task itself and the growth of this country, it will be found, that the appropriation will be unequal to the demand. And, while that may be left for future consideration, I would like to state fairly at this time that the House, I am sure will at no distant day be prepared to supplement this appropriation with still larger amounts. And when that time comes the House will consider it from the same standpoint that I ask it to be considered now, that we provide funds for effectual development along the lines of our greatest national asset. And with this, I am sure the hon. member for Carleton will agree.

The criticism of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) was that there was no policy in the Bill and that apparently no consideration had been given by the Government to policy. He will permit me to dissent rather strongly from that view; for, though I admit that there is no policy in the way of marking out certain definite clear-cut lines, there is a broad line of policy laid down that money should be devoted to agricultural education, instruction and demonstration. It is not possible for a Government dealing with nine provincial governments to lay down absolutely explicit lines along which each province can best move in studying its own conditions, and I maintain that the only way we can proceed is to feel our way year by year by thorough consultation with every government in the country, and their educational authorities, and work out between themselves and us a reasonable line of action which will make for continuity and development along the best lines and will be therefore a steadily growing policy, as I believe, of the best kind. I can only say to my hon. friend and to the members of the House that this is a difficult question to deal with—more difficult, perhaps, than they think. As far as I am personally concerned, I have given it and shall give it the most earnest consideration, simply and solely with the idea of working it out on lines that will be satisfactory to the agricultural and educational interests of every province in this country. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) also made a remark which I think I ought to answer now, and then I would be very glad to have the Bill taken up in committee. The hon. member for Rouville read a letter which had been addressed to me by the Council of Agriculture for the province of Quebec. I do not intend to read the resolution which was submitted, because my hon. friend has placed it on 'Hansard,' but I may say that I wrote to the secretary of the Council of Agriculture in answer to that letter as follows:

Dear Sir,—With further reference to the resolution of the Council of Agriculture, copy of which you forwarded to me a short while ago, and the receipt of which my secretary formally acknowledged, permit me to make one or two observations.

A portion of the resolution reads as follows:

That is what my hon. friend read:

There is perhaps a little misconception on the part of the Council in regard to this matter. It can hardly be said that it is proposed to devote the subsidy in the future to a 'single object' and there is nothing in the terms of the Bill or in my explanatory speech which would prevent assistance being devoted to the various objects mentioned in the first part of this quotation from the resolution, provided the moneys were expended along educational lines.

On page 12 of the speech, a copy of which I believe you have, I explained to the House as follows:—

Help given in an educational direction will not only mean better farming, but better farmers and better and happier men and women. The particular form such assistance may take, may vary with the special needs and conditions in each province. It will embrace the increasing of the efficiency and equipment of our agricultural colleges; the establishment of agricultural schools, of dairying and horticultural schools of short courses in agriculture; the initiation of agricultural teaching in the public schools and work by travelling or located qualified instructors. It might well include the valuable educational work carried on by means of demonstration trains——

This was done in the province of the hon. member for Red Deer, who is so critical of this measure, and the provincial Minister of Agriculture informed me that the greatest good resulted from that work.

—training of teachers in nature study and the invaluable work of domestic science concerned with the women and girls of our communities, whose influence will always constitute one of the most potent forces in solving the problems we are considering.

Morever, the preamble of the Bill specifically states that 'whereas great and permanent benefit will result through education, instruction and demonstration carried on along lines well devised and of a continuous nature, therefore, &c.

I think this can hardly be interpreted as a devotion of this money to a single object. It is true that it was not the intention to include loans or grants to enable farmers to carry on their work, it being considered wiser to demonstrate to the farmers how to make money than to give them money; better to show them how to carry on their work to advantage than to do the work for them, and I am convinced that within the four corners of this Bill there will be found ample powers and full justification for not only educational work in the ordinary sense of that term, but also for educational or demonstration work, which will be of great assistance to the various branches of agriculture which are mentioned in the first part of the resolution which I have quoted.

Mr. BURRELL.

I think that is a fairly full answer to my hon. friend from Rouville. I desire to apologize to the House for having taken up so much time, but I thought it was only fair to answer the criticism which had been made.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

House went into Committee on Bill.

On section 3—amounts payable for instruction in agriculture:

Mr. CARVELL: I suggested on the second reading of this Bill that I was not satisfied with the principle of voting the money for a period of ten years in advance. I think this principle is wrong not only as applied to this Bill, but to any other legislation which might be proposed in this House. I believe that in the handling of public money it is the duty of Parliament to retain control over it. Two new parliaments will assemble during this period of ten years, and I think we have no right to attempt to bind our successors in such a manner as is proposed under the present Bill. As all the arguments I have to make on the matter were made on the second reading of the Bill, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Oliver:

That section 3 be amended by inserting after the word 'fourteen,' in line 22 thereof, the following words:

'Upon appropriations in that behalf from year to year made by Parliament'; and by adding to the end of said section 3 the following words, namely: 'provided the same shall be voted yearly as aforesaid.'

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): May I ask the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., to explain how it would be possible for a provincial government to enact any legislation along the lines of general advancement in the province without having some kind of permanent policy that they could depend upon for at least several years.

Mr. CARVELL: I think it is very easily explained. Under section 5 of this Bill, the money remains practically under the control of this Government. This Government can make any kind of arrangement with the local governments which they have a mind to. They can say we are willing this year to devote this money to certain purposes. No man presumes for a moment that this money will be devoted for the same purpose for ten years. My hon. friend does not believe that an agreement made say in 1913 with the Government of the province of Ontario would be continued without change for ten years. He knows there will be changes probably every year, or every two years. That is a sufficient reason why the money should be voted yearly, because as new conditions arise, new agreements will have to be made, fresh sums of money will be required, and new votes will have to be obtained from Parliament. It seems to me that that is the very strongest reason why the matter should be taken up in that manner.

Mr. BURRELL: I can assure my hon. friend that this matter has been given the very closest attention during the past year, not only by the Government and myself and Dr. James, but by a number of the foremost men in every province, and I am safe in saying that this particular feature is the one that appeals to the whole country. I am putting this regardless of any political considerations whatever. I would also like to point out that the very contention my hon. friend is making now, was the one upon which to a large extent criticism was directed last year in connection with the Good Roads Bill. They objected to the amount put in the estimates in that way, and to the fact that it was not embodied in the statute and put in a more permanent form. The fact that this is put in the statute and in a permanent form, not only guarantees permanence, but there is no conceivable objection that I can see to it, and it will inspire confidence in every provincial government as to the continuity of this policy and enable them to shape their plans which take some years of consideration. I think that could not possibly be done if the suggestion of my hon. friend were carried out and put in the other form. I do not think there is any matter of principle involved, but I think the arrangement as we have it, would be a great convenience and a more satisfactory way of doing it.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not wish to argue the matter with my hon. friend. I just wish to point out that his reference to the Good Roads Bill last year is not very happy, because there was no proposition to vote any specified amount of money whatever. It was simply proposed to take power to devote whatever amount of money the Government saw fit, along such lines as they saw fit. What the Opposition proposed was that whatever the amount of money might be it should be handed over to the provinces, and that they should expend it at a pro rata proportion according to the population which each province bore to the population of Canada as a whole. My hon. friend has now adopted that policy. After taking out say $200,000 or $300,000, the balance is divided according to the population. Therefore he has adopted our ideas, but he has incorporated something else very different from what we suggested in connection with the highways Bill. If my hon. friends bring down the same kind of highways Bill this session, they will find practically the same objections to it, but we will deal with that when the time comes.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to say that the view expressed by the Minister of Agriculture in regard to the permanence given by the form of this Bill does not hold good. I have pointed out to the committee already that there is no permanence because of the form of the Bill. The Bill as it exists to-day can be amended at the next session of this Parliament. It is merely a formal declaration of the policy of the Government, and as such, has a measure of value. That measure of value is not interfered with by the proposed amendment. The declaration of policy remains in the form of the Bill, and it is proposed by the amendment to bring to the notice of Parliament at each succeeding session the vote of money that will be taken out of the consolidated revenue fund for that year, the intention being, as I have already pointed out, that the minister shall come to the House each year with his proposals for that year for the purpose of receiving suggestions with view to the better carrying out of the policy. As the Bill stands at present, he brings to the House each session a return subsequent to the plan of the previous fiscal year. By the time these events, which are then a year or a year and a half old, are criticised by Parliament, and embodied in the policy of a future year, I submit that the criticism and suggestions have ceased to be of value by reason of the lapse of time. If there are to be any valuable suggestions from Parliament, and surely Parliament is the body to make those suggestions, the best way in regard to an agricultural programme is the best way in regard to any other public expenditure. That is to say, an explanation of policy is made when the vote of money is being asked. That is an elementary principle which for the purpose of this Bill should not be departed from. On the contrary I maintain that the purpose of the Bill will be substantially advanced by continuing that very beneficial line of policy. My hon. friend the minister has said that in section 5, provision is made for the handing over of this money to the provinces. If he would amend section 5, so that it will provide merely for the handing over of the money to the provinces, according to plain terms set forth in the statute, there would be no objection to his proposal. But section 5 does not provide for simply handing over money to the provinces. It provides for handing money over to the provinces on conditions to be arranged between this Government and the governments of the provinces. That arrangement may be of one kind or may be of another, but whatever the nature of the arrangement or its effect, it is an arrangement for which this Parliament is responsible. I maintain that Parliament should retain control where it necessarily has responsibility. My suggestion then to the minister is that he amend section 5 so as to make specific payments to the provinces under specific conditions set out in the Bill, or else accept the amendment so that the proposals in each year would come under the review of Parliament the same as any other financial proposal ought to come; that being all the more necessary in this case because this is a new principle which remains to be worked out. With all respect to my hon. friend, I think he will agree with me that it is to his advantage and to the advantage of the working of the Bill that he should have the greatest freedom of suggestion from members of Parliament coming from all sections of the country and familiar with the interests and requirements of each section. It is for these reasons that I would ask my hon. friend to either accept the proposed amendment to section 3, or else amend section 5, so as to bring it in accord with the principle that he stated to the House, which principle it is not in accord with at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment be adopted?

Mr. OLIVER: Before the amendment is adopted, the acting whip informs me that there was an arrangement that the Bill should not proceed further than the second reading to-night.

Mr. BURRELL: That is news to me. I did not know it.

Mr. ROGERS: There was some arrangement that the Bill would go through, but I do not know whether it was that it should go through committee or pass the second reading. As far as we are concerned if there was no objection, and there was but one amendment, and we could get the Bill through the committee, we would be very glad to do so, but if there is any special objection to the Bill being proceeded with to-night there is no desire on our part to press it.

Mr. OLIVER: It is a very important Bill, this is a very thin House and, while I do not anticipate that there will be any serious amendment to the Bill or any serious delay in its passage, if there has been an understanding, I would like very much that the Bill should be allowed to stand until another day. I would like to have it thoroughly understood that everybody will be given an opportunity to consider and discuss the measure.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): The arrangement between the chief whip of the Liberal party and myself was that this Bill should go through the committee to-night.

Mr. BOYCE: And stand for the third reading?

Mr. SHARPE: Yes, stand for the third reading.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend from Lisgar has stated that it should go through the committee to-night. We will accept his statement and let it go.

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia): Why not adjourn?

Mr. ROGERS: If there is any doubt or misunderstanding, we have no objection.

Mr. OLIVER: We are quite willing to accept the statement of the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. HUGHES: The only thing I feel doubtful about is that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) sent a note across which I showed to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, who stated that he understood that as soon as the Bill passed the second reading, the House would adjourn.

Mr OLIVER: That is what I understood.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know whether my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works understood me or not, but when I handed him the note, he said, 'yes,' and on that understanding the hon. member for Pictou went away.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and he informed a number of us that that was the arrangement. A number of other hon. gentlemen left on account of it.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to be understood as absolutely accepting the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sharpe), and as being willing to carry out that arrangement. But if the leader of the House will agree to allow the House to adjourn now without passing the Bill, until there is further discussion, I would be very glad.

Mr. BURRELL: I hope my hon. friend, or any other hon. member, does not understand that I have the slightest objection to the fullest criticism. I welcome it because I think we all want to come to the same conclusion. I had hoped that it would not prove to be a very contentious measure and that we would be able to make some progress because there are a great many people throughout the country interested in agriculture who are anxious to know that the Bill has passed. But, if it is thought best to adjourn, I do not object. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. OLIVER: The amendment is not declared lost?

The CHAIRMAN: It is not voted on.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Rogers House adjourned at 11.22 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 21, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 173, to provide for the incorporation of Railway Companies.—Mr. Barker.

Bill No. 174, to incorporate Beaver Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Munson.

Bill No. 175, respecting the Manitoba Radial Railway Company.—Mr. Molloy.

Bill No. 176, respecting the Southampton Railway Company.—Mr. Crocket.

Bill No. 177, to incorporate the Athabasca and Grande Prairie Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 178, to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Mortgage Company.—Mr. Stevens.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW—DISMISSAL OF INSPECTOR.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (Maisonneuve, Montreal): Mr. Speaker, I desire, with your permission, to call your attention to a matter relating to organized labour in Hamilton, Ont., and for this purpose would like to read a short newspaper article. I refer to an article in the Hamilton Spectator of the 17th of April, as follows:

> Suspended for Barring Aliens—Now Union Moulders may Complain to Government—Claim Men were being Imported by Westinghouse Company.
>
> A sidelight on the Hamilton moulders' strike, which seriously affects a government officer and may result in the union making a strong protest to the Government, was revealed this morning in a story told by members of the moulders' union.
>
> It was to the effect that the Westinghouse people, of this city, in an effort to replace the striking moulders, recently attempted to bring in non-union men from the United States. H. Sharp, government immigration officer, located at Bridgeburg, who has been known to be a most efficient officer in locating and prosecuting foreigners and others who failed to comply with laws governing the entrance of alien labour to Canada, discovered early last week what he supposed to be a case of smuggling in of alien labourers. He removed from a Buffalo train four men who admitted they were on their way to Hamilton, engaged to work for a firm in this city. The men were deported as having been engaged contrary to Canadian labour laws, and the Westinghouse Company took the matter up direct with the Minister of Immigration at Ottawa, with the result that Mr. Sharp was suspended from duty without having been given an opportunity to explain why or how the case had been dealt with. The matter has come to the knowledge of the Moulders' Union, and it was stated this morning that they would take the case up direct with the department at Ottawa.
>
> 'I do not know Mr. Sharp; in fact, never met the man in my life, but if immigration officers, who, in the faithful discharge of their duties in carrying out the Alien Labour Laws of Canada, are to be dismissed in this manner, without a hearing or chance of explanation, it is high time organized labour of Canada, in whose interests the alien labour laws are put on the statutes and officers appointed to enforce, took the matter up. This we will do in the case of Mr. Sharp,' said an officer of the Moulders' Union this morning.
>
> A Spectator reporter called at the office of H. Sweeney, local immigration agent, this morning, and asked him if he knew of this case, but Mr. Sweeney positively refused to discuss the matter in any way, simply saying it was no affair of his and he had nothing to say.

I desire to ask the Government if there is any truth in this report, and, if so, what they are going to do about it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before this is answered, as this form of question is becoming more frequent of late, I desire to call attention to the matter. In Peel's Decisions, it is stated:

> Members should not put questions merely upon newspaper authority, but before putting them should institute some inquiry, and make themselves responsible for the statements they contain.

Also:

> A member who puts a question is responsible for the facts alleged therein.

I bring this to the attention of hon. members, that they may endeavour as far as possible, to conform to these requirements.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I did not hear the whole of what the hon. member read or said. My attention has not been called to the matter of deportation of any labourers who are attempting to enter Canada at the Niagara border; but complaint was made a few days ago that one of the inspectors had taken from the Michigan Central train, at midnight, a very respectable man who lived at Hamilton, and who had lived there for eight years, and had locked him up until ten o'clock the next day. The inspector's name is Sharp. He was suspended pending an investigation. That investigation is going forward, and we will deal with the report as we think right when it is sent in.

PRIVATE BILL—SECOND READING.

INDIAN LAND SALES.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Does the Government take measures to safeguard the rights of Indians to the land of their reserves in British Columbia when sales of such land are being made?

2. Is the Government aware of steps being taken, as alleged, to acquire from the Indians of the Kitsilano reserve, Vancouver, B.C., their rights to the land of the reserve by the provincial Government of British Columbia, or by other parties or interests?

3. Is the Government a party to the proposals of purchase being made by or on behalf of the British Columbia Government?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. Answered by No. 2.

NEWSPAPER PATRONAGE LIST.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

What newspapers in the province of Nova Scotia are on the patronage list?

Mr. BORDEN: An Order in Council was passed on December 10, 1896, establishing an official patronage list, but since the present Administration came into power, no Order in Council has been passed in this regard. The newspapers in which any particular advertisement is to be inserted are selected by the minister at the head of each department.

CLOCKS FOR PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. How many clocks have been ordered by the Department of Public Works since the 1st of November, 1911?

2. Were any tenders invited for same?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Fifty-four weight clocks and two electric clocks.

2. Yes, tenders were invited for tower clocks from two well-known English firms.

MAIL BAG LOCKS.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

From how many Ottawa and Quebec firms were offers received for improved padlocks for mail bags?

Mr. PELLETIER: There are no offers on record from any other firm than the Ontario Equipment Company.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

How many new padlocks and keys for mail bags have been purchased by the Post Office Department since April 1, 1913?

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member who puts this question is referred to the numerous answers already given that no new padlocks have as yet been supplied.

*Mr. CARVELL:

1. On or about the 23rd September, 1912, did the Post Office Department give an order for 99,000 checks to improve the padlocks in use for the mail bags?

2. If so, to whom was the order given,

3. What was the price of each of these checks?

4. How many have been delivered to the Department?

5. Was this order cancelled on or about the 2nd April? If so, for what reason?

Mr. PELLETIER: This question is not intelligible as it stands. No checks to improve padlocks have been ordered. If the question is intended to refer to malleable iron bars ordered from Edouard Lapointe, an order was so given for these bars which are manufactured apart from the padlocks. The order has stood for over six months, during which time no acceptable bars were offered and the order was therefore concelled.

*Mr. CARVELL:

Is the Post Office Department aware that Mr. Porter, who is a security for the carrying out of the contract for the new padlocks, is also said to be a stockholder in the Ontario Equipment Company?

Mr. PELLETIER: The information as to the list of stockholders of this company has been given to this House as secured lately from the Ontario Government. When Mr. Porter signed as security, he did so individually, and not as a stockholder of an incorporated company.

*Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What is the exact quantity of padlocks and keys for mail bags used by the Post Office Department in each province?

2. Has the distribution of the new padlocks commenced?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. The controller of postal stores reports that it is impossible accurately to answer this question. The mail bags are not all stationery in one province, but go from one to the other.

2. No.

*Mr. CARVELL:

Was there any conference between Messrs. Dion, Faucher and Grenier, the first patentees of the new padlocks and the post office authorities, before the signing of the contract with the Ontario Equipment Company? If so, at what date?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

LA PATRIE PRINTING CONTRACT.

*Mr. CARVELL:

Has the Post Office Department any printing contract with La Patrie of Montreal?

2. If so, to what amount per annum?

3. How much has been paid to La Patrie by the Post Office Department since 1st of November, 1912?

Mr. PELLETIER: All arrangements for outside printing are made by the Department of the Secretary of State to which this question is being referred.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT AUTOMOBILE.

*Mr. CARVELL:

Did the Post Office Department purchase an automobile since last session? If so, from whom?

2. What is the purchase price?

3. Is it a second-hand automobile?

Mr. PELLETIER: The question about the purchase of automobiles by this Government and the late one, were fully answered in the House of Commons, on the 16th December, 1912. (See 'Hansard,' No. 17, pages 1190 and 1191.)

ONTARIO EQUIPMENT COMPANY.

*Mr. CARVELL:

At whose request was the Ontario Equipment Company put on the patronage list of the Post Office Department?

Mr. PELLETIER: There is no such request on file.

ST. CHARLES RIFLE RANGE.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is it the intention of the Militia Department to transfer the present rifle range at St. Charles, Manitoba, to St. Vital?

2. Have any options been secured? If so, from whom?

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia and Defence): The matter has not been considered.

PURCHASE OF ROSS RIFLE.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. What is the date of the last purchase of Ross Rifles by the Militia Department?

2. How many were purchased, what price was paid, and when were they delivered?

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia and Defence): The latest order for Ross rifles which has been delivered and paid for is that of March 21, 1912, for 3,000 Mk. II rifles at $25 each, and $1.90 for charger guide and rear aperture sight. Delivered as follows: May 4, 1912, 20; June 20, 1912, 95; August 20, 1912, 12; October 16, 1912, 2,873; total, 3,000.

On a previous order (3rd November, 1911), for 10,000 rifles Mk. III, at $25 each, only 3,000 rifles have been delivered. Progress payments have been made on this order on the certificate of the Government chartered accountant to the extent of seventy-five per cent of the value of the order, viz., $187,500. Dates of deliveries as follows: December 21, 1912, 1,000; February 4, 1913, 1,000; March 29, 1913, 1,000.

Another order which should have been given six months earlier, was given on 9th

FISHERIES REGULATIONS.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Government received the following resolution, adopted by la Chambre de Commerce Française, of Montreal:—

Whereas the Bill No. 35, recently presented to the federal Parliament at Ottawa and adopted by it on the second reading, would have the effect of preventing the users of drag-nets from obtaining at Canadian ports, where they have been accustomed to come to get their supply provisions, bait and coal;

That the provisions of this Bill are apposed to those of the Franco-Canadian Treaty of 1907, (Art. 10-11), by which the two countries bind themselves not to establish, the one towards the other, any prohibition or restriction of importation, exportation, or transit, which would not be at the same time applicable to other countries granting reciprocity the treatment of the most favoured nations in all which concerns importation, exportation, re-exportation, transit, warehousing, bonding, transhipment, the completion and execution of the customs formalities, and generally everything which relates to the carrying on of commerce and industry;

That on the other hand these users of drag-nets operate only abroad on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, and have not consequently caused Canadian fishermen to suffer the least damage, attributed generally by them to the drag-net fishing.

That a conference was held last year at Washington for the preparation of an agreement between the United States, Newfoundland and Canada, with the view of making general this measure on the shores of the three countries; that this conference was to be resumed this year, but that it could not validly come to decision which would be prejudicial to other countries without hearing them.

May it please the Canadian Government to give to this question the greatest consideration, as much from the point of view of international rights, and especially to that of its engagement by its treaty towards France.

That all the countries interested, and especially the latter, be appealed to, to participate in the work of the next conference at Washington.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS PROVIDENT FUND.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved second reading of Bill No. 25, to amend the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees Provident Fund Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the purport of this Bill? On one or two occasions, particularly on one, a proposition was made to amend the Provident Fund Act and a deputation waited on the then Government from the men who were interested in this fund. Certain propositions were made and an investigation was had by an actuary, I think, as to what the effect of these changes might be. It was thought at the time that we had not sufficient information to make any radical change in the Act and that it might affect the old employees to a greater extent than some of the gentlemen interested thought. I do not know what the purport of this Bill is.

Mr. COCHRANE: The amendment now proposed to the Act is to comply with the request made last year that those men who were dismissed for political partisanship should get back the money that they had paid into the Provident Fund. The Bill is to enable us to return this money. I did not know last session that we required an amendment for this purpose, but I obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice and they advised us that such an amendment was necessary. With reference to what my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) has just said, I might say that there was no actuary appointed before he went out of office; at least, there is no report upon the subject and I am quite sure that there was no such appointment. The auditor tells me in a memorandum that he gave me that before the proposed changes could be made it would be necessary to have an actuary appointed, and he feels that would be very heavy on the men and very heavy on the railway as well. He figures it at about two and one-half per cent. This Bill is simply to enable the Government to pay back what the men have paid in.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my memory serves me right, there was a man appointed who made a report of some kind; at least, he was engaged to make a report. He was from Montreal.

Mr. COCHRANE: Mr. Bell is my authority for the statement that no such appointment was made.

Mr. GRAHAM: If he will look up the matter more carefully he will find that there was a gentleman appointed. My memory does not serve me as to whether or not a report was made. It would be interesting to know how much money this will involve.

Mr. COCHRANE: Somewhere between $2,000 and $3,000.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1—repayment out of fund to discharged employees:

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand that the minister has a statement of the number of men who would be affected by these proposals up to date?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not it here but I will furnish it to-morrow.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the hon. gentleman undertake to give it to us before the Bill goes through, together with the names?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, I will agree to lay it on the table.

Mr. GRAHAM: I see that there is nothing in the Bill with reference to activity in municipal elections. I suppose that was left out designedly and I would suggest not unwisely. I have expressed my opinion once or twice in the House on the question of partisanship, or citizenship, in regard to railway employees both while I was a member of the Government and since. I think that the lines that we are apt to draw sometimes with reference to municipal elections are too strict in relation to men employed on the railway. In a good many towns and cities which are railway centres—not Government railway centres but railway centres of the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Northern—railway employees are to be found amongst the most progressive and ablest members of the municipal bodies. You will find in these towns that the very best citizens are those employed in connection with railways. No private railway company has ever endeavoured to prevent any of its employees from acting on school boards, for example, or in the municipal councils. And why should they? The railway employee pays his taxes; he has built a home for himself in the town and no one of the citizens is more interested than he in the proper conduct of municipal affairs. He is a taxpayer and should have the same right as any other taxpayer, and the railway companies concede that. Why should a man be robbed of that right because he happens to work for a government railway, if he gives the government railway good service. Take a town like St. John, N.B. and other towns where the Government railway operates as well as private railways and the Government railway employee will find his next door neighbour who works for the Canadian Pacific railway permitted to take part in municipal affairs and give the best service he can outside of working hours for the welfare of the community, while he, the Government railwey employee, is debarred. I am glad to see the minister has left out any reference to municipal elections in this clause; from my point of view no employee should be dismissed for taking part in municipal elections. There is a possibility of our going too far in curtailing the rights of citizens merely because they happen to be earning their salary on a government railway, and that we should endeavour to guard against.

Mr. MACDONALD: I called the attention of the minister some time ago to the case of a young man who last year was dismissed from his position as car checker on the Intercolonial railway and in whose place was appointed a young man named Patterson, whose hand was unfortunately maimed, and who, under the rules of the Intercolonial railway, should not for that reason have been employed at all. This young man was not in the employ of the railway long when he displayed activity of a political character, by taking a very great interest in the preparation of the electoral lists. I understood that the minister was going to investigate the case. Has he done so? Does he believe such conduct on the part of an official should be the cause for his dismissal?

Mr. COCHRANE: I made inquiry as to whether the young man was capable and able to do his work as car checker and the report to me was that the fact that he could only use one hand did not prevent him checking up cars, and that he was discharging his duty satisfactorily. I do not remember that the hon. gentleman made any other charge in connection with this case, but if any other charge is made I shall investigate it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister consider activity on the part of an employee, in the preparation of electoral lists, sufficient reason for that employee's dismissal?

Mr. COCHRANE: Shortly after I took charge of the department, I made it a rule that any complaint of a political nature, made against any official of the Intercolonial, should be investigated as provided for under the rules of the Provident Fund and under agreement with the board. If a complaint is made, I will have it investigated.

Mr. MACDONALD: If, on investigation, an official was found guilty of having displayed activity in the preparation of the electoral lists, would the minister regard that as sufficient interference in politics to cause that officer's removal?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not want to convict a man until he is found guilty.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister is now proposing legislation, which has hitherto not been found on our statute-books, providing for what would occur as to the dismissal of officials for political interference. The language of the Bill is: that employees would be dismissed for engaging in partisan work in connection with any provincial or Dominion election. My point is, that the language of the Bill may not cover political activity in such a case as the preparation of voters' lists, and I wish to know from the minister, if, such a charge being proved against an official, he would consider it reason for his dismissal?

Mr. COCHRANE: That would depend on the facts as to what the man had done.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister confine political activity to interference merely during an election campaign?

Mr. COCHRANE: I could not give any decision until the case came up.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has exercised his judgment a great many times in regard to dismissals of men in his department, and notwithstanding that the investigator appointed did some pretty queer investigating, and adopted most peculiar methods of conducting hearings, I am bound to say that the Minister of Railways has dealt with his employees a good deal better than have some of the other ministers. I have in mind cases where men have been dismissed without any evidence of their having taken part in provincial or Dominion elections; I have in mind a case in which the only evidence against the man who was recommended to be dismissed by Mr. Duchemin was that in a provincial election in 1904,—not in the election even but in connection with the making up of the electoral lists of that year, he had interested himself in adding certain names to the lists. Unless this Bill is amended, when it becomes law the law clerk of the Department of Justice may advise my hon. friend's officials that these gentlemen, having been dismissed for something which was not directly partisan interference in either a Dominion or a provincial election, are not covered by this statute.

Mr. COCHRANE: It certainly would cover those cases.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend will remember that last year this question was discussed very fully and, with all due deference to the Department of Justice, it was agreed by everyone that the Act was not sufficiently broad to warrant the minister directing the proper officials to make the repayments.

Mr. COCHRANE: We have to take our law from the Department of Justice.

Mr. MACDONALD: I quite agree with that; but the minister assured my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), who was very anxious to have the matter settled, that he would see that these gentlemen got the money.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am going to see to it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am anxious to see that that is done. The Bill which my hon. friend has introduced and which I presume he wants to crystallize into a statute without amendment, only provides for such cases as men being dismissed for partisan interference in a Dominion or provincial election. According to the strict interpretation of this language, an opinion could be given that, where a man was dismissed, not for partisan interference in a Dominion or a provincial election, but because he had taken part in the compilation of electoral lists some nine or ten years ago, which act was considered sufficient for his dismissal, that would not bring him within the statute. My hon. friend would have to bring in an amendment in order to mete out tardy justice to these gentlemen. The matter is of sufficient importance that I am satisfied that my hon. friend ought to make clear what his attitude is in regard to it. The language of the Bill clearly covers cases where men go out and take part in election contests. It is not intended to cover cases where no election is or where something may be said or done which may create the antagonism of his political opponents who may make a charge to the minister. I have called my hon. friend's attention just now to a case that occurred. I wrote the minister about a month ago pointing out that an employee of the road had taken part in a partisan way in regard to the revision of the lists in Nova Scotia. I understand that the minister tells me that he will have an investigation. I want to know whether he regards that as being partisanship sufficient to warrant a dismissal? If he does so, I want him to put it in this Bill so that the man who was dismissed before on that ground will get his money back. I think that is only a fair request.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend is mistaken in supposing that there has been no legislation of this character on the statute-book, or no statute in connection with which the same expression is used. Section 43 of the Civil Service Act of 1908 contains this provision:

> No officer, clerk or employee in the Civil Service shall be debarred from voting at any Dominion or provincial election if under the law governing the said election he has the right to vote; but no such officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election.

Apparently the language in this Bill has been taken from that which is to be found in the section which I have alluded to.

Mr. MACDONALD: The right hon. the Premier will see that this Bill goes further and deals with a case of partisan interference in a provincial election which is not dealt with by the Civil Service Act.

Mr. BORDEN: Yes, it is.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That would include preparation of the lists, as that is political work.

Mr. BORDEN: I would think so.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the Premier think this language sufficiently clear to cover work between elections?

Mr. BORDEN: With all deference to my hon. friend, if one section covers it, I think the others would.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not know about that. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asked what I thought was a very fair question, whether or not a civil servant, or anybody in the employ of the Government who has taken part in an election and has been dismissed, is to be repaid what he has paid into the fund. He asked if an officer who worked on the preparation of the lists would also be entitled, according to the provision in the Bill. If anybody has been dismissed for political partisanship, it does not matter whether it is on the polling day or the day before, or in the preparation of the lists, he has put his head in the basket and I have no fault to find with his dismissal. The Bill is not so clear as it might be on this point. While we are on this subject, I should have been better pleased if my hon. friend the Minister of Railways had brought here the lists of those to whom the Act is intended to apply. This is rather a painful subject, but one which I am afraid must come up from time to time. Every government which comes into office will be subjected to a good deal of pressure for dismissals. There is only one way in which this can be overcome and properly dealt with. There are in every election men who are tempted to forget that they are civil servants and who take part in the election.

I believe on both sides of the House we are agreed that when a man enters the service of the state he should from that moment cease to be a political partisan. He should give his whole time to the state which pays him. If he had been a partisan before, as was his right, from the moment he accepts the public money, he should cease to be a political partisan. His case, however, is entitled to full investigation. I have no fault to find with the department of my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane), but in other departments men have been dismissed without proper investigation. The rule which we laid down in the last Administration was that the man who was charged with offensive partisanship was entitled to retain his office until he had been convicted after proper investigation. We have endeavoured to live up to that rule. The only exception which we admitted was that, if a charge was made by a member of Parliament sitting in this House, who made the charge of his own knowledge, that was evidence enough, because a member of this House giving his word to the minister that so-and-so to his knowledge was guilty of offensive partisanship ought to have his word accepted as evidence, as if his statement was challenged he could defend himself and give the evidence. Apart from that I believe no man should be discharged from office without proper investigation. The moment he has been dismissed for political partisanship, whether it is in connection with an election or in the preparation of lists or anything of the kind, it seems to me he ought to have the benefit of this Bill.

Mr. BORDEN: Whatever construction should be put upon the Act of 1908 which I have quoted would be put upon this. Exactly the same language is used:

No such officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election.

The words of this Bill are:

In the case of any employee discharged from the service on or after the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and seven, for or on account of having been engaged in partisan work in connection with any Dominion or provincial election.

Exactly the same form of expression is used. I should be disposed to agree with the construction my hon. friend has put upon it. I do not think you will find all political work done after the writ for the election is issued, or in the heat of an election campaign. It seems to me it would include all work in connection with the election.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister will state that in the operation of this Act he will give such construction to it as will enable the employees dismissed for cause other than acts alleged to have been committed during an election, it may be that the result that I desire to attain will be met without any amendment to the statute.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am glad to say to the House now that if a man has been dismissed for political partisanship this Bill covers his case and is intended to cover it. I have a list of dismissals up to the 11th of October. I do not know whether there have been any other dismissals since. I can lay this list on the table, and if there have been dismissals since, I shall be glad to give the names. I can safely say that on the whole system we have not dismissed as many as were dismissed in Prince Edward Island alone after 1897.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the hon. minister put that list on 'Hansard'?

Mr. COCHRANE: I shall be very glad to do so.

List of persons who have been dismissed from the service of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways, from October 1, 1911, to date, for political partisanship, and the amount contributed by each to the Provident Fund.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I would like to know if there is any regulation at the present time to prevent an employee of the Intercolonial railway from accepting a position as municipal councillor or school commissioner. We have some able men on the Intercolonial railway whose services are sought on public bodies, but when they were asked their answer was that they could not run for such an office without the permission of Parliament. I desire to know if there is any such rule.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know of any rule of that kind. I do not go so far as the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) does in this respect. I think the Intercolonial railway employees ought to have a perfect right to take part in municipal affairs because their property is directly affected. If there has been a rule it has been winked at for I know a number of men along the line who occupy positions either as school trustees or as municipal councillors. But the very men who are the most likely to run for municipal office are in important positions in which their services to the public are in demand, and they cannot be in two places at the same time. I have been asked, I think, three times, since I accepted office, with regard to cases of this kind, and I have said 'no' each time. But I have never yet told a man when he had accepted without permission that he must get out.

Mr. EMMERSON: I congratulate the minister on introducing this Bill. I called his attention to the subject last session and also earlier in the present session. I was then under the impression, and still hold the view, that it was within the power of the minister under the Act to return contributions in these cases. However, he was advised to the contrary. I think it is right that the money should be paid back. I do not think, however, that a man should be dismissed for taking part in a provincial election, for the reason that provincial matters are akin to those of municipal administration. It is true that federal politics are sometimes brought into provincial elections, but still I do not think that dismissal for taking part in a provincial election is right. However, that has been done, and having been done, it seems fair that these men should be recouped the amount they had paid into the fund. It must be seen, however, that this may involve danger to the stability of the fund. That fund was based upon a careful actuarial calculation and report. The employees are called upon to contribute a certain percentage, and for every dollar they contribute the Government adds another dollar. Now, the security of the fund is menaced by these constant dismissals. In the list furnished by the minister, there are the names of sixty men.

Mr. COCHRANE: A very small proportion of the men on the system.

Mr. EMMERSON: I give my hon. friend credit, so far as the county of Westmorland is concerned, at least, for having used the knife very carefully. But since the date of this list there may have been many dismissals. If the number of dismissals were large, it might be enough to affect the stability of this provident fund as a security for the protection of the employees. I am glad the minister has introduced this Bill.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I do not think the Minister of Railways is quite entitled to all the encomiums heaped upon him because of his so-called fairness and generosity in his treatment of the employees of the Intercolonial railway. My experience of the minister and the the department has been of an entirely different character. In the county I represent, he has dismissed two out of three of the section men. In each case, there was a so-called investigation. The expense was about $400 or $500 outside of the disbursements of the commissioner, but the investigations were a farce as anybody can ascertain who will take the trouble to read the evidence. But I do not desire to discuss the investigations but to refer to the Bill now before us. Take a case of this kind which I had the honour to call to the attention of the minister last year. There was a section foreman who was degraded to the position of under-man. This necessitated travelling down to the end of the section and back to the middle of it to his work before beginning his day's work at seven o'clock. He had unfortunately met with an accident the year before, resulting in the breaking of his leg. This made him subject to rheumatism, so that he was hardly in a position to do this extra walking forced on him. He saw that his degration was but a means to an end and that end was to get him out of the service.

Mr. COCHRANE: Was he degraded for political partisanship?

Mr. CHISHOLM: That is the only reason we know of.

Mr. COCHRANE: No man was degraded for political partisanship. If an employee was found guilty, he was dismissed.

Mr. CHISHOLM: There was no investigation in this case. The man had been fourteen years in the employ of the railway, and had been section foreman for eight or nine years, his work being satisfactory until the change of government. After September 21—some time in October, I think—he received notice that he was no longer to act as foreman. He was placed in a subordinate position—the man under him was appointed foreman in his stead—the duties of which necessitated his walking to the end of the section every morning and walking back again to wherever they happened to be at work that day, before seven o'clock. The man had rheumatism and was unable to do this, and he accordingly tendered his resignation in the hope that he might be enabled to participate in the fund. When he made application, however, he was met with the objection that he had voluntarily resigned. He at once placed the department in possession of the facts, showing that whilst the form of his resignation was voluntary, he was, as a matter of fact, obliged to resign. The declaration of this man, setting forth the circumstances under which he tendered his resignation and presenting a certificate from the medical officer stating that the man was unable to walk to the end of the section each morning and do the work required of him after his degradation, was sent to the department, and I think the minister was disposed to treat his case with favour. although he said that under the Act no allowance could be made.

Mr. COCHRANE: That would be a matter entirely for the Provident Fund Board; the same board now exists as existed under the old regime.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I think the evidence that was sent to the department satisfied them that the resignation in this case was not voluntary. I make these remarks for the purpose of asking the minister to consider whether or not this man may be permitted to share in the fund. I would call his attention to the fact that under section 12 of the Provident Fund Act, it is provided that the following classes of persons shall be entitled to participate in the fund:

Class B. Those who, after being fifteen years in the service, become physically or mentally incapacitated from following their usual occupation in the service;

Class C. Those who have attained the age of sixty years after being fifteen years in the service, and request to be retired from the service;

Class D. Those who are permanently disabled from following their usual occupation in the service as a result of injuries received while on duty and actually at work in the service.

I think representations were made by employees from Prince Edward Island suggesting an amendment to clause D. I am familiar with the case of a man who is suffering from locomotor ataxia in its incipient stages. He is an elderly man, has been fifteen years in the service, and his work has been satisfactory. The officials are satisfied, however, that he is not doing his work as well as a younger and more vigorous man would do it, but the circumstances are such that they kept him on. If this man had sustained an injury while actually in the service, he would be entitled to participate in the Provident Fund, but if the trouble came on gradually, through exposure or through the various circumstances connected with his work, and he thus became incapacitated, he would not be entitled to participate in the fund. I think the representations made by the Intercolonial railway employees in Prince Edward Island was to the effect that those who became physically incapacitated while in the service should be entitled to participate, notwithstanding the fact that their incapacity was not due to accident or injury sustained in the course of their employment. Under the Act, if a person becomes physically incapacitated, the result of an accident, he is entitled to participate in the fund, but if there is no accident, and his disability results from over-exposure or from the ordinary pursuit of his occupation, he cannot participate. It is in such a case that I think participation in the fund ought to be allowed, and I would ask the Minister if he can see his way clear to give effect to the representations in this regard made by the employees from Prince Edward Island?

Mr. McKENZIE: Have any changes been made in the composition of the board since it was organized in 1907?

Mr. COCHRANE: There has been no change, to my knowledge, since the present Government came into power.

Mr. McKENZIE: Under section 13 of the Act of 1907, the general manager is chairman ex-officio of this board, and that there has been a change in the personnel of the management since the passing of the Act of 1907.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think Mr. Pottinger is still chairman of the board.

Mr. McKENZIE: The word 'may' is used in this amendment. I would call the attention of the minister and his legal advisers to the interpretation which they propose to put on the word 'may' in this section. In acts dealing with Government business, the word 'may' is usually used instead of the word 'shall,' which is employed in acts dealing with company laws. It is important to those who shall come to apply to this board for their rights under this amendment to know what interpretation the minister proposes to put on the word 'may' in this section. Does it mean that the board shall pay the candidate this money if he be dismissed for any political reason? If 'may' is used in the ordinary meaning of the word, discretionary power is given to the board; they may say: This man was dismissed for political partisanship, and we will not pay him; against that condition the man has no remedy. He could not go into the courts and enforce his rights, he would have no power to sue the board. Therefore, I would like to have an interpretation by some legal authority representing the Government as to whether the word 'may' in this case means 'shall.' We would then know what was intended.

Mr. LANCASTER: In all matters where the King's revenue is directed to be paid the word 'may' is used. We do not say in any statute regarding the King's revenue that the King 'shall' do anything. In the case of a private individual or of a company, treated as a subject, the word 'shall' would be used.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am pleased to be confirmed in the view I took by my hon. friend from Lincoln. He says just what I have been saying. Has the minister any procedure in his mind by which the money shall be paid out? How are the applicants to satisfy the board that they are entitled to the money?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think it would be beneath the dignity of any minister to bring in a Bill in which the word 'may' is used and then quibble because the word is not 'shall.' I feel that I would not be worthy to occupy the position I hold if I did any such thing. In answer to the other question, here is a list in our office and I suppose also in Moncton, and when this Bill becomes law it will be the duty of the management to see that a cheque is sent to each individual who has been dismissed for political reasons.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I suppose we may take it for granted, as the minister says, that there will be no discrimination, but that every man who has been dismissed for political reasons shall be entitled to a refund. With regard to the amount of money to be refunded the clause reads:

> The board may pay out of the fund the whole or any portion of such employee's contribution to the fund, but without interest.

What is the reason for that wording: 'the whole or any portion' of it?

Mr. COCHRANE: I would not object to that going out; in fact, I would move that 'or any portion' be struck out.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Is the list produced by the minister of those who would be entitled to a refund a final and complete list? If others were found entitled to participate, would they be included?

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not give that as a complete list. I said it had been made out up to that time. If anyone has been dismissed whose name is not included in that list, he certainly will participate.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The case I had in mind was that of this man, John Girouard, section 166, Tracadie. I took the matter up with the officials of the department and also the officials at Moncton last year and they seemed to think that while, on the face of it, this appeared to be voluntary resignation on the part of Girouard, it was in fact, a compulsory retirement or could be construed as that. Under the Act a person who voluntarily resigns is not entitled to participate but one who has been dismissed for political reasons will be when the proposed amendment passes. He was not actually dismissed but he was able to see that he was going to be.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think you are wrong.

Mr. CHISHOLM: And others did go; two out of every three on the sections in the county of Antigonish went. I do not know how it was in other counties and on other portions of the Intercolonial railway, perhaps in these cases there was more magnanimity and bigger men on the patronage committees than are found in control of patronage in Antigonish. As a matter of fact there was a good deal of a scramble about the patronage there; the defeated candidate, a respectable and honourable man, was not allowed to have the patronage and the party in the various districts got together and formed committees who made representations and prepared the victims for decapitation. Even the postmasters in that county went by the score, a thing never before known there. If the minister were satisfied that the man to whom I have referred, although not discharged, resigned under such circumstances as I have indicated would the minister not think he should be permitted to share in the fund?

Mr. COCHRANE: In this case I do not think there is anything in the story that the man was degraded for political reasons. Any complaint about an official which was not in reference to political matters was sent to the management, and they dealt with it. For political complaints I had a special man investigate, and I do not think that the board would degrade a man for political reasons without consulting the department. At every investigation a representative of the sectionmen was present. In fact, in some cases the investigations were repeated in order to have such a representative present to see that the men got fair play. If this case was not political, then it would be a case with which the provident board should deal, not the minister. The provident board have means of getting at the facts, and whatever recommendations they would make would be carried out.

Mr. MACDONALD: The men who have been dismissed have been dismissed as the result of an investigation. Will the minister be good enough to see, if there are any other cases to be dealt with, that the investigator is instructed to permit a man being investigated to be represented by somebody acting in his behalf? Take, for instance the case of a sectionman; the sectionmen work probably at the lowest wage paid to any men on the road and as a rule they are not the kind of men who are accustomed to defend themselves before tribunals. It is a year and a half since the last general election and I am sure that the minister feels that by this time the taste for blood has been assuaged, but if he is going to have any more investigations, I hope he will see that the men who are investigated are given a fair chance.

Mr. COCHRANE: The agreement with the organizations says that the men shall be represented by anyone they appoint. Mr. Low has been at most of the investigations, or somebody whom they authorized to be there. I think that Mr. Low has given proof that so far the investigations have been fair. He has admitted the guilt of the men.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am speaking more particularly of the men who are not in any organization, because those who are in an organization will have somebody to represent them. But, take a sectionman who lives on a piece of the road that is isolated. The organization of the sectionmen does not extend all over the Intercolonial railway. I know in eastern Nova Scotia a great many men who do not belong to it. All I would ask is that, where a man is handicapped by not belonging to an organization, if any charge is made against him, the investigator shall allow him to have somebody to present his case. By reason of these men not belonging to the order there is all the more necessity, from the standpoint of justice and fair-play, why they should have somebody to represent them. The men who belong to the order are accustomed to look after their own rights, while the men who did not belong let things go or take things for granted. I understand the minister to assure me that he will see that this is done?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: With regard to the other matter to which I have called attention, I propose to write to my hon. friend and lay the facts before him. I hope he will deal with it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has just said that he thinks these investigations were fair. I have had men write me complaining very bitterly that they were not fair and some of them appear to be men whose names I see on this list; for example, Mr. Phillip Ryan, who figures on this list for $37.59, and Mr. Alexander McInnis, of Mulgrave, who is down for $53.06. Both of these men complained very bitterly of the character of the investigations under which they were dismissed.

Mr. COCHRANE: What positions did they hold?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Mr. McInnis was car inspector and Mr. Ryan was fuel man. They were both employed at Mulgrave. People who have attended these investigations do not regard them as having been fairly conducted. They are looked upon, to a certain extent, as a farce. I suppose the minister is quite aware that the investigator in eastern Nova Scotia, time and again, refused to allow the person complained against to be represented by counsel. I do not think that any counsel was present in these two cases I am referring to now, but there were other cases in which counsel appeared and was refused the right to ask questions. The commissioner admits that himself in his report. I can produce reports of Commissioner Duchemin in which he says that he did refuse to permit counsel to take part in these investigations. The minister is, of course, aware that under the Investigation Act the person accused is entitled to be represented by counsel.

Mr. COCHRANE: Under the agreement with the employees they are represented by one organization.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister say that the Investigation Act does not apply to the Intercolonial railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: I am speaking of the agreement with the men themselves.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am referring to the Investigation Act under which I understand the investigations have been conducted and, if I am correct, an amendment was made to this Act at the last session of Parliament, under which any person accused, and being investigated under the Act, has the right to be represented by counsel. Am I correct in that?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think you will find, if you look at the Investigation Act, under which these investigations are being carried on, that that point is very clear and if a commissioner refuses to allow counsel to act he is violating the law. Yet this gentleman has done it on various occasions in Nova Scotia. The chapter to which I refer is chapter 28 of the Act of 1912:

The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this Act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

This is as clear as it can be; he shall allow counsel to represent the accused. He does not do it but he admits that he has refused to do it over and over again.

Mr. BORDEN: Since the Act was passed?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, certainly. I trust the minister will put his commissioner right and draw his attention to the fact that there is a statute with regard to that matter. In the case of Alex. McInnis, he is one of the men that complained and, in writing him, I told him it was necessary for him to give me some proof that he had not received fair play.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is he the one who drove around canvassing with you?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No. He never drove around with me. That statement, if made, is not true.

Mr. COCHRANE: Was not that sufficient evidence?

Mr. SINCLAIR: He sends me a declaration in which he states that he was very summarily used in connection with this investigation. I wish to read this to the minister:

Declaration

Dominion of Canada, County of Guysborough.

In the matter of the conduct of H. P. Duchemin at an investigation in the case of Alexander McInnis, held at Mulgrave, February, 1912.

I, Alexander McInnis of Mulgrave, in the county of Guysborough, N.S., do solemnly declare that, at the said investigation, Mr. H. P. Duchemin prevented me from asking questions of Toussaint Beshang who was giving evidence against me, which was false in every particular, and that H. P. Duchemin told me the case was finished and that I could depart. After I had left the room, Allan McAskill a witness against me, told me he was taken back into the room and examined in my absence. He had previously been examined and signed the evidence before I went out.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Alexander McInnis.

Declared before me at Mulgrave in the county of Guysborough, province of Nova Scotia, this 14th day of December, A.D., 1912.

W. S. Wylde,

A Justice of the Peace in and for the county of Guysborough.

The statement is, that a witness named Beshang was being examined and was making statements which McInnis says were false and McInnis asked on his own behalf to be allowed to cross-examine this man and he was refused the right by Mr. Duchemin. A witness named McAskill gave evidence against McInnis and after his evidence was completed and signed and Mr. McInnis had left the room, McAskill was called back and further examined, which everybody will admit was not a proper and fair way of conducting a trial. This is the declaration of McAskill with respect to that:

Declaration:

Dominion of Canada, County of Guysborough.

In the matter of the conduct of H. P. Duchemin, at an investigation in the case of Alexander McInnis, held at Mulgrave, February, 1912.

I, Allan McAskill, of Aulds Cove, in the county of Antigonish, Nova Scotia, do solemnly declare, that I gave a true statement before Mr. H. P. Duchemin, first time called, when Mr. Alex. McInnis was present, after which I was told to go out until I call you again; after a while he called me a second time and that the answers I gave did not suit it appeared and he told me to go out again, after which I was called a third time and he questioned me a few times and threw his pen down and said that will do, go out.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Allan x McAskill.
Mark

Declared before me at Mulgrave, in the county of Guysborough, province of Nova Scotia, this 14th day of December, A.D., 1912.

Wm. S. Wylde,

A Justice of the Peace in and for the county of———

Mr. COCHRANE: Was it McInnis who was accused of driving you around canvassing?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not think so. There was some evidence of that kind against a Mr. Meagher; it was not said that he drove me but that he was in the same carriage with me and it is quite true that he did ride with me in the same carriage for some distance on one of those roads shortly before the election.

Mr. COCHRANE: Was it not his own carriage?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No. As a matter of fact the carriage belonged to Mr. Torey, the local member for the constituency, and he was driving around the Strait of Canso and he had room for two or three and he took this man along and he happened to be met by these people on the road. That was the evidence in regard to Mr. Meagher, but I am referring now to the case of Mr. Alexander McInnis. It appears that Mr. Duchemin refused Mr. McInnis the right to cross-examine the witnessess called against him, and that after Mr. McInnis had left the room Mr.

Duchemin called in witnesses and further examined them in Mr. McInnis' absence. Mr Philip H. Ryan also complains that he was not fairly treated. The principal witness against him was Whitman Byers, who stated that Ryan had canvassed him at the last local election and Mr. Ryan very positively denied that he had ever canvassed this man Byers. The oaths of these two men were directly against each other, and Mr. Duchemin received the statement made by Mr. Byers in preference to the statement made by Mr. Ryan. In the report of Mr. Duchemin to the minister he says:

I reported that I accepted Byers statement in preference to that of Mr. Ryan; that from the conduct of the two witnesses, their demeanor when cross-examined, and their manner of answering questions, I was convinced that reliance was to be placed in Mr. Byers' story, rather than Mr. Ryan's. I have now additional reasons for concluding that Mr. Byers was telling the truth; shortly after this inquiry, Ryan caused an information for perjury to be laid against Byers, and the matter went before the grand jury, at Guysborough, on Tuesday last, October 1. I was present as a witness. The grand jury refused to uphold the indictment against Mr. Byers and found 'no Bill' against him, thus manifestly accepting his statement, in preference to that of Mr. Ryan.

That is true to a certain extent, but Mr. Duchemin does not tell the whole truth. It is true that the grand jury did not find a bill against Mr. Byers, but the evidence against him was so clear that the judge took exception to the conduct of the grand jury. I am told this was looked upon as a political case and while I have no reflections to make on the grand jury I mention that the judge who tried the case, Justice Meagher, took exception to the conduct of the jury in not finding a bill against Mr. Byers and directed the Crown Attorney not to release Byers but to bring the matter up again at the next session of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court will meet in two or three weeks and Mr. Byers will be tried again for the offence. He was not discharged owing to the judge not being satisfied with the conduct of the grand jury. Mr. Duchemin, who reported the fact that the grand jury threw out the bill, does not tell us anything of the subsequent facts at all and from his report one would assume that nothing else had happened after no bill had been found by the grand jury. Mr. Ryan has sent me the following certificate from the clerk of the court at Guysborough, stating what did happen in connection with that trial:

I, Thomas Davis, clerk of the Crown, in and for the county of Guysborough, hereby certify, that at the October sitting of the Supreme Court, 1912, an indictment was preferred against Whitman Byers for perjury. The jury found no bill. A motion was made for the discharge of the said Whitman Byers but the presiding judge refused the motion.

Dated Guysborough, N.S., April 3, 1913.

Thomas Davis,
Clerk of the Crown.

This shows pretty clearly to my mind that Mr. Duchemin is not disposed to give the minister a fair statement of what does take place, because if he were he would have informed the minister that the verdict of the grand jury was not accepted by the judge, and that Mr. Whitman Byers is still held before the court for trial. The minister will see that the allegations which these people make concerning Mr. Duchemin are not at all creditable to him as a commissioner, if it is true he is refusing the right to cross-examine witnesses and that he is examining witnesses in the absence of the accused. Certainly, with regard to the case of Byers, he did not tell the minister the whole truth, and I should think that Mr. Duchemin's conduct ought to be investigated. I think it would be necessary, if we are going to do justice in these cases, to look after Mr. Duchemin.

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I ask the minister if the board itself is in favour of this Bill?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Have any representations been made by the men themselves?

Mr. COCHRANE: There were some individual cases.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did the men object to the Bill?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I have not had any objections.

Mr. GRAHAM: The difficulty, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), is that this may encroach upon the stability of the fund. The number of beneficiaries at the present time may be small. If I understand the Bill rightly, it will apply to any who may be dismissed in the future as well. There might come a deluge of dismissals under this Bill, and every man who was dismissed for partisan purposes—perhaps that is the proper term, though dismissed for partisan reasons would read better—would be entitled to a refund, and the stability of this provident fund would be shattered. Reading the history of the provident fund, I believe it is a difficult matter to arrive at a proper basis. The former Administration, of which the hon. member for Westmorland was a member, provided that an employee on the Intercolonial would be in as good a position as an employee on a company-owned railway, aand if possible a little better. It provided a scheme by which the men were to pay a certain amount and the Government was to supplement that amount. A board was to be formed upon which the men would be represented and the Government also. Both contributors to the fund were thus represented. When any case comes up, it is not so much a matter of the minister as this board that has to be dealt with. Sometimes cases arise which could be worked out by the minister were it not for the statute under which this board is formed. The men are protected from encroachment on their fund by the statute as well as by the board and also by the minister at times. It was pressed upon me very strongly in representation from the men when I was head of the department that any act of this kind opens the door to a change of the basis upon which the men think they have security in this fund. This door has been opened slightly—about $3,000, my hon. friend says. That might be increased to $6,000 or $7,000. In this Bill there is no provision at all where it shall stop. If for some reason or even without reason a large number of dismissals were made, under this Bill the men dismissed could claim the right to have the money which they had paid in refunded. That would have a double effect—in the first place, of taking out of the fund, the money which they had paid in, and, secondly, of depriving the fund of so many contributors. Every man who retires or who is dismissed makes one contributor less to the fund unless he is replaced. I want to warn the minister again that a danger lurks in any measure of this kind, that it may open a door for an encroachment upon this fund which may be detrimental to the contributors, and which may impair the security which they now have. The only way to overcome that should it arise, would be to increase the money paid in by the Government.

There is another question to which I want to call the attention of the minister. We are perhaps more particular, and especially under the provident fund, as to appointments to positions on government railways than company-owned railways are. In company railways, they have some way of looking after, to a certain degree at least, the men who are injured in their employ. On the Grand Trunk, you will find men who have lost their hands in an accident attending the gates and those who have been injured in some small way engaged in some other employment on the railway. If we were to adhere strictly to the law of the Provident Fund Act on the Intercolonial, perhaps we would not be able to look after these men as well as we might. My own view is that the Government ought to look after, as far as possible, men who are injured in its employ by providing them with some other employment that they can perform. This has been done in some instances, but I am afraid in government ownership hearts are not as tender as they are in railways managed by companies. That was impressed upon me when I was looking over the government lines in Germany. The railways of Germany are not owned by the federal authorities, as some people believe, but are owned by the various states, just as if our railways were owned by the various provinces. There is a provision there that the retired soldier, for instance, after long years of service, or perhaps after having been injured, is given employment on the government railways. As I understand it from the management of these railways, so many places are retained every year for old soldiers or for those who are disabled. Of course, we have no reason for going as far as that in this country. I think we ought to protect men who are injured on government railways by giving them some employment in which they can be independent to a certain extent and not feel that they are really receiving charity, because most of these men would rather have some employment at slight remuneration than go on the provident fund.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Mr. Chairman, there is a case to which I should like to refer, namely, the dismissal of one John McDonnell, who was a sectionman at Afton, Antigonish county. He had been in the employment of the Intercolonial railway for about thirteen years or so; at all events he had only a short time to remain in that employment until he would be entiled to participate in this fund, under its retirement provisions. It seems that somebody wanted his job, and that he had to be got out of the way. A charge of partisanship was preferred against him on March 21. The gentleman who had charge of the patronage writes as follows:

> I am writing to recommend the dismissal of John McDonnell and Herbert Myette, sectionmen at Afton and Tracadie, in the county of Antigonish. The specific charges against these men are, that they actively canvassed for the Liberal candidates, were members of and attended Liberal committee meetings in the polling district of Tracadie.

When this charge was preferred first, it was a charge of partisanship only; no misconduct was alleged on the part of Mr. McDonnell. It would appear, however, that after inquiry was had as to the evidence that could be elicited, the parties who sought the job discovered that it might not be so easy to supply the evidence, so they looked around for something else, and what do you suppose they found? They found that on the 28th of January preceding this man McDonnell had been guilty of taking a drink. The circumstances were these: He walked the whole section on Sunday, starting out at twelve o'clock and finishing some time in the afternoon. On his way home and after he was through with his work he met a friend and had some drinks with him. It will be observed that he did not have a drink while on duty. I find on the file the letter of Mr. Burpee, dated April 16, addressed to Mr. Brady, general superintendent:

Dear Sir,—I am herewith enclosing to you a file of papers in connection with John McDonnell, trackman on section No. 166, Afton, being under the influence of liquor after walking the track on Sunday the 28th of January last.

Will you please let me know what had better be done in this case. McDonnell was suspended as soon as the trackmaster found out about the case and he is off still. It would seem as if he had never been in the habit of using liquor while on duty. Possibly it might be better to give him another chance.

That was the effect of the evidence—that Mr. McDonnell had never been known to have used liquor while on duty. Corroborative testimony is that of John Melanson, who made a solemn declaration in which is stated:

I have worked with John McDonnell for the last six or seven years as trackman. I never saw him under the influence of liquor on duty.

The evidence of the foreman, Mr. Alexander McLeod, is as follows:

Q. Did you ever know of John McDonnell being under the influence of liquor before?

A. I never knew of him taking liquor on the work.

Q. Did you consider John McDonnell sober when you took him to his home from Tom Gorman's on the night of the 28th January 1912?

A. He had some liquor in him, I do not know how much.

Here is the evidence of the foreman, Mr. McLeod, and of Mr. McDonnell's associate, who knew him for several years, and they state that they never saw him under the influence of liquor while on duty, never knew him even to drink while on duty. But after hours, after he had got through his work, after he walked the track and found everything right, he happened to take a drink. Surely, that was not a sufficiently serious offence to justify his dismissal.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do all the drinking for the road.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I do not know that the management or even the minister has the right to control the actions of an employee after hours. Of course, the minister is allowed to require of a man that he shall be sober and capable of attending to his duties. If a man drinks even the night before he goes on duty, he may not be in a good condition to go to work. In that case it would be quite right to discipline him, and, if he persists in breaking the rules, to dismiss him. But this man on Sunday evening had taken a few drinks. There was no evidence that he was not capable of attending to his work the next morning just as before. It is evident that the management did not consider this a very serious offence, because it took place on the 28th of January, and, if there had been anything wrong in it, surely they would have found it out before the 21st of March when the charge of partisanship was preferred. If Mr. McDonnell had conducted himself in a way that was improper as section man it would have been found out by the man in charge of the patronage, and he would not have made a charge of partisanship, but would have asked that he be removed for cause. But even on the 21st of March, when they sought to decapitate him, there was no suggestion that he was not competent or that he had not conducted himself properly.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is Mr. John McDonnell the official who the hon. gentleman stated was investigated before Mr. Duchemin for offensive partisanship?

Mr. CHISHOLM: I did not state any such thing.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think that the hon. gentleman stated in the speech he made in the House before Christmas that among the instances of persons investigated by Mr. Duchemin was Mr. John McDonnell, and he was not allowed——

Mr. CHISHOLM: The hon. gentleman had better read what I did say. He is not stating it correctly.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Did not the hon. gentleman make the statement?

Mr. CHISHOLM: I have mentioned Mr. McDonnell's name as one whom Mr. Duchemin had investigated; and Mr. Duchemin got paid for it. Mr. Duchemin went down to investigate, but Mr. McDonnell was not in attendance. Mr. Duchemin reported that the man was dismissed some days before. But Mr. Duchemin was paid just as if a long investigation had been carried on. I gave a list of those who came under the attention of Mr. Duchemin and no doubt Mr. McDonnell's name was among them. But that is not what I am getting at. This man McDonnell had no charge against him so far as his work was concerned, and all the evidence goes to show that while he was in the employ of the road he discharged his duties faithfully. Let me direct your attention further to the fact that on the 27th April, the clergyman of the place addressed Mr. Pottinger the following letter:

I wrote you on Wednesday last in behalf of Mr. McDonnell. He is now going to lay his case before you. I repeat here what I wrote you and that is that I consider the investigation and report which caused the dismissal of Mr. McDonnell to have been exaggerated if not biased and prejudiced. However, Mr. McDonnell can state his case and will abide by your dicision.

Everybody down there knew as a matter of fact that this charge of drinking after hours, a charge based on the occurrences of two months before the charge of partisanship had been preferred against Mr. McDonnell by the man who is in charge of the patronage, was a charge trumped up for the occasion. It is true that Mr. McDonnell did take a drink after hours. But is that any reason why he should be debarred from participating in this fund? He had contributed to the fund——

An hon. MEMBER: Too bad.

Mr. CHISHOLM: An hon. friend says 'too bad.' Mr. McDonnell is a comparatively poor man, and he needs the money that he should get out of this fund. He does not have as much money to blow in as my hon. friend opposite. This money is fairly his, and he ought to receive it. It would be a case of rank injustice to Mr. McDonnell if he should be deprived of this money on the ground that he had taken a few drinks on a certain Sunday evening when he was not on duty. If such a rule as that was enforced generally, I am afraid the minister would find his road tied up; he would not have crews to run his trains or gangs to look after sections. I understand that there must be strict rules with regard to drinking. Where life and property is in the hands of men as in the case of railway employees, the rule making sobriety obligatory is most important. But the management should not have one rule for a man because he happens to be a Grit and exercises his God-given right to vote as he thinks proper, and a different rule for a man who happens to be a Tory. Toryism is the principal qualification of many of those who have been employed in the place of those dismissed, and to-day they are active partisans, and no doubt many of them who have been appointed will take a glass of liquor on occasion,—I do not say they will abuse it in any way; I am not insinuating anything of the kind. I only say that the men who have replaced those who were dismissed are no better in this respect than the others. It is not fair that Mr. McDonnell should be made to suffer for this trivial offence of having taken a drink when off duty. I think the minister should take his case into consideration and be governed by the suggestion of Mr. Burpee that the man be given another trial if it is evident that he had not been in the habit of drinking to excess while on duty.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sorry that I am obliged to call the attention of the minister once more to the question of dismissals, which is germane to the matter now before the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I think I have allowed this discussion to go a little too far. The Bill under consideration provides for the payment of certain funds to men who have been dismissed, but it has nothing to do with the manner of their dismissal.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that his court of inquiry is to-day a very important one. The Inquiries Act was not satisfactory to the present Government. They thought, to their credit, that the man who was charged with a fault of any kind did not have sufficient opportunity of dealing properly with his case. The minister knows that a charge of this character, depriving a man of his employment and striking his name off the payroll of the Intercolonial, involves a quasi criminal offence; if sustained it deprives the accused of certain civil rights, and he is entitled to be in a position to answer the charge as fully and as adequately as possible. The first session my hon. friends opposite were in power they found it necessary and proper to amend the Inquires Act to such an extent as to give the accused a fairer trial and a better opportunity to defend himself than he had before. On March 12, 1912, they passed this Act, of which I shall read only two or three sections:

The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this Act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

He has the unquestionable right of being represented by counsel. The last section reads:

No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him, and he shall have been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel.

In view of that provision of the law, I submit that no report should be acted upon by the minister until it is shown by the investigation that the charges were put in the hands of the party whose conduct is to be investigated, and that a proper inquiry took place. It is not necessary for me to point out to the minister that such was not the manner of conducting investigations in our part of the country. I had thought that the fever for dismissals had passed off, and that in the quiet and peace-loving county of Cape Breton good-will prevailed, but I find that a man by the name of Archibald Macdonald, an excellent railway man, has been dismissed—I do not know why. Another section forman, located a short distance below the Grand Narrows, and an exemplary young man, who has been on the road for fifteen or sixteen years, has been dismissed. I do not know why he was discharged, but he writes me to that effect, and I take it for granted that he was dismissed for political partisanship. I wish to call the attention of the minister to a case that has been before him—that of a namesake, but not a relation of mine, Archibald McKenzie. Some kind of an investigation was held, but Mr. McKenzie was not satisfied with it. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways is quite familiar with the fact that there are two languages in this country. He is quite familiar with the railway men who speak French and with those who speak English, and he would not consider that a charge against a French-speaking employee was properly investigated by a tribunal presided over by a gentleman who did not understand the language of the party accused, and of whose language the accused had no knowledge. This man McKenzie is a Gaelic-speaking gentleman, a Hielander of the Hielands, and comes from that excellent Scotch district of the Grand Narrows where the people still pray and sing and speak in this language. His case, as I say, was investigated by a man who did not know his language, nor could Mr. McKenzie understand his. In secluded sections of the country, they are not accustomed to tribunals of that kind. A man direct from the plough and the scythe who has never been in a court of law, if told there that he is charged with some offence and must defend himself, will be quite helpless. When Mr. McKenzie understood that his case was really tried and that he had not an opportunity of saying a word, which was practically the case, because he did not understand the situation —he was a Gaelic-speaking man who had never been in a court in his life—then, after he had an opportunity of discussing his case with officers of the road higher than himself, he made application for another trial, through the man at the head of the brotherhood; but no such trial was granted. We are only looking for a square deal, and I would urge on the minister to have this case again investigated. Affidavits are on file from McKenzie stating that the charges made against him are absolutely without foundation, and that he wants to be given an opportunity of answering them in a proper way.

Mr. DAVIDSON: All through this session hon. gentlemen opposite representing Nova Scotia constituencies have found a great deal of fault with Commissioner Duchemin because at his investigations he has not allowed parties to be represented by counsel. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that the Act passed last session provides that the commissioners must allow the parties concerned to be represented by counsel. I do not so interpret the wording of the Act, which is as follows:

> The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this Act, and shall allow any person against whom a charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

There are two cases clearly distinguished: the case of an officer whose conduct is being investigated under this Act, and the case of a person charged in the course of such investigation, an absolutely different case. In the first case counsel is permissive, in the second case it is obligatory. Too much importance should not be attached to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite on these cases. In saying this I do not want to be understood as intimating that they would wilfully mislead this House, but I think I can show that they have very grievously misinformed the House in connection with this matter in the past. Early in the session the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm), in a burst of frenzied eloquence, denounced Commissioner Duchemin for unfairness in not allowing certain persons whose conduct had ben complained about to be represented by counsel, and he stated emphatically that in the case of one man, John McDonnell, Mr. Duchemin had refused to allow him to be represented by counsel.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Will the hon. gentleman please give the page on 'Hansard' where I said that? If that is there, I have been misreported.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. gentleman has already admitted it.

Mr. CHISHOLM: John McDonnell was not investigated at all, so how could he be represented by counsel?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Yes, the hon. gentleman said to-day, only a few moments ago, that he might have said that McDonnell was refused counsel.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is putting words in my mouth that I did not use. He is misrepresenting what I said; I did not intimate anything of the kind, and I ask him to quote the words and support his statement.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Will the hon. gentleman state that he did not say in this House that John McDonnell, whose conduct was being investigated before Mr. Duchemin, was denied counsel?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Quote my words to that effect.

Mr DAVIDSON: Any day this session.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I make the statement that I did not say that of John McDonnell, because John McDonnell was not investigated and did not ask that privilege. Other McDonnells down there were refused counsel. Quote the words if you can.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's words, as I have not the 'Hansard' under my hand, but I hope before the end of the session to be able to refresh his memory in that regard, and to make a few observations on the subject. The hon. gentleman from Antigonish, referring to the conduct of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) complaining of these investigations, said that the hon. member for Guysborough was playing the game of politics. He admitted that in this House.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I did not admit that. I rise to a point of order. Perhaps I may have said in a joke to Commissioner Duchemin: Oh, he was playing the part of politics.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I would like the hon. member for Guysborough to express an opinion of the kind of politics that my hon. friend played when he made speeches of this kind. We have heard something from the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) and the hon. member for Guysborough in criticism of the action of the Government in making certain dismissals. Hon. gentlemen arose very gallantly to the defence of their officials in Nova Scotia. These hon. gentlemen have very good reason to rise to the defence of their officials. If it had not been for the work of government officials in North Cape Breton the hon. gentleman who now represents that constituency would not be in this House to-day. The same is true of the hon. member for Guysborough.

Mr. McKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. I would like the hon. gentleman to name anything that any railway official ever did for me in any position whatever, either politically or otherwise, in the county of Cape Breton.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I do not think that is a point of order. I am not going to confine myself absolutely to railway officials. The hon. gentleman will not deny that the fishery officials in his constituency, employed by this Government and appointed on his recommendation, were absolutely and directly responsible for his election in 1908?

Mr. McKENZIE: I absolutely deny it. There is absolutely no justification for the statement of the hon. gentleman and I defy him to produce the slightest scintilla of evidence to substantiate it.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I will give the hon. gentleman all the evidence he cares for before I resume my seat. I said that these hon. gentlemen are here because of the services rendered by government officials. I will say furthermore that hon. gentlemen opposite actually encouraged their officials to work for them and that officials worked in their presence. Let me give you an instance. At the investigation held by Commissioner Duchemin the evidence of Walter Radick was heard and this is the evidence that he gave:

I live at Fort Mill. I am a voter in the Mulgrave district. I am well acquainted with John P. Meagher. Just before the Dominion election, I met him on the Guysborough road, on the highway. He was with J. H. Sinclair, the Liberal candidate for this county. They were driving. John P. Meagher introduced me to Mr. Sinclair. I shook hands with him. Mr. Sinclair asked for my support. After a few seconds this man Meagher asked again, if I would give Sinclair my support, saying that I had boys knocking around, and it was a pity to see them without work. There was no particular job offered. He said if I would give Mr. Sinclair my support the boys would get labour. After leaving me drove off together.

Here is an hon. member of this House, knowing very well that it is illegal for officials of this Government to take an active part in politics, knowing very well that if an official engages in party work he is taking his political life in his hands, who allows an official to engage in corrupt practices in his presence and does not rebuke him. I think that hon. gentleman might well rise to the defence of men whom he has encouraged to resign their positions in the service of the Government and, if these officials are disturbed at the present time, they have not the Conservative party to thank for their dismissal but they have the members for whom they so zealously worked and who expect them to take the risks attendant upon such a course. The hon. member for North Cape Breton stated that his election was not influenced at all by the work of government officials.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was not.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I understand my hon. friend to confirm that statement?

Mr. McKENZIE: I do.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Perhaps my hon. friend will also concur in the statement which I make when I say that one Dr. Rhindress a resident of his constituency, was quarantine officer at North Sydney during the last election and an officer of this Government?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am proud to acknowledge my acquitance with Dr. Rhindress. He was an official of this Government.

Mr. DAVIDSON: We will look into the conduct of Dr. Rhindress. A charge of offensive partisanship was preferred against him and his conduct was investigated. In the report of the investigation the following evidence of John J. Pallen, manager of the Bedford Hotel, appears:

I reside in North Sydney. Am manager of the Belmont Hotel. I remember the elections of 1911. I was proprietor of the Hotel at that time. I had no conversation with Dr. Rhindress during the elections. I received no money from Dr. Rhindress or anyone on his behalf. I got paid in December for liquors and meals supplied during the elections of 1911. N. A. McMillan authorized me to furnish liquors and meals during the elections and Dr. Rhindress paid the bill. It was somewhere in the vicinity of a couple of hundred dollars. He paid me in cash. Some of the persons supplied with meals and liquors were electors.

Who was Mr. McMillan? This man, McMillan, was the law partner of the hon. member for North Cape Breton.

Mr. McKENZIE: Was he a government official?

Mr. DAVIDSON: If he was not a government official it was simply because there were not enough jobs to go around. Every possible job was obtained for my hon. friend's friends in that constituency. But Dr. Rhindress was in a position under the Government and although the hon. member did not go to this hotelkeeper, he did send his partner, or his partner went and engaged this hotelkeeper to distribute liquor and meals.

Mr. McKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. I did say to the hon. member for Annapolis a few years ago that it was impossible for him to approach the truth at the right angle. I say now that there is not the slightest approach to any angle of the truth whatever.

Mr. DAVIDSON: If my hon. friend has any explanation to offer for his surprising conduct I am sure the committee will be glad to hear it. I may say that his conduct is not rehearsed with any degree of pleasure by a member representing a Nova Scotia constituency.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is nothing said on the other side.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Does my hon. friend think that he has nothing to say in regard to this matter?

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not what I said. I do not recognize the party as responsible or worthy of a reply.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I find that the hon. member was at this investigation when this evidence was given. He was counsel. On that occasion I was not present, and yet the hon. gentleman did not have a word to say in palliation. He attempted to cross-examine a little, and I will read his cross-examination:

Cross-examined by Mr. McKenzie:

I never saw any person who was a candidate on the Liberal side bring anyone in for meals or liquor. It was practically all liquor that I supplied. It was given by me sometimes by order and sometimes without order.

And the only palliation the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) offers to-day for this is: I was the candidate, I did not order this liquor, it was merely my law partner and bosom friend who did it and paid for it afterwards. No, he did not go so far as to say who paid.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is very different from the practice of my hon. friend. I understand he does not pay his bills.

Mr. DAVIDSON: That is a very clever remark for the hon. member to make. I did not quite catch it, but I understand he said I did not pay my bills.

Mr. McKENZIE: Election bills.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I want to say that I do not pay election bills incurred for whiskey, because there are no such bills incurred either by me or by anyone else on my behalf. I wish to say further that I do not pay any election expenses of that kind, because there are no election expenses to be paid in my county for improper purposes. I can get elected in the county of Annapolis without the expenditure of money for such purposes.

Mr. McKENZIE: What was your majority at the last election?

Mr. DAVIDSON: My majority at the last election was considerably larger than the majority of the hon. gentleman in the election of 1908. In the election of 1908 my hon. friend was elected by a minority; there is no doubt about it in the world. And he sat in this House afterwards by virtue of the action of the county court judge who threw out an application for a recount. Under these circumstances, I do not think the hon. gentleman has any license to discuss the question of majorities at elections.

Mr. McKENZIE: You will not tell us what your majority was last election?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I have no objection to tell the hon. gentleman what my majority was in the last election; it was thirteen. I venture to say that next election my majority will be 1,300 on account of the good government we have had since the Conservatives came into power and on account of the tactics of the Opposition in this House. If the hon. gentleman thinks my majority was small and that he can procure a larger majority in his constituency, then I will make him a sporting offer: I will resign my seat to-morrow and run an election in Annapolis county if he will undertake to resign his seat for North Cape Breton and run an election in that county. Then we will have an opportunity of comparing majorities.

Mr. McKENZIE: What rules will we adopt?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Catch-as-catch-can.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will it be Macdonald election rules?

Mr. DAVIDSON: We will fight it out on the ordinary rules that govern honest elections, if the hon. gentleman is satisfied with that. Furthermore, I am quite willing that my hon. friend shall pursue the same devices he pursued at the last election, and if he wants to employ liquor sellers to distribute booze throughout his constituency to aid him to get elected he can even do that.

Mr. McKENZIE: I thought my hon. friend was going to be a sport; I thought he would come down to my county and run there; that is the usual way for such a challenge.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I do not know about that; I am not very well acquainted with the electors of Cape Breton North, and, considering the kind of representative they have sent here for the last six or seven years, I am afraid I would not suit them; I flatter myself that I would not be the kind of man they want. However, if my hon. friend would like to come to Annapolis, we will give him a warm reception. Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, I think I have succeeded in showing that the statements made by the hon. member in reference to investigations that take place in Nova Scotia must be taken with a very considerable grain of salt, and I think if the Minister of Railways will rely, as I believe he will, on the report of his officials and not on the unsupported word of hon. gentlemen opposite, he will find that the more satisfactory way of proceeding.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, you have given considerable latitude to the hon. gentleman, and allowed him to indulge in tirades of abuse on hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I call attention to the fact that when I discussed the provisions of this Bill and the Intercolonial railway I found no fault whatever with the Minister of Railways. I said nothing at all except that a gentleman friend of mine who was a Gaelic-speaking man, was examined in a court where he did not understand the evidence, and I asked that he be given a fair opportunity to understand the language used before the tribunal On account of that the hon. gentleman from Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) who represents a majority of thirteen, found it necessary to come back at me with a tirade of abuse to state that I was elected on the votes of some officers of the Marine and Fisheries Department. I am speaking in the presence of the head of that department, and I say the records of the department for the last eight or ten years since I have been a member are on file, and I challenge investigation now by a committee of this House. In the presence of the minister and of the hon. member for Annapolis, I defy him, from the day I came to this House and before I came to this House and down to the present moment, to put his finger on one single act or tittle of evidence that would in any way be dishonourable to me in connection with the Department of Marine and Fisheries or any other department of the Government. I am not immune from slander any more than any person else, and I know it has been said of me in the Tory papers in Victoria county that I appointed too many fishery wardens. That is all they have had to say against me. I challenge them to show that I added one man to the list of wardens. I took the list as I found it and I appointed men to occupy the positions which were created before I became a member of this House.

Mr. CARVELL: Have they reduced any of them since they came to power?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not aware that they reduced the number since they came to power, but they are adding two officers in different parts of the country in other ways. They are professing to be reducing the number but they are appointing others in the place of these removed. I am not now criticising the department in that regard, I am simply standing up for my own reputation. The hon. member for Annapolis has traversed my county several times; he has been all around the county and I defy him or any other man to point to a single weak spot, so far as I am concerned, whether I was supporting the Government or in Opposition. I do not think a man should say anything about his own character or about his own conduct, I do not like it and I am not going to do it, so I simply defy the member for Annapolis to go to my county or to any part of the province of Nova Scotia, or to ransack through the thirteen or fourteen departments of Government, or to inquire from any minister in office to-day or any minister who has ever been in office, and having done all that I defy him to put his finger on the slightest spot on my reputation in connection with the discharge of my public duties since I have become a member of this Parliament. It ill becomes a thirteener to talk about what majority another member of this House had. My hon. friend has travelled all over the province of Nova Scoia from Dan to Beersheba; he was a candidate several times.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Will my hon. friend tell me what majority——

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member even undertakes to say that I was here from 1908 to 1911 by reason of the decision of a county court judge.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hon. gentlemen say, 'Hear, hear.' There are men in this House who are quite familiar with the reputation and standing as a lawyer and as a judge of Sir Charles Townshend, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. They know that he sat in this House supporting the Government of Sir John Macdonald, a good strong Tory. They know that he retired in 1887 to make room for Sir Charles Tupper in this House, and that he was appointed to the bench in Nova Scotia by the Government of Sir John Macdonald, and that he has been for the last twenty-two or twenty-three years a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. The county court judge of whom they speak gave a decision that the investigation could not go on because the papers were irregular, and that they did not take the proper steps. The Election Act provides for an appeal to a judge of the Supreme Court. An appeal was taken from Judge MacGillivray—I have no reason to conceal his name—to the Supreme Court, and the case was tried before Sir Charles Townshend, the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, a Tory of the Tories, who confirmed the decision of Judge MacGillivray and threw out the investigation. The decision of Judge MacGillivray, confirmed by the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, is regarded in all courts from the Atlantic to the Pacific as the law on that point and it has been followed since then in every province.

Mr. CURRIE: How much of a majority had the hon. member at the subsequent election? What was the decision then?

Mr. McKENZIE: That was no decision at all. The decision was that of the returning officer. That majority was, I am not ashamed to state, a majority of seventeen. When I got a fair and square deal at the next election in the county—I am not going into an explanation of the other—the same man ran against me as at the former election, and I had six hundred and fifteen of a majority. If my hon. friends on the other side are anxious for an election in that county, I shall be glad any day to meet the best man they can produce.

At six o'clock House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock, and again went into Committee. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. McKENZIE: At six o'clock I was replying to the hon. member for Annapolis. It is true that hon. gentleman's observation had little or nothing to do with the Bill before the committee, but consisted of personal reflections upon certain gentlemen in the county I have the honour to represent. I do not propose to allow the hon. gentleman to get away with observations of that kind which are absolutely unprovoked, uncalled for and wholly apart from the question. Inadvertently, of course, on the part of the Chairman, hon. gentlemen have been allowed to drift away from the question, but it is only fair that they should be replied to. I should not have had anything to say about the hon. gentleman's observations had they been directed only at myself. I do not attach much importance to what the hon. gentleman may say about me. But when he attacks gentlemen outside this House, gentlemen who have no opportunity of defending themselves, I think it is obligatory upon me to reply to those attacks. The hon. gentleman thought it necessary to bring the name of Dr. Rhindress before the House. Dr. Rhindress is a gentleman of the highest possible standing personally and as a professional man. He is a medical doctor and is carrying on practice in the town of Sydney, a gentleman against whom, either in his personal capacity or as a professional man, nothing derogatory can honestly be said. He is a member of one of the first families of Nova Scotia, a brother of the Prime Minister of the province. That alone, of course, would be nothing, but when he is in every other way respectable, it is a matter of pride that he should be a brother of the Hon. G. H. Murray, Prime Minister of Nova Scotia and one of the first public men of Canada. What is the ground for this attack upon Dr. Rhindress? It turns out that during the last election, a comparatively small bill happened to be run at a hotel in North Sydney—less than a total of $200. After the election was over, and everything settled and done, it appears the cheque of my committee—I do not know who was looking after it—was handed in to the hotel proprietor by Dr. Rhindress. He was the family doctor of the hotelkeeper, and while there, on a professional call, he passed his cheque. That is all the hon. gentleman could say about Dr. Rhindress. He is welcome to it. I defy him to produce the second word as to Dr. Rhindress or any member of his family. There is nothing in this matter to be ashamed of but the hon. gentleman thought he could in some way convey the idea that Dr. Rhindress was guilty of something awful. It was all they had against him, and for that they dismissed him. Let me tell the minister and the hon. member for Annapolis that if they are looking for cases of dismissal in North Sydney, I can tell them of one. I refer to the case of Dr. J. W. McLean. Dr. McLean was connected with the Department of the Interior which formerly was presided over by the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). He was dismissed without an investigation or a single word or charge against him, and for no reason except that they wanted to make room for a party heeler. They could not bring anything against him; he never was a politician or a party man, but he was beheaded without even knowing that a charge had been made against him. That was the kind of treatment that is meted out to professional men by the Government in my town. I had not intended to refer to these matters, I was quietly and respectfully putting my case to the Minister of Railways whom I respect and who deserves the respect I give him; nor do I single him out more than other ministers; but I always endeavoured to put my case to the ministers in a respectful way. But there are people with ground instincts, people who must be digging in the dirt. As I have said, I do not care what the hon. member for Annapolis says about me, but when he attacks others in my constituency it is my duty to reply. The hon. member for Annapolis, who is a lawyer, was trying to put a construction upon this Investigation Act. The hon. gentleman tries to make it appear that sections 12 and 13 of this chapter 28 of the statutes of 1913, do not convey the meaning that in an investigation before commissioners the person against whom a change is made has the right to be represented by counsel. I submit that these sections, particularly when taken together, cannot bear any such interpretation. The Bill was before Parliament last session, and the hon. gentleman ought to know having been a member of Parliament when the Bill was passed, what was the intention of the House in passing it. If this had been law when this Government came into power they might have doubted the construction of it, but it is their own legislation and is new and fresh and we all know what is meant by it. We have only to read these sections to make it clearly understood what is intended:

> The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this Act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

I do not see any possible construction for it but the one given. But if there were any doubt it is wholly cleared up by the last section, No. 13:

> No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him and he shall have been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel.

If there is any doubt about the interpretation of the first section, all doubt is removed by considering the two sections together. I submit, therefore, that an investigation in which no notice is given to the party accused and he has no opportunity of knowing the nature of the charge or of being represented by counsel, is not in conformity with the Act. In the case of Archibald McKenzie these conditions were not complied with, and, for the reasons I have given I trust the minister will see his way clear to give that gentleman an opportunity of once more telling his story to the commissioner. I should not say once more, for he has not already told it, and was unable, under the circumstances, to do so. I was merely asking the minister this question when I stirred up the hornets' nest in which the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) conspicuously figured. It was entirely unprovoked and unlooked for, and I assure the hon. minister that anything that has been said which might appear to be in the nature of fault-finding was not brought about through any intention of mine, nor did I intend my remarks to be so construed.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I do not propose to answer at length the remarks of the hon. gentleman, because I conceive that that would merely be obstructing very important legislation, but there are one or two words which I desire to say in reference to his observations. When the House is in Committee of Supply I think I shall perhaps be in a position, without obstructing unduly the business of this House, to reply at length to the arguments he has made as to the interpretation of the statute, and his reference to the gentleman who, he claims, has been dismissed without a cause. I have had no notice that he intended to bring this matter up; I do not know the facts, but I have no doubt that when the facts are known it will be found that there was just as much reason for dismissing this official as there has been for dismissing other officials the charges against whom have been investigated in the usual manner. I was much interested to learn from the hon. gentleman's remarks that he considered this $200 to be a very moderate figure to pay for whisky for elections. I was also very much surprised to learn that he did not regard it as an act of offensive partisanship that a government official should pay an election bill incurred by the purchase of whisky with which to corrupt the electorate. I must admit that if this is the current opinion existing in his constituency, the political ideals of the people of north Cape Breton differ very widely from those of the members of my constituency. When I referred to this matter, the hon. gentleman rose and said he differed from me in that I did not pay my election bills, implying that he did pay his. We are bound to assume, therefore, that this $200 was actually expended by him—paid out by the hon. member for North Cape Breton. I would remind the hon. gentleman of the motion for which he voted some weeks ago, when the conduct of the hon. Secretary of State was in question, and had the House decided that that was a fit and proper matter to be submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I would think this also might be a case that might very properly be inquired into, with a view to ascertaining the propriety of an hon. member of this House actually paying a bill incurred in the purchase of intoxicating liquor. I rose, Mr. Chairman, merely to accede to a request which was made before dinner by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm), who asked me to quote from 'Hansard' the passage wherein he is reported as having stated that the case of John McDonnell was investigated by Commissioner Duchemin. I made the assertion that the hon. gentleman, wittingly or unwittingly, misinformed the House in respect to this matter; he challenged my statement, and asked me to quote from 'Hansard the passage to which I referred. It is found on page 778 of the unrevised 'Hansard' of December 6, 1912, and is as follows:

> The next section above Tracadie is Afton. There two-thirds of the men were dismissed. They were John McDonnell and J. W. Melanson. The case of McDonnell was investigated in his absence and Melanson's investigation was a farce.

He says very plainly and clearly that the case of John McDonnell was investigated by Commissioner Duchemin, which was in effect the statement I made. On page 772 I find these words:

> I have had an idea I should not be permitted to take part in the investigation, because I had heard of the conduct of Mr. Duchemin and knew of the way he had conducted an investigation at Tracadie. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) asked my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) if he knew of cases where sifficient notice was not given. I can name one case which took place in Aspen, the accused being Mr. John McDonnell. Mr. McDonnell was investigated in his absence by Mr. Duchemin.

My hon. friend will therefore agree that I was perfectly right.

Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr CHISHOLM (Antigonish): The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) said that the case of Mr. McDonnell was investigated, and, if I understood him aright, he intimated that it was one of the cases in which counsel for the accused was not permitted. The facts are that Mr. Duchemin received notice to investigate a charge preferred against Mr. McDonnell. I had not the papers before me on December 6, as they did not come down until January 17. In December, however, I knew that a charge of political partisanship had been preferred against Mr. McDonnell, and that Mr. Duchemin went down to investigate it. I naturally assumed that an investigation was held; to-day I stated that no investigation was held. To explain why I made this statement, I shall quote from the report of Mr. Duchemin himself. I desire to say that, so far as I was concerned, I did not desire to mislead the House in any way, nor did I suggest anything that was untrue. On the contrary, it is my ingenious friend with the pettifogging mental capacities who is endeavouring to misconstrue my remarks in the matter.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think the hon. member has no right to make such a statement in reference to myself.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. member should impute motives.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I am not imputing motives; I am referring to the hon. member's pettifogging mental capacity, and, as to my remarks, I leave it to any hon. member who reads 'Hansard' to come to a conclusion as to whether or not I was amply justified in making them. If, however, the word pettifogging is not parliamentary, I will withdraw it, with the understanding that I sought to express in parliamentary language the idea which I thought I could convey by means of the word I used. On May 10, 1912, Mr. Duchemin made a report, which says:

> I duly notified Mr. John McDonnell, sectionman at Afton, N.S., that I would conduct an inquiry into his case, at the station at Tracadie, at three o'clock on the afternoon of the 3rd instant.
> Mr. McDonnell did not appear and there was no evidence submitted against him. The names of some witnesses were given to me, but I did not go to the expense of enforcing the attendance of these, as I was informed that Mr. McDonnell had been dismissed for drunkenness, and had left the district.

I knew he went there some time in May for the purpose of conducting an investigation, and I took it for granted that he had actually made the inquiry. When I made these remarks on December 6, I stated that he had conducted an investigation in the absence of Mr. McDonnell; when the papers came down I found that no further investigation had been held for the reason that Mr. McDonnell was not present, and Mr. Duchemin was informed that Mr. McDonnell had been dismissed. My hon. friend referred to page 772 of 'Hansard,' and quoted the words:

I can name one case which took place in Aspen, the accused being Mr. John McDonnell. Mr. McDonnell was investigated in his absence by Mr. Duchemin.

Any hon. gentleman reading the remarks I made on that occasion will observe that I was referring to the fact that sufficient notice had not been given. I have authority for that. As a matter of fact, Mr. McDonnell did not get his notice. He was in Moncton seeking redress there, and did not receive the notice until some days after the investigation. My reference at page 772 was not to the investigation, but to the notice; and as for my hon. friend thinking that he had succeeded in putting me in a false light and himself in a better light than before he spoke, I am satisfied to leave that to the judgment of the House—to let 'Hansard' be read to-morrow in the light of the explanation I have made.

Mr. DAVIDSON: My hon. friend—I will be considerate of his feelings sufficiently to say that he does not do it intentionally—has certainly misinterpreted this matter. The point which I was making before dinner was that the minister and the House should not attach too great credence to remarks made by hon. gentlemen in reference to these charges. I particularly stated that I was not saying that hon. gentlemen were wilfully misinforming the House; but I could say absolutely by their previous statements that they had misinformed the House. As an instance I cited the case where the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) had said that this man was investigated improperly by Commissioner Duchemin, when, as a matter of fact, his case was not investigated by Mr. Duchemin, and the hon. member for Antigonish challenged my statements and challenged me to show from 'Hansard' that what I said was correct. He said he had never made any statement that this man had been investigated and he would not admit stating that he was investigated by Mr. Duchemin; that he was investigated by the board of the Intercolonial management. I challenged that statement and said that later on that I would be able to quote him from 'Hansard' on the point, and I have done so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman has referred to Mr. John T. Meagher. I would not think it worth while making any further reference to anything that the hon. gentleman says about myself, as I do not think my reputation will suffer where I am known by anything that this hon. gentleman can say. But he made a reference to a dismissed official named Meagher, who, I understand, is a member of a brotherhood that has asked for his reinstatement; and in order that the statement of my hon. friend may not do Mr. Meagher any injury, I wish to point out that it is not supported by evidence. The only evidence that there is in support of the statement that Meagher canvassed this man Reddick is the statement of Reddick himself, a worthless coloured man at Mulgrave, who for fifty cents could be got to say almost anything you wanted him to say. Against that is the positive statement of Meagher himself, a man known all over Eastern Nova Scotia as a very reliable man, whose word would be taken anywhere, I think just as quickly and more readily than the word of my hon. friend among people who know him. Meagher contradicts the statement that he canvassed Reddick, and as I was present I am able to corroborate what Meagher says. It is not true that Meagher canvassed Reddick or promised any work to his boys if he worked for the Liberal party. These statements are incorrect and if my hon. friend will look over the records he will find that they are disproved. You will see how reckless my hon. friend is when he comes to the House with a discredited statement made by a coloured witness contradicted by two men whose words ought to be as good as his and he says nothing about the contradiction but tries to induce the House to believe that the statements of Reddick are true. I would say that was not a fair way of placing the matter before the House.

My hon. friend is championing his friend Mr. Duchemin, and I do not blame him for that, but when he says that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are not to be relied on or have exaggerated these matters, I submit he has no right to make this statement. The statements which I venture to make to this House I proved by sworn affidavits. I made two statements. One was that this man Duchemin refused a man who was being investigated the right to ask questions or to cross-examine witnesses. The other statement was that he had received evidence and examined witnesses in the absence of the man who was being prosecuted. He finished the case of McInnis and asked him to retire from the room and then called a witness and received his evidence and even took him back the second time in the absence of the accused. I submit that this is not a fair way of running a trial. I do not know what views my hon. friend entertains about a fair trial being conducted but he has the proof, the sworn evidence of these men that this was the way the trial was conducted. I do not blame the minister for it, I think the minister is disposed to be fair, I will give him every credit for a disposition to be fair in regard to these dismissals. I have not a word to say against the minister; my criticism is against his commissioner and against hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for Annapolis, who back up the commissioner when he refuses to give a man under accusation the right to which he is entitled under the law, that is the right to be represented by counsel or to cross-examine witnesses himself if he chooses to do so.

I wish to correct an error I unwittingly made before six o'clock in replying to a question of the Prime Minister whom I would be very sorry to mislead in any way. He asked me if the case of McInnis was tried before the passing of the amendment to the Investigation Act, and I told him I did not think it was. I find it was tried before that date, and I had no right in that case to criticise Mr. Duchemin so severely as in subsequent cases dealt with after the passing of the Act. I do not think that there is another lawyer in the House who will construe the Act as the hon. member for Annapolis construes it. It seems to me to be absolutely clear that it was intended to cover every case where an accusation was made against an official and I feel certain that the Prime Minister looked at it in that way because in the discussion at the time the Act was passed I find that he said:

> I agree that every person who is under investigation should have an opportunity of being represented by counsel and of cross-examining witnesses if he desires it.

I think that the hon. member ought to take the construction put upon the Act by his leader at the time the Act was passed, instead of trying to discover some quibbling method by which he could exonerate his star chamber friend who is carrying on these investigations in Nova Scotia. I made two accusations against Mr. Duchemin and I am not saying a word against him that I cannot prove. I submit to the minister that in future investigations he should see that this commissioner is instructed to give accused people fair play, to allow them to be represented by counsel and not to bring in witnesses to make accusations against men in their absence.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would ask the minister whether the last words of this section, 'but without interest,' are necessary.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think we should pay interest.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no implication that any person is entitled to receive the payment of interest. It is only a case of drafting, but it seems to me there is no question at all that, without these words being there, the Act, as amended at the suggestion of my right hon. friend, would provide for the whole fund being paid to the parties entitled to it.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have amended it, and I do not think the presence of these words will do any harm.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is only a question of legal interpretation. There does not seem to be any necessity for the statute saying that a person is entitled to receive so much money, without saying anything about interest, and then to go on and negative the right to get interest.

Mr. COCHRANE: It says that he shall only receive what has been paid in.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is all he would get. Why put these words in? I want to say one word more. I asked the minister at an earlier period of this discussion to see if Mr. Duchemin is to be engaged in any further investigations—and I hope he will not be—because I assume that all those head-hunters ought to be pretty well satisfied with the efforts of this instrument of the law up to date—

Mr. COCHRANE: You ought to be well versed in regard to head-hunters.

Mr. MACDONALD: Well, I know one when I see him. The minister should call the attention of Mr. Duchemin to the absolute nature of the law as it has stood since 1912. I am surprised at the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson), who claims to be a member of the legal profession, venturing to assert in the House, in view of sections 12 and 13 of the Act passed last year, that it is not the bounden duty of the commissioner to permit counsel where charges are made against any person. The statute says that:

> The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this Act—— —to be represented by counsel. Where you have a general investigation going on in any department with regard to the conduct of any public officer and no charges are made against that person, it is in the discretion of the commissioners whether counsel shall be permitted. But the same section also says that the commissioners—— > —shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

—shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

The moment you have an official against whom any definite allegation is made, upon which he is called to make a defence and an answer, that moment, under the interpretation of the statute, he is absolutely entitled to counsel. With all due deference to my hon. friend from Annapolis, I venture to say that he will find it difficult for any hon. gentleman on this side of the House to attempt to reason along the lines upon which he has undertaken to discuss this matter. If that is the correct view, then the next section of the statute is prohibitive in its character. Section 13 says that:

> No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him.

He must have notice before a report can be made, and he must be allowed a full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel. Anybody who is accustomed to construe statutes knows that the interpretation of this language with reference to a person being heard by counsel is so well defined that there can be no argument about it. It says that a person against whom a charge is made has the right to be represented by counsel. I repeat, that section 13 is prohibitive in its character. Not only is it clear that the person must have counsel but the law has gone so far that it declares that the minister has no right to receive the report unless the person against whom the charge has been made has had an opportunity of having counsel, or has declined to avail himself of that opportunity. If the minister accepted and acted upon a report made by a commissioner where a person had been refused the advantage of counsel, I see no reason, unless it might be that some technical objection might be raised on account of the minister being a minister of the Crown, why an action at law would not lie against him for any wrong that was done as the result of a report being received by him where the full privileges of the law were not allowed to the person charged. That this person who has been engaged in conducting these investigations has insisted upon people being tried without permitting them counsel there can be no manner of doubt. That they have not been permitted the advantage of counsel as provided by this section of the law there can be no manner of doubt. I hope that the minister will see that, in ordinary fairness and common justice, every man, and more particularly those men in his department whose rights in the fund may be affected materially to their disadvantage by an adjudication made where they had not the full opportunity of presenting their defence, will be accorded the rights to which, under the law, they are entitled. That is all I have to say in that connection but I do suggest to the minister that the proper drafting of that section would exclude these last words.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why should interest not be paid? These men have paid their money into the fund and I presume that their money was in the bank, or somewhere, earning interest during those years. When the change of Government took place in 1896 a number of lighthouse-keepers were dismissed, an Act was passed to enable the Government to pay back money which they had paid into the fund and, if I recollect rightly, they were paid interest at the rate of five per cent. I would like to have some reason why these parties should not be paid the interest as well as the principal. It is their money and, if it has earned any interest, it should be paid back to them. There is no good reason why they should not receive the interest as well as the principal.

Mr. COCHRANE: They have had the benefit of the protection of the fund during the time that they have been paying into it and in that way they have received more than interest.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the Prime Minister think that these words are of any value?

Bill reported, and amendments concurred in.

Mr. COCHRANE moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) addressed a question to me, and I suppose that it would be well for me to answer it, so that there may be no question raised about it. Probably the effect would be very much the same if the words were not there, but it is desirable to have it perfectly clear. In reply to some observations made by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), I stated last year, before the Act was passed, that I thought any man who was investigated ought to have the right to be heard by counsel if he so desired. I still think that to be the case, whether any such Act is in force or not. It was my understanding that the commissioners would be so instructed. If they were not so instructed there must have been some inadvertence about it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They were instructed directly the opposite, according to Mr. Duchemin's report, by some of the ministers.

Mr. BORDEN: I have not so understood. I said distinctly in the House more than a year ago that I thought that any man against whom a charge was made ought to be represented by counsel if he desired it. I do not see any reason why he should not be so represented. So far as I am concerned, I shall endeavour to see that that it carried out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

IMPROVEMENT OF HIGHWAYS.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 32, to encourage and assist the Improvement of Highways.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the minister give us some explanation of this?

Mr. COCHRANE: This is the same Bill that was introduced in this House a year ago and that the Senate in its wisdom saw fit to throw out; I think under a misapprehension.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Senate did not throw it out.

Mr. GAUVREAU: They amended it.

Mr. COCHRANE: Well, the Senate practically threw it out; I will not argue that point now. This Bill is introduced with the same intention as that which has actuated the Government in promoting the rural mail delivery service and in introducing the Bill to aid agriculture throughout the Dominion, namely, to make the lot of the farmer and the settler more contented and happy. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition, in his remarks last year, expressed the opinion, that we ought to provide for the upkeep of these highways after they have been constructed, but I fear it is a little soon for us to assume that obligation. In my opinion, the necessity for getting the roads into good shape is much more important than is attending to their upkeep afterwards, which will no doubt be provided for in some other way. It is much easier for a township or a county to maintain a road after it is once properly built than to undertake the original construction. I hope to be able to make arrangements with the different provinces, as to what roads we should undertake to construct, and to agree on specifications covering the construction of these roads. Of course, the same specifications could not apply in all cases, because some highways will need different treatment from others, on account of the nature of the soil, the necessity for drainage, and so on. Once we have agreed with the provinces as to the nature of the road to be constructed, I believe tenders should be advertised for and the contracts let. I should expect that the different provinces, in co-operation with the federal authorities, would see that the money was properly expended and the roads well constructed. I feel that the criticism of this Bill last year was not directed to its merits, but that other considerations were allowed to prevail. So far as I know, only the province of Saskatchewan has criticised this measure. I may say that there is no intention to interfere in the slightest degree with provincial jurisdiction. I believe that the Government of the Dominion and the governments of the provinces can work in harmony on this Bill for the betterment of the condition of the whole people of the Dominion. If in certain quarters they will forget their politics for a little while and this Bill becomes law, it will prove of great benefit not only to the farmers and settlers, but to everybody who has occasion to travel on the highways of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is no point of difference between us as to the merits of this Bill and its usefulness to the general community, provided it is passed on proper lines. But the same difference of opinion which showed itself last year prevails again to-day, and it has reference to the manner in which the appropriation of the money for the different provinces should be made. When the Minister of Railways moved the first reading of the Bill last year, he stated that the intention of the Government was to apply this money on the same basis as the provincial subsidies.

Mr. COCHRANE: What I thought I said was that we would divide the money in that way. I said the money would be divided pro rata between the different provinces.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, but last year the hon. gentleman refused to incorporate that principle in the Bill, just as he does now, and he proposed to keep the distribution of the money within his own discretion. I think my hon. friend will agree that that is not the proper way to do business. I cannot conceive for what reason he refused to incorporate in the Bill the principle which he said would guide him in the distribution of the money. The hon. gentleman has stated to-night that this Bill was killed last year in another branch of the legislature; but that is not what occurred. The Bill was not rejected by the other branch of the legislature; it was simply amended to incorporate in it the principle as to the distribution of the money which the minister himself stated would guide him; but rather than have that included in the Bill the hon. gentleman chose to kill the Bill by not accepting the amendment. If the amendment made by the Senate had been accepted, the hon. gentleman would simply be complying with what he himself said would be his guiding rule; but apparently he wanted to have the distribution of the money left in his own discretion. I do not dispute the good intentions of the Minister of Railways, but he must know that if we have laws it is because we are human and because we cannot trust the good intentions of human beings. It is much better to have a principle incorporated in a law than to leave it merely to be understood. As the Bill is now drafted there is no rule at all in it to guide the Government as to the expenditure of the money, and the minister can expend it in one way or another, just as he pleases. It would be within his power to give to Ontario and to refuse to Quebec, or to refuse to Quebec and to give to Ontario. My hon. friend shakes his head. That would not be his intention.

Mr. COCHRANE: The money would be voted separately in the estimates for the provinces.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As the Bill is, the money might be voted in bulk. What is the object of this Bill if it is not to guide the Government? My hon. friend says that he has no intention—I am sure he has none at the present time—of making any discrimination between province and province. This is not a matter of conjecture. My hon. friend smiled a moment ago when I said he had no intention of discriminating; but he cannot be ignorant of or cannot have forgotten the fact that it was suggested to him by his own followers that he should discriminate, and should apply this money, not equitably among the provinces according to population, but according to what might be his own view of what are the needs of one province as against another. We had last year a prominent member sitting on the other side, who is no more in this Chamber, a man of power and authority and influence in this body, who deliberately suggested to my hon. friend that the Government should distribute that money, not according to the populations of the provinces, but according to what would be in the view of the Government the needs of one province as against another. I shall quote the words to which I refer which were spoken last year by the member for one of the Simcoes, now Mr. Justice Lennox, who deliberately took the view which I have just expressed. His words, which will be found in 'Hansard' of last year, at page 3653, are as follows:

> My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition thinks that this should be an expenditure in proportion to population, and he is so concerned about that that he would give this Bill a black eye in order that he would be able to say that he has brought in something new in connection with this scheme. My right hon. friend the leader of the House (Mr. Borden) has pointed out that already the desire of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has been gratified. But, if there is anything on which I would be disposed to express a regret and a hope at the same time it is that it has been announced that this money, or this initial vote and the inauguration of this system, will be upon the basis of population or some analogous principle. I want to be distinct upon this point. Whilst I congratulate the Government most heartily upon this great advance in the development of Canada—and it is one of the most important steps in the advancement of Canada that has been taken for a long time—yet I would have been a great deal better pleased if this really generous appropriation of money was not to be spent exactly upon that basis. This is a progressive Government and I cannot believe that they will not come to my view some time. I am quite sure that if they believe it is right they will. That is the difference between this side and that. I would be glad if we had been allowed more latitude and probably we will take more latitude later on in this respect in the appropriation of this money and shall say that not the question of population alone shall govern us, but that we shall be guided by the question of the need of the various provinces and localities.
> I believe that in the future in some instances it will be advisable to give even larger than a fair proportion according to population, to some provinces, in order to develop their highways, and for the reason that the more sparse the population the greater the need of assistance is, I trust that in time the principle will be recognized by the Government that the need of localities throughout the Dominion shall be the guiding rule in expenditures on highways from time to time. On behalf of the people whom I have the honour to represent, the farmers of the great riding of North Simcoe, typical of the farmers of Canada, I congratulate the Government most heartily upon this great advance in progressive legislation.

So my hon. friend sees that the views which he holds to-day were not unanimously held on his side of the House. His intention last year was, and this year again is, that this money which is to be voted by Parliament from time to time should be apportioned between the different provinces according to population; but he heard the suggestion of one of his own prominent followers that this should not be the rule, but that the rule should be according to the needs of each section of the country. To-day my hon. friend says that he does not admit that rule, that he sticks to the rule that the money should be divided and allotted according to population. If that be so, why does he not put it in the Bill? He is after all, human like all of us and is liable to temptation like all of us. Somebody may rise immediately behind him, as my hon. friend, the present Mr. Justice Lennox did, who will tell him: You are following a wrong principle, do not allow that money according to population, but consider that the needs of this section are greater than those of that. Under this Bill, what is to prevent my hon. friend from carrying out that suggestion? The principle that is suggested to him is wrong. Why did he not state his intention in the Bill of last year, and why does he not do so in this Bill? My hon. friend has stated that this is a measure calculated to improve the condition of the farmers and that its principle is the same as that of the Agricultural Bill. If that is the principle which he wants to follow, why does he not do as was done in the case of the Bill for aid to agriculture? That Bill was under discussion here a day or two ago. There was no opposition to it on this side of the House. The Bill was allowed to proceed to its second reading without a word of dissension from this side, because its object was stated in the proper way. If my hon. friend followed the example of the Minister of Agriculture, and would do so through and through, there would not be a word of criticism of his measure. The Bill for aid to agriculture provides that a sum of so many million dollars shall be voted, to be distributed over a certain number of years, and there is this clause in it to which I call the attention of my hon. friend:

4. The moneys appropriated for each year shall be apportioned and paid as follows:—
(a) An amount not exceeding twenty thousand dollars shall be paid in each year to assist in the work of veterinary colleges established in the provinces, the said annual amount to be distributed among the colleges qualified and legally authorized to grant degrees in veterinary science in proportion to the number of students enrolled at the said colleges respectively for the previous year and in accordance with such regulations and conditions as may be prescribed by the minister;
(b) The sum of twenty thousand dollars shall be paid in each year to the Government of each province.

That is without regard to population, whether the big province of Ontario or the small province of Prince Edward Island; but then comes subsection (c):

The remainder of the appropriation for such year shall be allotted and paid to the governments of the respective provinces in proportion to the populations of the said provinces respectively as determined by the latest decennial census.

It is the same idea which my hon. friend says is going to guide him. The difference is that in this case we have to rely upon his good-will, whereas in the case of the Agricultural Bill the idea is put in so many words in the Bill, and will become law. In the one case we are left to the discretion of the minister; in the other the appropriation is made by the letter of the law itself, and is to be done according to population. This view taken by the Minister of Agriculture is not at all in consonance with the view taken by the former member for Simcoe, Mr. Lennox; but it is in accordance with what I believe to be fair and just between province and province. My hon. friend does not condemn it; but he must realize that it would be extremely unfair if any other principle than that of population were to be accepted for the distribution of this money. It is true there may be differences of locality, but after all the only basis on which provincial subsidies should be given for the carrying on of civil government in the provinces, their local expenditures and so on, which is fair and equitable, is that of population.

It is thought advisable in this new age that we should assist the provinces in their development of highways. We find no fault with that; on the contrary, we altogether commend the idea. The problem of transportation is becoming more and more acute as civilization advances, and in a new country like Canada highways are of the greatest possible importance to the people. The more highways there are the wealthier the country must be. Therefore we commend the motive that animates my hon. friend; but the only thing I call attention to is this question of distribution. The hon. gentleman, I understand, agrees that this money should be distributed to the provinces according to their population, but he has not agreed that this should form part of the Bill. Last year I suggested this, but I am sorry to say we were not successful in convincing my hon. friend. We shall try again this year, with the hope that we may be more fortunate than before. Let me assure my hon. friend that we do not approach this measure in any captious spirit; we are willing to give the measure our support; but if the principle of distribution is as he himself explains it, there is no reason why it should not be inserted in the Bill. I shall move an amendment, simply to the effect that the same principle should be adopted as that adopted by the Minister of Agriculture in relation to his Bill for the promotion of agricultural education. This amendment is taken word for word from the Bill of the Minister of Agriculture:

That the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be resolved: That this House, whilst recognizing the importance of assisting out of the federal treasury in the matter of highways, is of opinion that all appropriations for that object should be allotted and paid to the governments of the respective provinces in proportion to the population of said provinces respectively, as determined by the latest decennial census.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): One would have supposed that if the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) were really desirous of promoting the passage of a measure by which the highways of this Dominion might be very materially improved in the early future, he would have permitted the second reading of the Bill to pass which would recognize that principle as a good principle, and that he would have waited until the Bill had gone in committee to move any such amendment as he now thinks desirable. My right hon. friend has not taken that course. He has proposed an amendment which would defeat the second reading of the Bill for the time being, and would make it necessary to have the Bill reinstated on the Order Paper for the purpose of having the second reading moved on some other occasion. Whatever may be his intention in the matter—I am not disposed to question his intentions in that regard—certainly that intention would have been fulfilled much better by a different mode of procedure. The right hon. gentleman is taking the same course which he took last year, that of proposing a motion which would prevent, if it should be carried, the second reading of the Bill for the present. Now he advances nothing that was not advanced by him last year, except in one respect. He has adduced the example of the Bill which was presented to the House by the Minister of Agriculture. Surely the right hon. gentleman sees, without my pointing it out, the distinction between the two cases. In the case of the Bill for the aid of agriculture, it is proposed to grant a specific sum of money, $10,000,000, and it was necessary that the Bill should provide how the division of that money should be made between the provinces. Even that Bill does not absolutely provide that the money shall be divided as the subsidies are apportioned to the provinces, because an absolute amount, $20,000 a year, if I remember correctly, is granted to every province in the first instance, in order that the sums given to some of the smaller provinces may not be so diminished as to prevent any real results from the grant. But, in the case of the present Bill, as I pointed out to my right hon. friend last year, there is absolutely no provision whatever for the spending of any sum of money except such sum as may from time to time be voted by Parliament. The Bill of itself does not enable the Government or the Minister of Railways and Canals to expend one single dollar unless that dollar shall have been first voted by Parliament. We pledged ourselves to the right hon. gentleman last year that when the estimates were brought down, it would be found that the money to be voted would be apportioned to the different provinces exactly upon the same basis as the provincial subsidies. So it turned out: the estimates amounted to $1,000,000, I think, for themselves in that regard. So the argument of my right hon. friend fell to the ground. When we bring down an estimate for any sum of money to be expended for the purposes of this Bill, which is only an enabling Bill, every argument that he advances now and that he advanced last year will be open to hon. gentlemen on the other side if we do not carry out the undertaking we made last year. That undertaking, I understand, is in exact consonance with what he proposes this year. So, my right hon. friend is merely beating the air; he is tilting at windmills; he is doing nothing except obstructing the passage of a measure which if it is carried out would seem to be greatly to the advantage of every province in placing at the disposal of the provinces under proper safeguards which will be devised and agreed upon between the several provinces and the federal Government, a sum of money for each province to bring about better communications between farm and factory and between every part of the country and the great transportation lines. I regret that the right hon. gentleman did not see fit to let the second reading of this Bill pass without the same vain and unnecessary discussion which took place on that point last year, because when we once have the Bill in committee it will be possible for the right hon. gentleman to propose any such amendment as would fulfil the contention which he has made. But, as I have said, even when we come to that stage of the Bill, it does not seem to me that the amendment would be necessary, because every point and suggestion the right hon. gentleman has urged will be entirely open to hon. gentlemen on the other side if we bring down estimates which do not divide the money among the provinces of Canada upon the same basis as the subsidies are apportioned to the maritime provinces.

I would have thought that a proposal such as this would have so commended itself to my right hon. friend that he would have foreborne precipitating a discussion of the character which we had last year, especially in view of the fact that, by his experience at that time, he must have realized that his apprehensions then expressed were entirely vain and unnecessary. The people of Canada, considering the conditions of development and the resources of the country, have expended enormous sums of money in providing railway transportation in this great country of ours, embracing nearly half of this continent; but that expenditure has been upon only a portion of the chain of transportation which is necessary to give the farmers and the manufacturers of this country an opportunity of transporting their products to market. It is, of course, an immense advantage to have great lines of railway transportation and great waterway routes in this country; but you need something more than that; you need good roads, by which the farmers can bring to the railway station or the steamship wharf their productions at perhaps one-fourth the cost which devolves upon them to-day under the system of bad roads which prevails throughout nearly the whole of this country. It is for the purpose of endeavouring to assist in meeting this great and pressing want that the Government are submitting to Parliament, as they did last year, a proposal which, seems to me, eminently fair.

We do not by this measure infringe in any way upon provincial rights, because this money will either be spent by the provincial governments themselves, under proper safeguards agreed upon between them and this Government, or it will, under one clause of the Bill—if it is the same as last year, and I think it is—be expended by the Dominion Government, but only with the authority of the provincial legislatures, and with the consent of the provincial executives. The rights of every province in Canada therefore, are absolutely maintained and safeguarded by the provisions of this Bill. With this safeguard of their rights, it is proposed to place at the disposal of the provincial governments, or to spend with the authority and consent of the provincial legislatures and executives, a sum of money in every province of Canada which ought to be, and I believe will be, a very marked assistance indeed in providing those modern lines of transportation which are as necessary and essential as the great lines of railway transportation to which I have alluded. Under the circumstances, and knowing that the people of Canada are thoroughly awakened to the necessity for better roads and for a better system of highways in every province of the Dominion, I can only express my regret that my right hon. friend did not see fit to assent at once to the second reading of this Bill, and to hail with satisfaction, as I think the people of the country will, the proposals of the Government to proceed upon the lines which were laid down last year, and to do something that is real and tangible and immediate for the purpose of establishing a better system of highways in this great country of ours.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Would my right hon. friend the Prime Minister explain how the acceptance of this amendment would in any way interfere with the object which the Government have in view in their Bill?

Mr. BORDEN: It is entirely unnecessary, and it is a vain and unnecessary discussion upon which we are about to embark. My hon. friend will remember that last year we brought down an estimate of, I think, one million dollars, for this purpose. That sum was divided exactly in proportion to the apportionment of subsidies among the different provinces. And so we say this year that this is merely an enabling Act to provide for the supervision by the Minister of Railways and Canals of any moneys that shall hereafter be voted by parliament for this purpose. In that way it differs in a marked and definite manner from the Bill which was cited by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. As the measure stands at present, therefore, coupled with the necessity of bringing down an estimate to this House afterwards, it provides every possible safeguard that could be afforded by any such amendment as the right hon. gentleman proposes.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): When a similar Bill was before the House last year, I did not have an opportunity of addressing the House in support of the objections I took on behalf of the people of my province to the form in which the Bill was then presented to the House. It seems to me a matter of regret that the Government did not learn something from the discussion that took place on this measure during the last session of Parliament. The Prime Minister tells us that the rights of the provinces are absolutely safeguarded by the fact that the money is to be voted by this Parliament, and when the vote is called for we shall be at liberty to give directions as to the expenditure of the money. The Prime Minister did not, to my mind, satisfactorily answer the question asked by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), because, if what the Prime Minister says is true, what possible objection can he have to the incorporation in the measure of the amendment proposed by my right hon. leader? It is not a popular action to oppose the expenditure of public money for such a useful and necessary purpose as the improvement of the highways of this country, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that coming from one of the newer provinces of this country, where the improvement of roads is to the people a consideration of the greatest importance, I hesitate to offer opposition to the Bill now before the House. But, Sir, when I find that the principle involved in this Bill, and the method by which the money is to be expended, constitutes a duplication of the methods proposed in the Bill of last year—which were then found to be and which still are objectionable, not only to the members of the Opposition in this House, but to the great majority of the people of my own province—I find it necessary to offer some objection to the measure now presented for our consideration.

To my mind it is a strange thing that the legislatures of the various provinces are not to be entrusted with the management of their own local affairs. The subsidies that have been granted by this Parliament to the various provinces of Canada since Confederation have been absolutely under the control of the local legislatures, and I think the Prime Minister and Minister of Railways can find no serious objection to the method by which those moneys have been expended in days gone by. Surely the authorities which are in a proper position to deal with the improvement of highways are the local legislatures and executive authorities of the various provinces themselves. While the present measure pretends to allow the local legislatures to retain their authority so far as the expenditure of this increased amount is concerned, I think the terms of the Bill constitute a menace to the rights and authorities of the local legislatures of this country. The Bill provides that the moneys to be voted by this Parliament for the improvement of highways are to be expended under conditions agreed on between the federal government and the executive powers of the various provinces. Supposing that the executive power of any province does not consent to the conditions laid down by the Minister of Railways or by Order in Council of this Government, what is the alternative? The alternative certainly is that the money will not be given to that province. While it appears to be by agreement that this money is to be granted to the various provinces, it actually becomes a matter of compulsion and so far as this feature of the Bill is concerned, while it appears to maintain the rights and authority of the executives of the various provinces, I think it is a menace to these rights and that authority. It would be a most unpopular move for any local government to resist or refuse the acceptance of a sum of money to be devoted to such an excellent purpose as the improvement of our roads and highways, and no government, unless it were an exceedingly strong-minded government, would be in a position to refuse to accept the terms and conditions laid down by the federal authorities. If one province should accept the terms laid down and another province refuse them, then the Government of the province refusing to accept would be in a most unpopular position and it might come about that every province, by the pressure of public opinion, even although the Government of that province had to practically give up their autonomy, their powers of local self-government, might be compelled to accept the conditions of this Government, to accept the money and spend it in the way prescribed by the federal Government. That seems to me to be a very serious objection to this Bill. The amendment as proposed will still permit this Parliament to vote the money, to allot it to the various provinces; but it will permit these provinces to enjoy the same privileges as they have heretofore enjoyed. Does the Minister of Railways actually think he knows more about local conditions than the local governments? Dealing with highways, I understand, has always been recognized as a local matter, and our highways have been hitherto exclusively under the control of the local legislature. It seems to me they should be allowed to continue to have responsibility and authority to deal with these questions. This measure might result in such harm to the right and authorities of local self-government that ultimately the benefit would be offset. This Bill is a double-edged affair; there are two propositions in it. One proposition is to hand over certain sums of money to the various provinces to be expended on terms and conditions agreed on between this Government and the various local governments; but it also provides that this Government, by consent of the local legislature of any province, may itself step in and undertake the work of constructing highways in any province. In my judgment that feature of the Bill is malicious and absolutely objectionable. Why should this Government step in and ask this Parliament to vote money so that they may go into the various provinces and deal with the highways which are under the control and authority of the local legislatures? Why should they ask this Parliament to give them such power as that, or to enter upon these local undertakings, such as building bridges and improving highways, which since Confederation have been under the jurisdiction of the various local legislatures? As I have said, although a local legislature might be absolutely opposed to the federal Government stepping in and undertaking these local works, it might be forced by public opinion to accept a bad principle in order to avoid political annihilation. This Government proposes to step into the various provinces, to go upon the roadways in those provinces and to expend public moneys. Why is that necessary? Why does this Government consider it necessary? Is it that we cannot trust the various local legislatures?

An hon. MEMBER: Maybe.

Mr. NEELY: Maybe? Well, that is not very complimentary to the political party that has, up to the present time, boasted of being the champion of provincial rights in this country. I think that the answer of my hon. friend throws a side light on the question which may give us the true reason why this Government are undertaking to put through this resolution. Personally, I view this proposal with a great deal of suspicion. I would be inclined to think that there will be certain years in which the highways in Canada will receive a great deal more attention than on other occasions although there might be no great alteration of conditions from time to time so far as the state of the highways is concerned. I can quite conceive my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, who represents a constituency in northern Ontario, finding it very greatly to his advantage, on the approach of a general election, to be able to put his hand into the treasury of this country and spend very considerable sums in a part of Ontario which we know does require great things in the matter of the improvement and construction of highways.

But I say that this is one feature of the situation that I consider to be absolutely objectionable. If the Government want the roads improved let them vote this money. The people of Canada pay it. It is obtained by taxation. This Government came into office a little over a year ago and found a splendid surplus in the treasury. If they have more money than they know what to do with and consider that they could spend part of the surplus to advantage in improving the highways, then let them accept the amendment of my hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), let them distribute the money, that they propose to apportion for the improvement of highways, among the various provinces under the terms of this amendment and surely the result they desire to accomplish will be far better accomplished than if the Government, already overworked, already overburdened, undertake the prosecution of this work which can be done so much better by the local authorities. I do not view with any great amount of pleasure the prospect of one of the minister's road gangs planting itself in the heart of my constituency just preceding a general election.

Mr. COCHRANE: No danger.

Mr. NEELY: If the money voted were limited in amount, one would naturally expect that the minister's constituency would receive a great deal more consideration than mine. I think the method of direct contribution would come in there. That this matter is being considered very seriously and is objected to very strongly by some of the local authorities in this country is proven by the fact that at the recent session of the Saskatchewan legislature the question was dealt with by a resolution which passed that House on the 17th December last. At that time this Parliament was in session, or had been in session, in the Speech from the Throne, the re-introduction of this highways measure was forecasted. The legislature, of course, had no knowledge that the Bill would follow the lines of the measure that was introduced in the House of Commons last year, but taking it for granted that the measure would be similar in character, the legislature was moved to pass the following resolution, which I shall take the opportunity of placing on the pages of 'Hansard' as a protest against the passing of this Bill in its present form coming into this Parliament on behalf of the people of Saskatchewan:

Whereas at the last session of the Parliament of Canada a Bill was introduced by the Dominion Government providing for the expenditure by the said Government of certain sums of money in the construction and improvement of highways in the various provinces of Canada;

And whereas it is reported to be the intention of the Dominion Government to introduce similar legislation at the present session of the Parliament of Canada;

And whereas according to the true intent and interpretation of the Canadian constitution the control of highways and of all subjects pertaining to the building and improving of highways within a province are matters of provincial concern;

And whereas as a consequence it would seem that any action taken by the Parliament of Canada assuming to vest the control of such matters in the Government of Canada and to provide for the expenditure thereon of moneys taken from the revenue of Canada, constitutes:

1. An attempt to usurp the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures in a matter of purely provincial concern;

2. An assumption that expenditures should be made upon the construction and improvement of highways in the various provinces in addition to the amounts which the said provinces are in a financial position to make and consequently that the subsidies granted the several provinces under the terms of Confederation are inadequate for the proper carrying on of important works of provincial responsibility;

Therefore, be it resolved that this House deems it to be its duty to direct the attention of the federal and provincial governments of Canada to the constitutional question involved in the contemplated action of the Federal Government with respect to the improvement and construction of highways;

And be it further resolved that in the opinion of this House it is desirable, before any further action is taken by the federal authorities in the direction of providing for highway construction and improvement in the several provinces of Canada, that the governments of the said provinces should be called together in conference with the federal authorities for the following purposes, namely:

(a) The consideration of the constitutional question involved in the said proposed action of the Dominion Government;

(b) The consideration of the advisability of so increasing the annual grants and subsidies payable to the several provinces to enable them to make proper provision for any additional expenditure that may be necessary for highway construction and improvement.

Those are the terms of the resolution passed on the 17th of December of last year by the legislature of Saskatchewan in protest against the passing by this Parliament of legislation dealing with highways similar to that which was brought into this House last year and which the Government refused to place on the statute-book because of certain amendments that had been made thereto by the Senate. I think that position taken by the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan is a perfectly fair one. They say to this Government If you propose to spend money on the roads of our province or of the other provinces, why do you not consult the authorities of the different provinces of Canada? Why have you not called together the premiers and other members of the governments of the various provinces in order that we together may work out some scheme that will be acceptable to the authorities of all the provinces of this Dominion? That seems to be a very fair and reasonable proposal. This Government have taken a good deal on their shoulders in undertaking to interfere in this way with the expenditure of money on highways, hitherto recognized as the right of the provincial authorities, without any consultation whatever with those authorities as to the working out of a scheme under which this money can be expended.

Mr. COCHRANE: We do not propose to spend one cent without the consent of the provinces.

Mr. NEELY: I have already pointed out my objection to the method by which that consent is to be obtained. It is to be obtained individually. If the various premiers of the different provinces had been called together in consultation with this Government and some scheme had been worked out absolutely satisfactory to all the provinces, there could then have been no objection to the granting of money by this Parliament for the purposes mentioned in this Bill. My hon. friend and this Government, however say to the province of Saskatchewan, to the province of Ontario or to the province of Quebec: We propose to grant a certain sum of money to you for the improvement of highways in your province under terms and conditions to be agreed upon between us—but who is dictating these terms and conditions?

Mr. GRAHAM: The man who has the money.

Mr. NEELY: Certainly the man who has the money is the man who will lay down the terms and conditions. As I have already pointed out, there is involved in that an absolute disregard of the right of the provinces to deal with their local questions in their own way, and to expend the money in the way which seems best to them. This Government apparently distrust the local authorities. They do not feel that, if they turn this money over to the various provinces on the basis of population, these provinces can be entrusted with the responsibility of spending it to the best possible advantage. I am not one of those who lack faith in our provincial legislatures. I believe they are quite capable of spending their money to the best possible advantage. I think the Minister of Public Works in the province of Saskatchewan knows a great deal better where money should be spent in that province in the improvement of highways and probably knows just as well as if not better how it should be spent than does the Minister of Railways. I fail to see where any advantage is going to come through the proposal in this Bill that this Government will take to themselves the power to go into the various provinces and to usurp the authority that hitherto has been recognized as belonging to the provinces themselves. It is a matter of satisfaction that the different provinces are to receive the aid. It is a matter of satisfaction that the Government of this country find themselves in this position that they can give aid to the different provinces of Canada for this very worthy purpose. Where is the Government's argument in favour of dealing with this increased subsidy? Why should it not be handed over to the provincial governments in exactly the same way as the other subsidies by which they are able to carry on local civil government? There is no reason whatever why this subsidy should be treated in a different way. Why does the Minister of Railways, if he finds himself with a surplus and if the Government are able to give money for the improvement of highways, not call together the premiers of the different provinces and adjust the question of subsidies with them? The province of British Columbia, for instance, has been raising strong objection from time to time because it considers it is not receiving the aid which it should receive from this Government. Every one of the provinces will be glad to have its subsidy increased. It is the people who pay the taxes who give us the amount of revenue which we have to-day. Let the provincial authorities be called together in consultation with this Government; and, if this Government have decided to increase the subsidies to the provinces, let it be settled on an equitable basis and leave the question, as it has been left hitherto, of the expenditure of these moneys to the local authorities who I am sure can spend and distribute it in a much more satisfactory manner than if it were done by this federal Government. It is on behalf of the people of my province that I strongly object to the form in which this Bill is being presented to the House.

Mr. Speaker, this Government undertook to defend their action in dropping this measure last year by having their newspapers spread broadcast throughout the country the impression that the Senate of Canada had killed the Highways Bill. That was absolute misrepresentation on the part of newspapers supporting this Government, because everybody knows perfectly well that all that the Senate of Canada did to the Highways Bill last year was to insert certain amendments along the lines of the amendment now proposed by my right hon. leader. The Bill was sent back to this House with those amendments and what did the Government do? Rather than accept the principle of these grants being turned over to the provinces to be spent in their own way for the improvement of the highways in the different provinces, this Government absolutely killed the measure which it had brought into this House with such great flourish as being of such great benefit to the people of the Dominion of Canada. It should be definitely understood in this country that the Highways Bill last year was not destroyed by the Senate of Canada, but was destroyed by the Government which brought it into being, because the Senate of Canada, in their effort to protect the rights of minorities and to maintain the authority of the different provincial legislatures, inserted certain amendments. So determined last year was this Government to rob the provinces of the right of local self-government that rather than let go the control and the authority that they proposed to give themselves in this Bill, they killed the Bill which they had introduced into this House. Evidently the Government have not learned from the experience of last year, because they have practically introduced the same Bill. Let them understand that the people of Canada are aware of the intent and motive of this measure, and the electorate will justify the Opposition in this House in fighting, as the Liberal party has always fought, for the right of the provinces to control their local affairs. I support the amendment moved by my right hon. leader, because it carries out the terms of the resolution passed by the Saskatchewan legislature, and because I believe it is an amendment which will result in good to the people. There is no desire on this side of the House to offer captious opposition to this measure. Personally, I wish to see the federal Government increase the allowances to the provinces so that the highways may be improved, but I want to see that done in the right way. I do not want to see the federal Government interfere with the expenditure of the money within the provinces—even, if perhaps under constraint, the provinces should give their consent. I look upon it is a matter purely for the provinces to deal with and in that view I shall support the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): There are certain subjects over which the federal Parliament has jurisdiction, along with the provincial parliaments, amongst others agriculture and railways, and there are certain subjects as to which the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction, amongst others the care of highways. The Bill now before us purports to take under the care of the federal authority a power which has always been considered as being within the provinces. In that respect it is objectionable. On a former occasion in this House I advanced the idea that it would be well if some arrangement could be made between the Dominion and the provinces so that railway legislation should be enacted solely in this Parliament, and I thought that a conference might be held with the provinces toward that end. I cannot say that I altogether like this legislation, because it must be remembered that the money which we give to the provinces ultimately must come out of the people. If we were getting the money from outside of the country altogether, it would be a fine thing of course to devote it to the maintenance of highways, but the money comes from the taxation of the people, and in that aspect those of us who are looking forward to reducing taxation and consequently reducing the cost of living must see our hope deferred. If the Government is convinced that good roads throughout the different provinces are necessary it is within the power of this Parliament to increase the subsidies to the different provinces for that purpose. Although no proposal has yet been made to increase the subsidies to the provinces for the purpose of providing better educational facilities, yet on the principle laid down by this Bill the federal authority might do so. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) read the resolution of the legislature of Saskatchewan, and that resolution suggests that there should be a conference between the Dominion and the provinces for the purpose of dealing with the constitutional aspect of this question and, to consider the advisability of increasing the annual subsidies with a view to providing better highways in the provinces. That seems to be a good suggestion and I would ask the Minister of Railways to give it his best consideration. If such a conference should be held I trust he will endeavour to make an arrangement with the provinces so that they will cease their activity in the passing of railway legislation and leave it to this Parliament to deal exclusively with railways. I would also suggest that the minister should arrange with the provinces, as this Bill does not arrange, that the provincial legislatures should deal solely with the question of roadways. In making these suggestions I may say that it is in my opinion not necessary that the British North America Act should be amended to that end, because all that will be necessary will be to discourage railway legislation in the provincial legislatures. The resolution of the legislature of Saskatchewan gives opens opportunity to this Government which I trust it will avail of.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Although the construction of good roads is not a new question, yet so far as Ontario is concerned good roads are yet in their infancy. We have, as the Prime Minister has said, spent a great deal of money and properly so, to develop railway communications, to construct and maintain canals, and to provide harbours; but we have neglected to a very large extent that initial part in our transportation system, which is the highway leading from the door of the producer to the railway station, or to the wharf, or to the elevator, as the case may be.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Or the local markets.

Mr. GRAHAM: Or to the consumer in the city and the town. This defect in transportation at the initial end means higher cost of living to the man in the city and less profit to the man in the country. If we compare for a year the difference between carrying a load a reasonable distance to market on a good road and having the same load on a bad road, there will be found a very considerable difference in the cost, which somebody must bear. On a good road a team can haul twice as much as it can on a poor road; consequently the farmer can do as much work in one trip on a good road as he can in two on a bad one, and, if his time be worth anything, he can employ the time thus saved in the cultivation of the soil and other profitable pursuits. Then, his team and wagon will last much longer; his horses will not wear out nearly so soon. So, any Act, whether it be of this Parliament, or of a provincial legislature, seeking to improve the condition of the highways so far as the farmer and the consumer are concerned, ought to, and I believe does, meet the approbation of the people generally.

The development of the automobile trade must be considered in dealing with this matter. I do not know how many hon. gentlemen in this House are able to have an automobile; I presume there are comparatively few. We may as well, however, face the situation and admit that locomotion by the various means employed in motor cars and motor trucks in Canada has come to stay; it is an integral part of our business life, and will be more so in future. I might interpolate the remark that I think they will never do away with the horses of which my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) thinks so much. However, the roadways of Canada must be improved unless we are to lose a portion of the benefits we would derive as well by the multiplication of first-class highways as the improvement of our waterways and railway transportation. The province of Ontario, of which I know, perhaps, more than of any other province, took up this question some years ago. Their first act, if I remember correctly, was to appropriate the sum of $1,000,000 to the improvement of highways. I think the Bill was introduced by the late Andrew Pattullo, of Woodstock, who was looked upon as the father of good roads movement in Ontario. They obtained the benefit of the experience of Mr. Campbell, a competent engineer of St. Thomas, who has given a good deal of study to road making, and who is now Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals. It was found necessary, as the scheme developed, and as the counties and municipalities became more fully acquainted with it, to enlarge its scope. I am not prepared at this time to say what the extent of the Act is, but I know it is now much wider in its scope than when it was first introduced. I myself had the honour of suggesting in the legislature that the money devoted for the improvement of highways should be used in certain cases for the purchase of what we call Macadamized roads, and for the abolition of toll roads. In many cases that has been done, and a certain development has taken place, but in the province of Ontario there is much room for improvement in the highways. In the city of Toronto some arrangement has been made between the citizens of that city and the residents of the adjoining communities for the improvement and the development of the highways just outside the city. The improvement of the highway makes the land through or by which that highway goes of that much more value, just the same as the pavement in the city makes more valuable the property which fronts on it. That being the case, I would not for a moment take any course that could be construed into opposition to the granting of money by the Dominion for the improvement of highways in the various provinces. As a matter of fact, a few years ago, before I became a member of this House, I suggested to the Dominion Government that something of this kind ought to be done, but the matter was not taken up. I think it is a good step, although I do not agree with the method by which it is proposed to be carried out, and in a few moments I will point out why I think the Prime Minister does not take the proper view with regard to the details of this Bill.

The Prime Minister suggested that the leader of the Opposition should not have moved an amendment on the second reading of this Bill. I do not agree with him in that view. Bills have certain stages, through which they must pass in this House, which are obviously for the purpose of bringing out all the discussion which the importance of the measure under consideration may justify, and if on the consideration of the principle of this Bill better discussion can be had by the moving of an amendment, it is perfectly within the rights of any hon. member to submit such an amendment. I feel I am in duty bound to oppose at every step the carrying out of the details of this Bill by the Minister of Railways, but to this I will refer in a few moments. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) has referred to the action of the Senate in regard to this Bill last year. The Government practically took the ground that it has taken on the proposed amendment to the rules of the House—that the proposed measure is infallible, and that no objections or amendments must be made or offered, even by the Senate, the Upper Chamber of this Parliament—because the Senate is as much a parliament as the House of Commons is. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that this House should not object to amendments by the Senate; the Senate is there for the purpose of criticising our legislation, and it would be remiss in its duty if it did not suggest any amendments that would make the proposed measure more practical in its working. The Senate proposed an amendment to this Bill, and the Government cannot get away from the responsibility of strangling this measure by saying the Senate threw it out. The Senate did nothing of the kind; it acted on its rights, and according to its best judgment, proposed amendments, but the Government said: 'If we cannot retain in our own hands, in the way we choose, the expenditure of this money in certain cases, we will not let the people of the country have any highways improvement Bill.' If there is any criticism to be offered at all it is in respect of the obstinacy of the Government.

Mr. COCHRANE: They accepted five out of the seven amendments.

Mr. GRAHAM: They accepted five immaterial amendments.

Mr. AIKINS: Does my hon. friend think the Senate does immaterial things?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has heard in the last week that it was not necessary to send back to the committee certain amendments proposed by the Senate because they were immaterial. If a material amendment is made by the Senate to any measure, it must be referred back to the Committee of this House, but if the amendments be not material, it goes through without this proceeding being resorted to; and those amendments, I must say, are as a rule, not material. But did the Government request a conference with the Senate on this measure last year? If I remember rightly, they did not, but they practically refused such a conference. In the past, when the Senate made certain amendments which the House of Commons did not feel like accepting, the constitutional method was for the Senate and the House to appoint committees, and hold a conference. But in this case the Government would not even offer to confer with the Senate on these amendments, but threw out the Bill and endeavoured to place the blame for their own obstinacy upon somebody else.

I believe absolutely that this measure is, to a certain extent, a contravention of the rights of the provinces. The provinces own the roads, or the municipalities own them, and the provinces legislate concerning them. If we undertake to construct and maintain these roads—there is a clause in this Bill for maintenance as well—we shall continually infringe upon the rights of the different provinces as established ever since Confederation. We can disguise it in words in this Bill in any way we choose, but the fact still remains. Let me point out to my hon. friend what the consent of the provinces means, if he wishes to act in a political sense—and he would wish so to act, I know, if he had the opportunity. In a certain constituency, let us say the constituency of my hon. friend from Red Deer, the Minister of Railways and Canals proposes to do something in road building which the provincial Government does not want done. The whole political situation would revolve around this question. The Minister of Railways, or his representative in Red Deer, would say to the people: We wanted to build this road for you, we wanted to make a magnificent road for you; but the Grits would not let us. Consequently he would have that political club, and it would not cost him a cent, because he could take the money off to Nipissing instead of to Red Deer, and use it there. My hon. friend may say that I am drawing on my imagination for this case. Not at all. No man knows better than I do what would happen under this Bill. What did happen a year ago? This Bill was not on the Order Paper one hour till men were rushed into South Renfrew into the campaign which was going on; rigs were hired and men were sent throughout the length and breadth of that riding to its uttermost corners. Men here and there were told: The Dominion Government, instead of the provincial Government, is going to build roads in South Renfrew; we are going to have control. Men were told, in instance after instance: Vote against Graham and you will have $500 to spend on your roads; get out and hustle with your team to beat Graham and you will have $200 to spend. This was, as I say, before the Bill came to Parliament at all. So I am perfectly justified in saying that I will oppose at every stage of this Bill the retention in it of the provision that the Minister of Railways shall carry out the details, because I was the victim of that carrying out about a year ago. It was used for political purposes to the full limit; and if ever corrupt practices existed in promises of work in any county, those were corrupt practices in the promises of expenditure of money under the very Act which is now under consideration. I am not at all surprised that the minister wants to keep these things in his own hands; they would be a great political factor. In Nipissing and Northern Ontario, where he exerts the greatest influence, he had for many years a great deal to say about the construction of colonization roads. They were not in his own department; but, being the minister from that section, he knows what it means in a campaign to be able to tell people where money is to be expended for roads; and I have no hesitation in saying, from my experience in South Renfrew, that this Act would be worked to its fullest limit whenever an election came on in a part of the country where roads were expected to be built.

Another strong reason why the Minister of Railways will not be willing to do as the Minister of Agriculture has done, and allow this money to be divided among the provinces according to population, is that it will enable him to make an arrangement with his staff in his department that he cannot well make unless he gets this road Bill through and is able to have a road department. I am opposed to this Bill in that respect, because, as I have said, I know that it is a powerful political weapon, and that it has been used, and I have every reason to believe it would be used on every occasion when politics demanded it. This money is to be expended for the benefit of the provinces. Whether a provincial government is Grit or Tory, the roads are under its jurisdiction and the municipal laws under its control. If there is to be an amendment to the Municipal Act, we do not make it; if there is to be an amendment to the Highways Act, we do not make it. Those things are under provincial and municipal control, and the people of the provinces, whether Grit or Tory, have confidence in their provincial legislatures; and if we are going to assist the provinces we ought to hand over the money pro rata according to population, and leave the men on the ground, who know more of the circumstances than we can, to deal with the matter in detail.

In reference to the Bill for the assistance of agriculture, I believe that the money ought to be voted by Parliament year by year, as is proposed by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals with regard to the money provided for in this Bill. Neither this Government nor any other ought to have money to spend without telling us where they are going to spend every dollar of it. We did not have details last year, and I think I am right in saying that the money voted to the province of Ontario, every dollar of it, could have been spent in three or four constituencies and not a cent in the rest of the province. That is not expenditure controlled by this Parliament; it is giving carte blanche to the minister to do what he pleases with the money; and my experience does not lead me to approve of that course.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I am surprised to hear the hon. member for South Renfrew use such strong language in condemnation of this Bill. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman the need of just such legislation as this. He tells us that this Government is taking away from the provincial governments the power to distribute this money. But if he will read section 4, he will find that it is as follows:

> Any highway for which aid is granted to a province shall be improved or constructed, as the case may be, according to descriptions, conditions and specifications approved by the Governor in Council on the report of the minister, and specified in each case in an agreement between the minister and the Government of the province.

Then, section 6 provides that it is necessary for the minister to obtain from the province the right to build a highway. It is as follows:

> The minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council and upon such terms and conditions as are prescribed by Order in Council, may undertake the construction of any new highway or the improvement of any existing highway in any province, and may expend in such improvement or construction the whole or any part of the sums voted by Parliament for such subsidy to that province: Provided, however, that the minister shall first obtain the necessary authority from the legislature of such province and the consent of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

It is there stated as plainly as it possibly can be that the minister cannot take action without the consent of the provincial government, and that it is impossible for him to go into a province and build a road wherever he likes merely to suit himself. He is compelled to have the consent of the provincial legislature before he can go into a province. So, when the hon. gentleman says that this is a political Bill, and that he is going to oppose it at every stage, he is taking action against one of the most popular measures ever brought before this Parliament, and he ought to know it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say I would oppose the Bill at every stage. I said I would oppose the detail of having it carried out by the Minister of Railways.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I took down the words of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM: You did not take down those words.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: The hon. gentleman said he would oppose it at every stage. He talked about the obstinacy of the Government. But why should they, having made full investigation into the circumstances, and considered this measure and brought it down, being convinced that it is right, accept at the hands of the leader of the Opposition such an amendment as he has proposed. The hon. gentleman says that the Senate is perfectly right, and that we should have accepted their amendment. But why should we be compelled to accept an amendment made by the Senate? I am sure that the hon. member for South Renfrew fully realizes that the Bill now before the House is for the best interests of the people, and one of the most popular measures that this Government has brought forward. The hon. gentleman says that we are taking away the rights of the provinces. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) says that we should increase the annual grant. The hon. member for Humboldt quoted a resolution passed by the Legislature of Saskatchewan in which they not only call attention to the Highways Bill but emphatically state that they wish the grant to the province increased. If it is merely the increasing of the grant to the provinces that we are expected to do by this Bill all we need to do would be simply to increase the subsidy. But the Government are perfectly right and justified in their position in stating that they intend to keep some control over this money and compel the provinces to spend it in a wise and judicious manner. And why not? Are we here simply to vote money to the provinces and allow them to spend it as they will? We do that as far as subsidies are concerned, but this goes away beyond the subsidies. This matter should be kept under control by the Dominion Government.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am sure that every hon. member in this House who has thought carefully on this question and is anxious to see federal assistance to roads put upon a proper basis, hoped that when the Government came to deal with the question this year they would present to this House a Bill in such a form that it would be constitutional in all respects, and at the same time provide a system which would be mutually satisfactory to gentlemen on both sides of this House. It is a matter of disappointment that when the measure was brought down to the House we found the Government standing by the measure which they introduced last year, failing to change it in any particular. They came before the House and asked us practically to break down the lines on which the powers were allotted to the provinces and the federal Government of this Dominion some forty-six years ago by the agreement of the various provinces then forming the Dominion. They came with a measure which was hastily prepared, ill considered and to whose ultimate consequences no thought had been given. My hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Armstrong) spoke with enthusiasm about this measure and undertook to answer some criticisms made by hon. gentlemen on this side, saying that this Government had thought out this matter with the greatest possible care and deliberation and had come down with a well prepared scheme. But this Bill is practically the Bill which the Government submitted to the House last year, the Bill which was amended by another body and sent back to this House where the Government refused to accept the terms and suggestions made by the other body. What was the Bill of last year? Was it a wise and well-considered measure in which the full rights of every province had been regarded, in which the Government were contemplating the working out of a scheme whereby we would have secured some substantial improvements in the roads of this country? On the contrary, the Minister of Railways last year, when he introduced that measure, announced to the House that the Bill he was then introducing was prepared very hastily and that for the time being they proposed to work it out by Order in Council and that after a while, they were going to give us a better measure. That is sufficient perhaps to prove the point I was making as to the absolute crudeness of the proposition which the Government now place before the House. Let us see what the Prime Minister said last year upon this measure which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) has eulogized as a perfect system which was well thought out. The Prime Minister said:

> I do not claim that this Bill is a perfect Bill. It has been prepared in the hurry of a session by a Government which had to meet Parliament within five weeks after it assumed office and the Minister of Railways, who introduced the measure, stated that it was introduced as the best method of dealing with this matter that could be devised by the Government in the short time at their disposal for its consideration. It is very likely that in the next or in the following session a more elaborate measure will be introduced, but it is considered desirable by the Government that no time should be lost in implementing the promise made in the last election.

The discussion last year was not characterized by acrimony or party spirit. Hon. gentlemen on both sides will remember that the question was discussed from the standpoint of how we could best lay down the lines on which this Government could help the provincial governments. We considered that forty years ago the fathers of Confederation had agreed that certain exclusive rights and powers should be given to the different provinces, certain privileges and certain duties which they and they alone should be empowered to execute and carry into effect. We considered also that by the terms of Confederation there were given to the federal Parliament certain other exclusive rights and privileges which the federal Parliament and authorities could alone exercise. One of the rights and privileges which were exclusively given to the provincial legislatures was the right to deal with the maintenance, the improvement and the construction of the highways. When hon. gentlemen come along and proceed to appropriate and take away, by an Act of Parliament passed here in this body which has nothing to do with roads and has no right to interfere with them, the right to deal with a matter which is exclusively within the purview of the provincial legislatures, hon. gentlemen see that this Parliament is trenching upon subjects of legislation which they should not touch except after the most careful consideration of all the details. The fact that they had done so with a measure prepared as the Prime Minister said in the hurry of a session called a few weeks after a federal election and that they have come down again this session with the measure without any material change, unthought of, unconsidered, shows that the Government have not approached the consideration of this important question with the deliberation which should have characterized it. The question is whether this Parliament has a right, and what right, if any, to deal with this question of roads. I said a moment ago that they had no right. I reiterate that statement. For what reason was it provided at the time of Confederation that the federal authorities which possessed the taxing power to a wider and greater degree than was permitted to the provincial legislatures, should grant every year by way of subsity to the provinces certain amounts of money? The only reason was to enable the provincial governments which had limited powers of taxation to carry out those duties imposed on them under the terms of Confederation. Now when the federal Parliament are able to say: We are in a better financial position than we were in 1867, we can to-day deal with problems with a more liberal hand, what is the duty of this Parliament in dealing with this matter? The manifest duty of this Parliament is to do what the Minister of Railways said it was his intention to do when he introduced this measure—supplement the subsidies to the provinces, pay to them a greater amount of money based upon the same principle as that upon which the subsidies are paid, so that the provincial parliaments will be able within themselves to better work out the authority and the rights which were imposed upon them at Confederation.

Mr. JAMESON: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to take the ground that it is not competent for this Parliament to make a grant for the specific purpose contemplated by this Bill?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has not apprehended what I have been saying. I have rather indicated that the only power that this Parliament had to deal with the question was to make a grant. It could earmark it and say that it was for this particular purpose, just the same as, when the subsidies were set down in the statute at the time of Confederation, each was to a certain extent ear-marked for a particular purpose and Parliament settled the basis upon which these amounts were to be paid. Included in the powers granted to the provinces was the sole and exclusive right to deal with roads, and when this Parliament comes to deal with the question it should deal with it along the lines of making a grant to the provinces based upon the system upon which the subsidies are given, ear-marking the payment, as it is done in the preliminary clause of this Bill, for the purpose of improving roads. That is the position we take; that is what the amendment of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition means. The proposal of the minister is not a sound one and it does not deal in the way in which this Parliament ought to deal with the question of the relations between the federal Government and the provinces.

This Government last year added to the province of Manitoba a large amount of territory. Why did this Government give to the provincial Government of Manitoba an increased sum of money based upon the demands that would be made upon them on account of this new territory?—simply and solely for the reason that there would be imposed upon the provincial government the rights and duties which are specified in this section 92 of the British North America Act, and for the reason that there were to be expenditures to be made for the building of roads and for all the purposes of a local nature within that territory. Now the principle is to obtain to-day under clause 6 of the Bill by which the minister wants to keep a string on this measure as he may have a control over the expenditure. Why did the minister last year consent to an absolute payment to the province of Manitoba for the purpose of governing the unorganized territory? Why did he not have a string to that Bill and provide that this money, which was on the face of it to go to the province for certain definite purposes, should not be paid to them, that the Minister of Finance would only allow the spending of that money in that province if he saw fit and that he could make an agreement with the Government of Manitoba for that purpose? If that clause had been put in the Manitoba Act it would have been exactly verbatim, in terms and in effect, the clause for which the Minister of Railways is so tenacious.

When, last year, this Government decided to give the province of Prince Edward Island $100,000 in addition to the subsidies that they had paid them in previous years, why did not the Minister of Railways go to the Minister of Finance and say: My dear colleague, you should put a clause in this Bill by which this extra $100,000 should be expended by the federal Government because it might be that we could spend it a great deal better than they could; we ought to provide that, if they are willing for us to do so, that extra $100,000 should be expended by us in Prince Edward Island. Why did not the Minister of Railways do that? If he had done so he would have been logical. If these hon. gentlemen had come to Parliament last year in regard to these matters on that basis my hon. friend would not be in the peculiar position which he is in to-night for, in bringing this measure a second time before the House, he would have agreed to legislation giving supplementary votes to the provinces entirely on the basis that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition insists is the proper one.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, a few days ago, appointed a commission to go into the claims of the province of British Columbia for an increased grant for the purpose of building roads in that great province and for the purpose of carrying on all the works of a local and private nature which, under the terms of the British North America Act, could only be carried on by the provincial government. That is why Premier McBride has asked this Government to give this money. What did my right hon. friend appoint this commission for? It is a strangely composed commission, let me say, and I trust that the House will consider that on some other occasion. But, the Government have appointed this commission with the view of arranging the conditions under which this Government are to give the province of British Columbia a larger supplementary grant for the purpose of carrying on those works which legally and properly come under the jurisdiction of the province. If my hon. friend is going to carry out the terms, as laid down by the commission, because I assume that they will report that some money be paid—that is what they are appointed for—will my hon. friend want to put a clause into the Bill to provide that the Minister if Finance in the Dominion knows better how to spend that supplementary vote in British Columbia than Premier McBride? Would he insert a clause in that Subsidy Act which will say that the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Governor in Council, and on such terms and conditions as are described, by Order in Council, may undertake the expenditure of this amount of money and may expend, on such improvements or construction, the whole or any part of the sums voted for such subsidy to the province? My hon. friend will not dare to make any such proposal yet, if he did so he would be carrying out the absurd and ridiculous policy that he is attempting to impress upon the country by the clause that he is inserting in this measure. Hence it is that I say that the Government, by their insistence of that clause, are proposing a wholly unwarranted and unconstitutional provision, one that is entirely at variance with the whole system of government since Confederation and one which trenches upon the rights which should exclusively belong to provincial legislatures and which have been maintained during all the years since Confederation.

I have not heard any hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House venture to deal with this question in that light. My right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, says: Oh, that is the proper way, and we are going to fix it when we come to vote the money; but we do not want to put it in the Bill. This is the proper method of carrying legislation of this kind into effect. Supposing that, when the British North America Act was before the Imperial Parliament forty-six years ago, the Prime Minister of Great Britain had said, in regard to the clause which was inserted to protect the rights of minorities in this country: Oh, we will not put that in the Bill, but I want to assure the House that, whenever the question comes up, the Imperial Parliament will be found ready to deal with it in the proper way. What would the minority in this country say to such a silly proposal? While the Premier admits everything that is said on this side of the House, while I venture to say he would not dare to question the suggestions that have been made with regard to what is the proper constitutional practice, he evades the issue in the good old fashioned way by saying: We can provide for it when the votes come down; last year, although we had this clause in the Bill by which we could take every cent of this money if we wanted to, we showed evidence of our good faith when the estimates came down by allocating the amounts to the different provinces. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, with all deference to the Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite, prefer that if you are going to deal with an important question like this you should deal with it upon the basis upon which it should be dealt with in this or any other British Parliament, and that is by putting in the statute the things you are going to do and leaving out of the statute the things you are not going to do. Either the Prime Minister means that this money is to be spent by the different provinces in accordance with his suggestion that he will bring down an estimate for that purpose, or he means that while he is going to bring down the estimate this little clause will be called into effect at the proper time by the genial Minister of Railways and what is voted for New Brunswick, or Quebec, or Saskatchewan, will be suddenly collected together and put into Ontario, for example, or Manitoba. The clause says:

The minister with the approval of the Governor in Council———

And so on.

Which means that the Minister of Railways goes to council and presents an order to his colleagues, and his colleagues agree to it, and then this is what he can do: He may undertake the construction of any new highway or the improvement of any existing highway in any province and may expend in such improvement or construction the whole or any part of the subsidy voted by Parliament for such purpose to that province If the minister does not want to expend any money in any one of the provinces he need not do so.

Mr. REID (Minister of Customs): Do you mean to say he could take the total amount voted to the provinces and put it all in one province?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes; the Minister of Customs has not appreciated the shrewdness of his colleague the Minister of Railways; that is the little nigger on the fence.

Mr. COCHRANE: In the estimates the money for each province will be voted separately.

Mr. MACDONALD: Now, would it not be much better to let this Bill go through unanimously and instead of asking us to wait until the estimates come down, to adopt the suggestion which we have offered and which the minister says he intends to carry out?

Mr. COCHRANE: You will have a voice in it when we vote the estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD: But the Government is contemplating a new system of rules which will prevent anybody on this side of the House having much of a voice in anything. I have some faith in the Minister of Railways and I hope there is nothing in the rumour that he may go elsewhere, but I do not want to see this power left in the hands of a Minister of Railways in whom I would not have so much confidence. Legislation should not rest on the whim of a minister. This Parliament should respect the rights of the provinces and legislate accordingly. For forty-six years the provinces have been dealing with their highways, and now the Minister of Railways proposes to do away with that system by this clause in his Bill. The peculiar thing is that while we urge this very simple thing, and while the other branch of the legislature amended the Bill last year so as to recognize the constitutional rights of the provinces, the Government appears determined to filch these rights away. Why is it that the Government preferred that their measure should be lost last year rather than that they should accept an amendment which was in accordance with the constitution and in the best interests of the country? The Minister of Railways should be candid with the House.

Mr. COCHRANE: I always am.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then, if he is always candid will he tell me why he sticks to this clause in the Bill when, by adopting the reasonable suggestion we make, he could remove all points of difference between us?

Mr. COCHRANE: Because I feel that the Government ought to be responsible for the expenditure of any money that this House votes.

Mr. GERMAN: Parliament will be responsible for it, and not the Government.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then my hon. friend tells us that, after all, this Government is going to be responsible for the expenditure of all this money, and not the provinces.

Mr. REID (Minister of Customs): They are responsible for the expenditure.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is nothing in this theory of giving money to the provincial authorities. The minister wants the money voted under this Bill to be placed in his own hands; he wants to be responsible for it, and therefore he keeps this clause in the Bill.

Mr. COCHRANE: I stated that in my first remarks.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend did not state that in his first remarks this year.

Mr. COCHRANE: This night.

Mr. MACDONALD: Let us see what he said last year. He has the same Bill this year as he had last year, without any change. My hon. friend tells us candidly that he keeps clause 6 in the Bill because he wants to be responsible, and his Government wants to be responsible, for the expenditure. That is not what he told us when he came here last year with the Bill. This is what he said:

The Bill is, perhaps, a little meagre, but this is because it has been impossible to decide in detail just what is the best way of carrying out the plan proposed. So we propose doing it largely by Order in Council until we get more definite information. The money will be decided the same as our subsidies for the different provinces, and the object will be to work in with the different local governments. We shall have to get their permission in any case before going on, either with them or alone, and in deciding what roads shall be improved or where the work is to be done.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: May I ask my hon. friend to tell us upon what principle or basis is the division to be made amongst the provinces?

Mr. Cochrane: Either with what they choose to grant, or if they do not like to grant anything at all, we will go on with their consent, to fix a standard of roads to be constructed, and then the Dominion can go on either with or without the assistance of the provinces. But they would be taken into consideration and it would be arranged what routes should be followed in construction or what roads should be improved. I hope the provinces will join and will contribute; but there is nothing in the Bill to force them to do so.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Is there no proportion as between the provinces, on the basis of population or anything else?

Mr. Cochrane: That lies largely with the provincial governments. I hope they will contribute. But, so far, we have not been able to take it up with them and ascertain on what basis they would like to carry it out.

Mr. Maclean (Halifax): Are the expenditures contemplated to be made out of revenue or out of capital account?

Mr. Cochrane: Out of revenue, I should think. Did I understand the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to ask how the money would be divided among the several provinces?

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I was asking the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) to tell us if there is any basis of allotment as among the provinces. The provinical subsidies are based on population; is this based on population?

Mr. Cochrane: Yes, I explained that it was to be on the same basis as that upon which the subsidies are granted to the provinces.

That is the position which my hon. friend took when he introduced the measure.

Mr. COCHRANE: I said then that the money voted for each province would be made up in that way. That is what I intended and that is what I understood the leader of the Opposition to ask, that the arrangement for each province would be made up on the same basis as a subsidy. I was not referring to how the money would be expended.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will my hon. friend put that in the Bill?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have put it to the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is the trouble

Mr. COCHRANE: You misunderstood me. I understood that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition wanted to know how we intended to make up the amount to be spent in each province. We were not going to hand it over to the provincial Government. I had no intention of that kind then any more than I have now.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think, rightly interpreted, my hon. friend's position in regard to the matter is this, that in computing the amount of money to be spent in each province, my hon. friend would make up the computation in the same way as the subsidy allowance, but when it comes to the expenditures he would control that.

Mr. COCHRANE: That was a matter of agreement with the provinces.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend will strike out clause 6 of the Bill, he will be all right. While that is his view, he wants to keep clause 6 in the Bill in order to keep a string on the expenditure, and practically to take away from the provinces a right they have enjoyed since Confederation. This is the issue between the two sides of the House on this question. My hon. friends come along with a proposition to assist in the improvement of the roads of this country. They introduce a Bill under which they provide for the expenditure of certain sums of money to be voted in the future. They go on with the different clauses of the Bill and provide for the Minister of Railways making agreements with the different provincial governments in regard to the expenditure of this money in those provinces within certain limits. They sail along with delightful consideration for provincial rights through various clauses of the Bill down to clause 5. When they come to clause 6, what do they do? They turn over their apple cart; they discard all the theory contained in the previous clauses of the Bill, and the Minister of Railways arrogates to himself the whole right to deal with the expenditure of this money in any province of the Dominion, if he wants to do so. On this side of the House, we say that my hon. friend is not dealing with the question fairly. We say that the proper method of dealing with a matter which was exclusively committed to the control of the provincial legislatures is by a supplementary grant of money, if money is the means by which that can be done. We say clause 6 of the Bill is unconstitutional, improper, ought not to be in the Bill, and that no minister of the Crown in a federal parliament has a right to ask this Parliament to give to him the exclusive right to determine as to the expenditure of money in any one province where the improvement of roads is to be carried on My hon.

friend says: Of course, you must have the consent of the legislature of the province. He will not complain if we on this side of the House are rather disposed to fancy that an occasion might arise in which he might, for instance, expend this money more particularly in the provinces which are in sympathy with him politically. My hon. friend has old memories of the province of Ontario and my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has referred to his knowledge as to his expenditure on conciliation roads in northern Ontario. I should not be surprised if he was inclined to favour that particular part of the country; he would be only human, but he might not want to go out into the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and expend money in those provinces. more particularly as in the last year they have intimated to my hon. friend and his friends that they do not care very much about them. My hon. friend might discriminate also if his colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) came along and said: We want to build roads in Manitoba; it is true that they had an increased subsidy last year for the purpose away in advance of what was given to other provinces. My hon. friend would naturally be disposed to do more for his friends in the province of Manitoba than he would for Sir Lomer Gouin in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it not contrary to the principle of interpretation that fraud should be presumed before instead of after?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am sorry my hon. friend from Peterborough has suggested something which so far never came into my mind. I have never suggested that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways would spend the money fraudulently. I have suggested, however, that he might spend it where it might do him the most good politically, which is an entirely different proposition. Hon. gentlemen behind my hon. friend know that is what it means. That is what they are expecting from this Bill. They are not expecting that this Government is going to grant to the provinces of this Dominion that have Liberal governments the expenditure of a fair basis of money which under this Bill ought to come to them. That is so, and that is why my hon. friend has clause 6 in the Bill. He knows and everybody in this House knows, and there is no use in anybody playing the hypocrite on the question or in pretending that is not so. Clause 6 is in the Bill in order that my hon. friend may do that. Those of us on this side of the House who consider this matter carefully believe that my hon. friend was right, and that his leader was right last year when they said that it was a very crude measure. It is absolutely unimproved. All the evil it had at first it still has and all the good is quite as much suppressed as last year. Who is there who does not want to see good roads in this country? But the people whose business it is to make good roads are the provincial governments. But if, out of the plentitude of an overflowing treasury, we wish to assist the provincial authorities in this respect, there is a plain and simple way to do it and that is the method proposed by hon. gentlemen on this side; that is the constitutional method, the right method. Hon. gentlemen opposite declined to accept it and that is the issue between the parties on this question.

Mr. FOSTER (Kings): Suppose the money had been voted, what would happen if the local government, say of Saskatchewan or Nova Scotia, refused to confer with the Dominion Government and to accept the money?

Mr. MACDONALD: That question was dealt with by my hon. friend from Humboldt in dealing with another phase of the matter. He pointed out that the Government which would fail to comply with any reasonable terms of an agreement that might be suggested would have to assume the political responsibility of that refusal.

Mr. J. H. RAINVILLE (Chambly-Verchères): Two gentlemen on the other side have given me good reasons why the Bill should stay as it is; one is the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and the other is the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). These hon. gentlemen complain of political interference and cite cases in their own ridings of political interference through this question of good roads. This is the very reason why these hon. gentlemen should favour the Bill as it is, for it means that Parliament should have the power to control this matter and prevent abuses. We have instances which should convince us on this side that the Bill should be left unchanged in order to prevent political interference by our opponents. I desire to quote a letter sent from the county of L'Islet to the hon. member for that constituency (Mr. Paquet) telling him in what way the grant for agriculture has been used by the Hon. Joseph Edward Caron, Minister of Agriculture:

14th January, 1913.
St-Roch des Aulnaies,
County of L'Islet, P.Q.

Dr. Paquet, M.P. for L'Islet.

My Dear Sir,—We, electors and residents in the parish of St-Roch des Aulnaies, county L'Islet, hereby certify that we attended the meeting and heard the speech delivered by Hon. Joseph Edouard Caron, actually Minister of Agriculture in the Quebec Government, on the 24th September last. In the said speech, Mr. Caron praised the magnitude of his attributions, the quantity of his gifts and favours for the benefit of the electors and residents of St-Roch des Aulnaies, Ste-Louise and other parishes in the neighbourhood and for the profit of the Agricultural Society and generally of the agricultural people. We hereby certify again that he managed his speech in order to make the electors believe that all the money that had been voted for agricultural purpose was firstly due to the generosity of the Quebec Government, and specially to the good initiative, the kind help and the large confidence granted to him, instead to Dr. Paquet, our member, by Hon. Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture in Ottawa. So that, Sir, we firmly protest against that unjust speech which is of a nature to hurt your influence and your popularity in L'Islet county, for the benefit of the Liberal party. We also beg to recommend you to send that request to the Minister of Agriculture, Hon. Martin Burrell, so that he will notice the case and use his influence to ask Mr. Borden that, for the future, the amount of money voted for agricultural purpose in L'Islet county, by the Conservative Government of Ottawa, should be given to Dr. Paquet, our member, with the charge of distributing that money justly and fairly among all the electors, which money had been given, up to the present, among a little bunch of friends by Hon. Caron. We trust, according to the great interest paid to agricultural matters by the present minister, Hon. Martin Burrell, that our request will be taken in consideration and granted, if possible.

We are, Mr. the minister and Mr. the member,

Yours very truly,

(Signed):

Alfred Tremblay,

This document illustrates the reason why the hon. member for Pictou and the hon. member for South Renfrew should agree with us to keep this business in our own hands, and when we vote money to be prepared to direct the expenditure of it by discussion on the floor of this House. Some of these hon. gentlemen have spoken as though this money were to be employed in building a road between Ste. Angèle and St. Cesaire, I do not think that is the intention of the Bill. I have here a copy of the French version. I do not know that the translation is accurate but the word highway is quoted as 'grandes routes.' That is a main road, virtually an interprovincial road. According to the French version this would mean such a road as between Montreal and Toronto, between Toronto and Midland, between Montreal and Levis, or from Lévis to New Brunswick, thence passing through Pictou to Halifax. Suppose this amendment in favour of granting these sums according to population were carried, and there was a proposition to build a road from Montreal to Toronto; everybody knows that four-fifths of that road would be in Ontario and one-fifth in Quebec. But the road would be just as useful to the people of Quebec as to the people of Ontario. In the case of a road between great centres, that which is to be considered is not so much the population of the provinces in which the road is made as the accommodation that is given to the people. Or take a more extended case. At present, in order to reach our western provinces by automobile or carriage, you must pass through the United States, for there is no road on the Canadian side. Would it be just in building a road, say from Midland or Owen Sound to Winnipeg, to base the grant made to Ontario and to Manitoba on the population of the several provinces? The province of Manitoba would have only a few miles to construct, and Ontario would receive a grant which would absorb the money expended for this purpose for five years to come. Certainly I would not object if an enterprise was undertaken which would make it possible to construct that highway uniting the east and the west. It has been pointed out by some hon. gentlemen that the Government of Canada, under this Bill, want to take upon themselves the authority of the provinces, and they say, we should trust the provinces. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) would not trust Ontario; the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) would not trust his own constituents. My hon. friends will say, why do we not trust the provinces; I say, why do hon. gentlemen not trust us?

Mr. BUREAU: Will you trust this side of the House?

Mr. RAINVILLE: Certainly. Hon. gentlemen say we have no business to make roads. Why not? We can make military roads without asking the provinces. Post office mail contracts have been cancelled because of the fact that the roads have been too bad to allow the work to be done, it is obvious that it would save the Post Office Department a considerable amount of money if the roads were improved. Three or four years ago some of my good friends in Quebec were requesting that break-waters be constructed along the shores. And why? The trade of Canada has been growing to such an extent that the tonnage of the boats and steamers are increasing to an enormous extent, the shores of all our navigable rivers are being washed away and our provincial roads are going into the rivers. If hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would go to the county of Verchères and Berthier and L'Assomption, and along the Richelieu, they would find that some of the roads that last year were in good condition are being destroyed by the action of the water. Much of this money, if it were voted, could be used and supplied, applied at St. Hilaire and Belœil—which is a beautiful place—and all along the St. Lawrence river, wherever it is needed, and, indeed, there are many places where it is badly needed. The money would be well spent and the provincial Government would be glad to see it used in that way. At Belœil a road has been built at great cost, and if something is not done for its protection on the shore, the road within a few years will be in the river. For that reason and for many others I say we should keep control of the money we are voting under this Bill. The provincial governments should be consulted and their opinions obtained, and for the money we are voting a contract will be entered into by the Minister of Railways and the provincial governments. After all, this is only a temporary measure; it is not an increase of the general subsidies. If it were decided to vote $15,000,000 extended over a period of ten years, would it not be worth while doing so for the purpose of meeting the wishes of the people in regard to the construction of the road between Montreal and Toronto, Montreal and Halifax, and Toronto and Winnipeg? Last year the Government of the province of Quebec undertook to construct what is known as the King Edward road, from Rouses' Point to Montreal. That road is to be sixteen feet wide, but if the Government had last year been able to contribute one-third the cost of that road, and make it twenty-four feet instead of sixteen feet, would it not be so much the better for the interests of all concerned, and of much greater benefit to the people? This is the kind of subscription the Bill has in view, to make a road a bigger, wider and better road.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Who is going to keep it up?

Mr. RAINVILLE: We do not need to keep it up. Ten years of good policy would be sufficient to build large roads all over the country. Of course, the provinces will get along during that time; they will benefit from the subscriptions, and after ten years they may need a little less money and will be able to look after the roads themselves.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) thought he was making a big point in finding in the 'Hansard' of last year that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said that the Bill was not a perfect Bill. It may be so, but it is always open to amendment. I asked myself in what way or shape the amendment would make the Bill more perfect. Only as to the amount that would go to each province, but if this amendment is not in the Bill I would ask what would prevent any member of the Opposition or any member on this side of the House from saying that this money was not being voted according to population or on a proper basis. Nothing would prevent that.

Mr. MACDONALD: The gag.

Mr. RAINVILLE: Whether that amendment is or is not in the Bill, the Bill will not suffer; it will not be any more perfect with or without it. The hon. member for Pictou said: Would you have the minister of Finance go to British Columbia and show them how to build roads? This is not the question at all. We do not intend showing the provinces how to build roads, but each province has a different way of building roads and a different organization and policy for securing good roads. For instance, some provinces encourage the borrowing of money by municipalities, and other provinces subscribe one-half or two-thirds of the cost of roads. How are you going to manage with our own organization? If in Quebec the policy of Mr. Gouin is to allow the municipalities money at three or four per cent and they pay this during forty years and then there is no more debt,——

Mr. ROBB: Two per cent, is it not?

Mr. RAINVILLE: The Government pay two per cent and the municipalities pay two. How are we going to subscribe to these roads if the municipalities borrow money? Will we pay the provincial government, and the provincial government lend the money to the municipalities? It is not possible. We could subscribe to a road in this way. We could come to an understanding and agreement with the province saying: You have a road from such a place to such a place to build. We will pay one-quarter or one-third of it as long as you show your plans, and in what way it is going to be built, and as long as you build it of such a width and in such a way. Then we will be able to subscribe to any extent. But another province may have another scheme, perhaps they are paying one-half and the municipalities one-half. We can go to the provincial government and subscribe to a road. But I think it is better, as all the provinces have not the same way of organizing their road policy, that we should keep control of the money we are voting or subscribing to particular roads between the provinces, between cities or large centres and make large wide roads which will be to the benefit of all farmers in their vicinity. It will be to the benefit of any farmer in the vicinity of those roads, it will be to the benefit of any municipality which will be able to build small roads and to connect with the large roads, and it will be a benefit to the people at large who travel more and more through our country.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): In the province of Ontario we are particularly interested in the construction of good roads, more especially in that section of the province from which I come. Several years ago the Liberal Government of Ontario under Sir Oliver Mowat—the same policy being continued under the late Mr. Hardy and more thoroughly under the present Sir George Ross—introduced a system of donations by the provincial government to aid municipalities in the construction of good roads. The present Government of Ontario, under Sir James Whitney, have carried that principle along with the result that we have now constructed in the province of Ontario a large system of good roads by aid of government subventions to the municipalities. That is a matter particularly within the purview of the provincial legislature under the British North America Act. While an appropriation by the Parliament of Canada in aid of good roads is, I presume, constitutional, as the Parliament of Canada can vote money as they see fit, it is not entirely the idea, perhaps, if I might use the word, of the Parliament of Canada. The Parliament of Canada deals with general public affairs but it may, if it choose, vote money in aid of good roads or in aid of the province in assisting good roads, and with that in view, I am in perfect accord with this Bill and will support the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals in any suggestion to Parliament that Parliament should vote money in aid of the construction of good roads in the various provinces of the Dominion, but, Sir, that aid must be given to the province and not be controlled by the Government of Canada, excepting under full control of the Parliament of Canada. I have heard a lot said throughout the country with reference to the Bill proposed by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. I am free to admit that it is somewhat misunderstood. Speaking for myself and, I believe for the Liberals of Canada, let me say that we will assist the minister in appropriating any sufficient sums of money that may be thought necessary and desirable for the construction of new roads but we will not place in the hands of the Government the power to spend as much money as they like, in any place they like and at any time they like, without receiving the sanction of Parliament. That is what the Bill proposes. The third clause of the Bill says that:

The Governor in Council may, in any year, and upon such terms and subject to such conditions as are prescribed by Order in Council, grant to any province in aid of the improvement of existing highways or bridges, or the construction of new highways or bridges, in such province, or for all or any such purposes, a subsidy not exceeding such sum as may in such year be voted by Parliament for that purpose.

That expresses no amount but supposing that this Bill is passed, and the Government ask Parliament to appropriate, in aid of roads in the province of Alberta, a million dollars. In Alberta they have just had an election. The Government persuade their supporters that a million dollars should be voted. What becomes of it? The Minister of Railways can spend that million dollars in the province of Alberta to suit himself without any man in this House, or in the province of Alberta, having a word to say about it.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): Suppose they hand it to the province, how will they spend it?

Mr. GERMAN: They do not hand it to the province.

Mr. SHARPE: Supposing they do.

Mr. GERMAN: If this Bill provided that a certain amount of money should be handed over to each of the provinces I would vote for it.

Mr. SHARPE: If there was an election pending and they handed it over to the province what would they do with it?

Mr. GERMAN: One could imagine what the hon. Minister of Public Works, knowing as he does how to win elections, would do with it. I do not know that I would even trust myself. I do not think that such a power should be placed in the hands of a government. The principle which was followed in this country forty years ago is introduced into this Bill and that is that the Government is taking control of public money and Parliament has nothing to say about it. The people will not stand for that and if we have to fight that question over again we will fight it. Hon. gentlemen opposite probably do not understand that particular phase of the situation. What does the last clause say:

The minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council and upon such terms and conditions as are prescribed by order in council, may undertake the construction of any new highway or the improvement of any existing highway in any province, and may expend in such improvement or construction the whole or any part of the sums voted by Parliament for such subsidy to the province.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Read on.

Provided, however, that the minister shall first obtain the necessary authority from the legislature of such province and the consent of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Mr. GERMAN: Supposing the hon. Minister of Railways had $3,000,000 to be expended in the province of Ontario, would anyone imagine for a minute that he could not get the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Ontario, advised by Sir James Whitney, to the spending of that money at any time he saw fit? It would be expended in such localities as would help hon. gentlemen opposite to carry elections. I do not suggest that hon. gentlemen opposite would do anything worse than we would do on this side of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GERMAN: I am not suggesting that for a minute but I say that no such power should be given to any government. The Liberals of Canada fought against that principle for years, we have to have the whole fight over again and intend to fight it in this next general election when hon. gentlemen opposite will be turned out of power on that very issue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GERMAN: Hon. gentlemen smile at that but they do not appreciate the situation. The people of Canada will not place in the hands of any government millions of dollars to be expended by the Governor in Council. Parliament must have control. Parliament has had control for years and Parliament will continue to have control. The people of Canada will maintain that proposition.

There is very little more to be said in reference to this Bill. You are violating the first principles of responsible government when you say that you are to place in the hands of a minister of the Crown authority to spend millions of dollars in any province even in aid of good roads. We are prepared to spend money in aid of good roads; I certainly am. I will assist the hon. Minister of Railways and vote with him in appropriating money in aid of good roads, year by year, to be handed over to the provinces under the British North America Act. The provinces, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Pictou, are the proper authorities to spend that money. I will aid in voting the money to establish good roads in the provinces but I will never agree to hand over, even to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, a very honest and upright gentleman though he is, the full authority to expend millions of dollars in building good roads which he may be tempted to spend for political purposes in a close election.

On motion of Mr. Carvell, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 22, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

H. M. C. S. NIOBE DISMISSALS.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am informed that on Thursday Commander Macdonald of the Niobe called his men aft and announced to them that, notwithstanding the fact that their time had not expired, they were free to accept their discharge immediately; in other words, he discharged the Canadians who were enlisted on the Niobe. In regard to this important step I think we should have some information from the hon. Minister of Naval Affairs, and I would ask him if he would be good enough to tell us what instructions were given to Commander Macdonald, and, if he has any documents upon the subject, to bring them down.

Mr. HAZEN: I will get the information for my hon. friend and give it to him tomorrow.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the statement correct?

Mr. HAZEN: I am not prepared to say.

PRINCE ALBERT HOMESTEAD ENTRY.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to remind my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works that during the discussion on Thursday in regard to the Donaldson homestead, I asked him to give me such information as would identify the file from which he was reading in regard to the operations of Messrs. Leach and Douglas, so that I might be enabled to move for a return of those papers to be placed before the House. My hon. friend has not yet given me this information, and I would ask him if he would do so as soon as possible.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad to do so, but I understand that the letters from which I read were placed on the table of the House yesterday; if there is anything else my hon. friend wants, I shall be glad to supply it.

Mr. OLIVER: It was understood when the discussion was in progress that these letters would be brought down, and this has been done. I then asked from my hon. friend such information as would identify the files from which these papers were taken, so that, as I have said, I might move for a return. My hon. friend told me he would get that information, but he has not yet done so.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad to supply the information.

Mr. CARROLL: I would ask the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crothers) if he has given any consideration to the telegram from the Photo-Engravers' Union of Toronto which I placed in his hands, and if he intends to take any action with reference to the matter therein referred to?

Mr. CROTHERS: I received the telegram from my hon. friend, and I have given it some consideration. I do not propose to pass any Order in Council under section 38 referred to by my hon. friend.

UNION LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance in regard to the Union Life Assurance Company of Toronto. Statements have been published by the Monetary Times and by other financial papers in the province of Ontario to the effect that this company is not in good financial condition. Have any steps been taken by the department to investigate the financial condition of the company?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I understand that the matter to which my hon. friend refers has been made the subject of a question by him now standing upon the Order Paper. It may be sufficient for me to say that the matter to which he alludes has been brought to the attention of the department, and has been under consideration by it. I do not see that it would be in the public interest that I should make any further statement in this regard.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Borden, to amend rule 17 of the House of Commons, and the proposed motion of Mr. Hazen, that this question be now put, resumed from April 16.

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to take up many minutes of the time of the House, but I feel that I would not be doing my duty to myself or to my constituents if I did not oppose, in the most forcible manner possible, the resolution that has been brought down. I do not deny that the rules of the House as they stand are capable of being improved, but there is a time and a place for everything and a wrong way and a right way of doing everything; and in characteristic manner this Government has chosen the wrong way and the wrong time to amend these rules. Possibly, Sir, this is not surprising when we consider the course the Government has pursued in other matters. The Prime Minister, in introducing this resolution on the 9th of April, stated that from time to time in the past the rules of this House had been amended, but he did not tell us how these rules had been amended in former times. And why? Because he intended to amend them in a new manner, to make a new departure. On former occasions when it has been found advisable to amend the rules, a special committee has been appointed for that purpose, a committee of which Mr. Speaker has been a member, and they have revised the rules and then reported their findings to the whole House in committee, thereby enabling the House to discuss the changes and to offer amendments to them. But how is it proposed to amend the rules in this case? The Prime Minister has assumed that all the wisdom and all the knowledge are on his side of the House. He has introduced a resolution changing our rules in a most drastic manner and has introduced it in such a way that no amendment from either side of the House and no suggestions may be made; even you, Mr. Speaker, who have to interpret these rules are precluded from giving your advice.

On the 1st of July next this country will have been governed under confederation for forty-six years. There have been occasions when the Government of the day has found itself unable to pass measures which it had brought down. In all, I think, there have been five occasions when the Government of the day found itself unable to pass a measure. What has been done when a government found itself in that position? If the Government had any faith in its policy it dissolved the House and went before the people; if it had no faith in its policy like the present Government, it withdrew its Bill or else accepted an amendment suggested by the Opposition. In all these years this has been found a satisfactory way of governing the country. What do we find to-day? We find a government which was weak when it was formed, which has been growing weaker ever since, a coalition government, between whose members there has always been dissension and dissension on the very point to enforce which this Government is bringing down the closure, that measure on which the Government is staking its life, a measure for the naval defence of the Empire. This Government, knowing that it is opposed in this policy by the Nationalist wing of its party, has the temerity to come before this House and country and say that it has a mandate from the people to bring down this measure. Does it not know that its Nationalist wing was elected to oppose this very policy? I would ask them where is their mandate from the people? I have said that there is a time and a place for everything. I say that the time to make a change in the rules of this House is not in the midst of a debate which has aroused party passion to a high degree and not in order to pass a certain measure which it has been found impossible to pass by any other means. The proper time to amend these rules is at the beginning of a session and by a special committee appointed by this House with you, Sir, as a member, so that the proposed amendments may receive the unbiased and the quiet consideration of members of both sides of the House. The hon. gentleman's reason for the bringing down of this resolution has been in order to pass the Naval Aid Bill, but the occasion has been seized to take away from the representatives of the people their right to withhold Supply until they have ventilated any grievances which they may have against the Government of the day. In earlier days the attempt to force through Supply without the consent of the people led to revolution. To show the length to which this Government is willing to go in order to pass this policy of theirs, we have only to go back to the 9th of this month when the Prime Minister introduced this resolution, when he and his followers not only refused the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the right to move an amendment or to offer any suggestion for the improvement of these rules, but went out of their way to offer him a personal affront. If this resolution is pasesd as it stands, the rights of the minority or of any minority, in this country, will be in grave danger. Once these rules are passed it will be an easy matter for any government in the future to take advantage of the closure to enable them to pass any other rules or amendments to suit their own wishes. It is giving a tremendous power to any government, Mr. Speaker, a power which it is dangerous for any government to have, even the present Government. Possibly some day, not very far distant, the Liberals will be in power, and it must surely make hon. gentlemen on the other side tremble to think of the perils with a Liberal Government in power with these rules in force. In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, I call upon the Prime Minister to withdraw this resolution before it is too late. This thing commenced with the comparatively unimportant question of how $35,000,000 should be expended for the naval defence of the Empire, but it has grown to the far more important and grave question of the loss of free speech in Parliament. If this Government's desire to aid the Empire is greater than their desire to remain in office, they will withdraw this resolution, drop the Naval Bill, and go on with the business of the country. If in the future they are able to evolve a permanent policy, they will bring it down and go to the people. There is just one thing, Mr. Speaker, with which I can agree with the right hon. the Prime Minister, and that is that there is a danger, an emergency, but I differ with him from there on. The danger is in this resolution. I consider that if these rules are passed, a death blow will be struck at the future of the British Empire. I wonder, Sir, if in drafting this resolution the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries remembered a certain night in London last July when they attended a banquet of the London Chamber of Commerce. At that banquet was present their esteemed colleague, whom we on this side of the House miss so much, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). In looking over the files of the London Times I was struck by a few sentences uttered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce on that occasion. He said:

> We have no steam-roller, or guillotine, or 'kangaroo' in the Canadian House of Commons, and he prayed to God he might never have them.

I wonder what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce will say when he comes back, to find that we have a steam-roller and a 'kangaroo' and a guillotine in this House. Mr. Speaker, in order that this question may be more freely discussed, I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I will take advantage of the motion of my hon. friend from Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) to endeavour to obtain from a reluctant government some information as to the exact meaning of the new rules which are soon to be in force in this House. I will not indulge in the complaint, which has already been made and not answered, that these rules should have been introduced in the manner always followed in similar circumstances, that is to say, that they should have been referred to a Committee of the House, there to be threshed out, defined, and understood, and then reported to the House for adoption. In some respect all the rules which have been in force either literally or tacitly in this House for more than forty years is already violated; still we had a right to expect that the Government would give us some information and some explanation as to the exact meaning of the new rules which have been introduced. These rules bear all the evidence of careful preparation. They bear evidence that a good deal of midnight oil has been consumed upon them, with the view, however, of making them not clear and intelligible, but rather obscure and mysterious; and it is in order if possible to clear away that obscurity and that mysteriousness that I now beg to address myself to the House.

The Government has been chary of giving any information as to the exact meaning of these rules. Two ministers only have spoken upon them, the right hon. the Prime Minister who introduced them, and who gave the reasons for their introduction from his point of view, and my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) who dwelt upon the general question and not upon the exact meaning of the rules. Then these ministers, having spoken, became mute as oysters; not a word has been heard from them since, and the task of explaining the rules has been left to my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) and my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins), both certainly well qualified to speak; because, if rumour does not slander them, they had a good deal to do with their preparation. But when my two friends from Portage la Prairie and Brandon had spoken, the dumbness which afflicted the Government spread over the rest of the party, and we have not heard a word since.

I venture to rise with the object of eliciting some information as to what we are to expect from the Government under these new rules. We know in a general way that they are intended to prevent and gag free spech, but even as to that we do not know any more than we learned from the explanation that was given us. But, Sir, there are certain features of these rules which it is well that we should understand before we proceed any further. Let me call the attention of the House, first of all, to the proposed amendment which is to be section 2 of rule 17:

> Every motion, heretofore debatable, made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions and every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee, or for the previous question, or the third reading of a Bill, or for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means of the resolution clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

There a general rule is laid down that all motions henceforth made in this House are to be non-debatable and non-amendable except those which are specifically mentioned in this resolution. The order would have been more logical and less liable to trouble if it had been the reverse, that is to say, that all motions should have been debatable and amendable except those which would be specifically named as non-amendable and non-debatable. But, if I understand it aright, the intention of this rule is that henceforth except such motions as are here specified, every motion, no matter what its character or occasion or purpose, is to be non-debatable. Let me call attention to one feature of these resolutions which will be of far-reaching consequence; that which provides that the motion to adjourn the House shall henceforth not be debatable. If I understand the rule correctly, it is the intention of the Government that every motion heretofore debatable, made upon routine proceedings, shall be debatable except adjournment motions. If this rule passes as it is now framed, henceforth the motion to adjourn shall be non-debatable. May I suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite who are responsible for the framing of these resolutions, and who, aside from the present conditions and the purpose by these rules of restricting free speech, I suppose want to retain some semblance of parliamentary government, that if there is a motion which of its nature ought to be debatable it is a motion to adjourn. Every day we meet here with a programme which is set for our consideration; we know exactly the questions which will come before us. But occasions have arisen in the past, and will arise in the future, when for reasons of state perhaps it may be advisable to interrupt the routine proceedings of the day, in order to adjourn the House; and, strange to say, if any such occasion arises, the motion to adjourn, which above all things should be debatable, shall not in future be the subject of debate. There are a thousand and one reasons why the House might be asked to adjourn; it may be the celebration of some great event; it may be the observance of a day of mourning; it may be some sudden event which caused a ministerial crisis; it may be a thousand and one things; and then a motion to adjourn has to be submitted to the House without a word of explanation or of debate. Could anything be less in accordance with parliamentary government?

In the history of Confederation there have been several occasions on which the Government has moved to adjourn the House for special reasons. In 1881 Sir John Macdonald moved to adjourn the House on the occasion of the death of Mr. Holton. Mr. Holton was a prominent member of the House and a parliamentarian of fame, and he died suddenly during the night, and when the House met the following day Sir John Macdonald moved its adjournment. Sir John Macdonald stated that it was not the custom to adjourn upon the death of one of the members, but the occasion was so special and so sudden that the House could not be supposed to proceed with business. If on that occasion the rules now proposed had been in force, Sir John Macdonald could not have debated that motion; he could not have presented any reason for moving that the House adjourn. Could anything be more absurd?

Ten years later, in 1891, Sir John Macdonald died in the midst of a session. He died on Sunday morning, the 6th of June; Parliament met the following Monday, and a motion was made to give him a public funeral, which of course was quite proper under the circumstances. Sir John Thompson, then leading the House, moved that the House adjourn. A debate arose as to whether the House should adjourn for one day or for several days, and that debate was of some importance; but if these rules now proposed had been in force there could have been no debate on the motion.

When Parliament met for the session of 1896, in the first days of January, there was a ministerial crisis occasioned by some five members of the Government tendering their resignations to the Prime Minister. Under these circumstances the House could hardly be expected to proceed to business, and what was left of the Government asked that the House should adjourn. That, of course, was an occasion when the Government should give their reasons for asking the House to adjourn. Sir Adolph Caron, who at that time was leading the House in the absence of the members who had withdrawn from the Government, gave the explanation which compelled them to ask that the House should not proceed with business, and a debate arose on it. Is it not fair that on such an occasion the rules should provide for debating such a motion? Is it to be tolerated for a moment that upon such occasions a motion for adjournment must be made without debate?

Examples such as these must convince the members of the House that the proposed rule—if it is passed, as it is evidently intended it should be passed—must work great injustice to both sides of the House and greatly nullify the advantages we derive from parliamentary government. I suggest to my right hon. friend that if there is one motion which above all ought to be debatable and upon which the greatest latitude ought to be given to members upon both sides, it is the motion to adjourn. To tell us that the business of the House can be interrupted and that a member who takes the responsibility of making such a motion shall be denied the privilege of stating the reason why he so moves, is enough to show to what length hon. gentlemen opposite, in their endeavour to suppress freedom of speech, have gone in making the rules of the House altogether unsuited for the purpose they were intended to serve. I would like to know from my hon. friend if he contemplated such a result and if it be the intention of the Government that this long-standing privilege of a member of the House shall be taken away from him. The Government after all are responsible for the conduct of business in this House; and, if they gag not only the members of the Opposition but themselves so as to make it impossible for any reason to be given to the House for any motion that might be made to adjourn the House, they are going further than they intended.

I now pass to another view of this matter. The resolution specifies by name the motions which in the future are to remain debatable. They are:

> Every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee, or for the previous question, or the third reading of a Bill, or for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means of the resolution, clause, section, preamble or title under consideration.

In the list of motions which are here specified as remaining debatable, there are some which are amendable and others which are not amendable according to the existing rules. A motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or special committee, is amendable. A motion for the previous question is not amendable. A motion for the third reading of a Bill is amendable. A motion for the adjournment of the House, when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, is not amendable. A motion for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, of the resolution, clause, section, preamble or title under consideration is amendable. I presume that under these new rules there will be no change in that respect, and that motions which are amendable will continue to be amendable, and motions which are not amendable will continue to be not amendable. For instance, the previous question is not amendable, and I presume will continue to be not amendable, although it is debatable. A motion for the third reading of a Bill is amendable, and I presume will continue to be amendable; but, if an amendment to the third reading of a Bill is moved, as I read the resolution—and I would like to have the opinion on this point of those who are responsible for the framing of it—that amendment will not be debatable. I cannot read the resolution otherwise. It specifies that certain motions shall continue to be debatable, but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment. The resolution does not say whether these are amending motions or main motions; but the terms are specific, that all motions except those which are here set forth shall not be debatable. I think the Government intend to go very far. I think it is their intention to control the freedom of speech as much as they can; and, in saying so, I believe that I am not doing them an injustice. I cannot believe, however, that they intend to go so far as to say that, on the third reading of the Naval Bill, for instance, if we move an amendment, that amendment will not be debatable. I believe that we shall be permitted to speak only a certain number of minutes; but I cannot believe that such an amendment will not be debatable, although the rule as framed states clearly that we shall not have the power to debate an amendment on the third reading of a Bill. We shall have the privilege of moving an amendment; but the moment that motion has been made even he who makes it shall not have the privilege of giving reasons why he does so, and then you, Mr. Speaker, shall have to say: Stop, you must not speak upon it; this is not a debatable motion; and the question must be put at once. That is a very serious consequence. I do not think that I misinterpret the purport of the resolution, because, if the English language properly conveys the meaning which is attached to these words, no other meaning can be taken from them than the meaning which I have taken.

To summarize, this first rule means three things. It means that a motion for adjournment shall not be debatable; that all motions, whether in amendment or otherwise, shall not be debatable; and that only the motions which are specifically excepted, shall be debatable.

Another consideration which leads me to believe that I am not misinterpreting the intention of the framers of the resolution is the insertion of the previous question among those motions which shall continue to be debatable. The regulations with regard to the previous question are to be found in rule 36 of the House, which reads as follows:

> When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a certain day; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the House.

This is very clear. When a question is being debated, the proceedings may be interrupted by any of these motions, and the debate may still continue on the specific motion. Under the proposed rule, a debate may be interrupted by any of these motions, but only on a motion for the previous question may the debate continue. On any other motion there would be no debate. For instance, during a debate on a motion, the previous question is moved and continues to be debatable. But if, instead of moving the previous question, somebody had moved, for instance, to read the Orders of the Day, that would not have been debatable according to the proposed rule. What is the consequence? I would like to be sure that, according to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, I am not misinterpreting the rule——

Mr. MEIGHEN: Only my opinion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER——but the opinion of the father of the resolution ought to go for something. I do not think I give too much praise—or too much blame—to my hon. friend when I say he is the father of the resolution. Or it may be that this rule has many fathers—that there has been a combination of efforts to bring forth this child; but of the child, my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie is father, whether alone or collectively. Then, I think I have not misinterpreted the rule. Let us see how that will work. Some years ago in this House, I think it was the year 1906, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) brought up a question of privilege. He complained of slander in the newspapers. The matter so stated was under investigation by the House, and though it was not concluded, a member of the House, exercising his privilege, and in order to put an end to the debate on the question of privilege, moved that the House do proceed to the Order of the Day. Under the rule as framed by my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, if it had been in existence then, that motion could not have been debated. And I should say here and now that the motion was debated and did not carry, and the House proceeded to the disposition of the matter of privilege. But in a matter of that kind, which in the opinion of a member of this House, and an important member, affected his honour, is it conceivable that another member could set aside the debate by moving to proceed to the Order of the Day, thus superseding the motion before the Chair, and this without a word of debate? Is that really the intention of my hon. friend? Is that what he had in view? It seems to me that this is not only prohibiting parliamentary government, but making parliamentary government a delusion and a snare; it is no longer parliamentary government. Is it conceivable that we have come to this in this House, that for the purpose of gagging the minority we shall set aside the rules that have been handed down to us from the Mother Country? I cannot believe that this House, having properly considered these rules, which bear the evidence of careful preparation, but to bear more the evidence of mystifying and obscuring than of enlightening, will authorize such a change. If, however—I say, if however—I have correctly interpreted the intention of the proposers of the rule, the only conclusion I can come to is that the nefarious attempt to be found in these rules is far worse than we had supposed.

Now, I come to the third rule, which is the parent of all the others, and is intended to kill, to prevent, free speech. That rule is as follows:

(3) Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes, in any such adjourned debate; or, in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

Now, these rules contemplate the closure upon a question which is still before the House with the Speaker in the Chair, and also when the question has passed from the House and gone into a Committee of the Whole, the Committee of Supply, or the Committee of Ways and Means. In either case, notice must have been given at a previous sitting by a minister of the Crown of his intention. If the Speaker is still in the Chair, before the Order of the Day is called, the motion is made:

That the debate shall not be further adjourned.

That is intelligible. But if the Speaker be no longer in the Chair, if the House is in Committee of the Whole, or in Committee of Supply, or Committee of Ways and Means, the motion that is made is:

That the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed——

There is a great deal of confusion and obscurity in these words. I suspect there is not only one nigger, but half a dozen niggers, concealed in that fence. What is the meaning of these words—and let me call the attention of my right hon. friend to them, as we would like to have an explanation.

The further consideration of any resolution——

I understand that.

—or resolutions——

I understand that.

—clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles——.

I do not understand that.

—title or titles.

I fail to understand that. I can understand the consideration of clause or clauses, resolution or resolutions. That is intelligible, for in one Bill there are more than one clause, more than one section. But there is only one title and there is only one preamble. And therefore I expect, from the ingenuity of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, since he has consented to give us the interpretation of these rules, that he will tell us what is meant by reference to our having under consideration 'preamble or preambles' or 'title or titles.' There is in that something which I entirely fail to apprehend, something which is absolutely unintelligible. The why and wherefore of this portion of the resolution is, I think, something in reference to which we have no reason to expect a full explanation. Let me read this part of the resolution again, to come to another aspect of the case:

Or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee.

Why these words, 'shall be the first business of the committee?' I do not understand why it has been provided in this resolution that the committee shall first proceed to the consideration of these clauses. Can anything else be their business? Can there be anything else than the consideration of these clauses? It is not the first, the second or the third consideration; it is the first and only consideration possible; and therefore the wording of this rule which has been conceived evidently with great care, is too acute for such an ordinary understanding as mine. There is in this portion of the resolution something in regard to which a full explanation is necessary in order to demonstrate to us what concealed meaning underlies its words.

There is another consideration in respect to which I would like to have some further elucidation. As to this point we have had an explanation from my hon. friend the hon. member for Portage la Prairie; but the explanation he gave seemed to me to be of such a monstrous character that I am loath to believe that such is the intention of the rule. The resolution goes on to say:

And if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes in any such adjourned debate, or if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or conducted before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

I would direct the attention of hon. gentlemen on the other side to these words:

Or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded.

I can readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that under the rule, if at two o'clock in the morning the discussion upon the section under consideration shall not have been concluded, then and there the question shall be put. The provision is harsh; it prevents free speech; but at all events it is intelligible. But when we are told that even if the consideration of the resolution, clause or section shall not have been resumed, the gag shall be applied and the question put. I do not understand that; I cannot conceive that it is the intention of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to carry into effect the principle that, even if the consideration of a section shall not have been resumed, at two o'clock in the morning the axe shall fall and the debate shall be entirely cut off. My knowledge of the English language is limited, but I think I know enough of it to understand plain words, and there is no other conclusion to come to than that under this resolution, at two o'clock in the morning, even though the consideration of a question shall not have been resumed, the axe must fall and the debate be cut off. If that be the intention, I have only to say that, having regard to this third section as well as the second, the rules are far worse even than we had supposed.

I now come to the fourth section:

On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

As to this I ask for no information; I understand exactly what it means. It is simply an attempt to take away from British subjects one of the privileges they have enjoyed ever since there has been parliamentary government in British countries. Britain has been the only country for ages in which taxation is imposed, not at the will of the Sovereign, but at the will of the people. But whenever the people are asked by the Sovereign to contribute moneys for public purposes, it is their undoubted and most valued privilege to present to the Sovereign any grievances from which they may suffer. Can there be a more salutary or satisfactory rule than that when those responsible for the government of the country ask the people for money for public purposes, the people should have the privilege of saying to the Government: we will give it, but with this consideration, that certain matters which we desire to bring before you shall be considered. Henceforth, however, that privilege shall not be enjoyed to the same extent as heretofore. The right shall not be altogether suppressed, but it shall be seriously limited.

If I were to discuss this question fully I would have very much to say, but it is sufficient to point out, without going any further, that in giving effect to this rule, you take away from the members of this House a privilege upon which rests the liberties of the people. And, Sir, it is the more unpardonable in that it is altogether unnecessary. I have suggested on a former occasion that the only proper remedy in the circumstances which gave rise to this resolution would have been to appeal to the people. The majority can decide, Sir, that there shall be no appeal to the people; they can play fast and loose with these old rules which have been the bulwark and safeguard of British liberty, but of this one in particular I say that in my humble opinion it is an invasion of the privileges of free people which must call forth the resentment and indignation of every subject who values our parliamentary liberty.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): I have listened with a great deal of interest and attention to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman, and it seems to me that he has allowed the suspicious tendencies of his nature to run away with his good judgment. He finds fault with us on this side of the House because we have not spoken sufficiently during the course of this debate. During a portion of the time my hon. friend is claiming that hon. gentlemen on that side of the House are gagged, or are about to be gagged, and, when he is not making that complaint, he is making an equally strenuous complaint that we on this side of the House are being gagged. I do not know which complaint weighs greatest in the right hon. gentleman's mind. We have given, not only in this debate but in other debates throughout this session, a great deal of time to hon. gentlemen opposite, more time than we have consumed ourselves; but my right hon. friend, with his forty years experience of parliamentary life, knows that this is not an unusual phenomenon in parliamentary life. During the seventeen years in which I have had the honour of being a member of this House, of which some fifteen years were spent on the other side of the House, it frequently happened that we, sitting to the left of the Speaker, did occupy a greater portion of the time of the House than gentlemen on this side who, after a certain period in the debate, left the further continuance of the debate to us.

I shall endeavour to take up one by one the points which he has mentioned and make the operation of the rules as I understand them as plain to the right hon. gentleman as it is to myself. In the first place, he made a very strong objection indeed to the proposal that motions to adjourn the debate or to adjourn the House should not themselves be debatable. My hon. friend knows that motions of this kind have been used ordinarily, not exclusively but ordinarily, as dilatory motions, and he also knows that everyone of the incidents to which he has drawn attention as illustrating his argument respecting this rule can be discussed in this House without any difficulty. In the first place, as far as rule 39 is concerned, that is with reference to motions for adjournment, my own pretty definite recollection as to what was intended by the committee in 1910 is by no means expressed by that rule; and the right hon. gentleman will see that in a moment. That rule, as it is expressed at present, gives an absolutely unlimited right to move the adjournment at any time and then proceeds to provide for something that is already covered, namely; the opportunity to adjourn the House upon a matter of urgent public importance. There was no need whatever to have made the last provision if the first provision was to have the unlimited scope it had in the past. And the intention of the committee in 1910, as I recollect it—although that intention is not expressed in the rules and we are not in any way bound by it—was to limit the right to make a motion to adjourn very much in the way we are attempting to limit that right to-day. Any hon. gentleman in this House will see that if we provide in the first place that any member at any time is perfectly in order if he makes a motion to adjourn the House and then provide further that on a particular occasion, namely, on the Orders of the Day, a motion to adjourn the House can be made for a definite purpose, that is to discuss a subject of urgent public importance, the combining of these two rules is certainly not a very logical provision because the second is already included in the first. When you have an unlimited right to adjourn it is absolutely unnecessary to provide that on a particular occasion you shall have a limited right to make a motion to adjourn for a particular reason, namely, to discuss a subject of urgent importance. We propose to leave the second provision as it is to-day and in respect of Cabinet changes, in respect of any crisis in the Ministry, in respect of any matter that might properly be classed as one of urgent public importance, that right remains absolutely unimpaired by the amendments which we propose. My right hon. friend does not seem to acquiesce in that so I would point out to him that that particular provision is expressly made in clause 2 which he read to the House a few moments ago. That rule is as follows:

> Every motion . . . . for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance . . . . shall be debatable.

Therefore, so far as the intention of the committee, as I understood it, in 1910, is concerned, that is absolutely preserved by the rules as we have presented them to the House to-day.

Further than that, even if I were not correct in my appreciation of the rules in that respect, the right hon. gentleman knows as I know and every man who has had any experience in this House knows, that in regard to some of the matters which he has mentioned, occasions of mourning on account of the death of a very distinguished member of the House or some great personage, even apart from the provisions that exist in the rules and will exist in the rules after our amendments shall have been carried into effect, debate would always be proper, and the good sense of the House, if there were no other provision whatever, would enable such debate on such an occasion to be carried on with the unanimous consent of the House. Why every day on which this House meets, upon the Orders of the Day, the rules of the House are departed from to a certain extent by hon. members on both sides and that without their action being in any way called in question. Therefore, in view of this consideration, it seems to me that the argument which the right hon. gentleman has put forward is entirely fanciful and one which should not weigh for a moment. Take, for example, the resignation of members of the Ministry in 1896. Does any hon. gentleman doubt for a moment that in the event of a crisis of that kind arising in the Administration of the day it would not be a proper subject of debate under that portion of rule 39 which I have just quoted?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would that not be discretionary with the Speaker under that rule?

Mr. BORDEN: I think it is discretionary with the Speaker and I understood that one difficulty which my hon. friend finds with these amendments as we propose them is due to the fact that we have not imposed a further certain discretion on the Speaker. In one breath they seem to find fault with any discretion being reposed in the Speaker and in the next breath they say that a discretion of the character imposed on the Speaker and Chairman of committees in Great Britain should be imposed on the Speaker and Chairman of committees in this country. I shall come to that a littlel later.

My right hon. friend next took the point that under the provision of sub-section 2 as we propose it, amendments will not be debatable. I take issue with the right hon. gentleman on that and I say that inas much as the third reading of a Bill or any other motion now amendable is debatable it will still be amendable and debate will be permitted on every such amendment. That seems to be the plain and clear meaning of the rule, at all events it is the sense in which the rule has been presented to the House, the sense in which I understand it and the sense in which the rule will be carried into effect if it should be the pleasure of the House to pass these rules. There was never the slightest suggestion or intention that an hon. gentleman on this side of the House or on the other side presenting an amendment on the third reading of a Bill or on other debatable motion now amendable should not have the same right in the future as he has had in the past to move an amendment to that motion and to debate that amendment.

Mr. GERMAN: Does the strict interpretation of the rules mean that?

Mr. BORDEN: According to my conception it does mean that and absolutely nothing else.

Mr. EMMERSON: It is a matter of right, and not of grace.

Mr. BORDEN: I do most undoubtedly think it is a matter of right and not of grace. Now, my right hon. friend also deprecated the effect of the rules in preventing debate on a motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day. A debate on the motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day is, equally with motions for adjournment, to be regarded as a dilatory motion. The right hon. gentleman seemed to reach the conclusion that some gross injustice might be the result of preventing debate on a motion to proceed with the Orders of the Day. I fail to see it. Take the very case to which he alluded. In 1906 when a question of privilege had been raised by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), a motion was made to proceed to the Orders of the Day for the purpose of preventing the hon. member for North Toronto raising that question of privilege, in relation to a gentleman who, I think, had been summoned to the Bar of the House. My right hon. friend knows perfectly well that the person, whoever he may be, who is for the time being leading the House, under such circumstances as those to which I have alluded, must take control of a situation of that kind, as my right hon. friend on that occasion took control of the situation. He came to the conclusion that it would be only fair and just to the hon. member for North Toronto to have that question of privilege dealt with by this House, and so it was dealt with, and by a practically unanimous vote of the House, I think, the motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day was voted down, and the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for North Toronto was proceeded with. I fail to see that any injustice whatever can possibly arise by the elimination of debate upon such a motion, and I think the motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day might properly be restricted in the future in that respect, as are other dilatory motions with which we propose to deal by the rules now under consideration.

Then my right hon. friend came to the third sub-section which, as he describes it, kills the right of free speech altogether. Under the English rule, if such a discretion were vested in the Speaker, as has been advocated by several hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, free speech might be killed in five minutes, so that no debate whatever could take place upon any motion. But we have not thought fit to take that course. As I have said to my hon. friends on the other side of the House, and as I say again to-day in all sincerity, if they think it is more desirable in the interests of the minority of this House and in the interests of this Parliament that we should put the English rules into force instead of the rules we propose, we are perfectly willing to take the matter up and to substitute the rules in force in England for the rules we have proposed. I am speaking in absolute and perfect sincerity when I say it was our desire and intention in proposing these rules to the House to impose less restriction upon the House and to give greater opportunity for debate than that which prevails under the English rules; but if I am mistaken in that regard, if the operation of these rules shows I am mistaken, if they should operate so as to create one-hundredth part of the injustice which is in the minds of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, but nowhere else, I will be perfectly prepared to substitute the English rules for these rules and to endeavour to carry on the work of the House under those rules.

My hon. friend is very much impressed because the plural has been used in respect to the words 'preamble' and 'title.' If there is only one preamble, the use of the word 'plural' will not affect the case, and if there is only one title the use of the word 'plural' will not affect the case. What possible secret meaning and what dreadful engine of tyranny and oppression may, according to the views of my right hon. friend, exist in the use of the plural in that particular part of the paragraph is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why is it placed there, then?

Mr. BORDEN: I suppose it was placed there by way of conformity with the rest of the section, and I suppose there may be, strictly speaking, more than one preamble and I suppose, strictly speaking, there may be two alternative titles to be considered in respect of a Bill. That is all quite possible. But at all events, what dreadful consequences are to result from the use of the plural? My right hon. friend conjured up some bogey, which I do not think anyone but himself could see, and asked me to quell it, and to put it at rest forever. I trust I have put it at rest forever so that it will not in future disturb the mind or the sleep or the imagination of my right hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the resolution mean this: Suppose on the previous day there have been two separate resolutions under consideration, or two separate Bills under consideration, the minister might give notice that on the next day they must all be disposed of under this. Is not that the reason why the word 'resolution' is inserted instead of the single word 'resolution,' and why the word 'titles' is inserted instead of the word 'title'?

Mr. BORDEN: I do not understand that the rule could possibly operate in that way.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my right hon. friend think it might be interpreted that way?

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think it would be interpreted in that way; there was no idea of interpreting it that way, and I do not see how it could be so interpreted. There might be more than one resolution, there might be a series of resolutions which related to the same Bill, and it seems proper and reasonable to include more than one resolution in a provision of this kind. But as I have said before, any government or any party undertaking to enforce rules of this character, must at its peril do so in a reasonable way. You cannot have any restriction upon the unlimited freedom of debate, which, under the existing rules, has prevailed in this House, unless you place the power somewhere. It was a perfectly legitimate argument for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to put forward as they have put forward, that it would be better in this country to repose a certain power and discretion in the Speaker than to vest it in the Government of the country. I appreciate the force of that argument; it is one which I had under consideration very carefully indeed, before introducing these rules. But I think hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will realize that conditions in this country, so far as the procedure of this House is concerned, are not in all respects the same as they are in the Mother Country. There the Speaker continues in his office irrespective of the departure of one party from the seats of office and the advent of another party. I know that there has been serious question in Great Britain within the past fifteen or twenty years as to whether that rule ought to continue, but it has continued up to the present time. In this country that rule has never prevailed. We have adopted the practice, a sort of unwritten law or practice, that a Speaker during one session of Parliament, whose mother tongue is English, shall in the next parliament be succeeded by a Speaker, whose mother tongue is French, and that custom necessarily has prevented us from having that continuity in the speakership in this country which has fortunately prevailed in Great Britain. I know that my right hon. friend has addressed himself to this question on more than one occasion in my recollection, and has pointed out precisely the same considerations that I am pointing out this afternoon. The speakership in Great Britain is more removed from the party arena than it has been possible to accomplish in this country, although I am bound to say in justice to the men who have presided over this House during my seventeen years of public life—and most of that public life has been under the regime of speakers who are not my political friends—that the duties of the Speaker of this House have on the whole been performed fairly and impartially, and this House and the country has a right to congratulate itself on that fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN: But the speakership of this House is undoubtedly more closely associated with the politics of the country than is the case in the British House of Commons, and for my part I did think, and I still think, subject to being convinced by hon. gentlemen opposite, that a duty of this kind might be imposed upon the Speaker or the Chairman of committees in the British House, when it would not perhaps be equally wise to impose that duty upon the Speaker of this House or upon the Chairman of committees of this House. I state frankly to the House, that was the reason which made it seem to me more dsirable that a discretion of this kind, if it came to be exercised, would better be exercised upon the responsibility of a minister of the Crown than imposed upon the Speaker or upon the Chairman of committees.

My right hon. friend also draws attention to the words, 'resumed or concluded,' and so far as that is concerned I wish to say that the rules as we have prepared them at present leave a very wide scope now to hon. gentlemen on the other side. It would be perfectly possible that after a motion such as the right hon. gentleman has spoken of, hon. gentlemen on the other side might endeavour to prevent us from reaching the consideration of that subject during the following day. We have put in the words 'resumed or concluded' but we have put these words in full consciousness of the responsibility of the Government to Parliament and to the people of this country that such a provision shall not be exercised in any such way as the right hon. gentleman has suggested. It would be the duty of the Government to bring that particular question which is to be concluded at two o'clock on the following morning--and of course such a motion would be made only after considerable debate—it would be the duty of the Government to bring that matter before the House at the earliest possible moment on the following day, in order that representatives of the minority, or for that matter any hon. gentleman, might have fair and reasonable opportunity to debate it.

Mr. GERMAN: Under that rule, however, discussion need not be resumed before two o'clock and if it was not resumed before two o'clock the debate would be cut off. Is not that the interpretation of the rule?

Mr. BORDEN: I say that the interpretation or the enforcement of the rule in that way would be just about as reasonable or sensible as if in Great Britain, upon an important motion being placed before Parliament, some member would get up at once and move the closure and the Speaker would consent to its being moved.

Mr. GERMAN: But it could be done.

Mr. BORDEN: So it could be done in Great Britain if you could find a Speaker who would do it.

Mr. GERMAN: I am not asking about the practice in Great Britain; I am asking what is to be done here.

Mr. BORDEN: I am comparing the practice here and I am pointing out that restriction of unreasonable debate can only be accomplished by the exercise of certain powers, and that these powers must be exercised upon the responsibility of some person. So far as we are concerned we propose to exercise the power reasonably and I hope to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACDONALD: Suppose the Prime Minister were not here and some other gentleman leading the House did not exercise the power reasonably, what would the remedy of this House be; what could His Honour the Speaker do?

Mr. BORDEN: If anyone else happened to be here instead of myself—I do not claim for myself any monopoly of sweet reasonableness—I think my hon. friend would find that anyone of my colleagues would be exactly as reasonable as I am myself.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition dwelt very strongly upon the fourth clause of this resolution, and he denounced us, as he said, for taking away the last vestige of liberty that remains to the members of this Parliament, because we propose that on Thursdays and Fridays the Speaker shall leave the Chair without question, but that he shall not leave the Chair for the purpose of considering any estimates which have not been first discussed on some other day of the week. My right hon. friend raised the question on the introduction of these rules that consent did not mean unanimous consent, and I at once offered to insert the word 'unanimous.' But, my right hon. friend, as he very frankly explained in his subsequent remarks, did not want reasonable rules; he wanted a grievance and so he declined my offer. I have no fault to find, the right hon. gentleman has his own policy in that regard, and I suppose anyone who desires a grievance will always succeed in finding one.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have a crop of grievances now.

Mr. BORDEN: My right hon. friend has had a crop of grievances for the last eighteen months and he calls attention to them very frequently in this House. The effect of these rules will simply be this: that on three days of the week during that portion of the session when the Government has taken all the days, the House will be moved into Committee of Supply in the ordinary way. I said in introducing these rules that the Government would always be bound to afford an opportunity to any hon.

gentleman who desired to bring up a matter of importance or to make any motion against the Government or a member of it. The best illustration of this, is that when my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the other day, when we were very desirous of making progress with the debate, brought to the attention of the House the fact that he wished to make a motion to censure the Minister of Public Works, we interrupted the debate and moved the House into Committee of Supply in order that the hon. member might have the opportunity he desired. I claim no credit for that; I am simply pointing out that that has been the universal practice of governments ever since I have been in public life. Whenever any hon. gentleman on the other side desires to move a vote of want of confidence in the Government or of censure on any minister, he can give us notice as hitherto and the practice of the Government will be exactly the same in that respect as it has been in the past.

Mr. OLIVER: If I did not persist in my motion after having been ruled out on one occasion my right hon. friend would not have given us that opportunity.

Mr. BORDEN: Really it is hardly worth while to be kind and generous to my hon. friend from Edmonton when one is overwhelmed afterwards with such base ingratitude.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We do not acknowledge any obligation.

Mr. BORDEN: I am not suggesting there is any obligation but I am saying that when the desire is expressed by any hon. member to move a vote of want of confidence in the Administration or censure on a minister it would be perfectly futile and unreasonable, and more than that it would be stupid, for any government not to give an early opportunity to have that motion moved.

Mr. MACDONALD: They have no right to do it. They will not have any right to do it.

Mr. BORDEN: Who will not have any right to do it?

Mr. MACDONALD: The Opposition under these new rules.

Mr. BORDEN: They will have the right on any day, except Thursday and Friday, when the House is moved into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not on Thursday and Friday?

Mr. BORDEN: I venture to say, if you take the average number of votes of want of confidence that have been moved in this House during the past eight or ten sessions, and if you take into consideration the number of days under these rules on which the House must be moved into Committee of Supply, it will be evident to every hon. member that, even apart from the practice to which I have alluded, there will be the most abundant opportunity for any hon. member to bring up any matter against the Government.

Mr. EMMERSON: Then why the necessity for changing the rules in that regard?

Mr. BORDEN: The necessity for changing the rules in that regard is this: My hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) knows as well as I that a great deal of time is wasted in discussing the estimates, and that a great deal of time is wasted sometimes on more or less unimportant discussions on motions to go into Committee of Supply. In this regard, if I remember the effect of the English rules correctly, we are not going by any means as far as they have gone. My. right hon. friend who leads the Opposition continually calls up to our example the English rules as being the result of the practice and wisdom of centuries. When we point out to him the practice in the British Parliament to-day, my right hon. friend seems to think that all the wisdom was exhausted before 1867, and that any amendments which have been made in the English rules since that time in the way of reasonable restriction of debate are a departure from that wisdom which up to 1867 continually made itself manifest. I am not aware of any particular reason why such a conclusion should be reached.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In England, both parties have been satisfied. It is certainly my opinion that the rules there have not been improved since 1867, far from it.

Mr. BORDEN: When speaking the other day on this subject, I quoted from the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and I could also have quoted from members on the other side of the House, who spoke with surprise of the fact that the Canadian Parliament is to-day endeavouring to carry on business under rules which have been abandoned in England long ago, and who stated distinctly and emphatically that it would be impossible in any parliament of first-class importance to put through the measures of the Government or to carry on public business effectively unless there were some reasonable restriction of debate. We have decided simply to put the rules of this House in such condition that public business can be carried on. There is no desire on this side of the House to restrict hon. gentlemen on the other side from debating fully, effectively, and reasonably any measure that we bring before the House. It would be very unfortunate and unreasonable and absurd if we took any other course. The rules which we have proposed, it seems to me, carried out reasonably, as they ought to be, will bring about that result. They will enable hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to debate freely, completely and effectively any measure which we bring down; but at the same time they will enable public business to be carried on and will prevent the business of this country from being obstructed by a minority in Parliament purely for the sake of obstruction.

My right hon. friend speaks of being gagged. Let us look at the other side of the question for a moment. We have been taunted over and over again during the present session of Parliament upon the absolute incapacity of this Government or the majority in this Parliament to put through any measure except with the consent of hon. members on the other side of the House. That has been said not once or twice but a dozen times, and after all what is the real expression of the opinion of Parliament? The opinion of Parliament does not find its final expression in debate. It finds its final expression in the vote which every hon. member is bound to stand up and give, if he is in the House, when called upon by His Honour the Speaker to do so. If there has been any gagging, it has been the gagging of the majority in this House, who have been prevented by hon. gentlemen on the other side with taunts and insinuations from recording their votes on measures which have been presented to this Parliament. That is the situation with which the Government of this country and the majority in this Parliament have been confronted for many months past. We have been not only confronted, but openly and defiantly taunted with that condition. Under these circumstances, I do not think that any reasonable man in this House or in this country will deny the conclusion that I have reached, that the time has at last arrived when such amendments to the rules should be made as will enable the public business of this country to be carried on and Parliament to pronounce its conclusions upon the measures of the Government which have been presented to it.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): I am sure that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister does not wonder that we on this side of the House are most anxious to know the precise meaning, the proper limitations, of the rules which it is proposed to introduce in this Parliament under the resolution now under discussion. It was a desire on the part of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to have the fullest and most accurate information upon that point which led him to address this House this afternoon in an effort to call from the Prime Minister some clear and definite statements as to the meaning and scope of the proposed resolution. I am satisfied, however, after having listened to the Prime Minister, that anything that he has been kind enough to explain to the House, has by no means made clear the matter, but has rather muddled it, if I may be permitted the expression. I do not believe the Prime Minister can fairly and squarely face those rules and explain them as anything else than as an absolute power of applying the gag to the Opposition at any time he and his Government see fit to adopt them. The cases cited by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister were very specific in their nature. What attempt did the Prime Minister make to answer the objections offered by the leader of the Opposition? He did not seek to explain the language of the proposed rule. He gave the House solely and only his opinion, his 'I say so,' his 'Ipse dixit,' a dogmatic opinion of what he thinks the language does mean, while we on this side of the House and I believe the majority of the House know that if language means anything this language means otherwise than was expressed in the opinion of the Prime Minister during the course of the last half hour. I cannot read these rules, giving them the best consideration that I can, and come to any other conclusion than that in the first place they are to some extent embarrassing. In the next place, they are to some extent inconsistent. In the third place, they are redundant. Their meaning, if any accurate meaning they have, is so clouded in words that even the most experienced parliamentarian in this House will find it difficult to make a true application of them. I do not know whether it was intended in these rules to obscure their meaning by the phraseology employed, but the result has been that of muddling and obscurity; and I doubt that even you, Mr. Speaker, with all your experience and ability, would be able to apply these rules if they were passed by this House in the spirit and in the nature which was intended by the man who drafted them. I submit to my right hon. friend—and if I am wrong in my argument let him stop me now—that under these rules if this House passed them, a Bill could be introduced, passed through its first, second and third readings and committee stage, if the Government so desired, without giving an opportunity to a single member of discussing that Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to go on and examine that statement, and I am going to convince hon. gentlemen opposite that my statement is accurate as I have made it. A Bill has to be introduced in this House, under the present rules, by motion for leave to introduce. That motion, I admit, is open to debate. But we do not know what the measure is at that time; only the hon. member who has charge of the measure knows what it contains; and so no one is in a position to discuss it. The minister having charge of the measure formally moves for leave to introduce that measure in a few words of explanation. Nobody is in a position to discuss it——

Mr. CURRIE: You are allowed to debate it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But we do not know what the Bill contains. The House has not the matter before it; the motion is only for leave to bring in the measure. Now, I ask my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) in all sincerity, how can a measure be discussed under these circumstances? Now, we pass from that motion to the first reading of the Bill. Under the rules and practice of this House, a Bill is not debatable on its first reading—merely a statement of the contents of the Bill is made by the member who has charge of it; and on more than one occasion in this House during the present Parliament, I have heard you, Mr. Speaker, in your wisdom, notify members who might be inclined to say something on the first reading that it was not according to parliamentary usage or practice to discuss a Bill on its first reading. Now, we come to the second reading and so far there has been no debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not catch what the hon. gentleman said. Did he argue that no debate could henceforth take place on the introduction of a Bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said that that was the only stage at which a debate could take place; but no one would be in a position to debate it because nobody but the member who introduced it would know what it contained; this practically made debate impossible—intelligent debate, of course, I mean. Now, I have come to the second reading. This is moved by the minister who has charge of the Bill, we will say. During the course of his remarks, he takes advantage of the proposed sub-section 3 of the amendment, and moves the adjournment of the debate, and gives notice, as provided under that sub-section, which will cut off debate automatically at two a.m. on the following day or when the Bill is taken up. He may do that under the rules, the Government may stand beside him and the majority behind him, and as his motion is not debatable, it is carried without debate. Debate is automatically shut off on the second reading, or it is adjourned without discussion. The Government has it in its power, under the sub-section not to resume that adjourned debate at all the next day; and if language means anything, I submit that under the language of that rule, whether resumed or not the debate is closed automatically at two a.m. This is as plain as words can make it. But assume that the motion is called the following day on the adjourned debate and the minister who introduces the Bill has the floor, as he would have and he 'considers' the Bill until two a.m.; then the vote is automatically taken and the debate is closed—not a word from the opposition side. The Bill goes to committee, but the same proceeding takes place in committee in regard to clauses 1, 2, 3, preamble and title—and I submit that under that rule they could all be taken in one motion. But suppose that all sections, preamble and title cannot be included in one motion; they can be taken one after another without a moment between them by a minister disposed to go the limit and the committee stage can be passed without a syllable being uttered on the Opposition side in the way of comment on the Bill. Now, we come to the third reading. If sub-section 2 of the amendment stood alone, I believe we might debate the third reading—not by way of amendment but ordinary debate of the Bill. But the following sub-section again takes away that power. By sub-section 2 you say the third reading of the Bill may be debated, but by sub-section 3 you say the minister can do precisely on the third reading what he did on the first and the second reading, and so exclude debate. Read the rules—the language is there. It will be seen that you give by sub-section 2 what you take away by sub-section 3. And so you have the Bill passed through three readings and the committee stage; it has become law so far as this House is concerned, and not a word or syllable of discussion from this side of the House. That is an extreme case, some hon. gentlemen may say. I am putting it as an extreme case. How should you examine a rule of practice or procedure? Should you examine in the light of what good it may confer, or should you examine in the light of what bad it may render possible? Should you not go to the extreme and see how much harm can be done under the new rule, not by a good government but by a bad government, not by a reasonable Administration but by an unfair and unreasonable Administration. And that is the only way to estimate these rules that are before us today. How much iniquity are they capable of permitting? It is all very well for the Prime Minister to inform this House that just so long as he is Prime Minister and head of the Government he will see to it that the rule shall always be exercised with due care for the rights of the minority. Well, as has been said before in this House, had not it been for the incident which transpired when my right hon. friend introduced this measure a week or ten days ago, a good many hon. members on this side would have been inclined to place more reliance on that assurance than they are to-day. The assurances which my right hon. friend gave to the House when he introduced this measure were pleasing to the ear; there was a sensible ring to his words, and we believed there was some foundation for them. But consider the attitude of an hon. gentleman, who, in sincere language and with a candid tone in his voice, assured the minority in this House that so long as he is at the head of the Government the rights of the minority shall be protected, when at that moment he was himself part and parcel of and party and privy to one of the most discourteous parliamentary expedients that has ever been witnessed in this House of Commons. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister honoured me just at this moment by looking up and smiling; that is the first time he has looked up since I started to speak, and it is evident that my words have touched the right spot. I realize that he was the most uncomfortable member of this House during the course of his remarks; he was in a position of which he was thoroughly ashamed, and in which he would never have been placed were it not for the dominating guidance of that hon. gentleman who is known as the Manitoba Wonder.

My right hon. friend calmly informs the House that if we approved the English rules he would adopt them and forego those which are now proposed. What an absurd, what a ridiculous proposal! Could the fact that we cannot adopt the English rules be proved to a demonstration with better effect that it was proved by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) —and the Prime Minister as well—who gave reasons why we could not adopt the English rules? It is because we have not a permanent Speaker of the House; because Your Honour, occupying the Chair, is not in a position similar to that of the English Speaker. During the last seventeen years, while my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has been a member of this House, I think there have been no less than seven Speakers, and, during the same period there have been only two in the British House of Commons. Read if you will the statements made by the members of the British House when considering the election of a Speaker; read the speech of the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition when any such appointment is proposed to be made. They discuss the qualifications of the gentleman proposed for the position, and it is a liberal education for any parliamentarian to read the speech of Sir Roundel Palmer, afterwards Earl Selborne, when he proposed Mr. Brand as Speaker of the British House of Commons. The judicial training which a Speaker should possess, the non-partisan character of his former political career, the fact that he had never served in the Government—all these points were duly emphasized, all these qualifications the Speaker was expected to possess. Was it not the height of folly for my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, as he did to-day and on a former occasion, knowing these circumstances, to say: 'We will adopt the English closure if you see fit.' What we say is that you cannot adopt it, and you know the reason why, but what you do propose in these rules is worse than the English closure. Instead of proposing that these iniquitous rules shall be administered by a judicial officer like the English Speaker, you propose that they shall be administered at the instance of a highly partisan minister in your own Administration. Is there not ground for objection in that regard? There can be only one reason for all this cumbersome phraseology; there can be only one reason for all the technique employed in preparing these rules, and that is to give the Government, under one pretext or another, under one section or another, absolute power to gag the minority in this House upon any occasion except upon routine proceedings. Do I make any mis-statements, or do I misconstrue the rules themselves? Is it not within the power of a minister of the Crown, if he desires to take advantage of the opportunities afforded him under the proposed rules, to pass a measure through this House, from its introduction to the third reading, without permitting the Opposition a single opportunity of discussing it?

Mr. BORDEN: I think not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Might I ask under what portion of these proposed rules a member of the Opposition can force a discussion?

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend will be answered in due course.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have asked a courteous question, for the purpose of eliciting information, and I do not believe that a straight-forward answer can be given except that my statement is correct—that no discussion on the part of the Opposition is permitted except by the grace of the Government. The majority can take advantage of the opportunity given it by a minister of the Crown to discuss any measure, but no opportunity will be given unless the Prime Minister is in the humour for doing so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman mean that the first clause of the amendment is meaningless when it recites a long list of subjects that may be debated?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I am not referring to routine proceedings. I am referring to the passage of an enactment such as the Naval Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the first clause says that not only any matter brought up under routine proceedings, but a long list of subjects not so brought up, shall be debatable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot see that any one of them applies to the passage of a Bill, except that reference to a third reading, of which I have spoken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member say that the second reading of a Bill does not appear on the order of proceedings for the day?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I say that any concession provided for in the first section has been absolutely taken away by the second. We will suppose that a minister has moved the second reading of a Bill, and during the course of his remarks he moves that the debate be adjourned; that motion will be put without debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there supposed to have been a debate before he moved that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that consistent with the first section of the amendment?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I say they are not consistent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there no interpretation that is consistent with both?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I see absolutely none.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is as clear to the hon. gentleman as anything can be that whatever is consistent with both must be given. This is consistent with both: that after debate a motion can be made. Nothing else is consistent with both sections.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will proceed with my suppositious case. A minister arises and moves the second reading of a Bill. During the course of his speech he moves the adjournment. There is no question about the fact that he has debated the Bill, and his motion to adjourn is put without debate. During the course of his remarks he gives the notice required by that sub-section that when the matter comes up again it shall not be further adjourned, and, by virtue of the sub-section, the debate automatically ceases at 2 a.m. I am putting the case under the supposition that the matter comes up on the following day, and we will say that the minister sees fit to take up the whole time—it might come up at night, and there might be but a short time available.

Mr. CURRIE: It is supposed that the minister is on his feet, speaking to the second reading. The hon. gentleman says that he can then give notice that there shall be no further adjournment of the debate after it is taken up the following day. Is there anything in the section to show that during that first day the debate can be gagged?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, by moving the adjournment, and the motion to adjourn shall be put without debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member really seriously say that a minister moving the second reading of a Bill, who during the course of his speech moves the adjournment, is moving that adjournment after debate? Is that his position?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I say it absolutely. If a word is spoken, it is debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will leave the hon. member to rest in that absurd position.

Mr. GRAHAM: Moving the adjournment of the debate is considered a speech.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is so much misapprehension and misunderstanding on the other side of the House that I think we are afforded the very best reason for urging that a committee be appointed to revise these rules. I appealed directly to the right hon. the Prime Minister and I have received no light from him, not even a straightforward answer. I have sought for light from other members—

Mr. CURRIE: Has any measure been brought before the House this session that has not been obstructed by the minority so that some amendment of the rules is called for in order that some progress may be made?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not intend to go into that, but I shall do so. It has been stated on the other side and I think on this that the Naval Bill has been obstructed. I do not admit it, but it has been stated. Apart from the question of the naval debate what other measure has been obstructed? I ask the Prime Minister that. It is charged in the newspapers every day that the business of Parliament has been obstructed and that the business of the country cannot be done on account of the action of the Opposition in obstructing Government measures. I read in newspapers that the Banking Act and other Acts are being obstructed. It is just as well to clear the atmosphere now and I ask the Prime Minister fairly and squarely what Acts these newspapers refer to which say the Opposition is obstructing the business of the country.

Mr. BORDEN: Unfortunately I do not keep very thoroughly in touch with the press. I do not know what papers my hon. friend refers to, and I am not responsible in any way for their assertions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The answer has all the merit of being very courteous and very concise, but it is a clear evasion of the question. The papers to which I refer are the Toronto Mail, the Toronto News and the Ottawa Journal. I have seen these statements time and again. If it is not true let us settle it now and say that it is not true. Apart from the Naval Bill nothing has been obstructed. If I am wrong the Prime Minister can correct me. I know I am right and I know he knows I am right, and he will not correct me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman say whether or not the Naval Bill has been obstructed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said it had been so charged on both sides of the House but I said that in my opinion it had not been obstructed but, for the sake of argument, I will admit that it has and ask what other business has been obstructed. Hon. members must bear in mind that the Opposition has no control over the legislation and business of the House. The Government lays out the programme of the House. We have had no statement of the finances of the country. Why? Just because the Minister of Finance has not seen fit to bring it down. We have not had other Government legislation standing on the Order Paper. Why? Simply because the Government has not brought it forward. The Opposition cannot bring it forward, anything that has been brought forward we have discussed reasonably and have passed sometimes without any too much discussion, but I may say that these newspaper statements and platform statements that the Opposition in this House is blocking the business of the country and obstructing the legislation which should be brought before Parliament, are absolute nonsense and I would say to the Prime Minister that he cannot show one scintilla of foundation for them.

If hon. gentlemen opposite take part in the discussion I hope they will give us some enlightenment as to the meaning of these rules, do not let them follow the lead of the Prime Minister. A more complete piece of evasion was never perpetrated in this House than that of the Prime Minister this afternoon. All he gave us was: I believe that the rule means so and so, while the language of the rule states otherwise. Just on that one point, that is sub-section 3 of the rules, where is says that, if the debate ' shall not be resumed ' or concluded, surely the Government is going to give us some satisfaction upon that phrase. What does this mean? Does it mean that you can go on with the adjournment and not resume the debate and still pass your Bill? If it says that and means that let us know it and if it does not mean that let us strike it out. You say you cannot amend. Why? Simply on account of this unparliamentary trick in the House when this measure was originally brought in. My hon. friend has power over his ministry I presume, over some of them anyway, and I have no doubt that if he requested the Minister of Marine to withdraw this motion for the previous question it could be done and the proposed rule could be amended. Why should it not be amended? If these rules are produced in this House as a serious piece of draughtsmanship, and have only the meaning or intention given to them by the Prime Minister, I think we can pronounce this perhaps the most bungled piece of composition that has ever been placed on a public document before this Chamber. I do not altogether agree that that is so, I think there is a covert meaning and a deep meaning and I think the meaning I have stated is the only reasonable and logical meaning that can be taken from the plain language. Then if the resolution is passed the result will be that the Government can shut off discussion when legislation is passing through this House. That is the first objection and in the second place the Government can, if they see fit, shut out absolutely the ventilation of any grievances which hitherto any member of this House could bring to the attention of the Government on Supply, according to immemorial practice. These are the serious aspects of the case. It may be argued that I have put extreme cases. I have, I admit it, that is the only way to examine the rules. I can inform the Prime Minister that governments come and governments go; while he may feel in his own mind reasonably certain that he will be always fair in the application of these rules while he is Prime Minister, another may some day take his place. We cannot tell what conditions might arise in this country. A sudden wave of excitement, a sudden wave of enthusiasm, some unrest might roll up and make a tremendous upheaval and both of the old parties might be swept suddenly aside. It has happened in other countries and it might happen in this. Then what of your rules, Mr. Speaker, what of the rules now proposed? What do the business interests of Canada think of them? Imagine a deliberative body presided over by a government which we might call an unsafe government, a government which is the outcome of a sudden wave of passion, a sudden wave of enthusiasm or something of the kind; imagine giving to the Prime Minister the power to say we will bring in an Act to amend the Railway Act, we will abolish the railway board, we will tax railways, we will amend this, that and the other Act, and we will do it all in spite of the minority. And they could do it in the course of a few days if they want to go to the limit of the rules they propose.

Mr. BURRELL: How long does my hon. friend think that a government would be retained in office if they enforced the rules to the extent he suggests?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know how long they would be in power, I do not think they would be in power very long, but tremendous damage might be done before they were put out of power. How do the banking and commercial interests of Canada view a proposal of this kind? In a day the Prime Minister might be called away and some reactionary might fill his place, some inexperienced untried man might preside as Prime Minister of Canada. How would the great banking and financial interests of Canada view this rule of procedure if a measure were suddenly introduced to take away the right of circulation from banks, to tax that circulation, to prevent banks from doing banking business outside of Canada, to tax bank stocks, to have various kinds of outside inspection not now welcomed by the bankers, to have government banks or other financial innovations? Why, Sir, it could be done under this rule by the government in power in two or three or four days, and no one else in this House but members on the government side could open his mouth in criticism of the measure. Then how would it be if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister were to enter into an agreement binding this country to Great Britain as part of a great Imperial system in some manner which did not meet with the approval of the majority of the people of this country, but which in its results would be perpetual? Under this rule, he would have the power to do so. You might say that at a general election the Government would be turned out, but we would be bound firmly for ever, and under this rule it could be done in a week's time and no one on this side of the House could discuss it unless it were the wish of the Government that it should be so discussed. These are the possibilities, I do not say probabilities. You must judge a measure by its possible as well as its probable results, take it in its most extreme phases, and apply it in its most drastic form. These are complications which could arise, under those rules. Why, at the present stage of the history of this country, after forty odd years of experience in this Parliament, why in the midst of a heated debate for the purpose of carrying a contested measure, take this unnecessary step—I might go further and say this un-British step—because Canada is not in the position of Great Britain in many respects yet, and is not yet ready for closure, even if Great Britain is. I have never heard before the extract which was read this afternoon by my hon. friend from Missisquoi (Mr. Kay). It caused me no amazement, but it pointedly drew the attention of every member of this House to the presence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce at that great banquet in England, the banquet of the chambers of commerce in London last year, at which I believe the Prime Minister was present—if I am wrong he will correct me—along with other ministers of his Government, when he heard his own Minister of Trade and Commerce state: We have no closure in Canada, we have no guillotine in Canada, we have no 'kangaroo' in our parliamentary practice, and thank God for it. I think, if I heard correctly, he hoped we never would have it. I have no doubt in my mind that the Prime Minister applauded that sentiment. It is in accordance with his own ideas expressed in his speech when he objected to any change in the rules of this House unless these rules were considered by a committee. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister knows as well as any hon. member in this House that that is the proper procedure. He has committed himself to that course in this debate. If I remember rightly, in his opening speech, introducing this resolution, he said that during next session, or at a subsequent time, he would agree to the rules going before a committee. What would be the use of putting them before a committee if the present method of procedure is correct? It is because this is the wrong way that he made that suggestion, and he knows it is the wrong way. There is a way out of this trouble, and that is to place them before a committee. I do not believe for a moment that there is a member of this House who might sit on that committee with you, Mr. Speaker, to advise, who would raise the slightest objection to a reasonable and calm revision of the rules and practice of this House. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, not of his own free will, I do not think, but dominated entirely by another influence, has been forced into the position of which he is the least proud, probably, of any member in the whole House, a position which he knows is a wrong one, which he cannot explain, or will not explain, for which he knows there is no foundation in the parliamentary practice of this country, for which there was no demand in this country, but he persists in pushing through in spite of a very huge minority in this Chamber for the purpose of gagging the people's representatives without their consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member goes beyond what is fairly his right in debate when he speaks of a minister doing a thing which is absolutely wrong, and which he knows to be wrong. That is going too far, because it is imputing improper motives. I have Peel's decision on this point, which says:

It is the imputation of an improper motive to attribute dishonest tactics.

With regard to other expressions that I have heard used in this House frequently of late I wish to say in Speaker Peels rulings, he says they are not permissible. He goes on to contend that for a member to say that a minister does a thing knowing it to be improper is not permissible. An expression I have heard many times, and which I regret to hear, is the phrase 'sharp practice,' applied to hon. members, which, according to this authority, is entirely wrong. The use of the expression 'cowardly,' which I have frequently heard, is also out of order. These are some expressions that I regret to say I have heard, and I think it is my duty to draw attention to them so that in future hon. members will be more careful in regard to the amenities of debate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, I hope you have no reference to myself when you mention the word 'cowardly'—that you do not suggest that I used that expression.

Mr. SPEAKER: Oh, no, it was the use of the words, that the government did a certain thing, 'knowing it to be wrong.'

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then, I would like to say that it was wrong in principle and worse in practice.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some diffidence, bearing in mind the admonition of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), given gratuitously the other evening, that no member of the Government of eighteen months' experience should venture to lecture the House upon the new rules. After I had listened to him with some interest I came to the conclusion that possibly inexperience was not altogether an unmixed disadvantage, because it did not seem to me that in his exposition of the rules he had profited by the longer experience of which he has had the advantage in this Parliament. Occupying the position I do, for only eighteen months, probably I might quote, as an appetizer for hon. gentlemen opposite the statement of my predecessor in the Department of Finance on closure. I like the advice of Sir Francis Bacon: we should be tender to the memory of our predecessor because some day we may be a predecessor ourselves. Consequently, I have refrained from dragging the name of my predecessor into any of the discussions in this House. But on this occasion I may read the matured and reasoned opinion of the Hon. Mr. Fielding on this question of closure, who, speaking in 1908, after thirteen years experience in this House, said:

I said the other day, in answer to a question concerning a certain motion, that any hon. member could only have such rights in this House as the majority afford him. Surely the hon. gentleman does not dispute that. If the majority exercise that right unwisely, there is the remedy in publicity. I repeat the statement I then made, no hon. member, in this House can have any rights in the procedure in the House except what the majority of the House see fit to give.

That is not my opinion; that is not the opinion of a gagging Government introducing closure; that is the opinion of the Hon. W. S. Fielding, Minister of Finance for fifteen years in the Liberal Government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do you agree with him?

Mr. WHITE: I will come to that later. In the meantime I will ask: Does my hon. friend agree with him?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. WHITE: Then, did he rise in his place and disagree with that statement when it was made?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not.

Mr. WHITE: If not, why not?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): What is the date of that statement?

Mr. WHITE: 1908.

Mr. CLARK: That is why he lost his seat.

Mr. WHITE: He did not lose his seat until 1911.

Mr. EMMERSON: It was the first chance they had to get at him.

Mr. BORDEN: He was triumphantly elected after he made that statement.

Mr. WHITE: Further on, Mr. Fielding says:

No public deliberative assembly could be conducted upon any other principle than that the wish of the majority shall prevail.

A Daniel come to judgment!

If that majority acts foolishly harshly, then the remedy is in public opinion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says hear, hear. There is certainly the remedy of public opinion, and there is also the remedy of the opinion in this House. Mr. Fielding further says:

I repeat the statement that in this or any other deliberative assembly no member can have a right in the deliberations of the House except what the majority gives him.

My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) told us when he was instancing what might be done under closure, that he was dealing with extreme cases; but I should say he was dealing not only with extreme cases but with impossibilities. He was dealing with bogies and nightmares, when he forecasted conditions under which the Government, because of the amendment of the rules of the House, could ruin the banks of Canada in a few days, tax the railways out of existence, abolish the Railway Commission, and do other such things. Was the hon. gentleman from South Wellington serious with the House when he said these things?

Mr. MACDONALD: You could do it under this rule.

Mr. WHITE: You might be able to do it under any rule, but is it common sense to suppose any government could or would do it? We know that under rule 17 any member can move that a certain member be heard in preference to the one designated by the Speaker, but how many times has that rule been invoked since Confederation?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Only once.

Mr. WHITE: Yes, only once.

Some hon. MEMBERS: And never again.

Mr. MACDONALD: Once you start it you can do it often.

Mr. WHITE: That rule could be invoked by any member of Parliament; it could be invoked improperly at any time; but it was only invoked once, and then only when it was properly invoked. And what are the restrictions upon the Government in the exercise of any of its functions or in the administration of the rules of the House? The hon. member for South Wellington says that the Government can do this, that, and the other thing, and that nobody can say a word; but surely my hon. friend does not appreciate the standing and reputation of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House when he says that a government can perpetrate an arbitrary and high-handed action without protest. He has gone so far as to say that the Government could ruin the commerce of Canada, the banks of Canada, the railways of Canada, and nobody dare lift his voice. I want to appeal to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition—I always go to him when I desire to get a reasoned opinion on the other side of the House—does he consider that such a statement as that, coming from the hon. member for South Wellington, is a sound reasoned opinion, or does he not consider that it is merely political claptrap? Surely nobody takes it seriously; my hon. friend does not take it seriously himself. When he talks about the Government ruining the commerce, and the banking system, and the railway system of this country, and pictures it, in the language of Shakespeare, 'like the baseless fabric of a vision leaving not a wrack behind,' surely he is not serious. The rules we propose do not go nearly as far as the English closure rules; and, having regard to the fact that closure has been introduced in every legislative assembly in the world of any importance, except the Parliament of Canada and the Senate of the United States, I ask hon. gentlemen. are they to take seriously a statement that a government will be so oblivious to the opinion of its own supporters, and to public opinion in the country as to act in such a high-handed manner? Every government must bow to public opinion; no government can take away the rights of a minority; no government can prevent free speech even under closure. But if public business is to be conducted, power must be in the hands of the Government to prevent obstruction, and how and when that power shall be exercised will depend upon public opinion and upon the opinion of the House. It is certain it cannot be exercised arbitrarily.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did not the hon. member see the Minister of Marine and Fisheries act arbitrarily the other day in moving that the question be now put?

Mr. WHITE: I will show that not only was that not an arbitrary exercise of power, but that it was the proper thing to do, and I expect before I conclude that my hon. friend from Pictou will entirely agree with me in that.

Mr. MACDONALD: You have a great deal of confidence in yourself.

Mr. WHITE: It is a great satisfaction to me to see that hon. gentlemen opposite are getting more sedate, and that words and sounds do not disturb them as formerly.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are hearing more of them from your side of the House now.

Mr. WHITE: There is one word which, when used in the House a few weeks ago, had a most extraordinary effect on the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), but which is now quite a usual word.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that the word 'gag'?

Mr. WHITE: Has my hon. friend forgotten the word 'obstruction,' which we were afraid to use on this side of the House for a long time for fear it might cloud the usually unruffled countenance of the hon. member for St. John? Does he recall how the word 'obstruction' used to ruffle him? For my part, I never used the word 'obstruction' when the hon. gentleman was not on his feet with a point of order. And yet, we have heard recently the right hon. the leader of the Opposition stating in this House that obstruction is not only parliamentary, but absolutely justifiable upon occasions. I want to tell my right hon. friend what he said. He justified obstruction upon four counts. If he justified obstruction, is he to be put in the position of justifying something that is not absolutely parliamentary or something that is parliamentary? The whole substance and tenor of the speech of my right hon. friend was to show that obstruction was justifiable under certain circumstances; and, if it is parliamentary to obstruct, how can it be out of order to use the word 'obstruction' in this House? My hon. friend from St. John has now resumed his wonted composure, and the word 'obstruction' no longer has the singular effect which it had upon him a short time ago. My hon. friend from South Wellington and some other hon. gentlemen opposite are showing some evidence of uneasiness over the delay of the public business of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you not bring down your budget?

Mr. WHITE: I shall come to that in a moment.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is what you always say. You are always coming to it, and you never arrive.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend is so impatient. If he will wait a little, I will come to him in time. A good deal will come to him before I get through. The budget will come along in the usual course when the proper time arrives to bring it down.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are beginning to show an appreciation of the consequences of their action in obstructing the business of the country. I have noticed that, when a man has anything very much on his mind and his conscience, he is continually referring to it. At two o'clock the other morning in the House, the hon. member for St. John had this matter of the delay of public business so much upon his mind and his conscience that he actually got up and scouted the idea of adjourning at that hour and demanded that we should continue the business of the House. Why, this question of delay of public business is weighing so heavily upon the minds and consciences of the hon. member for St. John and other hon. gentlemen opposite that they cannot get up here without referring to it. It is the very best evidence of what they feel in their heart of hearts about the delay of public business. My right hon. friend has said: What other business has been obstructed than the Naval Bill? Is the obstruction of the Naval Bill itself not an important matter?

Mr. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. WHITE: It is a matter brought down by the Government which at any stage—its first reading, its second reading, in Committee of the Whole in respect of the whole Bill or in respect of any section or sections—this Government stands ready and has stood ready from the very beginning to put through this House by a majority of fifty per cent over hon. gentlemen opposite. At any stage of the proceedings we have been in that position. Is it a matter of no importance that the will of the majority of the people of this country is to be flouted because hon. gentlemen opposite desire to obstruct? I say that there is no excuse for obstructing that measure. The obstruction of that measure has been a very serious matter indeed. I shall have something to say about that when the naval debate is resumed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: I said something with regard to the naval debate the other day which was not accepted by my hon. friends opposite. My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) is anxious about the budget. From what he said a short time ago, he has even had communications from business interests which were bothered about the budget. I doubt very much as to the communications he has had. He would not be the natural repository of the confidences of business men with regard to the budget. As a matter of fact, as I told him upon that occasion, the country is quite wise to what is going on and has the most absolute confidence in this Government. The business interests of this country are quite aware of what is taking place in this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say: We did not obstruct. They may say that in this House, but they cannot explain that to the people of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is the reason why you are afraid to go to the country.

Mr. WHITE: The people of this country are not blind. They read the newspapers, and they know that as a matter of fact this Bill has been obstructed, not merely, for weeks but for months, with two weeks of continuous session day and night, and they know who did the talking to obstruct that Bill. My hon. friends opposite cannot say that they did not obstruct. 'Hansard' shows who obstructed. For weeks and months the business of this country has been delayed by hon. gentlemen opposite in a factious opposition to the Naval Bill brought down by this Government which was ready at any stage to put it through this House by a majority of forty.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not make it any better.

Mr. WHITE: It does not justify hon. gentlemen opposite in a factious obstruction.

Mr. BUREAU: A majority in the House, but a minority in the country, as has been shown.

Mr. WHITE: That is not so. I doubt very much whether my hon. friend is a good guesser, but I will say: Guess again.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not guessing; I am going on figures given to the House by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin).

Mr. WHITE: Figures?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, figures.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend has been rummaging in the realm of the higher mathematics, and I will not accompany him in that excursion. I have not seen any figures to show me anything other than that the majority in this House has a majority of the people of this country behind it—

Mr. BUREAU: No it has not, not on that question.

Mr. WHITE: —and will have for years to come.

Mr. BUREAU: Why do you not go before the people, then?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) like Martha is anxious about many things, especially about the budget. I told him it would be brought down when the West Indian agreement was brought down.

Mr. MACDONALD: When is the West Indian agreement to be brought down?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Finance has said that the members on this side of the House have been doing all the talking upon the Naval Bill.

Mr. WHITE: Not all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it true that one of the longest speeches made in this House on the Naval Bill was made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance almost immediately before notice was given of closure?

Mr. WHITE: I shall not say one of the longest; I shall say it was one of the best speeches.

Mr. BUREAU: Now we have got your size. We know where you are.

Mr. BELAND: You are too humble.

Mr. WHITE: I have stated to the House that the Budget would wait and was entitled to wait upon the third reading of the West Indian agreement, its passage through the Senate, and its proclamation in accordance with its terms. What has been the position in this House with regard to that Bill? The legislation in connection with that agreement is simply legislation validating the agreement between the West Indian Colonies and the Dominion of Canada. That Bill went through its first and second readings; it went into committee, and came out, and now stands for its third reading.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why do you not bring it on?

Mr. WHITE: I will tell my hon. friend why; I am just coming to it. I asked my right hon. friend—and I have entire confidence in his word; when he tells me that he will not obstruct I know that he will not obstruct. If he tells me that, I know that that will represent his intention at the time; but I am not sure that my right hon. friend has control of this House.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do not worry about that.

Mr. WHITE: My right hon. friend told me that he would not obstruct the Bill. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) rose and stated that he would move an amendment—which was quite in order, although the amendment which he suggested might very properly have been moved in the form of a separate resolution, as it was not in any way connected with the Bill. However, it was quite within his right. Now, my hon. friend from Haliburton who has brought—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not the hon. gentleman know that if I had attempted to bring it up on resolution, it would have gone to the graveyard and never been heard of?

Mr. WHITE: It will go there anyway now, but, as a matter of fact, this was at a time when hon. gentlemen opposite, as I say, were obstructing that Naval Bill night and day.

Mr. OLIVER: The Opposition were not obstructing the Naval Bill; they were obstructing coercion by the Government.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. gentleman is not in accord with his leader, for that right hon. gentleman in his speech indicated as clearly as he could that there had been obstruction on the Naval Bill. My hon. friend from St. John, as I have said, had moved an amendment and I say that that was perfectly within his rights; I would not consider that obstruction in itself,—though I think that if he had moved that amendment there would have been obstruction on that just as there was on the Naval Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WHITE: I will prove it. My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) was desirous, I know, of going on with the third reading of the West Indian Bill; but the hon. member for Carleton, N. B. (Mr. Carvell), got up in his place and said that he would not be bound by an agreement with anybody.

Mr. CARVELL: I said that I would not be bound by an agreement made between the hon. junior member for Halifax and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. WHITE: I am not sure the hon. member said that. The impression I got was that he would not be bound by any agreement, and he had his amendments to move.

Mr. CARVELL: I have them yet.

Mr. WHITE: Very good. Then taking that condition of facts, with the hon. member standing aside, from his party and declaring that he was not bound by any agreement—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WHITE: Then, say he was not bound by an agreement with the junior member for Halifax. But is that hon. member not a responsible member of that party? He is a financial critic; is not his word good? If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) will not be bound by an agreement with the junior member for Halifax, how am I to know he will be bound by an agreement with any member of the Opposition? All this goes to show that the business of this House has been absolutely delayed since December 1 by the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WHITE: There is no mistake about it. We are not going to let these hon. gentlemen get away from it. And the country will not let them get away from it. The people know who has been doing the talking. Some hon. members may have talked for two hours, but hon. gentlemen opposite have been engaged in Marathon efforts that will go down as taking the long-distance record in discussion in this House—six hours at a time.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS—SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 175, respecting the Manitoba Radial Railway Company.—Mr. Molloy.

Bill No. 176, respecting the Southampton Railway Company.—Mr. Crocket.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Excitement is not desirable immediately after dinner, and I propose to avail myself of the style of parliamentary debate commended to the House by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) upon his return from his constituency after the Christmas vacation. I desire at the outset, in resuming my remarks, to deal with the episode in this House on the 9th instant, in the course of which the previous question was moved by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. There has been a good deal of misrepresentation, and, I may say, falsification—I am not now speaking with regard to the remarks of hon. gentlemen of this House—with reference to that episode that would be almost incredible were it not known to have actually occurred. There has been misrepresentation in the press as to what occurred in this House upon the occasion of the moving of the previous question on the 9th instant, and hon. gentlemen opposite have made remarks with regard to the conduct of the right hon. Prime Minister and of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House which I venture to say, they would scarcely repeat outside. This may be part of a political game, but I submit that such remarks are unfair in the extreme. With regard to the misrepresentations to which I have referred, one great journal in this country, feeling that its very able press correspondent in the gallery might be unable to give the report of the occurrences in the House upon that day the degree of veracity which might be required by its readers, had to send to the head office for clerical reinforcements in order that the desired results might be attained. The hon. member for South Wellington used some expressions that, while parliamentary, I think are very much to be deprecated. He said the right hon. Prime Minister, who I may say, is quite able to take care of himself, and requires no defence from me, had spoken words pleasing to hear, and that there were candid tones in his voice; and he made reference to 'part and parcel of the most discourteous expedience ever seen in this Parliament.' He said also that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House should be thoroughly ashamed of themselves in connection with the occurrences of that date. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), speaking the other night, in the very interesting manner which always characterizes his remarks in this House, referred to such articles of destruction as razors, sandbags and of dark alleys, and to treachery of the deepest kind. I wonder what kind of literature the hon. gentleman has been indulging in of late? One would think he had gone back to the days of his boyhood, and had had recourse to some of those dime novels sometimes read by the younger generation, in order to conjure up these razors and sandbags which he said were in evidence upon that historic occasion. He even went so far as to make reference to a skull and crossbones. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), is a very mild-spoken gentleman; I had this clipping before me, and I felt constrained to verify his words, because I could scarcely believe that he used them. In a very eloquent peroration, he said:

Political brigandry never went further in cowardice and treachery under any circumstances or in any country.

What do you think of that?

Mr. OLIVER: That is what I want to ask my hon. friend. Is that not right?

Mr. WHITE: That is one of the boquets from the flower garden of my hon. friend's rhetoric. Let me repeat the words:

Political brigandry never went further in cowardice and treachery under any circumstances or in any country.

These are the remarks my hon. friend made in this House. When my hon. friend is not engaged in harassing the Government here, I am told that he writes editorials for the Edmonton Bulletin. I do not know whether he does or not, but I am sure that, if this is the case, his articles would have a certain force and vigour and breeziness about them characteristic of the prairies. His remarks with reference to political brigandry—

Mr. OLIVER: Brigandage; that was an error on the part of the reporter.

Mr. WHITE: There is nothing like being particular about small things; instead of the word 'brigandry' we will say 'brigandage,' but I do not see that it makes much difference. This closure measure in the House of Commons, according to my hon. friend, is brigandage, but my hon. friend goes West and takes his pen in hand—or gets someone else to take it in hand for him; qui facit per alium facit per se—and here is another boquet culled from the columns of my hon. friend's paper in Edmonton. This, of course, was written in 1911:

A group of strong-headed tongue-waggers have it in their power to hold up the course of business as long as they please, and to block indefinitely the passage of any measure however large the number of their fellows favourable to it, and however warmly the public approve of it.

That fits the case here precisely

The performance is purely a physical one.

That is what we have always contended, that so far as the debate was concerned, it was tedious reiteration, purely a matter of physical endurance. Here are the real convictions of the hon. member in the Edmonton Journal.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend and his friends who made the test of physical endurance did not win by it.

Mr. WHITE: Let us assume that is so, that in 1911 they did make a test of physical endurance.

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking of two or three weeks ago.

Mr. WHITE: This represents my hon. friends reasoned opinion on a debate of that kind. He says:

The performance is purely physical——

Nothing intellectual about it.

—and leather lungs are the only qualifications necessary, save a callous indifference to the rights of a too tolerant majority in the House and out of it.

Look upon this picture and upon that, the counterfeit presentiments of the same gentleman—only one was in the House and the other in Edmonton, here in speech and there in editorial. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has referred also to this episode of the 9th inst. He has to go back to history. He is a great student of history and he can find nothing parallel or analogous to it except Cromwell's ordering the mace to be removed and Louis XIV saying: I am the State. In his peroration the hon. gentleman bursts into song and says:

Dispel this cloud, the light of Heaven restore;
Give me to see, and Ajax asks no more.

He seems to be looking for the light, groping in the darkness, and I think we will have to leave him there.

Let us examine this episode of the 9th instant. The Liberal newspaper press has carefully sought to create the idea in the minds of the public that a studied insult was offered to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. One member of the Opposition, speaking of the matter, I shall not mention his name, is reported to have said that it was possibly the saddest thing that had ever happened in Canada since the rebellion of 1837. Let me say it has also been stated that an attempt was made to humiliate my right hon. friend. We often engage in debate in this House, we have our battles here, but outside we have our opinions, one of the other, and one of the best features of parliamentary life is that we can fight in here and outside maintain our good opinion one of the other and extend to each other the courtesy due from man to man. There can be no insult without intention to insult as my right hon. friend knows; and every hon. member opposite well knows that there is not a man on this side of the House who would contemplate even the appearance of an insult to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition.

An hon. MEMBER: Too late now.

Mr. WHITE: The right hon. gentleman is a man who has devoted his life to public affairs, he has occupied a distinguished position in this country for fifteen years, one of the most eloquent statesmen we have ever had, a man of a high degree of urbanity and courtesy, as was his predecessor Sir John Macdonald. I repeat that it is an outrage that it should be stated that any member or members on this side of the House contemplated in any way to insult the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and I say further that he knows it and every hon. member opposite knows it, no matter what protestations they may make to the contrary. I propose to review that little incident and let us see whether any insult was intended or offered. What were the circumstances on that night of the 9th of April? As we have stated there had been obstruction of this particular measure for months and it had become absolutely patent to all that a measure of closure had to be introduced in this House. My hon. friend from Red Deer in the debate on the 15th instant said to the Government: Why do you not bring in closure; why not have the moral courage to do what Gladstone did—bring in closure? My right hon. friend brings in closure——

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend is, I fear, unintentionally misrepresenting me. I mentioned various courses that the Government might take. I do not think I recommended closure as a course.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. gentleman said:

> If they believe that we are simply destroying parliamentary discussion let them have the moral courage to bring in the closure as Mr. Gladstone and other statesmen did. Why do they stand lingering on the brink, let them bring in closure if that is their way of it and save the discussion.

Of course I may say that we pay a great deal of attention to the advice of the hon. member for Red Deer, who says bring in closure, and with that and other motives actuating my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, the closure resolution was brought down. Hon. gentlemen opposite know now, if they did not then, that if unlimited amendments could be moved to the closure resolution we should be here probably till next fall and perhaps next Christmas. They know that and we know it and the public know it very well indeed. It was a most surprising thing to me that hon. gentlemen opposite should never have heard of such a thing as the previous question, because their action when the previous question was moved was entirely incompatible with any previous knowledge of the rule of the previous question. The hon. member for St. John has been the leader of the Opposition in the tactics that were pursued for the two weeks of night and day sessions and he was supposed to be a master of the rules. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has referred to myself and other hon. gentlemen as mere tyros in parliamentary procedure and I shall not take exception to that statement. As the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) says, we have only been at it for eighteen months. I only say it was an extraordinary thing that veterans like the hon. member for Pictou and the hon. member for St. John should have allowed the hon. the leader of the Opposition to come into this House without posting him that the previous question might be moved. I do not blame my right hon. friend, he attends to larger questions of policy and I do not expect for a moment that he will give his attention to small details of rules. I speak only with reference to the hon. member for St. John and the hon. member for Pictou——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I knew all about it.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. member for St. John was a master of the rules.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I knew of the rules but I did not expect the application.

Mr. WHITE: I had thought that the hon. member for St. John had not realized that there was such a thing in the rules as the previous question. Now, what is the purpose of the previous question? To shut out amendments.

Mr. BUREAU: We all know it.

Mr. WHITE: You know it now.

Mr. BUREAU: We knew it before.

Mr. WHITE: You did not act as if you knew it then.

Mr. BUREAU: We knew it before; we always did.

Mr. WHITE: I will show my hon. friend that he could not have known about the rule before.

Mr. BUREAU: He knew about rule 17 and the previous question.

Mr. WHITE: The Minister of Marine and Fisheries got up to move the previous question and then, after the Speaker had said that my right hon. friend had the floor, the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) rose and moved under rule 17 that the Minister of Marine should now be heard. Now, my right hon. friend, who is usually accurate in his statements, complained that his constitutional right had been taken away from him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: My right hon. friend is a man of good sense.

Mr. MACDONALD: Thanks.

Mr. WHITE: He is a man of good sense, he knows that his constitutional right was not taken away from him, and he knows there was no intention whatever to put any slight upon him. He knows that well because he knows that the purpose of the previous question and the purpose of the motion and rule 17 was not to put a slight upon him, but to put an end to amendments which might have kept the House sitting here for months.

Mr. BUREAU: You are trying to cover it up now.

Mr. WHITE: No man can be insulted unless there is an intention to insult, and I propose to say nothing further on that head because I do not believe for one moment that he thinks there was any intention to insult him, or that any other member on the other side thinks so.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, we do.

Mr. PROULX: The country does.

Mr. WHITE: What happened? As soon as my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) moved under rule 17, one of the rules of this House which every hon. gentleman ought to know, there was tumult and confusion and shouts of 'shame' and 'gag.' Was the shouting of 'shame' and 'gag' consistent with a knowledge of these rules?

An hon. MEMBER: Much depends on the situation.

Mr. WHITE: I do not think it was in the slightest degree. The course that was adopted was a reasonable and constitutional course, which was abundantly justified by the situation at the time and every hon. gentleman opposite is well aware of it. There was, as I have said, confusion. Hon. gentlemen lost their heads for a moment.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh no, do not run away with that idea.

Mr. GRAHAM: You lost yours, or you would not have allowed it to be done.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WHITE: Hon. gentlemen should really see themselves in one of those storms which sweep over them occasionally, and they would never do those things again.

Mr. BUREAU: You should see yourself in your lecture and you would not lecture again.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend cannot see himself as others see him, for he thinks hon. gentlemen did not lose their heads. But there was need for a leader, and when there is need for a leader he always appears, and my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) took the floor and the leadership of the House. One of the Liberal papers in passing an encomium upon my hon. friend from St. John, and upon the action which he took, said that with the magnificent resourcefulness which had always characterized him, he at once got up and relieved the situation, referring to the tumult and confusion to which I have alluded. It then spoke of the hon. member for St. John as the natural leader under the circumstances, the man who had raised more points of order in two weeks than any other man since Confederation; probably. He got up and took charge of the situation and what did he do? He did the precise thing which he should not have done, he moved the adjournment of the House, which had the effect of shutting out my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition from speaking. Who was it that shut out my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition from speaking?

Mr. BUREAU: Since you ask the question, I may say it was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. WHITE: That is what you say, but we do not say that. The man who prevented the right hon. the leader of the Opposition from going on with his speech until nine o'clock was my hon. friend the member for St. John.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: Because my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition could have got up immediately after my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had uttered the words 'I move that that previous question be now put.'

Mr. MACDONALD: Why did you not allow him to stay up when he was up?

Mr. WHITE: I thought I had explained that, but my hon. friend will read it in 'Hansard' and he will be satisfied. I say that the man who prevented the right hon. the leader of the Opposition from speaking was not a member on this side of the House, but my hon. friend from St. John. And what did he say? He said that there was a matter of very grave public urgency and importance, and considering the criticism that he has passed upon the Government from time to time, we naturally expected that it was some sin of omission or commission on our part to which he was going to address himself, because as I have said he was shutting out the leader of the Opposition from speaking. He felt that there was a matter of such urgent public importance that he simply had to get up and bring it to the attention of the House. What was the matter of supreme importance that he brought to the attention of the House? Nothing short of the suffrage movement, votes for women. He thought that this Government had been derelict in its duty because it had not brought in a franchise Bill under which women would be permitted to vote. That is on record as being the matter of urgent public importance which was so strongly felt by the hon. member for St. John who actually shut out his own leader and prevented him from speaking until nine o'clock. I am dealing with facts.

Mr. BUREAU: Fancies, you mean.

Mr. WHITE: My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition said he was deprived of his constitutional right. He could not have been deprived of his constitutional right if we proceeded under the rules, and I have shown that we did proceed absolutely under the rules. I ask my hon. friends opposite is there any rule in the book of rules, any usage known to parliamentarians, or any law of Parliament that was not invoked by my hon. friend from St. John and others in the course of the two weeks' debate which we had? We never complained on this side of the House. We did not whine. We observed the rulings of the Speaker, and we bowed to the rulings. If we did not complain with regard to that, what have hon. gentlemen opposite to complain of if we invoked rule 17? My right hon. friend in concluding his very eloquent address on the night I have alluded to—by the way, my right hon. friend took command at nine o'clock and shut off the debate on the motion to adjourn—said this, referring to the closure. This is his peroration, and I want you to observe how highly coloured it is, what an appearance of unfairness it conveys. He says:

The poison that he offers to-day——

That is, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was offering him poison.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: I am glad to see that one hon. gentleman opposite has a sense of humour. He is laughing at it.

Mr. BUREAU: I am laughing at your lecture.

Mr. WHITE: You will laugh more before I get through. The right hon. gentleman said:

The poison that he offers to us to-day will come to his own lips at some future day. We are in the minority; we can be gagged; we can be prevented from expressing our opinions; they can trample upon our bodies. But, Sir, the day of reckoning will come, and it will come as soon as we have a dissolution of the present Parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: I thought I would get my hon. friend to laugh when I quoted that last sentence. Now, let us see how the professions of hon. gentlemen opposite square with the professions of the party in the past. Let us see how far this talk of poison that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is offering to the leader of the Opposition, and how far those remarks about daggers and razors and sundry instruments of destruction are justified by the opinions held by my hon. friends in the past. I am going to talk about what the leading men opposite said while they were on this side of the House, for I really think that if this is fairly presented, if they knew what their own position was in regard to this matter in the past, we might hear less about the tyranny of the closure. The first quotation I propose to read is from a speech of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and it is from the Globe. Every day of late the Globe has been raising its voice to high Heaven against closure, and I do not think it has been sufficiently emphasized that the Globe took a different position in 1911. One of the most extraordinary things that has occurred here was the repudiation of the Globe by the leader of the Opposition, who seemed to prefer the opinion of the Ottawa Citizen to that of the Globe. I commend what the Globe said in 1911 to my hon. friend from South Renfrew.

Mr. GRAHAM: Read the Citizen of yesterday.

Mr. WHITE: He also prefers the Citizen to the Globe.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would prefer that you should read it.

Mr. WHITE: The Globe said in 1911:

The Government should make it plain that the penalty of deliberate obstruction would be a few weeks of continuous session. Before the steady pressure of that sort of logic obstruction will not long make headway. Already a number of the western and eastern Conservatives are very restive, and only the determined attitude of the Ontario holds them in line. The heat of the summer will do much to lessen the fighting spirit of the irreconcilables, and if they hold out through June and July, then August would be an excellent month for introducing that much needed measure, a bill for applying the principle of closure to parliamentary debate in Canada.

That is the opinion of the historic Liberal Globe, absolutely in favour of closure, and yet gentlemen opposite do not call it tyranny. The Winnipeg Free Press further said:

The Canadian is the only British Parliament of the first rank which has not the closure. It is high time that it lose this undesirable distinction.

What do hon. gentlemen opposite say to that? Then, we have the opinion of the Hon. Mr. Paterson, who was Minister of Customs in the late Administration, and I would like hon. gentlemen opposite to mark and inwardly digest these statements of their leaders. Mr. Paterson said:

If there is anything in the minds of the people at present on which, when the Government ask for a verdict, they will get a favourable verdict by an overwhelming majority, it is this question of obstruction. I can tell you that the rules of this House must be revised in such a manner, that while the amplest time will be given for the discussion of every question and the investigation of every subject, there must be a means devised whereby the hon. member for North Toronto and the little clique around him will not be able to keep this House sitting indefinitely. This is the issue that will be pronounced upon, and the party which will favour a revision of the rules in order that something within the lines of decency may be maintained and the country's money saved will be endorsed by the people, and the party which will be entrusted with the carrying out of that reform will be the party that has ever carried out all reforms.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear—within the lines of decency?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend has just come into the House after no doubt having had a good dinner, and I like to see him smile.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Within the lines of decency.

Mr. WHITE: Is my hon. friend sure he is not within the lines of Torres Vedras? These relations have already been placed on 'Hansard' but there is a tendency to forget.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are you sure it is not tedious repetition?

Mr. WHITE: Not if it is illuminated by comment. Here is what the Hon. Sydney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture in the Liberal Administration, said:

—I give my pledge that, if the Laurier Government is returned again, the rules of the House will be changed. I consider present conditions inimical to the proper conduct of public business.

If he thought that then, what would have been the opinion of the Hon. Sydney Fisher had he gone through that two weeks of continuous talk we had lately? Mr. Fisher said further, speaking at Knowlton, Quebec:

The minister stated that it was the intention of the Government, should it be returned, to so change the rules of the House, that such obstruction would in future be impossible.

The answer of the leader of the Opposition is, that while that was the opinion of his ministers, it was not his opinion; that he is a Liberal of the old school and does not believe in closure. But the right hon. gentleman has not told us of any Liberal of the new school who is opposed to closure. What about Mr. Gladstone, who was the father of closure in the British Parliament? What about Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Churchill, and other distinguished Liberals in England who are all in favour of closure? Hon. gentlemen opposite say that unless the Government has an express mandate from the people they should not propose such an important measure as the closure, but let me point out to the leader of the Opposition that in the case of the Insurance Act and the Home Rule Bill in the British Parliament, the Government had not the mandate of the people.

Mr. MACDONALD: Certainly they had.

Mr. WHITE: Certainly not with regard to the Insurance Bill. My hon. friend is well up in ancient history, but he apparently knows nothing of modern history.

Mr. MACDONALD: You have not been reading your English politics.

Mr. WHITE: The English closure is called a guillotine closure, a compartment closure, and kangaroo closure. In the British Parliament closure became necessary because of abuse of the rules of the House, just as closure in this House has been rendered necessary by the abuse of our rules. It is said that free discussion in this Parliament is absolutely necessary, and I agree. I say that free parliamentary discussion is one of the safeguards of liberty and freedom. There are all shades of opinion in a country such as this, and it is absolutely necessary there should be a central parliament in which any representative of the people may voice the views of his constituents. That is in the interest of the state; it sometimes prevents revolution, because there are opinions strongly held in some quarters that have only to be uttered to be refuted, whereas if they are repressed they are apt to do mischief. And what is the difference between present conditions and past conditions which have rendered closure necessary in every parliament under the British flag? It is because business methods have changed; business has become more highly organized than ever before and parliamentary business like other business has become more complex and more comprehensive. Let any hon. gentleman look to the number of Orders in Council passed twenty years ago as compared with the number passed today; let him study the volume of legislation that comes before this Parliament as compared with that of a generation ago, and he must come to the conclusion that the day for long debates and five or six-hour speeches has passed. There is a higher degree of intelligence than there was twenty years ago, and there is wider diffusion of knowledge, and closure has been brought about in all parliaments with the exceptions I have named, by the necessity of modern conditions. The rules of Parliament are for the purpose of facilitating the transaction of public business and of legislation necessary for the wants of the people, and the abuse of the rules of Parliament is an abuse of the privileges of Parliament. If these rules are to prevent necessary legislation being introduced and carried to its conclusion, then Parliament, for its own protection, must have closure. That is precisely our position. We have not been swift about it at all. Closure has been introduced for many years in Great Britain. It is in operation in every representative assembly in the world, except in the Senate of the United States and in this House. Consider the length of the parliamentary sessions that we have in Canada. We have on both sides of this House men drawn from all parts of Canada, a country four thousand miles in width, the size of Europe, and presenting a variety of subjects of legislative interest as great as any in the world. We have in this representative assembly men drawn from all walks in life, from agriculture, from the great professions of law and medicine, from commerce and from finance All these men are willing, every one of them, so far as I know, to come and to give their time in this House so far as it may be necessary for the transaction of public business. I think I may make that statement without fear of contradiction. Every member is willing to do his duty in that regard. I say, however that the members of this House will not continue to be willing to stay here for eight or ten months of the year when the business of this country should be transacted in four or five. These men are willing to abandon their business or profession, and remain here as long as is necessary; but they are absolutely unwilling that their time should be wasted by debates protracted beyond all reason. Apart altogether from this Naval Bill, the closure will be one of the greatest measures that has ever been introduced into Parliament in order to facilitate the transaction of public business, or the legislation required to meet the wants of the country. It had to come.

Mr. MACDONALD: I thought it was not going to be applied. The Premier said he was not going to apply it.

Mr. WHITE: A very distinguished hon. gentleman opposite—I shall not mention his name—a minister of the preceding Administration, said, at a joint meeting at which I spoke with him before a society in Montreal, that the British cabinet system of government in Canada—he was speaking with reference to the work of ministers —was the greatest man-killing institution that we have; and he is right. No man, I do not care who he is, I do not care what his physical or his mental strength, can discharge the duty that he owes to this country as a minister if these parliamentary discussions are going to be carried on for eight or ten months every year. A minister does a good day's work, sometimes two day's work, after three o'clock in the afternoon. No man believes more in the freedom of discussion than I do; but this discussion has gone to an unreasonable and unlimited extent, and the time has come when in the interest of the administration of this country, if for no other particular reason, it must be checked and kept within proper bounds. That is the reason why closure was introduced in the British Parliament and in every other representative assembly in the Anglo-Saxon world except in this Parliament and in the Senate of the United States.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite are almost disposed to fall down and worship the rules, as a sort of ritual. Rules are subordinate; they are not the principal thing; they are to enable us to effectuate something. We must change rules when they are no longer capable of serving the purpose for which they were originally designed. In other words, rules are conditioned by the reasons for their existence. It seems an obsolete argument to talk of closure as tyranny or gag. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has shown conclusively that this measure of closure which he has introduced is mild compared with the British closure. He says: If you are not satisfied that this is a milder form of closure than the British closure, I will give you the British form. He could not have been fairer in his attitude to hon. gentlemen opposite. He has shown hon. gentlemen opposite that they have nothing to fear in connection with the application of this resolution to the proceedings of this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite are conjuring up phantoms. Some of their speeches are the stuff that dreams are made of. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) looks at me with a good deal of interest when I say that.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was wondering how my hon. friend was going to reconcile the argument which he made a moment ago as to the necessity for closure with the assurance given by the Prime Minister that the closure was not to be applied.

Mr. WHITE: The Prime Minister has the faculty of making himself very clearly understood to those who are open to conviction. If my hon. friend did not understand him, I do not believe the fault is that of my right hon. friend or of myself.

How do the people regard this? We take ourselves pretty seriously, and properly so, in this House; but I sometimes think that we take ourselves as politicians a good deal more seriously than the people take us. I say this, and do not believe it can be contradicted, that a more popular measure was never introduced into this House.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the climax.

Mr. WHITE: I say that closure is away overdue in this House.

Mr. GRAHAM: Like the budget speech.

Mr. BUREAU: And the West Indian treaty.

Mr. WHITE: If it is overdue like the budget speech, and my hon. friend thinks the budget speech is overdue, that is a good reason for introducing it. The public say: What are you talking about; too much talk down there, why do you not do more?

An hon. MEMBER: Why do you not stop talking?

Mr. WHITE: Why do I not stop talking? That just shows how unreasonable my hon. friend is. I get up here for a paltry hour and a half, and yet we have heard hon. gentlemen opposite talking against time. There are some hon. gentlemen opposite who could talk, not against time, but against eternity, and win out. My hon. friend objects to my getting up here in a humble and unobtrusive way and speaking to him words of truth and soberness for an hour and a half.

Mr. GRAHAM: We admit the soberness.

Mr. WHITE: I am glad to have my hon. friend's admission.

The very genius of the British parliamentary system is that the majority of the House shall govern. What is the antithesis of that? It is that the minority shall govern, and then you will have anarchy. The majority in the House must govern. This Government has a majority in this House on all occasions, in connection with the naval or any other Bill. Let me repeat again, at any stage of that Bill—its first reading, its second reading, in committee on any section of the Bill—we stand prepared and ready by a majority of fifty per cent over hon. gentlemen opposite to support that measure and to carry it through. We have been blocked. It is admitted that we have been blocked; my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition admitted it. I do not know what my hon. friend from St. John thinks of that. We know how he regarded the word 'obstruction'; yet my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition glories in obstruction, and my hon. friend from St. John never says a word. He knows that the word 'obstruction' has now a different sound to him from what it had two weeks ago.

Mr. GRAHAM: We can also say 'closure' now.

Mr. WHITE: Two weeks ago he would have been willing to move a resolution in this House that the word 'obstruction' be expunged from the dictionary, such an effect it had upon him. But my right hon. friend, who is a great political doctor, has cured him of that, and now he hears the word 'obstruction' as an ordinary word of the English language.

Now, I am done. I am sure hon. gentlemen will say they are glad.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WHITE: I only wish to emphasize again the point: this Government, in power eighteen months, fresh from the people, with a majority in this House, should be allowed to carry on the business of the country. Hon. gentlemen must admit that. If they were in a like case, they would take a like view. The leading men in the last Administration were in favour of closure. Closure has become absolutely indispensable. That is recognized by this Government, and I believe it is recognized by members of the Opposition; it certainly is recognized by the members behind us; and I believe it is recognized by Parliament as a whole. It is an indispensable necessity for the carrying on of the business of Parliament; and in addition it has the support of the great body of public opinion throughout the country.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) is altogether wrong in thinking that we were glad he was through. Far be it from us to interfere with a speech which has been incubating so long. He has not spoken as often as I should like. He threatened us with a speech once or twice, but that speech remained unborn for weeks. The hon. gentleman mentioned one speech that he had delivered and admitted that it was a good one. Having prepared it himself, having delivered it himself, and knowing every word of it, I suppose he is the best judge of its quality. For myself, I should express an opinion with hesitation in the face of such facts. However, I also would be ready to admit that it was a good speech, and I am glad to have my opinion substantiated by that of my hon. friend. It ought to have been a good speech; it was a long time coming.

Mr. WHITE: The way a speech ought to be.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, some of them should never come. The hon. gentleman warned us that he felt speech coming on him; he was going to give us a speech on the navy question. But something happened and speech departed, and days and nights passed, mornings, noons, weeks, more weeks—and still no speech. My hon. friend did not make that speech until he visited the Albany Club and found out what they thought of a Finance Minister in charge of the money-bags of the country not saying a word about the expenditure of $35,000,000 of the people's money. My hon. friend suggests that I am not very literary, that I take my literary quotations—I think he said, from Jack the Giant Killer, Texas Bill, and literature of that kind. I suppose my hon. friend in the days when he, like myself, was in the newspaper business, did vary his labours occasionally by reading light literature. But let me recall to him something else. It is not from Shakespeare—I think, he quoted Shakespeare to show how much stronger he was on classical lore than I am; I have forgotten what the quotation was, but he blamed it on Shakespeare. Now, men who attain high position may look down on their humble fellows; but sometimes these men fall. Readers of Milton will remember a case of that kind. One very important personage is there described:

> High on a throne of royal state,
> Which far outshone the wealth of Ormus or of Ind,
> Satan exultant sat.

Mr. WHITE: 'Exalted' sat.

Mr. GRAHAM: But this great personage took an awful tumble. I suppose perhaps he had been admitting that he made good speeches. Also he was inclined to want the rules of the place changed, so as to give him control of certain things that he was not able to control under existing conditions. But his fall was swift; it was disastrous; and could not be retrieved. I do not quote this to compare my hon. friend with that personage at all but to say that there is a possibility he might take a tumble, or, to put it in more parliamentary language, he might fall from his high estate; the gagging of members of this House may prove his undoing when he appeals to the country, because they will not be gagged.

The hon. gentleman took some time to apologize for not bringing in the Bill to confirm the agreement with the West Indies. It is too bad for the country that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) was called away at the time he was, because we should have had no such excuse from him. That hon. gentleman started his measure and, in the face of a good deal of criticism, he put that measure through to the stage in which he was compelled to leave it, which was quite an advanced stage. He did not object to our criticising it, he did not object to amendments.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He accepted my amendments.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, he accepted one of them. But here we have a Minister of Finance, responsible to this country for its financial arrangements, responsible for the whole business of the country, so far as one member of the Government can be responsible, rising in his place and telling the people of Canada that he allows the third reading of the West Indies Bill to stand because he is afraid that somebody would dare to move an amendment to it. The hon. gentleman is a previous question mark himself of the strongest kind. He would move the previous question on this West Indies Bill if he dared, because he is afraid of an amendment. He has gone a long way with his new friends in gaining for himself not only credit for making excellent speeches, but the ability the infallibility, of his legislation. And so he says not only in the closure, but in other ways: You have no business to amend what we propose; in relation to the West Indies treaty, no man in this House has any business to move an amendment to that treaty, and I will not bring it down for fear that somebody may do so. What are the Opposition here for? Are we here to take part in the legislation of the country? That excuse will not go down with the business people of the Dominion of Canada, nor with our fellow British subjects in the West Indies. That Bill should have been brought forward for third reading long, long ago. It would have received proper attention from this side of the House. And suppose amendments were moved—what is legislation for? And what are we here for? Are we to be told that no man behind the minister, no man on this side of the House, knows anything about this question, or knows sufficient to make an amendment that will assist in making that legislation more practical? That must have been the conclusion of hon. gentlemen when they heard the Finance Minister seriously tell this House that he had not proposed the third reading of the measure for fear somebody on this side would move an amendment. I tell him that it is the right of hon. members to move amendments; and it is our duty to let the people of Canada know what the minister is doing to prevent the moving of amendments. The question of trade with the West Indies is a very important one; if it were not thought so this Government would not have carried out the arrangement which was practically entered into by its predecessors. That trade is important, and in order that Canada may receive the greatest benefit from this trade agreement, it is not only the privilege but the duty of every member of this House who thinks he can improve that legislation to take advantage of every opportunity that presents itself to offer amendments or otherwise suggest improvements.

My hon. friend spoke also of the budget speech. Surely he does not want us to believe that the people of this country have not been anxious to hear that deliverance known as the budget speech, in which the Finance Minister lays before this House and the country the financial condition of Canada, her trade development and prospects, and any alterations proposed to be made in the tariff of the country? Why has the budget speech not been brought down? Because the naval proposition and the gag are supposed to be of greater importance than the public business of the Dominion of Canada. The parliamentary programme of the Government is like their naval policy—it is stern first. What do I mean by that? Hon. gentlemen opposite propose to construct a navy, and I may remark that every hon. gentleman from Ontario on that side of the House, with the possible exception of two members, is in favour of a Canadian navy, and dare not say to his constituents anything to the contrary. The manner in which this question is being discussed in the constituencies of members from Ontario is: We are going to do this, but we are going to have a Canadian navy. That is the apology made for this proposition. But how are they going to construct a navy? By beginning at the right end of the proposition and first constructing a consort, or these ships which necessarily accompany the larger ones? No; they intend to begin the construction of the navy by building the big ships first and the small ones afterwards, beginning as a contractor would attempt to build a church by constructing the tower first. So it is with the parliamentary programme of hon. gentlemen opposite. They present to us the Naval Bill, and then they say: If you do not put it through, no matter what your argument is, we will not let you do any other business in this Parliament—and then we will blame you for the consequences.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Does my hon. friend know the date upon which the budget was brought down in 1911?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. gentleman should look it up.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am discussing the present situation in this House, and the stern-first parliamentary programme of my hon. friends. The naval proposition is brought down first, and we are told: You can do no business until you put this Bill through; no matter what your arguments may be, you must settle this naval question first. The members on the Government side are told: When we go into committee on this Bill you must not say a ward; the members on this side of the House are told: You can neither eat nor sleep until you pass the Bill embodying the naval proposition, no matter what other business of the country may require attention. And then they expect us to act as docile lambs, meekly lick the hand that smites us, and pretend that we think hon. gentlemen opposite would be fair to the Opposition if they had an opportunity. Sir, let me give you a homely illustration of what I think of their fairness. I would just as willingly look for fairness from the political marriage of a jingo and a Nationalist as I would expect to get prize-fighting progeny from a consumptive couple. I admit that my hon. friend is a good historian; he acquired a certain amount of literary ability while connected with that Toronto journal which is noted for its delving into the relics and old quotations of the last two centuries. As a good historian, therefore, my hon. friend gave us some history to-night. Of course it is not ancient history; I think the events he related are almost within the memory of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. As we have heard quotations from Shakespeare and Milton and others, I am sure my hon. friend will not object if I quote from such authorities as the Montreal Star, the Prime Minister and others of a like importance. The Montreal Star is a great newspaper; I think the name of the proprietor must have something to do with its success. I take this from a quotation made by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) the other evening. The Star said in 1908:

> We must never forget that freedom of debate is a right of immense value. The power to do business may be of greater value; and no one doubts, for example, that the American Congress was justified in putting a stop to the 'filibustering' which prevented that body from transacting the business of the nation. But the condition of blockade ought to precede the application of the remedy. The nation must really suffer before it will be willing to give up the privilege of free debate.

Canada has never suffered, if hon. gentlemen opposite believe she did not suffer on account of the business of the country being blocked to a certain extent in 1911.

With a Parliament so little burdened with business as ours, it is hard to conceive of a condition of affairs under which our people would be willing to give to the majority the power to gag the minority at will. That is a very tyrannical and dangerous power; and might be used most despotically. The nation could be made to suffer far more under present conditions from the shutting off of free discussion than it is likely to suffer from the tieing up of public business. Conditions may change as Canada grows and our national business becomes more intricate and voluminous. But it will not do to regard the addition of the parliamentary gag to our weapons of party warfare as a matter of little importance, and a step abundantly justified by the tediousness of the talkers in the Commons.

That is the opinion of the Montreal Star, and my hon. friend has taken the advice of that paper from the beginning, so far as the naval question is concerned. The right hon. gentleman ought to go back to 1908 and season his judgment with a little of the salt used in the concoction which the Star handed out to the Government at that time. But my right hon. friend the Prime Minister glories in obstruction; he says obstruction is all right; that the business of the country, if the occasion arises, should be stopped, and that members of the House should be prevented from putting through measures that are not in the interests of the country. In the Canadian Annual Review of 1911, on page 176, there is an account of a speech delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister in St. John, N.B., on September 5, 1911. After reciting some of the incidents connected with that meeting, the Annual Review says:

In this address also Mr. Borden frankly admitted having obstructed the agreement in Parliament.

That was the reciprocity agreement. I will read the extract again, as my hon. friend read several quotations twice, and I am strong on precedent:

Where does the lecture from the Minister of Finance come in, here his leader says that he obstructed and that obstruction was right. Then he proceeds to give his own words:

We would have been untrue to our duty if we had not obstructed.

So say we on the Navy Bill. Call it what you like, I felt it my duty, as did the other members on this side of the House, when members on the other side refused to discuss that question after it had got into committee, to use every legitimate means in our power to prevent the passage of an Act which we thought was inimical to the best interests of Canada and the interests of the great Empire of which we form a part. My right hon. friend proceeds again:

I have no apologies to offer for our course he declared amid loud cheers. We would not have been worthy of our responsibility if we had done anything else.

Then, Sir, in the face of that declaration by the Prime Minister of this country, how comes it that his colleagues rise and tell us that what we have been doing is a menace to the country? We would not have been true to our duty as representatives of the people, as the leader of these hon. gentlemen said under similar circumstances they would not have been worthy of the people they represented, had we not obstructed the Bill. I ask hon. gentlemen to go back in the history of the Dominion of Canada, to 1896. The predecessors of these men—great men as they are their predecessors were equally great—they did not, in the year 1896, although they knew that Parliament was coming to an end in a few weeks, resort to the gag or to the closure but they allowed free discussion and, like men in responsible positions, they said: this is a great question and rather than apply the gag we will allow the people of the Dominion of Canada to settle it. And they did settle it. I am not going to argue upon the merits of the settlement but I challenge any hon. gentleman in this House to rise in his place and say that any evil resulted so far as the Dominion of Canada was concerned by allowing of that free speech in 1896. Coming to the year 1911 what happened? Hon. gentlemen opposite were then on this side and they took advantage of every legitimate means in their power, headed by the present Prime Minister, and he admits or maintains proudly that he did right, to prevent that agreement going through the House. That was an Act to ratify an agreement. While my hon. friend to-night said that an Act to ratify an agreement with the West Indies should not be approached with rude hands in this House in the way of amendments, they stopped altogether for weeks and weeks the ratifying of an agreement with the United States. The Opposition on that occasion were not taken hold of in a brutal manner and told: You will have to sit up day and night until you pass it. They were treated like human beings and given an adjournment at a reasonable hour every night. What did the then Prime Minister do? I am telling no secrets when I say that some of his colleagues were in favour of closure, but the man who sits to my right, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was never in favour of closure and never would submit a closure measure to Parliament while he was Prime Minister.

Mr. CROTHERS: If the right hon. leader of the Opposition in 1911 did not consent or agree in the Government to the introduction of closure had he succeeded in the elections of September 1911, how came it that some of his colleagues declared upon the platform that if they were returned to power they would introduce closure?

Mr. GRAHAM: If the hon. member will allow me, I will answer his question.

Mr. CROTHERS: Answer that one.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will say that it need never have been done, it need never have been mentioned, just like the payment of the Farmers' Bank depositors, promised by my hon. friend has never been carried out.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend attempts to answer my question by asking another. I asked how came it that one of his colleagues declared on the platform that they agreed to introduce closure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CROTHERS: Or that closure would be introduced if you succeeded. Would he have made that statement had not the leader of the Opposition agreed to it? My hon. friend has said something about the Farmers' Bank. I am quite prepared to discuss the question of the Farmers' Bank and justify every word I said on the public platform on it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will take that up another day. That is of vital importance. I cannot move the adjournment of the House because it has been moved, but we will discuss it at some time. I do not know that any colleague of the Prime Minister stated that closure would be introduced but I do know that the then Prime Minister, now the leader of the Opposition, was always opposed to the closure in any form, and I think I am safe in saying that if a government had been returned with him as Prime Minister, there never would have been any closure.

The Prime Minister shortly before he assumed office made the statement that he defended absolutely and was proud of obstruction. That being the case what happened? The then Prime Minister could have introduced the closure had he so desired, he could have done what this Government has done and could have used his majority in the same manner as this Government propose to use their majority. Then what would have happened? The reciprocity measure would have gone through and would to-day be on the statute book. I am not going to argue whether that would have been a good or a bad thing for Canada, that was settled by the people, in a measure, in 1911. But what is the position of the hon. gentlemen opposite? The then Prime Minister did what this Government ought to do, he submitted the question to the people of Canada. What was the result? The opinion entertained by the majority of this House at that time was not entertained by the majority of the people of the Dominion of Canada and Canada to-day is free from an arrangement which the people of Canada said should not have been entered into. Had it been otherwise Canada to-day would have had what the election showed the people of Canada did not want to have. If this Closure Bill goes through and the Navy Act is forced through by means of it, the people of Canada will have on the statute-book and become committed to an expenditure which I believe they do not want and are opposed to. I want to read three or four quotations from the speeches of prominent men on this question of closure in 1908. This was before the discussion of 1911. This was in 1908 when there was a discussion in this House in relation, I think, to an amendment of the Election Act. I will first read a few words from the speech of a very prominent gentleman in this country. They are as follows:

> But, so far as the English practice is concerned, they go indefinitely further than I hope we shall ever be obliged to go in this country. If we carried out the English practice to the full we would adopt the English system of closure, under which the passage of the estimates would be reduced to very little more than a farce.

These words were spoken by the present Prime Minister in 1908. My right hon. friend will of course argue that we are not going so far as the British House of Commons. In my humble judgment, if clause 4 remains in the rules, we are going further than the guillotine methods in the British House of Commons in the matter of putting estimates through. Let me read another quotation:

> Rumours have been prevalent for some time past in the Government press that the Government intended to revise the rules of the House at an early date, and to introduce what is known as a closure. I would like to ask the First Minister if that is the intention in this revision of the rules. I would like to say that so far as I can judge the temper of parliamentarians generally, they regard the freedom of debate as one of the dearest rights of the representatives of the people, and if any attempt is made under the guise of amending the rules to prevent the freest discussion of all public questions, I can only say that in my judgment the Government will invite a good deal of trouble.

These words were from a speech of your own, Mr. Speaker, in 1908. Now, Sir, I will quote another prominent gentleman:

I for one have no idea at all of submitting without protest to any of the well-defined liberties of the House as a parliamentary body being infringed upon.

These were the words of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). Here is another quotation, and I am sorry that the independent member for South York is not here, because he rose in his place the other day and mightily smote us with his vote in an attempt to put the gag on us. Here is what he said in 1908:

I trust that this committee will in no way interfere with the liberties of Parliament, and especially with the liberties of individual members of this House. In the United States to-day we see that the popular Chamber has lost its liberties, and has passed under the domination of a Speaker who is now known as a Czar, and consequently that chamber, which should have been the model chamber throughout the world, has lost its prestige and its power, that power having passed to another body. I do not wish to see a repetition of that history in this country.

These were the words of the hon. member for South York in 1908. These quotations are just a few that I picked out at random. They express the opinions of men who were giving their attention to the question at that time as they saw the situation in this Parliament, and in spite of the apologies made on the other side of the House, these views stand unrefuted and uncontradicted to-day so far as logic and reason are concerned. What are we doing in this House at the present time?

An hon. MEMBER: You are doing well.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not like to go the length of saying that I am making as good a speech as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, but I think I am giving a better speech than my hon. friend has been allowed to make since the gag went on the government side. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance related to us in detail how in a gentlemanly, soft, kid-glove manner the leader of the Opposition was metaphorically sand-bagged. It was done in a genteel way, and no person ought to take offence at the way in which it was done, he said. It was legal and constitutional, and according to the rules, and there was no intention of injuring the feelings of the leader of the Opposition. No such feeling inhabited the breasts of hon. gentlemen opposite or lurked in the persons of members on the Government benches. I have known a man to be killed without any intention on the part of the killer, and the man was dead just the same.

An hon. MEMBER: How funny!

Mr. GRAHAM: What happened, Mr. Speaker? Every hon. member in this House knows what happened, and disguise it as they will and apologize for it as they may I say it was an affront upon the oldest member of the House who has been the most prominent man in Canada both in Imperial and Canadian affairs. The Minister of Finance asks how could that be that when the rules permitted it. Sir, there are rules deeper than even the Ten Commandments. There are rules deeper than can be implanted on the books or statutes of any parliament, and one of those rules is the courtesy that ought to be extended by one man to another in this House or out of it. A good deal of play has been made on the action of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and associated with him was the Minister of Railways and Canals. Do not let that be lost sight of. The Minister of Railways and Canals seconded the motion of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and if there is guilt or credit attached to the action he must equally share it with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. When the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition had risen to his feet, a man to whom the country has listened, to whom the British Empire has listened, to whom the world has listened for over a quarter of a century, he was confronted with a motion from the hon. member for East Hastings, ordering him to sit down and let another man speak in his place. Is that courtesy? What was the reason? Simply that some person might move an amendment. Infallibility is claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we on this side of the House are to be governed by rules in regard to which we are not allowed to make a single amendment or any practical suggestion. And my hon. friend the Minister of Finance calls that fair play. Suppose that an amendment had been moved by my hon. friend. I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, I ask any hon. member in this House, I ask any man in the Dominion of Canada, who is better fitted to move an amendment to the rules governing Parliament than the man who has been longest in this House? Suppose he had moved an amendment. I leave it to the judgment of this House, whether it would not have been more in keeping with the dignity of Parliament and more to the credit of the Government if he had moved an amendment, if we had discussed it for three weeks, than to have such an incident as that which took place and which has been talked about all over the British Empire. There are some things, Mr. Speaker, that are stronger and higher even than getting a measure through the House of Commons to gag part of it, and however much hon. gentlemen may attempt to laugh it off they will find when they go to their constituents throughout Canada they may be forgiven for applying the gag, they may be forgiven for telling us there was an emergency when there was no emergency, they may be forgiven for putting through a measure of closure which we think should not go through, but down in the hearts of the people of Canada, as the father and mother and children sit around the fireside and talk about it, my hon. friends will never be forgiven for the insult which they offered to the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friends seem to have found their speech for the moment, but this gag will apply to them as well as to us when the Government want to put some measure through and want their followers to keep off the grass. What does this closure mean? It means the contravention of every principle underlying representative government. Go where you will, the lowliest citizen in this Dominion has the right through his representative to a voice in the legislation under which he is to live, and we on this side of the House are the only citizens of the Dominion of Canada to-day, who are told legislation shall be passed to govern us, in which we are not allowed to have any voice whatever. Representative government exists no longer in Canada. We are not even allowed to amend the rules which are forced on us for our guidance. The Prime Minister did not answer the question put by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and he knows it. The Minister of Finance made a speech; I think we will admit a good speech, but he talked of everything else except the rules now under discussion. I say that if the interpretation put on the rules by the leader of the Opposition is right, then not a man on that side of the House can deny that we are robbed of our rights as representatives of the people.

An hon. MEMBER: A great pity.

Mr GRAHAM: A member of this House who would make such a remark on an occasion of this kind does not take his position seriously. I believe, Sir, that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition has interpreted these rules as they can be applied, and, judging from the experience of the past few weeks, as they will be applied if the necessity arises. The moving of the previous question has prevented our offering an amendment, and we are forced to sit here without changing the proposition submitted to us in one word or syllable. We on this side of the House have had nothing to say in the preparation of these rules; Mr. Speaker; you yourself have had nothing to say about them, and I submit that the men who prepared these rules are not in the same impartial position to interpret them as is a member of this House who takes them exactly as they are. Who in this House, unbiased by partyism who would take the interpretation of these rules from younger members of the House, no matter how able, in preference to the interpretation of them by a distinguished parliamentarian who has been half a century in Parliament; who has been Prime Minister for fifteen years; who himself has taken part in making rules to govern our procedure ? I leave it to the wisdom of the country if the interpretation placed upon these rules by so able a parliamentarian is not more apt to be correct than the interpretation put upon them by certain gentlemen who helped to draft them and have their minds focussed in one direction. Sir, we on this side of the House have been deprived of our rights. Much as I respect the Prime Minister, I do not wish to stand in this House to voice the views of my constituents by the grace of any man. I have rights that the majority cannot take away from me as a member of this House. There are certain rights under the British constitution and under parliamentary practice and usage that can be taken from me if the majority so wills, but the moment that is done this is not a parliament; the members of this House become a mob and not a parliament. I have rights in my sphere as a representative of the people that are just as sovereign within that sphere as the rights of the king on his throne. The majority has no power to deprive me of these rights.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Did my hon. friend hear me read the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Fielding ?

Mr. GRAHAM: I heard the present Minister of Finance state again and again that the majority must rule.

Mr. WHITE: I quoted that from Mr. Fielding.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of Finance will have to read the 'Hansard' in the morning to find out whether he made a good speech or not, but I tell him there are certain limits within which the majority must rule, and outside of which they cannot rule. The majority of people in my neighbourhood cannot enter my house and rob me by force, because the moment they do that they become a mob, nor can the majority in this House encroach on my rights as a British subject.

Mr. CURRIE: Does the hon. gentleman say that he has rights in this House beyond those which the House gives him?

Mr. GRAHAM: When the majority attempts to make rules that are not in accordance with British practice and which invade the right of members of this Parliament, they are overstepping their powers and are acting unconstitutionally. I have a perfect right to stand up here and object to the utmost of my ability to the attempted forfeiture of my rights under the constitution and under parliamentary and representative government. I say, Sir, that not only cannot the majority in this House take away my rights, but they cannot take away the rights of Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Speaker cannot take away my rights either. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) tried to take away our rights, but the House would not let him. I leave it to every student of the British constitution and of parliamentary government if there are not certain rights to which I am entitled in this Parliament and which no majority has authority to take from me, no matter how big that majority may be. As a member of the Opposition I cannot be forced to rise in my place and say: by the grace of the majority may I be allowed to voice the opinion of my constituents. I want the rules to be stated in plain language so that I may know what my rights are and so that I may be able to defend them. I ask no quarter from the Government and no man on this side of the House asks quarter from the Government. The Government with its majority has said that it would no longer agree to the old principle that has been followed in this House of Government by agreement between the parties, and of rules decided by agreement between the parties. They throw that practice of years to the winds, and they now say: We will depend on our majority, and by brute force we will put this rule through. I say to them: Do it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that such a statement as he has made is out of order and ought to be withdrawn. It is not in order for him to say that any members of this House have applied brute force; it is in my opinion a reflection on Parliament. The hon. member for the sake of his own good standing in this House should withdraw that remark.

Mr. GRAHAM: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I shall use the words 'physical force.'

Mr. SPEAKER: That is quite parliamentary. I think the hon. member, for the sake of his own standing in the House, ought to withdraw that remark.

Mr. GRAHAM: I meant to withdraw what I said. I understood that I was withdrawing at your request.

To come back to my point again, I want to point out that the Government and its majority have said: We will not have any more agreements with the Opposition as to the carrying on of business; we are going to depend upon our supreme force and upon our overwhelming majority. I do not complain about that; but, as that is the stand taken in regard to these rules, I hesitate to accept the position that I am to be placed in of rising to ask the permission of anybody if I can speak on any question, if I think I am in order under the rules. When the Prime Minister tells me that these rules shall not be interpreted as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition thinks; that they cannot be so interpreted, and that they never will be, I say that is not the pound of flesh. We have been held to the rules. Rules have been enforced in this House that have never before been put in execution since I have been a member. We have had decisions in the Chair that will not be upheld by anybody. I wish now in the midst of the debate on these rules to have it distinctly understood that we want to have rules that can be literally applied; and, if there is any difference of opinion, that ought to be sufficient reason for my right hon. friend to withdraw these rules and to let these differences of opinion be harmonized, not as to the application of closure but as to what the meaning of these rules is, because nobody in this House at the present time knows what they mean. It has been made an excuse that this resolution has been introduced in order that the Naval Bill may be put through Parliament. I say that that is not the case. Clause 4 has nothing to do with the Naval Bill. It relates to discussion when the House is moved into Committee of Supply and it restricts our rights on Thursdays and Fridays, say what any person may. If this resolution were only for the putting through of the Naval Bill, we would object strenuously; but it would not have this added sting that our rights are to be curtailed in discussing public questions on a motion to go into Supply. My own position is this, and I state it very frankly. I do not believe that this House has any right to pass this resolution. I believe that the Government are bringing it in in an unfair manner; they are bringing it in contrary to the usage and practice of the British House, previous to 1867, which our rules say they cannot do. I believe they are violating the constitutional practice of Great Britain; that they are violating our own rules and that they are violating every principle of representative Government. So far as I am concerned, I intend to oppose this resolution in every legitimate manner. I think I have a right to do so and I believe that, if the people of Canada had a chance to pronounce, they would pronounce against the adoption of any such rules in this House.

There is only one way out of the difficulty. The Government have introduced this resolution. The Government have introduced the Naval Bill. The people of Canada are interested in these two questions. If the Government believe that they are right and that they have the people behind them, let us get rid of this vexed question of closure. Let us retrace our steps and place this Parliament where it has always been, able to do business without any gag or closure. Let us recall that closure, and appeal to the people of Canada, because it is their business and their views should be allowed to find expression at the polls before action is taken.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the superficial idea of individual rights which my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) seems to entertain. He knows very well that the rights of an individual have to give way when they infringe upon the rights of others. I suppose that a member of the British House of Commons prior to the year 1881 had the right to speak for any length of time that he might choose, just as our hon. friends opposite have for the last three or four months exercised such a right. When rules were introduced into the British House of Commons limiting the length of debate, the right that a member had prior to the introduction of the rules had to give way in the interests of the public. My hon. friend from South Renfrew has waxed very eloquent and is apparently determined to fight to the bitter end to preserve his rights; but his rights must give way to the rights of others, when he infringes upon their rights. That is what has happened with every member of the British House of Commons. They did not go to lunatic asylums and mad houses because the rules were changed. I suppose there was a time when the House of Representatives at Washington exercised certain rights that were taken away from them when the rules of debate were changed. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about their rights being taken away and fighting and wading through blood ankle deep, because the majority happens to say that the exercise of their individual rights is infringing on the rights of the majority and that therefore their individual rights must give way. Hon. members opposite have been telling us for weeks that the people of Canada will go to the eternal bow-wows if there is any limitation of their right of debate. What has become of free speech in old England during the last thirty years under rules limiting debate, very much more drastic than these rules? Have the people of England lost all right of free speech? Have the people of the United States lost free speech, because it was found necessary in the interests of public business that there should be a limit to debate? Has the British Parliament become a mob, as my hon. friend from South Renfrew says we shall become, because rules limiting debate have been introduced there? Are we to become a mob if we prevent speeches by the hour and by the day and repetition a dozen times on the same subject. It is impossible to find parliamentary language adequate to express the conduct of the members of the Opposition during the last four or five months in this House; but the people are not limited by any rules as to the language they shall use, and they are using language to-day in regard to members of the Opposition that could not be repeated in this House.

I do not think that there has been introduced into this House during the last twenty years a resolution or a motion so popular as this motion to limit debate. I have heard almost daily for the last quarter of a century denunciations of the length of time that we take up in this House in doing the business of the country. We are spending five or six months a year, and it is quite evident to anyone who has sat in this House that the business of this country could easily be done and be done much better in three months than it is being done in five. It is not necessary in order to enable the members of the press gallery to grasp an argument, that it should be repeated a dozen times by members of the Opposition. When a member of the press gallery does grasp an argument that is any good, he will very readily find means to give it to the public. But during this session we have arguments repeated dozens and scores of times, ad nauseam to everyone who had to listen to them. And why? For the mere purpose of obstruction. We have had it admitted by the leader of the Opposition that the game of the Opposition during this session has been obstruction. Earlier in the session if the word 'obstruction' was mentioned, hon. gentlemen on the other side flew off at a tangent and worked themselves into indignation because of it. But since they heard their right hon. leader admit that they had been obstructing, they say nothing more. And what excuse is given for it? It seems almost necessary to repeat some of the arguments given in this House at the beginning of the session; it has been so long since, and hon. members on the other side have been so long talking that they have actually convinced themselves that what they say is the truth. They say that the reason why they have been obstructing is that we obstructed in 1911. But what occurred in 1911? I had the honour, with several other hon. gentlemen I see before me, of having a seat in that Parliament. And let me say, what is known to every hon. member present who was in that Parliament, there was not a member of the then Opposition who spoke twice on the reciprocity question. We had before us a very important question, one that affected the best interests of every man, woman and child in Canada. On that question almost every one in the House desired to speak. And yet there was not a member of the Opposition who spoke on that question twice, and not half of them spoke even once. But what have we seen this session on the Naval Bill? Members speaking four, five, six, eight, times, and from one to five hours each. And the circumstances were entirely different. When we were opposing reciprocity in this House we were opposing a measure which the people of Canada had rejected three times and which was being thrust upon them by the Government of the day. You will remember that the leader of the Opposition, when he was leader of the Government, declared in 1899 that the people of Canada did not want reciprocity with the United States in natural products. He not only declared that they did not want it, but he gave the reason why. He said there had been a time when we wanted reciprocity with the people of the United States, but that time had gone by forever; we did not want it now because we had become independent of the markets of the United States. He declared that to all the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He went to the country a few months afterwards. In November, 1900, with that declaration on his lips, and the people of Canada declared: You are right , we do not want reciprocity with the people of the United States in natural products. In 1903, when he was introducing the measure for the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, he again said in substance, that the people of Canada did not want reciprocity in natural products with the people of the United States. He declared that we must construct this road at once—we must not wait a day, an hour, a minute; we must build it because an ever-vigilant competitor was seeking to cause our trade to run north and south, while we wanted the road in order to continue our trade east and west. He declared also that we had done everything possible to force the trade into British channels and out of American channels. On such a declaration he was, in substance, opposed to reciprocity with the United States. And in 1904, the people again said: You are quite right, we do not want the trade of this country to be diverted north and south——

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is not keeping to the question before the House.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am trying to follow the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), who has been talking about almost everything. He introduced this question of our alleged obstruction in 1911, and I was trying to show that the circumstances were entirely different; we were not obstructing. I say that at that time we were justified in saying to the Government: You are trying to force upon the people something that on three occasions they have declared they did not want. But hon. gentlemen declare that they want to go to the country. They seem to have forgotten that we have been to the country. We went to the country on the 21st of September, 1911. On that occasion this question of the navy was before the people of Canada. If hon. gentlemen opposite will turn up the speech of the leader of the Opposition on the 13th of February last in this House, they will find that he declared in so many words that the leader of the present Government had gone before the people in that election with his naval policy and the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) went with his, and the policy of the late Government was defeated. You will find a similar declaration at page 1063 of 'Hansard'. When the right hon. gentleman was asked why he had not proceeded to let the contract for the building of the cruisers for which he had asked tenders, what reason did he give? He said that an election was pending, and this was one of the isssues between the Government and the Opposition, and he knew that if the then Opposition succeeded at the polls, they would reverse his policy and therefore he did not think it in the interest of the country to let these contracts. Still, the hon. member for South Renfrew repeated several times: Let us go to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been shouting that so often that they have persuaded themselves that the election on the 21st of September, 1911 this naval policy was not before the people, although their leader has declared that it was before the people. The people of Canada declared that they wanted our policy; your leader said so. The people of Canada said they did not want your policy; your leader said so—what more do you want? Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about going to the country; we have been to the country. I received a letter the other day from one of the leading men of the province of Ontario, not now in public life, who said that if the Government went to the country to-day the Liberal party would not obtain four seats in the whole province of Ontario. The people are utterly disgusted with the obstruction in which hon. gentlemen have been engaged in respect to the Naval Bill.

At least fifty and perhaps one hundred times during the course of this debate, it has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that we were all one in 1909 when the resolution of March 29 was passed. I want to say that the Conservative party in this House never assented to the resolution of March 29 as subsequently interpreted by the Liberal party. How did hon. gentlemen opposite interpret this resolution when they came to put in force under the Naval Act of 1910? They interpreted it to mean that we should have a navy which would not necessarily have anything to do with any war in which England might be engaged. This resolution as it was first presented to the House by the right hon. Prime Minister, now the leader of the Opposition, excluded any possibility of a contribution, and, at the instance of the present leader of the Government, the resolution was so altered as to make it possible under certain circumstances, for the Government of Canada to make a contribution instead of proceeding to build a Canadian navy. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the issues of the Toronto Globe of March 31, and April 5, 1909, published after the resolution was passed on March 29, they will find that that newspaper, which in many instances has been substituted by my friends opposite for the Bible, advocated the construction of dreadnoughts to be sent to England, notwithstanding the resolution passed on March 29. But in the Naval Bill of 1910, hon. gentlemen opposite provided that Canada should not necessarily be at war when England was at war; they practically declared their adherence to a separatist policy, and the Conservative party withdrew from it at once. In that same session, the Conservative party brought forward a resolution in favour of a contribution of $25,000,000 for the construction of dreadnoughts. The Naval Bill was discussed during that session, and our suspicions were confirmed by speeches delivered by followers of the right hon. Prime Minister, now leader of the Opposition. One of his followers, sitting behind him on this side of the House, declared that he supported the naval policy of 1910 because he regarded it as a step in the direction of Canadian independence, and the right hon. Prime Minister of that time, sitting where the leader of the Government sits to-night, heard that follower of his in one of the back benches make this declaration, and he sat tight in his seat and did not rise and declare that he had no sympathy with such principles. Another hon. gentleman who sat behind him declared that he supported the naval policy of 1910 because it put us in a position to fight the British navy if we ever desired to do so, and the right hon. leader of the Government of that day sat tight in his seat and did not rise to repudiate that doctrine. Where is the follower of the then Prime Minister who declared that he was supporting the Naval Bill of 1910 because he wanted a weapon with which to fight the British navy when Canada should desire to do so? He has been rewarded for entertaining and expressing those ideas in this House by being placed upon the bench of the Supreme Court in the province of Quebec, and he occupies that position to-day.

A great deal has been said by my hon. friends about the Drummond and Arthabaska election, which was the first election held after the Naval Service Act was passed in this House. The present leader of the Opposition had lived in the county of Arthabaska for forty years; it was his adopted home, and he was well acquainted with the people of that district. One would have supposed that, when his Naval Bill was being submitted to the people of Canada for the first time, he would have gone down to his old home and told the people what the Naval Bill he had introduced and carried through this House meant. And did he? He did not appear amongst the people once during that campaign in Drummond and Arthabaska. Why? His followers carried forward that campaign, and the burden of their song on every platform on which they spoke throughout the constituency was that the naval policy of the then leader of the Government meant separation, and had been adopted with a view to putting the people of Canada in a position to take care of themselves as soon as they became independent. That was the doctrine preached from every platform in Drummond and Arthabaska during the first election held after the Naval Bill was introduced and carried in this House in 1910. Any hon. gentleman who desires to verify my remarks may do so by referring to the columns of the Montreal Herald and the Montreal Witness, both Liberal papers, where they will find, in the reports of the meetings held throughout Drummond and Arthabaska, that the Government of that day were preaching Canadian independence; and the right hon. leader of the Opposition, not desiring to incur in the English-speaking provinces the odium of supporting that doctrine, and not desiring to go into the constituency and say anything that would not be popular with the people, kept out of it altogether. What do hon. gentlemen think of a prime minister who, having introduced such a measure as the Naval Bill of 1910, and the first election after the passage of his Bill taking place in the constituency in which he lived for forty years, plays the coward, and keeps out of the constituency altogether? Having regard to the declaration in the House that under the Bill we would not necessarily be at war when England is at war; to the declarations of the right hon. gentleman's followers in this House that they supported the Bill because it meant independence, and because they wanted to establish a navy with which to fight the forces of Britain, was it unreasonable that the Conservative party of this country withdrew entirely from the policy upheld by the Government, and opposed it to the bitter end? We did go to the country, and it is not necessary for me to state the result. There was not an intelligent man in the Dominion of Canada who was not familiar with the views of my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister on the naval question. In this House he declared to the people of Canada what he would do if returned at the polls. He would go to England, consult the British Admiralty, and, if he found that conditions were grave, he would at once ask Parliament for immediate aid. In London, Ontario, where the opening meeting of the campaign in that province was held, he repeated this statement, and made others along the same lines, and they were published in every newspaper throughout the province of Ontario and even as far east as Montreal. So that, when hon. gentlemen opposite say that the naval policy was not discussed at the last election, they are reckoning without their host. But I must give them the credit of believing they do not know any better, because, if they did, they would not have taken that stand. This matter, therefore, has been before the people, a large majority of whom have declared that they desire that the present policy should be carried out. I might tell my right hon. friend that the rules of the House as they stand to-day were framed for the guidance of reasonable and patriotic men. No man adopting rules or establishing rules for any other class would adopt the rules as they stand to-day in this House. It has become necessary that these rules should be changed in order that the majority should have their rights. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), is not the only man in this House and is far from being the only man in this country. There is a large majority, counting him on one side and all the rest of the people of Canada on the other; and that large majority want the business of this country to be carried on. When that large majority say that they want that business to be carried on, my hon. friend's right will be swept away in the right of the majority. We have introduced these rules, mild rules, for the limitation of debate in this House to prevent tedious repetitions, to prevent one man from speaking six times on the same subject and repeating himself twenty times. The people of this country have become disgusted with that, this is the most popular move we could make in this House. My hon. friend's rights must be set aside in the interest of the great majority of the people of this country and they have determined that his rights shall be put aside; if necessary, in order that the business of this country shall be carried on, they have determined that not only shall his rights be put aside, but the rights of the whole Opposition shall be put aside in the interest of carrying on the business of this country. We have made a proposal for the amendment of these rules. That proposal let me tell my hon. friends opposite—and this is not for the gallery, but only for the ex-ministers in the House and those out of the House—we have proposed these amendments to the rules, these amendments are going to be carried. We proposed a Naval Bill and that Naval Bill is going to be carried. The sooner you make up your minds to that the better. The people of this country have told us that that is what they want, and what they have told us they want is going to be carried out, and going to be carried out this session—and don't you forget it.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I at least congratulate the Minister of Labour for being candid. I think we are accomplishing something in this debate. We are getting down now somewhere near where we have been trying to get for some time. Something has happened in the last week that has given courage to my hon. friends opposite. For the last three weeks you could fling almost any kind of an epithet across the House in reference to the navy and you could not raise one of them but now the Minister of Labour talks on it for nearly half an hour when it is not under discussion and he would not obey the Speaker when His Honour tried to get him back to the subject. When the Speaker brought him away from the reciprocity question as being out of order he talked for another half an hour about the navy. He will not consider me discourteous if I do not follow his highly technical explanation of the rules. I thought the object of moving the adjournment was to get some information as to the construction or conception of these rules but the Minister of Labour thinks that it was moved in order that he could have a chance to rehash his old speech on reciprocity. I do not intend to talk reciprocity. I have had an opportunity of discussing that on the address and possibly if the Minister of Finance ever screws his courage up to the sticking point and brings down the budget I may have another opportunity but I shall try to confine myself to the matter immediately under discussion and not to transgress the rules. The object of moving the adjournment was to get some information from the Prime Minister and any other gentlemen in the House as to the real meaning of these rules. On this side of the House we have an idea that they are unfair, unjust and I go so far as to say unconstitutional. I have an opinion that these rules were devised and created by certain gentlemen—of course I do not know exactly who they are, but I think I can make a shrewd guess—for the express purpose of meeting the position that they thought existed in the Parliament of Canada at the present time. I do not say that offensively, but rather in a complimentary way to them, but the right hon. gentleman did not, I think, know the real significance of these rules until it was pointed out to him from this side of the House. I have some doubt if he really has realized yet the actual meaning and the real venom hidden away in some of these clauses. If you look at the clauses you will find that they have been devised entirely for the purpose of meeting the condition of affairs which has existed here for some time regardless of whether that is necessary or what the future will require. If you want any evidence on that you will find it in the second line of the first section, which reads:

> Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings except adjournment motions.

The very first thing they take away from the Opposition is the right to debate adjournment motions of the kind we are discussing this evening and this afternoon. The Minister of Labour says that these rules are going through. He may be right, but I might remark in passing that if anybody had asked him about the 1st of January or the 3rd of March he would have said that the Naval Bill was going through right away—but it did not go through. Possibly there may be other surprises in store for the Minister of Labour. It is never wise to be too positive about things in this world. The very first thing they are taking away from us is the right to discuss a question on the motion to adjourn. The Prime Minister would try to make us believe that these rules are not one half as bad as the English rules, but I want to point out that, as bad as the English rules are, the right to move the adjournment of the House or of the debate is retained to members as you will see in rule 148. It is true that that is subject to some extent to the discretion of the Speaker, but in England where they have a Speaker who acts as a judge, a man who is not in politics, who is chosen as Speaker and then has no more politics because his position is for life, there is justice and adjournments of the House may be moved subject to the discretion of a gentleman who has no feeling or ambition except to hold the balance absolutely true between the two parties. The Prime Minister tried to say: oh, that does not make any difference, you have still the right to discuss motions to adjourn the House and on such a motion to discuss a matter of important public interest. My right hon. friend did admit to the hon. member for South Wellington that even then we are subject to the discretion of the Speaker. We had a case here within the last month when a member on this side attempted to adjourn the House to discuss a matter of urgent public importance and the Speaker held it was not such a matter and did not come within the rules and would not allow him to discuss it. That is the position we shall be in because we cannot move to adjourn the House to discuss any matter. My right hon. friend says: We will interpret this rule liberally, we will give you every right you possibly should have, we are going to be generous about it. We do not want any of his good wishes, we are not here to take good wishes from him or from any other man. We are in no different position than any other opposition. If the positions were reversed, and my hon. friends were over here, they would not want to ask the grace of being permitted to discuss a matter which is a matter of right. They would want to have the right to discuss it, and that is the first thing that is being taken away from us by this resolution. Why is it, I wonder? Go back a little while, and you will see why. My hon. friends will remember that on the 3rd day of March we entered upon a session which lasted for two weeks with the exception of the Sabbath day. When it was attempted to apply the 'steam roller' on the Friday evening, when a man was put in the Chair who had no right to be there, and when that man without any reason whatever, without any logic, and simply to carry out the behests of his superiors, ruled out of order two resolutions which we had been discussing for a fortnight, and which my hon. friends had been discussing, they were checkmated by the ingenuity of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) who moved the adjournment of the House. They were held up for twenty-four hours, and driven out of this House in disgrace, and then the bright minds, which attempted to change these rules, decided to put the matter so they would never be driven out of the House again by a motion to adjourn the House, and the first thing they did to meet that contingency was to try to take away the right which we have always enjoyed, and which has always been enjoyed in England. Let us follow the matter a little further. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition stated this afternoon that in his judgment, if these rules were adopted, we would not be allowed to move an amendment to the third reading of a Bill. I do not think my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) will deny that proposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes, without the slightest hesitation.

Mr. CARVELL: Then I do not give him so much credit for real judgment as I did. It may be that my hon. friend feels that he is bound to follow the unreasonable interpretation given by his leader this afternoon; I am willing to be generous enough to my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie to say that he is loyal enough to follow the lead of his leader, but, of course, I reserve my own opinion as to my hon. friend's real interpretation of these rules which possibly he may give us some time in the future. I know one gentleman who will not deny that interpretation, and that is the hon. gentleman who sits in the Chair. We will probably find out before many moons have passed what his interpretation is. I am finding no fault with the hon. gentleman who occupies the Chair. He will interpret these rules as they ought to be interpreted, and that interpretation will be the strictest that can be given to them. I think I am within my rights when I say that there has not been an occasion during the present session of Parliament on which the hon. gentleman who sits in the Chair has not strictly interpreted the rules of this House. We have all had experience; we have been called to order, and so have hon. gentlemen on the other side. The hon. gentleman who occupies the Chair has hewed to the line every time, and he will hew to the line in the future, and if he does, he will be compelled to rule that there is no possible power of amending a Bill on the third reading. We may move an amendment, but there will be no opportunity of debating it under this rule. I go further, and here is where my ingenious friend gets in his work a second time. You will remember that when the Naval Bill was moved into Committee of the Whole House, and we asked for an adjournment of the House on the Monday evening, while the Prime Minister was willing to agree to it, the Minister of Public Works opposed it, and said: Go on and make progress. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition moved an amendment, and a few hours later that was followed by a sub-amendment, moved by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). We discussed that amendment and sub-amendment for a fortnight while the Bill was in committee. Now, Sir, I make the statement, and I do not believe that the hon. gentleman who is responsible for the introduction of these rules will deny it, that the intention of this rule, and the true interpretation of it, is that in future we will never have an opportunity to discuss an amendment moved to a Bill in Committee of the Whole. If this rule goes through, the next time a public Bill is moved in committee, if the Government so desire, the Opposition will have no opportunity whatever of discussing an amendment moved to any clause or section of that Bill while it is in committee. I take the literal meaning of the words of sub-section 2, leaving out everything that is unnecessary in order to make a complete sentence so far as amendments are concerned.

> Every motion for the adoption in Committee of the Whole of the resolution, clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

I have read the rule as it is only with reference to the amendment of a clause or section of a public Bill in Committee of the Whole House. When the Naval Bill was moved in Committee of the Whole House, it consisted of a title, a preamble, and general clauses. That was the whole Bill under consideration by that committee down to the moment when the right hon. leader of the Opposition moved his amendment, and that is the only thing which can be discussed in the Committee of the Whole House. Any other motion is not debatable. What would be another motion? I will give my hon. friend one. The amendment which was moved by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition is one. His motion in substance was that the money should be applied towards a navy in close relation to the British navy. The moment that amendment was moved, and was put by the Chair, it became another motion, and that is one of the 'other motions' which cannot be debated. Therefore, Sir, if I am right, and I know I must be, and even my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie will not deny it, the result will be absolutely impossible to discuss amendments to any section or clause of a public Bill in Committee of the Whole House.

I want to know whether my hon. friends desire to go to the country as the authors and perpetrators of an act of injustice like that upon a minority, or upon the people they represent. My hon. friends who created this rule must have done so intentionally and wilfully, in order that an amendment like that moved by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will never be moved again. They were held up for a fortnight. We tried to show the country the vices of the proposals before the House, and we were able to show the people the insincerity of the Government. We were able to show them that the Government had not the nerve to defend their own conduct. After ten o'clock or eleven o'clock on the Monday night there was not a man on the other side who would open his mouth and say one word in defence of the Government's conduct. They sat like mummies for twelve days, day and night, while the members on this side of the House were showing the people the iniquities and vices of the proposition. Then they made up their minds, and I say this advisedly, that never again would the Government now holding the reins of office be placed in that position, and therefore they decided to introduce a rule by which it would be impossible to move amendments to public Bills in the Committee of the Whole House or at all events to discuss them. I will give an illustration of how it will work out. You will remember on Monday evening, the 3rd of March, we had discussed clause 2 of the Naval Bill in Committe of the Whole from half-past ten in the evening until two o'clock in the morning, and my friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) had the floor when in walked the Manitoba wonder and said: the hon gentleman is out of order; we have discussed this long enough. Fortunately we had our amendment in and we were able to tell the people of the iniquitous proposition that was placed before us by the Government, and for two weeks we kept at it until at last the Government were afraid to appeal to the people. But, after they get this resolution through, we will never have such an opportunity again and the Minister of Public Works will be able to walk in to the House any time he likes and say: I guess this discussion has gone on long enough, I will shut down the lid, and that's the end of it. The more you study this rule the more you see the real venom in the mind of the man who created it. I do not believe the Prime Minister knew what was behind this rule; I may be too generous to him but I give him the credit for having more fair play in his makeup. Perhaps the Prime Minister is not deserving of my encomium because were he the right kind of a man, and were he sincere, he would admit these things when they are pointed out to him, but probably he has lost control, and he is compelled himself to force the thing through and choke off free speech in this Parliament. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has pointed out—it would be an extreme case he admitted—but he has pointed out that it would be quite possible to introduce a Bill, give it its first and second readings, consider it in committee, give it a third reading and rush it through the House, without giving the Opposition an opportunity to discuss it for one moment. I do not say the Government will do that, but I say they could do it if they wanted to. There may be some question as to the conditions which would have to prevail before the gag is applied, but as I construe the rule all the Government would have to do, taking the Naval Bill as illustration would be this: We are now engaged in discussing clause 2, and when it is called again the Government can rush through clauses 3, 4 and 5 without giving us an opportunity to move an amendment to these clauses. That is the kind of power the Government is assuming under this new rule. The result is, therefore, that after we have discussed only one clause of a Bill, the Minister can give this notice, and he can railroad the Bill through without further discussion. The Prime Minister told us that clause 4 of the rule only means that you cannot move an amendment to Supply on Thursdays and Fridays. He said, and I took down his words: on three days of the week when the Government has taken all the days, the House will be moved into Committee of Supply, but no doubt what he meant was that the Government might, if it so desired, move the House into committee on these three days. I make the statement here to-night that it is possible to have all the Supply of the session put through without giving the Opposition a chance to move a single want of confidence motion. All you have to do is to get the consent of the House that supply shall be taken on Thursdays and Fridays, and once that is done there is an end to discussion, so far as the Opposition is concerned. The hon. the Speaker a few days ago gave voice to a sentiment which he partially retracted. He stated fairly that it was an offhand opinion, and that opinion was that there were fourteen occasions in every session when the Opposition would have the right to move amendments in going into Supply. Let us see if that is a true interpretation of the rule? Clause 4 says:

> (4) On Thursday and Friday when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

How is that rule to work out? The Prime Minister knows there has never been a session since he has been in the House when Supply has not been first taken on civil government items for the different departments. The first time the House was moved into Supply this session, was late at night as the Prime Minister wanted to get certain items through and we considered the items of civil government for his department, the items for the North-west Mounted Police, the items for the Justice Department, and for the High Commissioner's office in London. Three or four departments were considered that night in probably half an hour as a matter of ordinary routine procedure. The next time when we went into Committee of Supply was some weeks later. Then we took up at least four or five departments and passed the civil government branch of each of them. If the Government do not want to give the Opposition a chance to discuss public grievances, we can move an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply, discuss it and then go into Supply and they can go right down the list from A to Z; they can discuss every department there is. When they have done that, they comply with the conditions of the rule, because these departments will first have been taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday. When that is done, our mouths are absolutely closed as far as discussing grievances is concerned. The Government are at perfect liberty to bring up on a Thursday or a Friday every department that has been discussed on the previous occasion, and we have nothing to say about it. Mr. Speaker, does this agree with your idea of British fair play, or has it been done by hon. gentlemen opposite for the purpose of meeting what they thought were present conditions and of applying rules which might help them out under present conditions but which would be unfair to every constitutional parliament and to every person who might happen to occupy a seat on this side of the House. What is the answer to all this argument? We have had an answer to-night from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) who never pretended to discuss the rules at all. Then we had a speech of an hour and a half from the Minister of Finance (Mr. White). I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was trying to be witty or whether he was amusing himself alone, but he certainly kept as far away as he possibly could from the interpretation of the rules under discussion. I was somewhat surprised that Mr. Speaker did not call him to order. We could get no information or light from these two gentlemen. That brings us back to the intimation which we were able to get from the Premier. It is true that he gave one interpretation. He says: I do not believe it prevents amendments on the third reading of a Bill. Although I think he is wrong, I give him credit for having given us one opinion as to the interpretation of these rules. In regard to all other interpretations, he practically admitted: Yes, the proposed rules are bad; there is no doubt about that, but I am not going to enforce them. My right hon. friend has nothing to do with the enforcing of them. Of course, he would have something to do with regard to clause 4. So far as clauses 2 or 3 are concerned, he has nothing to do with enforcing them. That is in the hands of Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker considers it his business to strictly enforce the rules. If he comes to the conclusion that there ought not to be an amendment, he will say so, and it will not make any difference what may be the private opinion of the Premier or of any other gentleman who happens to be leading the House. No man has a right to be in the Chair unless he will enforce the rules. That is what he is put there for. There is no use my hon. friend coming here with nice protestations of fairness, because, no matter how fair he wants to be, he will not have a chance to work out his ideas of fairness. I do not want to be unkind to my right hon. friend. I took occasion one day last week to give my views of his conduct when these rules were introduced. I am not going to go over that again. I just want to point out some of the things that might happen, no matter how fair a man he might be. My right hon. friend says: No fair-minded man would venture to interpret those rules in the way you say; if there are two ways, he will take the fair way, the reasonable way, and therefore you are drawing on your imagination; you are conjuring up bugaboos; you are trying to cry 'wolf' in the country, and to make the people believe that an outrage is being perpetrated upon you. Suppose that my right hon. friend the Premier had been the originator of rule 18, which says:

(1) A member addressing the House shall, if called to order by the Speaker or by any other member, sit down while the point of order is being stated, after which he may explain. The Speaker may permit debate of the point of order before rendering his decision, but such debate must be strictly relevant to the point of order taken.

If my right hon. friend were introducing that as a rule, and we challenged him on its severity, and said that there might be some doubt about the word 'may,' and suggested the substituting of the word 'must,' I have no doubt he would say that no reasonable man would interpret that in any other way and that the word 'may' means 'must.' He would say that that is the common sense of it.

Mr. FOSTER (Kings): Does it not mean 'must'?

Mr. CARVELL: I am talking to the Premier. I will answer my hon. friend later.

He would say that the word 'may' must be construed as 'must;' that it would be contrary to the spirit of the British constitution to say anything else; that it would be violating every principle of fair play; that no parliament would say that that word means anything but 'must.' He would say: There is no necessity for your going into hysterics or conjuring up bugaboos; you will not be hurt so long as I am Premier; I will see that that word is properly construed, and that it means 'must.' Suppose my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) happens to be the Prime Minister of the country. It may be a violent assumption to suppose that he will ever be in any position of responsibility. We had an illustration of what he would say about it. We had the first attempt to apply the gag in this House by my hon. friend from North Simcoe and on the construing of that very clause. I have only to mention a few things like that to show the Premier that, what he thinks may be fair, his followers may not think fair.

Mr. BORDEN: I thought my hon. friend said a moment ago that neither I nor the hon. member for North Simcoe would have anything to do with the enforcing of the rule, that it would be the Speaker who would have to do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: My friends opposite cheer. As they get so few chances to cheer my right hon. friend, I do not blame them very much. Unfortunately my friend from North Simcoe was in the place of the Speaker on that occasion. That is where the trouble lies. It might be possible that my hon. friend from North Simcoe would be the real Speaker, and then Heaven help us. That is what might happen if the member for North Simcoe were in the Chair. It is the Speaker who interprets these rules and not the Premier. The Premier does not seem to be able to understand me. It is only an ordinary illustration of what I said when he was out of the House a moment ago. I do not believe he realizes the real venom behind the resolution. It is only when it is brought to his attention that he tries to get out of it as best he can. He is not the leader; he is being led. Suppose the hon. member for North Simcoe were the Speaker under these rules, where would we be? The most of us would be down with Miller, I think.

Mr. CURRIE: That is where you should be.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a matter of opinion.

There is another rule of this House which shows how my right hon. friend might be deceived, subsection 1 of rule 13, which says:

A chairman of committees of the House shall be elected at the commencement of every Parliament, as soon as an address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's Speech; and the member so elected shall, if in his place in the House, take the Chair of all committees of the Whole.

Then it says:

In the absence of the Chairman of Committees of the House the Speaker may in forming a Committee of the Whole House, before leaving the Chair appoint any member chairman of the committee.

If I were to ask my right hon. friend for an interpretation of that rule, he would say certainly that means that the gentleman who was chairman of the committee must assume the duties of Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, but he would say also that in the absence of the Chairman when a committee is formed, the Speaker designates some other gentleman to perform the office of Chairman. Of course, he would say that nobody would conceive the idea of any other interpretation. But what do we find? What did we find one night in the absence of the right hon. gentleman? While the Deputy Speaker was here in the House, after he had taken his place as chairman of the Committee of the Whole and was carrying out the duties of that office, another gentleman in this House was put in his place, a man who has a great deal of legal acumen, a man brought in here for a certain purpose and who carried out that purpose, a man who ruled out of order all the amendments we had been discussing for a fortnight.

Mr. CURRIE: Why did not you appeal it?

Mr. CARVELL: We wanted to get in another amendment, if the hon. gentleman wants to know. And we got it in.

Mr. BOYCE: An opportunity for obstruction.

Mr. CARVELL: My right hon. friend was prepared to construe that in the right way, but the trouble was when another man got a chance he construed it in the wrong way. The right hon. gentleman had to admit that that gentleman was wrong, and we put up such a serious kick that he got scared and ruled this gentleman out of order and brought back the real chairman. These things only show that we cannot trust my right hon. friend. He will do things wrong until you actually show him that he is wrong. He has not as much nerve as the Minister of Public Works; when the situation gets too hot he surrenders. And he surrendered on Saturday morning about seven o'clock and put the real Chairman in the Chair. These are only illustrations to prove that we need rules that do not have to have a special construction in order to secure justice and fair-play for every member of the House. And that is what we are complaining of. The object of this rule is to have a gag and prevent free speech by members of the Opposition. We are convinced that it is not well for us to take the professions of fair-play made by my right hon. friend no matter how sincere he may be. We have the right to have rules, that, fairly construed, will secure the rights of every member of the House in this Parliament or any future Parliament. We find in every statement and every act of this Government for the last three or four months evidence of a desire to place the Opposition at a disadvantage. Perhaps the most glaring evidence of this has been furnished in the present debate by the Minister of Finance. We had been demanding the bringing down of the West Indian Treaty. We asked time and again that it should be brought down. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) had told this House that he had an amendment to propose; I had told the House the same thing. And we really meant what we said. About two weeks ago, I think it was, we were told that the West Indies Bill would be brought forward for the third reading. The matter under discussion just before that was the ratification of the treaty with Japan. That matter was cleared away a few minutes after ten o'clock in the evening, and the right of way was given for the Minister of Finance to bring down his West Indian Treaty Bill with a view to putting it through its third reading. We agreed to put it through that night; no attempt was to be made on our part to obstruct the measure, and we sent word to the Government whips that it was understood that the measure was to go through.

Mr. REID (Minister of Customs): An amendment was to be moved.

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly, there were two amendments. But the agreement was that these were to be voted down and the Bill was to go through.

Mr. REID: No, no.

Mr. CARVELL: I say that is true. But the Government adjourned this House soon after ten o'clock rather than bring that Bill down. What is the reason? There must be something about these amendments that they are afraid of. And here is where the real sting comes in; the Minister of Finance knows that when he gets this closure rule through the hon. member for St. John will not have a chance to move his amendment nor shall I have a chance to move mine. There can be no discussion about them, and the hon. gentleman will get his Bill through without having the inconvenience of a discussion on amendments which might not be very pleasant for him. That is the best evidence of the construction of these rules, no matter how fair my right hon. friend may be or may wish to appear to be. We can only judge these gentlemen by their conduct and not by their words, I am sorry to say; we have had so many evidences this session that the only way to judge of them is by their conduct and not by their words that we are forced to that conclusion.

Now, I have discussed this matter longer than I intended. But I have tried to keep to the subject under discussion and have not talked about the navy nor about reciprocity. I have tried to point out to the right hon. leader of the House some of the things that appeared to me not to be fair; I am afraid that if I used the word that really expresses my opinion, it might not be parliamentary. The conduct of the right hon. gentleman and of his followers reminds me of a custom they have in Mexico. When they do not wish to go to the trouble of giving a prisoner a trial, they take him off to jail, or pretend to take him off to jail, and when they get him at a convenient place they give him his liberty and tell him to run, and when he runs they shoot him in the back as an escaping prisoner. So hon. gentlemen opposite assure us that these rules are the fairest that could possibly be in the world. The right hon. leader tells us that there is no danger, that as long as he is Prime Minister we shall get fair play. But the moment we start out for fair play, we get it in the back, or in the neck, if he can give it to us. That is what will happen every time the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) gets into the Chair, and I am afraid that there are other hon. gentlemen around him who are not much better. I should be almost afraid to trust even my smiling friend from Algoma (Mr. Boyce). As for the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), forgive me if I hope the time will never come when that hon. gentleman will be in the Chair in this House so long as we are in opposition, because I am afraid that a man who has the ingenuity to conceive such a set of rules as we have before us would have the intellect to land us all in jail before two sessions of the House are over. It may be paying him a compliment to which he is not entitled—if it is a compliment—to assume that he devised these rules. If that is a compliment, I give it to him freely. Now, I admit that this was one of the finest examples of an attempt to deliberately take away from Parliament the rights of expressing the wishes of its people that I have ever heard of in my life. When it comes to the application of the guillotine, the English rules cannot for one moment compare with those now proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is all very well for my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to say that he is willing to accept the English rules, but he has himself given reasons why this would not be possible. He knows that he is safe in putting forward such a proposition, because he is aware of the fact that neither side of the House could afford to accept the English rules unless the conditions and customs attaching to the office of Speaker of this House of Commons are entirely changed. If I am wrong in my interpretation of these rules, I hope that some hon. gentleman will set me right, but I am sure that I am right, and I am sure my hon. friends realize it. I think, even at this late stage, that the only reasonable and fair course my right hon. friend can take is to withdraw this measure, or at least appoint a committee and give hon. gentlemen full opportunity for the discussion of the proposed rules. Of course, if my hon. friend the Minister of Labour is authorized by this Government—and I presume he is—to make the statement that these rules are going through, and that the Naval Bill is going through, then I claim the right to express the opinion as to what I and other members on this side of the House will do in such a case. I want my hon. friend to remember that the rules of this House are not framed for the members of the Government only; they are designed for the guidance of the whole House, the members of the Opposition as well as the Government. The rules of the House are supposed to be fair to all members, and to be made and approved by the whole House. My hon. friend cannot point to a case in the English Parliament, at least down to 1867, or to any case in this Parliament, in which the rules of the House have been amended in the slightest degree except by a Committee of the Whole House, taken from both sides, and acting in conjunction with the Speaker. That is the unalienable and almost constitutional right of the people of this country, and when my right hon. friend brings in a guillotine measure such as this, without having consulted the members of the Opposition, and without giving them a chance to be heard, I say he is taking away from us the constitutional right of free speech. But if the members on this side take a leaf out of the book of the Minister of Labour, they will say that they do not propose to be bound by these rules, and if the time should come when this is demonstrated, I hope my right hon. friend will not feel aggrieved, or consider that he has not received due and reasonable notice of the attitude taken by the Opposition in regard to these drastic rules.

Mr. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie): It is with some hesitation that I ask the House to bear with me for a few minutes to-night—hesitation born out of the very patient hearing which I obtained a short time ago on the same subject. However, there have been some attempts, to which we might at least accord a reply, in the debate that has taken place to-day to criticise the rules now before us. Thinking that I might engage for a very few minutes the time of the House at a stage of the debate perhaps not so important as any time that might be so occupied to-morrow afternoon, I venture to do so. I have listened with more than usual interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and I may say that he did attempt, as he usually does—and he succeeded—to at least cling very closely to the subject under discussion. The same remarks apply, as I believe they always do, to the right hon. leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has some gifts, but I must say that, so far as I can observe or am able to judge, they do not go to the extent of enabling him to establish a point before he feels it his duty to thunder it out with awful emphasis upon the House. The hon. member for South Renfrew has mastered this art—if it is an art—he is able to repeat conclusions, times without number, with an emphasis that is almost fearful, before he has made any attempt to establish any of those conclusions, although at the same time they appeared to be perfectly apparent to him and be sincere in his own mind. I had thought, until the hon. member for Carleton sat down, that the initial attacks on these rules had been abandoned by hon. gentlemen opposite. I was about to congratulate the hon. First Minister of this House, who is entitled to all credit for the perfection of the rules now brought down, that all phases of the attack first levelled against these rules by hon. gentlemen opposite have been abandoned one after the other, and that they are coming around the circle to an entirely new set of objections. I remember that on the first night on which they were introduced, the hon. member for St. John arose in the heat of anger and denounced these rules because they would forbid the introduction of a motion levelling a charge against a member of this House, and the debating of that motion. In tones that almost brought fear to our hearts, he told us that the purpose of the Government was to shut out all such motions levelling charges against members, and that the effect of clause 1 was to so shut them out. That argument appears to have been abandoned, and it is creditable to the sane second thought of hon. gentlemen opposite that they have turned their backs on that proposition. It has been shown, and no one has attempted to refute it, that ever since these charges have been a matter of practice in this House they have been brought in and debated under routine proceedings, and the same course is still clearly and specifically open to all hon. gentlemen. I presume I am right in assuming that not only the hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-day, and those who have addressed the House on a previous occasion have abandoned that position, but that the hon. member for Carleton has abandoned it as well, because he sits in his seat and does not dispute it.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not want the hon. gentleman to make any such violent assumption. The mere fact that I do not repeat everything I said on a former occasion is no evidence that I have in any way abandoned any ideas which I have hitherto entertained.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had almost given the hon. gentleman credit for more than that; I did not think he advanced such a preposterous theory when he spoke before. What the hon. gentleman said was that it was at least a subject for debate, and he said that in very chastened tones, quite at variance with his ordinary custom and manner. However, in view of what has been done in the past, and in view of the invariable practice for twenty years in this House to bring such motions under that heading, I venture to hope no hon. gentleman will seriously advance the argument again.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has my hon. friend forgotten that Mr. Speaker ruled the motion of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver)—a motion of censure of the Minister of Public Works in connection with the Donaldson homestead—out of order on the ground that two days' notice had not been given, in which case it would have been placed on the Order Paper under a different heading than that of routine proceedings? It was only by reason of the consent of the Prime Minister to move the House into Committee of Supply the next day that the hon. member for Edmonton was allowed to make his motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows that the matter of notice is of no concern whatever in the present argument. The hon. member for Edmonton, during the progress of a debate, wanted to bring in a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing some other matter entirely alien to that debate, but Mr. Speaker held that, if that were to be allowed, we might as well set fire to the rules of this House, because, at the will of any hon. member, no matter what subject the House might be engaged in discussing, the consideration of that subject might be abandoned and the discussion of any other subject on earth taken up. Even though under the proposed rules notice may be necessary, there is nothing said as to whether it shall be or shall not; the matter is just in the same position as it was before, and no one will seriously dispute that, with notice at all events, and without notice, as has been the invariable custom of the House, according to Bourinot, these motions may be made under routine proceedings, and shall be exactly in the same position as to being made and debated after these rules are in force as they were before. The hon. member for St. John had another and very serious objection. Why, he said, you are revolutionizing the whole proceedings of this House by the way you are going about it; you are instituting these rules without reference to a committee and in doing that you are doing violence to the rules of Parliament because the rules of Parliament say that if we have no rule to govern a particular situation we must go back to the British rules of 1867, and under the British practice of that day there were no cases where the British House had amended the rules except by the appointment of a committee to act in conjunction with the Speaker. I hoped that that position had been abandoned by hon. gentlemen opposite but it was revived by the hon. member for Carleton. That contention is absolutely incorrect. Not only since 1867 but before that date the rules of the British House were revised without reference to a committee. In 1833, which is before 1867 if I can count aright, the rules were revised in this way. On, I think, the second day of the session of 1833, Lord Althorpe introduced a motion and made no reference of that motion to a committee. That motion was:

> That the House should meet every day, except Saturday, at noon, and sit until 3 p.m. for private business and petitions. That not later than 3 p.m. the Speaker should adjourn the House till 5 p.m. and leave the Chair without putting any question for adjournment. (Then follow some regulations showing that it was then thought difficult to get together a quorum of forty before the hour fixed for the beginning of public business.) At 5 p.m. the House was to proceed to the business of the day set down in the order book.

That is at pages 75 and 76 of the first volume of Redlich. In another passage Redlich says:

> On the 21st of July, 1856, without previous investigation on the part of a committee, the House incorporated the following further provisions among its rules:—
>
> 1. That no amendments not being merely verbal shall be made to any Bill on the third reading.
>
> 2. That on Wednesdays and other morning sittings of the House all committees shall have leave to sit, except while the House is at prayers during the sitting, and notwithstanding any adjournment of the House.
> 3. That this House will not receive any petitions, or proceed upon any motion for a charge upon the revenues of India but what is recommended by the Crown.

There are two instances in a few minutes in which the British House of Commons revised its rules without reference to a committee. In 1877, 1878, 1880, 1881, 1882 and 1888 and other years the House of Commons of England revised its rules repeatedly and in no case after reference to a committee. These rules were revised at the instance and on the motion of Sir Stafford Northcote on the first of these years and of Mr. Gladstone in the next and in no case was there criticism that the rules had not been revised by a committee. If the House of Commons had power by usage and custom to revise the rules without reference to a committee in 1877, 1880 and 1881, surely they must have had the same power in 1867. But this House has revised its rules without reference to a committee. In 1868, on motion of Mr. Duncan and Sir George Etienne Cartier, rule 22 of this House, a permanent rule, was permanently amended without reference to a committee. That is to be found at page 144 of the Journals of that year. In 'Hansard' of 1877, at pages 3 and 4, it will be found that Sir John A. Macdonald clearly affirmed the principle that the House could at any time by motion change its rules upon due notice. That was established by the practice of this House and by the practice both prior to 1867 and since then, we have ample power to alter the rules if we so desire without reference to a committee. I do not pretend to argue that the other method, that of reference to a committee for a report, would not also be quite within our power and both methods are certainly available under some circumstances—one method would be preferred and under other circumstances the other; but when an Opposition sits in front of a government, under the authority of its leader and the additional authority to-night of his lieutenant, avowedly in an obstructionist position, in a position to prevent the vote on the Naval Bill as well as on the closure, it is the duty of the Government to see to it that the rules followed will prevent, so far as we can prevent, the success of obstruction. Hon. gentlemen opposite have conjured up new objections in their minds to-night. This first one is that violence is being done to the rights of the minority because they are not permitted to debate adjournments and the leader of the Opposition to-night went so far as to say that if any motions by their nature required discussion and debate, motions to adjourn did. The hon. member for Carleton says that inasmuch as you are preventing us from discussing motions to adjourn, such as we are now debating, you are making our rules worse than the English rules. That is his position. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the name of common sense, what serious injury can be done to Parliament even under the most strained circumstances, even in the most extreme cases, by the refusal ordinarily to discuss adjournment? Motions to adjourn are in the main purely formal motions. There may be cases where perhaps they serve another purpose, but those cases are amply provided for and the opportunity for discussion is amply preserved by the first rule which we now propose to insert, cases where it is desired to discuss matters of urgent public consequence under a motion to adjourn. But what violence can be done to the rights of the minority, how do we injure the procedure of this House, by saying you shall not be allowed in open debate to move adjournment for the purpose merely of throwing the House into committee so that a man can talk as often as he likes on any subject? Surely once is sufficient. But says the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., they have in England the right as we have had the right to move an adjournment for the purpose of giving hon. gentlemen a chance to speak twice. Surely that is not right. I showed him that two weeks ago, but I think he was out of the House. In England they have no right to move adjournments for the purpose of discussing any thing at all except the reasons why they should adjourn. That is abundantly clear from the British rules. They have the right, as we have it, to move adjournments for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of public urgency. If a member of the British House moves the adjournment of the House at any time, he can support that motion ordinarily by reasons why the House should adjourn, but he cannot revert to the main motion, as we are doing, and discuss the main motion. That right has been taken away from him in England for many years, and no one has complained as to the result. Not only have they no right to discuss anything except reasons for adjournment on a motion to adjourn, but they can be forbidden to discuss that before a gentleman rises at all because immediately the motion is put by Mr. Speaker, to the House, any hon. member may rise and demand that the closure be applied. In Great Britain, no hon. member can discuss even the reasons why the House should adjourn except by the will of the majority, let alone discuss ad infinitum the main motion, such as we are doing now. But my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. says, you are taking from us the right to move motions to adjourn for the purpose of discussing matters of urgent public importance, inasmuch as you have put it in the power of the Speaker to decide whether or not it is a matter of urgent public importance, and therefore within his power to refuse the right to discuss such a matter. In the first place, it was the hon. gentlemen opposite themselves who put that within your power, Mr. Speaker. It was hon. gentlemen opposite themselves who appointed the committee which in 1906, I think, revised the rules and inserted clause 39, which places it within your discretion, Mr. Speaker, to measure the importance of the subject which an hon. member desires to discuss. So if they have any complaint, it is against themselves. But surely we are not getting into the invasion of individual rights more than they are in England. Is the hon. member for Carleton aware that the rule in England is word for word the same as it is here in this very regard? In England no member can move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of public urgent importance except with the consent of Mr. Speaker, so that there, hon. gentlemen are exactly in the same position as they would be here.

Mr. CARVELL: That is an additional right there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is?

Mr. CARVELL: The right of moving the adjournment of the House under rule 148.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, he has the right to move the adjournment of the House under rule 148 and if he does so, even with the consent of the majority, all he can discuss is the reasons why the House should adjourn. An hon. member here has the right to move the adjournment and with the consent of the House he can discuss something else, and if it is a matter of urgent public importance, you are bound, Mr. Speaker, to permit him to discuss it.

Mr. CARVELL: He will not have that right after this rule goes through.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Rule 39 is utterly unimpaired by the amendment.

Mr. CARVELL: Does my hon. friend say that a member will have the right to move the adjournment of the House or of a debate except under the rule which provides for the discussion of urgent public matters?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, he has the right to move it at any time. All that is cut off is the right to debate, and what is the use of debate unless it is of a matter of urgent public importance? I think I have properly apportioned the objections that have been offered to-night, and which hon. gentlemen opposite say are rooted in venom. They say that there is venom behind these resolutions. I am only concerned with the venom, if there is any, that is in the resolutions. I do not care what is behind it. I read the resolutions and I endeavoured to find out what they meant. It is what they mean that counts. My hon. friend says that the venom in the resolution consists in this that if we press these rules they could never amend a Bill on its third reading, and discuss the amendment, that they could not amend anything in committee at all and discuss the amendment. The hon. member for Carleton solemnly asserts on his responsibility as a member that that is the effect of the first clause that we purpose to insert. What is the first clause?

> Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions and every motion standing on > the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee, or for the previous question, or for the third reading of a Bill, or for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption in Committee of the Whole, or for Supply, or of Ways and Means, or the resolution clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable.

All these shall be debatable, and the third reading of a Bill shall be debatable. But says my hon. friend, you do not say that a Bill is amendable, and consequently it is not amendable. It is amendable now. Any hon. member can amend a Bill on its third reading. What is there in that resolution to take that right away? Unless it is taken away in that resolution, he has the very same right as he had before. A Bill is amendable on the third reading. But says my hon. friend, you may be able to amend it, but you cannot discuss the amendment. When the third reading of a Bill is moved a debate is precipitated, if hon. members wish to have a debate. If an amendment is moved what is the subject of debate? The third reading and amendment, and it so appears in the Orders of the Day. When that goes in the Orders of the Day it appears: Debate resumed on the motion of hon. minister so-and-so, that Bill so-and-so be read a third time and the amendment thereto of the hon. member for Carleton to such and such an effect. That is the subject of debate inserted in the Order Paper of the next day. That is the subject of debate according to the theory of this Parliament. Immediately an hon. member moves an amendment to the third reading, he adds to the subject of debate. It might be that in certain circumstances amendments must be debated one at a time as Mr. Speaker has ruled. In cases where you only amend a certain part and do not strike out everything after the word 'that,' you must debate that part first, and come back to the main motion, but on the Order Paper, and in the theory of practice in this House, there is one subject for debate only. It appears there as the main motion for the third reading, and the amendment thereto, whatever it may be, and if there is an amendment to the amendment that also is added, and becomes consolidated with the subject of debate, the whole being thrown open for debate. That would have been perfectly clear to the hon. gentleman if he had gone over the Votes and Proceedings of this House, and ascertained the principle on which debates proceeded. But he says that in committee you cannot move an amendment at all. What would stop him, unless these rules stop him? The motion in committee is this: we are at clause 2 of the Naval Bill, for example, and a motion is made that the clause we are discussing should pass. An hon. member moves that the clause be amended and that becomes the subject of debate similarly as an amendment becomes the subject of debate in the House. The motion that the clause pass, the amendment, the sub-amendment if there is one, all become consolidated together and become a subject of debate. The motion is debatable, the amendment is debatable, the sub-amendment is debatable, all are debatable. So much for the objection that no amendment would be allowed.

Let me come to another point. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) seemed very determined in his motions this afternoon. He almost took a fit as he thought over these rules and he said: You could stop debate altogether and you could put through a Bill to burn the House of Commons, to disband the army and scatter the navy, and to destroy the Transcontinental railway, all in three days. Of course he told us that was an extreme case. First let us see whether under these rules debate could be altogether shut out. The first clause says there shall be debate on a long list of subjects, and I submit that this includes every subject of substantial debate that the wit of man could imagine. The rule says these are subjects of debate and consequently they may be debated unless there is something absolutely inconsistent with that in another part of the rule, and which overrides it. But is there? The next clause of the rule says that any minister may rise in his place and give notice that at a certain time in the future, the next day perhaps, he will move that the debate be not further adjourned, or that the clauses which have been postponed be not further postponed. I cannot see how that is inconsistent with the provision that there shall be a debate. It says the minister may move, but he cannot move unless the provisions of the first clause have been lived up to and under that clause there must first of all be a debate. There must be a debate before the minister is empowered to rise in his place and move that a debate be adjourned. I would recommend the hon. member for South Wellington, if he has no better opinion of the meaning of the word 'debate' to go to a dictionary; a debate necessarily implies a speech on one side and a speech on the other side desired, at the very least. I submit that within the fair meaning of the word 'debate' the Government of the country would be bound, and will see to it, that there has been such debate as to reasonable men will appear sufficient for the subject in hand. There certainly must be debate and there can be debate at all stages of a Bill. There can be debate on the introduction of the Bill, there can be debate on the second reading, there can be debate in committee, there can be debate on the third reading, to say nothing of the debates that may take place in the Select Standing Committees of this House. There is plenty of room for debate, and after the Government of the country have considered that the debate having proceeded to a reasonable length and obstruction having reared its head, there must be a motion, and even after that the Opposition have a subsequent day in which they may discuss that Bill and its clauses. Surely there can be nothing unfair about that.

Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the rules now proposed are worse than the British rules, but in the British House there does not need to be a word of debate on one side or the other before the motion is put. Before there is one word of debate in the British House a motion may be made that the question be put; nay, as soon as the question is put from the Chair, the motion may be made and that motion may be made not by a minister but by any private member. Let me read the English rule for fear hon. gentlemen will doubt my word; it is rule 133 and it reads:

> After a question has been proposed, a member rising in his place may claim to move. 'That the question be now put,' and unless it appears to the Chair that the motion is an abuse of the rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority, the question. 'That the question be put,' must be put forthwith.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And Mr. Speaker can refuse to put it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and in one breath the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) blames us for not importing into this House that discretion of the Speaker, and in the next breath the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) say you cannot import it here because the Speaker is elected by a majority in this House and it would not suit us. What do hon. gentlemen opposite mean anyway? Here is complaint from the hon. member for St. John that we have not left the discretion with the Speaker, and have placed the responsibility on the Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In England there is, by reason of the method of selection to the office of Speaker and the permanency of his tenure, that safeguard, and you do not impose any such safeguard by this resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the hon. member for South Wellington says you cannot impose that safeguard here, and if you did it would be worthless.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If you cannot do it you should not apply the guillotine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And instead we place the responsibility directly upon the shoulders of the Government who are responsible to the people of the country, and furthermore we say that no government can at any time, even after debate, say that debate must close, but must give twenty-four hours' notice and allow reasonable debate even after that. That is the safeguard we apply. Now, I would like to know from hon. gentlemen opposite whether in the closure they intended to pass they were going to import the British discretion which is left to the Speaker, or were they going to introduce such closure as we now propose. Will the hon. member for St. John tell us that? Will the hon. member for South Renfrew who was in favour of closure once upon a time when his Government was in power, tell us whether they intended to give that discretion to the Speaker?

Mr. GRAHAM: Where has the hon. gentleman authority for the statement that I was in favour of closure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Right here in front of me. Here is what the hon. member (Mr. Graham) said at Port Hope on the 12th of September, 1911; he will remember the speech.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Here is what he said:

Under the present rules of the House of Commons business that could be done in three months was extended to nine months. He strongly favoured amending the rules.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear; I do not change that one iota if the rules are amended in a proper way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is now in opposition and he wants the rules amended so that he could drive a coach and four through them; that would be the proper way to amend the rules for him now.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend will now take back his statement that I was in favour of closure and that he had the authority before him to show that I was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have nothing at all to take back. I tell the hon. gentleman that if he is going to provide that business which took nine months in the House of Commons should only take three months, by amending the rules as he said he was, and as he now admits he said, he could do it by closure and by nothing else. That was my hon. friend's opinion. He says: they can shut out debate, and, worst of all, they can shut out amendments. He says: These rights are the very bulwarks of the Opposition and rules that would make it possible to shut out amendments and to shut out debate are the worst things which I have ever heard of; they have destroyed parliamentary government and made it the government of the mob. Let me tell the hon. member for South Renfrew and the hon. member for South Wellington that by the extreme exercise, but by the perfectly correct exercise of the present rules that are the very epitome of perfection according to the leader of the Opposition, you can shut out amendments and shut out debate to your heart's content. Let me show hon. gentlemen how it can be done.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then why apply the guillotine?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because it is not the reasonable interpretation of the rules, nor are the extreme cases cited by the hon. member for South Wellington the reasonable interpretation of these proposed rules. Under the present rules, whenever there is a motion before you, Mr. Speaker, we can immediately have the previous question moved and you can shut out every amendment. Those are the rules of the House as they stand to-day. The leader of the Opposition says that the best rules in the British House of Commons are such rules that the majority can entirely shut out amendments. We are exactly in the position so terribly deplored by the hon. member for South Wellington; but you can shut out debate by the minority as well if you want to. How do you do it? Just as soon as a member opposite rises to speak, somebody on this side rises and we move that our man be heard. That is our rule to-day; that is in the rules to-day and they are not debatable, thanks to the judgment of the leader of the Opposition himself, so that by a weapon forged by the leader of the Opposition we are to-day able to do the very extreme so much deplored by the hon. member for South Renfrew and the hon. member for South Wellington. No Government would do it.

Mr. GRAHAM: They have done it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under extreme circumstances, the rule could be applied.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You did it the other day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government have not done it. They have not prevented any hon. gentleman from speaking. They have had the previous question moved to shut out amendments. They have been compelled to use rule 17 in order to get the previous question moved. I appeal even to the ingenuity of the hon. member for St. John to say whether or not in the history of this Parliament he could imagine a case where the previous question was more necessary than it was in this case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I answer my hon. friend courteously and I say that in my judgment it was entirely unnecessary and entirely unjustifiable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend did not answer the question at all. I asked him to devise in the amplitude of his ingenuity any possible case where the previous question could be necessary if it was not necessary here, and also to devise any possible event or any possible contingency that might have been in the mind of his hon. leader when he inserted rule 17 in the form in which it now stands in the rules, if it was not just to cover such a case as this.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will answer my hon. friend again. The previous question was invented for the purpose of avoiding a decision on the main motion, never for such a purpose as that for which it was applied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has now elevated himself into the position of a reviewer of Sir Thomas Erskine May. Sir Thomas Erskine May says that the purpose of the previous question in England is two-fold—he is discussing conditions in England—first of all to avoid the decision on the main question and next to prevent amendments. I read it no later than this forenoon. In England, what is the previous question? Not that the question be now put, but that the question be not now put, and that is the reason that in England it has the two-fold purpose. In Canada, the previous question takes the form that the question be now put, so that its clear purpose is only to prevent amendments. That at all events was the only purpose in this case. In what possible circumstance could rule 17, which on the 9th of July the right hon. leader of the Opposition took under his eye and said: It does not suit me in its present form, because it is debatable; I want it not debatable and I amend it and put it in that form—in what possible circumstances could it be used except in just such a contingency as it was used in last week? Is it an advantage that the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) should speak before the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) under ordinary circumstances? Why, no; as every one knows, if there is an advantage to one speaker in this House over another, it is the advantage of coming after him, not of coming before him. So that the only imaginary contingency where there could be any practical use of rule 17 is just such an event as occurred last week when it had to be exercised in order that the previous question might be moved and this resolution rescued from the turmoil of indefinite and interminable obstruction.

The hon. member for South Wellington, who, I presume, in terror of the operation of these rules has taken refuge somewhere outside the House, conjured up the very destruction of Confederation by the extreme exercise of these rules. Inasmuch as he said that could be done—although it could not be done—inasmuch as there was possible, he said, the disbandment of our army, the destruction of the transcontinental, the taxation to death of our banks, &c., therefore we should shrink from this position, because we will be under turmoil and mob rule as soon as it goes into force. I should like to direct the attention of the hon. member for South Wellington to the real condition in this country at the present moment, and I will show him under no less an authority than Bagehot in his work on the English constitution that at the present time there rests in the Crown just such awful authority as he is afraid to vest in the Parliament of this country. What is it? After reciting what may be done, Bagehot says:

> Recent discussions have also brought into curious prominence another part of the constitution. I said in this book that it would very much surprise people if they were only told how many things the Queen could do without consulting Parliament, and it certainly has so proved, for when the Queen abolished Purchase in the army by an Act of prerogative (after the Lords had rejected the bill for doing so), there was a great and general astonishment.
>
> But this is nothing to what the Queen can by law do without consulting Parliament. Not to mention other things, she could disband the army (by law she can engage more than a certain number of men, but she is not obliged to engage any men); she could dismiss all the officers, from the General Commanding-in-Chief downwards; she could dismiss all the sailors too; she could sell off all our ships of war——
>
> Even, Sir, the Niobe and the Rainbow.
>
> —and all our naval stores; she could make a peace by the sacrifice of Cornwall and begin a war for the conquest of Brittany. She could make every citizen in the United Kingdom, male or female, a Peer; she could make every parish in the United Kingdom a 'university'; she could dismiss most of the civil servants; she could pardon all offenders.

That is what the Queen, or the King now, is empowered to do under the constitution of this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He would not like to endeavour to do it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, nor would any sensible government. This is a case, this determined obstruction of hon. gentlemen opposite, where it is excellent to have the strength of a giant, though it may be tyrannous to use it like a giant. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite are very much afraid of closure, and the hon. member for South Renfrew repeated again that no matter how he and others may have wandered from the path the right hon. leader of the Government had stood true to the principles of Fox and against closure in every shape or form. I am afraid I must be compelled to doubt the hon. member for South Renfrew, and I produce authorities for doubting him. I produce first the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) who does not speak without authority either on the stump or in this House. But the hon. member for Rouville made the statement, as a member of the Government, at St. Hyacinthe, and was man enough not to dispute it in this House when it was referred to here, that if the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was returned, Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself would introduce closure. The hon. member for Rouville knows that he took a manly position in this House, and he does not attempt to wiggle out of it, and he does not say that he is opposed to closure. All he says is that he is opposed to the way we are going about it and that if we had rereferred this to a committee of the House to consult you on it, Mr. Speaker, he would vote for it, but that our course is entirely against his conscience and he is bound to oppose it. The ex-Minister of Agriculture, Hon. Sydney Fisher, said that not only was he in favour of closure, but the entire Government was in favour of it. He pledged his word that the Government if returned to power would introduce closure and put it into effect. And the hon. member for South Renfrew was one of the ministers in that Government. These two gentlemen sat in the Cabinet councils discussing this matter with Sir Allen Aylesworth, who was Minister of Justice, and others who were committed to the conclusion that they had to put closure into effect as soon as they were returned to power, as they thought they would be in the reciprocity election. The hon. member for South Renfrew would like to tell us that it was not going to be closure, that it was going to be the amendment of the rules that would not close debate in any way. He says in effect: I thought they were going to amend the rules in a way which I cannot quite describe, but the idea was to have a three months' session instead of a nine months' session; and this was to be done without closing off debate. That is the way the hon. member for South Renfrew understood the decision of the Cabinet council. The hon. gentleman to-night gave us at least one reason why he should be considered next to the right hon. leader of the Opposition in command of the party—he entirely repudiated the tactics of hon. gentlemen behind him who are now endeavouring to say, face to face with the people of this country, that they have not been obstructing the Naval Bill. He says to the House—and he will dispute me if I am wrong—that they have been obstructing the Naval Bill and obstructing it for a long time. He knows they have been obstructing and it would be foolish to say otherwise notwithstanding the attitude of the hon. member for St. John. Now, what a Cabinet we had, if we had only known it, in the last Administration. Here was Sir Allen Aylesworth, who was Minister of Justice, and who, if anyone, would have had the framing of any closure rules had that Government been returned, and who, possibly, for anything I know, did frame such rules—this man said:

> When a member of Parliament so far forgets his responsibility, his duty to his country and the people who send him there that he deliberately descends to the level of obstructing public business, he deserves to be gagged, and I am ready to do it.

So, according to the hon. member for South Renfrew, this was the state of affairs in the late Government. He stood at one side, the champion of obstruction while in opposition and while in power intending to oppose to obstruction rules that would prevent without preventing it, that would close debate without closing it. And opposite to him sat the Minister of Justice, who said: You are degrading the whole parliamentary procedure: you have descended to defy the people, and have become a mere obstructionist; you have to be gagged, and I am ready to gag you. And the right hon. leader of that Government says: No, I am an adherent of Fox. —who never heard of obstruction—and I will have nothing to do with it. No, says the hon. member for Rouville who was Postmaster General, you are all wrong, and I will tell the people that you are wrong; my interpretation of the result of this Cabinet Council is that you, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, are in favour of closure and I am going to commit you to put closure into effect.

There is no doubt that not only under this Government but under previous governments obstruction has been practiced in this House. There is no doubt it was practiced in the British House, practiced to such an extent that closure became a necessity. It became more necessary as the years went by. Closure as first introduced proved ineffective and in later times it has been stiffened, and hardened, and amplified ever since until now it is the doctrine of both parties and of every member of both parties. That is a fact I can prove by referring to the records of the British House. In the last session of the House, there were no less than one hundred and eight applications of closure, to say nothing of the application of what are known there as the kangaroo and the guillotine—one hundred and eight applications of closure, and only a small fraction of them moved by members of the Government. And yet I do not know that they have had a revolution in Great Britain; I have not heard that a mob is in control of the House; I have not heard that free speech has been smothered; I believe that they have good government in Great Britain to-day. Closure was applied daily; as often as twice a day; as often as three times a day; as often as five times a day; and this by the Liberal Government of Britain. And I affirm, and I invite contradiction, that there is nothing made possible by the extremest exercise of the rules introduced by the right hon. the leader of this Government that is not made possible in a stronger way under the British rules. I ask for a single instance. What is made possible by the exercise of the extreme authority of the majority here that cannot be brought about under the British rules? Absolutely nothing. These hon. gentlemen talk about shutting off debate at two o'clock. Why, under the British rules they can shut off debate at any minute. In the British House they can move amendments, and those amendments need not be debated except at the mercy of the majority. They do not even need to be put to the House except at the discretion of the chairman. The chairman can take a list of the amendments and say: I strike out the first one, but I take the second, because it seems to have some common sense in it, and I will let the House vote on it. I strike out three, four and five, and I come to the sixth: I will take that and put it to a vote. That is within the power of the Chairman under the British rules; is that within the power of the Chairman of the majority under these rules? Not at all. I again assert that even the extremists exercise of power, within the imagination of hon. gentlemen opposite does not cover a single instance under these rules that cannot be covered under the British rules. Hon. gentlemen say: It is true you have offered us the British rules, but you know that it is absurd to offer us these rules, because we have not a permanent Speaker. The right hon. leader of the Government has said: If the Opposition, any time after these rules are put in force, think they would prefer the British rules, they are welcome to them. They do not need to say they prefer the British rules to the rules as now existing without amendment; all they need say is: We prefer the British rules to these rules you have now enforced. If the Opposition at any time take the stand that the rules of the British House are more palatable to them than these rules, they can have them; that is a standing offer, and so long as hon. gentlemen in this House get up and say they will not avail themselves of this offer, they are proclaiming—and there is no getting away from it—that they know these rules are more lenient than the British rules. I again ask hon. gentlemen to tell us what rules they proposed to introduce to close debate? What were the rules that they formulated?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The late Government did not decide to introduce closure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am asking the hon. member if they were formulated.

Mr. GRAHAM: Never.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They were never considered by council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, what must the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) think of the hon. member for St. John! I may tell the hon. member for St. John that the hon. member for Rouville is not the man to go down to St. Hyacinthe and say to the people that the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier would pass a closure measure if returned to office if he did not have the authority of council to do so. Has the hon. gentleman stated that such rules were not formulated by the late Government?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I said they were not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will have to wait for the developments of time. In the light of what the hon. member for Rouville has said; in the light of what the late Minister of Agriculture has said; in the light of the words of the late Minister of Justice, who would himself have formulated the rules if they were formulated; in the light of these facts I am compelled to say that there is no logical conclusion possible in my mind except that the rules were formulated, whatever they were.

In the past we may have erred on both sides. So long as you have fixed and defined rules of parliament, and so long as under these rules you have party government, it is inevitable, while human nature remains as it is, that this party or that will take advantage of those rules for its own aggrandisement, but that is no reason why a strong government, when it attains office, should not so amend those rules as to make it impossible for any party, no matter how determined its attitude may be, In the past we may have erred on both sides. to so abuse the principles of government as to defeat the will of the people and the progress of useful legislation. The duty of the Government is clear. We have to decide whether or not we shall proclaim our cause as hopeless at the hands of an Opposition hungry for office and burning with lust for power; whether we shall have to admit that we are going to lie here 'in cold obstruction and to rot' or whether we propose to purge this Parliament of 'this obstruction which begins to stop our very veins of life'. Let us look at what was done by a greater parliament than this after they turned the way this Parliament is now about to turn. Let us look at the immense volume of legislation so massive and so splendid, that has been achieved and is now being achieved in the British House. Let us look also at the path over which this ponderous burden is being carried; a path blazed first by that great Liberal chieftain, perhaps the most illustrious leader that ever adorned that Parliament, and followed later by them all

Mr. ARTHUR LACHANCE (Quebec Center): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the Opposition has once more, this afternoon, given the Government an opportunity to clearly set forth its views in regard to the purport of the resolution now, and for a few days past, under the consideration of the House. Thanks to the motion of adjournment introduced by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay), the right hon. leader of the Opposition has been able to put some precise questions regarding the correct interpretation of the new rules. However, what happened under our eyes? The right hon. Prime Minister, realizing the full force of the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition and feeling that he was unable to answer them without implicating himself, evaded the question and took refuge in repetitions and generalities, the effect being to further confuse matters. So we are more than ever justified in looking askance at the motives which are said to inspire the promoters of those three new rules embodied in the resolution, and in continuing to oppose them with all our might.

The resolution referred to was introduced in this House on April 9th instant. The Prime Minister himself, before all others, attempted to impress us with a favourable view of its hazy, but rather awe-inspiring provisions. The object, we are told, is to amend, by improving them, the rules which govern the proceedings of this House. Obviously, however, the end in view is a mistaken, false and objectionable one. Its purpose, it is claimed, is to ensure a greater measure of fairplay in the conduct of the business of the House; as a matter of fact, however, the principle embodied in this resolultion implies a rank injustice, and an abuse of power; it gives full sway to brutal force, to despotism, to tyranny itself. In order that tyranny should firmly take root, it is necessary to have recourse to despotic means. That is what the Government has done. Those who were present at the sitting of April 9th inst. will agree with me, if they are sincere; those who have witnessed how promptly the leader of the Opposition was deprived of his right to address the House, will ever be satisfied of the truth of my statement. As honourable gentlemen will remember, the Prime Minister had just closed his speech in support of the proposed regulations; he had put in action all his resources to clothe them with a semblance of plausibility.

Barely had Mr. Speaker read through the resolution which the Prime Minister had handed to him, than the leader of the Opposition was on his feet to answer him. It was his unquestionable right. For over five hundred years that parliaments have existed in the British kingdom, always and without exception it has been the practice to allow the leader of the Opposition to answer forthwith the leader of a government submitting an important proposition. If then, as will be readily admitted, a long standing usage is equivalent to a right in matters relating to British institutions, and particularly to Parliamentary institutions, the leader of the Opposition could, not merely as a matter of grace, but as a matter of indisputable right, address the House, following immediately on the leader of the Government, to extend his approval or express his disapproval, whether in the form of an amendment, or in any other shape recognized by the rules of parliamentary procedure.

Nevertheless, within the view of the whole country, the Government refused him that right; not only that, but the Government deprived him of that right while in the exercise of it. Indeed, the leader of the Opposition had been on his feet for a few seconds when the hon. Minister of Marine end Fisheries rose in his turn. Hon. members must have all noticed that so characteristic attitude of his, with head thrown forward, as if intent on grasping some object; he was, as a matter of fact, preparing to lay hands on something quite precious; he was preparing to lay hands on the freedom of speech and on the rights of the Opposition. The Speaker gave the floor to the leader of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and in doing so was doubly justified by the old-time practice which I referred to, and by the fact that the leader of the Opposition had been on his feet for some minutes. The latter gentleman having thus been adjudged the floor by the Speaker, rose once more and proceeded to address him in the usual terms: Mr. Speaker.

So I am justified in stating that the leader of the Opposition had already begun his speech. In the ordinary course of affairs, a member thus having the floor cannot be interrupted without his consent, unless it be on a point of order. In this case, then, the Government, through the brute force of the majority, silenced the leader of the Opposition after the latter had begun speaking and was availing himself of his right to answer the Prime Minister.

To justify that flagrant violation of an usage centuries old, the Government invoked rule 17 of this House; and through the honourable member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), moved that the leader of the Opposition be deprived of his right to speak and this right attributed to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). This afternoon, the hon. member of Finance (Mr. White) contended that no insult had been offered to the leader of the Opposition, in thus depriving him of his right to speak, considering that rule 17 authorizes such a course. The hon. minister is mistaken; the enforcement of that rule, under the circumstances which I have stated, was improper and illegal. Rule 17 reads thus:

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place: but a motion may be made that any member who has risen 'be now heard,' or 'do now speak,' which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

So then, when several hon. gentlemen rise at the same time to address the House, the Speaker gives the floor to the one who was on his feet; and, as stated by authorities on parliamentary procedure, it is improper after that to interfere with the Speaker's choice. Bourinot, at pages 457 and 458 under the title 'Precedence in Debate', thus expressed himself:

The Speaker of the Commons will always give precedence in debate to that member who first catches his eye.

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen 'be now heard,' or 'do now speak.'

It is usual, however, to allow priority to members of the Administration who wish to speak and in all important debates it is customary for the Speaker to endeavour to give the preference alternately to the known supporters and opponents of a measure or question; and it is irregular to interfere with the Speaker's call in favour of any other member.

If, moreover, the member who has been given the floor by the Speaker has risen, and not only is on his feet but has begun to speak, that motion provided for in rule 17 cannot be made any more; as the member cannot be interrupted, save in connection with a point of order, and that motion is not on a point of order. So then, on April 9th, not only did the Government deny to the leader of the Opposition a sacred right, but in order to deprive him of that right it committed a breach of usage, it acted unlawfully and had its course approved by the brute force of a majority. And that devious and hateful course, the Government adopted it deliberately, in order to force the previous question on the Opposition and to prevent the latter from changing a single line, a single word, in the new regulations; and at the same time it deprived the House of any suggestion emanating from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

After recalling those facts, am I not justified in stating that under the circumstances the action of the Government is equivalent to deeds of despotism, inspired by a spirit of tyranny; yes, tyranny, let us not shrink from using the word, when these gentlemen in power do not hesitate in doing the thing, do not recoil at the thought of violating the rights of the Opposition, though they cannot attain that object without being guilty of improper and illegal conduct.

I may give some further evidence of the arbitrary character of these proceedings. In his speech, the Prime Minister, of course, attempted to justify this resolution by alleging the desirability of ensuring the more speedy transaction of public business in this House. In that respect, his contention may appear to be plausible to a certain extent. I have not had sufficient experience in this House to be able to state 'urbi et orbi' whether he is right or wrong. I would rather abide by the opinion of members who have ben sitting in this House for many years and have personally ascertained whether there are deficiencies in some respects. But, of the latter, there are a good many in the ranks of the Opposition, and relatively a larger number than on the Government side. Such is not evidently the opinion of the Prime Minister, at least his acknowledged opinion. If we are to judge by his action, any idea, any suggestion, respecting the efficiency of the rules of the House cannot and should not emanate from any others than himself and his followers.

On the other hand, however high his estimate of himself and of his friends in that respect, I venture to bring forward, without hesitation, as superior to theirs, the experience, the knowledge, and the ability of the leader of the Opposition, who has been a member of this House for forty years, and, for twenty-five years, has been the leader, either of the Opposition, or of the Government. Why has the Government, by moving the previous question, deprived itself of the help of the leader of the Opposition and of a number of his supporters, highly qualified, they also, by their experience and their knowledge of parliamentary procedure? If the Government acted candidly, if its motives were true, above reproach, why has it thus brutally closed the mouths of those hon. gentlemen and their leader?

What then was the terrible proposal which that leader intended to make? The simplest, the most sensible proposal, and that consecrated by the longest usage: The appointment of a committee made up of members from both sides of the House, which, and rightly so, would have comprised a majority of Government members, a committee which would have looked into the question with a view to arriving at conclusion acceptable to both parties; in other words a procedure sanctioned by immemorial usage in British parliaments, and particularly in ours.

But precisely that is what this Government was adverse to. The reasons alleged in support of the speedy passing of this resolution have no foundation; the Government's primary object is to, in the first place, force through the $35,000,000 contribution bill for the benefit of Great Britain, which has no need for it; and then to deprive us of all freedom of speech. The Government realizes that fight put up by the Opposition has discredited, and rightly so, that legislation in the eyes of the public; it hesitates accordingly to submit it to the people, satisfied that it will there meet with defeat. On the other hand, the Government is aware that the Opposition, thus supported by public opinion, cannot and should not concur in that proposal, and that more than ever it is its bounden duty to oppose it by all constitutional means; hence, the fury of the Government and the extreme steps taken by it in its wrath.

That resolution besides constitutes an injustice and breach of faith towards the Opposition. The latter has taken up the glove on the ground where the Government had placed it, and has made preparations for resistance under rules which it was understood would hold good to the end; and now, on a sudden, in the heat of the fray, the Government realizing that its fate is sealed, dares to alter those rules, in the hope of ensuring a victory which is becoming more doubtful as time goes on, and avoiding a defeat the certainty of which increases from day to day.

Well, that is evidence neither of bravery nor loyalty; it is a back-down, a giving up of the sponge. The Government has already given that impression to the public; it is possible that by gagging the Opposition, by using its majority to strangle it, it may succeed in getting this resolution through, and accessorily the contribution bill; but in any case it will be a paltry victory and one which cannot restore to it the confidence of the people, the people which this contribution bill has estranged from the Government and whose good will the Government is about to entirely lose, as a result of its resorting to arbitrary means.

If that resolution had come up in the opening days of a session, or even in the ordinary course of a session, but while no other important measure was in suspense, and if the Government had followed the ordinary procedure, I mean the appointing of a committee or if, in any event, it had not prevented the Opposition from expressing its views, some measure of sincerity might be credited to it.

It is in vain that the Prime Minister has striven to find a justification to this resolution in views expressed by some Liberal candidates in the course of the electoral campaign which ended on September 21, 1911. The Prime Minister should not entertain the idea that he can satisfy a single member of this House as to the existence of any similarity between the circumstances of that time and those of to-day; he should not seriously think of passing off such views as a sop to hon. gentlemen on this side for being coerced. What were the circumstances? The Liberal ministers and members were then facing their constituents, defending a trade arrangement with the United States, in respect to which the members of the then Opposition had carried on systematic obstruction from January to July, 1911; an obstruction which had induced the Liberal Government to take the question before the people. The Liberals would say: If you return our party to power, if you approve of that trade arrangement, it will be necessary to ensure its passing through the House, and if we meet with a resistance similar to that which brought on this election, it will be incumbent on us to find some way out, and possibly the only way of settling the matter will be by amending the rules of the House. Now, the Liberal party was defeated; so that from the constitutional viewpoint that arrangement has been condemned, as also the proposal to modify the rules of the House towards ensuring its adoption. How then can the Prime Minister claim he has justification of his stand in that proposed revision of the rules which was condemned by the electors on September 21, 1911? Not only is he without a mandate to submit that resolution, which itself is intended to permit the forcing through of the $35,000,000 contribution bill, in respect to which, as well, he is without a mandate, but he is going beyond the mandate he holds in forcing through this resolution, the principle of which has been condemned by the people on September 21, 1911.

So that we are confronted with a series of hateful deeds emanating from this Government. What other result might have been expected from the present methods of this government? They started out with the contention that it was urgent to aid Great Britain and provide $35,000,000 for her. That is false; from falsity they proceeded to arbitrary action and exasperation, when obstacles were met on the way; from exasperation they proceeded to violence, from violence to brute force, from brute force to despotism; they will probably go as far as tyranny, if their interests warrant it.

But the Government should not delude itself with vain hopes; let it not expect any compromise on our part; we shall resist arbitrary action, brute force, despotism by all means open to us under the law of the country, and even, should that prove insufficient, under natural law; and should that even be of no avail, we shall appeal to the people, the absolute and almighty master in this country, to take in hand their own cause and drive from the sacred temple of the nation's liberties those who defile it and put it to vile use.

I shall not go into a detailed analysis of the three clauses of this resolution; several hon. members have already thoroughly considered their portent, as well as their probable outcome; they have shown peremptorily that they embody an arbitrary, dangerous and abusive principle, quite irreconcilable with British parliamentary institutions. The attentive reading of these three clauses definitely suffices to confirm that view. They are added to clause 17 which I quoted above. These three clauses read as follows:

(2) Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions and every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee, or for the previous question, or the third reading of a Bill, or for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means of the resolution clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

(3) Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes, in any such adjourned debate; or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

(4) On Thursday and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the Estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

In short, the following conclusions for instance, are implied in clause 3. Heretofore, the rights and privileges of members in the exercise of their duties as representatives of the people in this House were placed under the direct protection and safeguarding of the House itself and its Speaker; in future, those rights and privileges will be at the tender mercies of some minister of the Crown; a mere notice from him in relation to a subject then under discussion will be sufficient to forcibly close de plano the debate on the day following. How easy it will be on the day following to keep the House busy considering some other questions until two o'clock in the morning, and thus forestall the further consideration of that business which the minister is anxious to hide from the searchlight of the Opposition.

The Government itself through its most prominent exponents, admits that it might have recourse to such a scheme. I have evidence of it in the speech delivered by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) in connection with this resolution on April 10. The hon. gentleman does not deny that he had something to do with the wording of this resolution; he even seems to glory in it; what a small thing to glory about! Obviously he was entrusted with the duty of covering up the dangerous features in these resolutions, of concealing whatever might be deemed objectionable in them. To that gigantic task he devoted himself with all his might, but unsuccessfully; his statements, however melliflous, had only one object which was discernible: to try and hide the subtle venom which those three resolutions contained. Accordingly, pressed with inquiries, driven to the foot of the wall, he was forced to admit that clause 3 might in the end enable a minister of the Crown practically to forestall the discussion of any issue, and, moreover, to force through in a few minutes all the clauses of a measure: bill, resolution, estimates, &c., &c.

I quote herewith his own words in answer to remarks from the mouth of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German):

Mr. GERMAN: Could not the Government keep off the discussion on that second day until, say, 1.30 in the morning, or twenty minutes before two o'clock, and practically shut off all discussion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see the point of the hon. gentleman and I am coming to it because it was belaboured by the hon. member for Carleton, (N. B.). The hon. gentleman means that they could continue the discussion on some other subject?

Mr. GERMAN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government of this country could do that if they were willing to take the responsibility, but what would be the object? Let us consider the question and see how it would work out.

Mr. GERMAN: It could be done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but what could be the object? In order that there might be a short discussion on something that has been already discussed, the Government are themselves going to obstruct some other business and prolong the discussion over it. What object have the Government to serve by that? If it were possible within reason to put it within the power of even an insane government to do such a thing it could be done.

Mr. GERMAN: I did not say it should be done. I was asking the hon. gentleman if, under these rules, it could be done?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but it would be absurdity itself if it were done.

Mr. GERMAN: The resolution says:

Any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so do to, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution, or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title ou titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed.

Now, the second clause of the Naval Aid Act is under discussion. If a motion is made that the debate be not further continued, does the hon. gentleman understand that that simply adjourns the debate of that clause, or does he think that it terminates the debate on the whole Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, just on that clause——

Mr. GERMAN: That is what I understand.

Mr. MARCIL: But it says: clause or clauses.

Mr. GERMAN: Could they not give notice as to the whole Bill and stop the discussion on every clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This it what can be done; clause 2 is under discussion, say for two weeks or three weeks or five weeks, as would suit hon. gentlemen opposite; clause 2 is under discussion and the motion to postpone the consideration of that clause is made. Then it would be in order I would think, for the committee to pass to clause 3, and clause 3 would then have to be discussed and a separate motion would have to be made as to clause 3.

Mr. GERMAN: In the same way on the twenty-four hours' notice?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: As to each clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Exactly.

Mr. DEVLIN: That is not the rule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, of course, that is the notice. A motion is made that consideration be postponed on one clause; then, after the other clause has been discussed, another motion is made, of course all within the responsibility of the Government, that the consideration of that be postponed. Then notice is given that the clauses so postponed be on a certain day no further postponed. That is to say, notice is given that a motion will be made on some subsequent date stated, that the consideration of these clauses, so postponed, be not again postponed, and these clauses then must be taken up on that day.

Mr. DEVLIN: And vote on the whole Bill and all the clauses?

Mr. GERMAN: That means discussion on the whole Bill could be stopped on twenty-four hours' notice. I would like to get more information. Clause 2 of Navy Bill is now under discussion; the discussion of clause 3 will not be taken up until clause 2 is disposed of, discussion on clause 3 will not be begun. Surely it cannot be the intention of the Government, simply with one notice, to say that on such a day the discussion on clause 3 shall terminate and on such a day the discussion of clause 4 shall terminate, and consequently wipe out the whole thing on that day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I understand the question but I will repeat what I have said and I think the hon. gentleman will understand me. Clause 2 is under discussion and the Governement have reason, by what they have observed to see that it is being obstructed, or on reasons that appear to them good, they move that the discussion be adjourned.

Mr. GERMAN: On clause 2?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Nothing however is done at that time and they pass to clause 3. That is the next thing to do, without a doubt. Clause 3 then becomes the subject of discussion in the committee. Clause 3 is under consideration and the committee discussed it also for a time, and the Government takes the responsibility for the length of that time. Then, if the same conditions develop; if the Government deem it is their duty as the custodians of the rights of the people of this country, they can move that the consideration of that clause be postponed. Then the commitee passes to clause 4 and it is in the same category, and nothing is done as yet except merely to move the postponement. A debate has taken place successively on each clause and then when we have got all through the Bill and all has been debated clause by clause, the Government, or a member of the Government, may give notice that he will move on a certain day that these clauses, all of them, be the first business of that committee and be not further postponed, and then all the clauses must be taken up on that last day and concluded by two o'clock. I think that is absolutely clear.

Mr. GERMAN: It is worse than I thought it was.

Mr. HENDERSON: You mean it is better than you thought it was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am putting that as what would be within the power of the Government to do. Even that, the extreme exercise of its power, would be to give a day's discussion beyond what is permitted under the British rules. The Government does not need to do that. It can have one adjourned and then, if it is reached, it can take it up and finish it on a certain day, vote on it and then take up the other. Either way can be adopted. The extreme exercise of the rule would be to give to the Opposition of this House a day's discussion beyond what is given under the British rules. Within that day, the Opposition have it within their power to organize themselves and to discuss the Bill within that time to the best possible advantage. It is provided—because I presume it was anticipated that hon. gentlemen opposite would say, why, on the last day you have us right in your grip; you can put up some hon. member on the Government side and he can go on and discuss the Bill until two o'clock, it is not provided in this clause that no hon. member shall speak longer that twenty minutes, and that their will be no reasonable possibility, unless the Speaker becomes a conspirator with the Government, of refusing discussion on the last day.

Mr. GERMAN: You may not give us longer than twenty minutes to speak. You can quite easily do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is satisfied with the last and he returns to the first objection that the Government might obstruct itself on one clause until one o'clock in order that it might not be obstructed on another until two o'clock. I do not think that the hon. gentleman seriously anticipates that any such thing could or would be done by a sane government. However you put it, even assuming the worst that you can assume against the Government, there is certainly a latitude allowed beyond what is allowed in the Old Land.

So then, there is not the least ambiguity about it. The hon. member specially designated by the Government to show those resolutions under the most favourable light, is forced to admit that the full exercise of the powers conferred by clause 3 leads to the worst of tyrannies in connection with parliamentary institution: That which consists in preventing the Opposition from discussing the acts of the Government. The only corrective which that honourable gentleman can suggest to that despotic principle, is that no Government will dare make use of it; but all the same it is within its powers to enforce it, nad that alone is a dire prospect.

Let us take our present ministers. What will become of the rights and privileges of the Opposition when they are left at their discretion? On April 9 they gave us a dramatic illustration of their idea of good faith and fair play as regards opponents in the minority, and we are justified in expecting to be the victims of all sorts of grievances as soon as they are the only masters, the supreme arbitors of freedom of speech and discussion. But even supposing them to be better than they appear to be, and with the best intentions, I still maintain that under no consideration should we abandon the exercise of such power to the will of a minister of the Crown however straightforward, honest and enlightened. A minister of the Crown is a political partizan; a knowledge of the past, as well as of the present, shows to what injustices, to what abuses, to what moral vagaries, partizanship may lead at times. That is why, from the very beginning of humanity, governments of all kinds and of every age have been obliged to legislate to enforce the observance of certain rules of justice between individuals and now, in this nineteenth century and in this free parliament of a free Canada, it is proposed to-day to clothe a successful politician with unbounded and unlimited powers, powers of which even an angel could not but abuse. I say that such a departure is scandalous, immoral, tyrannical, and it is one of those cases when a member of Parliament or a citizen is justified in crying out: 'Non serviam', when a citizen or a member of Parliament is justified in resisting by all means the action and control of the government.

And what shall we say now of clause 4? That is something worse than the gag. It is strangling pure and simple. In the first place, let us look into the interpretation of that clause, always according to the honourable member for Portage la Prairie. I quote herewith his answer to some questions put by the honourable member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil):

Mr. MARCIL: Does the same rule apply to a discussion of the estimates? As the rule now stands, the estimates are taken up one after the other. Would it be possible for a minister of the Crown to give notice that on a certain day the whole estimates of one department or of all the departments might be called automatically or put to the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Referring to the first part of the hon. gentleman's remarks, consideration of the estimates in analoguous consideration of clauses in a committee. In the estimates, resolutions are substituted for clauses. Consequently in clause 3, the term 'resolution' and the term 'clause' are both used. The Government could take the same course with regard to a resolution as with regard to a clause; that is, after it has been discussed for a length of time—and I earnestly hope the Government will allow more than fifteen minutes to a discussion of $200,000 of salary, which was the limit left by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) when he was on the Government side—after a resolution for a vote of a certain amount, say a salary, has been discussed for a certain time, the Government can move the adjournment of the discussion and can pass to another item. After it has been discussed for a certain time the Government can take the responsibility again if conditions develop to warrant such action, and move the adjournment, and so on. The Government can move three, four or more, and then, having moved those, can give notice that on a subsequent day those that have already been discussed be discussed on that day but that the discussion stop before two o'clock.

So then, this clause, in theory and in practice does away entirely with all the means of attack and defence of which the Opposition disposes in regard to governmental acts; then this Government may besides have recourse to clause 3 whenever a minister is anxious to prevent the consideration of any item of supply or of the estimates. It is the ruin of the primary and most essential right and privilege of the people, that of ventilating and obtaining redress for their grievances against the Administration previous to holding the moneys required for the public service.

So this resolution puts us face to face with a most grievous situation and a most perilous one to the future of the parliamentary institutions of this country. It is the indisputable right of us, Liberals, at all times, and in all places, friends and trusted defenders of liberty, to denounce that resolution in the strongest terms and to draw the attention of the people to the tyranny of which we are the victims, as members of the Opposition, and which is an infringement on our constitutional liberties.

On the Government benches this plot was laid down towards ensuring the adoption of this resolution, the object and outcome of which is to deprive the Canadian people of their rights, by doing away with freedom of speech in this Parliament. That plot was evolved and worked out by the Tory-Conservative party, and how painful to think that it was the work of the advisors of His Majesty. Should not the prestige inseparable from those lofty attributes be secured against anything which might detract from it? Should there not be attached to it a nobleness of demeanour which adds to its lustre, a courage which increases in proportion to difficulties and which, at any rate, never thinks of resorting to expedients and never seeks as its extreme way out of difficulties violence and brute force?

Is that the estimate which future generations will make of our present ministers? I doubt it very much. Will they not say as already the present generations is whispering, at the sight of what is going on before their eyes that they were not courageous, that the mantle of the statesman did not fit them, that they were short-sighted and without an ideal, that the first serious difficulty which opposed their progress so discouraged them that they had recourse to the most extreme and even dispotic measures to stifle the voices which they were unable to silence. But these voices of the Opposition will not be stifled until mine, however humble, is raised to protest with all my might against the violence we are subjected to, to protest in my name and also on behalf of the thousands of electors whom I represent here. I feel it is an imperious duty which I am fulfilling in their name, I feel that I am meeting the wishes of my constituents, I feel that I am doing homage also to that liberty which we can never cherish too much, which we can never defend too ardently.

Mr. P. A. SEGUIN (L'Assomption): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, whenever a power abuses its strength and interferes with some franchise, whatever that power may be, and whatever that franchise may consist in, every citizen has the right, and the imperious duty as well, to raise his voice in protest.

So it is with a view to protesting that I rise just now. And in rising, it is not only in my name that I protest against the blow which is aimed at freedom of speech; it is also in the name of those honest people whom I have the honour of representing here.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that my protest will not change matters. A majority, which rests more confidence in its strength than in its rights, has decided that freedom of speech should be done away with, so that it may have a freer hand in destroying the autonomy of Canada.

I know that the deed will be consummated and that it is only a question of hours. A reprieve may be hoped for, but not a commutation of the sentence of death pronounced against liberty. But before liberty dies, it is only right that she should know who are those who demanded that a death warrant be issued against her. History, that impartial avenger will be able to descry the true friends of justice and liberty.

Mr. Speaker, the grounds taken to justify the action of the Government in proposing this resolution which does away with freedom of speech, are all more or less futile; they prove only one thing: the assurance which the Government has of a moral defeat, should there be a referendum, or of an actual overthrow, should there be an election.

So it may be said that freedom of speech is sacrificed, not in order to permit an act of generosity towards the Mother Country, not to favour the defence of the Empire on account of some emergency which might become more pressing as days go by, not on a question of principle, but purely and simply on account of the fright—a blue fright—experienced by the Government at the thought of the outcome of an election or of a referendum.

Mr. Speaker, Liberals have been charged with carrying on a disloyal obstruction against this government measure. That charge is foundationless. The Government has based its proposal on facts which are more than questionable; since it was unable to support its contention, in regard to an emergency for instance, the only thing for it to do, was to withdraw that hateful proposal, a danger to the autonomy of our country, and a most dangerous precedent to enact. So the Liberals were justified in opposing this plan by all means available under the constitution. The ardent struggle, strenuous at times, and at all times, painful, which we have gone through, shows too well how desperately the Government is intent on getting this scheme through the House.

In vain, a sensible element of the British people itself have clearly shown their dislike of the Bill opposed by the Liberals, in vain did Lord Churchill state that his memorandum had been supplied only at the request of the Prime Minister of Canada; in vain did Mr. Asquith state that the British government was unwilling to meddle with Dominion politics, thus giving clearly to understand that he never had applied for dreadnoughts or millions; in vain, on the other hand, did one half of the political press and nearly all the economic publications in Canada raise their voice against the proposal of the Government; in vain did numerous voices make themselves heard in protest against the Nationalist vote which gives the Government its majority, when the Government knows full well that these same Nationalists—some of whom are ministers and bear the title of honourable—have been returned in their constituencies on the formal pledge they gave to fight any proposal for a contribution or for the establishment of a navy; in vain did all that give the Liberals the right to oppose with all their might that contribution scheme—I was going to say that alms scheme—the Government has been unwilling to open its eyes, Mr. Speaker, and when it found that it could achieve success by brute force only, it did not hesitate to have recourse to that means.

Let rather freedom of speech perish! Let rather the constitution be violated! But that resolution must be passed. Well, Sir, freedom of speech will be sacrificed tomorrow. Of course, it will. The Government majority will then carry through their famous bill; and honourable gentlemen on the other side will make the welkin ring with their cheers. Very well, they will have succeeded; for when numbers are intent on scoring a victory over justice and right, they always begin by strangling liberty.

They will have scored a victory, and what then? The people will always be there. The people will always be there to decide finally. And it is that decision, which they are in so great fear of, that we on this side of the House will await with firmness and impatience. For they have resolved to kill liberty, but they have forgotten that liberty cannot die.

Motion (Mr. Kay) withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. What was the total number of homestead entries made during the year ending March 31, 1913?
2. What was the total number of pre-emption entries made during the year ending March 31, 1913?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. 33,611, not including entries made in Grande Prairie and Peace River agencies during the last week of March, as returns for that period have not been received.
2. 8,577.

PICTOU MAIL CARRIER.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Who is the mail carrier between Pictou post office and the railway station there?
2. What amount is being paid per trip?
3. Is there any amount due contractor? If so, how much?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Peter F. Foley.
2. Twenty-five cents per double trip, i.e. a trip from the post office to the railway station and return to the post office, or vice versa.
3. Nothing is due the contractor. By a mistake in the inspector's office the contractor was paid at the rate of twenty-five cents per single trip which was not in accordance with his tender, with the notice inviting tenders or with the contract sent to him for execution. There is still a small balance due the department.

GOVERNMENT BOATS AT PICTOU.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What amount was paid at Pictou during each of the months the winter boats were on duty during the past season for the handling of freight?
2. What amount was paid in each of said months on said service for the placing of coal on board at Pictou?
3. What amount was paid in each of said months for placing coal on board at Charlottetown and Georgetown, respectively?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. December, $219.73; January, $1,434.84; February, $1,019.47; March, $1,355.19.
2. January, $505; February, $912; March, $888.03; April, $232.80.
3. None.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Mr. MACDONALD:

Does the Government intend to introduce any legislation to carry out the pledge contained in the platform of the Conservative party in 1908, in the following words:—

'The operation and management of our Government railways by an independent commission free from partisan control or influence'.

Mr. COCHRANE: The operation and management of the Government railways are free from partisan control and influence now.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the officer of the Department of Railways and Canals been recently appointed to investigate and report on the Quebec and Saguenay railway?
2. If so, what is his name?
3. What is the object of such an investigation and report?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

MAIL BAG LOCKS.

*Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Is the new padlock for mail bags superior to the old one, as improved by the disc pattern metal bar contracted for with Edouard Lapointe on the 23rd September, 1912?
2. What is the price of the new padlock?
3. What is the price of the disc metal bar per hundred?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. No new locks and no acceptable new bars have as yet been supplied.
2. Although the new lock will be a great improvement, the department will not pay for same any more than the price of 80 cents, which was fixed by a former Postmaster General in 1907.
3. Five and one-third cents a bar was offered, but no acceptable bars were supplied.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

1. How many disc pattern metal bars were required to improve the old padlocks in use by the Post Office Department?
2. Were not said metal bars sanctioned and adopted by the Post Office Department on the 23rd September, 1912?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. No accurate answer can be given to this question. The controller of postal stores estimated that the quantities mentioned in his letter of September 23 would be needed.
2. The letter of September 23, together with the answer given to-day about it, speak for themselves.

*Mr. BUREAU:

1. Has any postal delivery of disc metal bars been made to the Post Office Department by Edouard Lapointe between the 23rd September, 1912, and the 2nd April, 1913?
2. Did said metal bars fit the lock then used by the Post Office Department?
3. Was any test made of the old locks as improved by the addition of said metal bars?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes. Four hundred and eighty-four were offered on March 6, 1913, but they were all returned because the controller of postal stores did not find them to be in accordance with the specifications.

2 and 3. No bars having been delivered which could be accepted, such a test was not practicable.

*Mr. CARVELL:

Has the following letter been sent to Edouard Lapointe, under the instructions of the Postmaster General:—

1092—A.

Post Office Department, Ottawa.
Postal Stores Branch,
Ottawa, April 2, 1913.

Sir,—

I am, by direction of the Postmaster General, to notify you that owing to the unreasonab'e prolonged delay on your part in filling the order of the 23rd September, 1912, for 90,000 metal disc bars for letter mail bags, notwithstanding you were requested some time ago by the department by letter and telegram, to hasten delivery, he has cancelled such order, which accordingly has absolutely ceased and determined, and on which the department must decline to accept any deliveries whatever.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Sydney Smith,
Controller of Postal Stores.

Mr. Edouard Lapointe,
9-11 Desjardins Street,
Quebec.

2. Have any other letters been sent by the Post Office Department to said Edouard Lapointe since September 23, 1912, urging him to hasten delivery of the 99,000 metal disc bars ordered?
3. Has Edouard Lapointe filed any claim against the Post Office Department?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. The Postmaster General did not dictate this letter, but the controller of postal stores had conferred with him in a general way before writing same. Moreover, the letter as it reads in the question is not accurately reproduced. It will be brought down with the other papers.

2 and 3. Yes. Moreover, Mr. Lapointe had been told in the letter of September 23 that those bars should be brought into use with the least possible delay. He came several times to the office of the controller of postal stores, and was urged to act promptly. However, at the end of March last he was still asking other people to make those bars for him. Finally he wrote raising a racial cry and asking for the dismissal of the controller of postal stores, who, he said, was persecuting him. The papers which will be brought down will further explain the whole thing.

*Mr. CARVELL:

1. Has the following letter been sent under instructions of the Postmaster General:—

(True Copy)

G. C. No.—X—1092A.

Post Office Department, Canada,
Office of Controller of Postal Stores,
Ottawa, September 23, 1912.

I am, by direction of the Postmaster General, to advise you that he has sanctioned the adoption of the disc pattern metal bar submitted by you, on which it is understood you hold a caveat from the Canadian patent office, and has directed that you be paid for these bars at the rate of 5½ cents each, $5.33 per hundred, and to convey to you authority to make and supply to this department:—

18,000 metal bars, 4 inches, for bags, 22 x 32.

45,000 metal bars, 4½ inches for bags, 26 x 36.

36,000 metal bars, 5 inches for bags, 30 x 48.

These bars to be made as to pattern state, length of bar and size of disc strictly in accordance with the samples, one of each size (4 in.-4½ in.-5 in.), of which goes to you by concurrent registered mail.

It is of the utmost importance that the dimensions, width and size of the disc hole correspond exactly with specimen, otherwise will fail to fit the lock, (as to the disc) and the bags, (as to the length and width of each bar).

As it is the intention of the minister that these disc bars shall be brought into use with the least possible delay, I am to request that you will please be so good as to advise the department by return of mail, how soon shipment to this department, of a supply of the three sizes specified may be executed and in what quantity.

Very truly yours,
Sydney Smith,
Controller Postal Stores.

Mr. Edouard Lapointe,
9-11 Desjardins Street,
Quebec, P.Q.

2. For what object were said metal bars ordered?

3. Were any of them delivered?

4. Was said order for metal bars cancelled? If so, at what date and for what cause?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. The Postmaster General did not dictate that letter, but the controller of postal stores had conferred with him in a general way before writing same. Moreover, the letter as it reads in the question is not accurately reproduced. It will be brought down with the other papers.

2. Because they were expected to minimize one of the objections to the lock.

4. The letter of the 2nd April, together with the answer given to-day about it, explain themselves.

Are there in existence any statistics relating to the monetary circulation of Canada, of Dominion notes and bank notes and metallic moneys?

Mr. WHITE: Particulars of the circulation of Dominion notes and bank notes are to be found in each issue of the Canada Gazette. It is impossible to ascertain the amount of metallic money in circulation in Canada, but there are statistics as to the amount of metallic money coined for use in Canada.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has the Department of Railways and Canals authorized Mr. C. S. Rioux, of Fraserville, to apply to the council of the parish of Cacouna, for the laying of the pipes of the aqueduct for the purpose of bringing water to the station of the Intercolonial railway at Cacouna?

2. If so, what will be the length of the pipe?

INSPECTION AND WEIGHING OF GRAIN.

On motion of Hon. G. H. Perley (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) it was ordered that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Canada Grain Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1912, and to provide in connection with Bill Y-2, intituled, An Act to amend The Canada Grain Act, passed by the Senate and now before this House, that whenever application is made to the board to arrange for the inspection of grain, or the weighing of grain, or both, at a place which is not a terminal point of an inspection division or of an inspection district, the board, if satisfied that such an arrangement should be made and that the applicant is a responsible person, may order such arrangement as it deems proper, on condition that, besides the fees payable, the excess, if any, of the costs of carrying out such arrangement over the amount of such fees, shall be paid by the applicant in such manner and at such times as the board may determine; and that the provisions as to the inspection and weighing of grain, and as to the appointment of inspector and weighmasters, and of any rules and regulations made under the said provisions, shall apply at every place with respect to which such an arrangement has been made; and also that the annual license fee payable by the proprietor, lessee or manager of any terminal elevator shall be twenty-five dollars; the annual license fee payable by the owner of an elevator engaged in the manufacture of grain products in the western division shall be five dollars; the annual license fee payable by the owner or lessee of a country elevator shall be five dollars; the annual license fee payable by an applicant to carry on the business of grain commission merchant in the western division, shall be five dollars; and the annual license fee payable by any person to carry on the business of a track buyer shall be five dollars.

PRINCE ALBERT HOMESTEAD ENTRY.

Mr. OLIVER: Before the Orders of the Day are called, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works, I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that the information in regard to certain files, to which reference was made on Thursday last, has not yet been given to me by the Minister of Public Works. I am anxious to get that information as soon as possible in order to move for a return of the papers affected.

Mr. BORDEN: I will direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works to my hon. friend's request.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

Mr. GRAHAM: I notice a despatch in one of the newspapers to-day which states that the Quebec and Saguenay railway has been taken over by the Mackenzie and Mann interests, and that they have guaranteed the Government that they will construct a number of miles this season. Will the Minister of Railways tell us if that is correct?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have no official knowledge of it. I have heard rumours of it and saw the despatch in the Montreal Gazette to-day. No pledge has been given to me, or to any member of the Government to that effect.

UNION LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN (Regina) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the financial condition of the Union Life Assurance Company of Toronto, and the urgent necessity, in the interest of the policy holders, of the Government advising the public of the result of any investigation which may have been held into the affairs of the said company.

And leave having been granted:

He said: I have no intention to take up more than a very few minutes of the time of the House in discussing this question. My reason for bringing it up at all, is that I have had representations made to me by policy-holders who reside in the same city as I do to the effect that in view of the statements that have appeared in the Monetary Times, the Toronto Saturday Night and other financial papers in Canada, they do not know whether they should make to that company further payments of their insurance premiums. Only a few days ago, I had a letter from one of my constituents who is a policy-holder in that company to the extent of $6,000, and who is a business man in the city of Regina, not apt to be taken by storm very easily by anything he reads in the newspapers, and he does not know whether he should make any further payments to the Union Assurance Company. I asked a question of the Minister of Finance yesterday—I have no doubt that he has taken the position which he believes is in the best interests of public policy at the present time—I asked him across the floor of the House for some information with respect to what the Government had been doing in regard to investigating the affairs of that company, and I think he stated in substance—his answer appears in 'Hansard'—that it was not in the best interests of the public, or in the interests of public policy, to make any statement at the present time in regard to the matter. In the list of questions on the Order Paper to-day there was a question in regard to the same matter, and the Minister of Finance made a similar statement.

The position I take on this matter is that it may be in the interest of the Union Life Assurance Company that nothing should be said in regard to it at the present time; but there is another side to the question. It is being advertised in the company's literature, and I presume the statement is correct, that there are in Canada 150,000 policy-holders in the Union Assurance Company, and I submit with all deference to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that if this company is, as some newspapers say, on its last legs, and if the Department of Finance has any information which would lead those policy-holders to come to one conclusion or another in connection with the further payment of their insurance premiums, the policy-holders of that company are entitled to the information which is in the possession of the Government. All the information I have in connection with this company I have obtained from the Monetary Times, which contains figures taken from the last report of the Superintendent of Insurance in connection with the affairs of the leading insurance companies in Canada. All the figures I will give to the House are taken from the report of the Superintendent of Insurance. I wish to refer to two or three points taken up in the Monetary Times, points I submit, which if true, indicate that there must be something wrong with the affairs of the Union Life Assurance Company, and if any investigation which the department has held in accordance with the provisions of the Insurance Act into the affairs of that company shows that there is something wrong, or that the company is not in good financial standing, it would be better to let the policy-holders know than have the matter drag along for two or three years and then have the policy-holders, who have put thousands of dollars of their savings into that company, find that it was not in a good financial condition. I have here clippings from the Monetary Times, but I am not going to take up time reading the whole of them. I have the Monetary Times of February 8 and of March 29, and the Toronto Saturday Night of March 29. What appears in the Monetary Times shows that this company from year to year, during the past five years, has written a tremendous amount of life insurance. In 1911 it obtained new business amounting to $19,333,496, but in the same year the business of that company which lapsed amounted to $12,875,475. Let me read to you what the Monetary Times says in regard to it. I am not an insurance expert, and I will not express my opinion as to the meaning of such a large amount of insurance lapsing. The Monetary Times says:

> The new business is certainly large and is almost entirely 'industrial,' but the business lapsed is also surprisingly large and it is to be accounted for probably by the fact that in order to show large figures of new business and to lessen the reserve liability the management appear to have resorted to the cheap and easy method of selling term insurance in place of the usual life and endowment policies as in other industrial companies, for out of some seventeen millions' dollars of industrial business written in 1911 over thirteen millions was nothing more than term business. Industrial business even on the level premium plan is notoriously non-persistent but when term insurance is resorted to it is evident the elements of stability and profit-making are largely absent.

Then it goes on to refer to the management of the company. These are matters I do not wish to refer to. With respect to what the company's financial position was then, the Monetary Times was drawing its conclusions from the report of the superintendent of insurance. It goes back to the years 1907-8 and comes down to the year

1911. In the year 1911 the total paid up capital of the company, according to the report of the superintendent of insurance, was $741,232. The impairment of capital in 1911 was $403,802, or almost 60 per cent of the capital of the company. The premium income of the company in 1911 was $631,845 and the expenses of management were $631,426, so that the company had in the year 1911 the magnificent sum of $59 to put to the reserve fund for the purpose of paying policies. The report of the superintendent of insurance shows that a large portion of the assets of this company are invested in building societies. It is not customary to invest insurance funds in building societies. They are generally placed in bonds, debentures and first mortgages and, when you can get eight per cent per annum on first mortgages on first class real estate, I cannot understand why an insurance company would invest $141,595 in building societies. Let me read what the Monetary Times says in regard to the financial condition of this company. It appears that in 1907 there was only a paid-up capital of $100,000. The manager recognized that they must get more capital in order to carry on the business and he went over to England and in 1911 succeeded in increasing the capital stock of the company from $100,000 to $741,000. This is what the Monetary Times says with regard to the matter:

The method resorted to in order to enable the company to secure capital and so to continue in business was ingenius. President Evans resolved to tap the pockets of English and Scotch investors in whose mind Canadian securities were becoming so rosy about 1909. To the metropolis of the British Empire accordingly sailed the president of the Union Life and succeeded in launching a stock proposition at which British investors appear to have bitten eagerly. It is necessary only to examine the list of stockholders in the Government blue book to see that President Evans swept Great Britain from Land's End to John O'Groats and succeeded in bringing back to Canada over half a million additional capital for his company. Just what were the representations on which this money was secured, we do not know.

The year 1911 shows still further paid-up capital was secured to the extent of over $100,000 presumably from the same source, this bringing the paid-up capital up to $741,232. The column in the foregoing table entitled 'Impairment of Capital,' is instructive. It shows that between 1907 and 1911 the impairment of capital has grown from $70,000 to over $400,000. To be sure the business of the company has also increased and if the business were regular level premium business in place of being largely term business, the result would be less disquieting. An examination of the expenses of management shows the extraordinary result that during the last two years these expenses have used up practically the whole premium income, so that during 1911 the impairment of capital increased about 200,000.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina).

Then it goes on to say that the capital was secured in Great Britain by paying a premium of 20 per cent on each share of stock.

An interesting sidelight on the faith of the British investor is shown by the fact revealed by the Government returns, that the new capital was secured at a premium of about 20 per cent., for of the $641,232 new capital secured in Great Britain in 1910 and 1911 the large additional sum of $122,815 was paid as premium on capital. On the other hand the still larger sum of $145,420 was spent in the effort to secure this new British capital.

Were the interests of the British investor properly safeguarded when this money was secured?

Then it goes on to speak about investments:

Turning to the investments, we are not a little surprised to see so much money invested in the stock of building societies, as the following indicates:—

It gives a table of the investments in building societies and says:

When so many excellent bonds and debentures can be now secured at good rates of interest and when it is so easy to loan money at high rates of interest on safe mortgage it seems somewhat perplexing to discover the reason why the management of the Union Life should have departed so far from the beaten track of approved life insurance investing. We venture to think President Evans would have increased the public confidence in his company and besides made better returns in the long run by following the practice set by other older and larger companies in the character and distribution of his investments.

But now the question arises what of the future? Rumours of amalgamation have been in the air. It is also stated that President Evans has been abroad, endeavouring to enlist further capital or other interest in his enterprise. Although the whole situation of the Union Life and Home Life demands his presence and efforts here, he is still abroad. In the meantime, we have confidence that the Government Insurance Department is keeping a close scrutiny on the operation of both companies so that the best interests of their policy-holders may be maintained.

We submit, however, that President Evans owes it to himself and to the name of Canadian life insurance to disclose his intentions as to the future of these two companies and what steps he and his co-directors are taking to conserve the grave interests committed to their care. The Monetary Times would like to have placed at its disposal a complete report of the statements submitted to foreign investors in England or France as a basis for investing in the stock of the Union Life; a statement of the movement in loans and investments for the past year in both companies; information as to the subsidiary companies in which Mr. Evans is interested and their relation, if any, to the Union Life and the Home Life; and an official statement as to what general policy is being formulated to place these two companies more fully in the public confidence, or otherwise to safeguard the security of the policy-holders.

I would not pay very much attention to statements of this kind appearing in an ordinary newspaper; but when these statements appear in the Monetary Times, which is recognized as one of the leading authorities on financial affairs in Canada, they deserve some attention on the part of the insurance branch of the Department of Finance. I find the following in a later edition of the Monetary Times:

It is quite evident that the affairs of the Union Life need attention right way, but everywhere almost we hear that 'Mr. Evans, the president, is away.' It is time Mr. Evans, the president, was home again, setting his financial house in order. If he does not recognize the need of his presence in Toronto, the Department of Insurance should.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to what appears in Toronto Saturday Night. I do not know how well qualified Toronto Saturday Night is to discuss questions of insurance, but I know that when the man, who writes the financial column of Saturday Night, speaks with reference to affairs in western Canada, he generally strikes the nail on the head and I would not be surprised if he again strikes the nail on the head with reference to the affairs of this company. On March 29, 1913, Saturday Night contained the following:

Another disquieting feature of the Union Life financial statement is that a very considerable proportion of the assets consists of securities of, or loans against securities of, companies which are controlled by H. Pollman Evans. These stocks to a certain extent, greater or less, depend again on other Pollman Evans' companies. They are, in fact, so interwoven that it is impossible to form even an estimate of their relations and values. However, some light can be thrown on the situation by the statements covering the National Land, Fruit and Packing Company now in liquidation, and of which Mr. Evans was the promoter. We have before us a report issued on December 9, 1911, which showed assets of $1,485,825, and liabilities to the public of $62,000, yet a few months after it was in liquidation the later report of the liquidator shows liabilities of $165,459, and the assets, excluding orchard leases, are $206,389, and 'this should be materially reduced.' One item of assets, $372,956 investment account, appears to have disappeared altogether.

Saturday Night goes on to say:

Taken all together, there appears to be a pretty mess which sooner or later will take a deal of straightening out on the part of the Insurance Department, for it does not take a prophet to tell where the Union Life is headed for.

I said at the outset of my remarks that I did not know anything personally about the Union Life Assurance Company and that I did not know any of the men who are interested in it. From letters which I have received from policy-holders residing in my part of the country, I know that there is a great feeling of unrest as to what they should do in regard to their insurance premiums. The Minister of Finance knows the terms of the Insurance Act. I refer particularly to sections 36, 37 and 38. Section 36 of the Insurance Act, chapter 34 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, says:

The superintendent may under orders from the minister make inspection visits to companies.

It goes on to provide that he can make examinations under oath. Section 38 provides:

If it appears to the superintendent that the assets of any company are insufficient to justify its continuance of business under the requirements of this Act in that behalf respecting the amount of deposits and assets, or that it is unsafe for the public to effect insurance with it, he shall make a special report on the affairs of such company to the minister.

Then sub-section 2 of section 38 says:

If the minister, after full consideration of the report, and after a reasonable time has been given to the company to be heard by him, and upon such further inquiry and investigation as he sees proper to make, reports to the Governor in Council that he agrees with the superintendent in the opinion so expressed in his report the Governor in Council may, if he also concurs in such opinion, suspend or cancel the license of such company.

Then sub-section 3 says:

Such company shall, during such suspension or cancellation be held to be unlicensed and unauthorized to do further business.

I would not have brought this matter up at all if I thought it would do any injury to the company. I brought it up simply in the interest of the policy-holders, of whom there are about fifty thousand according to this report. I submit to the Minister of Finance that, if an investigation has taken place and if the company has been found to be on a solvent basis, then the policy-holders of the company should know it. If the company has been found by the investigation conducted by the Government to be on an insolvent basis, then the policy-holders are equally entitled to the information in order that they may protect themselves in future. I simply urge upon the Minister of Finance, if no investigation has taken place, that there should be some investigation owing to the statements made in the Monetary Times.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I must say that my hon. friend has taken a very unusual course—I shall not characterize it in any other way—in passing a note over to me about three or five minutes before he started to speak, telling me that he proposes to discuss this matter.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not know that I was wrong in not advising the minister. I offer my apology. I understood that all I had to do in a case of this kind was simply to give a copy of the resolution to the Speaker. I would not have written the note to the minister if he had not written to me.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend does not require any advice from me as to the propriety of what he did. If I had known that my hon. friend proposed to discuss this matter, I would have made myself acquainted with the facts and have had some memoranda here in order to give information to the House. As it stands, I have to rely upon my memory, which happens to be fairly clear. As my hon. friend states that he intended no discourtesy in the matter, I accept entirely his explanation.

My hon. friend has stated that he believes the course that he has taken is in the interest of the policy-holders. If my hon. friend has the interest of the policy-holders very much at heart, I think it might have been advisable, in view of my statement to him that I considered it inadvisable in the public interest to bring down an answer to the question which he placed on the Order Paper, to have consulted with me before taking the very unusual step that he has taken in calling attention in this very public way to the matters which have been dealt with by him in his speech. It is true that there has been a great deal of discussion in certain of the financial papers with regard to the affairs of the Union Life Assurance Company. The articles which my hon. friend has read have been brought to my attention upon more than one occasion. As he has referred to section 38 of the Insurance Act, I may say to him that the provisions of that particular section have been observed to the full by the Insurance Department. The Insurance Department has been exceptionally diligent in connection with the case of this insurance company, because its affairs have been discussed, as my hon. friend has stated, in the financial press of this country upon more than one occasion. As long as a year ago, I took up the matter myself personally, and I may say that actuaries of the Insurance Department visited Toronto; that an extension of the license of the company was granted for a period of only three months, and for shorter periods since; that in every case the extension was granted upon the report of actuaries of the Insurance Department after a very full investigation of the affairs of the company. I should think—I am speaking now from memory—that the actuarial officers of the Insurance Department have been in Toronto quite a dozen times during the past year looking into the affairs of the company and making reports thereon. The information which they have obtained has been passed on to me in memoranda, and in every case their recommendation for an extension of license for a limited period has been acted upon and has been claimed to be in the best interests of the company and of its shareholders. My hon. friend has stated that in his opinion it is very desirable that a statement, substantially in answer to the question which he placed upon the Order Paper, should be made by the minister. The reason why I did not deem it in the public interest that the information should be given, and why I do not deem it in the public interest that this discussion should take place at this particular time, is this: We have been in cable communication with certain of the English shareholders who have expressed a desire to increase the assets of the company by paying in further amounts on account of their subscribed shares. In addition to that, there have been negotiations on foot in Canada, which may come to a conclusion by the end of this week, whereby the financial position of the company will be very materially improved. It is by having regard to those two matters that the Insurance Department has been dealing with the company in the manner that I have indicated. I think my hon. friend will agree that it is very much better that a company should be saved than that it should be destroyed, if it is possible to save it; that is, it is in the interests of both the shareholders and the policyholders that, if the position of the company can be strengthened in the manner that I have indicated, that should be done. It is just possible that the unusual course taken by my hon. friend—I do not desire adversely to criticise it, as it is within his right to take it—may have the effect of terminating these negotiations, which I have every reason to believe will materially strengthen the financial position of the company.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) discussed the paid-up capital. Can my hon. friend tell me what the subscribed capital is? It might make a difference.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend had taken what I deem to be the usual and courteous course in this House of giving me notice, I think I could have had all the information before the House. But I think that my hon. friend from South Renfrew, who is an experienced parliamentarian, will realize that there is some degree of unfairness in bringing on a motion of this kind without any notice whatever to the minister. I am unable to say at the moment how much is paid and how much unpaid, but I am able to say that I have reason to believe that negotiations are at present proceeding in Canada, apart from the English situation, which, if they eventuate favourably will materially strengthen the position of the Union Life and probably enable the department to continue the license for a limited period.

Mr. GRAHAM: I desire to put myself right. I was not trying to say anything to injure the company, but trying to get out the information that possibly the subscribed capital might be so far in excess of the paid-up capital that the company would be in a much better financial position than it might seem to be.

Mr. WHITE: I regret very much that, in view of all the circumstances in which this matter is being discussed, I have not had an opportunity to prepare a memorandum form in which I might have informed the House and my hon. friend as to the matters referred to. I think I cannot add to the discussion anything useful to what I have said. We had hoped that by these negotiations and the cutting down of the annual expenses the condition of the company would be so improved that the department would be justified in continuing, as I have said, for a short period, and afterwards for a longer period if found desirable, the extension of the license. And I must repeat to my hon. friend—who, as I have said, is quite within his right—that a discussion of this kind based upon newspaper articles with regard to a financial company, especially under the circumstances mentioned, is, in my judgment at all events, not in the best interests of the public, or the shareholders or the policyholders.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I do not think it matters so much in this connection what details of information may be available to us in regard to the life insurance company. What is important is to know how far control by Government of life insurance companies acts as protection to the holders of life insurance policies. The shareholders of the company may be trusted to take care of themselves, but the policy-holders, the people who contribute the money for the upkeep of life insurance, are the people in whom, I think, especially this Parliament is interested, and who are entitled to look to some degree to Parliament and to the Government for protection of their interest. At this point it is desirable that there should be information as to just what responsibility is assumed by the Government in the protection of the interests of the policy-holders of life insurance companies. I must say, if I may be permitted, that the attitude assumed by the Minister of Finance is not the attitude that I think is generally expected under the responsibility of the Government in regard to these companies. I think it is generally assumed that the inspection and control by Government—because there is not only protection but also control—is a substantial measure of protection. I am bound to say that what I have gathered from my hon. friend's statement is that in his view the Government have no serious responsibility, no means of substantially and effectively protecting the policy-holders. I do not wish to enlarge on this question. But I submit that the class of people who contribute life insurance money, the interests on whose behalf that money is contributed, the purposes held in view by those who contribute the money, make the question of the control of life insurance companies one very especially under the review of Parliament, and under the supervision and control of the Government; that is to say, conditions are such that if there is anything in Canada that should be looked after carefully by the Government it is the protection of the policy-holders of life insurance companies.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Is the hon. gentleman aware that the assets of this particular company that has been complained of were all acquired during the regime of the Government of which he was a much respected member?

Mr. OLIVER: I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. WHITE: We had better post ourselves on those things.

Mr. OLIVER: I really do not see what that has to do with the question. I am discussing this question without regard to what government is in power, and I want my hon. friend to understand that. I am not criticising his attitude from a partisan point of view. I assume that he has made a statement on behalf of this Government that would probably have been made under like circumstances by his predecessors. I am discussing the general question and trying to discuss it from the standpoint of the public interest and the interest of the policy-holders, not from a partisan standpoint. If the condition is such that the policy-holders are entitled to, but do not receive, protection from that supervision and control which is the responsibility of the Government under our law, then I take this opportunity to give my opinion that we should amend the law, that we should provide that there shall be a substantial measure of protection so far as it can be given, having regard to the absolute impossibility of those who are either the contributors to or the beneficiaries of life insurance funds protecting themselves. I say again, if there is anything that this Parliament and the Government should have regard to it is this matter of life insurance.

Now, in regard to the offence that is supposed to have been committed by my hon. friend in bringing this matter to the attention of the House and the possibility of disarranging negotiations in progress which might be beneficial, it seems to me that, the facts being before the country, as they are—because the facts which the hon. gentleman stated are taken from the report of the Insurance Department and have been published in the leading financial paper of the country—it surely cannot make any difference that these statements are repeated on the floor of this House. The purpose in so repeating them is not to place the facts again on record, but to secure from the Government a statement as to what their action is to be. I do not wish to make any partisan criticism, and I will say that I am not entirely familiar with life insurance, but it strikes me, as an outsider, that when a life insurance company is in a position which permits the Department of Finance to extend its license only from month to month, the time has arrived to secure a settlement of the outstanding affairs of that company, so that the policy-holders who have already paid their money into the company, shall not be in danger of losing further sums, and so that persons who have not become policy-holders shall not be induced to become associated with an institution which, within the knowledge of the Government, is not in a substantial or sound financial condition. I do not wish to put that forward as any special criticism of the hon. Minister of Finance or the Government, but I want to put it forward as a concrete case, bearing upon this great question, and as demonstrating, as it appears to me, the fact that there should be a supervision and control and substantial protection in this regard that does not exist at the present time.

Motion (Mr. Martin) negatived.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Borden, to amend rule 17 of the House of Commons, and the proposed motion of Mr. Hazen, that this question be now put, resumed from April 22.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): I am glad to have an opportunity of discussing briefly the iniquitous resolution that was moved in this House by the Prime Minister on the 9th day of the present month, and to have the privilege of adding to the remarks already made a word of protest against the adoption of that resolution. I shall endeavour, in the course of my remarks, to show that the proposed amendment to the present rules of this House is unjust, unwise, unreasonable, and wholly unwarranted. Considerable discussion has taken place on this resolution since its introduction, and the matter has been fairly discussed by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. It has been fairly discussed by a few hon. gentlemen on the other side, but, excepting the speeches of the right hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), there have emanated from hon. gentlemen sitting at your right, Mr. Speaker, no remarks of an enlightening or educative nature in so far as this proposed resolution is concerned. In the early stages of this debate we had a pronouncement from an hon. gentleman who, from his position, I would assume would be well quaified to discuss a question of such importance. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) undertook to discuss the resolution, but, in so far as I have been able to follow his utterances, I do not find in them anything which goes to show how these rules may be reasonably applied, and whether or not their adoption by this Parliament is justified. It is true that he contended that the rights of the majority in this country should be protected, and that the Opposition in this Parliament have, by their methods of debate, infringed upon the rights of the majority. Although a young member of this House, I wish to say that I absolutely fail to see how the Minister of Justice could reasonably make such a declaration, and where he has received the facts upon which he founded the statement I am unable to tell. Nothing has taken place during this present session of Parliament which would warrant the hon. gentleman in making such a pronouncement, and I do not know whether anything has ever transpired in the Parliament of Canada which would justify any hon. gentleman fo this House in making such an assertion. The facts of the case are that the rights of the majority have not been infringed upon during the present Parliament; that their rights were never infringed upon, and, even if the rules as they at present exist were to be continued, I do not think there would be any possibility that the rights of the majority in this House would be encroached upon. It is not an encroachment upon the rights of the majority that we in this House have to fear, but rather an infringement upon the rights of the minority. The hon. Minister of Justice in discussing this matter said there had been obstruction during the present session by the members of the Opposition, and that in the last Parliament, when the reciprocity agreement was being considered in 1911, there was no obstruction. I want to be fair in this matter, and I put a proposition which I think will appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House, when I say that if there has been obstruction of the Naval Bill during the present session of Parliament, there certainly was obstruction of the reciprocity agreement in the session which came to a conclusion in 1911. I do not think there was obstruction in either case, but I want to make the further remark that, as far as I am personally concerned, I do not care whether or not I am charged with having obstructed the Naval Bill during the present session. I take the ground, and take it readily and heartily, that I was prepared to obstruct the passage of the Naval Bill in this House, and that I would be, and am now, willing to oppose by obstruction the passage of this Bill. So long as I am a member of this House, so long as my constituents send me to this Parliament as their representative, if they are of the same mind as they are at the present time, I shall continue, so far as I am allowed, my obstruction to the passage of this Bill. As I have said, I do not think there has been obstruction in either case, particularly if we accept the definition of obstruction as laid down by a very eminent Speaker of the English House of Commons, Mr. Brand. This is his definition of obstruction:

The distinctive mark of obstruction lies in the indiscriminate and incessant resistance of an extremely small minority to proposals of the most diverse kinds.

No action of ours, taken in this House, could be construed as coming within that definition of obstruction. If there was obstruction of the Naval Bill during the present session, there certainly was obstruction to the passage of the reciprocity agreement in 1911, because, as I understand it, the reciprocity Bill was introduced some time about the middle of January, and up to the 19th of July the Bill had not been reported. The Naval Bill was introduced on December 5 last, and for the last four or five weeks, since this resolution was introduced, there has been no discussion on that question so that there was not more time devoted to the discussion of the Naval Bill than to the discussion of the reciprocity agreement. But, the Minister of Justice says, that was a very important measure, it dealt with the fiscal policy of this country. We must conclude from his remarks that the Naval Bill is not an important measure. As to the importance of the two pieces of legislation, reciprocity in some form or other has been before this country since 1872 and all political parties in Canada since that date have been in favour of a reciprocity agreement with the United States of America so that the people of this country were thoroughly familiar with the subject; they knew it was not interfering with our independence or our rights of responsible government. But what about the importance of the Naval Bill? It is a new departure, a departure wholly unwarranted by anything which has transpired in this country since we have had the right of responsible government. It is a departure which, on the floor of this House, was negatived in 1909 by unanimous resolution. Thus on the question of the relative importance of the two questions, in my humble way of thinking, the naval proposals before this House are far more important and their effects more far-reaching than could have been the reciprocity agreement of 1911. The Minister of Justice goes on to say that there is a clamour throughout the country for some amendment to the rules, for some form of closure in this House. I fail to see where the clamour is. If it is a clamour it has not the sound of the ordinary clamour when one arises in this country. In so far as I can see at the present time, the Liberal party and the Independent party and some of the Conservative party are absolutely opposed to a measure of closure such as this resolution imposes upon this House. There has been no Liberal newspaper which has not stood by our honoured leader in the discussion of and opposition to the imposition of this closure. The labour people of this country are opposed to it, there is no doubt in the world about that. There is only one way in which the labour unions of this country can bring grievances before this House; this is the proper Parliament in which the grievances of labour should be heard because we have, in this Government as in the past Government, a Minister of Labour. I would like to tell the Minister of Justice that when he says there is a clamour in this country for the imposition of closure he is speaking without authority to speak for the great masses of the workmen and artisans of Canada. He may be speaking for the multi-millionaires of Montreal and the multi-millionaire manufacturers of Toronto but he has no mandate from the labouring population of this country which, as a matter of fact, constitutes the majority of the people, to say that there is in their ranks a clamour for the imposition of a closure Bill upon this House of Commons. Other hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken on this question. We have had two very notable deliverances from the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). I wish to say, in justice to that hon. gentleman, that he was one of the two gentlemen who approached this question in the manner in which it should be approached; that is he dealt with the rules, explaining the rules as he saw them according to his light. But there were some observations in both the utterances of that hon. gentleman which call for a passing remark from hon. gentlemen on this side. In his first speech he tried to defend the action of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in moving the previous question and thus debarring the right hon. the leader of the Opposition from bringing in any amendment to this resolution. One of his utterances at that time was that they were justified in moving the previous question because he had heard that there were ninety-six amendments which were to be moved by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to the resolution. I have only to say that the sense of hearing of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie must be very highly developed because we on this side of the House, who are certainly in as close touch with the leader of the Opposition as that hon. member, never heard of any ninety-six amendments; but we did hear of one amendment, which was a constitutional amendment, and one only, and I say that in that remark the hon. member for Portage la Prairie was drawing upon his imagination rather than upon his fund of knowledge. Another utterance of the hon. member's appears at page 7699 of 'Hansard' of this year, where he is reported as follows:

I say that rule 17, which this Government availed itself of in order to permit the previous question to be moved, was placed in the rule book by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition.

That statement remains upon 'Hansard' and I would advise the hon. member, if he wishes to be as just and as fair as I, for one, believe him to be, to correct that impression which has been sent broadcast throughout the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will read the statement correctly he will see that it needs no correction. I stated that it was placed in its present form in the book by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. CARROLL: That is true, but it follows the words I have taken from 'Hansard.' The words I have quoted stand there to-day, and every Conservative newspaper in this country the next day published them with huge headlines. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member for Portage la Prairie is as fair and as just as I believe him to be, and as he would lead this House to believe, he should expunge that particular paragraph from the records of 'Hansard.' It is not in keeping with the facts. Rule 17 has been one of the rules of this House almost since Confederation. There was an amendment to it, to be sure, that it was not debatable, but in substance the rule is the same to-day as it was previous to the time when the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition led the Government of this country. Yesterday the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in a clear-cut declaration, so clear-cut and explicit, that a school boy could understand it, showed that a Bill might be introduced in this House and put through its various stages without a member of the Opposition being able to discuss or criticise it, or to move an amendment to that Bill, with the exception of the first motion that leave be given by the House to introduce the Bill. How did my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie meet that? He gave his definition of the word 'debate.' He said there must be some debate upon such a question. I am not going to reiterate the speech of my hon. friend from South Wellington; I think it was so clear-cut that any person could understand it, and I think that when the hon. member for Portage la Prairie undertook to get over that insurmountable wall he sprawled on his back. The only way in which he tried to get over it was to say that there must be some debate. So, say I, Mr. Speaker, but debate does not necessarily mean a controversy between contending parties in this House. A debate does not necessarily mean a discussion involving speeches from members on the Government benches and from members of the Opposition. An hon. member may get up on the other side of the House and discuss a question pro and con, and that would be as much a debate as if hon. members on both sides of the House were to take part in it. So I say that that proposition of the hon. member for South Wellington stands as an insurmountable wall, because it is a true, logical and a well reasoned argument. If I remember rightly, I think that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie told us to go to the dictionary to find out what was the meaning of the word 'debate.' I can debate a question with myself without giving utterance to one audible syllable.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the way the Government did.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes, that is the way the Government did. If I have not fully convinced the hon. member for Portage la Prairie that my contention is right, I will say that there is under the rules of this House a provision, as there will be when this resolution passes, an opportunity for two members to discuss a subject. I will go so far. One hon. member on the other side and one on this side of the House might discuss it, and if an hon. minister rising in his place wished to impose the closure, he could do so, and any Bill introduced in this House, important or unimportant, might be passed, on a strict reading of these rules, after two speeches only, and both of these speeches might be on the other side of the House. If my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie does not admit that one hon. gentleman's speech is sufficient to bring these rules into force, he must admit that discussion by two hon. members, would. All discussion could be shut off after two hon. gentlemen had spoken, and that is bad enough, Mr. Speaker.

In his speech last night, my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, discussed at some length the question of whether or not the methods in which this resolution is being forced through the House are constitutional. The ground is taken on this side of the House that the proper method of dealing with amendments to the rules is to refer them to a committee of this House composed of hon. gentlemen from both sides who would confer with Mr. Speaker. But says the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, they have amended the rules in the British House, without adopting that procedure, and he said that Sir John A. Macdonald amended the rules of this House in 1868, I think, without the amendments being sent to a committee of the House in conference with Mr. Speaker. He says we are doing the same thing now, and therefore it is right. That reminds me of a story which I heard about a justice of the peace. The scene of the story is laid in Manitoba, and I have no doubt that the justice of the peace in question was appointed by the present Government of Manitoba before some of the present Cabinet timber in this Government was taken from the government there. A poor unfortunate was charged before the justice of the peace with having committed murder. A day was set for the investigation of the charge, and of course the accused got counsel. On the morning on which the investigation was to be held, to see whether there was sufficient evidence on which to commit the accused to the Supreme Court, the solicitor appeared before the justice of the peace, and asked when the investigation into the murder charge was going to take place? 'Oh,' said the justice of the peace, 'I have tried the case already.' 'But,' said the solicitor, 'you cannot try the case, you have no jurisdiction to try the case.' 'I can try the case,' replied the justice of the peace, 'I have jurisdiction to try the case.' Matters then became pretty hot, and eventually the justice of the peace turned to the solicitor and said: 'Come with me.' He took the solicitor behind the house, and said: 'look, have I not got jurisdiction?' There was the man hung up to a pole behind the house. Of course he had jurisdiction, and of course the Government have some kind of jurisdiction to pass through this House a resolution of such importance as the present one, without sending it to a committee of this House composed of hon. gentlemen on both sides who would confer with Mr. Speaker.

I am going to submit some evidence, but before doing so I wish to say that I agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie that certain amendments have been made to the British rules and that one amendment at least has been made to the rules of this House without those amendments being referred to a committee, to confer with Mr Speaker. That is very true.

Mr. EMMERSON: That was by consent.

Mr. CARROLL: I do not know whether it was or not, but there never has been in this Parliament or in the British Parliament any rule or any amendment of the standing rules of any great importance without that rule or amendment being sent to a committee of the House to investigate and report. I am not saying this without having some authority. There is an hon. member of this House—a real hon. member—who, I presume, knows something about parliamentary procedure. He has been in this House since 1896. He is a great constitutional lawyer, one of the greatest in this country, and I presume that he knows as much about the rules of procedure in this House and by his study, knows as much about the rules of procedure in the British House of Commons as does the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). I am going to cite no less an authority than the Prime Minister to the effect for which we contend on this side of the House. I am going to put his evidence against the evidence of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie and let them settle it as best they can. In 1908 there was a resolution proposed by the then member for Lunenburg, the present junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), to the effect that, before any amendment should be made to the motion to go into Supply, two days notice of it should be given. It was not for the purpose of cutting out discussion, of applying the gag, of introducing the guillotine, or the kangaroo, or any of those things, but it was for the purpose of directing the attention of the ministry to the particular questions that were going to come up so that they would be in a position, when the time came, to discuss them in an intelligent manner. What happened? The Premier of this country, then the hon. member for Carleton, Ont., rose in his place and said:

> It rather takes the House by surprise to have a proposal of this kind made. The rules of the House are not lightly dealt with in this way; the universal practice is that so important a matter as an important amendment to a rule of the House should be submitted in the first place to a committee, considered by that committee and reported on to the House, when the House would take it into consideration.

Is there not the widest difference in the world between the very innocent amendment proposed by my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax and the wide, iniquitous amendment proposed now? Surely, if the right hon. leader of the Government in 1908, should say that it was iniquitous to pass the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Halifax without that amendment being considered by a committee, there is no word in the English language to express the iniquity of the present amendment in proposing to rush this resolution through the House without giving it the same consideration as he thought that resolution was entitled to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has finished his quotation from the right hon. Prime Minister, and, if so, will he now give me a chance to make the explanation that he asks for?

Mr. CARROLL: I am not through reading all that I am going to quote from the right hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of explaining this, although I do not think it can be explained satisfactorily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just let me try.

Mr. CARROLL: I know the hon. gentleman will do well. I have listened to the hon. gentleman and he certainly can try—I know that. But, I am afraid that his efforts will fall as flat as his effort to overcome the argument of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), last night. The right hon. the Prime Minister continues:

> We revised the rules of the House two years ago and, in the opinion of the House, there was no occasion at that time for any such far-reaching amendment as is now proposed.

Far-reaching? I would like to hear what word my right hon. friend would use in expressing the effect of the present resolution if he called the resolution of my hon. friend from Halifax far-reaching. He goes on:

> It would prevent the discussion of any grievance on motion to go into Committee of Supply unless two days' notice were previously put upon the Order Paper.

May I direct the attention of my right hon. friend to the present resolutions which, as we read them, would debar hon. gentlemen from airing their grievances in this House even if a year's notice were given to the government benches? They have no right, apparently, to bring their grievances to the attention of the House. The Opposition have not the same rights in this House that they had in 1908 or 1910. The hon. gentleman continues:

> That would be an abnegation of the practice that has prevailed for five hundred years in the British House of Commons and that has prevailed in this House of Commons ever since we have had parliamentary institutions in this country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McLean) speaks of members of the House being taken by surprise, but they need not be taken very much by surprise if they perform their duty and attend here. Surely matters of public interest can be discussed in this House without two days' notice on the Order Paper. The proposal would cut down to a very serious extent the privileges of this House, and I venture to say that in the end it would not be found to shorten the length of the session. I understood the hon. gentleman to refer to some English rule, but so far as the English practice is concerned, they go infinitely further than I hope we shall ever be obliged to go in this country.

The right hon. gentleman says that we can have the English practice, that he will introduce it if we like, whereas he prays in 1908 that we shall never be obliged to introduce into this House the rules which they had in the British House of Commons at that time, the same rules that he says we can have if we want them in preference to those which have been introduced by him.

> If we carried out the English practice to the full we would adopt the English system of closure, under which the passage of the estimates would be reduced to very little more than a farce.

True language in 1908 and true language in 1913. But the actions of the right hon. gentleman are apparently inconsistent as between these two periods. It is surprising that on the two occasions upon which he has addressed himself to this House he has not told us the reason for this sudden change of heart, this sudden change of mind, as to the justice of introducing closure in the Canadian House of Commons. He goes on:

> Often a sum of £10,000,000 is voted by the Commons of Great Britain after a discussion of not more than two hours' duration. We do not require any restriction of that kind in Canada, and it would be a most unfortunate thing to attempt to restrict discussion as the hon. member for Lunenburg proposes. There has been no very great evil attendant upon the practice of this House since Confederation. Hon. gentlemen who desire to bring a matter of public importance to the House usually give notice in advance. That is certainly done when there is intention to move an amendment to the motion that the House go into Committee of Supply. I have always pressed upon hon. gentlemen on this side of the House the extreme importance of giving the Government notice in advance of any amendment to Supply; and apart from that, hon. gentlemen have, from time to time, given notice in advance of their intention to discuss important public questions. I decidedly object to the passing of this motion; first, because according to the usual order of procedure such a proposal should be referred to a committee; and, in the second place, because it does not seem to me that there is any abuse of the present practice which would justify us in making such a very important amendment to the rules.

I say that that is a complete answer to everything that has been said in this House during the present discussion in favour of the introduction of closure.

I need not quote another very eminent parliamentarian in this country who has expressed himself in far stronger terms than the right hon. the leader of the Government against the introduction of the closure. His words were quoted yesterday by an hon. member. I refer to the utterances of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), who prayed to God that the Canadian Parliament would never witness the introduction of the steamroller, the introduction of the guillotine, or the introduction of the 'kangaroo.' His prayers have fallen apparently upon barren soil. He should have directed his prayers to the right hon. the leader of the Government and not to the high Personage to whom he did make them, because I do not think there has been any communication between the present Government and the Power to whom the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce prayed.

Many other hon. gentlemen, who occupy places of prominence on the other side of the House, have also given utterance against the introduction of the closure, and they have cited the ex-Minister of Finance as being in favour of a system of closure in this country. I want to point out the difference between the utterances that I have read of the speech of the Premier and the utterances which Mr. Fielding, the ex-Minister of Finance, made in this House. The utterances of the Premier were utterances on a question of procedure, a question as to the advisability of amending the rules of this House, whereas the utterances which hon. gentlemen opposite attribute to Mr. Fielding had nothing at all to do with the rules of debate or with the introduction of closure; they were given on an occasion when the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) moved for the production of original papers; and, for some reason, into which I did not go, the then Minister of Finance refused to bring down the original papers, but brought down copies of them. When he was criticised by the hon. member for St. Antoine, he gave utterance to the statement that the minority in this House were only entitled to the privileges which the majority gave to them. That was the occasion. That remark was not made in regard to a closure Bill, or to any proposed amendments to the rules of this House.

Some other hon. gentlemen did undertake to discuss this question of closure. The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) last night undertook to do so. From following him very closely, I have come to the conclusion that for some hours before he rose to speak he was making a very deep study as to how he could avoid all reference to the rules and to the resolution under discussion. He never touched it once. He never came within a hundred miles of it. That is one very remarkable thing concerning his speech. He discussed reciprocity, and gave a speech with which he obstructed the last Government. He made the same speech on reciprocity that he made throughout the Ontario towns and cities during the last campaign. He discussed the question of naval defence in this country, but he never touched on the question of the proposed resolution to amend the rules. It was a sad incident to see an hon. member, a minister of the Crown, getting up presumably with the avowed intention of discussing this question, but never coming next or nigh it. The next most remarkable thing about his speech was the peroration, which was a remarkable one. These are his concluding words: We are going to put this measure through; we are going to put the Naval Bill through—and don't you forget it. That certainly is a statesmanlike utterance of a gentleman who presumably rose to discuss the proposed resolution to amend the rules in a manner in which the amending of the rules of no British country has ever been undertaken before.

Mr. EMMERSON: Did he touch on the Farmers' Bank?

Mr. CARROLL: He was asked a question on that, but he kept absolutely clear of it.

We have been told that they have a closure in England and that therefore we should have a closure in this country. Conditions in the British Parliament and in this Parliament are absolutely different. When closure was introduced in the British Parliament there were some 670 members, an unwieldy body; and a small minority of seven obstructed the business of that Parliament, not one measure, not two measures, not a dozen measures, but absolutely every measure that was brought in by the Government of the day. That comes within the rule, which I quoted a moment ago and which I will quote again, the definition of obstruction:

> The distinctive marks of obstruction lie in the indiscriminate and incessant resistance of an extremely small minority to proposals of the most diverse kinds.

Another difference is that both political parties in the British House of Commons at that time agreed that some form of closure should be introduced in order to prevent a small minority of seven or eleven members from holding up the business of the House. In the British House of Commons, there are 670 members, which makes it a rather unwieldy body, whereas here we have only 221. There has been no organized attempt in this country since Confederation—and nobody knows it better than hon. gentlemen opposite—to obstruct the general business of the country. There has been holding up of certain Bills, call it obstruction if you will, but certainly there has been no obstruction this year except to the Naval Bill. Notwithstanding that fact, hon. gentlemen opposite introduce a measure into this House which is unprecedented for injustice and iniquity. It is brought in for the purpose of putting through Parliament a special piece of legislation which, I submit, with all candor, has not a majority of the people of this country behind it, for which the Government has no mandate and on which, should they appeal to the country, they would be overwhelmingly defeated. The union of England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales was brought about by methods far different from those which brought about the union of the provinces of Canada. The countries forming the United Kingdom were brought into the union against their will. And so they could not afterwards complain that promises made to them were broken. But the provinces of Canada were brought into Confederation under a certain state of facts, an agreement to which the provinces gave their consent—some of them grudingly, to be sure. They came into the Confederation with the understanding that they were to receive justice in this Parliament. The small provinces of Canada are the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. They were brought into Confederation on the understanding that the rules of the British House of Commons at that time prevailing should prevail here; and if at any time they were badly treated by the majority in this country, their representatives had it in their power to obstruct the whole public business until their grievance was remedied. We in the maritime provinces are in the minority. Suppose that a majority from the two great provinces of Quebec and Ontario should treat us unfairly on any question, under the proposed rules, that measure can be put through this House under closure, the minority having no voice against it. That is the point I again ask the right hon. the Prime Minister to take into consideration before he finally rushes this piece of legislation through the House.

Another point was raised by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. I come back to that hon. gentleman because, except for the Prime Minister, he is, judging by the speeches, the only gentleman on that side who has given careful attention to this question. He put forth a challenge to the effect that there was absolutely nothing that could be done under these proposed rules that could not be done in the British House of Commons under the rules that prevail there at this time. I have not gone into that phase of the question with as much detail as the hon. gentleman evidently has done, but there is one point on which I would be willing to accept his challenge. I would direct his attention to the question of Supply. I submit—while admitting that it is an extreme case—that while under these proposed rules, Supply could be put through this House under closure in one, two or three days, in England it is impossible to put through Supply in less than twenty days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read the English rule.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes, I hope the hon. member will do me the justice to believe that before discussing this question I did read the English rule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read it now.

Mr. CARROLL: I have read it and I think I understood it. I say again that in twenty days the whole Supply can be put through in the British House of Commons; some of it can be put through in compartments, but the whole Supply cannot be put through in less than twenty days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read the rule that says that.

Mr. CARROLL: I have read the rule, and I would merely retort, let the hon. gentleman himself read it. This is one very marked distinction between the rule of this House and the rule of the British House. But, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to make us believe that anything which the British Parliament does is of necessity right. I protest against such a proposition. I say the British Parliament have made mistakes in the past, and we should not follow them in their mistakes. The procedure in the British Parliament is and should remain foreign to this House. The formation and composition of these two deliberative bodies are as distinct and far apart as the poles. The mere fact that they have closure in England does not make closure in this country a good thing. There is no doubt we have much to learn from the great mother of parliaments; but there is also no doubt that we have much to undo which has been done by that great legislative body. I could mention, if I had time, many things which the British Parliament has done which a Canadian Parliament would not dare to do. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins) gave us light on this question. He told us that Italy had closure, that Denmark, Belgium, Holland and Switzerland had closure; and therefore we should have closure. Why did he not tell us that Russia has closure; that the Chinese Empire had closure; it would be just as pertinent to the discussion had he done so. I submit with all candor that the very fact that these countries have closure, their parliaments being merely created as ornaments to the supremacy of the Crown, is an argument why the Canadian House of Commons should keep away from closure.

In conclusion, I desire to say that in my humble opinion the rules of this House as adopted in 1910, with the endorsation of the right hon. leader of the Opposition at that time, impose all reasonable restrictions upon debate in this House, and that the present rules are proposed with a view to destroying the present functions of the Opposition to safeguard the interests of the people and especially all minorities, against the corrupt tendencies of a brute force majority.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman that the words 'brute force,' as applied to hon. members of this House, are not regarded as parliamentary or permissible.

Mr. CARROLL: I have heard the words used often, but I will withdraw them, and say animal force.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would also remind the hon. gentleman that any such characterization as would imply anything that could not be applied to an hon. member of this House is not permissible, and if the hon. gentleman's words refer to the lower order of the animal kingdom, they certainly would not be permissible.

Mr. CARROLL: I hope there are no hon. gentlemen opposite who think that I would not place them among the rational animals. Before concluding, I would suggest to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that he should follow the advice given to him some days ago by a very prominent Conservative newspaper of this country, to insert in the Naval Bill a referring clause which would provide that the Bill shall not be passed in this House until the people of the country have, by their voice, determined that it shall become law. So far as I am concerned, that will remove all opposition to the Bill. It will not then be necessary for the right hon. gentleman to proceed with this iniquitous amendment which he proposes to the present rules. At the same time, the passage of the Naval Bill will be facilitated, although, there being no emergency in regard to the naval affairs of the British Empire, it is not necessary that the Naval Bill should go into effect before the expiration of at least a year or so. I desire to say in conclusion what I said at the beginning of my remarks: that, after a reasonable consideration of this question, I have come to the conclusion that the introduction of closure in the Canadian House of Commons at the present time is unwise, unjust, unreasonable, and unwarranted.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that this Government should be the instrument of closure. The spectacle which we have witnessed here since the 5th day of December is sufficient justification for that conclusion. We have not had during that period from our friends opposite anything but silence and absence during the discussion of several very important measures. When sitting in the House they have been silent, and when there has been a discussion on this side of the House, too frequently, Mr. Speaker, have they trooped out of the Chamber, showing, as I believe they have shown, a want of courtesy to hon. members who have felt constrained, not merely in the interests of their constituents but in the interests of the country, to deal, or attempt to deal, with matters that are of vital concern to the people. That spectacle has suggested to me the fact that partisanship and party spirit, and party frenzy have had considerable sway in Canada, and I have realized that if it were not for that party frenzy the resolution which we are to-day discussing would not be upon the Order Paper for our consideration this afternoon. I think it is indeed a sorry spectacle that at this time, and in the midst of that party spirit, there should be injected into this House for its calm and serious consideration a resolution of the character of the one now before us. I am not going to say very much at this moment with respect to that resolution, but I may point out that it affects in a very marked degree the constitutional and parliamentary basis of all the liberties which we as a people in this country enjoy; it represents an attack upon the very foundations of our parliamentary government. I think I can say, and say with truth, that our parliamentary government has been largely built up through precedents. The precedents of hundreds of years have established in Canada, as well as in Great Britain, the protection of the common people—and I use the word advisedly—against, in former times, the kings and nobles, and, in modern days, the interests which, under our new conditions, are representative of the authority of the olden times. These precedents declare that the minority's rights to propose amendments and exercise the right of presenting grievances shall be unrestricted. Precedent after precedent is to be found in the parliamentary records of this country, as well as in those of the Old Land, tending to show that these rights and privileges which were blood-purchased by our forefathers should not be in any sense restricted, and, through all the years down to 1867, the tendency of those precedents, and since that date in this parliament was to oppose and prevent any such restriction. In this resolution I say that these blood-purchased privileges are sought to be in a very large measure abolished; if not absolutely abolished they are apparently sought to be curtailed to the vanishing point, and to such an extent that the people are at the mercy of certain interests in this country. We must recognize that we live in a land that is in some respects different from any other. We may seek for inspiration from the mother of parliaments and from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland but in this country there are different situations and different environments, there are minorities, there are differences of race and religion. It has been the pride and glory of our young country that we have been able to grapple with all our difficulties fairly from the standpoint of equal rights and justice to all. But here is a menace. This resolution which places in the hands of the majority an instrument so vicious, so powerful that the rights of the minority and the privileges which they have enjoyed in the past may be and will be imperilled.

I do not propose to deal particularly with this resolution in its details. At a later stage I hope to analyze and discuss it. The Government, in introducing this resolution, have given evidence of one particular thing, not merely with relation to this resolution, but with respect to the legislation which we understand gave rise to it. They have treated this matter as indeed they treated the Naval Bill, as children afraid of the dark. They have seen dimly during the past months, what the people of Canada have had clearly vizualized before them; but the conditions in Canada and the temper of the people of Canada apparently are unknown to hon. members on the treasury benches. The people of Canada today have a clear vision of the situation and apparently the Government have been blindfolded in their partisanship and their party frenzy and zeal which have moved them forward from one mistake to another until they have reached a point where they are applying in this House of Commons a gag which will injure to the disadvantage not only of the business of this country, but to the stability of the rights of the people. I will not say that that resolution was designed for a particular purpose but if it were desired to buttress and entrench a corrupt and vicious government, a government that intended to loot the treasury of Canada, no better provision could be made than the one that has been made in the form of the resolution that has been introduced by the right hon. the Prime Minister. I do not think it would be exaggerating to describe such a resolution as one for the purpose of looting the treasury of Canada. This may seem strong language to you, but it is language which in my judgment is justified, and I think it is particularly justified because of the considerations which have heretofore prevailed in Canada in this regard.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my judgment, the language of the hon. member is not parliamentary, and clearly violated the amenities of debate. It is imputing what is clearly an improper purpose or object, and I need not quote a very large number of rulings of Mr. Speaker Peel, which I have in my hand, on exactly the same lines.

Mr. EMMERSON: If I had used that language in that connection as making a charge, which I submit I did not, I would have been trespassing on the amenities of debate, but I said 'if it were designed, if that were the intention,' and I was not imputing that intention to the Government. Parliamentary usage and my own feeling with regard to hon. members who sit on the treasury benches would constrain me not to use language as harsh as that. But we are not merely framing this resolution for the moment or for the day, we are framing it for the future, and if hon. members now sitting on the treasury benches are immaculate and are not open to temptation it might be that at some future time in the history of Canada there would be men sitting where they now sit who would not be actuated by such high motives as they are. I am amazed when I contemplate even for a moment the authorship of this resolution. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government has held a very high place in the political history of Canada; during the past fifteen years he has been honoured by his party and has been looked up to with respect and honour. The leader of the Government, who was for many years the leader of the Opposition during this time, assumed a very high moral altitude. He must not forget his professions during the seventeen years of his membership in this House. He has professed many principles which were entitled to and received the commendation of the people of Canada. In the manifesto which my right hon. friend issued to the people of Canada from his representative city of Halifax, in 1908, he took a commendable position on civil service reform and other matters pertaining to the moral side of the government of the country. He preached, in season and out of season; he professed, in this House and out of this House, principles that were high and elevating in tone, and that if carried into effect would produce most beneficial results. He is the author of this resolution, and, as I shall show before I take my seat, he has claimed privileges with respect to parliamentary government and the constitutional rights of the people, which he now wantonly ignores. Though I have been opposed to my right hon. friend since he became a Conservative, he and I once saw eye to eye with respect to Liberal principles. But he departed from the faith. I am where I was, and where he was then. During the past seventeen years that he has sat in this House I can say that I have always considered with pride his utterances with respect to the reforms that were deemed necessary to the administration of affairs in this country. I thought he always professed true principles with respect to parliamentary government and the rules which govern this House. I thought his views of constitutional rights and of the rights of the people of Canada as to the preservation of our autonomy and as to our relationship with the Empire were the correct views. I am simply giving my own opinion, but I think I can say that in his professions, while in opposition, my right hon. friend had the commendation of all right-thinking people, and that they looked forward with great expectations to the development of his aspirations in regard to Canadian affairs and Canadian self-government he has since failed to put in practice. But I believe that since my right hon. friend assumed office, the disappointment of the people in that regard has been as extreme as were their admiration and hope in the years of his leadership of the Conservative party in opposition. The contrast between his performances and his promises is certainly marked. I think his performances have caused a great deal of disappointment not only among the supporters of the Conservative party throughout the country but among all classes in Canada. In this resolution, I think it could be shown, if it were properly analyzed, and I do not want to transgress the amenities of debate, or parliamentary usages, that there is an utter destitution of principle and an evidence of moral obliquity that are to be lamented. My right hon. friend had been placed upon a very high pedestal. Great expectations were formed with respect to him, but those expectations have not been realized, and the people have come to think that after all it is but a case of another fallen angel, that he has come down to the level of the partisan, and that he has shown himself to have the feet of clay if not the hoof that might be cloven. I think we can characterize this resolution in its true terms if we say that it was born with a desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to exercise a power that would enable them to carry forward the schemes which were the result of promises made in times past. Political life, like the natural life, is dear to all, and I assume there is the same desire for the preservation of political life as there is for the preservation of natural life, and we know how deep that sentiment is in all of us. So keen a judge of human nature as Job said that 'skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath, will he give for his life,' and apparently my hon. friends are willing to give all they have to preserve their political lives in connection with the Government of Canada. I wondered as to the inspiration and source of the Naval Bill and of this resolution which flows naturally from the former. It is said that obstruction was made with respect to the Naval Bill and that therefore this resolution is necessary to put that Bill through. Let me say there has been no obstruction.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EMMERSON: I will go further and say that, in my judgment, what was characterized as obstruction in 1908 and in 1911 was not the same class of obstruction that we hear spoken of in connection with the British Parliament. It is true that we have discussed, all on one side, the naval proposition introduced by the Government. I characterize our attitude as that of constitutional resistance to a measure that was not in the best interests of Canada. It was not obstruction, it was constitutional resistance, and I submit that we were justified, not merely from our own point of view, but from the standpoint of the arguments addressed to the House by hon. gentlemen alike in their present positions, and when they were seated on this side of the House. We have been justified in that resistance, but in no sense is the introduction of this resolution justified. It seems to me that in introducing the resolution the Government has lost its moral perspective, and that the resolution should stand over to permit them to recover that perspective. This resolution works an innovation with respect to Government. We have supposed that we were governed by a Parliament, and the position of a member of Parliament has been no mean one in Canada from 1867 down to the present. As a result of these resolutions parliamentary government ceases and you have government by the Cabinet. I have thought that the tendency in Canada has been to have matters controlled not by Parliament but by the Cabinet, that orders in councils were more potent than were the acts of parliament. The tendency in this country, as in Great Britain, is for Parliament to cease to have the control that it had in former years and, instead of government by parliament, the Cabinet takes control of parliament. Under these resolutions members of the House of Commons become silent registering machines, mere puppets, a species of tent pegs to sustain a covering for the Cabinet. It is a degradation. The position of the supporters of the Government is not, and has not been in the past, an enviable one. Their opportunities are limited. If they seek to promote measures that they deem to be in the interest of their constituents, they are in every way restricted, and they have been, under the rules of this House. There are few private members of this House who, in the past number of years, have not felt that, even under the rules of Parliament as they have existed, they were restrained, restricted and limited in their influence and power. Whether that be true or not, whatever these limitations and restrictions have been in the past, they will be accentuated in a ten-fold manner in future. To-day, the man sitting behind the Government, and the men even on the Opposition side of the House, have no opportunities other than those which are furnished them by the rules of the House. These rules have been very largely restricted. If we were to take into consideration the rules of the House, we would at once grapple with the question in respect to public Bills and Orders. I take up the Orders of the Day and I read at the head page 17 the following: 'Public Bills and Orders.' What do I find there? I find there measures, or statements in respect to measures, that were brought forward, not by the Government, not by the Opposition, but by individual members of Parliament. I assume they are properly brought to the notice of Parliament and yet, where are they? This 'Public Bills and Orders' is simply nothing more or less than a mausoleum or morgue where are interred all the troublesome motions and orders that savour of embarrassment. We have an illustration in the motion I made before this House in order to get a return of public documents, which return is deemed to be in the public interest. The motion was made in the early part of the session. There was a debate, and that debate was adjourned, with the result that the motion went on the Order Paper under 'Public Bills and Orders,' and I have, day after day, been asking my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to give me an opportunity of having that matter brought up. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) has a Bill of paramount importance before the House. It relates to the pollution of navigable waters. Under the rules of the House as they exist, and as they have existed, that has gone to its interment and cannot be resurrected unless by the grace of the Government.

I need not mention other illustrations, but there are many which go to demonstrate that the influence of a private member of this House, under our present rules, is restricted and that his power for usefulness to his constituents is greatly minimized. Yet, under these proposed rules, that influence is to be still further restricted and he becomes a mere puppet to be influenced at the will of the Government of the day and is placed in a position that certainly is not a credit to the people whom he represents because he is impotent and unable to serve their interests unless the Government are kindly enough to forward his interests in a particular case and even then he cannot have a voice in the disposition of many questions coming before Parliament.

This is a resolution designed to gag the Opposition, but hon. members on the other side of the House who have any independence and who show any independence will find that, in its effect, it will result in gagging them also. They will be powerless to in any way act for their constituents unless such action would harmonize with the will and grace of the Government of the day. Therefore,the adoption of these rules means government by cabinet, the abdication of parliament and the passing of that body. I feel that the influence of hon members will be very much restricted and cut away. You might almost put over the portals of this chamber these words: 'Abandon hope all ye who enter here.' It might well be said with regard to the attitude we are taking and the fight that we are making in this matter, that it is a fight on the part of the people against Diabolus, and that we are forced to fight against diabolical methods. Upon one occasion during the present session the taunt was thrown across the floor of the House to me that we would go down to defeat in our resistance to the naval proposition. I answered that that might be, but that if we did, we would go down to defeat with our sword unsheathed from its scabbard and broken at the hilt. I think that the resistance which we should show, which we have shown, and which we are justified I believe, by the people of Canada in showing to the naval proposal, is a resistance that means the very vitality and life of the people of Canada and the preservation of dearly-bought privileges from a constitutional standpoint and with regard to this measure from the standpoint of parliamentary privilege in the interest of the people. When I plead on behalf of a member of Parliament, I am not pleading on behalf of an individual. It must be borne in mind that he stands in this House as a representative of constituents who have sent him here for a purpose, not to resist the will and decree of governments on all occasions, not even to oppose without reason the measures that may be advanced by a government, but as the representative of a free people to use his judgment in protecting their rights. As such, the position of a member of Parliament is a responsible one and a very responsible one. I view with alarm any attempt made to cut away the privileges which he, on behalf of the people whom he represents, enjoys. I think those who have proposed this resolution have already found themselves in the morasses and quicksands of their own creation, and they are at this moment up to their armpits, waving their arms, struggling but steadily sinking. That is their position; but they will realize more and more as the days go on, after they have consummated their present intention, that it will have to be a tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye. A modern novelist, one who is not unknown in Canada and one who has taken a distinguished position as a Canadian in other lands, makes one of his strong characters say: 'We pay for all the wrong we do; we pay for all the good we get.' I think this Government will realize that they will have to pay for all the wrong they do to the people of Canada in passing this resolution against the best interests and against the will of the people. We propose to resist it, it is true, constitutionally as we have resisted another measure constitutionally. I repudiate the word 'obstruction,' and I say that in that resistance we are simply voicing the will of the people of Canada and acting as they would have us act with regard to this measure. It has been said that war is part chance, part common sense and part of the pluck and luck of the devil. That has been said of modern warfare; it can with the same truthfulness be said of political warfare. We have to take our chances in this fight on behalf of the people and the pluck that has been shown in the doing of it up to this moment I certainly feel has met with the approval of the people of Canada who are familiar with the situation. It is not from the standpoint of luck that we are doing it. The Opposition in this fight are actuated by convictions and they have acted upon convictions. They have not relied upon chances, they have relied upon their efforts constitutionally to oppose the measure. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), whose name is frequently mentioned in connection with the introduction of this resolution, whose name indeed has figured largely in connection with the attempted unjustifiable exercise of rules which are to-day in existence in this House, has ever been in his political life a gambler in the way of taking chances. While he took chances and failed that memorable night of the 15th of March last, he feels that there is another chance open to him and he takes the chance with respect to a closure resolution, a gag resolution, and he hopes to be more successful this time than he was on that occasion. In our resistance of this measure, we have said that our sword will not be sheathed and that it will be broken at the hilt, should we go down to defeat. I can say this, that our great and revered leader has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never blow retreat. However much we may be defeated, it will never be said of us: They retreated. Those who come after us will judge how well or ill we took our part in the defence of the rights of the people; but, whenever men hereafter write the story of how Liberalism fought the battles of the people, they will have to commence a new chapter beginning with the date of December 5, 1912. That will be a story that will be written in future years, not merely in this Canada as it is to-day, but in a larger Canada, a greater Canada that will overcome these obstacles that are sought to be placed in the way of our liberties.

In the consideration and analysis of this resolution and with respect to the discussion which has taken place upon it, I shall endeavour to speak upon it from three standpoints, first as to the method of its introduction and its unconstitutionality, and I shall endeavour to contrast it with former precedents and the time honoured usages of Parliament. I shall endeavour also in a measure to deal with its alleged necessity and with the misrepresentations which led to its introduction, as contrasted with its real origin. Then I shall have a few words to say more particularly with respect to its consequences.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EMMERSON: In resuming the discussion I wish to deal with the alleged necessity of this resolution, and the situation which led to its introduction. I have spoken of the leader of the Government as the father of this resolution. It had a widely different origin in my judgment, that is to say, the causes which gave rise to it began in a little cloud no bigger than a man's hand that arose on the political horizon of Canada in 1910. I refer to the Nationalist movement. That movement was hailed by many in this country as an influence that might be used to the disadvantage of the then Liberal Government and to the advantage of the Conservative party. From that standpoint, it would be only a Canadian question, tending to influence only Canadian public affairs; but the movement grew and its results have been widened beyond what its initiators intended or even hoped for. That movement now affects not merely Canada but the Empire, and not only party relations but parliamentary government in this House. I need not elaborate that idea, but certainly the Nationalist movement was the cause of this measure with respect to naval affairs. In 1910 Canada was a unit with respect to the methods that should be pursued in reference to our naval defence; but as a result of the Nationalist movement a change came over the spirit of the dream of the Conservative party, and they were forced to introduce at this session of Parliament what is known as the emergency Bill in relation to naval defence. The Bill was introduced with great eclat, with great stage effects, and was prominently brought to the notice of the Canadian public and the people of the Empire. But, as time went on, it was found that the measure was not acceptable to Parliament and that it was opposed by a very large number of the people of Canada. The unity which had existed between the parties in Canada in 1909 and 1910 ceased, and a different view was promulgated. Now, as a result of that movement, and in order to carry through this new measure in favour of our naval defence, it is necessary to gag the members of this House—and I do not use that term in any offensive sense because I hold that the Government have been very successful in silencing their own supporters; they have not been allowed to take part in the discussion; and now the Government—not Parliament but the Government—seeks to silence this side of the House and prevent us from uttering our protest against the measure.

It is claimed by the supporters of the Government that this measure is required in order to carry on the business of Parliament. It is also said that the Liberals intended a similar provision. It is also said that other legislative bodies on this continent and on the continent of Europe have similar provisions with respect to the limitation of debate. As to the claim that this measure is required in order to carry on the business of the country, there has been, as I have already stated, no obstruction of public business. There has not been even resistance. Every measure that has been brought before this House, except that referring to naval defence, has been discussed only as it should be discussed, and it cannot therefore be said that this resolution is necessary in order to carry on the King's Government in Canada to-day. Supply has been granted on every occasion when asked. Every government measure that has been brought before the House for consideration has been given only fair and reasonable discusssion and has not been unduly opposed. I can quite understand that this resolution may have been brought forward ostensibly in order to carry that particular measure with regard to naval defence, and I can well understand that there may be lurking behind that acknowledged purpose a very different purpose affecting the affairs of government generally. It is said that in 1911 gentlemen associated with the Liberal party indeed some of them members of a former Liberal Administration, gave utterance to views favouring some measure of amendment to the rules of this House in order to further the business of the House. Even though there may have been such utterances, and even though such prominent Liberals as Hon. Mr. Fisher and Hon. Mr. Lemieux may have given expression to opinions favourable to an amendment of the rules having the effect of limiting debate, this outstanding fact cannot be controverted, that, notwithstanding the obstruction and resistance to the measures of the Government in 1908 on the part of the then Opposition; notwithstanding the obstruction, if you will call it such, or the resistance offered in 1911 to the reciprocity proposal, the leader of the Liberal party, who was the only exponent of the policy of his Government, resisted every solicitation made to him with respect to limiting debate in this House. It is needless to attempt to deny the fact that party feeling ran high during the session of 1911. There had been introduced into this House in January of that year a proposal whereby reciprocal arrangements would be carried into effect between this country and the United States with reference to their natural products. It is true that at the time of the introduction of that proposal it was met with hearty acclaim not only by hon. members of this House, but in the press and throughout the country. Certainly it is not a matter of surprise that that was the case, because for twenty odd years the successive governments of Canada had sought to bring about such an arrangement. When there was a possibility, therefore, of securing this advantage, the people of the country rejoiced, and the members of this House on both sides of the Speaker at that time heartily applauded this proposal. In a very short time, however, there arose a very strong opposition to the idea, and party spirit ran high. There were those sitting behind the treasury benches in 1911 who were exasperated at the obstruction, if you will call it so, to that proposition, and they urged upon the then leader of the Government that there should be an amendment to the rules of the House whereby such obstruction would in the future be rendered null and void and ineffectual. But the Liberal party did not take it up. The leader of the House at that time was opposed to any such course, and I shall endeavour to show briefly, by citations from 'Hansard,' that the position taken by the then leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was consistent and in harmony with the views he had expressed on the floor of this House in 1906, 1908, and 1910, and that it was upon these views that he acted when he resisted the pressure in 1911 for any amendment to the rules to shut off discussion with respect to the reciprocity proposal. I will show not only that these were the sentiments of the right hon leader of the Government of that day, but I will show also, by citations from the utterances of my right hon. friend (Mr. Bordon), then the leader of the Opposition, that his views were in harmony with those expressed by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1906, 1908, 1909, and 1910. During those years the leaders of the great political parties in this country were in harmony with respect to the restriction of the right of debate in this House, as they were a unit in 1909 and 1910 with respect to the methods of naval defence for Canada. Later they differed with respect to the matter of naval defence, and to-day they are at variance with regard to the restriction of debate in this House. The right hon. leader of the Opposition has not changed his views on either subject; he stands to-day where he stood then, but the right hon. leader of the Government does not now hold the same views. He has shown himself not to be persistent in clinging to the convictions and principles which he on former occasions expressed on the floor of this House and throughout the country. I shall not at this moment cite from those expressions of opinion, but I will deal briefly with the manner in which legislative bodies in other countries have dealt with similar provisions relating to the limitation of debate. It is said that they have in the British House of Commons, what is known as a closure rule. I shall not refer to that at any length, because the subject has been so fully dealt with that any remarks of mine would perhaps be merely a tedious repetition. But, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I will refer to an article in the National Review for October, 1909, under the caption of The Limitation of Speeches. In volume 54, 1909-10, page 233, will be found the following—and I think it is illuminating and expressive, and compresses in a very few sentences practically the history of closure in Great Britain.

> The closure tends to be exercised more freely, while closure by compartments has been applied with over-increasing severity year by year. Under closure by compartments the Bill is mapped out roughly in sections and a day or portion of a day is allotted to each section, and no matter how important the discussion or how vital the amendments that are not reached, the guillotine falls mercilessly at the end of the allotted period of time. Truth to tell, the whole vocabulary of the language of vituperation has been exhausted on the guillotine. As a legislative expedient it is profoundly unsatisfactory, and can only be justified on the plea that the Government of the day is entitled to get its legislation through somehow or other. Closure by compartments deprives debate of any sort of reality, and reduces private members of Parliament to the position of harmless automata. Their only duty under this form of procedure is to trudge the division lobbies and there seems to be no valid reason why, if the system is to be perpetuated members should not be permitted to vote by proxy or to hire other people to vote for them. The great public outside marvels at the deep and inveterate hatred of the guillotine that is felt by all members who care for the House of Commons and who are concerned for the continuance intact of its ancient privileges. We who watch day by day the working of the legislative machine know that closure by compartments is fast reducing the House of Commons to a position of abject servitude to the Government of to-day. The more the private member is suppressed, the more autocratic becomes the executive and it is only because some limitation of speeches must result in wider freedom for a greater number of private members that a modest plea for such limitation is here advanced.

That article is written over the signature of Cecil Harmsworth, himself a member of the British Parliament, as I understand, and a man who is familiar with the workings of the system of Great Britain. He condemns it unequivocally and unreservedly and has written in this way with respect to the effect that it has had on the House of Commons. Who can say that my remarks this evening were not to the point when I said that there would be a degeneration in the character of the members of this House and that they would be mere cogs in the wheel, the motive power of which would be the Cabinet or Government of the day. Is that not true in England to-day? The considerations in the British Parliament and in Great Britain, as you yourself know and have said in this House, are so widely different that you cannot draw a parallel between them and the considerations here. Theirs is an immense House, with six or seven hundred members. They legislate not only with respect to foreign affairs but with respect to all sorts of local matters. They have no legislatures corresponding to our local legislatures to deal with local affairs and they have not that wide measure of municipal self-government which is enjoyed by the people of Canada; while we are here legislating in conjunction with the legislative assemblies of the respective provinces who take from us a large proportion of the work of legislation for Canada. We have only a little over two hundred members, we have not the detail to discuss and scrutinize and inquire into and legislate upon matters which they have in Great Britain. Their closure may have been a necessity, it is not a necessity here, it is not recognized and no hon. member can make a claim or argue successfully that it is a necessity here. All that can be said is that it is an expedient to carry out the will of the Cabinet, the ipse dixit of some thirteen or fourteen members of this House who, for the time being, are charged with the responsibility of Government. They say the word and members of this House must sit silent until the Government require their approval of what they may have determined upon. It has been said with respect to the United States, that in one of the branches of their Congress, the House of Representatives, they have rules for the limitation of debate. I grant it, but their system of government differs widely from ours and the illustration does not apply. The conditions are not in any sense parallel. Our political constitutions are vastly different. They have in that country fixed dates for elections and of course, the system here is different in that regard as it might be greatly to the advantage of a government to put through large estimates, to vote large sums of Supply and suddenly, if they can do it under closure, take the vote in that way go to the people, spring an election. In the United States it is different. The law there governs the dates on which elections are held. The United States Government is virtually elected directly by the people through the President and is not responsible to Congress. There is no parallel as between our constitution and Parliament and their constitution and Congress; the conditions are dissimilar in almost every respect. In Canada the people of the country elect the House of Commons. From the representatives of the people so elected there are selected a committee who constitute a cabinet; that is to say, the members of the House select one of their number who is charged with the responsibility of associating with himself some thirteen or fourteen other gentlemen who become members of his Government but who must be ratified by the votes of the people in the constituencies which they represent. In the United States the President is elected by the people and he has carte blanche and is under no such restraint in the selection of his Cabinet. The people have no voice in their selection, and there can be a President and Cabinet administering the affairs of the United States without the consent of Congress or of either branch of it, and without the voice of the people other than the direct vote of the people in the selection of their President. Can it be said that the closure is justified here because it is in force in the House of Representatives at Washington when the conditions are so dissimilar? I am sure that I need only call the attention of hon. members to these conditions to convince any of them who may be open to conviction that the illustration taken from the closure in the House of Representatives does not apply to the Canadian House of Commons. I shall not discuss matters for the limitation of debate in continental legislative assemblies. I can quite appreciate that the tendency there would be always to restrain the influence and the voice of the people's representatives in a legislative assembly. I appreciate the fact that in continental Europe, in Asia, and in the distant lands beyond the seas where they have representative government so called, the dominating influences of their parliaments if such they can be called, are not in the people, but in the monarchs and in the classes who control. To draw a parallel or an illustration from those countries is not congenial to the free air of Canada, and not congenial to the constitution which was given to us forty-six years ago by the British Parliament, a constitution which is based upon the rights of the common people of this country to govern themselves to control governments, to call them to account, to scrutinize their votes, to question their right to expend here there or anywhere, aye, even to withhold from a government the privilege of expending a dollar without the consent of the people through their representatives. Under British institutions conditions are different. In connection with the article from which I have quoted from the National Review, I would like to read an opinion expressed by Earl Grey, a former Governor General of Canada. Very recently, Earl Grey speaking on parties, and incidentally on party government and upon Parliament is reported as follows in the Alnwick Guardian, an English newspaper:

> On Friday evening Earl Grey addressed a meeting at Backworth on 'proportional representation.' Earl Grey said the value of a vote was to have freedom of choice, which, under the existing system, he considered impossible. There were three great evils of our present system. Firstly, the enslavement of the elector to a party; secondly, the power of organized majority; and thirdly, it made the representative a timid, worthless fellow. He excepted such men as Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Burt, Mr. Fenwick, and the stout men from Northumberland, who had not hesitated to say that they would rather be true to their convictions than be in the House of Commons at all.

Were ever words spoken that had greater application to the conditions prevailing in Canada to-day? Has any utterance fallen from the lips of any hon. member of this House during this debate, or indeed during past debates, which so clearly pictures the conditions that are growing up in this Parliament. Earl Grey says there are three evils in our present system. First the enslavement of the elector to party, secondly the power of organized majorities. Confine your consideration for a moment to those two statements. Has not partyism run wild in this House? He says there is an enslavement of the elector to party. Does it not tend to add to the enslavement of the elector if you have his representative in this House gagged, shackled, and bound? There is not even a hand left unbound. They say that when men are gagged and bound their first and greatest difficulty is to get one hand free. By this resolution my right hon. friend not only gags hon. members, but binds both hands, and in doing so he gags and binds the electorate. I commend these pregnant utterances of Earl Grey to the consideration of my right hon. friend. All this has a human interest, and should have a human interest. If, under the conditions which prevail in Great Britain a member of Parliament becomes a timid worthless fellow, I wonder in what position the member of Parliament here will be after the steam-roller process has taken place and he is gagged and bound. I would not wish to point to any hon. member opposite and say he is a timid, worthless fellow. That would not be parliamentary, and parliamentary or otherwise, I would not want to use the language. But I do say that in its effects this resolution will paralyse the member of Parliament and render him impotent and he will not be able to do what it is his bounden duty to do on behalf of the people who send him here.

I have said that the method of introducing this resolution was unconstitutional, and others have said it with greater force than I could hope to do. But I think I can prove out of the mouth of my right hon. friend, and out of the mouths of many hon. members in this House, that it is unconstitutional. Certainly, we have not followed the precedent which should govern the procedure of this House. The Journals of the House show that in 1867 Sir John A. Macdonald, when framing the original rules which have since prevailed in this House, moved for a committee, which committee was to assist Mr. Speaker, and that committee did assist Mr. Speaker in framing rules which were reported to the House. Then they came before the Committee of the Whole House, and on that occasion the Speaker took his position on the floor of the House as a member of the committee, and, addressing the Chairman of the committee, took part in the discussion of the proposed rules. That was the method of procedure in 1867. It is true that in the same session, before those rules were adopted, a resolution was passed without discussion, by agreement between the parties, that the rules which prevailed in the Parliament of the United Canadas, should govern until the new rules were formulated and adopted by the federal House. This is the only precedent that can be found, and that was a precedent of necessity. Although it preceded a resolution moved by Sir John Macdonald to the effect that a committee should be appointed, it was not followed in the subsequent resolution by him. That committee acted, and reported to the House of Commons and the House, in Committee of the Whole, approved of the action of the special committee. The Speaker took part in the discussion. The same was true in 1876. The proceedings in 1876 will be found on pages 58, 108 and 216 of the Journals of that day. There will be found the resolutions with respect to the amendment of the rules adopted on that occasion, and which came before the House. Mr. Speaker Anglin, from his place as a member of the committee and addressing the Chairman, took part in the discussion of the rules proposed in amendment to the original rules adopted in 1867. That method was followed in 1906. It has been followed right down from the earliest years of Confederation. It was the method followed by the British House of Commons prior to 1867. We borrowed it from the British House of Commons. There has been no occasion in that House, or in this, when a different method was followed. In 1908 my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), then the member for Lunenburg, of his own motion and off his own bat, proposed a resolution in this House with the view of limiting the right of airing grievances on the motion to go into Committee of Supply. Exception was taken to the method pursued by him. As has been quoted by my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) this afternoon, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), then the hon. member for Carleton, Ont., took exception to the procedure upon the ground that this was not the proper course to pursue, if upon no other ground.

I hold that the rules of parliament should be framed by parliament itself. I hold that it is the prerogative of members of parliament, that it is not a responsibility devolving upon the Government and that, while they may take an active part in the formation of the committee appointed to frame the rules or to amend them, they have no right to usurp the powers of parliament by undertaking to frame the rules to govern parliament whose servants they are. Admittedly, this resolution is framed by the Government, admittedly it is a government measure, admittedly Parliament has not been consulted in any way with respect to the matter. They have introduced the resolution as a Government measure, it has been introduced under the ægis of the Government, with their authority and power and with all that the idea carries with it. Ordinarily, that resolution would go to a committee of the whole House and, ordinarily, every clause of it would be discussed in detail. That would be the procedure. The members of the House would then have an opportunity of making suggestions. I can remember an occasion in this House since I have had the honour of being a member—I think it was in 1906—when the rules were amended and when my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), then leader of the Government, as the chairman of the committee, submitted the rules which had been framed for the consideration of the House. You, Mr. Speaker, standing in your place as the representative of East Grey, complained and set forth clearly the constitutional view that this was a matter for the consideration of the House and that time should be given to the members to study the proposed rules. For what purpose?—as expressed by yourself, that every member of the House could take part in the discussion of every separate rule contained in the report. The justice of your claim was acknowledged by the then leader of the Government and time was given. When the matter did come up it was discussed in Committee of the Whole. I do not remember that the Speaker of that day took part in the discussion, but I know that the resolution was for the appointment of a committee to assist Mr. Speaker in modifying and amending the rules that should govern this Chamber in its procedure. That was the then rule. Subsequently, in 1910, the same method was adopted. I do not wish unduly to prolong the debate in this regard by citing any of these authorities, but I think they will be illuminative if hon. members have not taken the trouble themselves to look them up, and I assume from their silence that they have not. There were views expressed at that time which, I think, commended themselves to the House of that day and which will commend themselves to the members of this House. They need only to have their attention directed to them. I will take these up in their order. In 1906, as reported in 'Hansard' of that year, page 7601, the hon. Speaker said:

> Mr. Sproule: There is a very small House to consider these and as the rules affect all members it would be better if we had a full house, but if the Government intends to push them through, I suppose there can be no objection to dealing with those to which there are no amendments made.
>
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: There would be no use doing that. If we do not adopt these revised rules this session we shall have to go through all the work next session.
>
> Mr. Foster: We can go on, and if there is any one amendment discussion, of which is desired, we can hold it a little while.
>
> Mr. Sproule: Even though they were not adopted this session, what is to hinder the adoption of them at any time while the House is sitting next session seeing the Senate has to deal with them?
>
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: For the reason that we should never put off till to-morrow what we can do to-day.
>
> Mr. Sproule: That is a very good rule in its place, but I would remind the Prime Minister that the rules of the House are very important and very interesting and the House does not of its own desire willingly give up any of its rights, nor do I think it should do so. The Government always have enough control over the House through their position as an Administration without in any way interfering with their rights under the rules of the House. To hurriedly go over rules, especially where you propose to take away rights may not be a wise thing to do. I have observed that consideration of the rules of the House has always been regarded as a very important matter; it is not usual to pass amendments with a mere cursory examination.

This resolution is brought in under and by the operation of rule 17, which has been in force for forty-six years, but which has never before been invoked on any occasion in this House, and which was never invoked in the British House of Commons except on two or three occasions, as my researches have led me to conclude, and then not against any leading member of an opposite party, not against any member of the minority. Although in the British House of Commons they have that rule and had it previous to 1867, it has never been put into operation there or invoked against the leader of a party. In this House it was never invoked until the other day against even a private member. It has been there; and if my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) chose to invoke the rule, to take an advantage, to prevent a discussion of this resolution, to shut off members from moving or suggesting amendments, it was of course his privilege, because the rule was there and he could use it. I say, however, that it was not in the interests of the people and that it was not fair-play. It was not fair-play as against the leader of the Opposition. I venture to say that it is a rule that would never have been invoked by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition had he been sitting where the right hon. the leader of the Government now sits. We had fifteen years of his leadership in this House, and on no occasion has any such rule been invoked against any of the leaders of the opposite party, and it has never been invoked against any member of the House. Although you, Mr. Speaker, in 1906 said that it was a very important matter for members and that it was their duty to consider these rules, by reason of the attitude taken by the right hon. the leader of the Government the other day in having a member of his Government move the previous question, that right is shut off to members of this House. You, Sir, complained of the action of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1906 in hastening the consideration or the passage of rules. You thought that more time should be given to their consideration. Indeed you thought that it should be put off until a later session; but during this session the leader of the Government shuts off all amendment, all effective discussion. Hon. members on both sides of the House can talk until they are black in the face.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON: No danger of my hon. friends doing that. They are not permitted to do it. Closure is in force with them even before this rule comes into operation. They cannot, not one of them, not even the right hon. the leader of the Government, move an amendment, even a verbal one, in the face of that motion for the previous question. In 1906, as reported on page 7607 of 'Hansard,' you, Mr. Speaker, said, in reference to a motion to adjourn for a special purpose:

I do not know what others may think, but I think this is entirely too restrictive. We are not under the same conditions here as they are in the English House of Commons, nor have we ever experienced the same difficulty in carrying on the business of the House. There is no doubt that in the British Parliament for several years there was systematic and persistent obstruction to such an extent that very little business was done. Therefore it became a matter of importance to have something like the closure to shut off discussion and to enable the business of the House to be done. But that has never been the experience of this Parliament, and it seems to me that if we adopt this rule we shall be restricting the rights of private members of this House beyond what is reasonable. It does seem at first sight, I was going to say nothing less than absurd to suppose that one must hawk around a petition to get the signatures of 20 members before he can bring up a question which in his judgment is a matter of urgency. It may not appeal to others in the same way, because they may not be familiar with either the local surroundings or the history of what he is going to bring up. The member himself must always, I think, be the judge very largely of whether a matter is a matter of urgency or not.

The exercise of that rule is left to the discretion of the Speaker, as it is to-day. You, Sir, as the champion of the rights of the individual members of this House were strong in your protest against restricting any of those rights. I commend your utterances; I commend the principle which they involve, and I commend them to the favourable consideration of all hon. members.

I pass from that to 1910. In the fifth volume of 'Hansard' of 1910, I find on page 7867:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier laid on the table the report of the special committee to revise the rules of the House and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole House for consideration to-morrow.

Mr. Sproule: Would it not be well, even necessary, to have copies of the proposed revision in the hands of members before the matter is taken up? There seems a very short time for consideration, if a report only now presented is to be taken up to-morrow.

It was deferred until the next week at your instance and it was then taken up, as will be found on page 8365. On that occasion the House was moved into committee and the matter was discussed by every member of the House. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) was very active in the consideration of the rules on that occasion.

He says:

I think that the application of a closure rule is not going to benefit the public. Anyone who has followed the legislation this year must come to the conclusion that next year we will have more calls from corporations demanding blood and more strenuous efforts will be put forth for the purpose of getting something that is contrary to the interests of the public. Whatever merit the rule may have as applied to public business, certainly, when the House is in Committee on private Bills it should not be applied.

Then, at page 8376:

I do not feel like giving up any privilege or right in the way of obstruction that I have at the present time as a member of the Opposition in any legislation which I consider not to be in the interest of the country is being forced through this House against my will.

As might easily be shown by quotations from 'Hansard' my right hon. leader, as the leader of the Government of that day, was in hearty co-operation with hon. members of the then opposition in their views against restricting the rights of members of this House, and he used his great influence as leader of the Government to preserve to the members of the House all the rights and privileges which they had heretofore enjoyed. As a result of his attitude from that time down to the present when it has been proposed to take away these privileges and to do it with the aid of some of the very members who made such violent and vehement protests against the restriction of their rights in 1906, 1908 and 1910, these rights continue to be enjoyed. There was an occasion in 1907-8 when this very question came up as regards the restriction of the rights to expose grievances on a motion to go into Supply. My hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr.

Carroll) quoted a part of the remarks of the right hon. the leader of the present Government on that occasion. I shall not repeat anything that my hon. friend has quoted, but I would call attention to a portion of my right hon. friend's speech as follows:

I understood the hon. gentleman to refer to some English rule, but so far as the English practice is concerned, they go infinitely further than I hope we shall ever be obliged to go in this country. If we carried out the English practice to the full we would adopt the English system of closure, under which the passage of the estimates would be reduced to very little more than a farce. Often a sum of £10,000,000 is voted by the Commons of Great Britain after a discussion of not more than two hours' duration. We do not require any restriction of that kind in Canada, and it would be a most unfortunate thing to attempt to restrict discussion as the hon. member for Lunenburg proposes. There has been no very great evil attendant upon the practice of this House since Confederation. Hon. gentlemen who desire to bring a matter of public importance to the House usually give notice in advance. That is certainly done when there is intention to move an amendment to the motion that the House go into Committee of Supply.

He goes on:

I decidedly object to the passing of this motion; first, because according to the usual order of procedure such a proposal should be referred to a committee; and, in the second place, because it does not seem to me that there is an abuse of the present practice which would justify us in making such a very important amendment to the rules.

Mr. McIntyre, then Deputy Speaker of this House, made some remarks and his opinions are entitled to great weight. He said:

I cannot say that I have given the question much consideration, and I would not address the House at all but for the fact that you, Mr. Speaker, announced me as the seconder of the motion. But so far as I have considered it, I have not found myself favourable to it. So that I must decline to take the position of seconding the motion.

My right hon. leader on that occasion took a position identical with that which he has taken as leader of the Opposition. I will not quote his remarks at length but they were then as strong in opposition to the proposal to restrict the privileges of members as are his utterances in this House against the resolution proposed by the right hon. leader of the Government. I will give but one brief quotation from his speech on that occasion. He said:

On the whole, so far as the privileges of members are concerned, I think we had better stick to our rules.

On that occasion Mr. Sproule, representing East Grey, said, referring to the privilege of presenting grievances on a motion to go into Committee of Supply:

It is one of the valuable rights of this House, and one which should not be given up, that any member may bring before the House any grievance before supplies are voted.

And so I could quote the opinion of other hon. members of that time whose opinions ought to carry weight with their colleagues in this House. I could also quote the remarks of my right hon. leader to show further that his whole influence was exercised in the direction of preserving to the people the privileges which their representatives enjoy in this House. For, this is not a matter which relates only to the members of the House, but it concerns mainly the people whom the members are sent here to represent. This is a curtailment of the privileges of the people which privileges they ought to continue to enjoy.

Now, I have mentioned the character of the resolution, but the possible consequences of that resolution are a greater menace to the people of this country. We must realize that in Canada there are many diverse interests. We have within our boundaries men of different races and creeds, and we have minorities whose rights, under our rules and under the procedure of parliamentary government today, are in the fullest possible way safeguarded, but which under the operation of this proposed rule, will be imperilled and menaced every session—aye, every week, and, I would almost say, every day of the session. We have heard very much about large financial and other interests in this country. It is only within the few last days that we have heard of great railway magnates coming to this Parliament with respect to financial assistance; with respect to pledging the credit of the country; with respect to additional subsidies and bonuses. It is inevitable that this Parliament should from time to time be invaded by those who are seeking to build up certain interests. Under our present rules, however, nothing could be railroaded through this House; every constituency would have the right to protect itself through its representative; every province would be in a position to defend itself in this Parliament. But change the present rules and the opportunity is afforded for an invasion of Parliament to secure special privileges. I do not cling to the idea that this rule is framed for that purpose, but I do say that in adopting it you are creating a dangerous engine that could be seized upon and taken advantage of by those who would be unworthy enough to do so. The right hon. leader of the Government and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) have said: 'Oh, no government would ever so act or do this or do that; this rule will be exercised reasonably, and fairly and justly.' That may be;

those hon. gentlemen may be so disposed, although I very much question it with respect to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government after the experience of a few days ago, when this measure was introduced, and when advantage was taken of an old rule with regard to moving the previous question. That was an invasion of the rights of a member, the leader of a party; that was an invasion of the rights of the people and party whom he represents, and it may occur again. But the point I desire to make is that such rules should be adopted as would give and preserve to the representatives of the people their rights and privileges, and that it is a matter of right that we claim, not a matter of grace. Many things are to come up during the present session of Parliament. There is the question of the Intercolonial railway; we have had experiences in the past—and I have no doubt we shall continue to have such experiences—with regard to land and franchise grabs; we shall have subsidy applications by the score, and, before the Governor General dissolves Parliament, supplementary estimates and resolutions with regard to railway and other subsidies may be brought down at the closing moment of this session when there is no time for consideration, and when, with addition of closure, the people of the country through their representatives will have no opportunity to scrutinize, to object and to protest. They will not have the privilege of scrutinizing in detail the items of supply that may be brought to the notice of this Parliament—a right which they have always enjoyed in the past. There are many other matters which may come up for consideration. The high cost of living is certainly a live issue in this country to-day; the very mention of the subject is pregnant with thought and with conjecture as to the causes of that condition and the methods of affording a remedy. Special privileges are being asked for by various interests before the committees of this House day in day out, session in and session out. We have under consideration by a committee of this House the Bank Act, a measure in which the people of this country from ocean to ocean are taking the deepest interest, but by the adoption of this resolution the people's representatives will not be afforded an opportunity of protesting against any iniquities which they may see lurking within the folds of that Act. There are many other economic questions likely to come up, but under the provisions of this resolution the free speech of the people's representatives can be curtailed; their liberty to express their opinions can be muzzled, and a great wrong may ensue with respect to any of these questions that may suddenly come up for consideration during the dying hours of the session. We may well ask what constitutes the state. It is not merely the territories involved; one of the greatest factors in the constitution of a state is the preservation of its constitutional rights. We defend our land as against invaders, but the danger is not from assaults from without, but from internal assaults that may be made from within when least expected. The curtailment of the privileges of members of this House of Commons makes possible iniquities that could under our present system be avoided. I cannot protest too strongly against this resolution, against its spirit, against its object and against its consequences, in so far as I can foresee what those consequences will be. I have said that it is practically a rule that may be utilized to buttress and entrench a corrupt and corrupting government; it may be utilized to protect looting of the treasury, to cover up fraud, to prevent inquiries, and the exposure of irregularities. Under the system hitherto prevailing in this Parliament. that was not possible; we have had evidence of that time and again in the course of preceding parliaments. By this resolution liberty will be dethroned, freedom abridged and free discussion stifled in Canada. No longer can we boast of being the freest of all peoples. What is truth, asked jesting Pilate, and would not stay for an answer. That is a scriptural quotation more correct, I trust, than was the quotation of the Minister of Finance. That question was asked two thousand years ago and he would not stay for an answer. We ask it to-day and the leaders of the Government and the members of the party behind them will not stay for an answer. They go out of the House when an effort is made to propound the truth to them. They keep out of the House and are silent with respect to the truths that are being uttered. I could not use language too extravagant to express all that I feel with regard to this resolution. I am not in accord with the Government in respect to its policy of centralization in connection with naval affairs but I most unhesitatingly say, strong as are my feelings against that measure, my opposition to this proposal is infinitely stronger, because it undermines the very foundations of the people's rights in matters of the government of Canada in this twentieth century. I have entered my protests against the resolution. They are uttered with conviction and sincerity. I realize that they may be uttered in vain, I realize that partyism has taken such a strong hold upon hon. gentlemen opposite that there will be no staying the tide that is rushing us on to this iniquity. But I do say that a day of retribution must come. This matter may be settled by your vote of to-night but it will not be settled right and nothing is ever settled until it is settled right. I would say in conclusion that in the great journal of things happening under the sun we, the people of this Dominion, find our account running under date of the 20th century of the Christian era. We find ourselves in peaceful possession of the fairest portion of the earth as regards extent of territory, fertility of soil and salubrity of climate. We find ourselves under the Government of a system of political institutions conducing more essentially to the ends of civil and religious liberty than any of which the history of former times tells us. We are the legal inheritors of these fundamental blessings. We toiled not in the acquirement or establishment of them; they are a legacy bequeathed to us by a once hardy, brave and patriotic but now lamented and departed race of ancestors. Theirs was the task (and nobly they performed it) to possess themselves, and through themselves, us of this goodly land and to uprear upon its hills and in its valleys a political edifice of liberty and equal rights. It is ours only to transmit these. The former unprofaned by the foot of an invader, the latter undecayed by the lapse of time and untorn by usurpation to the latest generation that fate shall permit the world to know. This task, gratitude to our fathers, justice to ourselves, duty to posterity and love for our species in general all imperatively require us faithfully to perform. How then shall we perform it? Shall it be by loosening our hold upon our constitutional and parliamentary rights? I think that that would be the suicidal course for free Canadians to adopt to-day and I would hope that this resolution could be defeated here and now and defeated for all time.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, the consideration of what should be the rules of this House must always be one of the most important questions that can engage the attention of this House. These rules are usually changed only at long intervals and so the effect of those changes, the influence they may have on the rights of members of the House and upon the rights of the people of this country, becomes a matter of the greatest possible moment. There is no matter which is so little understood by the public of this country and might I say also by members of this House as the effect of the rules of Parliament. I make that statement after having had some sixteen years experience of legislative and parliamentary life and after having seen during that period very many political changes, very many discussions of what the effect of rules is and what new rules ought to be. Neither in legislature nor in Parliament were there very many men who day in and day out had before them the purport, effect and importance of the rules of Parliament as they were at that time, as they had been or as they might be in future. By this resolution hon. gentlemen opposite propose to take away rights and privileges which have existed in this House for the representatives of the people and for the people themselves for a very long period of time. I can only say that it may be that my hon. friends, like a great many people in this country, have enjoyed for such a long period in Canada the advantages of free government and of free institutions that they have come to regard them as being so much a certainty that there is no particular reason to inquire where they came from or of thinking where they are likely to go. But I especially envied the Minister of Finance, though he has been only a year and a few months in this House, the certain and jaunty manner in which he approached the consideration of these rules, as to what they were, how they should be changed, and what the effect of the changes would be. I say that he was wholly the object of envy and of admiration because in looking around I saw hon. gentlemen who had much longer experience than I have had, and I knew that they, with becoming modesty, would have hesitated about approaching the consideration of the question with that absolute certainty of result which seemed to animate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. When he dropped into quotations, I could not help recalling a little scripture which I remember hearing long ago. 'Let not him that girdeth on his armour boast himself as he that putteth it off.' My hon. friend at the inception of his political career enters the lists and the discussion which we have been having on the rules and gave his opinion with absolute certainty as to its effect. I hope that after years of experience in this Parliament he will profit more than from reading books on the question. Now, these rules are very important, because they involve the rights of hon. members in this House. These rights have not been fixed by the majority of the day. They have been fixed by the usages of the Imperial Parliament and by the wisdom and judgment of men of moderation on both sides of politics who have had to do with the framing of the rules from 1867 to the present day. What are the rights and the purposes of Parliament? The purpose of Parliament is not merely to pass legislation at the will of the majority of the day. The purpose of Parliament is very much greater and wider than the passing of legislation which may happen to emanate from time to time from the treasury benches. The purposes of Parliament have been laid down by very high authorities, as consisting of three classes, the passing of legislation, the granting of supplies, and the remedying of grievances. Lord Palmerston, a Prime Minister of England, speaking in 1861 on a question that was before the Imperial Parliament said:

> This House has another function to discharge, and one highly conducive to the public interests—namely that of being the mouthpiece of the nation, the organ by which all opinions, all complaints, all motions of grievances, all hopes and expectations, all wishes and suggestions which may arise among the people at large, may be brought to an expression, may be discussed, examined, answered, rejected, or redressed. This I hold to be as important a function as the other two —namely, legislation and granting of supplies.

What is the situation before this House? It is that this Government has introduced a resolution with the view of enabling them to pass a Bill the reason for which and the nature and effect of which I will discuss later, which is absolutely destructive of the rights of the people of Canada and of their representatives in this House in regard to the granting of supplies and the remedying of grievances, two functions which hon. members of the two parties that comprise this Parliament have to discharge, because they are here to express the views of their constituents and to lay their grievances before this court of appeal. By means of the rules which are the result of the wisdom and usage to which I have referred, they have always been accorded those privileges and those full rights which the present Government propose to take away in order to enable them to place a piece of legislation on the statute books. That is the position in which we stand. Is it important that the right to ventilate the grievances of the people should be respected in this House? Is that one of the purposes for which Parliament meets, or is it not? What are we here for? Is it to register the decrees of the Government of the day from time to time in regard to legislation which they may choose to introduce? Or has every hon. member here the right to act as a representative of the people and with absolute freedom under the proper safeguards laid down by the wisdom of parliamentarians for ages, to ventilate the grievances of the people before Parliament? This has always been the supreme tribunal of the nation to which all grievances come. It is the political court of appeal which has absolute jurisdiction, and before which the humblest and the highest in this land can be arraigned.

By this closure my hon. friends opposite are attempting to prevent the possibility of the people asserting their right to have if necessary the arraignment before this tribunal of the highest man in the land whose political career and misdeeds should be investigated. Let me say, Sir, that the consiousness that this right existed uncurtailed and unhampered in this Parliament is fully present in the minds of the people. As Canada has developed the consciousness and the certainty of that right and jurisdiction have increased; it comes to every man who enters Canada, and it has been the great pride of our people. If these functions of Parliament are to be insidiously destroyed by the methods which hon. gentlemen opposite propose, in order to gratify a mere whim of their own, although the people of Canada have been quiescent because they knew as a matter of certainty that those rights existed, they will speedily realize the effects of the application of the principles which hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to introduce, they will realize that their freedom has gone and that their right to ventilate their grievances has forever disappeared. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says that the people on the streets are asking 'what are you talking about down there, why don't you do more?' I would like to know what the people of this country would ever know about public questions if there were no discussion in Parliament. If the regular Speaker had been in the Chair I should have liked to remind him of the time when he stood on the floor of this Parliament in 1896, and did what he thought was right in opposing the efforts of the Government of the day to impose coercion, as he would have called it, on Manitoba, and I should have liked to ask him whether the people of Canada would ever have heard what was involved in that question if he had not stood on the floor of Parliament and talked as he did, bringing before them the real issue. I would like to know of any great question which ever was understood by the people of Canada except by discussion in Parliament. It is all very well for office seekers and others who are looking for favours from hon. gentlemen opposite to say: 'Why don't you stop talking down there?' But if the public interests of this country the freedom of debate, the priceless heritage of justice and right which has come down to us through generations are to be swept away, to please office seekers and patronage hunters, then Canada indeed has fallen upon evil days.

What does this proposition do? It fetters every hon. member in this House and will fetter every hon. member who may come into this House unless the rule is repealed. It is for the benefit of the few men who happen to be in the Government of the country for the time being, and it is not even for the benefit of those who support the Government unless they are to be ranked hereafter as mere automatons, without any judgment and without any opinions upon public questions. Hon. members of this House on both sides are to be fettered and hampered hereafter for the benefit of the thirteen or fourteen gentlemen who, for the time being, happen to compose the Government of this country. I would like those gentlemen who talk about Parliament discussing public questions so much to tell me whether free discussion in Parliament has not frequently stopped injurious legislation that might have injured this country in many ways. I want him to compare that result with the other alleged result as to the important legislation it might have postponed, and I want to say that the balance will be found on the side of the fact that discussion has prevented injurious legislation being passed by this Parliament. What victories have not been won in this and other parliaments as the result of free speech? Look at the achievments in the Mother Country, the acts which have been placed upon the statute book, the reforms, the means of civilization and all those advancements which are the pride of every son of the Empire. Were they not the result of free speech? Were they not, in many cases, the result of the advocacy of reform before closure came in the Parliament of the Mother Country and was not that advocacy only possible as a result of the rules then in existence which permitted of the placing of the facts and the arguments before the people of England? So it has been in Canada.

There will be a loss of the rights of the people by the application of this gag method which this hon. gentleman proposes putting through. These are important considerations and they may have been lost sight of perhaps in the haste and hurry of a party debate and in the eagerness of the Government to rid itself of the opposition which has been developed with the utmost sincerity and the utmost belief in the righteousness of the cause on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. All these considerations will be swept away for the moment, but they cannot die and if crushed they will rise again. Let me give one or two illustrations. The wisdom of the fathers of Confederation placed in the British North America Act, for the protection of minorities in this country, certain safeguards. If hon. gentlemen, who to-day scorn the privileges and rights embodied in the British North America Act, had been there at the time of Confederation no rights of minorities would ever have been considered by them. But the men of that day did consider them and, having considered them, they placed them there, and they have remained there ever since protected by this Parliament of Canada under the rules which have been in existence and which were placed there very largely by the men who brought about Confederation. If at any time a majority, elected as the result of appeals to passion or prejudice in this country under these new rules which they have introduced to fetter and bind this Parliament, choose to do so, they could sweep away in a week every guard, every protection placed there for the preservation of our national life with regard to the rights of minorities.

The pitiful part of it is that this Government are using the minority that they have tied to their chariot wheels and using them upon this very question. Although that minority were elected in direct opposition to the policy for which they have voted, the Government are using them to take away the rights of minorities for ever in this country. A peculiar spectacle never before witnessed in any British legislature is here presented to us that the men who compose the minority in this country will be found writing their own death warrant, signing the repeal of the Act under which they and their forefathers have stood for the last century and whose rights are from this time onward imperilled if the majority in this country choose to take them away. That is what they are doing to-night. That will be the result when this closure will have been passed and some of these gentlemen will be able to see the results of their action. Some of us will live to see in Canada, the results of the vote that they will give under this coalition Government with which they have allowed themselves to become associated, for closure and the strangulation of the right of free speech.

I have pointed out to you, Mr. Speaker, that one of the great privileges of Parliament, in the interests of the people, has been the liberty to come here for the remedying of grievances. I have pointed out how these rights are to be curtailed and how they are being taken away. Henceforth freedom of action, except within the narrow lines laid down in these four resolutions, and independence of thought, are to be prostituted to the demands of a party machine. From to-night the Canadian Tammany Hall machine is to make the decrees which a shackled Parliament is to register. Government of the people, by the people and for the people has been the proud boast of those of us who live on the northern half of this continent. So long have they enjoyed these privileges and rights that the people have forgotten from whence they came and have come to believe that they could never be imperilled. But after this, instead of it being government of the people, for the people and by the people, it will be government of the machine, by the machine and for the machine party in this country. Hon. gentlemen have not been getting their legislation through just as fast as they would like; hence, because they have not been getting legislation through, they say: We want to have rules by which we can discuss it quickly and get it through quickly.

Incidentally, they propose to take away absolutely the right of this Parliament and the representatives of the people to bring their grievances before Parliament on the motion to go into Supply. On what possible pretext have hon. gentlemen attempted to justify their interference with the rights of the members of this House with regard to discussion on going into Supply? My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition listened to the argument put up by the right hon. leader of the Government, and what did the right hon. Prime Minister say? He stood up and quibbled in the way in which he usually does when he is in a corner and said that the right to move the adjournment of the House was not taken away, but he never faced the proposition of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that discussion in Supply was absolutely interfered with and rendered useless. My casuistical friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), that stormy petrel who always looms up when the Government is in a hard place, a sort of devil's advocate, who makes a splendid argument especially when he has to do with a bad case, came to the defence of the Government. It was not my privilege to be present when he discussed this question upon the first occasion, but I was amused upon reading 'Hansard' to see how he bolted when he came to defend the proposal of the Government with reference to this right of discussion on going into Committee of Supply. He boldly asserted that this was the strong part of the whole case, but having made that assertion, he rested there and did not attempt to go farther because even the shrewdness of my hon. friend would not enable him, or any other hon. member, to carry the argument along one step further. Why have they done this? We have not kept them sitting up on any motion for Supply. We could not get them down to Supply. We have been trying to get them to go into Supply. We have been trying to get my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) to bring down his Budget, which he will not do, this wonderful Budget of his which he tells us he cannot bring down because he has not brought down the West Indian agreement. When you ask him why he has not brought down the West Indian agreement, he immediately proceeds to get into an argument with my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and runs away from the question. The Government have no complaint in regard to Supply. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie never attempted to give any reason upon that question for the closure. What is the position in regard to the rights of the Opposition on this question of going into Supply? Of course there is not much use in quoting my hon. friend the leader of the Government. He has the delicious assurance to ask this House and the country to believe that, although he has introduced these rules by which he shuts the door and bangs and bolts it, he is going to be very nice about it; he is going to wear a pair of gloves in the enforcing of this rule and he is not going to be nasty about it. We do not believe him. We do not expect anything from him. We, on this side of the House, do not intend to take anything from him. Look at this doughty champion of the rights of a free people. Would you think that it was the Premier who used this language in 1908, just a short time ago:

> This is a very suitable occasion to bring that subject to the attention of the House, because all the liberties of the Commons of England, and our own are founded upon this right. All the liberties of the Commons of England were in the first place obtained by their insistance upon the right to refuse Supply until grievances were redressed. In the earlier times of the parliamentary history of Great Britain that fact stands out prominently above all others that the rights of the Commons of England not only to the redress of grievances, but their very right to enact the laws of the land, depended upon their firm insistence on the right to withhold Supply, unless the laws they demanded were framed and unless the grievances for which they sought relief were redressed. So the old tradition stands to-day not only in the Parliament of Great Britain, but in the parliaments of all the self-governing countries in the Empire, that upon a motion to go into Committee of Supply you can always discuss grievances, because the redress of grievances must precede the granting of Supply to the Crown.

The Premier of this country used these words only five years ago when he was leader of the Opposition. To-day apologetically he asks us to believe that, although he is putting through this nefarious rule, to prevent motions on going into Supply he will not enforce it. This man, who surrenders every principle contained in that statement of his in 1908, who is the person who in history will always be known as the man who by his influence, by his own pen and by his own hand, took away this right which has come down imperishable from generations, the right of a free people to ask for redress of grievances before granting Supply to the Crown.

Private members' day will become a thing of the past under this system. Of course hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that it will not; that you can always move motions. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie will make an argument that you can move a motion to do anything in this House after these rules are put in force and he will make a pretty good argument, too, although of course he will not be right. You will not get a Speaker to decide that way after the rules are put into force. We will be told that private members can always move motions. There is a beautiful instance of the way in which private legislation and individual effort to bring about reforms are encouraged by this Government. Upon the very first day of this session, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) placed upon the Order Paper two Bills, one in regard to the use of flags and the other in regard to the pollution of navigable waters. He has never moved them to the second reading. No other private Bill which has been introduced this session, whether by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House or by an hon. gentleman opposite, has been moved to the second reading. The Premier does not facilitate the second reading of Bills that even his supporters introduce. Even under the present rules, this Government has succeeded in paralyzing the legislation of this House and the right of private members to move in regard to matters of importance. What will happen when we will have about two private members' days at the beginning of the session, and when this great Government, which has so much legislation to do, will tell the people and the representatives of the people: There is no room for you in this House at all; we are the machine that is running this Parliament and this country and our decrees must be registered.

Why is this encroachment upon the rights of the people of this country? Oh, says some hon. gentleman, because it exists in the British Parliament. That ends the whole thing. Do not talk about it. That is the attitude that is intended to go with a good many people in this country who will not stop to think. What are the conditions in the British House of Commons? There are six hundred and seventy members in a chamber smaller than this; they legislate for over forty million people; they legislate in regard to all the subjects which this Parliament would have to legislate for, if we had all the work that is done by the nine legislatures that obtain in this Dominion outside of the federal Parliament. If we had to legislate for British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, the Maritime provinces with their individual legislatures, if all the business of these nine legislatures were thrown into this House in addition to the business which we now have, then my hon. friends might have some argument for introducing rules to limit debate. As we do not legislate in regard to matters of a private and local nature, as our conditions are entirely different from those in the British House of Commons, as in England to-day they legislate about the smallest matter that affects a crofter in the north of Scotland or anybody who lives in the farming district of Ireland, as they have no local legislatures of any kind, as anybody who sits down and looks at their 'Hansard' and studies their debates will see that they have the greatest and the most unwieldy parliamentary machine that is to be found anywhere in the world, and as it is impossible, as Ireland has long said, as Scotland says, as Wales says, for that Parliament to legislate satisfactorily, even under the stringent rules that they have imposed there, for the local and important interests that affect the United Kingdom, yet because a parliament of that kind, clogged as it is with all these interests of the smallest importance to questions of great foreign policy, has the closure, we in Canada must have a closure in order to be fashionable. We cannot build ships in Canada; we must go over to England to build them. They have a closure in England, so I suppose we must have one here. My friends were over in England last summer and they got this English fashion. A little microbe entered into their composition and when they got back to Canada they said: We must have one of these things too; we must have the closure. My hon. friend, the eloquent and interesting member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins), after hunting all over the world, found a closure everywhere. He did not venture to present Russia to this House as an example; that would have been going a little too far. I happen to have under my hand a statutory document containing an inquiry that was made in England in 1908, which shows that they have no closure in Austria, France, Germany or Spain. They have it in Russia. And between the desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to be fashionable and the desire to boss everybody, we have here a sort of Russo-English combination perpetrated in Canada. And they turn to the United States for an example. They tell us that the United States House of Representatives has a closure, and we should have one too.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): Reciprocity.

Mr. MACDONALD: I suppose it is a new phase of reciprocity. Now, anybody who knows anything about the Government of the United States knows the complete dissimilarity of conditions between the House of Representatives and the Canadian House of Commons. There is no government on the floor of the House of Representatives of the United States, no executive there responsible for administration in any way whatever. Besides, the House of Representatives of the United States governs about ninety millions of people. But see what is said about that House of Representatives in this parliamentary document which I have under my hand. This document contains a letter written from Washington, from the office of the Embassy there, where they look into matters very carefully, and they give this quotation as to the situation in the House of Representatives:

> In Washington the new Congressman meets a discipline which for cancelling individuality, is not equalled in any organization in the world possibly outside the German army. . . . The control of the body by a few men, their security in the rules, their seeming callousness to public sentiment, their ridicule of the ideal, their seeming contempt for enthusiastic initiative, all these are felt months before he finds definite evidence of their existence. . . . .

These are all things I have pointed out as sure to follow the adoption of these rules in this House.

> He finds in Congress a machine which is in its very nature a denial of the principle of democracy. . . . . a flat contradiction of the form of government which he has celebrated every Fourth of July.

A strange example on which to pattern the representative body of this country—Russia, and a condition of things in the United States which the people there themselves rebel against. In the United States they glory in the Senate over the fact that ill-digested legislation put through the House of Representatives receives from the second body of Congress the most careful attention and is scrutinized with the greatest particularity. In that body it is conceded by every student of affairs in the United States, you have the prudent attention which must be paid at all times to propositions of a legislative nature before they are crystallized into statutes. And why is all this being done? My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says that the increasing business of the country makes it necessary. There is nothing in that argument. My hon. friend, the one man who has to do with business propositions in this House, certainly has nothing to complain of. When he came along with his Bank Act we discussed it for two days and sent it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where it has been discussed with the greatest care. He cannot complain so far as his West India Treaty Bill and his budget are concerned, for he has not brought these forward for action. There is nothing whatever in the theory that the business of the country is being delayed. Other hon. gentlemen tell us frankly that these resolutions were introduced because of the discussion on the Navy Bill. Why should not we discuss this Navy Bill? What is this Parliament here for? Is it, as I suppose hon. gentlemen will expect us to do in the future, to stand up and vote when they bring a Bill and pass it through? Is that what we are here for? Or are we here for what our fathers were here for—the men who laid the foundations of this country, who considered questions with the greatest possible care, and who recognized that the greater and more important the problem submitted to us for action the greater the attention that should be paid to it. Here was the peculiar situation with regard to this proposal: the Government had no mandate for this proposition. In no province of this country was the Naval Bill discussed except in the province of Quebec, and as a result of that discussion there are twenty-one men sitting behind the Government who are here because they declared that they did not want Canada to have anything to do with naval expenditure at all. How much did the Minister of Finance talk about the navy in Ontario in the last election? How many times did he declare on the platform opposition to the policy of the late Government?

Mr. GRAHAM: He discussed tomatoes.

Mr. MACDONALD: He knows that he never discussed the navy.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not a word.

Mr. MACDONALD: What mandate has he on this question? I would ask every one of the other members who come from the province of Ontario, what mandate they had upon this question.

Mr. BURNHAM: Patriotism.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) had more to do with Ne Temere, he told us. I suppose the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) lay awake nights thinking about this navy question. There is not a member of the Government from Ontario who could produce reliable evidence to satisfy even one of his own colleagues that he had a mandate on this question, to say nothing of satisfying hon. members of the House generally. If these hon. gentlemen were even here as representatives of the old Conservative party, with its traditions and with the assertions made on behalf of that party in some parts of the Dominion, they might make an argument. But they are here as a coalition Government, sitting here since October, 1911, yet without the Prime Minister or the men with whom he made the coalition ever deigning to give this House an explanation of the terms upon which they got together in regard to the Naval Bill. We hear a great deal about parliamentary traditions; what a fine observance of parliamentary traditions characterizes the conduct of these hon. gentlemen! Take the history of the British Parliament; no such combination as exists in this House was ever made in England between public men of different stripes to form a government for a common purpose but the leader of the Government of that time or the men with whom he joined stood up in Parliament and frankly told the basis on which they became associated, what their common purposes were, and what their policies were with regard to public questions. Up to date, these hon. gentlemen have done nothing of the kind. And we have the peculiar spectacle of one of the members of this coalition, who declared that he was riveted and bolted to his seat and would not tell what had riveted and bolted him, breaking the bonds and running away. We are not told the reason why he went away; the Government never deigns to tell this House, why the coalition, so far as this gentleman was concerned, was broken. The rest of the coalition stands and the farce is perpetrated here of this combination having the temerity to force the closure upon the free people of Canada. This coalition Government, without even declaring the basis of their existence, come into this House offering, as they say, a free and generous gift to England in this navy proposition. A very free and generous gift is it not? A pitiable object it is to-day after the Canadian people have looked at it and discussed it for five or six months. The fate of this unfortunate measure might easily have been foreseen on account of the peculiar combination of parents to which it owes its existence. From the beginning the attempt has been made to force this measure upon the House of Commons. The Prime Minister did not ask the attention of Parliament for two days in each week, but insisted in taking up all the time from the beginning, to the exclusion of everything else—every other business disregarded. The Government would not have proceeded with any measure during the last three or four months had the Opposition not demanded and insisted that they should do so. They did not ask for Supply until the last day of the last month of the fiscal year. Why did they not do so? What right had these gentlemen to declare to the people that the business of the country was interfered with, in view of the actual facts? I have referred to what was done with regard to the Bank Act, and the Opposition treated every other piece of legislation submitted to this House in the fairest possible way, and did not unnecessarily obstruct any of them. All of them had fair and due consideration; all of them were properly dealt with. My hon. friends say we should not discuss the Naval Bill—this beautiful toy of theirs which they say should be looked at but not touched. Let me say that if there ever was before the Canadian Parliament a measure in respect of which there was a necessity for an absolutely full and free discussion, it is the naval question. It was necessary first to show to the people of Canada the combination that existed between the Conservative party and the Nationalists of Quebec in regard to this matter. It was necessary to show to them, in addition to that, that this Bill was the product of this nefarious arrangement entered into two years ago before the last election in the province of Quebec. Not only that, but hon. gentlemen have assumed that everybody in this country is enthusiastically in favour of this proposed naval expenditure. They might have known, after the discussion which took place in 1910, and from the events that transpired previous to their coming into power, that a large number of the people of this country did not believe in naval expenditure, either under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, or, perhaps, under the policy which we proposed in regard to the matter. It was the bounden duty of both parties in this country to discuss in Parliament, from the standpoint of those who believe we owe something to the Mother Country—and I am one of them—our position in regard to naval defence and our relations with the Motherland now and in the future, in order that the people of this country might know just what the proposition was, its full significance and probable consequences. Do hon. gentlemen think that a Bill which proposes to materially alter Canada's relations with the Mother Country should be brought up to-day and voted on next week? That is the way they are going to do it when they pass this measure of closure. What can they not do; what will they not do, under circumstances by virtue of which there will be placed upon this Parliament the incubus of the conditions that have disgraced the province of Manitoba for the last ten years? What is the avowed object of these gentlemen? Everybody who has read the history of the West; everybody who has studied the results of legislation in Manitoba within the last ten years knows that the rulings of the provincial House and the manner in which free discussion was gagged and throttled in that province was a disgrace to the whole Dominion of Canada, and that is what we are asked to impose upon this House by our vote this evening. Our stand in this House during the discussion of the naval measure was in the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me that the hon. gentleman has been going a little too far. I have in my hand a decision of Mr. Speaker Brand in the House of Commons, in which he refers to language implying on the part of the Government any course approaching trickery or unworthy procedure as being quite unparliamentary. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman's reference to what took place in Manitoba, and his statement that it was being done here, would come under that ruling.

Mr. MACDONALD: I merely wish to say that that is my honest estimation of the meaning of this resolution. I never permit myself to reflect upon any hon. gentleman personally in the course of my remarks, but I do submit that I have a right to characterize my estimation and my judgment as to what the meaning of this legislation is and as to what its effects will be.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member would be quite within his rights in treating it in that manner, but, as I understood him, he referred to very improper conduct in connection with the Manitoba legislature, characterizing it as disgraceful, and then said that the same thing was being done in this House. I do not think he should refer to it in that way.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am bound to say. Mr. Speaker, that I do not see your point, but in so far as I have infringed upon the rules, I bow to your ruling. I wish to be construed as endeavouring to keep within the rules, and I am willing to withdraw any remarks to which you may have referred. Now, what occurred in regard to this matter? After we returned here at the close of the Christmas holidays, and proceeded to take up the Naval Bill and discuss it, the Prime Minister suddenly got into a pet because the right hon. leader of the Opposition asked him for certain information, and while in that pet he started the House on a week's continuous sitting, promising to give information which he did not furnish in the meantime. Then on the night of March 10, after giving this information, he insisted on his whips keeping the House in continuous session, and during the course of the last two days of the week he proceeded to raise questions of order with regard to the amendments that had been before the House for a long period of time. After the discussion had been treated by him as being in order, and after he had given solemn answers to questions asked during the course of the debate, he proceeded to ask that these motions be ruled out of order. We all know the history of those few days; we all know the history of the assertion of right on the part of hon. members to the left of the Speaker, of which I shall always be proud. It will always be a matter of pride to every hon. member on this side of the House that he took part in that fight during the last two days of that memorable week. The Bill was then allowed to dawdle; nobody heard anything about it until about two weeks ago, when it was again suddenly brought up for consideration. Eloquent speeches were made, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance for the first time enlightened the House and the country as to what he thought of the proposed measure. Hon. gentlemen on both sides had been addressing the House with the utmost seriousness in regard to this question—no finality, however, having been reached—when, like a bolt from the blue, this measure—the resolution now under consideration was proposed to settle the question. The fact that on Wednesday this resolution was placed on the Order Paper, after the placid demeanor of the Prime Minister on Monday, is one of those things no one can understand, especially in view of the fact that he has asked hon. members on this side of the House to look upon him as one of those sleeping beauties who never does anything when he is awake. He has said that he would never unnecessarily give effect to these rules, and does not intend to do anything nasty. He was never going to put these rules into force, he did not intend to do anything unfair. How can we judge whether he means that when we recall his blissful attitude a few weeks ago when we last discussed the Navy Bill? We never can tell where these people are going to land. They have been gagging in connection with this Bill ever since the beginning of last December. No hon. member except one or two, on the opposite side, was permitted to speak. Occasionally an hon. gentleman would deign to give to the House and to the country his views on this great measure but the system of dealing with it was as I have outlined and in sheer pettishness or to gratify some dominant wish on the part of some dominant member of the Government, they put this closure on and are attempting to drive it through the House. Talk about parliamentary rules and parliamentary amenities? They have become a thing of the past as a result of the attitude of hon. gentlemen in regard to this matter. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) referred to the unconstitutionality of this resolution. I venture to say that the Minister of Justice will not assert that the Government had any right to submit this resolution in the form it is submitted. What was the position? There being no express rule of this House providing for a method of amending the rules of the House, you proceeded to rule I and found that the custom and usage in England before 1867 governed, and in 1867 there never had been a rule amended except by referring it to a special committee of the House of which Mr. Speaker was a member. Therefore, these hon.

gentlemen broke the rules in trying to impose this tyrannous Tory proposition upon the people of this country and upon this House. If any municipal body proceeded to pass a by-law as the Government are passing this resolution, that by-law would be declared illegal and invalid by every court in the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the by-law be also illegal and invalid if it were put through in the way the hon. member wants the resolution put through, by a committee of the House and then passed by the House?

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh, not at all; it would depend on the statute and usage governing the municipality. My hon. friend is at his old trick in making a suggestion of that kind but it will not do. My proposition was that if the proper method to amend the rules of the House was to proceed under the usage of the Imperial Parliament as before 1867, the Government are not proceeding along these lines.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I showed the cases last night where this procedure was adopted and the hon. member for Cape Breton this afternoon admitted that I was right.

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh, no, he did nothing of the kind. My hon. friend has been going along so well on this rule question that he has got it into his head that all that is necessary is for the Prime Minister to propose something and he will go out and make a case and prove it is true. The leader of the Opposition, with his forty years experience in Parliament, has told us on his responsibility of long experience what these rules mean. Every hon. gentleman here yesterday heard what the Prime Minister said on that point. The Prime Minister practically accepted the statements of the leader of the Opposition except in regard to motions for adjournment and he proceeded to apologize for them. He wants to pass them but not to use them, they are to be looked at but very seldom used. He wants to have them in the book but he assured us that they would not be used. If they are not going to be used why has he taken two weeks to try and put them on the statute-book? He wants to have a kind of parliamentary taws to frighten the boys on his side and on this side of the House. Why should he not be frank about it? The Minister of Public Works had the good sense not to talk about the rules; he is one of those frank spirits who would come out and say that he wanted to have these rules on the book in order to stop debate and to prevent any discussion on this side of the House that did not suit him. There is no question about that. We have delightful assurances that this lovely gloved hand of my right hon. friend will not be used and we are called on to accept the assurance of his most distinguished consideration, and we are asked to say: We do not believe that you are ever going to use these rules at all. I am afraid the Prime Minister has forgotten just where he is. He has got into the habit of these little answers, the idea of a soft answer turning away wrath. He says there is not much in these things, I will not use them at all. He told us in December last that he was coming to Parliament with this Naval Bill, he would present it and if Parliament did not pass it he would go to the country. On December 5 when he made his speech on the naval question he reiterated that statement that he was going to submit this measure to Parliament and if it was opposed he would appeal to the country. He said that twice. Parliament has refused to pass this Bill up to date. The reason why hon. gentlemen are asking this House to pass the closure is because Parliament has refused to pass the Bill up to date. When he made the speech in Montreal and when he spoke on the 5th of December he did not say that after he had passed closure in order to make Parliament pass this Bill he would go to the country. Let him make good his pledge and go to the country and then we will believe him after that. Where has he placed himself by this closure measure? He disarms himself from going to the other body of this Parliament and asking them to pass this measure on the basis that it has passed as every other measure that has gone there from this free Parliament. The assumption that the Senate should pay some attention to the verdict of the House of Commons and identify themselves with measures which are sent up to them is an assumption which, under constitutional rules and under all the precedents that have come down to us through the ages, does not apply in a case of this kind. If this Navy Bill leaves this House as the result of a closure resolution, under which we on this side of the House, representing the majority of the people of Canada upon this question, are muzzled and shackled and prevented from discussing it before the Canadian people, I hope that the Senate of Canada will justify itself, will show that it believes in the rights of a free parliament in this country, that it recognizes honest government and the views of a free people, and that it will throw that Bill out. That is what I hope they will do. Will my right hon. friend make good his pledge if the Senate does that?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is a very nice question Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CARVELL: He has promised them a session in September.

Mr. MACDONALD: If closure passes and everybody is tied up, when the Bill goes to the Senate, the Senate are supposed to be good little boys and to register the will of the new masters in this country. Of course we are not expected to have that pledge redeemed. We will have another session in September and the boys will get another $2,500 apiece. Will the Prime Minister of this country keep his pledge if the Senate throws out this Bill? That is the question which the people of this country will ask. They will want to know whether he is a man of his word from now on. Let me say that the Senate would be justified at this moment in adopting an amendment to their rules by which no Bill coming from this House could be considered by that body until at least one month's notice of the Government's intention to move it had been given, so that the public of Canada would have an opportunity of considering what their rights were, and of asserting their rights in regard to measures that went from this House. I hope that rule will be passed, because it is the only way in which the free people of Canada can ever get a legislative body to right their grievances. This Government with temporary power, this Government which holds office for a day and which will vanish as snowflakes before the noon-day sun, this Government in the short perriod they have been in power, pass legislation which cannot be defended before the people of Canada, and I hope the Senate, the other portion of the Government of this country, will assert themselves in regard to these matters and will show themselves to be the true representatives of the people of this country. When my right hon. friend assumes that hon. gentlemen in this House are going to adopt his idea of the gloved hand, he should remember his assurances made on the platform of 1908, when we were told that we were going to have government ownership of railways, the nationalization of telephones, and other things to which I might call your attention, Mr. Speaker, if it were not too late, matters which he has never mentioned since he assumed responsibility. We want him to make good somewhere as the Prime Minister of this country. The great question from now on, if the closure and the gag are to prevent the expression of the views of the people of this country, will be whether he is going to make good his word in regard to two or three things.

This measure has emanated in the most natural way from that Toryism which has always been noted for its disregard of the people's interests. After being in power for eighteen years, the old Conservative party in this country went up and down thanking God that they were not as other men were, that it was by good fortune that any miserable Grit was allowed to exist in Canada. Why, a member supporting the Government of that day stood up in this House and boldly declared that it was only to the Conservative party that the genius of government had been committed. A sort of divine right idea imbues the mind of the average Tory, which makes him naturally propose coercion. That is the idea that is at the root of this proposition. When it was argued that legislation was being stopped, and that something must be done in order to get legislation through, the old-fashioned Tory idea asserted itself, and they said: 'We will cut off their chance of raising any questions on going into Supply, we will make a good old-fashioned job of it, we will show those Grits and the people of Canada that we are running Canada.' That is what they are trying to do. It is a sort of transplanting of that good old Toryism which existed in the Old Country in the middle ages. The proposition which has emanated from them is a danger of free speech and to government by the people, an attempt to impose Russian or Manitoba methods on Canada. Every minority in Canada, whether racial, religious, or territorial, is menaced by this proposition; every reform in Canada will be prevented, and every individual effort and every aspiration of the people will be stunted. Parliament will become a rubber stamp to mark the decrees of hon. gentlemen opposite so long as Providence leaves them to misgovern this country. But their chickens will come home to roost. In old England today, the friends of home rule are enjoying the luxury of watching closure being applied for the purpose of driving through the House of Commons and against the will of the House of Lords and of the Tories of that land, a home rule measure. It is a case, Sir, of the fates meting out just retribution, and my hon. friends opposite will meet the same fate, only we will not have to wait so long as the home rulers in the Old Country have had to wait. The men who will vote to-night for this coercion measure, will live to see these very rules turned against them and their friends in this very House. Occasions will arise, and it may be very soon, when the attitude of the Opposition in this House will be vindicated beyond question, and it would only be just retribution if hon. gentlemen opposite who are responsible for this creation which they are jamming through the House of Commons against the will of the free representatives of the people, had a taste of their own medicine.

Sir, we protest on behalf of the free people of Canada against this destruction of their rights, against the interference with their freedom and against this infringement of their privileges, which have existed in this country ever since responsible government was introduced. Public opinion in this land has been quiescent upon those questions hitherto on account of the certainty that these privileges which have never been questioned up to this hour existed, but public opinion, reawakened by this imposition, by the putting into effect of this proposition by hon. gentlemen opposite, will revolt against the idea that we are going to have any Russian Duma in this country presided over by any czar, no matter what his name may be. As to the result, when the free people of this land realize where they are, there can be no question. The idea of a free and generous gift under the Naval Bill has long ago passed into the land of ridicule, and the theory that this resolution is necessary to put through any such proposition is entirely and absolutely ridiculous. Under cover of that allegation the Government are undertaking to seize the liberties of the people. With regard to this matter, once more I protest. Let the right hon. gentleman who leads the House fulfil his pledge, given at Montreal and in this House on the 5th December, that he would go to the country if his Bill were not passed. It has not been passed; let him go to the country; and we on this side of the House welcome an appeal as soon as he likes.

Sir EDMUND OSLER (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it will be permitted in this House for a man who is not a lawyer, and it is a lawyer's business to talk, to say a few words I almost expected to hear my hon. friends on the opposite side object to that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir EDMUND OSLER: With regard to the Naval Bill, I have not spoken or expressed any opinion. Anybody reading it can only form one opinion and that is that it is a gift—an individual gift—and not a policy. The Canadian people can well afford to give $35,000,000 if only to pay a little for what they have received from the Mother Country in the way of defence. If it is the wish of the Canadian people that they shall sponge on the Mother Country in the future, as they have done in the past, and that seems to be the wish of a large portion of this House, I for one am not proud of being a Canadian.

I have been in this House more or less—mostly less—for nearly seventeen years. It has been a wonder to me, from the day I came here until to-day, how sane men and business men, who undoubtedly outside of this House are sane men, can waste the time of the country and the time of the House in talking—may I say—I do not know whether I can apply it generally—absolute rubbish. I do not apply that remark especially to anyone, either on this side of the House or on the other side of the House, but I say for myself that my judgment is that there have not been twelve speeches delivered in this House, including the Government side and the Opposition side, since I have been here, that would cause any man to come from No. 16, or any other room, to listen, were it not for political purposes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir EDMUND OSLER: That is my opinion. If this Parliament were a body doing ordinary business in any other line than that of politics, the whole business of the country could be carried on and completed inside of two months. Any man who comes to Ottawa, having any other business to do, finds it a pretty serious task; and if it is to be the case that there shall be talk and talk with very little done, no one can come to Ottawa unless he be a professional politician. That is rather a serious thing for the country. Many of the speeches we have heard in this House during the last few months—I call them speeches, but they are not speeches—they are absolute drivel—have been delivered only for the purpose of obstruction.

Mr. GRAHAM: He could not have heard that 'good speech.'

Sir EDMUND OSLER: I have heard two or three good speeches, but the good speeches that I have heard have always come from the right hon. leader of the Government and the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I think that when these two right hon. gentlemen have made their speeches there is very little more to be said. I am not apologizing for anybody, because I include the whole House in what I say. I believe this House and this country will approve absolutely of the proposed closure. It will enable the business of the country to be carried on in a more businesslike way, and put a stoppage to discussion that is an absolute absurdity. This measure will not interfere with liberty; its object is to stop license. I hope that when our friends opposite, in the natural course of events, come upon this side of the House, they will properly carry out the closure and stop useless, senseless, miserable talk. I cannot imagine a more hideous purgatory than for members of this House, when they depart from here, to be bound to listen for the next seventeen years to such rambling chatter as has been talked in this House.

There has been a great deal made, or attempted to be made, of what has been spoken of by the Opposition press as a slight placed upon the right hon. leader of the Opposition. There is no member of this House who would willingly slight that right hon. gentleman. He has the respect of every hon. gentleman in this House. But I take it that he is still a hard-fighting politician —

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Sir EDMUND OSLER:—able to give, as he does give, and to take, as he ought to take, hard knocks when they come from his opponents, not a little china god that has to be dusted with a silk handkerchief and a camel's hair brush. He ought to take, and I would be sorry if he did not take manfully, the defeat which he sustained. The public and the members of Parliament respect the leader of the Opposition, and I believe there is not a member on this side of the House who would not be ashamed of himself if he had intentionally put a slight upon him.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Sir Edmund Osler) has a very distinguished brother who seriously propogated not long ago the theory that most men should be chloroformed to death at sixty. I never felt so favourably disposed to that theory as I do to-day. If I held the opinions on the right of free speech, which after all is a somewhat important distinction between man and the lower animals, which my hon. friend holds, I would take a room in an asylum for deaf mutes and stay there for the rest of my life. These comments are not too severe for the brief utterance of an hon. gentleman who rarely attends the House at all, when in that utterance he took the very superior position of characterizing as rubbish whatever is said by the great majority of the people with whom he happens to find himself associated. One does not want to dwell longer upon an unsavoury topic and I pass to what I hope will be a brief and a rational discussion of the resolution before the House.

It seems, so far as one can gather, that it is written in the book of fate that we are to have closure in the Parliament of Canada: 'It must needs be that offences come, but woe unto him by whom the offence cometh.' That is a word which gives me consolation in view of the operation which it is proposed shall be performed upon us, especially those who sit upon this side of the House.

I was surprised last evening to find my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) desirous of fathering this reform upon me. I wish he would keep his foundlings in his own nursery. I think my hon. friend really ought to learn the dangers of quoting what anyone says in this House apart from their context. My hon. friend quoted words in which I said: Why do the Government not have the moral courage which Mr. Gladstone had and introduce closure? It is quite true I said that. I have not had the time or the energy since my hon. friend spoke to look up the context, but I am perfectly sure that my memory is good when I remind him that I was discussing the possible alternatives by which the Government might relieve the House from the deadlock in which we found ourselves for two weeks. I think my hon. friend will admit that that was the setting of my remark which he quoted. It is open to me to commend those remarks to the Government at this moment, because they have imitated the moral courage of Mr. Gladstone in considering some road out of the difficulty in which Parliament finds itself; but it is open for me at the same time to doubt the political wisdom as to the road which they have chosen, because I doubted the political wisdom of Mr. Gladstone when he chose to pass closure in the British House of Commons. I want to repeat to-night what I said on the occasion to which my hon. friend referred: that there were three roads before the Government. I discussed them then and I might mention them now. There was the withdrawal of the Naval Aid Act; and anyone who has paid any attention to what I have said in this House will admit that again and again I have told the Government, as humbly and as modestly as I could, that the withdrawal of that Act was the only statesmanlike procedure that they could take in the circumstances. There was the possibility of an appeal to the people upon a vexed Imperial question and there was the other possibility of closure. One might be pretty sure about this Government, so far as I have had any experience of them, that if they have three posssible roads they will always choose the worst, and they have done so in this case. The reason why they have taken this particular course is not far to seek. I think Burke, in discussing political leaders in one of his writings gives us the reason in a famous epigram. He says: 'Indecision is the natural accomplice of violence.' When an indecisive government does take action, it usually takes it along the road of violence and believes for the moment that it is really firm and forcible in character.

I want to examine very briefly the arguments, the grounds, the precedents and the likely results of the alteration in our rules which this resolution proposes. The case for the resolution rests I think upon the statement of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister when he brought the resolution down to the House. I do not think

I do injustice to other speakers when I say so. It is true we have had other speeches.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) favoured us with his views upon this question and I do not think I am unfair to him when I say that he deserted what I understood to be the principle of his lifetime; and, like a great many famous apostates from St. Peter down to the present day, he got into a condition of extreme ill humour for the purposes of his renunciation. I do not know that I would care to refer further to his speech than to say that I am perfectly sure that by it he forfeited what he himself has regarded throughout life as one of the most cherished gifts of Providence to him, and that is the good opinion of a large portion of the race from which he sprang.

We had a speech from the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) on this subject, which was temperate and reasoned and moderate for the member for Brandon.

Mr. CARVELL: And not too poetic.

Mr. CLARK: In that speech he said: Obstruction has been followed in order to force an election and to get back to office. The Minister of Finance a few nights before had said, without rising from his seat: 'I do not believe anyone on that side wants an election.' This is a beautiful example of the harmonious condition of opinion that prevails upon the other side as to the unanimity of opinion on this side on that particular subject. The want of harmony that exists there as to what we want here does not exist here as to what they want there, because we know the last thing that any of them wants at the present time is an election. My hon. friend from Brandon went on to base his argument for the need of this closure resolution upon some very interesting researches which he had been making. I personally am very much indebted to him for making those researches which I would never have made myself, because he had the energy and the painstaking care to find that during the debates on the Naval Aid Act I had filled one hundred and fifty columns of 'Hansard.' He said that that was evidence of obstruction.

My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie referred to the impotence of Parliament. All this talk about the obstruction and the impotence of Parliament I think is really beside the mark; it traces effects to wrong causes. I am one of those —and I am bound to say that on this side of the House there have been differences of opinion on this subject—who absolutely deny that there has been any obstruction, if we take either the definition of Mr. Gladstone which my right hon. friend quoted or the definition of Speaker Brand which was quoted by my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) this afternoon. I am one of those who absolutely deny that there has been any obstruction, if we take either the definition of Mr. Gladstone which my right hon. friend quoted or the definition of Mr. Speaker Brand quoted by my hon. friend from South Cape Breton this afternoon. What was the definition of Mr. Gladstone?

Resistance to the will of the majority, otherwise than by argument.

I cannot recall a single word that I uttered which I did not feel was part of an argument, and I did not hear any of my hon. friends by whom I am surrounded, and of whom I am as proud as is my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), use any language which was not meant to be part of their argument. It might not have suited the superfine taste of my hon. friend from Toronto who has spoken, but we did the best we could, and that says a great deal more for us than we could say about some of the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. The fact is, the impotence of Parliament, if there has been such impotence, has been due to Government bungling and blundering in the way they brought their legislation before this House. If I were an art critic and were asked to give an opinion of a portrait of His late Majesty of sacred memory, I would be prepared to give my opinion of that portrait within a reasonable time. But if for that portrait kaleidoscopic views were brought continuously before me, common sense will tell anyone that I should need more time to discuss those views than to discuss the well-finished work of art in a single frame. And these kaleidoscopic views offered by the Government in regard to naval aid, seemed interminable.

We are told we have obstructed the business of this country. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance was very anxious to bring this charge home to us last week. Well, there is the whole question. And how far were my hon. friends opposite forwarding the business of Canada? I can understand they were going to help the business of the Old Country, but every time they spoke they raised a fresh argument against their own point of view. I do not see how the sending of $35,000,000, beyond the power of this Government to control, is going to help the business of Canada at all. Every time they spoke they gave us four or five fresh arguments against their methods. The fact is, we were face to face with a policy which was continually changing in the mouths of those who presented it; at one time they were on one side of the Atlantic and at another time on the other side of the Atlantic and we had to travel with these gentlemen in their varying views and cross the Atlantic to the side they might happen to be on at the time. My right hon. friend quoted Mr. Gladstone, but I am sure he cannot refer to a time when Mr. Gladstone was not willing to speak himself, and not only that, but willing to let his supporters speak in rebuttal of the arguments brought forward on the other side. Prolonged controversy was inevitable upon such a measure of importance, and I deny for my part that there has been any obstruction.

My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) made a speech on this subject; in fact, he made two speeches. I am sorry I did not hear his speech of last evening, but I heard his first speech. I am bound to say that the psychology of my hon. friend interests me immensely. He seems to have a mind which is a blank to broad principles yet associated with an enormous ability of analysis, and from that point of view I repeat his psychology is most interesting. If I happened to be in London with my hon. friend and lost him, I should look for him in Madame Tussaud's and should expect to find him in the Chamber of Horrors. I should expect to find him in that chamber turning over with infinite curiosity and the greatest possible pains the thumbscrews and various other instruments of torture used in the mediaeval ages of the world's history. For my part, I am not nearly so much interested in the variety of thumbscrew to be put upon me as I am in not having any thumbscrew put upon me at all. So, I do not propose to go at length into the speech of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie. But that hon. gentleman, with all his great reasoning power, can be guilty of sophistry when it suits his purpose, and in the speech I heard I think he was guilty of one or two full-blossomed sophisms. The hon. gentleman said: 'We only delayed the leader of the Opposition a minute and a half.' Well, what happened to the leader of the Opposition in that minute and a half is really the important thing to consider. But my hon. friend had the ability to concentrate the attention of those by whom he was surrounded upon that minute and a half. Suppose that he had called in a skilful surgeon who, in that minute and a half, proceeded to cut the tongue out of the leader of the Opposition—and a skilful surgeon could make a good dab at a man's tongue in a minute and a half—it might not matter much to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, and he might make very little of the time, but the operation would have horrible effects on the person who suffered it. And that is precisely what was done. In the minute and a half the tongue was practically cut out of my right hon. leader, because in that minute and a half a resolution was passed which forbade him to move an amendment to the resolution which was before the House. And what was the amendment which he would have proposed? Why, simply that the resolution brought down by the Government should be referred to a committee, presided over by Your Honour and composed of members on both sides of the House. And that amendment would have been in accordance with the procedure of the Parliament of Canada ever since Canada has had a Parliament. Am I to be told that the prevention of debate upon that subject was a light affront to my right hon. friend, or was a light affront to the constitutional procedure of this House ever since it existed? What had the minute and a half to do with it? It is what was done in that minute and a half that is important. Bourinot sets forth:

> Whenever it is necessary to appoint a committee in the Commons to revise the rules and standing orders of the House, it is customary to place it under the direction of Mr. Speaker.

My hon. friend knows that; he has declared it himself. Taking the language of Bourinot he said it has been the universal practice of this House to revise the rules by means of a committee. What becomes of my hon. friend's 'universal practice' in the face of the procedure that took place in the minute and a half of which he speaks? It is blown to the winds. The very amendment which my right hon. leader was about to move ought to have been the best guarantee that he would be heard by any party properly called 'Conservative.' The true Conservative has regard for precedent; he looks with veneration to the past and is slow to look on innovation with favour; and the precedent in this matter is that since Confederation these things have always been done by the methods my right hon. friend would have proposed if he had had an opportunity. That was not an unusual spectacle, because, just as the Conservative party are always monopolizing to themselves all the loyalty and all the constitutionalism that ever existed on the face of the earth, so when it suits their purpose, they are the first to turn away from constitutional procedure. This was well known to Hosea Biglow, who, caricaturing such people, says:

> We takes our stand upon the constitution,
> A fact of which there's bushels of proofs;
> Else why did we trample it under our hoofs?

The other sophistry of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie was that the rule under which my right hon. friend was prevented from speaking was inserted by the right hon. gentleman himself in the rules of parliament. That statement of my right hon. friend was much criticised, and his answer was that the rule was inserted by the right hon. gentleman in its present form. Let me remind him that the substance and main principle of the rule are older than my right hon. friend. What, then, becomes of the qualification 'in its present form?' Is it not a mere quibble, which, if not meant to mislead the country certainly had the effect of doing so? Not only was the rule in its substance not the invention of my right hon. friend, but it never was meant for the purpose to which it was put in this House. I think you will find, in authorities dating from the middle of the last century, that the object of the rule was to guard against partiality on the part of the Speaker in catching with his eye the particular member upon whom he was to call. But there was no partiality in this case; Mr. Speaker looked to the place where he always looks after the leader of the Government has spoken—he looked to the leader of the Opposition, and he saw him. The rule was twisted from any use to which it had ever been put in its history; it was twisted in a way which will remain a discredit and a pain to those who did it so long as life is vouchsafed to them.

My hon. friend last evening gave us another example of his reasoning in reply to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). The hon. member for South Wellington could not get the assent of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie to his interpretation of the rule, and far be it from me to give any opinion as to which of the two gentlemen is right. These refinements which are gone into by legal gentlemen are very hard to follow on the part of a plain man like myself. But the fact that they are so hard to follow by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, who has just spoken, and myself, is surely the best possible reason for having the rules sent to a committee so that when they do come before the House at least these legal gentlemen will be able to come to some kind of an agreement as to what the rules really mean. Consider the absurdity of these hon. gentlemen divesting themselves of the benefit of your knowledge, Mr. Speaker, which has been accumulated during a parliamentary experience extending over a period of forty years; consider the fact of hon. gentlemen opposite divesting themselves of your guidance, and of all assistance from anyone on this side of the House, and consider them bringing down brand new rules and having them supported in the way they have been, and by speeches such as that delivered by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and two gentlemen from Manitoba; and they expect the House to swallow such arguments. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie said that no sane government would do what the hon. member for South Wellington suggested. I suppose my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie is perfectly satisfied of the sanity of the present Government, but I do not know that that is a reason why we should be so sure about it on this side of the House. I do not of course use the term sanity in the sense that suggests a diseased mind. We all know that latin phrase, mens sana in corpore sano, and I am bound to say that hon. gentlemen opposite do not always come up to my view of what should constitute a sound mind in a sound body. I wanted during that prolonged debate to give my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie and those by whom he is surrounded some very useful medical instruction as to how unsound bodies are produced in this House, and he immediately proved my case by proceeding to call me to order, wasting an hour and three-quarters on the question as to whether or not I was in order in giving him that very necessary physiological information. The fact is that these rules should be so constituted that they would keep an insane government in order.

I have said that the case really rests with my hon. friend the Prime Minister. I have no objection to the tone of that speech—none of us could have; but what I feel inclined to ask him is, when he delivered that speech in such an exceedingly conciliatory tone, did he know what was going to follow? If he did not, I would like to know who leads the party opposite; if he did, then the tone leaves an impression on my mind that I hope my right hon. friend will not often create, or I shall lose at any rate a portion of the very high opinion I have had of him for the many years during which I have personally known him. I am bound to say that a speech delivered in that tone keeps the word of promise to the ear, but it breaks it to the hope. My right hon. friend's tone was all right; I liked the expressions he used. Fair play is a thing which appeals to any Britisher, but it is not only the words I like. I think that my right hon. friend should have interpreted the words in his action, but he handed over the interpretation to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, assisted by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and I think also my good friend the Minister of Railways, and their interpretation did not convey anything like the meaning conveyed by the good old expression itself. I did not see any fair play in what they did. I looked upon a scene that I hope shall never be seen again, not only within the precincts of this Parliament, but anywhere upon the surface of this globe, because, Sir, while many of the virtues that adorn humanity are difficult of attainment, I think it is one of the common adornments of humanity that we look with respect upon grey hairs. I cannot charge myself with having had anything but respect for those who have gone further in the walk of life than I have myself, but when those grey hairs adorn the head of a man who has spent his lifetime in attaining a position of the highest distinction that can come to a Canadian citizen; when those grey hairs are upon the head of a gentleman who has received the distinguished notice in Britain of royalty itself, then I say it was a spectacle I never want to see repeated that the majority in this House should pass a motion, twisting a rule from its purpose to do it, to close the mouth of the possessor of those grey hairs under any pretence or pretext of fair play. I notice that my hon. friend the member for Portage la Prairie laughs; that laugh can only come from a very careful student of those many awful gags and thumbscrews peculiar to the company in which I expect to find my hon. friend.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister took a very peculiar position in regard to this general subject of the revision of the rules. He said he was perfectly willing to debate the whole question in a new session. That was a giving away of his whole case. Why this mention of a new session? Why debate these rules in a new session? Why talk of debating the rules except that my right hon. friend knew that he was proceeding with unconstitutional methods, in a method which had not the sanction of precedent, in a way which would be understood to be a stultification of words he himself used a few years ago when similar changes were proposed from the other party in this House. If my right hon. friend and his party were prepared to discuss these rules in a new session, why do they want this resolution now? Presumably to pass the Naval Aid Act, to relieve us from the deadlock. That is the only possible answer to that question. Well, the people of Canada are to be closured to offer to Great Britain a gift which is only a loan, to be taken back when it has effected its double purpose of saving the Empire and incidentally loosening up the British investor. The hon. member for Rouville ((Mr. Lemieux) may well quote the newspaper in England which refers to this matter as an Imperial tragedy. I do not think it is so much of an Imperial tragedy; it is a great deal more of a jingo comedy. What will the people of Great Britain think, what would they think of a gift that was carried with these adornments and by this method? Of course it never will be carried

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) said in his speech last night: 'We are going to pass this, and don't you forget it, and we are going to pass the Naval Aid Act after.' He means that he is going to pass it through this House as a hearse passes through the gate of a cemetery. My right hon. friend and his followers must surely realize that there are a great many grounds upon which these proposals come with a bad grace from them. There is their record. The record of the party opposite on the Manitoba List Bill is exactly the record of what was done in the way of discussion on the Naval Aid Act and it is the record of hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. Then there is a record of what was done on the reciprocity question. The Minister of Justice tried to draw a distinction between reciprocity and the Naval Aid Act. He said reciprocity was a very serious Bill. Nobody would deny that. I think, in the sense he used it, it was not as serious a Bill as the Naval Aid Act and I will tell him why. If we had carried reciprocity we would have carried something that would be of great benefit to the Canadian people but if we carry the Naval Aid Act for the purpose of being the first step in a scheme of Imperial federation we would be carrying a Bill and taking a step the end of which we could not see and which, I think, would be the first step in breaking up instead of building up the Empire. But that is the position, the seriousness is all in connection with the Naval Aid Act and is all on our side. It comes with a bad grace from hon. gentlemen opposite because of the composite nature of the majority by which they are supported.

The Prime Minister upon this particular point said in so many words: We have a normal majority of forty-five. I do not suppose my right hon. friend really thought out the word 'normal,' when he applied it to a majority such as that which supports him. How is this majority constituted? Is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) a member of it? I presume he is one of the forty-five but how does he stand on the Naval Act and on the closure? Absolutely opposed to both of them. A normal majority? Why, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has seventeen supporters in this House who hold exactly his views upon both the Naval Aid Act and the closure. He has written a letter to the press in which he says that hon. gentlemen have no right to vote for the closure to put through a Bill in opposition to which they were elected to the House. Will the Postmaster General say that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was untrue to the pledges which he gave at the last election when he resigned from the Ministry? Will any one of the seventeen gentlemen who were elected as Nationalists in the last election stand up and say that the member for Jacques Cartier has been untrue to certain pledges by which he was elected in the last election? But if the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has been true to his pledges in resigning what about those who remained and what becomes of the normal majority of forty-five? My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has very strong views upon closure. He expressed them in London last summer. I suppose he is a member of the normal majority of forty-five by which my right hon. friend is supported. Has he been cabled to on this question? Has he given his sanction to closure? While he is very agile I do not think you could get him across the sea in that way by cable. What becomes of the normal majority? If I were asked to take out two gentlemen from the Cabinet apart from the leaders who rank as statesmen and politicians of experience, I should take the member for Jacques Cartier and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and so the normal majority proceeds to carry out a policy of closure which was opposed by the two best men in the Government as it was formed.

The Prime Minister comes to this House and gives as a plea for this closure that he has a normal majority of forty-five. I differ on that point; I say it is a very abnormal majority; in fact, it is not a majority of all; it does not represent a majority of our people. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin), in a very able though brief speech, proved that up to the hilt. Closure is an objectionable thing when it is applied by a majority to a minority but when it is applied by a government representing a minority to an opposition representing a majority of the people it is indefensible and intolerable. No answer is given to my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Boivin), except the usual answer of silence which prevails on the Government benches. No answer has been made to his calculation and I submit to the serious consideration of the minister, even at this late hour, that it would be well even now to consider whether the closure resolution should not be withdrawn.

My right hon. friend went on to found himself on quotations from the Liberal press, from articles written in a moment of irritation. I submit to my hon. friend that the articles of the Globe of two or three years ago were somewhat ephemeral literature on which he should base a departure from the policy and rules of this House that have been in practice for forty years. Why, I do not suppose that even the editor of the Globe attaches too much importance to what he wrote two years ago, and I am sure that nobody else attaches importance to what he wrote except the Prime Minister of Canada. I really think that this was too light literature on which to found such a serious departure in policy. His glance at the history of that period was very partial and very incomplete. What really ought to interest my right hon. friend is what answer he and his fellows in the Conservative party make to the Globe and other newspapers that he quoted. That is the really interesting thing. Was there ever such a curious thing as the Tory party of this country founding its policy upon articles written in the Globe three years ago? I never knew that they thought so much of the Globe, but to found a policy upon what the editor of the Globe wrote or what the editor of the Manitoba Free Press wrote three years ago, is surely a very curious course of procedure in statesmanship. The fact of the matter is that my right hon. friend was not so anxious to get good support for himself as to take the support from beneath his opponents. That is the only explanation I can give of his founding a policy upon such articles.

I do not want to take up the time of the House at this period of debate by giving quotations that have already been read. I will be exceedingly brief in that matter, but I have three samples of the kind of argument that was put up against the ephemeral literature upon which my right hon. friend founded his case. I find that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) had very strong opinions at that time. He said:

> I, for one, have no idea at all of submitting without protest to any of the well-defined liberties of this House as a parliamentary body being infringed upon.

Then my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) said:

> I trust that in amending the rules there will be no attempt to curtail the liberty of debate, or to hamper members from discussing in a proper manner the views they may wish to utter concerning the welfare of the country.

I have here another quotation which I commend in all seriousness to the House and to my right hon. friend. When this matter was discussed in this House there was a member who bore the name of Dr. Sproule, and he sat for East Grey. He was a well-known parliamentarian, a conscientious parliamentarian, who for many years had studied the rules and procedure, and who had taken an active and honourable part in the proceedings of the House of Commons, and I submit that any word that he uttered should fall upon attentive ears even upon those of the present Minister of Finance. I find that that hon. gentleman said:

> Rumours have been prevalent for some time past in the Government press that the rules of the House at an early date, and to introduce what is known as the closure. I would like to ask the First Minister if that is the intention in the revision of the rules? I would like to say that so far as I can judge the temper of parliamentarians generally, they regard the freedom of debate as one of the dearest rights of the representatives of the people; and if any attempt is made under the guise of amending the rules to prevent the freest discussion of all public questions,

I can only say that, in my judgment, the Government will invite a good deal of trouble.

Those were the advisers at that time, and that is the language that was addressed to this House by one who was then the hon. member for East Grey. My right hon. friend attached a great deal of importance to those advisers at that time, but he has called in others since, others who have a higher opinion of their own parliamentary performances, and who do not hesitate to state in the second session of their parliamentary experience, that they make some of the best speeches in this House. I can imagine my hon. friend the Minister of Finance saying to himself: Why, this Dr. Sproule, this member for East Grey, is an old fogy; he is out of date; and, as for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, why, he is another old fogy, he is out of date too; we will send the one to where he cannot guide us at all and the other to the antipodes. Then my hon. friend, who is so well satisfied with his own thinking powers and performances, actually takes this state of mind to the Prime Minister and says: 'You have got to be up-to-date, my friend; I am a modern; this closure is an institution of modern times.' He has brought modern issues, modern practices, into Parliament. They had their advent in Parliament when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance came here, and the astonishing thing is that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister throws over his old, well-trusted, and experienced advisers, and takes the opinions that are given to him by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I am getting a little old-fashioned myself, but I think my right hon. friend would be well advised to go slowly in the matter of these younger men whose advice he is taking.

The right hon. the Prime Minister said that we do not get the best men under present conditions. He says it is notorious that we do not get the best men in Parliament. I suppose he expects to get better men by putting a notice on the door, 'Muzzles provided.' I cannot share that view. I repeat what I said at the beginning that the power of abstract thought and the expression of that thought in articulate and coherent speech, is a power—

Mr. BURNHAM: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: is a power which is a little rare in the neighbourhood of Peterborough but which has not usually been despised by the more intelligent part of the civilized population of any country.

Before we take final leave of this matter, I want to enter a modest plea on behalf of speech, and in doing so I am in good company. I recall that Macaulay in his essay on the younger Pitt said that parliamentary ability is really speaking ability. Why, if we could not speak, Mr. Speaker, the only thing we could do would be to eat, perhaps gather a little money, and stand up and get counted at voting time. That is the condition to which we would be reduced if we could not speak.

I want to enter a modest plea on behalf of free speech. I very much question if we will get better men under the gag. I do not think so. The opinion is rather hard on us on this side of the House. My right hon. friend seems to think a great deal of his own supporters. We have samples of their speech from time to time, and I do not want to repeat in regard to ourselves what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance said about himself. I would not like to say that we on this side make all the best speeches in the House, but I think we compare favourably, man for man, with hon. members on the other side. But silence has fallen upon them over there, so that we ought to find the best support for the argument of my right hon. friend on the other side of the House, and I must say I fail to find it.

My right hon. friend said that other countries had this thing. That is a good old-fashioned Tory argument—what has been ought to continue to be except when it happens to be a method of revising the rules. That which has been, is now and ever shall be, is a good Tory principle, but like many principles of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, it is not meant to be practised. I do not think that, as a Canadian, I am disposed to subscribe to a doctrine that, whatever they have had in other countries, we should have in Canada. That is a horrible impediment to place in the way of human progress. Fifty years ago the Government might have got an argument from Fiji and all the other South Sea islands in favour of cannibalism on that ground. I do not think that is a good argument. I think it is the proud distinction of the Canadian people that they have been able for nearly fifty years of their national existence to carry on the debates of Parliament with a freedom which has been commendable. I think that is a proud distinction of the Canadian people that they ought to be slow to give away. There are many ways in which Canada will go ahead of every other nation that there has ever been on the face of the earth. There are many ways in which she ought to have a larger and not a smaller ambition than other nations. That is the meaning of progress and that is the only way we will make progress. Canada ought constantly to keep before her the idea that she will go ahead of the other nations of the world.

Now, I come to what was the main argument of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and that was the argument based upon British precedent. The more you examine British precedent the more it halts. Let me point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that, while they may seek for guidance from the precedents of Great Britain in this particular instance, they are not always so fond of British precedent. I have been the continual butt of hon. gentlemen opposite because I believe in freedom of trade. It seems that British precedent is only useful to hon. gentlemen opposite when it goes in for restriction and not when it goes in for freedom. English precedent has not guided them in other matters as they claim it has guided them on this matter. They are the British party when it suits their purpose, but they can be anti-British enough when it does not suit their purpose.

The conditions under which closure was applied in Britain are as dissimilar from the conditions in Canada to-day as the poles are dissimilar from the equator. I want to look at that for a short time. What was the condition of affairs that existed in the House of Commons at Westminster when Mr. Gladstone first proposed closure? I do not propose to go into this in extenso but to summarize in a sentence almost what was the condition in the British Parliament. You had a very small minority of members of the House of Commons who went to the House with the avowed purpose of stopping all discussion of any kind whatsoever. They not only did it but they avowed that that was their purpose in view. They said: We do not want to come to your Parliament, we want to stay at home and manage the affairs of our own country in Ireland, but if you insist upon refusing us our Parliament and forcing us to come here, we will do everything we can to twist and torture the rules so as to make parliamentary business impossible. Has that been the attitude of the party on this side of the House ? There is no hon. gentleman who has any fair-mindedness upon the other side of the House who will say that there is any resemblance between the small minority that had that avowed purpose in Great Britain and the larger half of the people of Canada as represented in the Opposition in this House, obstructing or opposing one particular measure while they have given every possible facility for the passage of every other portion of the Government's programme.

What was the condition outside of Parliament which rendered closure necessary in the time of Mr. Gladstone? What made it necessary for him to propose it? The condition of Ireland was a much more serious matter even than the condition in the House of Commons. Not only did the Irish members avow that they would make parliamentary proceedings impossible inside of the House, but they had established a Land League in Ireland, and the Land League had issued a no-rent manifesto. They had said that no rent should be paid with a view to breaking down the evils of landlordism in that country and, under the Land League, outrages were perpetrated upon man and beast and human lives were taken. It was under that condition of affairs in the House of Commons and in Ireland that Mr. Gladstone brought in the special legislation which he first proposed closure to secure the passage of. Will any hon. gentleman opposite tell us that there is any condition of affairs here to compare with that? I am not dealing with the merits of the Irish question, which I shall refer to in a moment, but I put it to the fairness of mind of my right hon. friend and his supporters. Is there any comparison between the condition in Great Britain at that time, the duties of parliament and the responsibility of government and what we have in Canada at the present time? There was an emergency which, as I have said, goes into summer hibernation every year. You may have heard of some emergency as late as last December, but everybody in the world laughs at any emergency to-day. It has gone; there is no emergency—none whatever. But the peculiar thing about the Government is that with the loss of the emergency the greater becomes their determination to pass the Naval Bill through the House and deprive the people and Parliament of the right of free speech in order to pass it.

The second measure, which has been pointed to again and again, was introduced under a Tory government, and it was a much more agreeable task for them than for Mr. Gladstone. They take to the subject more naturally. Anything in the way of tyranny always come more naturally to the Tories than to the Liberals. The second Act providing for closure was that which was introduced by Mr. Smith, leader of the House of Commons when Lord Salisbury was Prime Minister, Lord Salisbury was also confronted by the grave state of affairs in Ireland and by the same resolute, though numerically larger, band of Irish members in the House of Commons. Lord Salisbury had a double prescription at that time for the woes of Ireland. He said that they wanted twenty years of resolute government and he recommended those who did not like resolute government to go to Manitoba, which was then being talked about in Great Britain. We did not hear much about Alberta and Saskatchewan in the Old Country in 1887. Lord Morley, in commenting upon the policy of Lord Salisbury, said that it was a policy of manacles and Manitoba. To-day the measure of the Government is one of manacles from Manitoba. There is no doubt that this measure has found special favour in that province. I think we have ample evidence of that fact. In playful language I compared the hon Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) a little while ago with the Sultan of Perak. We have now the Sultan of Manitoba, and we have been given to understand that this is the measure of the Sultan. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) —shall I call them his train-bearers—are about the only hon. members who have had anything to say in favour of this measure. I think it may be fairly characterized as manacles from Manitoba to be placed upon the people of Canada in this House by the good folks that have come from Ontario.

What has been the history of Ireland? That was the condition of Ireland then. What has been the history of Ireland since and what has been the guidance of history for a wise statesman at this moment? The history of Ireland goes still more strongly against the proceedings of this Government. What has happened strengthens immensely the argument that what statesmen want to do is to get hold of a good policy; then they will commend their policy to the people, they will commend it to the majority of the House and that will silence the minority beyond what may be considered by even the majority as reasonable discussion. Six years after Mr. Gladstone introduced a very mild form of closure, he gave up coercion in Ireland forever. He introduced a mild form of closure to carry coercion Bills, but six years later he gave up coercion altogether. What became of Lord Salisbury's twenty years of resolute government? I was in Britain just about twenty years after he announced the policy of giving Ireland twenty years of resolute government. In January, 1906, just twenty years after that event, I was in Britain and I saw the Conservative party, which twenty years before had committed themselves to that policy, nearly wiped out of existence, and I saw the cause of Home Rule for Ireland won. I want to tell my right hon. friend that, although he may carry closure by what he calls a normal majority, long before twenty years have passed that closure will have done very different work from that which it is designed to do at the present moment. What is the use to which closure is going to be put in the United States at the present time? The Democratic party are going to introduce closure in order to get cheaper boots and shoes for working men and children. I call the attention of my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) to that. They are also introducing closure in order to impose taxes upon the great trusts which have battened and fattened upon the common people. I want to warn hon. gentlemen opposite that this sword cuts two ways, and I for one am not going to mourn, because I feel assured that long before twenty years have passed in the usage to which it will be put here, a new setting will be found for the lines:

> For God from evil still educes good,
> And freedom's seed still grows, though steeped in blood.

As my hon. friend said the other night, The poisoned chalice will find its way to the lips of those who have devised the poison. That is what it teaches us. My hon. friend thinks the time of Parliament will be saved by closure. Has he considered the British precedent in that connection? Has the time of the British Parliament been saved by closure? They have just met for a session, after two days of prorogation, and the previous session had lasted the round of the year. I do not see that there is much encouragement for my right hon. friend in his argument that we shall have shorter sessions as a result of closure. In that respect are we saving the time of Parliament at the present moment? I venture to think that human ingenuity is such that the more you stem the tide of free speech, the more avenues are found for it. We are making a mistake in giving away the proud history of Canada in this matter. It is a credit to Canada that for forty-six years since Confederation she has been able to close every one of her debates by some form of mutual consent. That is how rational beings should conduct themselves and that is how rational beings have conducted themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: Well, of course the rationality of the back benchers opposite is conceded by us. They are so rational that they mutually consent to anything; they mutually consent one moment to the fact that you must not debate a point of order, and the next moment they mutually consent to the fact that you can debate it to your heart's content.

My right hon. friend says that hon. members have to make a living, and that, if you cannot save the time of Parliament, they will not come here. The cure is not to stop speech; the cure is to pay them plenty for their work. Canada is rich enough to pay her members what is needed to support themselves here for all the time that the business of the country requires them to be here.

Mr. BOYCE: That is what you are after.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend from Algoma never used an interruption which had less application than the one which he has just used. I belong to the medical profession. I was trained in a profession where men work for large fees and often do not get paid them; but I believe my hon. friend is a lawyer who looks after the fees before he looks after the interests of the client, if there is any money around. I am not arguing this from my own point. My hon. friend ought to know that I am not one who cares whether he is elected next time or not except in so far his election is going to be good for the people of this country. He ought to know because he is a good North Yorkshireman; he is one of the nicest fellows outside the House that one could meet. I am not arguing about myself; I am arguing about a principle. Canada can afford to pay those who make her laws. I question very much whether the effect of the closure will be to save the time of Parliament. When I was a boy and a youth, I remember that Parliament used to meet in January or February in Great Britain and it invariably rose for grouse shooting which begins on the 12th of August. Last year they sat the round of the year, prorogued for two days and then they began another round of another year. I think the British precedent upon which my friend bases his action is not good.

The closure is not needed in Canada because the commonsense of the people has hitherto enabled them to do their business without it. It is not only not needed but it is calculated to be deleterious and mischievous because of the peculiar distribution of races and creeds in Canada. Why is it that we have not a permanent Speaker in Canada as they have in England? It is largely because we have a Speaker of one language for one Parliament and of another language for another Parliament. I should have thought that these conditions would have presented themselves to this Government, to the Postmaster General especially, and that he would have stood in this Parliament for the protection of the minority to which he belongs. The distribution of races and creeds in this country ought to have made this Government careful before it took this step.

There is another ground, which I approach with the utmost delicacy. I do not believe the standards of public life in this country are such as to justify us in bringing in closure. I give myself no airs as a Britisher on this subject, I know that in the time of Chatham and Walpole you could buy men as easily as you do fish. We do not have that condition of affairs to-day. When Sir Edward Grey became Foreign Secretary, he sold every foreign investment so that his judgment would be free from being warped and free from the suggestion of being warped by his own personal interest. You may judge of the standards of public life in Great Britain by the noise that has been created from the fact that Lloyd George, and Rufus Isaacs have dealt in a few Marconi shares. Such a thing would never be considered for a moment on this side of the Atlantic. The facts are all against the adoption of closure. Last week we had a debate in which one side seriously tried to prove that a ten-dollar homestead had been given to a man and that by the gift of that homestead he had made a fortune. I am not going into the merits of that matter. I only use it by way of illustration. The other side of the House immediately met that charge not by denial but by trying to prove that their opponents were as bad as they themselves were.

Where there is smoke there is fire, and I am afraid the word 'graft' has a real meaning in the public life of this country. I never knew the word during the first forty years of my life; I never heard it used on the other side of the Atlantic in that sense; but I am afraid it stands here. I bring no personal charges, and I judge no man; but I submit that in this early period of the history of Canada, when we have the invaluable and almost infinite resources of this country to look after, when Parliament and Government are the only rightful guardians of these things, it is a mistake to take these watch dogs from the door of the treasury, it is a mistake to interfere by one jot or one tittle with the rights of Parliament to make the freest investigation into the way the money of Canada is spent.

Now, this argument could have been anticipated, could have been prevented, if the Government had been candid in this matter. My right hon. friend says: We will call a new session, if you like, to consider the whole rules. I draw from that statement the inference that the Government are introducing this resolution merely to pass their Naval Aid Act. But, in that case, why has it been made applicable to Supply? There has been no obstruction of Supply, not a cent; no hon gentleman opposite dare say so having regard to his own repulation. Ministers have got all the Supply they wanted. In that connection I am going to take the whole responsibility of making a statement in this House which I think should go upon 'Hansard' for the instruction of posterity as to what happened in these troublous times with regard to Supply. I think I know the opinions that my fellow-members on this side hold, and the majority of them were so sure they were interpreting the will of the people correctly that at the end of March they would not have given Supply to my right hon. friend for these two months. But my leader, stickler for constitutional and righteous ideas, a real leader of his party, made with the right hon. the leader of the Government the arrangements that have usually been made in such cases. And what did he get for his love of constitutional practice? He got rule 17 and the previous question. And what I say to this country to-night, and what I say to this Parliament is: look on this picture and on that, and you will know how to vote when your next chance to vote comes. The election cannot be postponed for ever. There never was a time when the distinction was so clear in this country between Toryism and Liberalism as it is at the present time. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government and his Government were elected upon a policy of restriction, the restriction of the markets of the farmers. They have remained in power upon a policy of restriction, the restriction of the proper development of Canada as a nation within the Empire. Elected upon restriction of trade, remaining to restrict the development of Canada, they propose to establish both policies by the restriction of free speech. We stand for freedom on every count of the indictment; and we have not the shadow of a shade of doubt that the people of Canada stand with us.
